An important feature of the 1994 debate was what may be called the slanderfest of the “extreme right”, with the League as main target. For example, National Party Leader Tim Fischer (the member for Farrer) proudly stated: “Members of this house will know that over the years I have been involved in many battles against what we call the Far Right, the League of Rights and other organizations from the extreme Right, some members of whom hold the sort of odious racist views that this bill is intended to address. From that experience, I have come to know that these people do not think rationally about such issues. They interpret the actions of others, governments in particular, in terms of the twisted international conspiracies they imagine.”[\[59\]](#) Some might well see this sort of vague language as reckless vilification. Fischer went on to add: “In this respect, as in my constant and unflinching opposition to the Far Right, my record stands me in good stead and provides a self-evident defense against those who would seek to place the racist tag on my back or on the back of any member of the parliamentary National Party.”[\[60\]](#)

Government spokesman Mr. Latham (the member for Werriwa) had this to say: “Yet a small minority of racists and racist organizations do express and seek to incite racial intolerance and hatred..... We do have the League of Rights and we do have in election campaigns organizations such as Australians Against Further Immigration, which run their campaigns on a racist platform.”[\[61\]](#) An impartial analysis of both the named groups might also find evidence of unjust vilification here too.

Mr. Snow (the member for Eden-Monaro) said: “There is plenty of intolerance and bigotry about. For instance, the League of Rights has been mentioned in this debate. The League of Rights has a phobia about Zionism..... Zionism poses some ethereal threat, which I have never been able to perceive in spite of all the writings of those who are on the right, such as those in the League of Rights.”[\[62\]](#) That was not an intellectually substantial rebuttal of the League’s commentaries on Zionist and Jewish influence in politics. It was vilification offered in defense of an anti-vilification bill!

At least seven other speakers participated in the slanderfest.[\[63\]](#) Not a single speaker in the whole debate sought to stem this avalanche of misinformation and defamation. A significant body of Australians was being demonized, leading to the strong presumption that the discussion was not the completely free exchange of views it might seem to be. What power within the political order could be so powerful that it was able to frighten both major political parties into such a dishonorable group attack?

IX

It seems that Jewish influence played a large part in the formulation of the Racial Hatred bill of 1994. That is, if Graham Campbell is correct in claims made in his speech. Campbell said: “Mr. Keating finally announced that the bill would definitely be introduced before the end of 1994 at the 36th biennial conference of the Zionist Federation of Australia. The outgoing president of the ZFA, Mark Leibler, was one of those who had most strongly pushed for this bill, with criminal sanctions. The choice of venue for the announcement underlined from where the major lobbying pressure for the introduction of such a bill had come. Of course, other ethnic groups and academics have been involved and Aboriginals have been used as a stalking horse, but the main driving force has clearly been the Zionist lobby.”[\[64\]](#)

Mr. Campbell gave other examples of Jewish influence in Australia’s national politics: (1) At the same conference Mr. Keating announced the formation of a multicultural advisory council to advise the Government on cultural diversity dimensions of the centenary of Federation and the Olympic Games – and nominated as first (and at that stage only) member a lobbyist from the ZFA; (2) The imposition on Australia in 1988 of a “costly and counter-productive war-crimes trials process” [purely set up to catch alleged Nazis]; (3) The sacking of the secretary and deputy-secretary to the Immigration Department in 1990 because they resisted opening up a separate immigration category for Soviet Jews; and (4) The achievement of changes to the immigration rules which “were used to block controversial historian David Irving from entering Australia.”

British historian David Irving

Source: Photo taken from the Irving website that states: "These photographs are provided for use copyright free unless otherwise indicated" [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

In dealing with the attempt by Jewish spokesman Jeremy Jones to deny the truth of the third of these charges (which had been exposed in the Canberra Times by journalist Verona Burgess), Campbell said:

Neither the Zionist lobby nor anyone else has the right to use state authority to deny inconvenient facts of history and remain unchallenged. Nor should we attempt to suppress people who make such denials.... This is how we should approach those who deny the Holocaust. They should be met with the facts and arguments in open debate and not suppressed.... This bill is also designed to entrench one view of history as holy writ. All aspects of history, no matter how horrible and distressing to some people, should be open for critical examination and discussion. We cannot rule a line on the study of the past. I really believe that if we do not make a stand on this bill, then the authoritarian excesses will get worse.[\[65\]](#)

Campbell raised these matters with an admirable mixture of directness and tact: "I want to make it clear that in talking of the Zionist lobby, I am not talking about the great majority of Jews, many of whom, I know, are totally opposed to this bill. I am talking about a relatively small group in the Jewish community, disproportionately composed of authoritarian zealots who have crushed or silenced internal opposition. Due to a combination of money, position, relentless lobbying and the manipulation of their victim status, they have a very powerful influence, both in Australia and abroad."[\[66\]](#) Although many other speakers referred to Jewish matters, most being sympathetic to Jewish interests,[\[67\]](#) none of the twenty-six who followed Campbell made any significant reference to his comments about the role of the Zionist lobby in promoting the bill and otherwise strongly influencing Australian political affairs. The natural presumption is that they knew they could not refute his thesis but did not wish to be associated with it.

After being passed in the House of Representatives (the lower house of the Australian Parliament) on party lines 71-59 the bill was sent for consideration to the Australian Senate (the upper house), which arranged for its joint (all-party) Legal and Constitutional Committee to investigate it. As a result some public hearings were heard and I attended the one in Melbourne on 24th February 1995, having arranged in advance to be allowed to make a submission. What occurred there, I believe, casts considerable light on the nature of both the bill and its eventual acceptance by the Senate (after which in amended form it became law as part of the Racial Discrimination Act). After being invited to address the hearing by its chairman, ALP Senator Barney Cooney, I began by explaining that I appeared as a private citizen and representative of a long line of British and European writers who had defended free speech. I continued as follows:

Within the last 24 hours I have nearly completed a first reading of the transcript of the hearing held by this committee in Canberra a week ago on 17th February. This convinces me that there is still widespread confusion and error in many people about the nature of this bill and its implications. I remain convinced that the bill should be completely rejected at this stage, and that a new inquiry should be set up into relevant matters of society and race in this nation, an inquiry which is indisputably and manifestly impartial.

On page 276 of that transcript, we read that Senator Abetz said a week ago: "Let us say I was an outrageous revisionist of the academic view and said, 'The Holocaust did not exist, did not happen.' There are some people with that strange view of history." He indicated that he believed that such a view and the promotion thereof "would offend all Jewish people" and would be done "because of the race." He added that "these revisionists say these things" because they believe that "the Jews have perpetrated a fraud on society and got them to accept a version of history that was not true." Dr Sernack commented: "You may very well hold those beliefs in good faith but, nevertheless, it may not be reasonable in the circumstances to promulgate them." On page 280, Senator Abetz talked about a neo-Nazi and asked: "If there were a neo-Nazi meeting to which only neo-Nazis were invited to hear some revisionist history, would that be a public place?"

Later he referred to "this outrageous revisionist version of history". Later still he referred to the revisionist view of the Holocaust as "just diatribe." These and many other references throughout the transcript show that an inadequate background of knowledge is being brought to the public deliberations on this bill and that a crudeness and lack of subtlety of terminology are being employed, which means clearly that the nation is not yet ready to have legislation on such controversial matters of race and society framed, debated, legislated and enacted. A Miss Chung said, on page 302, "We can never wait for the perfect time." However, the present time, the present context, is grossly imperfect, so the voice of wisdom says, "Not yet, not yet."

I end with a series of challenging assertions which I am prepared to defend to the best of my ability. The bill is too vaguely worded and offers insufficient safeguards for intellectual freedom. The terms "racist" and "racism" are too vague for adequate debate. They are unscientific in the sense used by Professor Eric Voegelin of the term "fascism" in his seminal work, The New Science of Politics, published by the University of Chicago

Press in 1952 in America.[\[68\]](#) “Denial of the Holocaust” and allied terms are prejudicial and seriously misleading. Revisionist historians, David Irving and the Australian League of Rights, as well as many other individuals and groups in the so-called far right spectrum, are honourable and decent people who deserve a fair hearing. Their exclusion from public debate on this bill by the major media is a national intellectual scandal. The member for Kalgoorlie in the House of Representatives, Mr Graeme Campbell, was correct to state that the major impetus for this bill has come from Jewish Zionist pressure groups and individuals, as he said in the House debate of 15th and 16th November. Jewish Zionist influence on our national politics has become excessive and needs to be curbed.[\[69\]](#)

The chairman in response suggested that there was no problem “under this bill in saying that the Holocaust did not occur” and likened such a claim to stating that Dresden was not bombed in World War Two, that the Kokoda Trail did not exist, that there was no Burma Railway built by the Japanese with prisoner of war labor, or that William III was a homosexual [that is, a series of obvious absurdities]. In response I said:

I think that is arguable. In any case, this bill needs to be seen in a context that goes far beyond that of Australia; a context that includes a number of other countries that have been mentioned in debate on this matter, such as Britain, France, Germany, Austria, Canada, America, where it is quite plain that there is what appears to be a worldwide campaign to inhibit as much as possible the expression of certain controversial views on various topics associated with race, of which the Holocaust and the degree of Jewish influence in national and international politics is one.

The chairman asked why I picked out the Holocaust. I replied:

Mr. Chairman, I am a writer. I believe it is necessary, as [Joseph] Brodsky, one of the Nobel Prize winners for literature, said, to speak the whole truth fearlessly. It is necessary to go to the heart of the matter. This I believe is where the heart of the matter is. Moreover, when I look at the transcript of last week’s hearing, I see that there is quite a significant number of references to Jewish matters, to Nazism, neo-Nazism, the Holocaust and so on. This is a very important aspect of this bill.

The chairman repeated his question and I replied:

Because I think this takes us straight to the heart of the socio-political context in which this bill has been presented to the parliament. I have referred to the writings of Ian Dallas. I have one of his books here – a magnificent piece of writing called The Ten Symphonies of Gorka Konig.[\[70\]](#) He is a Muslim sheikh. He is a man of an extraordinary range of knowledge and intellect and he would argue that I am doing just that, that I am going to the heart of the matter. The other matters you refer to may be important but they are not as important as the one I am referring to.[\[71\]](#)

There now occurred an extraordinary intervention. It so happened that in this small room, containing some fifteen or so persons, one of them was none other than Mark Leibler, the very powerful and prominent Jewish activist and leader to whom Graeme Campbell had referred in his House of Representatives speech. Leibler now passionately intervened: “Mr. Chairman, this is a new experience for me. I have never been before a Senate committee and listened to something which is really straight out of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. Now that we are here, perhaps Mr. Jackson ought to be asked to explain. What he is obviously telling us is that all the ills of the world are attributable back to the Jews, that this is a worldwide conspiracy and the Jewish people are responsible for everything. I think it would be of interest to the committee if perhaps you asked Mr. Jackson to explain how all this happens, for example, how the Jews control the government here, how the Jews control the international community. Maybe you should invite him to explain.”<sup>[72]</sup> Rather taken aback by this onslaught and its intellectual crudity, I had the feeling that Leibler was acting a role, a familiar role for him, in which a person or a group or a view was not to be so much discussed as rubbished and hissed off the stage.

He and the chairman for a few moments discussed implications of Holocaust denial and its relationship to the bill. Leibler likened such “denial” to saying “that the moon does not exist or the sun or the earth is square.”<sup>[73]</sup> He then renewed his attack on me: “But Mr. Chairman, we have been treated here to something which I have never heard but I have seen on TV. This is The Protocols of the Elders of Zion. This gentleman is talking about a worldwide Jewish conspiracy controlling all governments, controlling the world. I would like to know how this is done. He should be asked to explain.”

Fortunately I was able to respond to these diatribes and the whole conversation is on the public record. I replied:

It should be quite plain, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Leibler has grossly misrepresented what I said and given a superb example of what I was talking about when I talked about inadequate terminology and an inadequate background knowledge. I said nothing whatever about the Jews being responsible for “all the ills of the world.” I have not talked about a conspiracy engineered by the Jews. To suggest that reality of the sun and the moon is comparable to the reality of a controversial historical event is nonsense. I resent very strongly the imputations that this gentleman has made about me.<sup>[74]</sup>

Leibler was plainly on the back foot now, as he had clearly ascribed to me views I had neither directly nor indirectly expressed, exaggerated statements I had made, and come up with a ludicrously stupid comparison. Leibler meanwhile continued in a very sarcastic voice: “I got it wrong, Mr. Chairman. It was not the Jews; it was the Zionists. Correct?”<sup>[75]</sup> It evidently did not occur to him that an apology was in order.

There now occurred another memorable exchange. The Chairman turned to a Mr. Pearce, a representative of the prestigious Victorian Council for Civil Liberties, and asked him: “Mr. Pearce, what do you say about that? Do you agree with what Mr. Jackson said?” Pearce replied: “With virtually none of what he said.”<sup>[76]</sup> It amazed and disappointed me that this man said nothing in support of my free speech position and nothing about the way in which Leibler had clearly misrepresented me. I had the conviction that foremost in his mind was the desire not to be associated in any way at all with what he regarded as “anti-Semitism.” And, if I am correct, that shows the degree to which a taboo has infected Australian society: an eleventh commandment – “Say no ill of the Jews.” Pearce went on to argue, effectively I thought, that Holocaust denial would become illegal if the bill was passed. Along the way he remarked: “We are here to talk about this bill and not the international Zionist controversy.”<sup>[77]</sup>

I managed to get another important point made: “No distinction has been made yet between the phrase ‘denial of the Holocaust’ and between revisionist historians of responsible and intellectual caliber who are not ‘denying the Holocaust’ but who are arguing that it has been exaggerated – something which any historian should be perfectly free to say about any particular historical event. Using the phrase ‘denial of the Holocaust’ constantly evades facing up to this question that it is not a matter of denial. It is a matter of questioning the extent of.”[78]

Soon the chairman was again comparing Holocaust denial to saying that no Australian troops were killed on the Burma Railway, and I was able to make an important point about that: “I am not aware of any significant body of historians of academic and intellectual quality who are making any denials about the Australian activities in the Burma railroad et cetera and, therefore I am afraid that comparison is quite irrelevant. But there is such a body making these sorts of comments about the Holocaust. Some of them are in jail in certain countries and I feel that this legislation is at least a step in the direction of putting Australian intellectuals who are dissidents in gaol.”[79]

Mr. Leibler soon remarked: “I could not really take this seriously. It is best that I say no more. I would hope that no-one else takes it any more seriously than I do.”[80] I thought his tone petulant; and it occurred to me that he was used to saying publicly the sort of defamatory things he had been saying about me without being effectively challenged. The major media often published Jewish attacks on their opponents but rarely if ever opinion articles by writers of “the extreme right”. But now, all of a sudden, he had a capable debating opponent from that stable who was being given opportunity to reply to him – and it was all going onto the public record. It seemed that he had grasped that he had better not take the debate with me any further.

A representative from the Australian Civil Liberties Union[81], Mr. Geoff Muirden, now uttered a word of support for me: “I feel that matters raised by the revisionists should be a matter of open debate. If the Jews take exception to it, as they apparently do, they should be able to meet the revisionists in open debate. There should not be this attempt to suppress David Irving from entering Australia.”[82]

The conversation moved to the topic of combating racism by means of educational programs and, after several speakers had given their views, I was able to speak:

We tend to assume in public discussions in this country and in other Western countries that education is a great good. It is surprising, however, how much written material by top quality minds now exists to suggest that modern mass education has in many respects been a very harmful influence. I can quote simply one top writer, Frithjof Schuon, one of the Perennialists School. He is a Muslim writer but he has argued this in quite a number of essays.[83] I have been listening with interest to what has been said in the later part of this discussion and it convinces me that the education first needs to begin among the people in this room and others who speak the kind of language that they speak. For I say again that if you use words like “racist” and “racism” you are using unscientific terminology, as Professor Voegelin said.

In response to this, Leibler sneered: “Mein Kampf.”[84] He had been reduced to the schoolboy tactic of mindless derision. What on earth had my speech to do with Hitler?! I responded: “Despite Mr. Leibler’s recent sneering comment, this is a serious matter, as I say. The word ‘racism’ needs to be very carefully examined; it will be found that it is used in many contexts with many ranges of meanings.” The chairman tried to sweep aside my insistence on careful defining.[85] I replied: “Still coming back to your question relating to racial hatred, incitement to it and so forth, can we afford as a nation to frame and pass in the parliament legislation that flies too much in the face of truth? I think that is a question that has not been adequately answered at all today. I agree with what Mr. Wakim has said in his colloquial language – if I may put it that way – that a hell of a lot of work has to be done in order to reverse stereotypes. I have been observing that just today, because although I have made a number of points which have certainly not been answered by anyone here, people have gone merrily along their way using the old stereotypes that I have queried.”[86]

The chairman tried to get Mr. Pearce to agree that legislation against racism is necessary in a multicultural society; but Pearce would not be drawn: “We do not see that the conduct which this bill will proscribe threatens social or public order. .... That is because there is no evidence that we have seen that the conduct which this legislation seeks to proscribe does threaten public and social order.”[87]

He was supported by Liberal Party Senator O’Chee: “I think that what Mr. Pearce is saying is that in a tolerant society you have room for free speech, and he is saying that if you curtail that principle you strike at the very principle of tolerance itself and ultimately you undermine a multicultural society.”[88] Pearce went on to explain that there were only “two very discrete and small categories of conduct” which the bill proscribed that were not already proscribed by other laws: “hate speech” and “giving offense or insulting someone”. He insisted: “There is simply no evidence that I have seen which demonstrates that conduct of that kind in Australia in 1995 threatens social order.”[89]

I had asked for definitions; Pearce had asked for evidence; neither of us had been satisfied in this hearing. I was allowed the final say by the chairman who kindly thanked me for ‘a very good contribution this afternoon’. I said: “Could I say something about the matter of conciliation which was raised?.... It was suggested that the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission conciliators are neutral. I think that that is a questionable statement. I think that, in the social-political context in which that body was set up, and in which it operates, an individual Australian citizen may well be entitled not to have confidence that such neutrality exists. I would ask every senator who is present here...” (“And who is a white Aryan Australian –”, Leibler sneeringly interrupted.).... “I would like to ask every senator here to see what I have had to say about that in my short 9-page letter of late January because I made a very serious comment for the senators about just this matter of conciliation.”[90]

Why did one of Australia’s most prominent and powerful Jewish leaders feel a need twice to try to undermine my remarks by associating me, without any justification from my words, with Nazism and Hitler? I left the hearing strengthened in my conviction that Jewish will was a prime motivation behind the bill and that it was not at all benign towards those who would oppose it, no matter how decent they were as people, no matter how eloquent and logical they were in argument. I also felt that I had witnessed an all-too-typical timidity in others when confronted by manifestations of that will.

XI

Three cases brought under the Racial Discrimination Act in its new form which became applicable in October 1995 (without including criminal sanctions for persons found guilty of inciting racial hatred, since the Australian Parliament had rejected that) aroused concern among supporters of free speech. In each case the defendant was found to have transgressed the Act and was accordingly punished. Two were bankrupted by lengthy legal processes which they had to some extent themselves initiated; these were Olga Scully, a Tasmanian woman of Russian ethnicity, and Dr. Fredrick Töben, a Victorian of German origins. The third defendant was a gun journalist from Melbourne’s mass circulation newspaper, the Herald Sun, Andrew Bolt, of Dutch ethnicity; and his case became a cause célèbre. Indeed it is widely understood that the verdict in Bolt’s case was what prompted Tony Abbott to promise reform of the Act in 2012 and to attempt this, unsuccessfully as it has turned out, after he became prime minister.

It appears that Scully had been making a practice of dropping unsolicited political pamphlets and videos in letter-boxes, as well as selling these and various books in a public marketplace. The record of proceedings states that some of these materials claimed that Germany did not engage in organized brutality during World War Two, and that Germans had been wrongly depicted as fiends. It was argued that the bodies of concentration camp victims were not burnt in gas ovens, but had ordinary cremation. The camp at Auschwitz had a swimming pool, school and theatre.[\[91\]](#)

It was also reported that Scully had distributed pamphlets alleging that the Holocaust was a lie, the Talmud encouraged pedophilia, Jews orchestrated the Port Arthur massacre[\[92\]](#), communism was a Jewish plot and the world banks, media and pornography are under Jewish control.

Some of the material she placed in Launceston letter-boxes included The Inadvertent Confession of a Jew, The Jewish Khazar Kingdom, Russian Jews Control Pornography, The Most Debated Question of our Time – Was There Really a Holocaust?, and an untitled excerpt on which was written in longhand: “The white Christian nations are the true seed of Israel. ‘The synagogue of Satan’ – who say they are Judean – but are lying frauds, are trying to force the white race to mongrelize.” There was also a document entitled “MFP – What Are Japan’s Motives?”, in which Scully had underlined the names of three individuals mentioned in the article, including that of Mr. David Rockefeller of Chase Manhattan Bank, and written in the margin next to their names “3 Jews”. On a photograph of Rockefeller she had written “Jew” across his forehead.[\[93\]](#)

Mr. Anthony Cavanough QC, the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity commissioner, gave his decision on 21st September 2000. He found that Scully had breached Section 18C of the Act. Factors that contributed to his finding included the “stridently anti-Semitic” tone of her material and “the inflammatory tone of the publications.” He rejected a claim by Scully that she made a clear distinction between “Talmudic/Zionist /Communist Jews” and “good” Jews, pointing out that her leaflets for the most part made no such distinction, but attacked Jews generally.

Justice Cavanough explained why he did not believe that the exemptions allowed in Section 18D (which Scully had, in any case, failed to invoke) would have exonerated her. He felt that the leaflets did not bear “on their face the appearance of reasonableness, good faith and genuineness of purpose.” Rather, they appeared to be “intended to defame and injure Jews”, whether or not they had other purposes. He believed that “the extreme nature of the imputations made, the intemperate and inflammatory tone of the leaflets and the great variety of subject matter which have been made vehicles for the imputations against Jews” combined “to suggest a lack of the reasonableness and good faith required by Section 18D... and a lack of the requisite ‘genuineness’ of purpose.”

The judge further explained that he did not think the exemption of “in good faith” could have been successfully invoked by Scully just because she “honestly or sincerely” held her negative views about Jews.

As for the criterion of “reasonableness,” he felt she would not have succeeded with this either, as her material was “unverified and lacking in persuasiveness.” He evidently did not feel that Scully had taken care prior to publication to establish the truth of the assertions in the pamphlets, or checked them for accuracy, or that she possessed any “special knowledge” which would justify publication. Moreover, he did not believe that her activities were carried out for any “genuine academic, artistic or scientific purpose” (another criterion for exemption). Rather, he saw them as the spreading of “hate propaganda”. He did not regard the leaflets as “reports” or as touching on “a subject of public interest”, since their topics as a whole were too broad to fit the statutory concept. A “subject of public interest could not be some general abstraction unrelated to the conduct of particular individuals.” Finally, the judge did not regard the publications as

“comment”, let alone “fair comment.”<sup>[94]</sup>

It is worth noting at this point some of the definitions contained in the “Guide to the Racial Hatred Act” published by the Australian Human Rights Commission on its website. The phrase “in good faith” is stated to mean that “the act [of publication] must have been done without spite, ill-will or any other improper motive”. If there has been “a culpably reckless and callous indifference” to injury that a targeted person or group would be likely to experience, this also would establish a lack of good faith. Moreover, if publication was found to be “unpersuasive” and having “a main purpose to humiliate and denigrate” a person or group, the exemption would also not excuse it.

The AHRC claims that the test for “done reasonably” is objective: “Whether or not the publisher... thought the act was reasonable, it is the ordinary person whose assessment is relevant. The context of the act or publication, community standards of morality and ethics and the impact on the community, on the targeted person or group and on race relations are all relevant.”

What is one to make of the significance of the Scully case? Was justice done? In my judgment Scully, despite her obviously genuine desire to witness to the truth and defend those she felt had been unfairly traduced, was considerably at fault. It seems to me that she had become fanatically obsessed with her political views, so that she relied on writings of unworthy quality, lost to some extent her sense of the humanity of those she was criticizing, lost the crucial awareness that there might be another side to the matter, lost the awareness that she herself might be in error to some extent, and failed to realize that dropping unsolicited material into letter-boxes is an invasion of privacy that is to be avoided if possible.

Her Jewish adversaries had grounds for complaint. Whether they were wise and compassionate in proceeding is a different issue. It is hard to believe that Scully’s activities constituted any seriously dangerous threat to the Jewish community. Perhaps it would have been nobler to ignore this case of a loner with “a bee in her bonnet.” Certainly her punishment of bankruptcy is excessive, but she partly brought this on herself by stubbornness and mismanagement of her case.

What is perhaps most important is the inevitable subjectivity that entered the judging of her case. The language of the Act itself is inevitably vague, ambiguous and capable of different interpretations by different observers. Some of Justice Cavanough’s opinions appear contestable. While there was error and crudity in some of Scully’s publications, there appears also to have been some truth in them, possibly dissident truth that deserves dissemination; and there is a danger that successful litigation in such a case has the effect of “throwing out the baby with the bath water.”

XII

A more important, more sensational and better known case brought under the Racial Discrimination Act was that initiated against Dr. Fredrick Töben by Jeremy Jones and the committee members of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry in 1996, a matter that was to drag out until 2009. Töben had established a revisionist website under the name of the Adelaide Institute. The complaint was that Töben through his website had engaged in malicious anti-Jewish propaganda. He had denied the Nazi genocide of the Jews and blamed Jews for the crimes committed under Stalin. He had stated that “the well-connected Jewish lobby wants to signal for those who are aware of their various rackets and schemes, that, if you cross them as an individual or as a nation, then they will boycott, persecute and ultimately punish you, using Gentile government agencies and Gentile taxpayers’ money.....One day in the not too distant future the tables might well have turned and the aroused Gentile world will mete out justice and vengeance.”[95]

A hearing took place before the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission in 1998 and on 10th October 2000 the Commission ruled that Töben must remove from the Adelaide Institute website material considered to be hate speech and refrain from republishing such or similar material. This ruling was confirmed by Justice Branson in the Federal Court on 17th September 2002. The offending material included: (1) claims that there is serious doubt that the Holocaust occurred; (2) statements that it is unlikely that there were homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz; (3) an accusation that Jewish people who are offended by and challenge Holocaust denial are of limited intelligence; (4) claims that some Jewish people, for improper purposes, including financial gain, have exaggerated the number of Jews killed during World War Two and the circumstances in which they were killed; (5) a home page statement headed “About the Adelaide Institute.”[9]

Like Scully, Töben had declined to make use of the exemptions allowable under Section 18D. In the Scully case Justice Hely had noted: “The present proceedings were not concerned with the truth or falsity of what was distributed by the respondent; rather, it was concerned with whether her leaflets were reasonably likely to offend, insult, humiliate or intimidate Jews in Australia..... The fact, if it be a fact, that assertions made in the leaflets may be wrong or inaccurate does not of itself establish a contravention of Section 18C. A true statement, or one which might in some way be shown to be true, does not mean that the statement is incapable of being offensive.”[97] Affronted by this situation, Scully and Töben preferred to refuse to participate in what they claimed were show trials in which truth was not a defense.

In the Töben case Justice Branson stated:

The applicant gave evidence that the Australian Jewish community has the highest percentage of survivors of the Holocaust of any Jewish community outside of Israel. Each of the first two of the imputations identified in [88] above thus challenges and denigrates a central aspect of the shared perception of Australian Jewry of its own modern history and the circumstances in which many of its members came to make their lives in Australia rather than in Europe. To the extent that the material conveys these imputations it is, in my view, more probable than not that it would engender feelings of hurt and pain in the living by reason of its challenge to deep seated belief as to the circumstances surrounding the deaths, or the displacement, of their parents or grandparents... [and that it] would engender in Jewish Australians a sense of being treated contemptuously, disrespectfully and offensively...

...it is more probable than not that the third and fourth of the imputations identified above, by reason of their calumnious nature, would offend, insult, hurt and wound members of Australian Jewry.

On these grounds the relevant publication was deemed to have been likely to “offend and insult” (two of the four key criteria of Section 18C) Australian Jewry. Justice Branson then explained why the other two criteria (“intimidate and humiliate”) were also applicable. Publication on such an easily accessed website was likely to “cause damage to the pride and self-respect of vulnerable members of the Australian Jewish community, such as, for example, the young and the impressionable..... Vulnerable members of the Jewish community... might well experience, whether consciously or unconsciously, pressure to renounce the cultural differences that identify them as part of the Jewish community.” Other Australian Jews might “become fearful of accessing the World Wide Web to search for information touching on their Jewish culture because of the risk of insult.”

Justice Branson also mentioned that none of the material produced by Töben established that he had acted “in good faith.”[\[98\]](#)

In April 2009 Töben was found guilty of contempt of court for having breached a court order. He unreservedly apologized for this, but was nevertheless jailed for three months. Töben has now become the highest-profile Holocaust revisionist in Australia. The media have widely reported his imprisonment in 1998 in Mannheim Prison in Germany for having “defamed the dead,” his attendance at President Ahmadinejad’s conference on the Holocaust in Iran in 2006, and the unsuccessful attempt by Germany to extradite him from the UK on a European arrest warrant in 2008.

It is difficult to resist the impression that Töben has an excessively combative personality and that on occasion he has pursued what, for him, has become a veritable crusade in an inappropriate manner. Attitudes and language published on the Adelaide Institute, which still operates but now under a different director, have at times, one feels, been unnecessarily aggressive as well as intemperate. In short, as with Scully, the Jewish community may have had some legitimate grounds for concern. At the same time, as again with the Scully case, there is reason to fear that the Racial Discrimination Act, as invoked against Töben, led to an unjust rejection of dissident views, sincerely and seriously offered; and some of Justice Branson’s argument, quoted above, appears to be tenuous.

---

Notes:

[1]	First published in The Times Literary Supplement , 15 September 1972 and later included in the Penguin Books 1987 edition of the novel.
[2]	Hansard (record of the House of Representatives debate on 15th and 16th November 1994), pp. 3336-3337.
[3]	Ibid, p. 3359.
[4]	Ibid, p. 3385.
[5]	Ibid, pp. 3387-3388.
[6]	Ibid, p. 3385.
[7]	Ibid, p. 3368.
[8]	Ibid, p. 3373.
[9]	Ibid, p. 3380.
[10]	Ibid, p. 3455.
[11]	Ibid, p. 3414 (Mr. Filing, the member for Moore), p. 3431 (Mr. Forrest, the member for Mallee), p. 3494 (Mr. Katter, the member for Kennedy), and p. 3499 (Mr. Slipper, the member for Fisher).
[12]	Ibid, p. 3450.
[13]	Ibid, p. 3384.

[14]	Tilmouth is an Aboriginal rights activist. The Central Land Council is an Australian Government statutory authority covering an area of 750,000 square kilometres in the southern half of the Northern Territory.
[15]	Hansard, op. cit., p. 3463.
[16]	Ibid, p. 3391.
[17]	Ibid, p. 3416.
[18]	Ibid, p. 3347.
[19]	Ibid, p. 3422.
[20]	Ibid, p. 3444.
[21]	Published by National Alliance, USA, 1978. See Section 3 ('Definitions') of Chapter XVIII ("The Everlasting Truth about Race"), p 491. Also see pp. 567-570. Simpson began his adult career as an idealistic believer in racial equality, but reported that his life experiences had taught him the untruth of it.
[22]	Published by Public Affairs Press, USA, 1961.
[23]	Op. cit., pp vii-viii.
[24]	Ibid, p. 28.
[25]	Ibid, p. 49.
[26]	Ibid, p. 84.
[27]	Published by Public Affairs Press, USA, 1967.
[28]	Op. cit., pp. 64, 67.
[29]	Ibid, pp. 70-71.
[30]	Ibid, p. 68.
[31]	Ibid, p. 95.
[32]	Frithjof Schuon, "The Meaning of Race," in Castes and Races (Perennial Books, UK, 1982), pp. 37, 39.
[33]	Published by 1st Books, USA, 2002.
[34]	Op. cit., p. 46..
[35]	Hansard, op. cit., p 3414.
[36]	Ibid, passim - for example, Mr. Lavarch (Dickson) p. 3337, Mr. Ruddock (Berowra) pp. 3342, 3347, Mr. Tanner (Melbourne) p. 3358, Mr. Filing (Moore) pp. 3415-3416, Mr. Charles (La Trobe) p. 3436.
[37]	Ibid, p. 3337.
[38]	Ibid, pp. 3344-3345.
[39]	Ibid, pp. 3414-3415.
[40]	Ibid, pp. 3429-3431.

[41]	Ibid, p. 3488.
[42]	Ibid, pp. 3498-3500.
[43]	Ibid, p. 3411.
[44]	Ibid, p. 3418.
[45]	Ibid, p. 3435.
[46]	Ibid, p. 3455.
[47]	Ibid, p. 3447.
[48]	Ibid, p. 3461.
[49]	Ibid, p. 3339 (Mr. Lavarch, the member for Dickson), p. 3362 (Mr. Williams, the member for Tangney), pp. 3373-3374 (Ms. Worth, the member for Adelaide), p. 3409 (Mr. Latham, the member for Werriwa) and others.
[50]	Ibid, pp. 3373-3374.
[51]	Putnam, Race and Reality , Public Affairs Press, USA, 1967, pp 26-30.
[52]	See G. Edward Griffin, The Fearful Master: a Second Look at the United Nations , Western Islands, USA, 1965 and William F. Jasper, Global Tyranny: Step by Step , Western Islands, USA, 1992. Consider also the part played by the secret communist, Alger Hiss, in the setting up of the UNO after World War Two and the powerful attempts to protect him after Whittaker Chambers outed him.
[53]	Ibid, pp. 3364-3365.
[54]	Ibid, p. 3409.
[55]	Carleton Putnam, Race and Reason , Public Affairs Press, USA, 1961, p. 85.
[56]	Hansard, op. cit., p. 3388.
[57]	Ibid, p. 3462.
[58]	Ibid, p. 3510.
[59]	Ibid, p. 3353.
[60]	Ibid, p. 3354.
[61]	Ibid, p. 3410.
[62]	Ibid, p. 3457.
[63]	Ibid, p. 3369 (Mrs. Sullivan, the member for Moncrieff), p. 3371 (Mr. Holding, the member for Melbourne Ports), p. 3384 (Mr. Cobb, the member for Parkes), p. 3418 (Ms. Henzell, the member for Capricornia), pp. 3427-3428 (Mr. Ferguson, the member for Reid), p. 3439 (Mr. Charles, the member for La Trobe), p. 3441 (Mr. O'Connor, the member for Corio).
[64]	Ibid, p. 3386.
[65]	Ibid, pp. 3386, 3388.
[66]	Ibid, p. 3386.

[67]	Ibid p. 3343 (Mr. Ruddock, the member for Berowra), p. 3350 (Mr. Gibson, the member for Moreton), p. 3372 (Mr. Holding, the member for Melbourne Ports), p. 3452 (Mr. Snowdon, the member for Northern Territory, p. 3368 (Mrs. Sullivan, the member for Moncrieff), p. 3389 (Mr. Tuckey, the member for O'Connor), p. 3356 (Mr. Tanner, the member for Melbourne), p. 3425 (Mr. Ferguson, the member for Reid), p. 3433 (Dr. Theophanous, the member for Calwell), p. 3457 (Mr. Snow, the member for Eden-Monaro), p. 3497 (Mr. Katter, the member for Kennedy).
[68]	See p. 30 of the 1966 Phoenix paperback edition: "A further symptom of such confusion is certain discussion habits. More than once in a discussion of a political topic it has happened that a student – and for that matter not always a student – would ask me how I defined fascism, or socialism, or some other ism of that order. And more than once I had to surprise the questioner – who apparently as part of a college education had picked up the idea that science was a warehouse of dictionary definitions – by my assurance that I did not feel obliged to indulge in such definitions, because movements of the suggested type, together with their symbolisms, were part of reality, that only concepts could be defined but not reality, and that it was highly doubtful whether the language symbols in question could be critically clarified to such a point that they were of any use in science."
[69]	Hansard, Senate – Legislation, Report of the Public Hearing of the Legal and Constitutional Committee of the Senate on Racial Discrimination and Racial Hatred, 24th February 1995, pp 381-382.
[70]	Published by Kegan Paul International, London, 1989. Dallas is a Scotsman who converted to Islam in 1967 and adopted the title and name of Shaykh Abdalqadir as-Sufi. He is the leader of the Murabitun movement.
[71]	Hansard, Senate – Legislation, op.cit., pp 382-383.
[72]	Ibid, p. 383.
[73]	Ibid, p. 383.
[74]	Ibid, p. 384.
[75]	Ibid, p. 384.
[76]	Ibid, p. 384.
[77]	Ibid, p. 384.
[78]	Ibid, p. 384.
[79]	Ibid, p. 385.
[80]	Ibid, p. 385.
[81]	The ACLU was founded by civil libertarian John Bennett after he had been expelled from the Victorian Council for Civil Liberties because of his support for free speech for historical revisionists.
[82]	Ibid, p. 386.
[83]	Frithjof Schuon, op.cit., p 29: "No doubt some will say that humanitarianism, far from being materialistic by definition, aims at reforming human nature by education and legislation; now it is contradictory to want to reform the human outside the divine since the latter is the essence of the former; to make the attempt is in the end to bring about miseries far worse than those from which one was trying to escape. Philosophical humanitarianism underestimates the immortal soul just because it overestimates the human animal; it compels people even to denigrate saints that they may the better be able to whitewash criminals; the one seems unable to go without the other. From this results oppression of those of contemplative bent from their most tender years: in the name of egalitarianism vocations are blurred and geniuses are worn down, by schools in particular and by official worldliness in general; every spiritual element is banished from professional and public life and this amounts to removing from life a great part of its content and condemning religion to a slow death. The modern levelling – which may call itself “democratic” – is the very opposite of the theocratic equality of the monotheistic religions, for it is founded, not on the theomorphism of man, but on his animality and his rebellion.”

[84]	Hansard. Senate – Legislation, op.cit, p 388.
[85]	Ibid, p. 393.
[86]	Ibid, p. 395.
[87]	Ibid, p. 396.
[88]	Ibid, p. 396.
[89]	Ibid, p. 396.
[90]	Ibid, p. 397.
[91]	As reported in Melbourne’s newspaper The Age on 2nd May 2002.
[92]	On 28th and 29th April 1996 a killing spree occurred in south-east Tasmania, mainly at the historic Port Arthur prison. 35 people were killed and 23 wounded. Martin Bryant, an intellectually disabled man, was found guilty and is serving life imprisonment. Shortly after this event the Australian Government introduced new legislation to restrict the private possession of firearms. Various conspiracy stories circulated after the massacre.
[93]	As reported in the finding of Mr. Anthony Cavanough QC, the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commissioner, dated 21st September 2000.
[94]	Ibid passim .
[95]	Federal Court of Australia, Jones v Töben (2002 FCA 1150), in the Introduction by Justice Branson to ‘Reasons for Judgement’ (accessed on the website of the Australian Human Rights Commission, 29th August 2014).
[96]	Op.cit., see Justice Branson’s judgment.
[97]	Quoted in ‘Olga Scully Update – 30 April 2003’ on the website of the Adelaide Institute, accessed 29th August 2014.
[98]	Federal Court of Australia, op. cit., see Sections 93, 94, 95, 96 and 101.

The Karski Report: the Holocaust in Miniature

by Jett Rucker

This issue of Inconvenient History features an article by Friedrich Jansson that is appropriate to the Year 2014, designated by the Sejm (legislature) of Poland the Year of (Jan) Karski, the intrepid courier/witness for the London-based government-in-exile of Poland, born in Poland one hundred years ago. The article discloses, for the first time of which I, an occasional student of the matter, am aware, the tortuous experience of the reports rendered in December 1942 by Karski, whose effigies today grace parks and university campuses from New York to Jerusalem. Celebrated in a 1994 hagiography titled Karski: How One Man Tried to Stop the Holocaust, his exploits on one undercover mission into the heart of German-occupied Europe have, as delineated in Jansson's masterful recapitulation, undergone a series of (partial) expungements and reconstructions that in their particulars and in their severity uncannily mimic the expungements and reconstructions that produced the Holocaust Narrative(s) with which everyone, at least who grew up in the West in the Twentieth Century, has been inculcated, with the usual result of entrenched, if unconsidered, belief in extensive untruths.

To rely upon the novel, but to me seemingly unchallengeable conclusions of Jansson's article, Karski undertook a hazardous mission into German-occupied Europe in the service of his London- (non-Communist) Polish employers to garner material that might serve his employer's purposes, which were both to oppose the present German occupation of Poland and to counter the efforts of a competing (Communist) entity in Moscow to gain international approval for their (ultimately successful) project of being recognized as the legitimate government of Poland. For this enterprise, Karski's employers had decided, like the British with their Balfour Declaration and other such maneuvers, to capitalize on the global financial strength of international Jewry, and in pursuit of this part of their agenda, to assign Karski to penetrate not only the Warsaw Ghetto, but at least one "extermination camp." Karski dutifully visited the Warsaw Ghetto (presumably no difficulty for him, as he had been supplied with papers identifying him as non-Jewish), and from there was directed to the "extermination camp" of Belzec, a small town 300Km to the southeast, where his contacts in the ghetto assured him he might witness an extermination camp in operation.

Karski (again, following Jansson and other reporters) went to Belzec, and there found no evidence of an extermination camp, but rather, a scene that closely fitted that of a transit camp.

And there, the problems arose. Karski, upon his return to London in November 1942, apparently first reported what he saw, though the accounts upon which we are forced to rely for that are, at the very least, interested. Interested in what? The answer is, several details, and one overriding concern: that the German occupiers be shown to be intent upon annihilation of the Jewish race, at least as it exists in Europe. And this concern required that Belzec in fact be the extermination camp that the anti-German party line insisted that it was, and not a mere transit camp from which inmates went forth to fates that could not be described with any degree of specificity, much less credibility.

Jan Karski Bench in Warsaw at the Museum of the History of Polish Jews

Source: By Mateusz Opasiński (Own work) [CC-BY-SA-3.0

(<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Concern about such matters was somewhat out-of-body for the Roman Catholic cadre that ran the London-based government-in-exile of Poland. But it was expedient—to a degree that bore on the success, the very life, of the group. This faction had to consider two potential deal-killers possibly residing in the hearts of Poles in Poland: sympathy for communism and hatred of the Jews. It had to choose between these predilections on the part of the modal Pole on the ground in the contested territory. It chose to side with the Jews, against the communists, a fact made ironic by the domination by Jews of the Communist regime that ultimately took over Poland after World War II.

Karski's report, then, for all the horrific detail true, exaggerated, and false, that it contained, undermined this agenda more than it served it. So it was suppressed. The London Polish government issued a Note<sup>[1]</sup> to the Allies arrayed against National Socialist Germany dated December 10, 1942 in which it delineated all manner of genocidal atrocities against Jews by the enemies of said "government," including, at Belzec, murder by electrocution of all (Jews) transported thence. The exigencies of propaganda and international (military) conflict are such that the particulars of Karski's eyewitness account had to be suppressed, at least until this proclamation had its intended (immediate) effect, that is, the issuance of the Joint Declaration by Members of the United Nations of December 17, 1942<sup>[2]</sup>, which claimed for the powers opposing Germany the divine purpose of protecting Europe's Jews from the depredations upon them of which it accused National Socialist Germany, perhaps a reprise of the United States's issuance of the Emancipation Proclamation at a similar point (about three years in) in the course of America's War between the States.

After this critical event, Jansson's account explains, parties hoping to gain from particulars—carefully selected and judiciously edited—of Karski's intrepid exploits publicized their favored versions of where he went, when he went there, what he saw, and what he made of it, sometimes without his knowledge of what they were publicizing, at other times with his complicity in "shading" the occasional detail or interpretation thereof. Between his understandable desire to serve his employer's—and his country's, as he must have seen it—immediate needs and his own requirements for continued employment and regard, Karski's own cooperation with the many campaigns of deception surrounding him seems more than understandable, particularly in the light of his subsequent utterances, whether calculated or careless, to set the record of what he saw straight.

What strikes me about this Saga of Karski is how the forces of interested, and sponsoring, parties' imperatives interacted with Karski's observations and his reports thereof, and with Karski's own enduring self-interest and with the interests of the various media and entities that so-to-speak fed upon his testimony produced a narrative that, viewed over time through the lens so assiduously provided us by Jansson, squirmed and wriggled in a pattern that reveals the forces themselves and the agendas motivating those who applied those forces.

The sponsoring party, the London-based Republic of Poland, is long gone. Also gone is the Soviet-Union-sponsored Communist regime that controlled Poland until about 1990, replaced by one that has sought membership in the European Community and NATO. Very much with us today, however, is the sovereign promoter of international Jewry, Israel, and the compelling narrative defended by its advocates of the Holocaust. Also with us, if only in the nature of annoying gnats buzzing about our eyelashes, is the "corporal's guard" of revisionists who have been advancing a cover story in fact invented by their dominant adversaries that Karski actually visited only a "sorting" camp at Izbica Lubelska, some distance from Belzec. Jansson's account destroys this particular spin on Karski's movements, dispositively.

But history, it would seem, is a football, as an object of contention between competing teams is aptly called, and just like the ball in a contest of what Americans call soccer, it is kicked back and forth, up and down, into goals, and outside them, by groups warring with all their might to make it go one way or another. The football analogy, however, is grossly deficient on at least one score, and that is the number of contending teams, and even the number of goals being sought in the contest. Originally, the contest in which Karski found himself caught up seemed to involve a mere three teams: the Communists, the non-Communist London government-in-exile, and the Germans, who held the ground in question. Over time, however (much more time than is involved in the usual football match), a group previously considered pawns in the game, the Jews, gained ascendancy by various means including the creation of the state of Israel, and it could be they, along with their massively powerful amen chorus in the United States, who have acquired the means to keep the game afoot, as it were, in the service of their own agendas and propagandistic desiderata.

Jansson's article powerfully depicts the "football" nature of history in general, but in particular that portion of history that concerns itself with the experiences of the Jews of Europe during the time of territorial expansion that Germany undertook during its interval of National Socialism. And like the Karski football, the Holocaust football has been "all over the field" over its long and active life. Putting aside prewar adumbrations such as those cataloged in Don Heddesheimer's 2005 The First Holocaust, the Note from the Republic of Poland cited above may have been the "kick-off" for the historical event that overshadows all others before or since, with the subsequent United Nations Declaration counting as the "extra point" (this analogy from American football).

The "launch" provided by the Note of December 10, despite styling its own details as "fully authenticated," was wobbly enough. Larded throughout with phrases such as "As far as is known" and "It is reliably reported," the Note details the specialization of the Belzec camp in murder by electrocution while assigning the use of poison gas to that at Chelmno. It takes one detail from Karski's report and relates the use of corrosive chemicals on the floors of railcars to slowly and painfully kill the Jews forced to ride in said rolling torture chambers.

From there, the Holocaust was off on a merry chase that eventually revived the tired World War I canard of soap made from the fat of murdered Jews, lampshades made from human skin, and so on in a litany that is repeated (though critically) even in the pages of this very journal.

I have found it illuminating to project the patterns depicted in Friedrich Jansson's article upon what I know, what I have heard, what I used to know, and what I now disbelieve, of the Holocaust.

It seems, upon due consideration, to be all of a piece. And by no means just as to the Holocaust.

---

Notes:

The Origin of the Soviet Report on the "Next-Generation" Homicidal Gas Chamber at Sachsenhausen

by Friedrich Jansson

According to the standard accounts of the camp, Sachsenhausen possessed a small homicidal gas chamber from 1943 to 1945, in which several thousand people were killed. This chamber, however, has received only a marginal treatment in the literature. One of the reasons for this marginality is that the technical operation of this chamber clashes with the standard overall portrayal of National Socialist gassing technologies. The gassings did not take place with Zyklon B, as in the alleged homicidal gassings at Auschwitz and Majdanek, nor with engine exhaust, as is claimed took place at Chelmno, Belzec, Sobibor, and Treblinka, nor with pure carbon monoxide, as is stated for some euthanasia institutions and Majdanek. Rather, they took place with an elaborate gassing apparatus that used a gas in liquid form. This apparatus was given a detailed description, including diagrams, in a report authored by a Soviet team which was active in the camp from 10th to 22nd June, 1945. This report, together with the confirmatory statements which the Soviet investigators extracted from former Sachsenhausen workers in the context of the Berlin-Pankow Sachsenhausen trial, forms the foundation of the accepted account of the functioning of the Sachsenhausen homicidal gas chamber. The description of the gas chamber's functioning contained in the Soviet technical report is not derived from any earlier source, nor is it confirmed by sources originating outside of Soviet aegis, which rarely offer any description of the gas chamber's nature and, when they do, disagree with the Soviet technical report.

In perhaps the first revisionist article on the alleged Sachsenhausen gas chamber, Carlo Mattogno observed<sup>[1]</sup> that the system described in the Soviet technical report is unquestionably based on the DEGESCH Kreislauf system for Zyklon B gas chambers, without any indication of specialized killing technology. The Kreislauf system is not alleged to have been turned to homicidal use at other locations, but is supposed to have been used only for its intended (non-homicidal) purposes. The Soviet report, therefore, depicts a technical system that matches the apparatus accepted to have been used throughout the rest of Europe only for sanitary gassings, and does not match any of the systems said to have been used for homicidal purposes. This raises the strong suspicion that the details of the gassing system described in the Soviet technical report on Sachsenhausen were filled in from an actual delousing-gas-chamber system rather than from any homicidal gas chamber.

In (implicitly) responding to this line of argument, Günter Morsch has, while offhandedly conceding a similarity to the DEGESCH Kreislauf system, emphasized the novelty of the Sachsenhausen gassing system<sup>[2]</sup> and even claimed that it represented a "new, more perfect killing technique."<sup>[3]</sup> The claim of novelty for the Sachsenhausen system rests on the one significant difference between regular DEGESCH Kreislauf gas chambers and the installation described in the Soviet technical report, namely that the Soviet report describes a system that used a bottled gas rather than Zyklon B. The aim of this paper is to explain the origin of the Soviet technical report in a way that accounts for this discrepancy. We will see that there is in fact a well-documented explanation for this feature of the Soviet technical report, which places the Soviet-depicted Sachsenhausen gassing installation firmly within the history of sanitary gassings, and which excludes the homicidal interpretation.

The Sachsenhausen Delousing Chambers and their Conversion to Areginal

At his trial, and in a pretrial interrogation, Bruno Tesch testified that in 1944 he had converted the gas chambers at Sachsenhausen from the Zyklon B system to the use of Areginal gas. During the third day of his trial, on 4th March 1946, he gave two pieces of testimony on this subject, although the matter was largely unrelated to the court's interest. In the first piece of testimony, he explained the work he had done at Sachsenhausen:

Q. What was the purpose of your visit to Sachsenhausen?

A. I showed the disinfection chambers to the Minister of the interior and to a certain Mr. Seeling. I also paid a second visit to Sachsenhausen about July 1944 when I had a gas chamber altered from working on prussic acid to working on "Original."[\[4\]](#)

Q. What was the gas chamber in Sachsenhausen being used for?

A. It was being used for the disinfection of persons' clothing.

Q. Have you seen the gas chamber working?

A. Yes.[\[5\]](#)

The topic recurred shortly thereafter:

Q. Which gas was used to operate these [10-cubic-meter delousing] gas chambers?

A. Blausaure, prussic acid, Zyklon.

Q. Has an experiment ever been made to use another gas for these gas chambers?

A. Yes, in 1944 the main firm was burnt out and we tried to use "Original" gas.

[...]

Q. Has this "Original" gas ever been used in concentration camps?

A. Yes, it has been done in the concentration camp Sachsenhausen.[\[6\]](#)

During an interrogation months earlier, Tesch had stated:

Q. Did you yourself supervise the extermination of vermin in Sachsenhausen?

A. No. They were 10 cubic metres chambers, which were placed four in a row.

Q. In what part of the camp?

A. Through the first gate when I was stopped. Then through the second gate and about 500 metres further on, on the right hand side.

[...]

Q. Did you give any instruction in the use of your gas to any personnel inside Sachsenhausen?

A. There were people present when the plant was installed and I explained their use to them; they were prisoners. The same prisoners were also present when I visited the camp in 1944; they recognised me. Then the plant was redesigned.[\[7\]](#)

Tesch's account of the Sachsenhausen delousing chambers is supported by a number of other sources. In a December 1945 statement made in the context of Tesch's trial, the managing director of DEGESCH, Dr. Gerhard Peters, confirmed Tesch's statement that there were four 10-cubic-meter gas chambers at Sachsenhausen,[\[8\]](#) a statement he repeated in a 24 February 1947 affidavit.[\[9\]](#) More importantly, in an October 1947 interrogation, not only did Peters affirm that there were four (delousing) gas chambers at Sachsenhausen, but also was questioned about Areginal gas, and confirmed that due to the scarcity of Zyklon B, Areginal gas had been introduced for delousing at Sachsenhausen.[10] Still further support comes from an interrogation of Tesch and Stabenow employee Erika Rathcke, who mentioned that a doctor at the SS disinfestation school at Sachsenhausen had performed experiments with Areginal.[11]

Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-H0403-0201-003
Foto: o. Ang. | 1936/1943 ca.

Wilhelm Frick and Heinrich Himmler visit Sachsenhausen circa 1936.

Source: Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-H0403-0201-003 / CC-BY-SA [CC-BY-SA-3.0-de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Contemporary documents also confirm that conversions of Zyklon B gas chambers were underway in the summer of 1944. A letter from Auschwitz Zentralbauleitung chief Werner Jothann to Tesch & Stabenow remarks:

Our garrison surgeon informs us that, of late, Zyklon B gassing chambers are to be converted to "Areginal gassing." Garrison surgeon wanted to get in touch with you directly in connection with the corresponding modifications.[12]

Tesch & Stabenow's reply confirms that Areginal conversions were taking place, and that hardware had been manufactured for this purpose:

We have noted that gassing chambers are to be arranged also for AREGINAL gassing. Your garrison surgeon has not yet approached us in this matter, but on 9 cr. we received instructions from Reichsarzt-SS und Polizei, the Top Hygienist, to include the additional AREGINAL equipment. No modifications of the gassing chambers are necessary, it is sufficient to install the AREGINAL gassing unit as well. You will receive an appropriate installation drawing when the AREGINAL units have been supplied by the manufacturer. For the sake of completeness, we inform you here that the price of the AREGINAL-unit amounts to RM 27.- and the steel requirements are 12 kilograms.[13]

The project of converting delousing chambers to Areginal gas[14] has also been described in some detail in the standard monograph on Tesch and Stabenow.[\[15\]](#)

Areginal, unlike Zyklon B, was stored as a gas and accordingly was kept in bottles. Hence, the conversion of the Sachsenhausen delousing chambers to Areginal offers an explanation for the otherwise baffling Soviet technical report: it was inspired by the observation of a DEGESCH recirculation gas chamber that had been modified to use Areginal gas.

The Errors in the Soviet Technical Report and Their Causes

The Soviet technical report, however, is clearly not a faithful and accurate account of the Sachsenhausen delousing plant. No matter how one interprets it, it is unquestionable that the report contains inaccuracies. For example, the technical report claimed that the system used Zyklon A, which (they said) contained 30% liquid hydrogen cyanide.[\[16\]](#) In fact, Zyklon A does not contain 30% liquid hydrogen cyanide, but 90% methyl cyanofornate and 10% methyl chlorofornate.[\[17\]](#) Moreover, as Carlo Mattogno has pointed out,[\[18\]](#) the system described in the Soviet technical report is not suitable for the dispersion of Zyklon A. In the light of such inaccuracies, it is no surprise that other aspects of the report would also be inaccurate.

Chief among the report's inaccuracies pertains to the location of the gas chamber, which was said to have been located in the crematorium. The apparatus the Soviets describe, however, was not found at that location. According to Morsch, it was found in the battery building of the Industriehof, apparently in a disassembled state,[\[19\]](#) whereas according to the 25th June 1945 report of the Soviet Forensic-Medical Commission under the leadership of Lt. Colonel F. I. Schkarawski, the apparatus was found in an "artesian well."[\[20\]](#) While the Soviets claimed that they could recognize that the gassing hardware matched the alleged gas chamber room in the crematorium, we have only their unsupported word on this, the relevant physical evidence having been destroyed by the East German authorities in the 1950s. The association of crematoria with homicidal gas chambers had been a common feature of Soviet propaganda for quite some time when the Sachsenhausen report was written, so it is no surprise that the report repeated this narrative element. The authors could also draw support for this story from camp rumor, which had picked up the idea of a gas chamber associated with the crematorium.[\[21\]](#) (On the other hand, the idea of a gas chamber in the crematorium was a relatively late addition to the Sachsenhausen "Prisoners' report,"[\[22\]](#) indicating that this rumor was not particularly strong.) Given this context, it is no surprise that the Soviet investigators couched their report in the framework of the crematorium / gas chamber connection, but there is nothing to show that they found anything to support that narrative. On the contrary, the Areginal-adapted Kreislauf chambers which they described came from the delousing chambers, not from the crematorium. Clearly the Soviet investigators felt free to embellish their report for political purposes; after all, the authors of Soviet technical reports were not scrupulous about distorting the truth in order to tell a desired story.[\[23\]](#)

The Soviet report is also questionable in another respect, namely in the description of the usage of glass bottles to contain the gas, which were crushed in the process of gassing. Areginal, however, was normally stored in steel bottles.[\[24\]](#) It is conceivable that Areginal might at some point have been stored in glass bottles, perhaps because of the inconvenience involved in obtaining tightly-rationed steel.[\[25\]](#) Alternatively, the Soviets may have simply been confused by the various disorganized bits and pieces of hardware they found strewn about the abandoned camp, just as they were demonstrably confused about the respective natures of HCN and Zyklon A, and erred in their reconstruction of the gassing system.

Conclusions

We have shown that the gassing technology described in the sources on the supposed homicidal gas chamber at Sachsenhausen, which orthodox Holocaust historians are forced to explain as a mysterious and inexplicable anomaly, has a natural and well-documented explanation in the context of the redesign of the Sachsenhausen delousing chambers. As this conversion took place in mid-1944, while the homicidal gas chamber is said to have come into operation in 1943 or earlier, the system described in the Soviet technical report cannot be that used in the alleged homicidal gas chamber.[26]

While the Soviet technical report is not a particularly accurate exposition of the functioning of a DEGESCH Kreislauf system adapted for Areginal gas, it retained enough accuracy in detail to show that Sachsenhausen's supposed "[homicidal] gas chamber of the future" [27] was in fact designed for delousing and installed (in 1944) in the delousing facility.

---

Notes:

- [1] Carlo Mattogno, KL Sachsenhausen: Stärkemeldungen und »Vernichtungsaktionen« 1940 bis 1945. Vierteljahreshefte für freie Geschichtsforschung, Vol. 7, No. 2, p. 173-185.
- [2] Günter Morsch, 'Tötungen durch Giftgas im Konzentrationslager Sachsenhausen', in Günter Morsch and Betrand Perz (ed.), Neue Studien zu nationalsozialistischen Massentötungen durch Giftgas: Historische Bedeutung, technische Entwicklung, revisionistische Leugnung. Metropol, Berlin, 2011, p. 268.
- [3] Morsch & Perz, Neue Studien zu nationalsozialistischen Massentötungen durch Giftgas, p. 269.
- [4] The correct spelling is "Areginal." The trial transcript exists only in English, so the version we have is mediated by both the translator and the court reporter, which accounts for the misspelling.
- [5] Tesch trial day 3, p. 260, PRO WO 235/83.
- [6] Ibid, p. 263.
- [7] Tesch interrogation of September 26, 1945, PRO WO 309/1603.
- [8] Deposition of Dr. Gerhard Peters, December 11, 1945, PRO WO 309/1603.
- [9] Affidavit of Dr. Gerhard Peters, February 24, 1947, copy at http://nuremberg.law.harvard.edu/php/pflip.php?caseid=HLSL\_NMT01&docnum=702&numpages=3&startpage=1&title=Affidavit.&color\_setting=C
- [10] Peters interrogation of October 26, 1947, p. 26, online: <http://www.ifz-muenchen.de/archiv/zs/zs-1301.pdf>
- [11] Rathcke interrogation of October 18, 1945, PRO WO 309/1603. The stenographer misspelled the name of the gas as "Aniginal," but the meaning is clear from the context.
- [12] Letter from SS-Obersturmführer Werner Jothann to Tesch & Stabenow of 8th June, 1944. RGVA, 502-1-333, quoted in Carlo Mattogno, Auschwitz: The Case for Sanity: A Historical and Technical Study of Jean-Claude Pressac's "Criminal Traces" and Robert Jan van Pelt's "Convergence of Evidence", The Barnes Review, Washington, 2010, p. 182.
- [13] Letter from Tesch & Stabenow to Auschwitz Zentralbauleitung of 13th June, 1944. RGVA, 502-1-333, quoted in Mattogno, Auschwitz: The Case for Sanity, pp. 183-84.
- [14] Incidentally, the reason for this project, namely the extreme shortage of Zyklon B, is itself extremely problematic for the traditional account of Auschwitz. As Bruno Tesch pointed out on being confronted with the claim that the Zyklon B he sold had been used for homicidal gassings, the Germans would not have been so foolish as to waste such a critically scarce material for the simple task of killing Jews, which after all could have been accomplished very easily in numerous other ways not involving the large-scale waste of an essential product whose supply already failed to meet demand.

- Jürgen Kalthoff and Martin Werner, Die Händler des Zyklon B: Tesch & Stabenow; eine Firmengeschichte zwischen Hamburg und Auschwitz, VSA-Verlag, Hamburg, 1999, pp. 128-130.
- [15] GARF 7021-104-3, p. 4, quoted in Carlo Mattogno, „KL Sachsenhausen: Stärkemeldungen und »Vernichtungsaktionen« 1940 bis 1945.“ Vierteljahreshefte für freie Geschichtsforschung, Vol. 7, No. 2, p. 173-185, here p. 180.
- [16] Mario Sartori, The War Gases: Chemistry and Analysis, D. Van Nostrand, New York, 1939, p. 104.
- [17] Carlo Mattogno, „KL Sachsenhausen: Stärkemeldungen und »Vernichtungsaktionen« 1940 bis 1945.“ Vierteljahreshefte für freie Geschichtsforschung, Vol.7, No. 2, p. 173-185, here p. 180.
- [18] Morsch & Perz, Neue Studien zu nationalsozialistischen Massentötungen durch Giftgas, p. 275.
- [19] The author owes this fact to Klaus Schwensen.
- [20] See, for example, the rumors recorded in the diary of Odd Nansen.
- [21] Klaus Schwensen, "The "Report on Concentration Camp Sachsenhausen" (Prisoner's Report) of 12 June 1945," Inconvenient History, Vol. 6, No. 3, online: http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2014/volume\_6/number\_3/the\_report\_on\_concentration\_camp\_sachsenhausen.php
- [22] See, for instance, The Truth about Katyn: Report of Special Commission for Ascertaining and Investigating the Circumstances of the Shooting of Polish Officer Prisoners by the German-Fascist Invaders in the Katyn Forest, published as a supplement to Soviet War News Weekly, issue 107, 3rd February 1944.
- [23] Kalthoff & Werner, Die Händler des Zyklon B, p. 130.
- [24] Kalthoff and Werner claim that the limited available steel for bottles interfered with the adoption of Areginal. That glass bottles were substituted as a result is mere speculation, but it is certainly more plausible that relatively safe (to humans) Areginal could have been stored in glass than that the same would have been done with enormously dangerous HCN, as Morsch supposes.
- [25] One could, of course, postulate that the supposed homicidal gas chamber was, like the delousing chambers, redesigned (from what?) in 1944, but there appears to be no support whatsoever for such a hypothesis in either the testimony on Sachsenhausen homicidal gassings or in the testimony on the redesign of the delousing plant. Moreover, Areginal gas is not a particularly suitable means of killing humans.
- [26] Morsch & Perz, Neue Studien zu nationalsozialistischen Massentötungen durch Giftgas, p. 273.
- [27]

Tinseltown Goes to War | CODOH

by Ralph Raico

I've just watched for about the third time the 1962 film, The Longest Day, a great action movie on the Allied invasion of Normandy. Among its several pluses: an all-star male cast, including a young Sean Connery, as well as a brief segment starring a seriously good-looking woman bearing a strong resemblance to Sophia Loren.

The Longest Day is filmed in black and white, adding, I think, to the authenticity. Remarkably, the many Germans actually speak their own language among themselves, instead of a heavily German-accented English. Curt Jurgens gives an excellent performance as a German officer bitterly skeptical of the Führer's leadership. His is the "good German" character popular in American movies around the time that West Germany was being integrated into NATO. The joshing Catholic padre, another stock figure in World War II films of the time, makes an appearance.

For me a spine-tingling scene shows another German officer patrolling the Normandy coast with his beautiful German shepherd dog. He's passing his Zeiss binoculars (the best ever made) over the incoming waters of the English Channel when he stops and freezes. Then he starts screaming, Die Invasion! Es ist die Invasion! What he's seeing before him is the greatest assemblage of naval power in the history of the world. Of course, his superiors at headquarters don't believe his telephoned report until it's too late and the Allies—Yanks, Brits, Canadians, and Gaullist French—have consolidated their beachhead.

Paul Hartmann (left) and Curt Jurgens (stage name) in The Longest Day (1962)
Source: By trailer screenshot (20th Century Fox) (The Longest Day trailer) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

I would argue that another merit lies in the contrast to the way Hollywood portrayed the Japanese in the war. The best, or worst, example is the 1944 movie, The Purple Heart, loosely based on the Doolittle raid over Tokyo. A group of American airmen is captured hiding in China and put on trial for war crimes. (Since the men had engaged in the indiscriminate bombing of civilians, they were clearly guilty.) The movie recounts this fictional trial.

The Purple Heart offers some heartwarming clichés. The airmen include a Lt. Canelli, a Sgt. Skvoznik, and a Sgt. Greenbaum, a smart, brash Jewish lawyer from Brooklyn—persons previously known to their fellow countrymen as wops, polacks, and kikes. But now every last one of us was needed to build that world of love and laughter and peace ever after, with bluebirds over the White Cliffs of Dover. Just you wait and see. Tomorrow. When the World is Free.

The Japanese want to know the location of the aircraft carrier the Americans flew from, and the interrogator is a General Mitsubi, played by Richard Loo. Loo, though actually a Chinese, assumed the role of the evil, smirking Japanese officer in lots of Hollywood offerings. Here he deals out insults, threats, and harsh treatment to the Americans. Skvoznik, when he appears again in court, is mute, catatonic, constantly twitching: he's been beaten and crippled. His buddies are aghast, while the German war correspondent smiles.

The leader of the Americans, handsome Dana Andrews, the quintessential fighting hero in those days, delivers a fire-breathing speech of defiance at the end. Curiously, he concludes by spitting out the promise that the U.S. air force will burn the cities of Japan to the ground—thus confessing to a major war crime, that was subsequently in fact committed, in advance.

At one point, the judge—no poster boy for judicial impartiality—starts yelling, Corregidor has fallen! Corregidor has fallen! With the fortress in Japanese hands, Manila is theirs. The spectators fall into a frenzy, and in the eeriest footage the navy and army men draw their swords and engage in grim-faced, clanging sword play, dramatically highlighted. The Yanks stare, stunned by the utterly alien scene being enacted before their eyes. For the movie audience, a perfect setup for an Orwellian Two-Minute Hate.

The revisionist historian James Martin once wrote that during the war there were probably millions of Americans who thought that, with the little yellow men, we were literally fighting a species of sub-humans. That illusion was created by films like this one and many others, including Across the Pacific, with Humphrey Bogart and the great Sidney Greenstreet, the fat man in the white suit, as a Jap-loving professor of sociology at the University of Manila (!). They were aided by the rest of the media, as in Life magazine's notorious depiction of the Japanese as hordes of devouring rats. At least the Germans, though wrong-headed, robotic followers of their mad Leader out to conquer the world, were not usually shown as alien sub-humans.

There were a number of anti-Nazi films during and even before U.S. entry into the war. But the attitude of the motion picture community to Communism and the Soviet Union was quite different. The Boy from Stalingrad (1943), Song of Russia (1944), and other productions informed Americans of the happy life led by the citizens of the Marxist utopia and of their death-defying resistance to the German invaders. Two films of this genre stand out.

The script for North Star (1943) was written by Lillian Hellman, who later lied under oath in denying that she had ever been a member of the CPUSA. It starred Dana Andrews (again), Walter Huston, and Anne Baxter, music was by Aaron Copland, lyrics by Ira Gershwin—the entertainment industry's royalty. It was nominated for six Academy Awards (naturally). There's no doubt that the current consensus is correct: North Star is unabashedly pro-Soviet propaganda.

Mission to Moscow (1943) is based on the memoirs of the US ambassador, Joseph E. Davies. It features music by the preeminent Hollywood composer, Max Steiner. Again, we see Russian workers and collective-farm members, cheerfully toiling their hearts out for the Motherland under the benevolent, all-seeing eye of the Vozhd. Mission to Moscow was promoted by FDR himself, and lavishly praised by the country's most important film reviewer, Bosley Crowther of the New York Times.

A rightwing nut-job might complain that this steady stream of Red rubbish by owners, producers, and directors revealed something rotten, even sinister, about the culture and ruling elite of Hollywood. But who cares what he might say? He is, after all, just a rightwing nut-job.

Now, finally, back to The Longest Day and its many serious minuses. The French civilians of Normandy are portrayed as jubilant at getting their homes blown up. Yet, the historical truth is that they were scared out of their wits. With reason, since more French civilians, at Le Havre and elsewhere, were killed by Allied bombs than English killed by the Germans in the Battle of Britain. The death of their compatriots remained a sore point with the French survivors for years afterwards.

The GI warriors always rush into battle bravely, eager and clear-eyed, often with a humorous quip. There's not the slightest allusion to all the cowed conscripts, wetting and soiling themselves in terror of their impending death, blindness, or loss of legs and arms. In Hollywood's version of the war, they never existed.

But the worst demerit of the movie is that it continues and exemplifies what my friend and libertarian scholar, Joseph Stromberg, has called the seven centuries of Anglo-Saxon self-congratulation. The Longest Day gives the impression to the easily impressionable and historically clueless (the vast majority) that the Second World War was won on the western front, principally by the United States and Britain. It never gives the viewer an inkling that in the west the Wehrmacht was mostly composed of older men and raw recruits. The best German divisions, 175 of them, were fighting on the eastern front, against Stalin. It was there that the Second World War was won, and lost. Won not by the Anglo-Saxons but by the Russians, and lost by the Germans. Then followed the Red Army's orgy of rape and murder. Hundreds of thousands of German females were raped, from little girls to old women, most of them gang-raped, many raped to death. Ilya Ehrenburg, the Soviet propagandist, publicly urged on the conquering rapists, and that loathsome gay man, Christopher Isherwood, publicly praised them for their robust virility. Today, all of this has been expunged from the historical record — it never even existed in Hollywood's version — just another one of the forgotten episodes from “the Last Good War.”

Aspects of the Tesch Trial

by Friedrich Jansson

“I do not feel guilty. I did my duty working from morning 'til night for my country, just as the English would work for their country.”

—Bruno Tesch, interrogation of September 26, 1945

“It is an official duty of humanity to exterminate vermin.”

—Bruno Tesch, interrogation of September 26, 1945

In March 1946, Bruno Tesch, the head of the firm Tesch & Stabenow (often abbreviated as TESTA), was put on trial along with his Prokurist Karl Weinbacher and the gassing (i.e. fumigation) technician Joachim Drosihn, on the charge that they “did supply poison gas used for the extermination of allied nationals interned in concentration camps well knowing that the said gas was to be so used.”<sup>[1]</sup> Tesch had been brought to the attention of British authorities by former employee Emil Sehm, who had claimed that while working at the company he had seen a travel report in which Tesch had agreed to provide technical assistance with exterminating the Jews with poison gas. After seven days of proceedings, Tesch and Weinbacher were convicted and sentenced to death, while Drosihn was acquitted.

The trial received early revisionist attention from chemist William Lindsey, who wrote a substantial (if somewhat intemperate) 1983 article outlining its course,<sup>[2]</sup> and has also been criticized from the orthodox side, notably by Jean-Claude Pressac, who wrote that “In 1946, simple malicious gossip could easily lead to someone being hung. I do not know whether the ‘trip report’ was produced before the Tribunal,<sup>[3]</sup> but if it was not then, this trial was a masquerade.”<sup>[4]</sup> In the only significant orthodox account of the trial, Angelika Ebbinghaus focuses on background information, offering little on the details of the trial.<sup>[5]</sup> Some aspects of the trial have also been covered in a history of Tesch & Stabenow.<sup>[6]</sup>

For their information on the Tesch case, the works cited above relied almost exclusively on the trial transcript. This paper aims to deepen understanding of the trial through the materials available in the investigation files. These files offer insight into both the specific case against Tesch, as well as the conduct of postwar investigations in general. An additional benefit is that the investigation files contain a number of sources of independent interest. This paper will not address the witnesses concerning homicidal gassings who appeared at the trial (notably C.S. Bendel and Pery Broad), first, because they are better considered in a broader context, and second, because their statements have already been discussed in the revisionist literature. We are not aiming at a treatment of all aspects of the trial, and will be content to pass over topics we consider unenlightening or which have already been adequately covered by other authors. Though in principle self-contained, this paper is not structured as an introduction to the Tesch trial, and the reader may find it useful to first familiarize himself with the case by reading Lindsey’s article. The published summary of the case<sup>[7]</sup> may also serve as a useful introduction. When quoting from the investigation materials, we have always used the original English translation when one was available, while sometimes noting discrepancies from the original German. Where there was no original English version, the translation is the author’s.

1. The Investigation

The investigation of Bruno Tesch and TESTA began with a letter from the former TESTA bookkeeper Emil Sehm to British authorities on June 29, 1945. Sehm wrote:

According to my estimation I am able to supply very important information that means fresh evidence to commit war criminals for trial. The war crime I am referring to concerns an official discussion which took place between a businessman of an IG Farben sister concern with leading men of the OKW [Army High Command], about the application of the hydrocyanic acid process to kill human beings. Further the training of SS men to apply this process.

My profession gave me the opportunity to see top secret files and that is where my knowledge results from.<sup>[8]</sup>

As his first letter received no response, Sehm sent another letter on August 24. He wrote:

In my capacity as accountant and later in special cases dealing with the correspondence I got acquainted with a few top secret documents. When dealing with a particular file, I was instructed by Dr. TESCH about the secrecy which had to be kept about this particular file. The contents of this file was a report and I can very well remember it. It had the meaning as follows:

Dr. TESCH reported about an invitation he received to a conference at the OKW BERLIN. He stated to which members he was introduced and in which way and form. About the subject of the conference he wrote that the speaker explained that the execution of the Jews by shooting has developed in a mass execution and furthermore it is very unhygienic. Dr. TESCH was asked to submit any suggestion, whether and how Jews could be exterminated by using hydrocyanic acid. Afterwards technical points about the application of hydrocyanic acid were discussed and amongst other suggestions one way was suggested that all Jews detailed for extermination should be taken into a barracks previously prepared (gas-tight). During the night a trained man (using a respirator) should enter the barracks and place hydrocyanic acid plates in the rooms. In future, instead of getting buried, dead bodies will be cremated. Dr. TESCH offered himself to SS men who will be selected by the OKW and put at his disposal to train on courses for this purpose (using hydrocyanic acid).

In fact there were some SS men trained by him and his fellow worker. The book-keeping disclosed further that the firm has supplied hydrocyanic acid called "T" Gas<sup>[9]</sup> to the OKW and SS offices (Dienststellen).

I copied this report and showed it to one of my reliable friends. Later I told it as well to Herr Frahm, Lorenzenstrasse 10. This copy was burnt immediately as I realized that it would have been useless to take any further steps for the time being to stop the crime. [...]

On this conference according to the report of Dr. TESCH no high ranking SS were present, but the highest authorities of the OKW were leading this discussion. [...]

As an economical adviser, I was convinced from the beginning that NSDAP means only war and destruction of the economy and it gives me a satisfaction to write this statement.

Through the knowledge of all these happenings my eyes were opened and I was fully convinced that the German nation has criminals as leaders and it will be the tragedy of the German people to be made responsible for the crimes inflicted on the human race.[\[10\]](#)

To recapitulate: Sehm claimed to have seen one of Tesch's travel reports in which it was specified that (1) the method of killing Jews and disposing of their corpses was to be switched from shooting+burial to HCN+cremation, (2) the reason for this transition was hygiene, (3) the planning for gassing Jews was handled by the OKW, and (4) the killing with HCN was to take place by having a gassing technician enter the barracks in which Jews resided during the night, when the Jews would presumably be asleep, and carry out a disinfestation. This gassing method is so absurd that it is difficult to believe that Sehm was taken seriously - but he was. That September, British investigators visited TESTA with Sehm in tow and arrested Tesch. The date of the visit is a little uncertain. The investigative team's report on the case says that it took place "on or about the 18th September 1945."[\[11\]](#) Authors relying on the trial transcript have stated that Tesch was arrested on September 3,[\[12\]](#) as the prosecutor Gerald Draper stated in his introductory speech.[\[13\]](#) However, the dates of September 19 and September 12 were also given during the trial.[\[14\]](#). As the arrest is described in a statement dated September 18, the date of the 19th would at least seem to be excluded. In the aforementioned statement, Sehm wrote that "the filing room in which I believed the file which would incriminate Dr. Tesch to be, was burned out [...] during Mar 1944, after an air attack". He detailed his confrontation with Dr. Tesch:

I stated to him: I have knowledge of a Traveling Report compiled by you. According to this you have negotiated with leading persons of the OKW. It was submitted to you that the shooting of Jews had increased to such an extent that this could no longer be justified from the hygienic point of view. It was proposed to employ the prussic acid process for the "liquidation" of the Jews. You were asked for your opinion in the matter. Furthermore, the single phases of the operation were explained in the report.

Interrupting my statement, Dr. Tesch said that I[\[15\]](#) knew perfectly well that the firm was only carrying out gassing of vermin, etc; only after being repeatedly questioned did he deny to know of such a Travel Report. The female stenographers, Miss Radtke and Miss Knickrehm were also questioned as to whether they could remember that this Travel Report was dictated to them by Dr. Tesch. Both denied it.[\[16\]](#)

In his statement of October 10, Sehm stated that these events took place on September 18.[\[17\]](#)

Tesch was interrogated by Captain Gerald Draper and Captain Frank on September 26. The interrogation is available only in English. He was told that five million people had been gassed at Auschwitz, and replied that this was news to him - he had first heard of homicidal gassings in the press and radio. He did not believe that the gas he had supplied had been used for mass killing. He saw little sense in the description he was given of fake showers being used as gas chambers, and absolutely denied Sehm's story about the travel report. While in many cases he was deferential to the interrogators on matters outside his direct experience ("If you say so, gentlemen, perhaps it is true; you may have better evidence"), he was very definite about the travel report ("It does not exist"). Sehm, he said, had always been a "book of seven seals" to him, and may have borne a grudge against him because of their past differences regarding pay and because of Sehm's dismissal from the firm.<sup>[18]</sup> The interrogators, however, told him that Sehm's statement could be confirmed, because Sehm's friend Frahm (mentioned in Sehm's letter of August 24) had also seen the travel report:

Q. In a secret file there was a report about an invitation to a conference in Berlin, was there not?

A. The only invitation received was to a conference with the Army and SS, the Reichs Ministry of Food and the Reichs Ministry of Interior.

Q. It is useless for you to say that is not so, as Sehm has seen the file. Is it possible there were files in the offices which were so secret that they could be seen by Sehm and not by you?

A. It is possible.

Q. And you are the head of the business?

A. I was away for more than half the year. I was away often, and whilst I was away secret papers arrived.

Q. Do you remember going to a very big conference in Berlin, with many high-ups?

A. No, I cannot recollect.

Q. Is it possible?

A. No, I do not think so. I did participate in conferences with the Reichs Ministry of Food and representatives from the three Services were present, but not high-ups.

Q. What were the ranks of the senior members?

A. Senior Staff Medical Officers.

Q. Do you remember a conference at which they talked about methods of doing away with the Jews?

A. No.

Q. Is it not unfortunate that Sehm read about it in one of your files?

A. I cannot imagine what he read.

Q. But someone else also saw the file – Frahm?

A. I have not met him.

Q. He is a friend of Sehm, and he also saw the file?

A. I do not understand, I cannot understand how a stranger could see a business file.

Q. Because Sehm showed him it.

A. I cannot credit Sehm with such a breach of confidence. He was not entitled to show such things to strangers, but if he did so he must have known what he was doing. I have absolutely no recollections of what Sehm could be thinking about.

Q. Sehm extracted the report from the file and showed the report from the file to his friend Frahm. It is easy to find out whether Sehm is lying, because we can ask Frahm.[\[19\]](#)

Indeed, one could and did ask Frahm. Two weeks later, Frahm gave a statement. Unfortunately for the investigators, Frahm did not confirm that Sehm had shown him such a document. Rather, Frahm stated that Sehm had shown him the letter he had written to the British in the summer of 1945:

I have not worked for the firm of TESCH and STABENOW but a friend of mine, Herr Emil SEHM, worked for this firm as bookkeeper. He told me one night that he did not want to work for TESCH and STABENOW any more but he did not tell me why.

One day in July or August 1945 Emil SEHM told me the following: "Now I can tell you why I wanted to leave the firm of TESCH and STABENOW". He showed me a letter that he had written to the British Military Authorities. It said that Dr TESCH had been in BERLIN with the Commander of the Wehrmacht and Dr TESCH had been told by the Commander of the WEHRMACHT that he or a member of his firm would have to instruct 30 SS men in how to use BLAUSAUERE-GAS [sic]. These SS men, when they had been instructed in the use of this gas, had to wear gas masks and go into the barrack rooms in the concentration camps and put tablets of the gas in the corners of the room and go out and shut the door.

Emil SEHM also told me that he had seen in a file in Dr TESCH's office that the Ober-Commander of the Wehrmacht told Dr TESCH to instruct the 30 SS men in the use of BLAUSAUERE-GAS [sic].[\[20\]](#)

Frank and Draper's seeming belief that Frahm had seen the file is inexplicable in terms of the available documents. The reader may verify that in the passages quoted above, Sehm did not make this claim. There are several possibilities for explaining this: Frank and Draper may have been lying in order to intimidate Tesch, they may have misunderstood the documents, Sehm may have verbally told them something along these lines which was not put down in writing, or the available versions of Sehm's early statements may have been altered in order to remove contradictions from the prosecution's narrative. In light of the numerous cases of dishonesty on the part of the investigative team which will be proved below, the last possibility cannot be dismissed out of hand, given that the available versions are not originals, but copies in English translation. That said, there is nothing to prove that this was the case.

Emil Sehm also gave a statement on October 10. He explained that he had found the alleged travel report filed under "Wehrmacht", and that it was not marked as secret or confidential. He then quoted from the alleged travel report as follows:

Mr. .... (Name of the Wehrmacht representative missing) explained to me that the shooting of Jews became a Mass Shooting and it proved to be unhygienic. He thought this could be improved by gassing the Jews with BLAUSÄUREGAS and burn the corpses afterwards. He asked me to supply him with suitable propositions. I suggested to carry out the extermination of the Jews by the usual method of gassing. After they have been put into the Barracks (the Jews) which were made airtight, a BLAUSÄURE expert proceeds to the rooms at night for the purpose of laying BLAUSÄUREGAS tablets. The corpses could be disposed of in the morning. [21]

In case his previous statements had left any doubt in the matter, he reiterated that “With regard to the travel report I want to mention again that according to the report the negotiations were not carried out by the higher SS leaders but with the leading personalities of the Army High Command.”

While Sehm’s statement did not say that he showed the documents to Frahm, as the British interrogators claimed, it did state that he had told Frahm about his reason for leaving TESTA. In denying that Sehm had told him this (“he did not tell me why”), and claiming that Sehm had said after the war that he was finally able to inform him of this reason (“Emil SEHM told me the following: ‘Now I can tell you why I wanted to leave the firm’ ”), Frahm directly contradicted Sehm’s assertions.

Had Frahm’s statement been taken earlier, and had the investigators been more clearheaded, that might have been the end of the case. But by October 10, the case could no longer be easily stopped. On September 28, the firm had been visited again. The report on this visit written by Sergeant D. Ellwood complained that Weinbacher “could not or would not give all the information sought.” Ellwood spoke to two gassing technicians, Marczinkowski[22] and Pietsch:[23]

Both stated that they knew nothing about Gas Chambers, but had been engaged in “delousing” only. It is practically certain that they had been “briefed” in what they should say when questioned, as they both professed ignorance of the simplest things. It was only after having been spoken to sharply that the above was wormed out of them.[24]

Ellwood’s report was forwarded along with a note that underscored how the investigators sought to interpret normal delousing facilities as homicidal:

It will be noticed that the “delousing” apparatus referred to is in fact a Gas Chamber installation as pictured in the pamphlet herewith entitled “Die kleine TESTA-FIBEL über Normal-gaskammern”. These chambers [10 cubic meter delousing chambers. –FJ] are certainly large enough to have been used for the purpose of annihilation of human beings. [...]

The firm has asked if they can have the enclosed file back![25]

On October 2nd, after reading Ellwood’s report, Tesch’s interrogation, and a report (presumably Sehm’s) on the confrontation between Sehm and Tesch,[26] Group Captain A.G. Somerhough wrote that he was “by no means satisfied that [Tesch] was not well aware of the purposes for which he was supplying this cyanide and that he did not only act as a technical advisor on the question of its use for the purpose of exterminating human beings.”[27] Because of Tesch’s connection to Sachsenhausen, Somerhough suggested handing him over to the Russians for interrogation “if they think they can get any more out of him, bearing in mind that they are in possession of some actual lethal chamber apparatus”, [28] proposed “to turn a War Crimes Investigation Team on to this case”, [29] and suggested that Tesch, Weinbacher, Drosihn, and twelve TESTA gassing technicians be arrested.[30]

In the meantime, Tesch had been released. Like so many things about the investigation, the date of his release is uncertain. The investigative team stated that it took place on October 1st,[31] a claim which was repeated at the trial.[32] The same date was also claimed by A.W. Freud[33] during his interrogation of Drosihn, but the latter remembered that Tesch returned on a Saturday,[34] which would necessarily have been

Saturday September 29.

Once on the case, War Crimes Investigation Team [WCIT] Number 2 carried out arrests on a scale even broader than intended by Somerhough, rounding up and arresting all available employees of TESTA, secretaries and accountants along with gassing technicians. Weinbacher was arrested on October 6th, and Tesch and Drosihn the next day.<sup>[35]</sup> According to the investigative team's report, nine employees were arrested on the 6th, three on the 7th, three on the 8th, one on the 9th, two on the 19th, and two on the 20th.<sup>[36]</sup>

Thus, by the time Frahm gave his statement of the 10th of October, the authorities had already committed to the Tesch case by ordering and carrying out the mass arrest of TESTA personnel. Given this commitment, the case could not be given up lightly. Although Sehm was the only witness against Tesch, and his statements had been directly contradicted by his friend Frahm, the case had to go ahead. On October 22, another version of Frahm's statement was made, which attempted to remove these contradictions. The text now read

I have not worked for the firm of TESCH and STABENOW but a friend of mine, Herr Emil SEHM, worked for this firm as a bookkeeper. He told me one night in the early part of 1943 that he did not want to work any more for the firm of TESCH and STABENOW because his principles did not agree with those of Dr TESCH, and he might also have told me of the gassing operations of TESCH and STABENOW at concentration camps, but I am not certain now.

In August or July 1945 Emil Sehm showed me a letter that he had written to the British Military Authorities. It said that Dr TESCH had been in BERLIN with the Commander of the Wehrmacht and Dr TESCH had been told [...] [remainder of letter follows the version of October 10]<sup>[37]</sup>

The reader should compare this to Frahm's statement of October 10th, and will readily see that the changes were exactly the removal of the two contradictions between Sehm's story and Frahm's.

1.1 The Interrogations of Drosihn and Weinbacher

The interrogation transcripts for Drosihn and Weinbacher, unlike those of Tesch, exist in full in both German and English. Neither knew anything about Sehm's travel report, or about the gassing of humans. Their interrogations are particularly interesting, however, in that they give us a look into the operating procedures and ethical standards of the British War Crimes Investigation Team. The interrogations, in fact, exist in two different versions each in both German and English: an original transcript of the interrogations, which took place on October 17 in Drosihn's case and October 16 in Weinbacher's, and a doctored version.<sup>[38]</sup> The doctored versions have had certain passages embarrassing to the prosecution removed, but are still signed and certified as accurate transcripts by Captain Freud and the stenotypist. Altogether, then, there exist (1) a German original, with the passages to be removed indicated in pen, (2) an English translation of the German original, (3) a sanitized German copy with the offending passages removed, and (4) an English translation of the sanitized German copy.

What kinds of passages were thought worth removing? To start, the very beginning of Weinbacher's interview was removed:

Q. Take your hands out of your pockets if you come in here.

A. Yes, I have done it already,

(Owing to the obstinate behaviour of the prisoner Captain FREUD ordered the presence of an armed guard).

What was this obstinate behavior? In the report on the case, it is stated that Weinbacher was “so insolent” during his interrogation that “special steps” had to be taken.<sup>[39]</sup> Another excised passage from the interrogation gives a sample of this “insolence”. After having first claimed that Dr. Tesch had bribed Weinbacher, something Weinbacher indignantly denied (the entire exchange being later excised from the transcripts), Capt. Freud then claimed that Dr. Tesch had given the members of the firm instructions about what to tell investigators. Weinbacher denied this, and in the exchange that followed (which was cut from the transcript) showed more of his “insolence”:

Q. Don’t lie.

A. No. As sure as I am standing here, there was no question about it. You are under a misconception.

Q. Don’t shout at me.

A. I am speaking in the same voice as you are talking to me.

Q. Don’t become insolent. What did you get from Dr TESCH?

Q. I didn’t get anything. I can only say that you do not appreciate Dr TESCH [German original reads daß Sie Dr. Tesch falsch beurteilen.]

When Weinbacher denied that TESTA had specially secured files,<sup>[40]</sup> he was threatened by the interrogator, but the exchange was later removed from the transcript:

Q. How do you like the prison? Apparently too well. We shall send you to a working camp [Arbeitslager] if you don’t want to speak the truth.

A. I can only tell the truth and nothing more. I can’t say anything but the truth.

Dr. Drosihn’s October 17 interrogation experienced similar expurgations. As in Weinbacher’s interrogation, a passage to do with the disparagement of Tesch’s character was removed. (The first two lines of the following quotation were not removed; they are included here to provide the proper context.)

Q. What did Dr. Tesch say when such an enormous order came?

A. “Good; that is a beautiful order”.

Q. He did not say: “Good, another 100,000 Poles or Russians dead”?

A. No, he never did say that. In my opinion he would always have been against that.

Q. I am very much disappointed with you. I thought you would speak more openly.

A. I did so.

Q. No you did not. You did not say anything about the gassing of men.

A. I don't know anything about it.

In another removed passage Captain Freud expounded on the converted shower theory that dominated thinking about gas chambers at the time.[41] (He also made such a sketch and description of gassing showers during the interrogation of TESTA employee Johann Holst.[42])

Q. We will show you how we found the gas chambers. (Captain FREUD makes a sketch). I show you the chambers of RIGA. These rooms had once been shower baths. The SS was standing armed on the roof, the people were driven into the yard, then the doors were locked and the SS pushed the people into the rooms, allegedly to take a shower bath. They were told that, then the doors were locked and the ZYKLON gas was sprinkled through the holes in the ceiling. After ten minutes the people could be brought to the incinerator, How many of these installations did you see?

A. Not a single one. In RIGA I only saw the normal installation.

Figure 1: A page from the original transcript of Weinbacher's interrogation, showing passages to be excised.

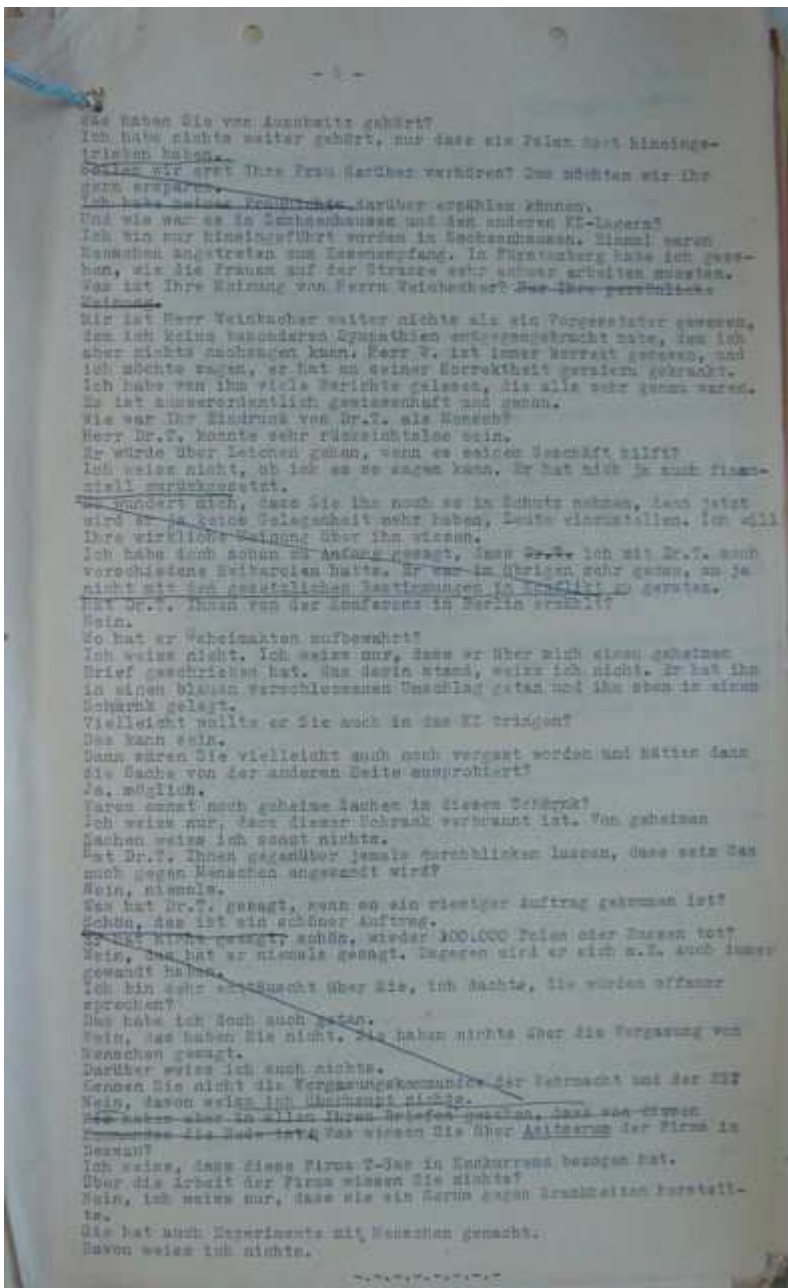

Figure 2: A page from the original transcript of Drosihn's interrogation, showing passages to be excised.

The questioning of Drosihn on Sehm's travel report story was also cut, with the following text being removed:

Q. I will tell you what records we have found. At the end of 1941 Dr Tesch was in BERLIN and had conferences with the highest officials of the Wehrmacht and the SS. And in the course of these conferences it was said literally: "Because the shooting of Jews is unhygienic it is suggested that BLAUSAEURE GAS should be used." That is to be read in black and white in a letter from the High Command. I am rather sure that you, too, took some part in this. What do you know about the destruction of men? But this time I don't want to hear the same lies, but the truth.

A. I state once again that I heard of it only after the occupation.

Q. That is impossible for the shower baths were only camouflaged; there was no water there.

A. I assume that they were perhaps hot air chambers, but it is not allowed to build them like that, for that is not permitted by the law, that chambers must stand quite apart.

Q. It was a barrack standing alone. Didn't you supply anything for it?

A. No, nothing. That is not the expert way and cannot be brought in accordance with the laws relating to BLAUSAEURE.

As in Weinbacher's interrogation, threats were removed from the edited version of Drosihn's interrogation. First to go was a threat to hand him over to the Russians to be tortured:

Q. I see, Dr DROSIHN. We won't get anywhere like that. I had thought you would like to speak, but as you are not doing that, we must proceed differently with you; for we want to know what the firm had to do with the gassing of men. You know the firm's position today, as well as yours, and that of the other gentlemen, Dr TESCH and WEINBACHER? Your sphere of activity was mostly in the East, such as AUSCHWITZ, RIGA, LUBLIN, ORANIENBURG, and all those places are now under Russian authority. We shall be forced to pass you on to the Russians who now deal with such cases and probably employ other methods to make you speak.

A. I cannot make any other statements. I can only assure you that my tongue has been loosened and that I will tell you everything.

Q. Until now you have not told us anything.

A. I must adhere to my statement that only after your victory did I hear that men had been gassed in the concentration camps.

Also removed was a veiled threat against Drosihn's wife:

Shall we first hear [verhören, translation should be 'interrogate'] your wife about [what Drosihn had heard about Auschwitz]? We want to spare her this.

Figures 1 and 2 show pages from the original German transcripts of the interrogations, with the passages to be excised marked in pen.

The revelation of this procedure of sanitizing interrogation transcripts has significant implications, and raises the question of how far this practice extended to other similar cases of the time. Certainly one must suspect similar alterations to Tesch's interrogations, neither of which exists in a true original (meaning the copy actually taken down during the interrogation). However, there is also a strong possibility that similar acts took place in other British and American interrogations. In one similar case, there was testimony in the Congressional investigation of the Malmedy trial that the investigators engaged in extensive rewriting of interrogation-derived statements.<sup>[43]</sup> Interrogation materials are often not available in the original typed version, as seen in Figures 1 and 2 (with characteristic lack of formatting), but only in better-formatted, retyped versions. In light of the modifications demonstrated here, scholars cannot deny the very real possibility that they are dealing with doctored materials - "the interrogation as it should have been". Though this is not the time to treat the subject thoroughly, one must remark that when using interrogation and trial materials, holocaust scholars have not shown adequate sensitivity towards the type of evidence with which they were dealing. It is no surprise that reading the prosecution's file makes the accused look guilty: the prosecution was aiming for that effect, and often was not being particularly honest in the process. On the theme of caution with interrogation-derived statements, one should also note the penchant of prosecutors to use their own statements in the deposition of a witness. In simplified and somewhat caricatured form, the process looks like this: one begins with an interrogation as follows:

INTERROGATOR: Statement 1 is true, right?

WITNESS: Yes.

INTERROGATOR: Statement 2 is true, right?

WITNESS: I guess so.

INTERROGATOR: Statement 3 is true, right?

WITNESS: No, definitely not.

INTERROGATOR: Statement 4 is true, right?

WITNESS: I don't think so.

INTERROGATOR: Is it impossible?

WITNESS: Well, I guess I can't prove it didn't happen.

Through the magic of the prosecution's rewriting, this becomes

DEPOSITION OF WITNESS: Statement 1. Statement 2. It is quite possible that Statement 4.

In this way, the witness simply becomes the mouthpiece for as much of the prosecution's case as he will assent to, or at least not explicitly deny. The appearance of voluntary or spontaneous admissions in the resulting statements makes them much more convincing evidence than the interrogation transcript itself would have been. This, of course, was intentional on the prosecution's part. To give a simple example from the Tesch case, consider the following exchange during Drosihn's interrogation

Q. What was your impression of Dr TESCH as a man?

A. Dr TESCH could be very inconsiderate.

Q. He would step over corpses if it helped his business?

A. I don't know whether I can express it that way. It is true he neglected my salary.

Q. It astonishes me that you still protect him thus, for now he will not have an opportunity to employ people. I want to know your real opinion of him.

A. I have already stated at the beginning that I had several quarrels with Dr TESCH. Besides, he was very correct and tried not to come into conflict with the law.

Q. Did Dr TESCH tell you about the conference in BERLIN?

A. No.

Q. Where did he keep secret records?

A. I don't know. I only know that he wrote a secret letter about me. I don't know what was in it. He put it into a blue, closed envelope and laid it in the upper shelf of the cupboard.

Q. Perhaps he wanted to bring you to a concentration camp?

A. That is possible. [Das kann sein.]

Q. Then you would perhaps have been gassed and experienced the matter from the other side?

A. Yes; possible. [Ja, möglich.][44]

In his statement, this became

I also know that Dr TESCH kept a sealed envelope which probably contained my criticisms of the State in order to be able to blackmail me.[45]

1.2 Tesch's Second Interrogation

On October 24, Tesch was interrogated by Anton Freud. This second interrogation does exist in German, but in a fragmentary form, severed into 31 numbered chunks. While the interrogation contains some particulars that are of interest in connection with specific points, some of which are cited elsewhere in this paper, the interrogation as a whole offered little new. Mainly, Freud took the opportunity to vent his anger and frustration over the weakness of the evidence the WCIT had gathered, accusing Tesch of engineering a coverup with his employees, and of burning key documents. At the time, there was still a realistic possibility that Tesch would be turned over to the Russians,[46] and Freud took the opportunity to threaten that because of the 4.5 million people he had killed, the Russians would rip out Tesch's [finger and toe] nails.[47] Faced with Freud's threats and name-calling, Tesch mostly confined himself to repeating his previous statements.

2. The Trial

The Tesch trial lasted from March 1 to 8, 1946. The Judge Advocate was C.L. Stirling, who had also presided at the Belsen trial. Major Gerald Draper started things off, reminding everyone what the trial concerned:

Zyklon B was going in vast quantities to the largest concentration camps in Germany east of the Elbe, and in those same concentration camps the SS Totenkopfverbunden were systematically exterminating human beings from 1942 to 1945 in an estimated total of six million human beings, of which four and a half million human beings were exterminated by the use of Zyklon B in one camp alone known as Auschwitz/Birkenau.[48]

The trial was conducted in English, and its transcript records only the English language versions of statements. The quality of the translation varied. A letter from Major Peter E. Forest, sent the day after the trial concluded, described the four interpreters. Captain Sempel received top marks, with Sergeant Rees a step behind. Sergeant Cunningham's English was inadequate for the job, his translations incorrect, his manners poor. ("The Court was most displeased with his remark 'Shut up' to the Defending Counsel.") Corporal Jacobson was too nervous and distracted to perform up to standard.[49] Certain problems of translation are evident in the transcript, for instance when the gassing of “mules” is mentioned (a mistranslation of Mühlen, the German word for “mills”).<sup>[50]</sup>

The main fact which the prosecution attempted to prove was that the defendants had known that the gas they provided was used for extermination. While witnesses for the gassings did appear, they were not the focus of the trial, and the “fact” of mass extermination with gas in concentration camps was largely taken as known, having already been “proven” at the Belsen trial. In establishing the defendant’s “guilty knowledge”, the vital witnesses were the trio Sehm-Frahm-Pook, as well as the TESTA secretaries Biagini and Uenzelmann. We will focus on the evidence which these witnesses presented at the trial, how it compares to their previous statements, and the pretrial machinations concerning how the case would be presented.

2.1 Sehm, Frahm, Pook

Sehm was the first witness to appear. He made a number of mistakes that damaged his credibility, such as alleging that TESTA had delivered gas to Dachau and Belsen,<sup>[51]</sup> and stating that “it was well known in the firm that Dr. Tesch was not a chemist, but a Doctor of Philosophy and interest only privately in the chemical science [sic].”<sup>[52]</sup> Sehm’s presentation of his story concerning the crucial travel report was consistent with his pretrial statements. With respect to the contentious question of what he had told Frahm, he stated that in the Spring of 1943 he had told Frahm all about the travel report, and Frahm, a “very temperamental person”, had “behaved in a rather violently anti-national socialist way.”<sup>[53]</sup> With respect to Wilhelm Pook, he stated that the latter “came back to Hamburg in October or November 1945 and we have been having discussions since.”<sup>[54]</sup>

Frahm was the next witness to appear, and contradicted Sehm’s account:

Q. Did [Sehm] tell you why he wanted to leave [TESTA]?

A. He indicated that things were going on at that firm with which his conscience could not agree.

Q. Did he particularise what those things were?

A. No. He did not give me any particular details because at that time to talk about such things was quite impossible.<sup>[55]</sup>

Wilhelm Pook and his wife Kate Pook did not appear until Day 3 of the trial. On direct examination Wilhelm Pook was not asked about the Sehm travel report, but did give an account of what Sehm had told him during the war:

Sehm told me that he was working at Tesch & Stabenow and that that firm supplied prussic acid for the territories in the east and that it was mainly a question of the killing of Jews and that Dr. Tesch undertook journeys there to give instruction about the manner of using that poison, and I know that Tesch & Stabenow furnished themselves this poison gas.<sup>[56]</sup>

Only on cross examination was he asked about the travel report. He confirmed Sehm’s story insofar as he stated that Sehm had told him about finding the travel report, read notes he had taken from it, and that he, Pook, had advised Sehm that it was dangerous to carry such a paper.<sup>[57]</sup> He did not, however, remember Sehm’s story about burning the note in an ashtray on the table:

Q. Did anything happen with this copy made by Sehm in your presence?

A. I cannot remember any more if he put it again in his pocket or what happened.[58]

Far more important than whether Pook could confirm Sehm's bizarre tale of the travel report outlining the OKW's plan to gas Jews at night in their barracks, however, was a fact revealed by Tesch's lawyer Zippel. The reader may have noticed that Pook's pretrial statements have not been mentioned. This is for good reason: they are not present in the files. While cross examining Pook, Zippel revealed that pretrial statements were taken from both of the Pooks. He pressed Pook on the discrepancy between his earlier statement and his trial testimony.

Q. Why did you not mention [the travel report] whilst you have been interrogated by Captain Lee, the British Interrogation Officer?

A. In the meantime I could think about it.

Q. Have you in the meantime spoken to Sehm about it?

A. Yes, we did, but we did not gain any new facts.

Q. When did you speak with Sehm about it?

A. Last week.

Q. Have you spoken to Sehm after Sehm appeared as a witness before this court?

A. Last week.[59]

Q. Did Sehm tell you what was the evidence given before this court?

A. It was only repetitions of what he had said before.

Q. Please answer my question now. Did he tell you what he gave as evidence before this court?

A. Yes he did - what was printed in the newspaper.

[...]

Q. Whilst interrogated by the British Interrogation Officer you could not remember that Sehm did show you a paper and yet now, months later, you can remember what was in this document.

A. We talked over this happening just as I gave the evidence a few moments before.[60]

Wilhelm Pook was followed on the witness stand by his wife, Kate Pook, who delivered similar testimony, with a few notable differences. First, she claimed that she had thought at first that the document Sehm brought with him was an original document but only later realized that it was a copy - a story which clashes with Sehm's claim that it was just his own handwritten and fragmentary notes.[61] Second, unlike her husband, she managed to remember Sehm's story about burning the note in an ashtray, although she was forced to admit that she might have merely been "reminded" of this by Sehm when he visited.[62] Third, in her original statement to the British interrogating officer, she had apparently mentioned something about Sehm showing her one of Tesch's letters (rather than Sehm's notes on a travel report, as she claimed at the trial), and she stated that she only remembered about the document after her initial statement.[\[63\]](#)

It is not entirely clear how Zippel acquired a copy of the pretrial Pook statements, or why they are not preserved in the records of the investigation and trial. Indeed, the casual reader of the Tesch investigation files could be forgiven for not noticing (either) Pook's existence. From a few traces, however, we can reconstruct the events of the investigation involving Pook.

Sehm had alluded to Pook without mentioning him by name in his August 24, 1945 letter. His September 18 description of his confrontation with Tesch named Pook for the first time, giving a lengthy description. Sehm repeated his description of Pook in his October 10 statement. Pook, however, was located in the American zone, and was consequently not the easiest witness for the Hamburg-based team to get at.

On October 27, Ashton Hill, the commanding officer of the No. 2 WCIT, requested that a statement be taken from Pook:

It is requested that a statement be obtained from POOK who is now in the American zone, in order to corroborate the evidence of the chief informant Emil SEHM, who has made a statement on the lines set out below [Hill then quotes four paragraphs from Sehm's statement][\[64\]](#)

Making mention of this request, the investigative team's report on the case notes that

In its present form there is very strong indirect evidence against all three accused but only weak direct evidence against Dr TESCH and no direct evidence at all against Herr WEINBACHER and Dr DROSIHN. The direct evidence against Dr TESCH can be strengthened slightly if a corroborative statement is obtained from Wilhelm POOK.[\[65\]](#)

Referencing the report, a November 9 letter stated that Pook was being searched for.[\[66\]](#) Eventually, No. 2 War Crimes Investigation Team received a message informing them that Pook had arrived in Hamburg on November 23:

RESTRICTED. CONFIRMING TELEPHONE CONVERSATION
BENTHAM GREEN/ASHTON HILL RE GIFTGAS CASE AND
DOCTOR TESCH. WILHELM POOK NOW REPORTED ARRIVED
HAMBURG 23 NOV ADDRESS ALTONA STRESEMANNSTRASSE 71
BEI FAMILY MEYER. PLEASE ARRANGE IMMEDIATELY
INVESTIGATION FOR CORROBORATION OF EVIDENCE OF EMIL
SEHM AND REPORT ACCORDINGLY[\[67\]](#)

This message is dated only "02", as in "the second day of the month", at 1800 hours. The position in the file, however, indicates that the month was January. We will trace through the chronology of the pretrial period to see where Pook came back into the story. The report on the case, dating to early November, mentions only that a statement should be taken from Pook. A November 28 advisory report by Brigadier H. Shapcott recommended charges against Tesch only, suggesting that the cases of Weinbacher and Drosihn be left for a later date.[\[68\]](#) Though it listed all witnesses and other evidence to be brought, the report made no mention of Frahm or Pook. These two were also omitted from a December 12 list of witnesses to be called.[\[69\]](#)

On December 21, however, the charge was altered to include three defendants rather than Tesch alone. At this time, Frahm was added to the list of witnesses, but Pook still went unmentioned.[\[70\]](#) On January 3, referencing a telephone conversation between Smithers and Ashton Hill, Pook's arrival was noted:

It has been reported that Wilhelm POOK has left the American zone and is at HAMBURG-ALTONA, Stresemannstrasse 71 by Family Mayer. An immediate interrogation has been ordered by this Branch to be conducted by a member of No. 2 WCIT, and the result will be notified to you accordingly if it is intended to call POOK as a witness.[71]

On January 19 both Pooks were on the witness list, but with a handwritten note that they were “not to be produced”. [72] Wilhelm Pook’s statement was acknowledged as received by 8 Corps District on January 31, [73] and eight further copies were sent on February 2. [74] On February 7, the originals of both Pook statements were passed on, along with copies. [75]

I have narrated these events in such detail to show the compelling evidence that statements from the Pooks were first taken at some point during January. It is important to establish this clearly because there is an intriguing circumstantial argument to the contrary. Here we return to the theme of the manipulation of witness statements by the WCIT. In addition to the Sehm statement of October 10 cited above, a second version of Sehm’s statement was prepared and is included in a set of copies of exhibits to be used at trial. [76] This version, which is given the same date, is identical to the normal statement, with one exception: Sehm’s discussion of his friend Pook, to whom he showed a copy of the mysterious travel report, is omitted.

The existence of this version of Sehm’s statement would appear, on first glance, to be linked with another case of document manipulation, namely that alluded to in the above mentioned November 28 advisory report, which states that Sehm should be presented as a witness “in accordance with Sehm’s statement as amended by this office.” [77] The question arises whether the Pook-less version of Sehm’s statement is that amended version. If so, it would be tempting to suggest that the Pooks’ failure to confirm Sehm’s story caused the British authorities to create a new, Pook-less statement. This would require the hypothesis of an additional, earlier, undocumented meeting between Pook and War Crimes investigators. The chronology of events related to Pook was given in such detail in order to show that such a hypothesis is untenable. The documentary record is too clear to allow for such speculation.

If the Pook-less Sehm statement is identical with “Sehm’s statement as amended by this office”, then the amendment was done prior to taking a statement from Pook, presumably having been performed in order to conceal Pook’s existence from the defense, since at the time his evidence remained a wild card. If the Pook-less Sehm statement is not identical with “Sehm’s statement as amended by this office”, then the latter was either for some reason not preserved in the Tesch trial files, or is nothing other than the standard version of Sehm’s statement, the true original not having been preserved. Whichever of these options one prefers, it’s clear that a great deal of document manipulation went on in the preparation for the Tesch trial.

2.2 Biagini and Uenzelmann

Aside from the trio Sehm-Frahm-Pook, the only witnesses offering evidence that Tesch and his fellow defendants had known that their gas was used to kill humans were two secretaries, Erna Elisa Biagini [78] and Anna Uenzelmann. [79] Neither of these witnesses told such a spectacular tale as Sehm, but they were seen at the trial as providing confirmation. Of the two, Biagini is the more interesting, in that she completely changed her story between her pretrial and trial statements.

In her interrogation, Biagini stated that she had not seen written materials concerning homicidal gassing, but mentioned that rumors on this subject had circulated at TESTA.

These rumors, which she first heard in Winter 1942, were not given any credence.<sup>[80]</sup> The same story is given in her statement<sup>[81]</sup> and in the report on the case.<sup>[82]</sup> Her statements to this effect may well be true. Rumors concerning the gassing of humans did circulate in Germany during the war. It would not be surprising if some typists at a gassing firm gossiped about them. That said, Biagini claimed that she had heard the rumors from her fellow typist Erika Rathcke, which Rathcke denied in her interrogation, asking to be confronted with the witness who claimed this. She maintained this denial in the face of a threatening interrogation (“I tell you that you don’t speak the truth. That rumor was circulated in the office and you must know. I shall let you sit here for years if you don’t speak up.”). She had heard rumors about “idiots” being put to sleep (the euthanasia program), and knew of an institutionalized family member who had died shortly after a transfer, causing suspicion. She had not, however, heard anything about the use of gas for this purpose.<sup>[83]</sup>

At the trial, however, Biagini’s testimony was completely different. She first denied having heard rumors, but then told a new story about seeing a travel report:

Q. Did you ever hear any rumours about Zyklon B whilst you were with Tesch & Stabenow?

A. No rumours. What sort of rumours?

Q. Were there rumours about Zyklon B whilst you were with Tesch & Stabenow?

A. No rumours.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE: When you were working with the firm, were there any rumours going about as to what Zyklon B was being used for?

A. I do not know for certain.

Q. Have you understood the question?

A. Yes.

Q. Let the court have an answer. It is a very simple question.

A. That the gas was used in concentration camps for disinfection.

MAJOR DRAPER: Did you ever hear that they were using the gas for any other purpose than for disinfecting vermin?

A. Yes.

Q. Will you tell us the circumstances and what you heard?

A. I was working at a document; I have read it - that it might be used for human beings as well.

Q. Do you say you read that yourself?

A. Yes.

Q. Having read that, did you mention it to any of your co-employees?

A. Yes.

Q. To whom and in what circumstances?

A. To Fraulein Rathcke. [...]

Q. Did you learn anything else about Zyklon B being used for exterminating human beings whilst you were in that firm?

A. No, nothing else.[84]

Under cross examination, she stated that this report was one of Dr. Tesch's travel reports, but did not remember anything about the context of the document. She could testify only to having read in a travel report something concerning the possibility that Zyklon could be used against humans.[85] When questioned about the matter, Tesch thought that Biagini's new story might be based in fact, and offered the hypothesis that a student in one of his courses might have asked him about the effect of Zyklon on humans, and he might have taken note of this in a travel report. When challenged on this he emphasized that he indeed did frequently write down students' questions in the travel reports from his courses, that he could prove this, and that students did indeed ask such questions at his courses.[86] Rathcke, for her part, denied that Biagini had told her about this document.[87]

The prosecution clearly did not know Biagini's new story before the case went to trial, as can be seen from the fact that Major Draper mentioned her old story in his opening speech.[88] Her reasons for changing her story are not apparent. Like her old story, her new story is perfectly plausible and not at all incriminating, despite the prosecution's insinuations. Her new story certainly cannot be interpreted as confirmation of Sehm's travel-report story.[89] While both stories involve a travel report, the two descriptions of that travel report are quite different, as Tesch himself noted at the trial.[90]

The other TESTA secretary to offer evidence that Tesch had known of gassings was Anna Uenzelmann. Unlike Biagini, she stuck to her pretrial statements: at some point in 1942, after returning from Berlin, Dr. Tesch had said something to the effect that he had heard that there were plans to use Zyklon to kill humans, but had not given any details whatsoever.[91] Tesch denied that there was any truth to Uenzelmann's story, and noted that "Frau Uenzelmann is well known in the business as a very confused person", and suggested she may have become confused during the years since the event and made a mistake.[92]

2.3 Excess Zyklon Supply?

It would be difficult to overstate how much emphasis was placed on the size of the Zyklon supply to Auschwitz during the Tesch investigation and trial. According to the prosecution, the supply was so large that Tesch must have known that the gas was used for extermination. TESTA's employees, under arrest at the time, were pressured to provide support for this argument. Meanwhile, in his first interrogation, Tesch had indicated skepticism towards this line of argument:

Q. I am going to tell you something instead of asking the questions. 5 Million people died from gassing in Auschwitz. What do you understand from that?

A. It is news to me.

Q. Tonight you are learning something, are you not? You are astounded, are you not? So some of the gas which went in did not kill merely bugs, did it?

A. I do not know; there were a lot of bugs in Auschwitz.[\[93\]](#)

In one case, the investigation team managed to secure a sort of endorsement for the excess Zyklon supply [hereafter EZS] argument, but only based on the assumption that Auschwitz was much smaller than it in fact was: a statement taken from the gassing technician Gustav Kock[\[94\]](#) stated that he would be “astonished” at Zyklon orders of one ton monthly for two years from a camp the size of Neuengamme.[\[95\]](#) He repeated this statement at the trial.[\[96\]](#) Auschwitz, which had ordered 19 tons in two years, was meant, and the interrogator had suggested to Kock that Auschwitz was the size of Neuengamme or Gross Rosen. In another case, the British interrogating agent explicitly stated that Auschwitz was a normal sized camp, and was smaller than Sachsenhausen.[\[97\]](#) The confusion about the size of Auschwitz was compounded by the statements of the gassing technician August Marcinkowski, who recounted an early trip to the camp:

In March 1940 I carried out a gassing in AUSCHWITZ. This was just before it was due to become a concentration camp. At this time AUSCHWITZ consisted of seven to eight one-storeyed [einstöckigen] stone houses and we used about 120 kilograms of ZYKLON gas to gas it.[\[98\]](#)

Marcinkowski was called at the trial and repeated the story, stating this time that 120 to 130 kg of Zyklon had been used.[\[99\]](#) Captain Anton Freud, in turn, repeated this claim while interrogating Tesch, in order to prove that the Zyklon supply to Auschwitz was excessive:

Q Not conspicuous! Do you know what people have said about you? If a camp ordered 1 ton of gas a month, throughout 2 years, and you didn't notice it, then you are either moronic or you don't want to know it. You know that the entire Auschwitz camp can be gassed with 120 kg.

A. One barrack?

Q. No, the entire Auschwitz camp.[\[100\]](#)

The possibility that the Auschwitz for which Tesch supplied gas might have been somewhat larger than the Auschwitz which Marcinkowski gassed in early 1940 seems not to have occurred to Freud. Indeed, it was taken for granted by the investigating team that the quantity of Zyklon supplied to Auschwitz was so immense as to be sufficient to prove that large scale extermination of humans occurred at the camp. An entire segment of Tesch's October 24 interrogation is devoted to Anton Freud's rant against Tesch's claim that the quantity supplied was not surprisingly large:

Q. There aren't enough insects in all of Germany that one needs 1 ton Zyklon per month. If a camp ordered that much, you must have been aware that it wasn't only used against insects. Do you know what your people have said about that? That you are an idiot or you didn't want to know what the gas was used for.[\[101\]](#)

Here Freud was alluding to Gustav Kock's statements mentioned above, originally made during his interrogation of October 20.[\[102\]](#)

At the trial, the prosecution strenuously objected to Tesch's statement that Auschwitz's demand for a larger supply of Zyklon was unsurprising due to the fact that Auschwitz was a larger camp.[\[103\]](#) Their plan for the EZS argument was to claim, based on inaccurate statements from Drosihn, that the SS could not carry out disinfection of barracks without the help of TESTA technicians, but could only perform gassings in gas chambers. Therefore all Zyklon sent to Auschwitz had to be used in (delousing) gas chambers or for homicidal purposes. As the quantities ordered were in excess of those needed by delousing chambers, therefore Tesch had to know that Zyklon was being used for mass extermination of humans at Auschwitz. Tesch rejected these arguments as well:

Q. Do you know how many delousing chambers there were in Auschwitz in 1942?

A. I do not.

Q. Do you know how many you supplied to this concentration camp.

A. Yes

Q. How many, roughly?

A. As far as I know we did not supply any.

Q. You would agree, would you not, that seven thousand kilograms of Zyklon B gas is unlikely to have been used for the purposes of delousing chambers?

A. On the contrary, I even now today am of the opinion that even a bigger amount could have been used.

Q. And you say the same about twelve thousand kilograms in 1943?

A. Yes, that means 1,000 kilograms a month and that is not exaggerated for a big camp.[\[104\]](#)

Despite the prosecution's best efforts, the EZS argument consistently failed to persuade competent observers. The gassing technicians to whom it was put invariably rejected it, the only exceptions being in those cases where the technicians were given erroneous information concerning the size of Auschwitz.[\[105\]](#) Tesch rejected it, as did Weinbacher[\[106\]](#) and Drosihn, the latter even under the assumption that the Zyklon sent to Auschwitz cannot have been used for disinfecting barracks, but only in gas chambers or homicidally:

Q. If it is so from the books of the firm that 7000 kgs. [of Zyklon-B] went to Auschwitz alone [in 1942], would that strike you as the proper quantity for disinfecting only in gas chambers?

A. I do not know the conditions in Auschwitz, but I think it may be possible. [...]

Q. Auschwitz took in 1943 12000 kgs. of the gas. Would you have been surprised if you had heard that?

A. I knew that Auschwitz was a very big camp.[\[107\]](#)

The prosecution also put the argument before Karl Schwarz, Professor emeritus at the (Hamburg?) Institute of Hygiene, who declined to endorse it.[\[108\]](#)

Despite its consistent rejection by everyone with expertise in gassing, the EZS argument remained the prosecution's favorite, and went on making the rounds with holocaust historians. For example, in a well-known anthology on the alleged National Socialist gassings, the size of the Zyklon deliveries to Majdanek was held to be proof that they were intended for homicidal use.[\[109\]](#) While the EZS argument was repudiated by Jean-Claude Pressac,[\[110\]](#) it was resurrected by Robert Jan van Pelt in connection with the Irving-Lipstadt trial.[\[111\]](#) Van Pelt's shoddy arguments need not concern us beyond a few brief remarks.[\[112\]](#)

Van Pelt uses Zyklon delivery quantities from Tesch trial documents, but these numbers are not complete and hence not suitable for comparisons of the sort van Pelt wants to draw.[\[113\]](#) The quantities van Pelt quotes do not include the gassings that TESTA carried out themselves in the camps,[\[114\]](#) notably in Sachsenhausen and Neuengamme, where these quantities are large enough to dramatically alter the results of van Pelt's calculations for 1942.[\[115\]](#) TESTA's books record that in that year it gassed a total of 334,720 cubic meters at Sachsenhausen and 112,260 cubic meters at Neuengamme. At 15 grams per cubic meter, the standard concentration for gassing barracks,[\[116\]](#) this means the use of 5,020.8 and 1,683.9 kg of Zyklon, respectively. These quantities dwarf van Pelt's annual totals of 1,438 and 180 kg for these two camps. When the two sets of figures are added together, it appears that the quantities of Zyklon going to Sachsenhausen and Neuengamme in 1942 were, if anything, excessive in comparison with the quantity going to Auschwitz, perhaps as a result of German fear that epidemics in these camps might spread and affect the nearby urban areas.

Further, van Pelt assumes that the Zyklon supply to camps other than Auschwitz, Neuengamme for example, was adequate on a per-prisoner basis, while in reality Neuengamme prisoners complained that delousing was scarcely ever done, and blamed the camp administration for this omission, which was the result of a shortage of Zyklon.[\[117\]](#) Moreover, citing the Nuremberg document NI-9912 (of little direct relevance to Auschwitz), van Pelt assumes that the Auschwitz delousing chambers would have used a concentration of 8 grams per cubic meter. The concentration normally recommended by TESTA, however, was 10 grams per cubic meter (Type 'D'). Even worse, van Pelt assumes a concentration of 5-8 grams per cubic meter for the delousing of barracks. TESTA's recommendation for the gassing of barracks was 15 grams per cubic meter (Type 'E').[\[118\]](#) Correcting this last figure alone suffices to overturn van Pelt's analysis.

Van Pelt compounds his errors by assuming that all camps require the same amount of Zyklon per prisoner, without considering regional differences in hygienic conditions. This allows us to return to the arguments made at the Tesch trial. In his first interrogation, Tesch remarked on the regional difference in the need for disinfestation, stating that "Eastern territories were particularly in danger of spotted fever", although this was not said in the context of the EZS argument.[\[119\]](#) In his second surviving interrogation he made this point as well, this time in the EZS context, responding to the suggestion that the deliveries to the concentration camps were "a little strange" with a reference to the great danger of louse infestation in the east.[\[120\]](#)

Tesch elaborated on this point at his trial, noting that there was a greater infestation problem in the east than in the west,[\[121\]](#) and stating that among the reasons he was not astonished by the quantity of Zyklon supplied to Auschwitz was that "Upper Silesia was a much infested province of Germany, and because I experienced in Poland a sort of infestation with insects and vermin as I had not thought possible."[\[122\]](#) When the prosecution expressed incredulity that Tesch should not have thought it strange to see Auschwitz order four times as much gas as Sachsenhausen over a certain period,[\[123\]](#) Tesch observed yet again that "one is a territory which is infected by vermin". He explained that this was both general knowledge ("We knew that the whole of Poland and Upper Silesia were territories which were very badly infested") and something he knew on the basis of his own experience.[\[124\]](#)

The prosecution also knew Tesch's statement to be true. Their own trial Exhibit DB, a travel report dated March 20, 1941, reporting on Tesch's experiences in Upper Silesia from 7-11 March, contained a discussion of the poor sanitary situation in Upper Silesia, including the remark that while the disinfection plan was not yet definite, all were agreed that "something radical must take place."<sup>[125]</sup>

Finally, in his attempt to obtain an upper bound for the amount of Zyklon that could have been put to "ordinary" use, van Pelt assumes that the entire supply of that product delivered to the Auschwitz complex had to be used in either the Stammlager or in Birkenau. He gives no justification for the assumption that the other Auschwitz subcamps never required Zyklon. The need to supply subcamps was repeatedly mentioned at the Tesch trial.<sup>[126]</sup> As van Pelt cites the trial transcript, it is unclear how he remained ignorant of this fact; the most charitable interpretation is that while he found it a fine thing to cite the trial transcript in support of his arguments, he did not feel obligated to go the trouble of reading it.

2.4 Sentence, Appeal, and Execution

Tesch and Weinbacher were found guilty and sentenced to death,<sup>[127]</sup> while Drosihn's groveling earned him an acquittal. On March 19, Tesch submitted a petition against the judgment, as did Weinbacher the next day. Both men referred to the written appeals of their lawyers.<sup>[128]</sup> Tesch's lawyer Dr. Zippel wrote a lengthy appeal which addressed a number of issues which had looked bad for Tesch during the trial. Chief among these was the issue of large gas chambers. Tesch had made various denials concerning his ignorance of large size gas chambers. At the trial, the prosecution sought to destroy his credibility by showing that these were lies. Drosihn wrote a statement on appeal concerning these large gassing facilities:

I hereby declare under oath that the small 10 cbm. normal gas-chambers, which were used for quick delousing of clothing and simultaneous bodily delousing of the wearers of this clothing, f.i.<sup>[129]</sup> in barracks, are unsuitable for the delousing of winter clothing for the troops, which is returned from the front in large quantities during the spring and summer months by car, lorry, or truck loads for repair, because this material was continually brought to the collecting stations of the Army Clothing Departments, and had then to be taken in hand. For this purpose I therefore considered the employment of large gassing rooms more practical than the corresponding number of small chambers. The places known to me indeed all only used large rooms for gassing, but did not install typical gas chambers. As instances I would enumerate the clothing department of the Heeresgruppe Nord

1) in Riga - Mühlgraben

1 gassing room of 1500 cbm.

2) in Pleskau

1 gassing room of abt. 150 cbm.

furthermore the Field Clothing Department of the air force Riga

3) in Riga - Ilgeziem

1 gassing room of abt. 180 cbm.

Big rooms have the advantage of a considerable saving in building material for the construction of inner walls, and that instead of many equipments only one is required and the handling of the clothes (taking and handing out) is quicker and simpler. By extending the time to 8 - 24 hours for the gas to take effect in comparison to the gassing duration of not quite one hour with simultaneous personal (bodily) de-lousing, the gyratory equipment could be dispensed with altogether.

In the repair workshop of the Reichsbahn in Posen finally whole trains with military winter-clothing were regularly deloused by means of Zyklon in truck loads with afore-mentioned Pintsch Tunnel. This disinfecting establishment of abt. 500 cbm. was not only arranged to be operated with heat but also for the production of sub-pressure, so that quick time for the gas to take its effect and high outputs could be attained. The tunnel in Posen is illustrated on the page before last of the Testa-Fibel regarding Zyklon.[130]

This confusion appears to have resulted in part from the prosecution's use of the term Gaskammer to designate all kinds of gassing spaces, even the kind that gassing professionals would call generally a Gasraum, and in part from the prosecutors' failure to consistently distinguish between equipment that TESTA themselves supplied and equipment that they had merely heard of. Thus in his interrogation, Drosihn says that he has never heard of large Gaskammern one minute, and immediately afterwards discusses an immense gassing facility in Riga.[131] This is clearly not an attempt to deceive, but rather proof that he did not classify the Riga facility as a Gaskammer. The fact that the term Gaskammer was assumed to have a somewhat restricted usage is also supported by the interrogation of Gustav Kock, who distinguished an improvised Gasraum from a Gaskammer. [132] Thus, the prosecution's belief that Tesch was lying in his statements concerning large gas chambers is simply the result of their failure to understand the usage of the relevant specialized vocabulary.

Tesch's lawyer also sought to call for the testimony of additional scientists as character witnesses, including the Nobel laureate Otto Hahn.[133] Such gambits were tried by any number of accused Germans, and rarely did much good. A highly favorable personal letter from Léon Blum did nothing to prevent Dr. Schiedlausky from being sentenced to death at the British Ravensbrück trial.[134] British agent Sigismund Payne Best's highly sympathetic account of Sachsenhausen commandant Anton Kaindl[135] did nothing to prevent the British from transferring Kaindl to Russian hands and to his death in imprisonment. Even more futile was Kurt Eccarius's wife's attempt to aid her husband by providing his former prisoner Martin Niemöller as a witness to his character: by the time she wrote, he had already been turned over to the Russians.[136]

Attempted help came from outside as well, as Fritz Kiessig, who had worked with Tesch's company on disinfestation in the east, wrote to offer his services in their defense. His letter reads

Dear Sirs,

On the evening of 2nd. March I heard from a British wireless station that three gentlemen of your firm had been arrested for having participated in gassing operations in the East.

Whilst I was in the O.K.H.B of the Adm.Amt V2 during 1942/43 I also had to do among other matters with the entire de-contamination problem and collaborated a great deal with your good firm or respectively with one of your directors in this question. This matter is therefore not unknown to me and as far as it concerns the section "Army" of our forces the happenings in “gassings” as indicated in the British radio are entirely new to me.

If you should have any interest in my evidence I will gladly hold myself at your disposal, as the practices of the firms occupying themselves in the east with de-contamination are known to me from personal experience.

Yours faithfully

(signed) Fritz Kiessig

Oberfeldintendant a.D.[\[137\]](#)

The letter was received only after the trial had finished. In his appeal, Zippel informed the authorities of the letter, and requested “that arrangements be made to cross-examine this witness” in order to confirm or refute Sehm’s claims.[\[138\]](#) This was not done. In a memorandum recommending confirmation of the sentences, Brigadier H. Scott-Barrett claimed that the appeals “do not disclose any substantially new matter.”[\[139\]](#) The sentences were duly confirmed. The death warrants were signed on April 26 and executed on May 16.[\[140\]](#)

Several weeks later, Tesch and Weinbacher’s lawyers filed a protest, noting that neither they nor the families of the victims had been informed that the execution had been scheduled or even that it had taken place. Their complaint was forwarded to the headquarters of the British Army of the Rhine, with the observation that “It would appear unnatural that the nearest relatives of a man about to be executed are not advised of the forthcoming execution,” and the question, “Are relatives entitled to receive the body for interment?”[\[141\]](#) The reply was negative, and read:

Accused sentenced to death are not notified that their sentences have been confirmed until the evening before execution. It is undesirable that there should be any demonstrations in connection with executions and it is therefore necessary to withhold any information relating to the dates of execution until they have been carried out. In this latter connection, the question of notifying next of Kin that death sentences have been carried out and giving notice of confirmation of prison sentences, is at present being considered [...] It has been decided that bodies of executed persons will not be handed over to next of kin, or their place of burial made known.[\[142\]](#)

2.5 The Theft of Tesch’s Property

In the absence of substantial direct proof of Tesch’s guilt, a large portion of the prosecution’s strategy fixed on portraying him as a liar. The report on the case gave a list of his alleged lies, and those of his co-defendants.[\[143\]](#) One of Tesch’s alleged lies was the claim that when a British agent left the room on October 23, he had not exchanged whispers with head bookkeeper Zaun. The prosecution laid out their view of the incident:

Arrangements were made for the firm to be allowed to continue business after the release from prison of all its members except Dr TESCH, Dr DROSIHN and Herr WEINBACHER. Military Government appointed Alfred ZAUN, the former Chief of Accounts, to act as manager in the absence of Dr TESCH. In order to obtain the necessary written authorities, Herr ZAUN applied for a personal interview with Dr TESCH, which was granted and arranged for 23rd October. The opportunity was taken to lay a trap in the form of a microphone in the office in which the interview was conducted, and a German stenographer was detailed to record the conversation.

As a cover, in order not to rouse the suspicions of either Dr TESCH or Herr ZAUN, an interpreter of this Team was initially ordered to remain in the room, being summoned out by a bogus telephone call. Immediately he had left the room Dr TESCH and Herr ZAUN's conversation dropped to a whisper which could not be understood; but certain passages were recorded which revealed that Dr TESCH had handed over to ZAUN his wallet containing RM 3,700 and certain personal possessions to be given to Frau TESCH. The failure of this ruse to obtain any concrete evidence, owing to the fact that the microphone apparatus was not sufficiently tuned for whispers, was unfortunate. However, there is little doubt that quite a considerable amount of whispering was interspersed between normal conversation, and great suspicion fell upon both these persons. At the subsequent interrogation of both of them, done independently, they both strongly denied that any whispering took place. The possibility of ZAUN being re-imprisoned was seriously considered, but it was felt that he still was blameless as regards the main crime that was being investigated; further, he would be of less value to the Team in the conduct of the investigation if in prison than he would be at large.[\[144\]](#)

During that period, Tesch had given Zaun valuables to pass on to Tesch's wife. Resentful at the failure of their ploy, the British confronted Tesch during his October 24 interrogation, claiming that he had tried to bribe Zaun:

Q. Herr Zaun is very sorry that he could not bring your things to your wife, but he found that RM 4,000 was too small a bribe.

A. That was not a bribe.

Q. You want to deny that you gave Herr Zaun money?

A. No, I gave Herr Zaun RM 3,700, which was not supposed to be a bribe; he was supposed to deliver it to my wife.

Q. Did you have permission for that? Herr Zaun told us all the secrets that you shared with him there, and as a bribe you gave him money.

A. I can only say that we shared no secrets, and he was supposed to give the money to my wife.

Q. What else was he supposed to give your wife?

A. My fountain pen, my watch, my rings.

Q. What else?

A. I don't know.

Q. What else? Penholder, perhaps a tie pin?

A. Yes, that also.

Q. And letters to your wife?

A. No.

Q. Tasks for your wife?

A. No, I did not say that to Herr Zaun. I only said that he should give the money to my wife.

Q. No tasks for your wife? Herr Zaun has informed us otherwise.

A. I only said that he should bring the gold securely to my wife.[\[145\]](#)

It should be mentioned that the investigation team was already accusing Zaun of being bribed a week before the meeting,[\[146\]](#) and that they made such accusations very freely. The questioning of Tesch continued to address alleged whispering:

Q. What did you whisper yesterday with Herr Zaun?

A. Nothing, we did not whisper anything. I spoke to him only on points due to business affairs.

Q. What did you whisper?

A. No, we did not...

Q. You did not whisper. It did not occur to you at all to lower your voice. You continued to speak normally when we were outside?

A. Yes, I did not whisper.[\[147\]](#)

Tesch reiterated this version of events in his statement.[\[148\]](#) According to the description of the incident quoted above, Zaun was also interrogated about the alleged whispering on October 24th, but the statement taken from Zaun on that same day contains no mention of the meeting with Tesch, or of whispers, or of bribes,[\[149\]](#) and the transcript of the interrogation is not present in the case files.

As for the property which Tesch had tried to pass on to his wife, it was confiscated by the British. On January 23, 1946 - three months after this incident - WCIT No. 2 transferred the property of Tesch, Weinbacher, and Drosihn to Property Control. The receipt included some of the items taken from Zaun (fountain pen, pocket watch, tie pin) along with other items, but not Tesch's rings, and it included only 3,500 marks, rather than the 3,700 Tesch had given to Zaun.[\[150\]](#) More precisely, they claimed to have handed over the property. The property was not returned (just as the families were not informed of the executions). Eventually, a custodian was appointed by the British military government to look for the property. He wrote to the war crimes investigation section of the military government

According to information received from Mr. Alfred Zaun, a bookkeeper in the firm of the deceased, the following objects were taken from Dr. Tesch on 23 October 1945 in the course of an interrogation held after his arrest in the War Crimes Enclosure in Hamburg [...][\[151\]](#)

Lt. Col. R.A. Nightingale's reply noted that the gold wedding ring and gold diamond ring were not contained on the receipt.[\[152\]](#) Property Control Section, however, reported that "No trace of this property could be found in Hamburg nor is the name of Capt. H.B. Bursar, S.O. III P.C., who is supposed to have signed the receipt, known at this HQ."[\[153\]](#) While there is no certainty here, it appears that someone in the war crimes investigation team invented H.B. Bursar (note the name!) and forged the receipt in order to cover up the theft of Tesch's property.

It wasn't only the investigative team that had financial motivations. Emil Sehm, who had been so keen to stress his "top secret" knowledge in his initial letters, hoped for some gain from the case, and claimed compensation as an expert witness for the period in September 1945 during which he worked on the case, but after a series of correspondence it was found that he was completely ineligible for such wages,<sup>[154]</sup> which were up to 3 RM per hour, or 6 in exceptional cases, in comparison with ordinary witnesses' wages of 20 Pf. to 1.50 RM.<sup>[155]</sup>

3. Miscellaneous Elements

We will take the opportunity to gather a number of pieces of information of interest which are contained in the files of the Tesch trial. The collection is by no means comprehensive.

3.1 The Witness Pery Broad

Despite Jean-Claude Pressac's dismissal of his "report"<sup>[156]</sup> the Auschwitz witness Pery Broad has returned to the prominent position in the pantheon of Auschwitz witnesses which he obtained during the Frankfurt Auschwitz trial, being relied on in an important recent collection of articles concerning claimed National Socialist gassings.<sup>[157]</sup> According to Michael Shermer, "Broad was never tortured, and he had nothing to gain and everything to lose by confessing."<sup>[158]</sup> The files of the Tesch trial demonstrate that this was not the case. When Broad was transferred from one prison to another in preparation for the Tesch trial, he was accompanied by a note requesting that he receive preferential treatment: "Perry Broad has recently given much useful information. He should therefore receive as good treatment as is possible within ALTONA Prison."<sup>[159]</sup> While this dynamic was not responsible for all German testimony on homicidal gassings, it was, as revisionists have contended and this note confirms, a structural factor.

3.2 The Witness Rudolf Diels

One witness managed to influence the Tesch trial greatly without having to make an appearance. This was Rudolf Diels, whose statement was used by the prosecution to support their contention that the extermination of the Jews by gas was general knowledge in Germany during the war. Somewhat surprisingly, the previous studies of the Tesch trial that have discussed Diels do not seem to have realized just who he was. Rudolf Diels, in fact, was the first head of the Gestapo, Heydrich's predecessor in that role. Diels was a political opportunist who sought to make himself useful to the Allies. He presented himself as a victim of National Socialist persecution, claiming that he had been sentenced to death,<sup>[160]</sup> and giving statements damaging to former colleagues and rivals.

As one observer wrote, "The case of Dr. DIELS is rather peculiar, if not unique."<sup>[161]</sup> Opinion among Allied authorities on Diels was divided. Some British officials supported him. Major Draper recommended his release, noting that "he has proved of considerable assistance in rendering specialized information to British War Crimes Executive and also to this office."<sup>[162]</sup> Others did not, stating that Diels should not be given any liberty, as he was a "dangerous conspirator and professional revolutionary."<sup>[163]</sup>

Diels was later kept in the Allied prosecution's "Guest House" in Nuremberg,<sup>[164]</sup> and among other things provided key testimony supporting the prosecution's attempt to blame the National Socialist leadership for the Reichstag fire.<sup>[165]</sup>

On February 13, Thomas Dodd wrote to Colonel Phillimore, noting that Rudolf Diels had been called as a Nuremberg defense witness for Schacht. He asked to be sent all pertinent information derived from the British interrogations of Diels as soon as possible.[\[166\]](#) The next day, it was noted that Diels might not be available at the Tesch trial because he might be required as a defense witness at Nuremberg.[\[167\]](#) At the trial Draper explained that Diels could not come:

He is at present undergoing interrogation by the military authorities. He cannot be released. [...] he is undergoing interrogation on security matters. Application was made through the proper channels, but it was said that he could not come. [...] It is also within the knowledge of the convening authority that the witness is being held at the disposition of the Nuremberg International Tribunal.[\[168\]](#)

Diels's evidence exists in two forms: his statement[\[169\]](#) and the interrogator's notes.[\[170\]](#) The two are compatible, and the latter was probably used to compose the former. Most of the former was read into the record during the Tesch trial.[\[171\]](#)

There are a few points of interest in Diels's statements. The prosecution set great stock in his statement that there was general knowledge of gassing in Germany during the war. Diels, who made similar statements concerning the general knowledge of gassing a year later as well,[\[172\]](#) focused on stories of euthanasia gassings. He claimed that it was general knowledge that Zyklon-B was used to gas insane people, mentioning a euthanasia center for killing with Zyklon-B located in Württemberg. Interestingly, there is a 1941 document mentioning the rumor of euthanasia gassings with hydrogen cyanide,[\[173\]](#) and rumors concerning gassings in Württemberg circulated in the press.[\[174\]](#)

Because of his opportunism and eagerness to please those in power, Diels's statements offer insight into the thinking of the War Crimes investigators. For instance, his statement notes that "It might well be that 'spotted fever' was also a term used as camouflage for gassing operations."[\[175\]](#) This was exactly the kind of simple-minded argument that War Crimes investigators were eager to put forward. Indeed, at the Tesch trial the prosecution argued that the evidence of Broad and Bendel "put it beyond doubt" that the story of disinfestation was only "a cover and facade - a facade peculiarly dear to the mind of the SS".[\[176\]](#) The prosecution applied this notion of a facade across the board, stating that "throughout that correspondence there is a duplicity to each word used. Either it is a genuine disinfection that the SS require, or it is the cover for the biggest murder one can imagine."[\[177\]](#) While it is beyond the scope of this paper to examine each one of the trial documents in detail, it is clear that all of them concern disinfestation. Diels's statements relating Tesch to the euthanasia program also reflect the investigation's thinking: on the basis of some details in a May 1945 report on euthanasia,[\[178\]](#) they seem to have convinced themselves that Tesch had delivered Zyklon for the purpose of euthanasia gassings.[\[179\]](#)

Meanwhile at Nuremberg, the defense wanted Diels to testify, but the prosecution insisted that he could not appear:

Dr. PANNENBECKER: As witness Number 4 I have named Dr. Diels, who is now in an internment camp in the Hanover district. The witness was chief of the Gestapo in Prussia in 1933-1934. He is acquainted with the measures which the Defendant Frick, as Reich Minister of the Interior, decreed for the supervision of the provinces by the Reich, as well as about the concentration camps, and also, in particular, about measures taken in individual cases and about conditions in the camps.

SIR DAVID MAXWELL-FYFE: I submit that this witness' evidence should be taken in writing. With regard to the earlier part, the Tribunal will have the advantage of the Defendant Goring who was concerned especially with the practices of the police in Prussia in 1933 and 1934, and with regard to the other points, as to the measures of the Defendant Frick, these are either laws or orders or administrative measures, which could be included, in the submission of the Prosecution, as being dealt with by written testimony supplemented by testimony of the Defendant Frick himself.

Dr. PANNENBECKER: I should like to say something to that. I believe that it would be more practical to hear the witness here before the Court. We can then have a talk with him beforehand and find out the points on which he has detailed information, whereas in an interrogatory these things could not be discussed in detail.

THE PRESIDENT: We will consider that.[\[180\]](#)

They may have considered, but Diels never appeared before the court. It is evident that the authorities had no intention to allow him to testify, whether at the Tesch trial, at Nuremberg, or anywhere else. They preferred to use him as an aid for their own preparations, while presenting his statements in affidavit form so that they could not be effectively challenged.

Meanwhile, Allied opinion on Diels remained split. One side held that Diels was “a useful asset and mine of information in which capacity we should prefer to have him as a free man.”[\[181\]](#) The other thought that “It has become increasingly apparent that Dr Rudolf DIELS is a man whose liberty should in no circumstances be granted to him” and “it cannot be urged too strongly that his liberty would be a menace to the security of the occupation”.[\[182\]](#) Ultimately, Diels was cleared of all potential charges and released. He had provided such “considerable assistance to the prosecuting authorities” at Nuremberg that Telford Taylor informed the British of Diels’s impending return to their zone, and urged his favorable treatment.[\[183\]](#)

3.3 The Hungarian Aktion and the Zyklon-B Supply to Auschwitz

In a December 1945 deposition, former DEGESCH managing director Gerhard Peters stated that

Sometime in 1944 a member of the SS from AUSCHWITZ concentration camp came to visit DEGESCH at FRANKFURT-on-MAIN FRIEDBERG and asked if we would supply some ZYKLON B direct to AUSCHWITZ as a transport of 250,000 Hungarian Jews was expected and they required material for disinfection owing to the danger of typhus breaking out. This request was refused as an agreement had already been reached that all orders for the Wehrmacht, including the SS, with effect from the end of 1943 or the beginning of 1944, would be made through HSP BERLIN[\[184\]](#)

Peters repeated the story in a later affidavit,[\[185\]](#) adding that he had no suspicion that the requested delivery was for any purpose other than delousing. Peters’s testimony demonstrates that the description of Zyklon as “material for the resettlement of Jews”, is not at all suspicious or incriminating, but was commonplace and was correctly taken at face value.

3.4 Riga

Tesch and Stabenow was quite active in the Riga area. Tesch and Drosihn both taught courses in that locale, and gassing technician Johann Holst was employed there as well. That Tesch taught a course on (sanitary) gassing in late 1941 in Riga is now well known, and was mentioned repeatedly in pretrial interrogations and at the trial. However, Richard Breitman's discovery of intercepts[186] mentioning Tesch and Zyklon in this connection caused the historian to speculate wildly about plans for exterminating Jews with Zyklon in the eastern territories.[187] Responding to Breitman, Christian Gerlach to his credit recognized that the context is clearly that of sanitary rather than homicidal gassing.[188] Making arguments similar to Breitman's, Andrej Angrick and Peter Klein have argued that the plans to gas the eastern Jews were thwarted by the regulations concerning approval for the use of Zyklon-B.[189] In fact, Tesch stated that from Riga he "went on towards the front for gassing",[190] and had there been the intention to gas Jews with Zyklon at that time and place, there would have been nothing to prevent the diversion of adequate quantities of Zyklon for that purpose, with or without the permission of the quartermaster.

Owing to TESTA's activities in the Riga area, there are a number of trial documents pertaining to that region. One of these is useful with respect to another more broadly referenced and much disputed document:

To: The General Kommissar, RIGA

For the attention of Herr Dr. BOSSE,

RIGA.

Training of personnel only after delousing apparatus made ready and on availability of Zyklon and gassing apparatus ..... possible (.) letter follows (.)[191]

Unfortunately, the document exists only in English translation, at least as far as the files of the Tesch trial are concerned. However, the phrase "gassing apparatus" is almost certainly a translation of "Vergasungsapparat", which recalls the well known use of that term's plural in Nuremberg Document NO-365. The reference in that document has been variously interpreted by orthodox holocaust historians as a reference to stationary gas chambers[192] or as a reference to the use of gas vans.[193] The fact that the term Vergasungsapparat was indeed used in Riga in the context of delousing sheds light on the proper interpretation of this document. This applies regardless of the authenticity of the document, as an inauthentic document is likely to have been constructed from modified authentic materials, from which the term Vergasungsapparat would have been obtained.

Another Riga-related Tesch trial document mentions that "The large chamber of 120 cbm and the small one of 30 cbm should be kept out of the two chambers provided for mobile disinfestations etc." [194] Again we are lacking a German original, and the translation is quite puzzling and perhaps incorrect, but one important aspect emerges, namely that chambers for mobile disinfestation, presumably vehicular, were in use in the Riga area. The existence of such devices likely contributed to reports of homicidal gas vans in this region.

3.5 Gassing Technicians as Witnesses

The TESTA gassing technicians offer an interesting, if marginal, class of witness. A number of them had visited concentration camps. However most of the visits were early in the war, before the alleged homicidal gassings had begun, and before the SS had trained enough of its own personnel to carry out their own gassing operations. Thus, for example, we have the account of Hans Willy Max Rieck, who visited Auschwitz in early summer 1941 to carry out a gassing, as there was a typhus epidemic underway in the camp at the time. Naturally, he reported that there were no gas chambers in the camp, although he had heard that Berlin had approved the construction of gas chambers in Auschwitz (obviously delousing chambers were meant). He had not heard of homicidal gassings until the occupation.<sup>[195]</sup> His fellow gassing technician Johannes Mueller, who accompanied him on the visit to Auschwitz, confirmed his story.<sup>[196]</sup>

A notable exception is the gassing technician Edmund Josef Marso who visited Stutthof in November 1944, at a time when homicidal gassings were supposedly going on.<sup>[197]</sup> Marso, however, stated that he had not heard anything about homicidal gassing in Stutthof, and indeed that he had first heard about homicidal gassings in concentration camps through the English radio. He also mentioned that there was an epidemic of spotted fever when he was in the camp, and that he had seen some 20 bodies lying near the crematorium, which the SS sergeant accompanying him had told him were victims of the typhus epidemic, and were to be cremated.<sup>[198]</sup> Marso's account also confirms that the Stutthof gas chamber was still being used for delousing during the period in which it was supposedly used for homicidal gassing.

3.6 Fred Pelican's Memoirs

In 1993, Fred Pelican published his memoirs, titled From Dachau to Dunkirk, with a dedication "to the six million who perished in the gas chambers." A Jewish refugee in Great Britain, he had been assigned to work as a war crimes investigator, and had participated in the preparations for the Tesch trial. The account which he gave in his memoirs, however, is a pack of lies.

According to Pelican, a man whom he calls "Schneider" came forward to denounce Tesch.<sup>[199]</sup> In Pelican's portrayal, "Schneider" is a composite of Sehm and Zaun. Like Sehm, he denounced Tesch. Like Zaun, he remained with the firm throughout the war, and was to be put in charge of TESTA (Pelican calls it "Chemical Industries"<sup>[200]</sup>) by the British after Tesch and Weinbacher's arrest. Pelican relates how "Schneider" informed the war crimes investigators of the progress from the first gases "developed for extermination purposes," which "made the victims scream to heaven." One of these techniques was a sort of gas van which operated (somehow) by throwing a gas canister inside. The drive for efficiency led to the creation of stationary gas chambers in the camp showers. The Jews, eager for a shower, would crowd inside by the hundreds, although there were actually only a dozen or so showers. Gas canisters thrown in through a hole in the roof would finish the job.<sup>[201]</sup>

Pelican's unreliability extends beyond his invention of the Sehm-Zaun composite "Schneider". He states that "Captain Freud understood a certain amount of German" and that he, Pelican, gave Freud English translations of Schneider's words.<sup>[202]</sup> Freud, who grew up in Austria and was capable of carrying out interrogations in German, was certainly not in need of such translations. Likewise, Pelican's assertion that Tesch was given an honorary rank of SS-Gruppenführer<sup>[203]</sup> is pure invention. Given his penchant for conflation, it is conceivable that Pelican associated Tesch with Rudolf Diels, who did receive an honorary rank of SS-Standartenführer.

Nevertheless, Pelican accurately relates some details of "Schneider's" (really Sehm's) story, noting that

He ["Schneider"] carried on to give us another detail of extermination methods. The gas was manufactured in tablet form. While the prisoners were asleep, a number of tablets would be placed in the corner of each quarter, which ejected a vapour of gas. Windows and doors were sealed, and in a comparatively short time not a single person would be left alive.[\[204\]](#)

Intriguingly, Pelican states that the British Military Authorities were most unhappy that Tesch and Stabenow had been shut down, as they were in need of the company's continued services.[\[205\]](#) Accordingly, he states, Anton Freud suggested that Herr Schneider be put in charge of the company.[\[206\]](#) This is at least partially based on fact: Zaun was indeed made TESTA's Acting manager.[\[207\]](#)

Pelican proceeds to narrate a meeting between "Schneider" and Tesch, which he says took place in connection with the transfer of the company to Schneider's control. This meeting, between Zaun and Tesch, did indeed take place. It is the meeting which the investigative team attempted unsuccessfully to bug, as discussed in the section "The Theft of Tesch's Property". That Pelican was present can be confirmed from a letter written by the custodian attempting to recover Tesch's property, which states that "[Tesch's property was] taken from Dr. Tesch and Mr. Zaun upon orders and in the presence of Col Ashton-Hill, Capt. Freud and Staff-Sergeant Pelican of the War Crimes Investigation Team".[\[208\]](#) The account which Pelican gives of this meeting, however, is at the very least heavily embellished with fantasy, if not completely fraudulent. Pelican accurately narrates the plan, involving him being called out of the room on the pretense of a phone call, allowing Tesch and Zaun to talk in imagined privacy. According to Pelican, however, the bugging of the conversation was successful. His account is worth quoting at length so as to demonstrate the extent of his mendacity. He writes:

I went into the interviewing office, and sat on the chair as the two men walked in, facing each other. Dr Tesch for a moment appeared stunned to see his ex-employee looking at him. "Dr Tesch," I said, "in view of your being detained, we have authorized Herr Schneider to run your business until such time as you will be able to return and carry on yourself. He requires certain powers which only you can grant. I must ask you both to confine your conversation solely to business matters, any other discussion will not be tolerated. I would like you to discuss your business on a basis of understanding and without animosity. Please commence."

Schneider began by informing Dr Tesch that he had been approached by the authorities to run the establishment. However, obstacles had made it difficult, particularly the financial aspect, paying wages, rent, rates, etc. Unless powers of attorney were granted to him, he was sorry to say the business would fold.

At that precise moment, there was a knock at the door. "Yes, come in," I called.

"Staff Sergeant Pelican, you are wanted on the telephone."

I got up and left the room. Casually, I walked down the corridor and entered the room where the rest of our staff were present. The moment I entered, they signalled for me to be quiet. I heard the voices of Dr Tesch and Schneider coming over the loudspeaker, loud and clear. The conversation between the two of them gave me one of the biggest shocks of my life. I just could not believe what I was hearing. Everyone around me was just as shocked as I was, with the exception of Colonel Nightingale. For a moment, I had to pinch myself to make sure my senses were in working order.

The moment I left the room, Dr. Tesch started appealing to Schneider to keep his mouth shut. “Have you signed anything?” he enquired. “I’ll make sure, Schneider, that you will be fixed up for the rest of your life, you’ll never be short of anything. Of course, I’ll sign the power of attorney and grant you full control without question. I will only emphasise once again, keep your mouth shut, you don’t know anything, you hear me, Schneider? I ask you again, have you signed any form of statement?”

We sat or stood around absolutely motionless, one could hear a pin drop, the unthinkable was yet to come. Schneider suddenly burst out, “Who the hell do you take me for? I expected you to know me better, having known me for many years. Do you really believe I would disclose anything to those British bastards, englische Schweinehunde, look what they have done to our beautiful city, murdered hundreds of thousands of our people, die viele Frauen und Kinder [the many women and children]. Dr. Tesch, whatever bullshit I may have disclosed, I have signed nothing, absolutely nothing, I swear, Dr. Tesch.”

“Go back, Staff Sergeant,” the CO ordered.

I walked back to the room, and the moment I entered, the conversation reverted to the discussion of financial arrangements, powers of attorney, rent, rates, wages and lots of other details of that nature. They acted quite calmly, the only one not at all calm was me, my head was buzzing, I hardly took any notice of the two archangels. A good five minutes passed, then came another knock at the door. “Come in,” I called out.

“You are wanted.”

I got up, however this time I didn’t just walk down the corridor, I literally flew down in order not to miss a single word.

The conversation between them continued along the same lines as before, growing in ferocity. Schneider pointed that one of the “Geheimdienst Offiziere ist ein Judenjunge [one of the secret service officers is a Jewboy].” Of course he meant Captain Freud. Apparently, Dr Tesch wrote a brief note for his wife who lived in a villa somewhere in the suburbs. “Schneider,” he said, “give this note to my wife, not tomorrow, tonight at whatever time, however late it may be. This is for yourself, put it away and this you can keep as a memento. I beg you, Schneider, keep your mouth shut and don’t sign anything,” Dr Tesch said again.

“Herr Doctor, disclosing anything to those devious British murderers would be like stabbing my brother. Ich schwöre hoch und heilig [I swear high and holy] those British bastards get nothing, absolutely nothing out of me, I’ll see them in hell first, they are not human beings, Schweine, Schweine, Herr Doktor.”

The CO ordered me to go back and break up the meeting, ensuring Schneider had obtained power of attorney. The officers arranged for Dr Tesch to be taken back to prison. The typists feverishly typed every word taken down in shorthand in German and English. When they had finished, I checked it word for word, ensuring nothing had escaped them. I was told to tell Schneider that the CO wanted to see him regarding the power of attorney. [...] Schneider was waiting outside in the lonely atmosphere of a long corridor. I went to the door, and called him in. He hardly looked ruffled or disturbed.

“Come in, please, and take a seat, Mr Schneider,” the colonel said. “How did you get on with Dr Tesch?”

“First class, Sir.” He took from his breast pocket some papers and waved them in the air. “I have got everything I required, the military authorities can now rest assured, all problems are solved, the firm will run properly to their full satisfaction.”

“Well done, Mr Schneider,” the colonel exclaimed, “I am delighted, may I on behalf of myself and the British authorities thank you most profoundly for a job well done, you have managed to overcome a great dilemma most efficiently.”

Schneider was beaming with satisfaction, courteous and friendly, his usual persona. “Tell me,” the colonel continued, “did Dr Tesch mention anything as to his detention?”

“Sir,” Schneider replied, “I made absolutely sure that in accordance with the preliminary instructions by Staff Sergeant Pelican, our conversation was strictly confined to business matters only.”

Since the interview was conducted in English, I stood next to the colonel, here and there helping out with the odd word Schneider had difficulties with.

“Schneider,” the colonel continued, “I find it hard to comprehend that not a single word was mentioned as to him being held in prison, are you absolutely sure nothing whatsoever was mentioned?”

“Sir,” he replied, “first of all, the Staff Sergeant was present during our conversation, you can ask him, and during short breaks when he was out, I can assure you, had he mentioned a single word other than business, I would have broken up the meeting immediately.”

To Schneider, the colonel gave the appearance of being satisfied with his assurances. “Did Dr Tesch give you anything?” the colonel asked.

“Sir,” Schneider replied, “I beg of you, do you actually believe I would accept anything from such a person, a monster, who was instrumental in the killings of masses of innocent people, his hands soaked in blood?”

“Is our driver still about?” the colonel enquired.

“Yes, Sir, I believe he is downstairs,” I replied.

“Call him,” the colonel ordered. Within minutes, the driver came up. “Herr Schneider, would you kindly wait outside? Don’t worry, we’ll take you home later.”

As Schneider went outside, the colonel instructed our driver to keep an eye on him. Back in the office, the colonel asked what I had to say of the affair so far. “Sir,” I said, “I am absolutely flabbergasted, I can hardly believe what I have heard.”

“He is a two-faced bastard,” the colonel exclaimed. “I’ll make sure he will not leave this building until we get a word-by-word admission that corresponds with the wording in front of us, otherwise it may give an impression of us having fabricated the entire episode, in other words a put-up job.”

Looking at the colonel, I asked him whether he would allow me to make a suggestion. “Sir, you conducted the interrogation in English because Schneider is quite good at the language,” I said. “In order to eliminate any misunderstanding and to make absolutely sure no excuse can arise in one form or another, would you mind if I asked him very briefly the very same questions, this time in unmistakable German.”

“Go right ahead, Freddie.” (This was another of the rare occasions when he called me by my first name.)

I went to the door, calling out loud and clear, “Come in, Schneider.” I walked towards him, stopping half-way from the colonel’s desk. I got as close to him as possible, the distance between our faces being no more than perhaps six inches. I started by telling him that I requested a big favour.

“What is it?” Schneider asked.

“My Colonel is a person of high repute, he, as well as the other officers and myself, have treated you most kindly, above all grateful to you for passing on to us unsolicited information regarding Dr Tesch. You wrote to us, we didn’t write to you. The favour I ask of you is, don’t keep on telling the colonel a pack of bloody lies.” All this I put to him in a subdued voice.

“Sir, what the heck is he talking about?” he almost shouted out.

I grabbed him by the arm a bit forcefully. “You are now talking to me, you hear,” I screamed. “I ask you once and once only, what did Dr Tesch give you?” I put more pressure on his arm.

“Nothing,” he said in a loud voice.

The split second he said nothing, I started tearing the clothes from his body, ripping off his jacket, trousers and underwear. He stood there almost naked, shaking like a leaf, red-faced, glaring at me. The colonel watched, not a single word coming from him, as cool as I had ever seen him. I placed the jacket and trousers on the table and I pushed Schneider towards the table. Going through his pockets, I found a note, a reasonable amount of cash money and a gent’s diamond ring with the initials BT (Bruno Tesch).

“Let him get dressed,” the colonel ordered. He got into his trousers and jacket, somewhat shattered.

“Now look here, Herr Schneider, I don’t really know what you take us for. I asked you several times loud and clear whether Dr Tesch passed anything on to you, you were lying, why should you tell me lies?”

“Sir, I assure you it was a misunderstanding,” he pleaded.

“OK, Schneider,” the colonel replied, “we must have both misunderstood you. I am prepared to accept it. Now, I want you to tell me what conversation took place apart from business matters.”

“No other conversation took place, Sir,” he replied.

“Are you sure?”

“Absolutely, Sir.”

At that precise moment, the colonel put the voice-recording machine into operation. When Schneider heard his own voice, suddenly his body stiffened, he fainted and fell backwards before I had time to grab him. He hit the floor with the back of his head, bleeding profusely. I called out to the driver, we picked him up and washed the blood away and revived him.

He then made a full confession which he duly signed.[\[209\]](#)

Aspects of this story, though misrepresented, are based on actual events, such as the turning-over of property to Zaun. Viewed as a whole, however, Pelican’s story is an enormous fabrication. The bugging was unsuccessful, so the claims concerning the overheard conversation are inventions. Zaun did not sign a “full confession”, and naturally all the details predicated on the identification of Sehm with Zaun are untrue. False as well is the claim that Tesch gave his blessing to Zaun’s leadership of the firm. In his interrogation the next day, Tesch was asked why he opposed Zaun taking over the company, and gave the answer that Zaun lacked technical expertise with gassing.[\[210\]](#)

Pelican proceeds to claim that Tesch gave “Schneider” instructions to his wife to destroy incriminating materials:

We examined the piece of paper which gave Dr Tesch’s wife instructions what to burn or destroy immediately. It listed a large number of incriminating documents, a paperweight made from a Cyclon “B” container prominently displayed on his desk at home, various other articles, books of a particularly unpleasant nature in the sphere of Nordic puritanism and Aryan philosophy, outrageous publications on subjects like the sterilisation of the mentally ill, racial hygiene, the euthanasia programme and many other pieces of Nazi literature.[\[211\]](#)

As we have already seen, Tesch was interrogated the day after the meeting with Zaun about whether he gave any such instructions to his wife, and he denied it. The total silence of the trial documents concerning the interception of such a piece of paper clearly indicates that Pelican is fantasizing again, turning the investigative team’s suspicions into reality.

According to Pelican’s narrative, the investigators then proceeded to the Tesch residence and, finding it locked and unoccupied, entered with the help of a locksmith. It was full of luxury items, he reports, and he found “a diary belonging to Dr Tesch and an undeveloped film.”[\[212\]](#)

The receipt of Tesch’s property does record a 1945 diary of Tesch’s, so it is possible that such was confiscated from his house.[\[213\]](#) On the other hand, in Pelican’s account the diary was a record of Tesch’s amorous affairs, including diary entries recording Tesch’s encounters with various women (Ruth, Gertrud, Paula, Hilde), and recording Tesch’s measurement of the precise angle (in degrees) of his erection, which varied from woman to woman.[\[214\]](#) The film, he claims, proved to contain naked pictures of Tesch and his wife.[\[215\]](#) All of this is evidently another case of conflation, and probably fantasy as well. Drosihn admitted at the trial to keeping naked pictures of himself and his wife, and to having kept a diary which was, in Major Draper’s words, “full of revolting details.”[\[216\]](#) mentioned in trial documents that may be confused here. It is recorded that nine photos were confiscated from the house of Joachim Drosihn on the occasion of his arrest.[\[217\]](#) Some film was preserved in the trial files (Figure 3), which contains nine gas-related photos, setting aside the baby pictures and the photo of a ship. Presumably these are identical to those taken from Drosihn's house. It's hard to see how these could be seen as evidence of anything, aside from the fact that the investigation team was somewhat gas-mad.

For the sake of completeness, we should mention that there is another roll of film

Figure 3: The Roll of Film

Pelican also proudly recounts that he stole a good deal of Tesch's property and sent it to a nearby DP camp, and stole some books for himself.[218] This may not have been all that he stole. Earlier in his book he reports having become quite wealthy while working for the occupying British forces, to the point of occasioning comment.[219] Given the none-too-ample British pay scale for lower-ranking men, his wealth was likely the result of looting. It would be no surprise if it were he who stole Tesch's property. As was already shown, he was the only lower-ranking (hence poorer) man involved in confiscation of Tesch's property. If "H.B. Bursar" is indeed an invention, as seems likely, then Pelican is certainly the leading suspect in the theft.

Pelican's biography ends on a melancholy note. After commemorating the six million gassed Jews,[220] and lamenting the too-early shutdown of the war-crimes trials, he notes mournfully that the accused have a right to legal defense, with the result that witnesses face an "ordeal" and the case may end in an "abyss". Accordingly, he objects to modern war-crimes trials as bad-for-the-Jews:

Personally, I would not be in favour of any trial taking place in this country. It would not be in the best interests of the Jewish population. Do we really need show trials playing into the hands of neo-Nazis and many other elements not particularly well disposed to us?[221]

He does, however, recommend criminalization of Holocaust revisionism: "I would also most strongly recommend all Western countries and others to strengthen legislation to combat the resurgence of neo-Nazism, making the denial of the Holocaust a crime in distortion of history." [222] It's no wonder that a liar like Pelican would not want people to be able to question statements such as "In my family alone, more than forty perished in the gas ovens of Auschwitz and Treblinka," [223] a figure which does not include his mother, who "escaped" from Auschwitz.[224]

4. Conclusion

What are the lessons of the Tesch trial? The defendants' innocence of the charge brought against them is obvious, as is the absurdity of Emil Sehm's story which drove the entire investigation and trial. The trial is more enlightening as a window into how War Crimes investigations operated: into the incompetence and dishonesty, the manipulation of documents, the intimidation of witnesses, the suppression of contradictions. Only with this awareness will it be possible to adequately assess the evidence gathered in post-war trials, rather than using it as ammunition to bolster a set of predetermined conclusions.

---

Notes:

[1]	PRO WO 235/641.
[2]	William Lindsey, "Zyklon B, Auschwitz, and the Trial of Dr. Bruno Tesch" The Journal of Historical Review , Vol. 4, No. 3, pp. 261-303. Online: http://www.ihr.org/jhr/v04/v04p261_Lindsey.html
[3]	It was not.
[4]	Jean-Claude Pressac, Auschwitz: Technique and Operations of the Gas Chambers (New York: The Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, 1989), p. 17.

[5]	Angelika Ebbinghaus, “Der Prozeß gegen Tesch & Stabenow. Von der Schädlingbekämpfung zum Holocaust,” in: 1999. Zeitschrift für Sozialgeschichte des 20. und 21. Jahrhunderts 13 (1998), No. 2, pp. 16–71.
[6]	Jürgen Kalthoff and Martin Werner, Die Händler des Zyklon B: Tesch &amp; Stabenow; eine Firmengeschichte zwischen Hamburg und Auschwitz VSA-Verlag, Hamburg, 1999.
[7]	Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals, volume 1, 1947, pp. 93-103.
[8]	Sehm letter, 29.6.45, PRO WO 309/1602.
[9]	This is, of course, incorrect. Sehm had confused T-gas with Zyklon-B.
[10]	Sehm letter, 24.8.45, PRO WO 309/1602.
[11]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and The “GIFTGAS” Case, section 1, PRO WO 309/1602. This report, which will be referenced frequently, is not dated. However, it mentions Tesch’s statements (Productions 31 and 32), which were drawn up on October 31, and it was sent to “DJAG (War Crimes Section) HQ British Army of the Rhine” on November 4.
[12]	Lindsey, Op.Cit.; Kalthoff & Werner, Op. Cit., p. 144.
[13]	Tesch trial Day 1, PRO WO 235/83, p. 165.
[14]	Ibid, pp. 170, 176.
[15]	The English translation reads “he” here, but the German original clearly shows that “I” is correct. The translation problem was fixed when the same material was rehashed in Sehm’s October 10 statement.
[16]	Sehm statement, 18.9.45, PRO WO 309/1602, 1603.
[17]	Sehm statement, Prosecution 1, PRO WO 309/1602, 1603; original signed German copy in PRO WO 309/1603.
[18]	Tesch interrogation, 26.9.45, PRO WO 309/1603. While the available text of the interrogation is plainly based on a real Tesch interrogation, it is no original, and contains some eyebrow-raising passages that suggest that it has undergone a certain amount of petty alteration. When plans of what to do with Tesch were being considered, prior to Tesch’s second arrest, copies of the interrogation were sent to various recipients. It may be hoped that some of these are closer to the original, and have survived in files unrelated to the Tesch trial.
[19]	Tesch interrogation, 26.9.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[20]	Frahm statement, 10.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[21]	Sehm statement, Prosecution 1, PRO WO 309/1602; original signed German copy in PRO WO 309/1603.
[22]	Elsewhere spelled “Marcinkowski.”
[23]	Occasionally spelled “Peitsch.”
[24]	Sgt. D. Ellwood, Report on Firma Tesch & Stabenow, Hamburg, 28.9.45, PRO WO 309/1602; copy in PRO WO 309/2040, p. 23.

[25]	39 Field Security Section to War Crimes Investigation Team, 29.9.45, PRO WO 309/1602. A copy of the pamphlet in question can be found in PRO WO 309/1603.
[26]	PRO WO 309/2040, p. 24.
[27]	Ibid, p. 25.
[28]	Ibid. The assumption that the Russians must be in possession of conclusive physical evidence is telling, and false.
[29]	Ibid.
[30]	Ibid, pp. 23, 25.
[31]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and The "GIFTGAS" Case, sections 4-5, PRO WO 309/1602.
[32]	Tesch trial Day 1, p. 165, PRO WO 235/83.
[33]	Captain Anton Walter Freud, a grandson of Sigmund Freud, was a leading figure in the investigation, and carried out many of the interrogations. In a 2003 interview he took exclusive credit for getting Tesch hanged: Lesley Chamberlain, 'Freud squad', Financial Times , 28.6.03.
[34]	Drosihn interrogation, 17.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603. That the investigative team should have been wrong about this date is not so surprising, as it had not yet been assigned to the case when Tesch was released. Drosihn, on the other hand, remembered Tesch's return in some detail.
[35]	War Criminal Arrest Reports, PRO WO 309/1602.
[36]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and The "GIFTGAS" Case, section 27, PRO WO 309/1602. This report, however, claims that Tesch was arrested on the 6th, while his arrest report demonstrates that the arrest took place on the 7th. The release dates given by the report also seem somewhat unreliable, as they show the TESTA secretary Wilma Nachtweh as having been released upon completion of her interrogation on October 8th, when in fact she was interrogated on the 25th, with a supplementary statement the next day. There were also a number of individuals who were interrogated but who do not appear on the arrest lists; in some cases these were former employees, who seem to have been considered separately.
[37]	Frahm statement, 22.10.45, PRO WO 309/1602. It should be noted that both versions of Frahm's statement exist only in English, and that neither is signed - they are simply drawn up, ready to be signed.
[38]	all versions in PRO WO 309/1603.
[39]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and the "GIFTGAS" Case, section 41(b), PRO WO 309/1602.
[40]	The prosecution was trying to show that Dr. Tesch had had key documents destroyed.
[41]	The shower idea dominated even at the trial. A document concerning Riga, discussing a delousing facility which would simultaneously delouse personnel and their clothing, was regarded with particular suspicion at the trial, due to its mention of (real) showers. Tesch trial Day 4, pp. 295-96

[42]	Interrogation of Johann Holst, 19.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[43]	Letter of James J. Bailey, Malmedy Massacre investigation. Hearings before a subcommittee on the Committee on Armed Services, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, 1949, pp. 53-54; Testimony of James J. Bailey, Malmedy Massacre investigation, pp. 154-190.
[44]	Drosihn interrogation, 17.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[45]	Drosihn statement, 26.10.45, PRO WO 309/1602.
[46]	See, for instance the October 22 recommendation that if the Russians requested Tesch he should be given to them. Copies in PRO WO 309/625, p. 1, and PRO WO 309/2040, p. 41.
[47]	Tesch interrogation, 24.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[48]	Tesch trial Day 1, p. 164, PRO WO 235/83.
[49]	PRO WO 309/626, p. 141.
[50]	Tesch trial Day 2, p. 205.
[51]	Tesch trial Day 1, pp. 171, 176. In fact, TESTA delivered only east of the Elbe, while Dachau and Belsen lie west of the Elbe.
[52]	Ibid, p. 177. Tesch was in fact a degreed chemist who had enjoyed a fairly illustrious career. The idea that Tesch was not actually a chemist was also expressed by Anton Freud in Tesch's October 24 interrogation; presumably he was told this by Sehm.
[53]	Ibid, p. 169.
[54]	Ibid, p. 170.
[55]	Ibid, p. 181.
[56]	Tesch trial Day 3, p. 243.
[57]	Ibid, pp. 243-44.
[58]	Ibid, p. 244.
[59]	Sehm had testified on a Friday, and Pook the next Monday.
[60]	Ibid.
[61]	Ibid, p. 245.
[62]	Ibid, p. 245-46.
[63]	Ibid.
[64]	L. Ashton Hill to DJAG (War Crimes Section), HQ British Army of the Rhine, PRO WO 309/1602.
[65]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and the "GIFTGAS" Case, paragraph 54, PRO WO 309/1602.
[66]	PRO WO 309/625, p. 11.
[67]	EXFOR to No. 2 War Crimes Investigation Team, PRO WO 309/1602.

[68]	Copies in PRO WO 235/83, WO 309/625, WO 309/1602.
[69]	PRO WO 309/625, p. 19.
[70]	Ibid, p. 39.
[71]	Ibid, p. 48.
[72]	Ibid, p. 47 The handwritten day of the month given in the report is very messy and could be interpreted as 4, 9, 14, or 19. Fortunately, another paper in the file (p. 75) refers to this exact report, assigning it the date January 19.
[73]	Ibid, p. 75.
[74]	Ibid, p. 77.
[75]	Ibid, p. 83.
[76]	PRO WO 309/625.
[77]	Copies in PRO WO 235/83, WO 309/625, WO 309/1602.
[78]	Middle name sometimes spelled "Eliza."
[79]	Sometimes spelled "Unzelmann."
[80]	Biagini interrogation, 17.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603. She stated that these rumors circulated among members of office staff, who were separate from the technical staff. The WCIT endeavored diligently to obtain statements from the numerous members of the technical (gassing) staff to the effect that they had heard rumors about gassing of humans during the war, but met with no success.
[81]	Biagini statement, 24.10.45, PRO WO 309/625.
[82]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and the "GIFTGAS" Case, section 46(b), PRO WO 309/1602.
[83]	Rathcke interrogation, 18.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[84]	Tesch trial Day 1, pp. 184-185.
[85]	Ibid, pp. 185-187.
[86]	Tesch trial Day 3, pp. 275-76.
[87]	Tesch trial Day 5, p. 348.
[88]	Tesch trial Day 1, p. 165.
[89]	This interpretation is given in Kalthoff & Werner, Die Händler des Zyklon B , p. 150.
[90]	Tesch trial Day 3, pp. 275-76, 291.
[91]	Tesch trial Day 1, p. 189-190, PRO WO 235/83; Uenzelmann interrogation, 22.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603; Uenzelmann statement, 23.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603; Dr. Bruno TESCH and the "GIFTGAS" Case, section 46(a), PRO WO 309/1602.

[92]	Tesch trial Day 3, p. 274. Tesch contrasted Uenzelmann, who was a highly confused person, and Biagini, who was not. He did not simply disparage all witnesses against him.
[93]	Tesch interrogation, 26.9.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[94]	Surname sometimes spelled "Koch."
[95]	Summary of examination of Gustav Kock, 24.10.45, copies in PRO WO 309/1602, 1603. Kock's statement adds an expression of incredulity that anyone would not see that this was an excess supply, which was directed against Tesch - in fact, the interrogators even quoted it to Tesch during an interrogation. The statement, however, falls flat, not only for the obvious reason that Auschwitz was not in fact the same size as Neuengamme, but also because a transcript of Kock's interrogation survives, and reveals the extent of the interrogator's influence on Kock's statements, as well as Kock's desire to please the interrogator (the interrogation ends with Kock begging for approval by mentioning that his wife is a foreigner).
[96]	Tesch trial Day 2, p. 217.
[97]	Interrogation of Johann Holst, 19.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[98]	Summary of examination of August Marcinkowski, 24.10.45, copies in PRO WO 309/1602, 1603.
[99]	Tesch trial Day 2, p. 215.
[100]	Tesch interrogation, 24.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[101]	Ibid.
[102]	Kock interrogation, 20.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[103]	Tesch trial Day 3 p. 277. In the entire following discussion, "Auschwitz" must be taken to mean the entire Auschwitz complex, not merely the Stammlager . It was on this basis that the calculations of Zyklon supply were calculated, and in this fashion that the matter was discussed in the investigation and at the trial.
[104]	Tesch trial Day 4, p. 295.
[105]	Mention should perhaps be made of Karl Ruehmeling, who provided a very weak kind of support for the EZS argument. Ruehmeling was mainly employed as an accountant, but also worked as an assistant gassing technician at times of high demand for gassing, until December 1943, when he entered military service. When the EZS argument was first suggested to him during his October 13 interrogation with reference to the size of individual orders from Auschwitz and Sachsenhausen, he rejected it, noting that these camps were very large, although when pressed he did express a general sort of surprise at the size of camp that would need such quantities of Zyklon. When the interrogation was continued the next day, after receiving further threats from the interrogator, he managed to express a generalized kind of surprise at the size of individual orders of Zyklon, but stated that he had never heard such an expression of surprise from any of the three defendants. While the interrogations of the other interrogated (current and former) TESTA employees were promptly converted into deposition form, Ruehmeling's was left to linger before finally being put into the form of a deposition and signed on December 30. The deposition mentions large orders of Zyklon but expresses no surprise at their extent, and mentions that none of the other employees expressed such surprise. At the trial (Day 1, pp. 194-199) Ruehmling was not questioned about surprise at the size of Zyklon orders. The Ruehmling statement is in PRO WO 309/1602, while copies of the interrogations can be found in PRO WO 309/1602, 1603.

[106]	Tesch trial Day 5, p. 329.
[107]	Tesch trial Day 4, p. 304.
[108]	Tesch trial Day 5, p. 339f.
[109]	Eugen Kogon, Hermann Langbein, and Adelbert Rückerl, Nazi Mass Murder: A Documentary History of the Use of Poison Gas (Yale University Press, 1993), p. 175. In support of this claim, correspondence between TESTA and the Majdanek administration is cited. It is sourced from the documents left at Majdanek rather than from those gathered from TESTA's files by WCIT No. 2. The Tesch trial documents do contain a number of documents relating to the planning of the Majdanek (sanitary) gas chambers, which establish quite clearly that they were planned for hygienic purposes. This fact, however, has been largely conceded by orthodox Majdanek historians, and consequently will not be further developed here.
[110]	Jean-Claude Pressac, Les Crématoires d'Auschwitz: La machinerie du meurtre de masse , 1993, p. 47.
[111]	Online: http://www.holocaust-history.org/irving-david/vanpelt/vanpelt-zyklon.shtml . Link now removed.
[112]	The interested reader may wish to consult the following critique of van Pelt's arguments: Carlo Mattogno, Auschwitz: The Case for Sanity: A Historical and Technical Study of Jean- Claude Pressac's "Criminal Traces" and Robert Jan van Pelt's "Convergence of Evidence," (Washington DC: The Barnes Review, 2010), pp. 503-509.
[113]	This can be seen in the example of Majdanek by comparing van Pelt's numbers with those given in Carlo Mattogno and Jürgen Graf, Concentration Camp Majdanek (3rd ed.) , (Washington DC: The Barnes Review, 2012), p. 200ff.
[114]	This fact is explicitly explained in Zaun's statement of October 24 (signature dated October 26), whose original is in PRO WO 309/1603.
[115]	These additional quantities are given in Dr. Bruno TESCH and The "GIFTGAS" Case, section 45(6)(e), PRO WO 309/1602.
[116]	The assumption that this concentration was used is also supported by the size of the bills. For instance, in one Sachsenhausen gassing operation encompassing 196,800 cubic meters, the bill for Zyklon was RM 21,622.19. The other bills were on a similar scale relative to the volume gassed. The price of Zyklon varied but was usually around 6 RM per kg.
[117]	PRO WO 309/872.
[118]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and the "GIFTGAS" Case, section 24, PRO WO 309/1602; Ruehmling interrogation and deposition, PRO WO 309/1602. The latter fact was also mentioned by Weinbacher in his interrogation. The concentration of 10 grams per cubic meter may well understate what was used for delousing; Drosihn mentioned at the trial (Day 4, p. 304) that delousing employed triple the concentration used in general gassing.

[119]	Tesch interrogation, 26.9.45, PRO WO 309/1603. The term “spotted fever” is doubtless a translation of the German Fleckfieber ( Fleck = spot, Fieber = fever), which means typhus. As this term was used throughout the investigation and at the trial, it will not be corrected; the reader should understand that typhus is meant.
[120]	Tesch interrogation, 24.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[121]	Tesch trial Day 3, p. 266.
[122]	Ibid, p. 277.
[123]	The prosecution attacked the idea that Auschwitz was a larger camp complex than Sachsenhausen.
[124]	Tesch trial Day 4, p. 288.
[125]	Exhibit DB, PRO WO 309/1603.
[126]	Tesch trial Day 3, pp. 267, 277, 288.
[127]	Tesch trial Day 7, pp. 407-408.
[128]	Petitions in WO 235/83.
[129]	Short for “for instance”. The affidavit is present only in English, but presumably there was a German original in which Drosihn used the common German abbreviation z.B. for “zum Beispiel.”
[130]	Drosihn Affidavit, 19.3.46, PRO WO 235/83.
[131]	Drosihn interrogation, 17.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[132]	Kock interrogation, 20.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[133]	Appeal on behalf of Tesch, PRO WO 235/83.
[134]	Blum letter, 14.11.46, PRO WO 235/310.
[135]	PRO FO 1093/339.
[136]	PRO WO 309/2041.
[137]	Kiessig letter, 4.3.46, PRO WO 235/83.
[138]	Appeal on behalf of Tesch, p. 6, PRO WO 235/83.
[139]	Summary of the case by M. Scott-Barrett, 5.4.46, 1946, PRO WO 235/83.
[140]	Death Warrants, PRO WO 235/83.
[141]	PRO WO 309/626, p. 183.
[142]	Ibid, p. 184.
[143]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and The “GIFTGAS” Case, sections 51-53, PRO WO 309/1602.
[144]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and The “GIFTGAS” Case, section 44(3), PRO WO 309/1602.

[145]	Tesch interrogation, 24.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[146]	Zaun Interrogation, 16.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603. (Only the English copy is dated, not the original.)
[147]	Tesch interrogation, 24.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[148]	Tesch statement 31.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[149]	Zaun statement, 24.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603. Zaun's signature on the German original, however, is dated October 26. In the English translation the latter date is retained, while the date of the 24th, which appears at the head of the original statement, is omitted.
[150]	Receipt, 23.1.46, PRO WO 309/1602.
[151]	T.A. Lohmann to War Crimes Investigation Section, Hamburg, 15.4.48, PRO WO 309/1602.
[152]	Lt. Col R.A. Nightingale to T.A. Lohmann, 6.5.48, PRO WO 309/1602.
[153]	Property Control Section to War Crimes Group (North West Europe), 31.8.48, PRO WO 309/1602.
[154]	memos of 29.3.46, 2.4.46, 7.4.46, and 5.4.46, PRO WO 309/1602.
[155]	Appendix "G" to Headquarters, British Army of the Rhine Administrative Instruction No. 104, Part I, PRO 309/626.
[156]	J.-C. Pressac, Auschwitz: Technique and Operation , p. 162.
[157]	Robert Jan van Pelt, "Auschwitz", in Günter Morsch and Bertrand Perz (ed.), Neue Studien zu nationalsozialistischen Massentötungen durch Giftgas: Historische Bedeutung, technische Entwicklung, revisionistische Leugnung . (Berlin: Metropol, 2011), pp. 196-218.
[158]	Michael Shermer and Alex Grobman, Denying History: Who Says the Holocaust Never Happened and Why Do They Say it? (Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2000), p. 138.
[159]	Memo dated 22.2.46, PRO WO 309/626.
[160]	Diels interrogation, 22.10.45, microfilm publication M1270, roll 3.
[161]	17.12.45, PRO WO 309/294.
[162]	Draper memo, 15.10.45, PRO WO 309/768.
[163]	Major A. Gordon Hewson to Colonel Phillimore, 30.11.45, PRO WO 309/768.
[164]	Telford Taylor, The Anatomy of the Nuremberg Trials: A Personal Memoir , 1992, p. 231; Ingeborg Kalnoky and Ilona Herisko, The Guest House , 1974.
[165]	Robert Kempner, "Cross Examining War Criminals," Yad Vashem Studies , 1963, pp. 43-68. Diels and Kempner had known one another long before the war.
[166]	FO 1019/94, p. 36.
[167]	PRO 309/626, pp. 105-106.

[168]	Tesch trial, Day 1, p. 182.
[169]	Diels statement, 5.10.45, copies in PRO WO 309/625, PRO WO 309/1602.
[170]	Notes on a conversation between Lt. Col. N. Ashton Hill, Captain Franks and Dr R. Diels, 5.10.45, PRO WO 309/1602.
[171]	Tesch trial Day 1, pp.182-184.
[172]	Klaus Wallbaum, Der Überläufer: Rudolf Diels (1900-1957) - der erste Gestapo-Chef des Hitler-Regimes , 2009, p. 244.
[173]	NO-844.
[174]	“Amerikanischer Beamter bestätigt Mauthausen-Verbrechen”, Aufbau 12.6.42; “Nazis Use Jewish War Prisoners as Guinea Pigs for Poison Gas Experiments”, JTA 18.6.42.
[175]	Diels statement, 5.10.45, PRO WO 309/1602.
[176]	Tesch trial Day 7, p. 395.
[177]	Ibid.
[178]	UNWCC Summary of Information No. 24: The Instructional Staff of the Death Camps, copy in PRO WO 309/1603.
[179]	Dr. Bruno TESCH and The “GIFTGAS” Case, section 44, PRO WO 309/1602.
[180]	4.3.46, IMT Vol. VIII, pp. 527-28.
[181]	Letter of Major A.E.E. Reade, 15.4.46, PRO WO 309/768.
[182]	4.5.46 memo, PRO WO 309/294.
[183]	26.6.47 memo, PRO WO 309/294.
[184]	Deposition of Dr. Gerhard Peters, 11.12.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[185]	Peters 27.10.47, NI-12111, in microfilm publication M892 (IG Farben trial), roll 33, p. 1123ff.
[186]	intercepts 10 and 52 of 13.11.41, PRO HW 16/32.
[187]	Richard Breitman, Official Secrets , 1998, pp. 75-77.
[188]	Christian Gerlach, Kalkulierte Morde , Hamburger Edition, Hamburg, 1999, p. 651.
[189]	Andrej Angrick and Peter Klein, The Final Solution in Riga (Berghahn Books, 2009), p. 190. In the relevant footnote (n. 63) the authors also wrongly assert that the first name of TESTA gassing technician Johann Holst is unknown.
[190]	Tesch interrogation, 26.9.45, PRO WO 309/1603.
[191]	Exhibit JA, telegram sent 16.11.42, PRO WO 309/1603. The omissions indicate portions of the document which were illegible due to charring. TESTA suffered heavily under the air raids on Hamburg, and many of the surviving documents had been partially burned. Some of these original charred documents are still available in the files, but many have gone missing.

[192]	Peter Longerich, Holocaust (London: Oxford University Press, 2010), pp. 279-280.
[193]	Christopher Browning, The Origins of the Final Solution (University of Nebraska Press, 2004), pp. 367-68.
[194]	Exhibit JD, April 1942 letter to DEGESCH, PRO WO 309/1603.
[195]	Summary of evidence of Hans Willy Max Rieck, 22.10.45, copies in PRO WO 309/1602, 1603.
[196]	Summary of evidence of Johannes Mueller, 24.10.45, copies in PRO WO 309/1602, 1603.
[197]	For a discussion of the alleged homicidal gassings at Stutthof, see Carlo Mattogno and Jürgen Graf, Concentration Camp Stutthof and Its Function in National Socialist Jewish Policy (Chicago: Theses & Dissertations Press, 2003).
[198]	Summary of examination of Edmund Josef Marso, 22.10.45, copies in PRO WO 309/1602, 1603. The topic of the bodies which Marso saw was probably brought up by the interrogator on the basis of a what had been heard in the interrogations of Holst and Kock, see Holst interrogation, 19.10.45, p. 3; Kock interrogation, 20.10.45, p. 2, both interrogations in PRO WO 309/1603.
[199]	Fred Pelican, From Dachau to Dunkirk (London: Vallentine Mitchell, 1993), p. 171.
[200]	Ibid, p. 174.
[201]	Ibid, pp. 172-173.
[202]	Ibid, p. 173.
[203]	Ibid, p. 179.
[204]	Ibid, p. 173.
[205]	Ibid, p. 175. This may be true. Certainly the German authorities testified to the critical importance of TESTA's hygienic services right up to shortly before the German surrender, and such activities would have remained essential under the British occupation. If true, this fact would have a bitter irony: at the Tesch trial the urgent German calls for the support of TESTA's hygienic work were used, under a "coded language" theory ("sanitation" is code for "extermination of the Jews"), as proof of TESTA's participation in a program of mass homicidal gassing.
[206]	Ibid, p. 176.
[207]	Certificate signed by Zaun as Acting manager, 30.10.45, PRO WO 309/1602.
[208]	T.A. Lohmann to War Crimes Investigation Section, Hamburg, 15.4.48, PRO WO 309/1602.
[209]	Pelican, From Dachau to Dunkirk , pp. 183-188. Bracketed translations of German text in original.
[210]	Tesch interrogation, 24.10.45, PRO WO 309/1603.

[211]	Pelican, Op. Cit., p. 188.
[212]	Ibid, p. 189.
[213]	Receipt, 23.1.46, PRO WO 309/1602. As discussed above, the authenticity of this document is questionable.
[214]	Pelican, Op. Cit., p. 189.
[215]	Ibid, pp. 190-191.
[216]	Tesch trial Day 4, p. 307. Draper used this material, which was mentioned as early as Tesch's October 24 interrogation, in order to impeach Drosihn's moral character and Christian faith.
[217]	Production 25, 27.10.45, PRO WO 309/1602.
[218]	Pelican, Op. Cit., p. 189.
[219]	Ibid, pp. 122-123.
[220]	Ibid, p. 195.
[221]	Ibid, p. 198.
[222]	Ibid.
[223]	Ibid.
[224]	Ibid, p. 155ff.

Defending Barbarism | CODOH

by Richard A. Widmann

Bombing Vindicated by J.M. Spaight, Ostara Publications, 2013, 129 pp.

"Bombing Vindicated" by J.M. Spaight
Published with permission from Ostara Publications

Ostara Publication's edition of J.M. Spaight's hard-to-find Bombing Vindicated is an exact reproduction of the 1944 original – something which should thrill collectors and historians alike. Well-known and frequently cited in revisionist circles, Spaight's thesis is anything but revisionist. In fact, Spaight's book was written to counter mounting criticism of Britain's program for mass-bombing of German cities. Spaight, a former Principal Secretary of the British Air Ministry, set out to justify the murder of German civilians through the British saturation-bombing campaign.

Spaight's apologetic takes several forms. He begins by contrasting tactics and strategies of air power. Spaight asserts that in the run-up to World War II, Germany's air force was designed in a way that was predominantly tactical while Britain's was predominantly strategic. He goes on to explain that Germany's air force was designed to support their army.

One of its weapons would be the aircraft, but it would only be a weapon of a Service which was predominantly the embodiment of German land power. The idea of air power as the rival or equal of land power was beyond the comprehension of soldiers steeped in the philosophy of war which commended itself to German mentality.

Spaight argues that the Germans never really understood the meaning of air power. He quotes Air Chief Marshal Sir Arthur Tedder, “They did not know how to use an air force properly.” From a statement from 9 January 1943, Tedder notes, “We have learned this new kind of warfare and the Americans are learning it. The Hun and the Jap have yet to learn it.” He continues, “Today, Britain alone of the embattled nations can look to a striking force in the air unshackled and untrammelled by parochialism and preconceived ideas, free from glib phrases like ‘air support’ and ‘fighter assistance’ – an Air Force which commands the air.”

While Spaight voices some degree of admiration for how well the German air force was fit to implement the air policy adopted by its military leaders, it is clear he considers such policy as shortsighted and even a weakness, a weakness that the wiser British leaders could exploit. He comments,

[The Luftwaffe] was an almost ideal arm for cooperation with ground forces. It contained a high proportion of dive-bombers (Junkers 87's) and of transport aircraft (Junkers 52's). Our own air force was weak in these two categories but was superior to the German in the quality (though not the quantity) of its long-range bombers and its single-seat fighters.

Our Wellington was a better heavy bomber than anything which Germany had, and we were definitely ahead of her in the fighter class. She has a fairly good interceptor in the Messerschmitt 109, but it was definitely inferior to our Hurricane or Spitfire. In other words, in the two categories which are of prime importance in the waging of air warfare, considered per se, we had the advantage, while Germany had it in those categories which are essential in air operations ancillary to those of ground forces.

By 1936 Britain was already planning for long-range bombers that could go farther than possible at the time and carry large cargoes of explosives. While Britain moved forward with their plans for heavy bombers, Hitler was expressing apprehension and concern on where such policies could lead. Already in May of 1935, Hitler warned, “War has been speeded up too much and made too overwhelmingly destructive for our geographical limitations. Within an hour – in some instances within forty minutes of the outbreak of hostilities – swift bombing machines would wreak ruin upon European capitals.”

Spaight recounts that Hitler's National Socialists attempted both in 1935 and 1936 to restrict bombing of civilian centers and wanted such policy to be enacted as a far-reaching international agreement. He writes:

I can not subscribe to the view that Hitler brought it forward in 1935 and 1936 with his tongue in his cheek; not in the least because he was incapable of doing so, but simply because it was unquestionably in his interest to have such a restriction accepted. He was scared of the possible effect of a bombing offensive upon Germany's war effort and the morale of the German population. He would infinitely have preferred to fight out the war in another way, a way that was not our way but was his way. He did not want our kind of war.

Spaight recounts a series of what must have been well-known events at the time. He writes of the first bombings of cities during the Second World War, and admits that bombing of Warsaw and Rotterdam was something entirely different than the bombing of London and later, the cities of Germany. Warsaw and Rotterdam were bombed in support of the German army and its tactic of blitzkrieg. The air bombardments were an operation of tactical offense. Spaight also acknowledges that while the Luftwaffe was the most powerful air force in the world that no air attacks fell upon Britain in the first ten months of the war. Likewise no aerial bombing of Paris occurred. Spaight notes “there was a mingled feeling of surprise and relief when no raids came.”

While there had been some minor incidents by both sides early in 1940 in which civilians were killed as result of bombings, there had been no policy of bombing civilian populations up until that time. Spaight applauds Britain’s decision to initiate the bombing of civilian centers. In fact he refers to it as “our great decision.” He writes, Bomber Command went to war on 11 May, 1940. It had only been fooling with war until then. That is the great date in its war diary: not because of anything spectacular achieved immediately, but because of what was to follow in the fullness of time. In that decision of May, 1940, there was implicit the doom of Germany, though we little guessed it then.

From May through August of 1940, Britain carried out numerous raids on German towns. Up until the Hannover raid on 1 August 1940, the National Socialist press remained silent. Following that raid, German newspapers declared, “Britain loses her honor” and denounced the raid as “an appalling crime.”

In September 1940 Hitler retaliated against British bombing of German cities by bombing London. Hitler explained in a speech in Munich on 9 November 1940 his decision, “Mr. Churchill had bombs dropped on the German civil population. I waited in patience, thinking ‘The man is mad; for such action could only lead to Britain’s destruction,’ and I made my plan for peace. Now I am resolved to fight it out to the last.”

Addressing the National Socialist Party on 31 December 1940 Hitler again stated that the British bombed German cities for three and a half months before any reprisal action was taken. An infuriated Hitler now promised for every bomb dropped by the British, the Germans would drop 10 or if necessary even a hundred upon British cities.

Spaight offers what may be his best justification for the policy of bombing of civilian centers:

He [Hitler] most assuredly did not want the mutual bombing to go on. He had not wanted it ever to begin. He wanted it, having begun, to be called off. That, I am firmly convinced, was the aim behind his frantic bellowings and all his blather about attacks on the civil population. He knew that, in the end, our air offensive, if it did not win the war for us, would certainly prevent Germany from winning it.

Continuing his defense of “total war,” Spaight coins the term “battle-towns” to make the case that civilian centers involved in the support or manufacture of weapons or materials in support of a country’s military are indeed justified targets. He writes, “the making of arms is war-making. It cannot be called anything else. It is not noncombatant work.” But Spaight refuses to stop at the armaments industry. He adds, transport workers, as well as all the civilians enrolled in the service of passive defence – the fire fighters, the fire-watchers, the rescue parties, the demolition squads – cannot be classed otherwise than as warriors in the new kind of war in which their work is as essential and, in principle, as warlike as that of the soldiers, sailors, and airmen.

Spaight concludes his case with a twist on the “war to end all wars” hype from World War I. He suggests that his beloved bombers could serve as the means to such an end. “The world will have been given convincing proof of its almost limitless capacity as a war-breaker before this war ends. It is the ideal weapon for smothering aggression.”

There can be little doubt that Britain's policy of saturation bombing of civilian centers contributed to Germany's defeat during the Second World War. The general public would likely embrace Spaight's thesis. That same public has accepted the myth of warfare disguised as moral conflicts between "good" and "evil." They have little concern about the means of defeating evil including the wholesale murder of innocents. Accordingly, veterans who flew missions against German cities and even those who dropped atomic bombs on Japanese cities are considered heroes. Public outrage is stirred only when such attacks occur against our civilians. In such cases, the perpetrators are deemed "terrorists."

Bombing Vindicated is available from: <http://ostarapublications.com/>

Defending the Defenseless | CODOH

by Kerry R. Bolton

- Periodicals
- English
- Inconvenient History
- Vol. 7 \(2015\)
- No. 1

Americans Who Opposed the Mistreatment of Germans following World War II

---

This document is part of the Inconvenient History periodical.
Use this menu to find more documents that are part of this periodical.

Despite the Germanophobia that was drummed up even prior to the USA's 1941 entry into the war against Germany, the immediate aftermath saw a significant reaction of Americans to war crimes and post-war genocidal policies that were being inflicted on Germany. Several salient factors for this include: (1) the large component of the American population that is of German descent, (2) the "isolationist" tradition of American foreign policy upheld in the slogan and the pre-war mass movement of "America First," that resisted the campaign to push the USA into the war, (3) the affront to traditional honor and justice such actions and policies represented to many American military leaders and jurists of what might be termed the "old school," and (4) the realization that a strong, rather than a permanently impoverished and castrated, Germany was needed as an ally in the post-war world.

The USA had pursued a course of vengeance and pastoralization of conquered Germany via the Morgenthau Plan named after the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau Jr. The measures drafted by the Treasury Department, under the direction of Dr. Harry Dexter White (nee Weiss) aimed to reduce the German population by a policy of starvation, reminiscent of Lazar Kaganovich's contrived famine widely held to have caused the deaths of up to seven million Ukrainians and to have broken the kulak class of successful peasantry. That White was later exposed as a Soviet agent might suggest another motive for the Morgenthau Plan as pursuing quite another aim to that intended by Morgenthau et al who thought only in terms of Old Testament-type vengeance and total annihilation. Might the aim of White and other Soviet agents within U.S. Treasury have been to use the Morgenthau Plan dialectically, to push the Germans into the embrace of the USSR, whose policy, despite the mass rapes committed by soldiers of the Red Army, after the war became far more conciliatory towards Germans than France, Britain and the USA?[1]

A genocidal attitude towards Germany had long been harbored in influential U.S. circles. The Morgenthau Plan was enacted on a de facto, not a de jure basis. Hence, it could be, and still is, claimed that the "plan" was abortive. Ironically, Deborah Lipstadt, the "scholar" who is heralded as the vanguard of opposition to "Holocaust denial," a rhetorical term without scholarly meaning, denies there was a Morgenthau Plan[2] in the course of her largely ad hominem attack on those who question certain aspects of World War II "history."

Details of U.S. post-war policy in occupied Germany got back to the USA and aroused

protest from the remnants of traditional America who spoke up against policies and actions that they viewed as an affront to justice. The extent to which there was an undercurrent of opposition to post-war policy among notable individuals of the Old America is best indicated by a compendium that was produced by an American of German descent. As I have related previously,<sup>[3]</sup> H. Keith Thompson Jr. established himself as a literary agent of significance despite his association with the pre-war German-American Bund and with the post-war Socialist Reich Party, and individuals such as Major General Otto Remer, Yockey, George Sylvester Viereck, Edward Fleckenstein, et al. Thompson compiled a volume of hundreds of testimonials from prominent figures throughout the world, who protested the treatment of the naval hero Grand Admiral Karl Dönitz and the very concept of “war crimes” trials of German military leaders. These testimonials were presented to Dönitz upon his release from Spandau. Here we find among the Americans who criticized the treatment of Dönitz and other German military leaders, opposition to the dubious legal judicial foundations of the war crimes trials by Ohio Supreme Court Justice William L. Hart, who wrote the foreword, and cited the Chicago Tribune that “no one of the victors was free of guilt” of the accusations made against the Germany.<sup>[4]</sup>

Nuremberg Set Tyrannical Precedent

Hart and many others commented of Nuremberg that it set a dangerous precedent that should not be followed in future.<sup>[5]</sup> This is precisely one of the primary concerns of revisionists: how precedents set by the Allied treatment of Germany have established foundations for the present “new world [dis]order,” reflected for example in the lynching of Saddam Hussein and the trials of Serb military and political leaders. Again it is the concept of vengeance being played out behind the rhetoric of the concepts of “international law” established at Nuremberg. The epilogue from Rear Admiral Dan V. Gallery’s book Twenty Million Tons under the Sea was used as the “Prologue” for the Dönitz book, with Gallery’s permission, wherein he referred to “the kangaroo court at Nuremberg.” Its reference as the “International Military Tribunal” he regarded as “a libel on the military profession.”<sup>[6]</sup> He found it absurd that military leaders could be tried for waging “aggressive war.” Admirals Dönitz and Raeder were tried under new rules of war at sea that the Allies had not themselves followed.<sup>[7]</sup>

Another excerpted chapter is from John F. Kennedy’s book Profiles in Courage, where he lauds Senator Robert A. Taft, a Republican Party statesman who had campaigned to keep the USA out of World War II and continued to oppose US global adventurism after the war.<sup>[8]</sup> He had opposed ex post facto laws and continued to do so in regard to Nuremberg. Kennedy stated that such views were shared by many Americans, “at least privately,” and after, but the only politician of conscience to speak out was Taft.<sup>[9]</sup>

Taylor Caldwell, the novelist, was among those who regarded the “war crimes trials” as “barbaric” and stated that “our country’s hands are not free of blood and crime, in spite of our vaunted democracy and ‘noble aspirations,’ etc. etc., ad nauseam.” She regarded the trials as among the blackest of the USA’s “recent black (and Red) spots.”<sup>[10]</sup> Senator William Langer wrote to Dönitz that his conviction at Nuremberg was a “miscarriage of justice,” and that he had done nothing other than his duty.<sup>[11]</sup> Hon. J. Bracken Lee, Governor of Utah, regarded the Allies as “just as guilty” as those who were tried as “war criminals.”<sup>[12]</sup>

Lipstadt laments that “Holocaust deniers” and critiques of post-war Allied policy towards Germany focus on the Morgenthau Plan, which she correctly states “would have prevented the economic rehabilitation of Germany.” However she claims “the plan was never put into effect.”<sup>[13]</sup> The Morgenthau Diary, published in two volumes from a selection of thousands of documents edited by Professor Anthony Kubek of Dallas

University, and issued by the Internal Security Subcommittee of the U.S. Senate on the Judiciary in 1967, shows that Morgenthau and his chief assistant Dr. Harry Dexter White headed up a team in the U.S. Treasury that supervised the War and State Departments in formulating policies on occupied Germany. Drawing on the memoirs of Secretary of War Henry Stimson and Secretary of State Cordell Hull, Kubek asserts that Morgenthau and White, et al were at loggerheads with other policy-makers. Due to Morgenthau's influence on Roosevelt it was the Treasury cabal that prevailed. Morgenthau also had the support of a perennial presidential adviser, the banker Bernard Baruch, who threatened to end the careers of those in Washington who stood in the way of obliterating Germany.<sup>[14]</sup> Stimson objected that the Morgenthau Plan to deindustrialize Germany would cause the starvation of 30,000,000 Germans. Although President Truman opposed the Morgenthau Plan and Morgenthau resigned in 1945 when Truman did not include him in the Potsdam delegation, 140 of his Treasury cabal were ensconced in the occupation administration in Germany and ensured that genocidal policies proceeded under the terms of JCS 1067.<sup>[15]</sup> The extent to which the Morgenthau Plan was carried out has been documented by Bacque.<sup>[16]</sup>

What is objectionable to certain interests about those who expose Allied war crimes is that this is "relativizing" the Holocaust, an offense that has been considered previously in Inconvenient History.<sup>[17]</sup> If German criminality in World War II was no more or less iniquitous than the wartime criminality of any other state, then the uniqueness of the Jewish experience is undermined. Hence also the moral underpinning of not only the Israeli State, but of the special taboo against criticizing any reprehensible character who happens to be Jewish. While Lipstadt et al claim that historical revisionism is devoid of any scholarly merit, they are stuck with the existence of genuinely eminent scholars such as Charles C. Tansill, professor of American diplomatic history at Georgetown University, who saw World War II as an inevitable consequence of the Versailles Treaty in his 1952 book Back Door to War,<sup>[18]</sup> and Harry Elmer Barnes. Inconvenient historians such as Tansill and Barnes therefore do not have their scholarship scrutinized, but rather are portrayed as merely part of an anti-Semitic current that had its precursor with the Henry Ford-sponsored 1920s series "The International Jew." published in the Ford Company's newspaper The Dearborn Independent,<sup>[19]</sup> and continued today by Klansmen and neo-Nazis. Hence, Tansill and Barnes become part of an anti-Semitic world conspiracy that includes tobacco-chewing Klansmen and Muslim suicide bombers. In this vein James J. Martin, another American scholar, is cited as having described the Morgenthau Plan as running Germany "according to the Old Testament instead of the New."<sup>[20]</sup>

Nuremberg Trials a Jewish Triumph

While those who point out that Allied occupation policy, including that of Morgenthau and of Nuremberg, seemed more like Talmudic than Western legalism are portrayed as "anti-Semites," Jewish spokesmen boast of their role in conceptualizing vengeance as a modern war aim. Dr. Nahum Goldmann, who had headed several of the primary Zionist organizations, while president of the World Jewish Congress gave credit to the WJC as the organization from whose bowels "the war crimes trials" issued forth. The WJC, he stated, established the Institute of Jewish Affairs, where the groundwork was laid for two objectives: ensuring that the Nazi criminals did not escape punishment and obtaining maximum restitution from a defeated Germany. It was in this Institute that the idea of punishing Nazi war criminals was first conceived, an idea later taken up by some great American jurists, notably Justice Robert H. Jackson of the Supreme Court, and implemented in the Nuremberg Trials. The idea of prosecuting and sentencing political and military leaders for crimes against humanity was completely new to international justice."<sup>[21]</sup>

Goldmann commented that many jurists opposed the trials because “they were unable to see beyond the concepts of conventional jurisprudence.” What Goldmann calls “concepts of conventional jurisprudence” are the concepts of law and justice built up over centuries by Western Civilization, based on the Christian ethos and chivalry. To jurists schooled in a countertradition, that of Talmudic dialectics, these are concepts that have no place in the world. Goldmann also points out that these concepts of jurisprudence are what have since formed the basis of “international law” in condemning vanquished statesmen and military leaders. National sovereignty, stated Goldmann, had to become subordinated to this new concept of ‘international morality,’ as “an effective warning and deterrent for the future.”<sup>[22]</sup> The concepts seem not to apply to the military and political leaders of Israel, which might be accounted for by the dual moral code of Judaism; or as it might be simply put: “do as I say, not as I do.” Goldmann stated that the WJC, under the direction of Jacob and Nehemiah Robinson, “put great effort into the intellectual and moral groundwork for these trials, and it is one of the triumphs of the Roosevelt administration that it consistently accepted these principles despite all the misgivings of some influential allies circles, particularly in England.”<sup>[23]</sup> Can anything be clearer, or was Goldmann making empty boasts?

Early Misgivings

However, there were early misgivings about U.S. policies in Germany, which filtered back to the USA. While Lipstadt refers in passing in an endnote to one Karl Brandt in connection with the revisionist publisher Henry Regnery,<sup>[24]</sup> she does not mention that he was professor of economics at Stanford University, who had returned from Germany where he had been an adviser to the US occupation government. He spoke before the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations, on the “draconian policies” of the USA that would destroy not only Germany but also all of Europe. Indeed, Brandt and a group of refugees from Hitler’s Germany sought to have Harper, the publisher of Henry Morgenthau’s book Germany Is Our Problem, publish a rebuttal that they would prepare. Harper refused to do so.

Regnery and a colleague published the rebuttal, which had the same title as the Morgenthau book, and detailed how Allied post war policies were destroying Europe. It was published at a very early post-war date – 1946, by Human Events Inc., for which Regnery was an editor. <sup>[25]</sup>

After publishing several pamphlets on the United Nations Charter and on the U.S. Constitution, Regnery produced a volume of letters that had been smuggled from Germany (Germans having been forbidden after the war to write abroad) “which gave a graphic picture of what life was like in that broken country.” As Regnery describes it, the first pamphlets that established him as a notable conservative publisher were on the condition of Germany and Allied policies. <sup>[26]</sup>

While according to Lipstadt the Morgenthau Plan was not happening, the eminent Jewish Left-wing publisher Victor Gollancz, founder of the influential Left Book Club, had returned to London from a visit to Germany. He wrote in letters to London newspapers of the British occupation zone where Germans were reduced to starvation, of the dismantling of industries, and the expulsion of refugees from their homes in the East, to overfill German cities such as Hamburg that had been reduced to rubble. Gollancz published these letters and other reports in two books, In Darkest Germany, and Our Threatened Values. Despite his prominence, Gollancz could not find a major American publisher, so his two books were offered for publication to Regnery.<sup>[27]</sup> The Gollancz books were the first to be published by Henry Regnery Company.<sup>[28]</sup> Oddly, Gollancz is missing from Lipstadt’s list of Holocaust deniers and relativists. Our Threatened Values had an important review in Time, describing Gollancz as “retaining his Jewish faith and socialist belief,” while stating that humanity's salvation rests with the uniting of "traditional religious ethics" with Western secular beliefs, based on mercy, love and respect.

Gollancz related to Regnery in New York that after the war Churchill had asked him about the conditions in Germany, and claimed concern. He was also shocked by the killing of German civilians in the British air raids over Hamburg, Dresden, etc., claiming that he had not been told. Gollancz remarked to Regnery that of course Churchill had known, but a certain "romantic" ideal had enabled him after the war to selectively forget by what we might see as rationalizing his self-image of innocence and virtue. Asking Gollancz whether it was true that 5,000 civilians had been obliterated at Hamburg, Gollancz remarked that the figure was much higher, and likewise perhaps more than 200,000 at Dresden because of the number of refugees cramming the cities.<sup>[29]</sup> (In recent years it has become customary to greatly scale down the figures, although orthodox academics and authors do not seem to be threatened in the same manner as those who question the sacred figure of 6,000,000). Gollancz soon became a champion of the Arabs displaced by Zionism.

Another early book published by Regnery was Whither Germany by Hans Zbinden, well-known in Switzerland as an author and a humanitarian. He asserted "the disappearance of Germany as a political and spiritual force would probably mean the end of European history." This was followed by From Versailles to Potsdam, by Leonard von Muralt, professor of modern history at the University of Zürich, with the theme on the shortsightedness of basing the post-war world on the type of revenge that the Versailles diktat placed on Germany after World War I. These books began to get significant reviews in venues such as the Saturday Review of Literature.<sup>[30]</sup> In 1949 two other books on German policies were published by Regnery, Montgomery Belgium's Victor's Justice, on the war crimes trials; and The High Cost of Vengeance by Freda Utley, on Allied occupation policy.<sup>[31]</sup> Belgium was well-known in England as an essayist and literary critic who had served as an officer during the war. He regarded the war crimes trials as a travesty of Western justice, and that those sitting in judgment were also guilty of war crimes. While Germany was accused of using forced labor [albeit paid work with holidays home] while the trials were proceeding not only the USSR, but France and Britain were using forced labor [without pay and holidays home] with prisoners of war supplied by the USA. <sup>[32]</sup>

Freda Utley was an important figure in the post-war opposition to U.S. genocide against Germany. She contended in The High Cost of Vengeance that the USA came to Germany as a conquering "master race," affirming rather than repudiating the doctrine of "might makes right."<sup>[33]</sup> As one would expect, Lipstadt condemns Utley as among the "relativists and German apologists" who cited Allied war crimes as mitigating the Third Reich. Moreover, Utley became "one of the most vocal" of Senator Joseph McCarthy's supporters, using tactics of Nazi apologists in condemning the mass transfer of German refugees from the Soviet-occupied East,<sup>[34]</sup> which caused many deaths of German displaced persons. Again, a background of this "Nazi apologist" and McCarthyite is not given. She had come from a socialist family in England, graduated from the London School of Economics, and remained a lifelong friend of pacifist guru and iconic liberal philosopher Bertrand Russell. She had become a Communist, married a Soviet citizen and had lived in the USSR. Regnery stated that she always took the side of the underdog, and that in the immediate post-war world the collective underdog was decidedly the Germans.<sup>[35]</sup> Moreover, like Gollancz, Utley had drawn from her experiences, having stayed in Germany in 1948. At the time industries were still being dismantled, denazification entailed guilt by association, and arbitrary arrests were still frequent. She interviewed Germans and occupiers, and perused the documentation. Her book was scathingly attacked by a Germanophobe, Delbert Clark, writing for the Sunday New York Times.<sup>[36]</sup>

When Utley was in Germany she was not reticent about condemning U.S. policy to the press and in lectures. Some U.S. media, especially The Reporter, which ran several articles on the subject, inferred collusion between the Soviets and American and German Rightists in condemning US occupation policies. This was at a time when the Socialist Reich Party, regarded by the occupation as a revival of the National Socialist party, stated that they did not view Russian occupation as any worse than the American, that Germany would not align with the USA against the USSR, and the Soviet occupation zone was already taking a more conciliatory approach towards German veterans and the reunification of Germany. Russian émigrés in Germany, neo-Nazis in Germany, McCarthyites in the USA and neo-Nazis in the USA around Frederick Weiss and the National Renaissance Party were portrayed as a common front against the Morgenthau policy, with such supposed anti-Americanism serving the USSR.<sup>[37]</sup> As we now know, there is reason to believe that many Jews serving as Soviet agents in U.S. Treasury were contriving the Morgenthau policies to push the Germans into the Soviet embrace.<sup>[38]</sup>

Utley criticized Chancellor Konrad Adenauer's weakness in defending German interests and accused U.S. High Commissioner John J. McCloy of having reinstated on his staff three-fourths of the "Red Morgenthau boys" who had been removed by General Lucius Clay. One of the few German newspapers with the fortitude to support Utley was Die Deutsche Zukunft, a Westphalian political weekly owned by Dr. Ernest Achenbach, an Essen lawyer and prominent conservative politician, and leader of the Free Democratic Party in the Ruhr. Achenbach, married to an American, had important contacts in the USA. His friendship with Utley enabled him to keep Senator McCarthy informed on the German situation. [The next issue of Inconvenient History is slated to carry a review of The High Cost of Vengeance.]

While Achenbach had managed to visit the USA on several occasions, in 1953 Edward Fleckenstein, a New Jersey lawyer of German descent, visited Germany but was promptly deported. Fleckenstein was the president of the Voter's Alliance for Americans of German Descent. H. Keith Thompson was among his colleagues. Indeed, Thompson's Committee for International Justice, and Committee for the Freedom of Major General Remer, were auxiliaries of the Voter's Alliance, and Fleckenstein the legal counsel. While Thompson campaigned for the rights of Germans and for the release of Socialist Reich Party leader Otto Remer from jail,<sup>[39]</sup> Fleckenstein was a central figure in trying to alleviate the effects of the Morgenthau policy. When Fleckenstein visited Germany in 1953 he lauded Senators McCarthy and Pat McCarran as friends of the German people.

That year a book on the Allied occupation, Advance to Barbarism, by English jurist F. J. P. Veale, was published in the USA. It was damned by Jewish sources as an apologia for Nazism. The book had actually been published first in 1948 under a nom de plume, "A. Jurist." The 1953 edition carried an enthusiastic endorsement by The Very Reverend Ralph Inge, Dean of St. Paul's. Dean Inge, writing in 1951, presciently wrote of the type of precedents that were being set at Nuremberg:

I disliked the Nuremberg Trials for three reasons: First, trials of the vanquished by the victors are never satisfactory and are generally unfair. Secondly, the execution of the political and military leaders of a beaten side by the victors sets a most dangerous precedent. The Germans were certainly guilty of "crimes against humanity"; but war is not a humane business and it would always be possible for the victors in any way to find enough examples of atrocities to justify vindictive punishments. After the next war, if there is one, trials and hangings will follow as a matter of course. We may go further. One of the indictments of the German leaders was not that they waged war inhumanly, but that they made war aggressively. They did; they desired large annexations of territory in the East. But have we not heard of other nations who have acquired extensive empires without consulting the wishes of the inhabitants? Thirdly, one of the judges—Russia—ought certainly to have been in the dock and not on the bench.[\[40\]](#)

Another “Foreword” was written by the Rt. Hon. Lord Hankey in 1961, who acknowledged Veale’s inspiration for his own book, Politics: Trials and Errors (1950).

Judge Roden and Senator McCarthy

Among the condemnations of Veale was that he “belittled” “Jewish survivor” testimony on the German manufacture of soap from the fat of exterminated Jews. As is now conceded, the allegation was indeed nonsense. Veale also claimed that the U.S. placed Germans into concentration camps without reason; another allegation by Veale that is now known to be correct.[\[41\]](#)

Sen. Joseph McCarthy with his attorney Roy Cohn during Senate Subcommittee hearings on the McCarthy-Army dispute (1954)

By United Press International telephoto [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

An article by Milton Friedman of the Canadian Jewish News states that one of the two persons to whom Veale dedicated his book was Edward L. Van Roden. Senator McCarthy praised Judge Roden for his exposé of the tortures inflicted on the defendants at the Malmedy Trial in 1949 by U.S. military personnel. Friedman counters that among such personnel were Jews, as though being Jewish per se should have been sufficient to recuse someone from investigation or even criticism. Friedman also alludes to the German defendants as being “Nazi stormtroopers.” Friedman asserts that a Senate Subcommittee found Van Roden’s claims to be “false,” and that there had been a concerted effort to both free the “Nazis” and try the U.S. interrogators. Van Roden, warned Friedman, also endorsed the book The Crime of Our Age by Ludwig Fritsch, described as “pro-Nazi, anti-Jewish.” Others who endorsed the book were Dr. A. O. Tittmann, ex-diplomat and founder of the Voters’ Association for Americans of German Descent, which Friedman imaginatively describes as a “successor” to the pre-war, paramilitary, overtly pro-Hitler German-American Bund. Another endorser was long time German-American campaigner and scholar Dr. Austin J. App,[\[42\]](#) who is singled out for particular condemnation by Lipstadt.[\[43\]](#) Friedman claimed that The Crime of Our Age was a “forerunner” to Veale’s book, and circulated mainly in “neo-Nazi” circles, holding that the real “crime” was that the Nazis had lost the war. Veale compares the Morgenthau Plan to the Old Testament, citing “The Book of Joshua.”[\[44\]](#) Hence through such tenuous association the image of a transnational network of neo-Nazis is built up, involving Senator McCarthy, Judge Roden, German-Americans and Nazi apologists. Dean Inge’s endorsement is not mentioned.

Malmedy Trial

Hence the Malmedy Trial, Nuremberg Trials and the Morgenthau Plan were three primary elements of concern for those who opposed Allied post-war policies towards Germany. The Malmedy Trial came under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Army.

The 7708th War Crimes Group was established under the command of Colonel Clio E. Straight, an Iowa lawyer and businessman in the U.S. Army Judge Advocate General’s Corps during the war. The purpose of these U.S. Army courts, as distinct from the four-power tribunals, was to investigate alleged war crimes committed against American personnel. From April 1945 to December 1947 these war crimes groups undertook 222 trials. The Army set up an independent reviewing authority, supposedly to provide a fair trial for the defendants. The head of the post-trial section was Samuel Sonenfield, whose name could only have confirmed suspicions as to the provenance of the Allied judicial regime. This U.S. Army group was responsible for the trial of the Malmedy Massacre defendants, from May 16 to July 16, 1946. The defendants had been accused of shooting American soldiers who had surrendered during the Battle of the Bulge, in Belgium. The U.S. Army later investigated the methods of extracting confessions, after a process set in motion by those who convinced Senator McCarthy to take up the cause. A dissertation on the U.S. War Crimes Group, although favorable towards the whole war crimes process, nonetheless states of the defendants that most were locked in the dungeon of Schwaebisch Hall for months, where they were refused clean clothing or the ability to take a bath. After taking the German prisoners from their dank cells, American interrogators roughly interviewed them and coerced confessions and sworn statements from each using psychological torture, threats and physical violence. Though the SS men were veterans of some of the bitterest fighting in history, most of them were young and did not have the education or experience to withstand the pressure of the investigators.[\[45\]](#)

Willis M. Everett, appointed by the U.S. Army as chief defense counsel, and others, were uneasy about the number of Jews who were involved in the war crimes process. James J. Weingartner writes of this:

Other factors entered into Everett’s refusal to accept the outcome of the Malmedy trial. While not a racist, he shared with many contemporaries a suspicion of Jews as a clannish subculture with views and interests not entirely in harmony with the best interests of the countries of which they were citizens. This manifested itself in a distrustful attitude towards the Jewish principals in the Malmedy investigation and trial, particularly the law member of the court, Colonel Rosenfeld, in the assumption that Germans, SS men at that, could not have received just treatment at their hands. In a nutshell, Everett believed that confessions had been extorted and then legitimated in court by a collusive system which had been weighted against his clients from the beginning.[\[46\]](#)

Everett also considered that the crimes of which the youngsters of the Waffen SS in the heat of battle had been accused, had their counterpart in the U.S. Army. Everett recalled talking with General Josiah Dalbey, president of the Malmedy court, at the officer's club in Dachau one evening. Dalbey stated that the sentencing of the seventy-three defendants had been the most difficult undertaking he had ever encountered because he knew that American soldiers had been guilty of similar offenses. Dalbey agreed with Everett that the case should not have come to trial. The review officer of the Malmedy case, Maximillian Koessler, after the trial, pushed for a speedy review. He referred to convictions, including death and life sentences, as being secured on vague and contradictory testimony, and to interrogation methods that included the use of hoods, false eyewitnesses and mock trials. Col. Straight was displeased with Koessler's reviews (although he could not adequately articulate his reasons), and they were rejected.<sup>[47]</sup> Everett took the matter to the U.S. Supreme Court, despite the Army refusing to provide him with the court transcripts of Malmedy. The Supreme Court Justices ruled that they did not have jurisdiction over the Army trials.<sup>[48]</sup>

German and American patriots, along with sundry liberals expressing disquiet about the vengeance being wreaked upon Germany, took the matter up with Senator McCarthy, a member of the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee, pressing for an inquiry.<sup>[49]</sup> The secretary of the army, Kenneth C. Royall, established a tribunal headed by Gordon Simpson of the Texas Supreme Court, Leroy van Roden, Pennsylvania judge, and Lieutenant Colonel Charles W. Lawrence of the U.S. Army.<sup>[50]</sup> The Simpson Commission recommended the commutation of all death sentences of the Malmedy defendants.<sup>[51]</sup> While the Simpson Commission report was "bland," van Roden returned to the USA fully endorsing the allegations that interrogators had subjected the defendants to beatings, including "blows to the genitals," threats of hanging during interrogations, and refusal of drinking water.<sup>[52]</sup> Colonel Strong, head of the War Crimes Group at Wiesbaden, testifying before the Senate investigation, was critical of the prejudiced manner of Colonel A. H. Rosenfeld, the "law member" of the court trying the Malmedy defendants, and stated that the prosecution team had obstructed and threatened witnesses.<sup>[53]</sup> Rosenfeld "had wielded great power, interpreting the law and making frequent procedural rulings for a bench whose members were combat soldiers inexperienced in such matters. Rosenfeld had not allowed the defense to challenge the credibility of prosecution witnesses."<sup>[54]</sup> The most prominent of the interrogators at Schwaebisch Hall was William R. Perl, a Prague-born Jewish lawyer from Austria, who had been active with Zionist emigration programs. He was attached to the War Crimes Branch of the U.S. Army in 1945. When incessantly questioned by Senator McCarthy, Perl "exploded" that there was so much "noise" about "one or two Germans getting slapped."<sup>[55]</sup>

It is therefore quite a distortion to place the critique of the Malmedy trial in the context of neo-Nazism joined with McCarthyism, while castigating individuals such as Judge Van Roden as liars. Colonel Everett was at the center of trying to secure justice, and certainly did not do himself any personal favors by advancing the case. Nor did Van Roden. In the mid 1950s he was among the hundreds of prominent people who gave testimonials to H. Keith Thompson for Dönitz. Unlike Jewish interrogators in U.S. Army uniforms, Van Roden had served three years in Europe during the war, including the Normandy D-Day landing. He examined the records of trials in over 1000 cases, undertook many interviews, and concluded that such war crimes trials were a travesty, including that of Malmedy.<sup>[56]</sup>

The Malmedy case was typical of the war crimes procedures, as recent disclosures show. A "secret torture prison" was operated at Bad Nenndorf in north-west Germany, by the Combined Services Detailed Interrogation Centre (CSDIC), a division of the British War Office. The center of the township was emptied of people and surrounded with barbed wire. At night the villagers could hear the screams of the prisoners. Most of the interrogators were "German-Jewish refugees." The warders were the "most unruly" elements of the British Army, who could be expected to resort most readily to violence.[57]

The Foreign Office briefed Clement Attlee, the prime minister, that “the guards had apparently been instructed to carry out physical assaults on certain prisoners with the object of reducing them to a state of physical collapse and of making them more amenable to interrogation.”[58]

Another “secret center” was operated in London where German POWs could be held and tortured in England without the knowledge of the Red Cross. In 2005, at the request of The Guardian newspaper, documents were declassified showing the extent of the torture regime against Germans after the war. The documents refer to “living skeletons,” tortured, beaten and exposed to extreme cold. The ranks of the prisoners expanded from being members of the Nazi party and the SS, to anyone who had succeeded under the Third Reich. They even included Germans who had escaped from the Russian zone and offered to spy for the British: they were tortured – one dying – to determine whether they were sincere. A former diplomat incarcerated at Bad Nenndorf was there simply because he knew too much about the interrogation techniques, while another was there for eight months due to a clerical error. Apart from physical brutalities, threats to kill a prisoner’s wife and children were accepted techniques of interrogation. An anti-Nazi who had spent two years in Gestapo custody stated he had never experienced such brutality as he had at Bad Nenndorf.[59]

This was the modus operendi of the Allied occupation forces, exposed by people such as McCarthy, Van Roden, Fleckenstein, Veale, Tittmann, App, et al, in the immediate aftermath of the war, at first vilified but since increasingly vindicated.

AUSTIN J. APP, PH. D.

Austin J. App
The Widmann Collection

The Crime of Our Age

The supposed Nazi apologia circulating mainly within “neo-Nazi” circles according to Milton Friedman, The Crime of Our Age, was written by a Lutheran theologian, Dr. Ludwig A. Fritsch, and intended mainly for circulation among Christian laymen and pastors. It had been given to the U. S. President, Washington officials and all Congressmen. It was published in 1947, and hence is one of the first critiques of post-war occupation policy. Fritsch focused on what is now being called “relativism,” in pointing out that whatever the Germans were accused of, the Allies had done similarly during and after the war. An example is the accusation of the German looting of art, which is lately receiving fresh attention through the movie, The Monuments Men. The Hessian royal jewelry was looted by an American WAC officer, her defense lawyer stating that 90% of the occupation forces had done likewise. The late Kaiser’s silverware was stolen by a colonel who was a lawyer in civilian life. Fritsch “thanked the Lord” that his son, having served as an officer in the U.S. Army, came home stating that he had kept the Seventh Commandment.

So far from The Crime being an apologia for Nazism, Fritsch stated that most Germans knew as little about Dachau etc., as Americans knew about what was being done in their name at Teheran, Yalta, and Potsdam. Fritsch was not defending Nazism, he was objecting to the defamation and genocide being imposed on Germany in the name of collective guilt, and as a theologian contended that such a policy had more in common with the Talmud and Old Testament than with Christianity. Citing Professor Pitrim Sorokin’s Social and Cultural Dynamics, Fritsch pointed out that Germany, far from being uniquely a war-mongering nation as claimed by the Germanophobes, spent fewer years engaged in war than any other leading European nation between the 12th century and 1925. Fritsch’s appeal was to clergy, not to “Neo-Nazis” and he appealed to them to “fight for peace in Christ’s name.”[\[60\]](#)

In 1947, the same year as the publication of Fritsch’s book, Ralph Keeling’s Gruesome Harvest was published.[\[61\]](#) Dr. Austin J. App, a notable lifelong opponent of Germanophobia, wrote in his introduction to the 1978 edition that Keeling’s book was the first to blast the silence on the expulsion of 15,000,000 ethnic Germans from their homes in East Prussia, Pomerania, Silesia and the Sudetenland to a ruined, starving Germany. The 1947 edition seems to have been funded, according to App, by Arthur Koegel, a conservative German-American, and chairman of Koegel Coal Company.[\[62\]](#) Keeling prefaced his report of the expulsions with a description of the wartime devastation of Germany caused by the firebombing of civilian targets such as Dresden, Frankfurt-on-Main, Hamburg, Kassel, etc. General Eisenhower said his aim was the “destruction of ... every German west of the Rhine and within that area in which we are attacking.”[\[63\]](#)

Keeling saw the post-war annexation of German territory as a means of “extermination by overcrowding,” coupled with the destruction of German industry and the expropriation of resources. When the ethnic Germans in Poland and Czechoslovakia were pushed across to Germany with only what they could carry, millions more were added to the already starving population. Chicago Daily News correspondents were told by Russian soldiers that “the Poles had cleaned out all Germans as far west as the Oder River, and the Germans in Sudetenland.” They were permitted to take 30 to 100 pounds of luggage but nothing of value. [\[64\]](#) A train came into Berlin from Poland with 1000 refugees, among whom were 91 dead, some of the women having gone insane, and many trying to carry their dead babies with them. New York Daily News correspondent Donald Mackenzie reported from Berlin of 12,000,000 to 19,000,000 displaced refugees in East Prussia and Silesia, and mortality rates of 25% along the roadsides.[\[65\]](#)

While 4,000,000 Germans had fallen as slave laborers into Russian hands, the western Allies were not innocent. According to the International Red Cross, France had 680,000 former German soldiers as slave labor in 1946, most of whom had been turned over as POWs by the U.S. Army. Figaro magazine reported that they were “living skeletons,” savagely and systematically beaten.[66] At the same time the Red Cross reported that Britain had 460,000 German slave laborers.[67] Other countries having slave labor were Italy, Belgium, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, Luxembourg, and Holland.[68] While the rapes of German women and girls by the Soviet Army are often commented on, not so well known is the rape perpetrated under the French occupation especially by Moroccan and Senegalese troops. In Vailhingen, a town of 12,000, 500 cases of rape were reported. In the U.S. zone, Captain Frederick B. Eutsler, a chaplain, wrote in Stars and Stripes of the barbarous conduct towards women by the U.S. troops. In Stuttgart during the French occupation, 1,198 women were raped and eight men violated mostly by Moroccans. Dr. Karl Hartenstein of the Evangelical church estimated the number of rapes to be 5,000.[69] American troops spread venereal disease along with democracy. V.D. was especially rampant among colored troops, in mid 1946 standing at 771 per thousand in comparison to 190 per thousand among white American troops. According to Lee Hills, Chicago Daily News foreign correspondent, there were 42,000 Negro (U.S.) troops stationed in Germany.[70]

Starvation played a major role in the ravishing of German women; hence it could be said that they were not “raped” so much as paying G.I.’s for minimal life sustenance. How much more moral this was than the mass rapes committed by Soviet troops is an elusive point. Observers such as Gollancz and Christian aid workers commented on the widespread starvation. Dr. Lawrence Meyer, Executive Secretary of the Lutheran Church, Missouri Synod, stated in January 1946, after returning from Germany that he expected millions of children to die of starvation. Dorothy Thompson, not noted for her Hitlerism, reported that postwar policies were resulting in the “extermination of tens of thousands of children.” [71] Some politicians exposed the plight of Germany in the USA. Senator Homer E. Capehart, Indiana, stated to the Senate that there was a deliberate policy of mass starvation conceived by a “conspiratorial clique.”[72]

Even during the war, Dr. Austin J. App had begun writing on the folly and barbarity of Allied policies. He is reserved a special place by Lipstadt as seminal in the development of “Holocaust denial.” Lipstadt claims that because App was a lifelong figure in German-American societies he, unlike the eminent American academic revisionist Harry Elmer Barnes, “had no independent standing in the academic world.”[73] App served as president of the Federation of American Citizens of German Descent, founded in 1945. While he was a professor of English literature at Catholic universities, Lipstadt claims that his “far more dubious side” was unknown to his students. Were the Anti-Defamation League of B’nai B’rith, American Jewish Congress, and American Jewish Committee really so neglectful in trying to ruin the career of a well-placed and outspoken critic of Germanophobia and Talmudism, which Lipstadt calls “gutter-level antisemitism”? However, as we are again reminded, the Morgenthau Plan was not in effect anyway, and indeed the U.S. policy was humane.[74]

App began his campaigning in 1942, writing to newspapers, periodicals and journalists. In 1943, after Roosevelt and Churchill had declared at Casablanca that only unconditional surrender was acceptable, App wrote to the Columbus Evening Dispatch that the concept was “grossly unethical.” The view was one shared widely among Allied military leaders and judicial scholars, as Thompson’s compilation for Dönitz would show. App visited Germany in 1949, noting the large numbers of Jews engaging in black-marketeering and theft, and seemingly immune from the law. Germanophobes see this as nothing other than App’s “gutter-level anti-Semitism.” However, the Eastern Jews had been widely held in contempt even by German Jewry before the war, who often expressed their disgust in a manner similar to that of App. For example, Walther Rathenau, foreign minister in Weimar Germany, wrote of them “You rarely find a middle course between wheedling subservience and vile arrogance.” Rathenau hoped that German Jews would develop as something quite different from the types that were coming from the East. [75]

General George S. Patton, placed in charge of Displaced Persons, restricted the movements only of Jews, due to their habits. For this he was reprimanded by Eisenhower, and shortly after removed as commander of the Third Army, and he subsequently died in dubious circumstances. Patton attested to the Morgenthau Plan being implemented and remarked:

Evidently the virus started by Morgenthau and Baruch of a Semitic revenge against all Germans is still working. Harrison (a U.S. State Department official) and his associates indicate that they feel German civilians should be removed from houses for the purpose of housing Displaced Persons. There are two errors in this assumption. First, when we remove an individual German we punish an individual German, while the punishment is not intended for the individual but for the race.

Furthermore, it is against my Anglo-Saxon conscience to remove a person from a house, which is a punishment, without due process of law. In the second place, Harrison and his ilk believe that the Displaced Person is a human being, which he is not, and this applies particularly to the Jews, who are lower than animals.”[76]

In 1946 App published Ravishing the Women of Conquered Europe, focusing on the orgy of rape perpetrated by the Allied armies. App published his letters to the press from the latter half of the 1940s as Morgenthau Era Letters in 1949.

App was not motivated by Nazism or anti-Semitism but by his devotion to Catholicism, like the Lutheran motivation evident in Fritsch’s Crime of Our Age. The Germanophobes and Talmudists are perhaps constitutionally incapable of appreciating this or of even differentiating between Christian apologia and Hitlerite apologia. App is recognized as a notable Catholic scholar, educator and author. He wrote of his motivations in five principles:

1. that Christianity, especially Catholic Christianity, should be accepted all over the world as life's first and greatest blessing;
2. that literature is the best engine for carrying the ideals of Christianity from the heads of men to their hearts;
3. that profane and indecent speech, along with the greater sins of violence, immorality, and dishonesty, must be vigorously repressed;
4. that world peace is God's reward for justice and that enforcing an unjust peace is a criminal responsibility;
5. and that, to advance Christian ideals, good people must not only become informed but must also be trained to express themselves persuasively.[77]

App explained:

...Most compellingly, I saw with horror that the Yalta and Potsdam pacts were delivering much of Christian Europe to the Bolsheviks, who were looting, killing, and ravishing their way into Eastern Germany, Austria, and Hungary. With the approval of American leftists and Morgenthauists, the Communists and Partisans were expelling twelve million ethnic Germans from their ancient homelands, which “forced migration of millions of people,” another former professor of mine, now Archbishop Aloisius J. Muench, called “the greatest crime of this age.”

When even many Catholic magazines feared to publish the painful truth about Morgenthauism and the Potsdam peace, I felt forced, no matter what the cost, to publish myself. Beginning with a reprint from the Brooklyn Tablet entitled “Propaganda ‘To Hate All Germans’ Is Debunked” (Feb. 16, 1946) by an army officer, upon which as a lucky afterthought I set a price, “One copy, a stamp; ten, 25 cents,” I wrote and published in the next five months: “Ravishing the Women of Conquered Europe”; “The Big Three Deportation Crime”; and “Slave-laboring German Prisoners of War.” I was overwhelmed by the response. With one swoop my ivory-tower teaching status was ended. Morgenthauistic attacks, angry letters, thank you and help-seeking letters literally by the thousands, and orders, also by the thousands, flooded into my apartment. In a matter of months several of the pamphlets were out of print at 30,000 copies; one went to 80,000 in English and was translated into four foreign languages.[78]

What is less known about App is that he also authored many works on his scholarly specialty, English literature, and received awards as an educator. Establishing Boniface Press in December 1946, he first published History’s Most Terrifying Peace, a collection of thirteen articles. The theme is on the un-Christian concept of unconditional war, and the Catholic attitude that negotiation with the enemy should be the first principle of just war.[79]

Relief Aid

While such courageous individuals had from the start raised their voices against the genocidal Germanophobia of Allied war and post-War policies, there were also immediate post-War practical efforts to try and alleviate the sufferings caused by the Morgenthau occupation regime. In particular, food relief was organized by German-American societies with the aid of Christian relief organizations, in particular the Quakers. At the center of these efforts were Edward Fleckenstein and Dr. A. O. Tittmann.

In 1947 the Senate Committee on Civil Service under the chairmanship of William Langer heard submissions “To Amend the Trading with the Enemy Act So as to Permit Certain Aid to Civilian Recovery in Occupied Zones.” The terms read:

(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, it shall be lawful, at any time after the date of cessation of hostilities with any country with which the United States is at war, for any person in the United States (1) to donate, or otherwise dispose of to, and to transport or deliver to, any person in such country any article or articles (including food, clothing, and medicine) intended to be used solely to relieve human suffering, and any article or articles intended for household or other personal use or for sustenance of life; and (2) to donate money not exceeding $100 in any calendar month to any one person, or to any two or more persons in the same immediate family, in such country, and to transmit such money to such person or persons by international money order or other appropriate means, and the Post Office Department is authorized and directed to accept and transmit any such money order.[80]

The Senators were incredulous that while the Chase Manhattan Bank had established a branch in Germany and had been authorized to accept international remittances, the U.S. Post Office Department could not do so. It is of interest that Senator Langer, chairman of the proceedings, was to write to H. Keith Thompson a testimonial for Dönitz, stating that his conviction at Nuremberg had been a “travesty.”[81] Tittmann cited Quaker reports that Germans were living off potatoes, and soup from any vegetable that they might eke out of a flowerpot or window box.[82] He referred to the 15,000,000 ethnic expellees. James M. Read of the Quaker organization, American Friends Committee on National Legislation, stated that he had been to Germany for the Relief Council of the American Friends Service Committee, working with Protestant and Catholic organizations. He said that “the suffering in Germany cannot be exaggerated.”[83] Edward Fleckenstein spoke as chairman of an aid committee of clergymen and laymen in New Jersey. They attempted to help individual families who appealed for assistance. Because of weight regulations in postage little food was able to be shipped.[84] Walter Penningsdorf of the Steuben Society also testified as to the difficulties of getting aid to Germany due to postal restrictions.[85]

Keith Thompson recalled that Fleckenstein’s work had “paved the way” for the removal of restrictions on sending aid to Germany. He had been assisted by former New Jersey Governor Driscoll, “ministers, teachers and businessmen.” In 1950 Fleckenstein participated in “a trial-blazing Dismantling Suit” against Secretary of State Dean Acheson, seeking damages for German industries dismantled by the U.S. occupation regime as part of the Morgenthau process.[86] Fleckenstein held various meetings for German-American friendship in 1950, particularly in Yorkville, a German enclave in New York City. He was backed by Frederick C. F. Weiss, a mentor for many nationalist causes and individuals, including particularly Thompson and Francis Parker Yockey; Kurt Mertig, a German-American activist since before the war, and president of the Citizens Protective League; and A. O. Tittmann.[87]

Fleckenstein became legal counsel for Thompson’s Committee for the Freedom of Major General Remer in 1952 when the latter was incarcerated in Germany as a leader of the burgeoning Socialist Reich Party, which had been banned, and of which Thompson had been registered U.S. agent. Fleckenstein also served as counsel for the Committee for International Justice, another Thompson effort that campaigned with some success to assist incarcerated German war veterans.[88] Both committees were auxiliaries of the Voters Association for Americans of German Ancestry, of which Fleckenstein was president.[89] He had been invited by Dr. Aschenhauer, who had been a defense counsel at the Nuremberg Trials, and had been influential in conservative circles in the Free Democratic Party, to tour Germany in 1953. That year Fleckenstein did go to Germany, where he lectured but was quickly expelled.[90] Fleckenstein had organized a “German-American friendship rally,” in which Senator Joseph McCarthy had been due to speak, but McCarthy decided on another engagement. However, those who did speak apart from Fleckenstein, were Henry C. Furstenwalde, former official at the U.S. embassy in Berlin; Austin J. App of LaSalle College; Dr. Ludwig Fritsch; and Father Emmanuel J. Reichenberger, “distinguished Catholic expert on the East German expellee problem.” Keith Thompson served as “floor manager.” He recalled that it was “the first time since World War II that such an audience had been assembled.” [91] Father Reichenberger, far from being a “Nazi,” had opposed the local Hitlerites in his native Sudetenland before the war and had been known for his left-wing sympathies. After the 1938 Munich Agreement he fled Czechoslovakia, reaching the USA in 1940. Travelling back to Czechoslovakia with the U.S. Army in 1945, he noted the brutality of the Czech army towards ethnic Germans. He became the advocate of the millions of German ethnic expellees from the east. For this work he was criticized as an apologist for Nazism. His books included East German Passion (1948), Drive through Defeated Country (1950), Europe in Ruins: The Result of the Crusade of the Allies (1952) and others.

Fleckenstein was reported as also being prominent in the Pastorius Society and the Steuben Society, two long established German-American associations.[92] Fleckenstein was also “well-known” for his campaign work for the Republican presidential nomination of Robert Taft, a veteran America Firster, against Eisenhower.[93] Thompson organized a front for this called the American Voters’ Association. Included in the pro-Taft campaign at the Republican national convention in Chicago, along with Fleckenstein and Thompson, was Arthur Koegel, German-American businessman,[94] who during the early 1960s became president of the Steuben Society. There they lobbied for friendship with Germany, meeting Senators Dirksen and McCarthy; former Congressman Hamilton Fish, a veteran America Firster; and conservative columnist Westbrook Pegler.

While the FBI monitored Fleckenstein, Thompson et al, “Postwar American Jewish Community groups paid close attention to the activities of German American groups, seeing them as defenders of Nazism and supporters of Hitler’s memory. Jewish publications and defense organizations paid close attention to the ‘old pro-German groups’ that functioned in the post-war period ‘under the guise of German relief societies.’” The American Jewish Year Book, Jewish community councils, the American Jewish Congress, and the Anti-Defamation League “ferreted out” and “gave particular attention to the ‘German Groups,’ which they considered a category unto themselves,” in regard to monitoring “anti-Semitism.” The American Jewish Year Book for 1950 included a chapter entitled “Anti-Jewish Agitation” in reporting on the “German Groups,” where there was any manifestation of activity by Tittmann’s Voters’ Alliance for Americans of German Ancestry.[95] Organized Jewry in the USA was determined to maintain the Germanophobia of wartime, and thereby gave support to the implementation of the Morgenthau outlook. They worked to abort any effort for American and German reconciliation. Ten years after the war Organized Jewry was agitating against the performance of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Herbert von Karajan, whom the Jewish Labor Committee called “a notorious Nazi.” The Boston Jewish Times commented that had Hitler won the war, the same orchestra and conductor would be playing in the USA with the Horst Wessel Song among its repertoire.[96] In Cincinnati, where the population of German descent was large, the Jewish Community Relations Committee agitated against the plan to make Munich a “sister city.”[97]

With the perpetuation of such Germanophobia, still going strong ten years after the war, it is easy to understand why Senator McCarthy would have been blacklisted among organized Jewry even prior to his crusade against communist infiltration, which happened to turn up mainly those of Jewish descent. These included the coterie led by Nathan Gregory Silvermaster and Victor Perlo operating mainly within the Treasury Department, formulating post-war policies on Germany. Others included Silvermaster’s wife Helen, Solomon Adler, Frank Coe, who ended up as an adviser in Red China; Bela Gold; Sonia Gold; Irving Kaplan, who served as chief adviser to the U.S. military government in Germany; George Silverman; William Ullmann, and Harry Dexter White. With 80% of the Soviet agents turning up as Jews, Germanophobia served as a red herring, albeit one that had little effect among the American population when McCarthy started his investigations. Such Jews had a schizoid frame of mind, insofar as many remained loyal to Stalin due to their hatred of Western civilization, regardless of their traditional distrust of Russians and Stalin’s own vigorous turn against “rootless cosmopolitans” (Jews) after the world war. Eventually, the Cold War obliged the USA to incorporate Germany into its alliance against the USSR despite the reluctance of many Germans who had no wish to serve their new supposed “friend” that had spent so many years seeking their literal destruction.

---

Notes:

- |     |   |
|-----|---|
| [1] | For example, Stalin insisted to the German Communist leadership, or what was left of them (most having been liquidated by their Russian comrades when they sought refuge from Hitler) that they accept veterans from the Third Reich into the political and military apparatus. Stalin offered German reunification, repudiated Jewish reparations claims, and formed a nationalist party, the National Democratic Party of Germany, which remained an important constituent of the East German government. See Bolton, “Stalin’s German- |
|-----|---|

	Nationalist Party,” Inconvenient History , http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2014/volume_6/number_1/stalins_german_nationalist_party.php
[2]	Deborah Lipstadt, Denying the Holocaust (London: Penguin, 1993), p. 44.
[3]	K. R. Bolton, “Profiles in History: H. Keith Thompson Jr.,” Inconvenient History , http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2014/volume_6/number_2/h_keith_thompson_jr.php
[4]	H. K. Thompson Jr., and Henry Strutz, Doenitz at Nuremberg: A Reappraisal: War Crimes and the Military Professional (New York: Amber Publishing, 1976), xviii.
[5]	H. K. Thompson Jr., and Henry Strutz, ibid. , xx.
[6]	Gallery, ibid. , xxi.
[7]	Gallery, ibid. , xxii.
[8]	It was noted in 1975 that even the New Left, in its opposition to American interventionism, was turning to the example of Taft. While interventionism is regarded as a “conservative” policy, conservatism having over the past few decades been hijacked by ex-Trotskyites calling themselves “neoconservatives,” the genuine “paleoconservative” position of non-interventionism is upheld by Pat Buchanan, Paul Gottfried, et al. In contrast to the Trotskyites and other socialists who flocked to the Cold War bandwagon against the USSR, Taft, despite his anti-Communist conservatism, maintained his non-interventionist stance and opposed confrontation with Russia. See Robert McTiernan, “Taft and the New Isolationism,” The Alternative: An American Spectator , October 1975, http://64.62.200.70/PERIODICAL/PDF/AmSpectator-1975oct/16-19/ Also: Michael McMenamin, “Anticommunist? Yes. Cold Warrior? No,” Reason , July, 1979, http://64.62.200.70/PERIODICAL/PDF/Reason-1979jul/34-41/
[9]	John F. Kennedy, Profiles in Courage (Harper and Row, 1956), cited in Thompson, op. cit. , xxvii.
[10]	Thompson, op. cit. , p. 4.
[11]	Ibid. , p. 5.
[12]	Ibid. , p. 23.
[13]	Lipstadt, op. cit. , p. 44.
[14]	Baruch regarded the Morgenthau Plan as “much too soft.” Of the U.S. State Department representative, Clayton, who was opposing the Morgenthau Plan, Baruch said he would “cut his heart out if he didn’t behave himself.” He added of Clayton: “He won’t be able to stay around Washington after I get through with him.” Quoted by Kubek, op. cit. , p. 67; de Poncins, p. 123.
[15]	Morgenthau Diary (Washington: US Government Printing Office, 1967). On this see Count Leon de Poncins, State Secrets: A Documentation of the Secret Revolutionary Mainspring Governing Anglo-American Politics (Devon: Britons Publishing Co. 1975), pp. 95-138.
[16]	James Bacque, Crimes and Mercies (London: Little Brown & Co., 1997).
[17]	Bolton, “Historical Revisionism and ‘Relativizing the Holocaust,’” Inconvenient History , http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2012/volume_4/number_2/historical_revisionism_and_relativising_the_holocaust.php

[18]	Lipstadt, op. cit., p. 40.
[19]	Ibid., p. 37.
[20]	Ibid., p. 44.
[21]	Nahum Goldmann, Memories , pp. 216-217; quoted by Count Leon de Poncins, op. cit., pp. 50-51.
[22]	Ibid.
[23]	Ibid.
[24]	Lipstadt, op.cit., p. 44; endnote 56 to “The Antecedents.”
[25]	Henry Regnery, Memoirs of a Dissident Publisher (Lake Bluff, Ill.: Regnery Books, 1985), p. 32.
[26]	Ibid., p. 33.
[27]	Ibid., pp. 37-38.
[28]	Ibid., p. 39.
[29]	Ibid., p. 40.
[30]	Ibid., p. 44.
[31]	Ibid., p. 46.
[32]	Ibid., p. 48.
[33]	Freda Utley, The High Cost of Vengeance (Chicago: Regnery, 1949), p. 14.
[34]	Lipstadt, op. cit., p. 43.
[35]	Regnery, op. cit., p. 49.
[36]	Ibid., p. 51.
[37]	Edmond Taylor, “Germany: Where Fascism and Communism Meet,” The Reporter , April 13, 1954, p. 10.
[38]	Soviet infiltration with centered in the Treasury Department, through the Silvermaster and Perlo spy rings. See concluding paragraph herein.
[39]	K R Bolton, “Thompson,” op. cit.
[40]	Ralph Inge, Foreword, Veale, Advance to Barbarism , 1953. The book is online at: http://www.jrbooksonline.com/HTML-docs/Advance_to_Barbarism.htm#_ftn1
[41]	James Bacque, Other Losses (Toronto: Stoddard, 1989).
[42]	Milton Friedman, “Heard in the Lobbies,” Canadian Jewish News , January 22, 1954.
[43]	Lipstadt, op. cit., pp. 85-102.
[44]	Milton Friedman, op. cit.
[45]	Reynolds and Mueller, “Review, U.S. v. Altfuldisch, et al,” 1-2, Office of the Judge Advocate, Complete List of War Crimes Case Trials , 49-53; cited by Wesley Vincent Hilton, “The Blackest Canvas: U.S. Army Courts and the Trials of War Criminals in Post World War II Europe,” Ph.D. Dissertation, Texas Tech University, December 2003, p. 138.

[46]	James J. Weingartner, Crossroads of Death: the Story of the Malmedy Massacre and Trial , (Berkley: University of California Press, 1979, p. 169.
[47]	Ibid., pp. 170-172.
[48]	Ibid., p. 187.
[49]	Ibid., p. 199.
[50]	Ibid., p. 190.
[51]	Ibid., p. 193.
[52]	Ibid., p. 194.
[53]	Ibid., p. 209.
[54]	Ibid., p. 225.
[55]	Ibid., p. 218-219.
[56]	Edward L. Van Roden in Doenitz... , op, cit., p. 67.
[57]	Ian Cobain, “Britain’s Secret Torture Chamber: The Interrogation Centre that Turned Prisoners into Living Skeletons,” The Guardian , December 17, 2005, http://www.theguardian.com/uk/2005/dec/17/secondworldwar.topstories3?guni=Article:in%20body%20link
[58]	Ibid.
[59]	Ibid.
[60]	Ludwig A. Fritsch, The Crime of Our Age (Chicago, 1947), http://www.germanvictims.com/wp-content/uploads/2013/04/crime-of-our-age-ludwig-adolphus-fritsch.pdf
[61]	Ralph Keeling, Gruesome Harvest: The Costly Attempt to Exterminate the People of Germany (Chicago: Institute of American Economics, 1947).
[62]	Keeling, Gruesome Harvest (Reedy, W. Va., 1978).
[63]	Ibid., p. 3.
[64]	Ibid., p. 14.
[65]	Ibid., p. 15.
[66]	Ibid., p. 21.
[67]	Ibid., p. 23.
[68]	Ibid., p. 25.
[69]	Ibid., p. 57.
[70]	Ibid., pp. 58-59.
[71]	Ibid., pp. 67-68.
[72]	Ibid., p. 70.

[73]	Lipstadt, op. cit., p. 85.
[74]	Ibid., p. 86.
[75]	Walter Rathenau, “Hear, O Israel!,” Zukunft , no. 18, March 16, 1897.
[76]	George Patton, diary entry September 17, 1945.
[77]	“Austin Joseph App,” Catholic Authors, http://www.catholicauthors.com/app.html
[78]	Ibid.
[79]	App, History’s Most Terrifying Peace (Takoma Park, Md.: Boniface Press, May 1970).
[80]	Senate Committee on Civil Service, “To Amend the Trading with the Enemy Act So as to Permit Certain Aid to Civilian Recovery in Occupied Zones,” Washington D.C., April, June, 1947.
[81]	Thompson, Doenitz at Nuremberg , op. cit., p. 5.
[82]	Tittmann before Langer committee, op. cit., p. 18.
[83]	Read before Langer, ibid., p. 19.
[84]	Fleckenstein before Langer, ibid., p. 22.
[85]	Penningsdorf before Langer, ibid., p. 23.
[86]	H. K. Thompson, “I Am an American Fascist,” Part II, Expose , September 1954.
[87]	Ibid.
[88]	Bolton, “Thompson...,” Inconvenient History , op. cit.
[89]	Brian F. Jinnett Jr., FBI, Newark, NK 105-919, October 9, 1952, p. 2.
[90]	FBI Memo, New York, 105-6127, October 14, 1953, p. 2.
[91]	H. K. Thompson, “I Am an American Fascist,” op. cit.
[92]	Brian F. Jinnett Jr., FBI, ibid., p. 9.
[93]	FBI Memorandum, Newark 105-1160, August 4, 1953, p. 4.
[94]	FBI Memorandum, August 4, 1953, ibid., p. 15.
[95]	Hasia R. Diner, We Remember with Reverence and Love: American Jews and the Myth of Silence after the Holocaust 1945-1962 (New York University Press, 2009), p. 243.
[96]	Ibid., pp. 242-243.
[97]	Ibid., p. 244.

► Additional information about this document

Harry Truman and the Atomic Bomb

by Ralph Raico

- Periodicals
  - English
  - Inconvenient History
  - Vol. 7 \(2015\)
  - No. 1
-

This document is part of the Inconvenient History periodical.
Use this menu to find more documents that are part of this periodical.

The most spectacular episode of Harry Truman's presidency will never be forgotten but will be forever linked to his name: the atomic bombings of Hiroshima on August 6, 1945, and of Nagasaki three days later. Probably around two hundred thousand persons were killed in the attacks and through radiation poisoning; the vast majority were civilians, including several thousand Korean workers. Twelve US Navy fliers incarcerated in a Hiroshima jail were also among the dead.<sup>[1]</sup>

Great controversy has always surrounded the bombings. One thing Truman insisted on from the start was that the decision to use the bombs, and the responsibility it entailed, was his. Over the years, he gave different, and contradictory, grounds for his decision. Sometimes he implied that he had acted simply out of revenge. To a clergyman who criticized him, Truman responded testily,

Nobody is more disturbed over the use of Atomic bombs than I am but I was greatly disturbed over the unwarranted attack by the Japanese on Pearl Harbor and their murder of our prisoners of war. The only language they seem to understand is the one we have been using to bombard them.<sup>[2]</sup>

Such reasoning will not impress anyone who fails to see how the brutality of the Japanese military could justify deadly retaliation against innocent men, women, and children. Truman doubtless was aware of this, so from time to time he advanced other pretexts. On August 9, 1945, he stated, "The world will note that the first atomic bomb was dropped on Hiroshima, a military base. That was because we wished in this first attack to avoid, insofar as possible, the killing of civilians."<sup>[3]</sup>

This, however, is absurd. Pearl Harbor was a military base. Hiroshima was a city, inhabited by some three hundred thousand people, which contained military elements. In any case, since the harbor was mined and the US Navy and Air Force were in control of the waters around Japan, whatever troops were stationed in Hiroshima had been effectively neutralized.

From left to right. British Prime Minister Clement Attlee, American President Harry S. Truman and Soviet leader Joseph Stalin at the Potsdam Conference in 1945.

By US Government [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

On other occasions, Truman claimed that Hiroshima was bombed because it was an industrial center. But, as noted in the US Strategic Bombing Survey, "all major factories in Hiroshima were on the periphery of the city – and escaped serious damage."<sup>[4]</sup> The target was the center of the city. That Truman realized the kind of victims the bombs consumed is evident from his comment to his cabinet on August 10, explaining his reluctance to drop a third bomb: "The thought of wiping out another 100,000 people was too horrible," he said; he didn't like the idea of killing "all those kids."<sup>[5]</sup> Wiping out another one hundred thousand people ... all those kids.

Moreover, the notion that Hiroshima was a major military or industrial center is implausible on the face of it. The city had remained untouched through years of devastating air attacks on the Japanese home islands, and never figured in Bomber Command's list of the 33 primary targets.<sup>[6]</sup>

Thus, the rationale for the atomic bombings has come to rest on a single colossal fabrication, which has gained surprising currency – that they were necessary in order to save a half-million or more American lives. These, supposedly, are the lives that would have been lost in the planned invasion of Kyushu in December, then in the all-out invasion of Honshu the next year, if that had been needed. But the worst-case scenario for a full-scale invasion of the Japanese home islands was forty-six thousand American lives lost.<sup>[7]</sup> The ridiculously inflated figure of a half-million for the potential death toll – nearly twice the total of US dead in all theaters in the Second World War – is now routinely repeated in high-school and college textbooks and bandied about by ignorant commentators. Unsurprisingly the prize for sheer fatuousness on this score goes to President George H.W. Bush, who claimed in 1991 that dropping the bomb "spared millions of American lives."<sup>[8]</sup>

Still, Truman's multiple deceptions and self-deceptions are understandable, considering the horror he unleashed. It is equally understandable that the US occupation authorities censored reports from the shattered cities and did not permit films and photographs of the thousands of corpses and the frightfully mutilated survivors to reach the public.<sup>[9]</sup> Otherwise, Americans – and the rest of the world – might have drawn disturbing comparisons to scenes then coming to light from the Nazi concentration camps.

The bombings were condemned as barbaric and unnecessary by high American military officers, including Eisenhower and MacArthur.<sup>[10]</sup> The view of Admiral William D. Leahy, Truman's own chief of staff, was typical:

the use of this barbarous weapon at Hiroshima and Nagasaki was of no material assistance in our war against Japan. ... My own feeling was that in being the first to use it, we had adopted an ethical standard common to the barbarians of the Dark Ages. I was not taught to make wars in that fashion, and wars cannot be won by destroying women and children.<sup>[11]</sup>

The political elite implicated in the atomic bombings feared a backlash that would aid and abet the rebirth of horrid prewar "isolationism." Apologias were rushed into print, lest public disgust at the sickening war crime result in erosion of enthusiasm for the globalist project.<sup>[12]</sup> No need to worry. A sea change had taken place in the attitudes of the American people. Then and ever after, all surveys have shown that the great majority supported Truman, believing that the bombs were required to end the war and save hundreds of thousands of American lives, or, more likely, not really caring one way or the other.

Those who may still be troubled by such a grisly exercise in cost-benefit analysis – innocent Japanese lives balanced against the lives of Allied servicemen – might reflect on the judgment of the Catholic philosopher G.E.M. Anscombe, who insisted on the supremacy of moral rules.<sup>[13]</sup> When, in June 1956, Truman was awarded an honorary degree by her university, Oxford, Anscombe protested.<sup>[14]</sup> Truman was a war criminal, she contended, for what is the difference between the US government massacring civilians from the air, as at Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and the Nazis wiping out the inhabitants of some Czech or Polish village?

Anscombe's point is worth following up. Suppose that, when we invaded Germany in early 1945, our leaders had believed that executing all the inhabitants of Aachen, or Trier, or some other Rhineland city would finally break the will of the Germans and lead them to surrender. In this way, the war might have ended quickly, saving the lives of many Allied soldiers. Would that then have justified shooting tens of thousands of German civilians, including women and children? Yet how is that different from the atomic bombings?

By early summer 1945, the Japanese fully realized that they were beaten. Why did they nonetheless fight on? As Anscombe wrote, "It was the insistence on unconditional surrender that was the root of all evil."<sup>[15]</sup>

That mad formula was coined by Roosevelt at the Casablanca conference, and, with Churchill's enthusiastic concurrence, it became the Allied shibboleth. After prolonging the war in Europe, it did its work in the Pacific. At the Potsdam Conference, in July 1945, Truman issued a proclamation to the Japanese, threatening them with the "utter devastation" of their homeland unless they surrendered unconditionally. Among the Allied terms, to which "there are no alternatives," was that there be "eliminated for all time the authority and influence of those who have deceived and misled the people of Japan into embarking on world conquest [sic]." "Stern justice," the proclamation warned, "would be meted out to all war criminals."<sup>[16]</sup>

Atomic bombing of Nagasaki on August 9, 1945.

The Official CTBTO Photostream [CC BY 2.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/2.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

To the Japanese, this meant that the emperor – regarded by them to be divine, the direct descendent of the goddess of the sun – would certainly be dethroned and probably put on trial as a war criminal and hanged, perhaps in front of his palace.<sup>[17]</sup> It was not, in fact, the US intention to dethrone or punish the emperor. But this implicit modification of unconditional surrender was never communicated to the Japanese. In the end, after Nagasaki, Washington acceded to the Japanese desire to keep the dynasty and even to retain Hirohito as emperor.

For months before, Truman had been pressed to clarify the US position by many high officials within the administration, and outside of it, as well. In May 1945, at the president's request, Herbert Hoover prepared a memorandum stressing the urgent need to end the war as soon as possible. The Japanese should be informed that we would in no way interfere with the emperor or their chosen form of government. He even raised the possibility that, as part of the terms, Japan might be allowed to hold on to Formosa (Taiwan) and Korea. After meeting with Truman, Hoover dined with Taft and other Republican leaders, and outlined his proposals.<sup>[18]</sup>

Establishment writers on World War II often like to deal in lurid speculations. For instance, if the United States had not entered the war, then Hitler would have "conquered the world" (a sad undervaluation of the Red Army, it would appear; moreover, wasn't it Japan that was trying to "conquer the world"?) and killed untold millions. Now, applying conjectural history in this case, assume that the Pacific war had ended in the way wars customarily do – through negotiation of the terms of surrender. And assume the worst – that the Japanese had adamantly insisted on preserving part of their empire, say, Korea and Formosa, even Manchuria. In that event, it is quite possible that Japan would have been in a position to prevent the Communists from coming to power in China. And that could have meant that the 30 or 40 million deaths now attributed to the Maoist regime would not have occurred.

But even remaining within the limits of feasible diplomacy in 1945, it is clear that Truman in no way exhausted the possibilities of ending the war without recourse to the atomic bomb. The Japanese were not informed that they would be the victims of by far the most lethal weapon ever invented (one with "more than two thousand times the blast power of the British 'Grand Slam,' which is the largest bomb ever yet used in the history of warfare," as Truman boasted in his announcement of the Hiroshima attack). Nor were they told that the Soviet Union was set to declare war on Japan, an event that shocked some in Tokyo more than the bombings.<sup>[19]</sup> Pleas by some of the scientists involved in the project to demonstrate the power of the bomb in some uninhabited or evacuated area were rebuffed. All that mattered was to formally preserve the unconditional-surrender formula and save the servicemen's lives that might have been lost in the effort to enforce it. Yet, as Major General J.F.C. Fuller, one of the century's great military historians, wrote in connection with the atomic bombings:

Though to save life is laudable, it in no way justifies the employment of means which run counter to every precept of humanity and the customs of war. Should it do so, then, on the pretext of shortening a war and of saving lives, every imaginable atrocity can be justified.<sup>[20]</sup>

Isn't this obviously true? And isn't this the reason that rational and humane men, over generations, developed rules of warfare in the first place?

While the mass media parroted the government line in praising the atomic incinerations, prominent conservatives denounced them as unspeakable war crimes. Felix Morley, constitutional scholar and one of the founders of Human Events, drew attention to the horror of Hiroshima, including the "thousands of children trapped in the thirty-three schools that were destroyed." He called on his compatriots to atone for what had been done in their name, and proposed that groups of Americans be sent to Hiroshima, as Germans were sent to witness what had been done in the Nazi camps.

The Paulist priest, Father James Gillis, editor of The Catholic World and another stalwart of the Old Right, castigated the bombings as "the most powerful blow ever delivered against Christian civilization and the moral law." David Lawrence, conservative owner of US News and World Report, continued to denounce them for years.<sup>[21]</sup> The distinguished conservative philosopher Richard Weaver was revolted by the spectacle of young boys fresh out of Kansas and Texas turning nonmilitary Dresden into a holocaust ... pulverizing ancient shrines like Monte Cassino and Nuremberg, and bringing atomic annihilation to Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

Weaver considered such atrocities as deeply "inimical to the foundations on which civilization is built."<sup>[22]</sup>

Today, self-styled conservatives slander as "anti-American" anyone who is in the least troubled by Truman's massacre of so many tens of thousands of Japanese innocents from the air. This shows as well as anything the difference between today's "conservatives" and those who once deserved the name.

Leo Szilard was the world-renowned physicist who drafted the original letter to Roosevelt that Einstein signed, instigating the Manhattan Project. In 1960, shortly before his death, Szilard stated another obvious truth:

If the Germans had dropped atomic bombs on cities instead of us, we would have defined the dropping of atomic bombs on cities as a war crime, and we would have sentenced the Germans who were guilty of this crime to death at Nuremberg and hanged them.<sup>[23]</sup>

The destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki was a war crime worse than any that Japanese generals were executed for in Tokyo and Manila. If Harry Truman was not a war criminal, then no one ever was.

---

Notes:

[1]	On the atomic bombings, see Gar Alperovitz, The Decision to Use the Atomic Bomb and the Architecture of an American Myth (New York: Knopf, 1995); and idem, "Was Harry Truman a Revisionist on Hiroshima?" Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations Newsletter 29, no. 2 (June 1998); also Martin J. Sherwin, A World Destroyed: The Atomic Bomb and the Grand Alliance (New York: Vintage, 1977); and Dennis D. Wainstock, The Decision to Drop the Atomic Bomb (Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1996).
[2]	Alperovitz, Decision , p. 563. Truman added: "When you deal with a beast you have to treat him as a beast. It is most regrettable but nevertheless true." For similar statements by Truman, see ibid. , p. 564. Alperovitz's monumental work is the end-product of four decades of study of the atomic bombings and is indispensable for comprehending the often complex argumentation on the issue.

[3]	Ibid., p. 521.
[4]	Ibid., p. 523.
[5]	Barton J. Bernstein, "Understanding the Atomic Bomb and the Japanese Surrender: Missed Opportunities, Little-Known Near Disasters, and Modern Memory," Diplomatic History 19, no. 2 (Spring 1995): 257. General Carl Spaatz, commander of US strategic bombing operations in the Pacific, was so shaken by the destruction at Hiroshima that he telephoned his superiors in Washington, proposing that the next bomb be dropped on a less populated area, so that it "would not be as devastating to the city and the people." His suggestion was rejected. Ronald Schaffer, Wings of Judgment: American Bombing in World War 2 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1985), pp. 147–48.
[6]	This is true also of Nagasaki.
[7]	See Barton J. Bernstein, "A Post-War Myth: 500,000 US Lives Saved," Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists 42, no. 6 (June/July 1986): pp. 38–40; and idem, "Wrong Numbers," The Independent Monthly (July 1995): pp. 41–44.
[8]	J. Samuel Walker, "History, Collective Memory, and the Decision to Use the Bomb," Diplomatic History 19, no. 2 (Spring 1995): pp. 320, 323–25. Walker details the frantic evasions of Truman's biographer, David McCullough, when confronted with the unambiguous record.
[9]	Paul Boyer, "Exotic Resonances: Hiroshima in American Memory," Diplomatic History 19, no. 2 (Spring 1995): pp. 299. On the fate of the bombings' victims and the public's restricted knowledge of them, see John W. Dower, "The Bombed: Hiroshimas and Nagasakis in Japanese Memory," in ibid. , pp. 275–95.
[10]	Alperovitz, Decision , pp. 320–65. On MacArthur and Eisenhower, see ibid. , pp. 352 and 355–56.
[11]	William D. Leahy, I Was There (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1950), p. 441. Leahy compared the use of the atomic bomb to the treatment of civilians by Genghis Khan, and termed it "not worthy of Christian man." Ibid. , p. 442. Curiously, Truman himself supplied the foreword to Leahy's book. In a private letter written just before he left the White House, Truman referred to the use of the atomic bomb as "murder," stating that the bomb "is far worse than gas and biological warfare because it affects the civilian population and murders them wholesale." Barton J. Bernstein, "Origins of the US Biological Warfare Program," Preventing a Biological Arms Race , Susan Wright, ed. (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1990), p. 9.
[12]	Barton J. Bernstein, "Seizing the Contested Terrain of Early Nuclear History: Stimson, Conant, and Their Allies Explain the Decision to Use the Bomb," Diplomatic History 17, no. 1 (Winter 1993): pp. 35–72.
[13]	One writer in no way troubled by the sacrifice of innocent Japanese to save Allied servicemen – indeed, just to save him – is Paul Fussell; see his Thank God for the Atom Bomb and Other Essays (New York: Summit, 1988). The reason for Fussell's little Te Deum is, as he states, that he was among those scheduled to take part in the invasion of Japan, and might very well have been killed. It is a mystery why Fussell takes out his easily understandable terror, rather unchivalrously, on Japanese women and children instead of on the men in Washington who conscripted him to fight in the Pacific in the first place.
[14]	G.E.M. Anscombe, "Mr. Truman's Degree," in idem, Collected Philosophical Papers , vol. 3, Ethics, Religion and Politics (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1981), pp. 62–71.
[15]	Anscombe, "Mr. Truman's Degree," p. 62.
[16]	Hans Adolf Jacobsen and Arthur S. Smith, Jr., eds., World War II: Policy and Strategy. Selected Documents with Commentary (Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-Clío, 1979), pp. 345–46.
[17]	For some Japanese leaders, another reason for keeping the emperor was as a bulwark against a possible postwar communist takeover. See also Sherwin, A World Destroyed , p. 236: "the [Potsdam] proclamation offered the military die-hards in the Japanese government more ammunition to continue the war than it offered their opponents to end it."
[18]	Alperovitz, Decision , pp. 44–45.
[19]	Cf. Bernstein, "Understanding the Atomic Bomb," p. 254: "it does seem very likely, though certainly not definite, that a synergistic combination of guaranteeing the emperor, awaiting Soviet entry, and continuing the siege strategy would have ended the war in time to avoid the November invasion." Bernstein, an excellent and scrupulously objective scholar, nonetheless disagrees with Alperovitz and the revisionist school on several key points.

[20]	J.F.C. Fuller, The Second World War, 1939–45: A Strategical and Tactical History (London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1948), p. 392. Fuller, who was similarly scathing on the terror-bombing of the German cities, characterized the attacks on Hiroshima and Nagasaki as "a type of war that would have disgraced Tamerlane." Cf. Barton J. Bernstein, who concludes, in "Understanding the Atomic Bomb," p. 235:  In 1945, American leaders were not seeking to avoid the use of the A-bomb. Its use did not create ethical or political problems for them. Thus, they easily rejected or never considered most of the so-called alternatives to the bomb.
[21]	Felix Morley, "The Return to Nothingness," Human Events (August 29, 1945) reprinted in Hiroshima's Shadow , Kai Bird and Lawrence Lifschultz, eds. (Stony Creek, Conn.: Pamphleteer's Press, 1998), pp. 272–74; James Martin Gillis, "Nothing But Nihilism," The Catholic World , September 1945, reprinted in ibid. , pp. 278–80; Alperovitz, Decision , pp. 438–40.
[22]	Richard M. Weaver, "A Dialectic on Total War," in idem , Visions of Order: The Cultural Crisis of Our Time (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1964), pp. 98–99.
[23]	Wainstock, Decision , p. 122.

► Additional information about this document

Outdoor Incineration of Livestock Carcasses

by Heinrich Köchel

In assessing the reported cremation of huge numbers of human corpses in German concentration, labor, transit and/or extermination camps during the Second World War, the capacities of the respective facilities – crematories, outdoor cremation pits and pyres, as well as mass graves – are an important factor. Literature on the pertinent crematories is plentiful and technically well documented, especially by Pressac's and Mattogno's works. In particular the Auschwitz camp was well equipped with crematoria. The other camps established in eastern Poland (Treblinka, Sobibór and Belzec) did not have such sophisticated facilities, so that many corpses had to be burned outdoors. Some two million Holocaust victim deaths are traditionally ascribed to these camps. Using current knowledge about the open-air cremation of large amounts of livestock carcasses, the author of the present study investigates under which circumstances the disposal of so many human corpses would have been feasible, if at all.

1. Reports on Corpse Cremations in German World War II Camps

In his work Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka Yitzak Arad explains that the victims in these camps were killed in homicidal gas chambers using carbon monoxide gas from engine exhaust between fall 1942 and early 1943. Most were initially buried in mass graves. Due to the threat of ground water contamination but also concerns about a possible later discovery of this evidence of mass murder, these corpses are said to have been disinterred in the first half of 1943 and burned over a period of several months.

Apart from impressive descriptions of these fires regarding their blazing flames, intense heat, acrid smoke and unbearable stench, little precise data can be found about them. Some witnesses stated that even living people died in these fires, either because they were forced to jump into them or because loads of victims were dumped into them from trucks. This is not very credible, though, as such huge fires would have been dangerous even for the perpetrators and for any vehicle getting too close to them.

In the above-mentioned book Yitzak Arad describes these open-air incinerations at Treblinka and Belzec as follows:

[Treblinka:] The cremation structure consisted of a roaster made from five or six railroad rails laid on top of three rows of concrete pillars each 70 cm high. The facility was 30 m wide.[...].

[...] SS Oberscharführer Heinrich Matthes, the commander of the “extermination area” in Treblinka, testified:

[...] The corpses were piled on these rails. Brushwood was put under the rails. The wood was doused with petrol. (p. 174)

[...] another special team, called the “burning group” (Feuerkolonne), removed the corpses from the stretchers and arranged them in layers on the roaster to a height of 2 meters. Between 2,000 and 2,500 bodies – sometimes up to 3,000 – would be piled on the roaster. When all was ready, dry wood and branches, which had been laid under the roaster, were ignited. The entire construction, with the bodies, was quickly engulfed in fire. The railings would glow from the heat, and the flames would reach a height of up to 10 meters.

At first an inflammable liquid was poured onto the bodies to help them burn, but later this was considered unnecessary; the SS men in charge of the cremation became convinced that the corpses burned well enough without extra fuel.

Yecheil Reichman, a member of the “burning group,” writes:

The SS “expert” on bodyburning ordered us to put women, particularly fat women, on the first layer on the grill, face down. The second layer could consist of whatever was brought [...]. Then the “expert” ordered us to lay dry branches under the grill and to light them. Within a few minutes the fire would take so it was difficult to approach the crematorium from as far as 50 meters away. (p. 175)

The body-burning went on day and night. The corpses were transferred and arranged on the roasters during the day; at nightfall they were lit, and they burned throughout the night. When the fire went out, there were only skeletons or scattered bones on the roasters, and piles of ashes underneath. (p. 176)

In Belzec, all 600,000 victims had been buried already when the cremation started. During a period of four to five months they had to be unearthed and burned. (p. 177)

At Belzec and Treblinka, [...] a system had to be found to cremate 150,000 to 200,000 corpses within one month and 5,000 to 7,000 in one day. By [...] operating simply built, huge, open-spaced crematoria, [...] the Operation Reinhard staff was able to complete its mission of cremation and the erasure of their despicable crimes. (p. 178)

Arad's book contains some information about the size and layout of these camps, and even though these data do not fully agree with other sources, it gives an impression of the surface areas available for the respective “zones of death” for the claimed extermination facilities, mass graves and subsequent incinerations:

Camp	Size of “Death Zone”	Surface Area	Arad's Data
Belzec:	275 m × 90 m	≈ 24,750 m <sup>2</sup> (6.1 acres)	map (p. 437) in conj. with total size of camp (p. 27: ca. 275 m × 275 m)
Treblinka:	250 m × 200 m	≈ 50,000 m <sup>2</sup> (12.4 acres)	p. 41*
Sobibór:	150 m × 100 m	≈ 15,000 m <sup>2</sup> (3.7 acres)	map (p. 35) in conj. with total size of camp (p. 30: 600 m × 400 m)

*An official Polish source based on a 1945 survey of the camp claims a surface area of merely 14,000 m<sup>2</sup> (3.45 acres) for the Treblinka “death zone,” see Graf/Mattogno, pp. 91, 321

According to eyewitness claims, thousands of bodies, some of them even frozen, were incinerated within a day with a minimal amount of fuel on pyres, which according to Arad had a surface area of 1,000 m<sup>2</sup> (Treblinka) and 1,500 m<sup>2</sup> (Belzec and Sobibór). At the end of this process, only ashes and small bone fragments are said to have been left behind. The latter could easily be crushed to dust with stampers. As incredible as such claims may sound, they have been considered to be true so far and were accepted as evidence by various courts of laws.

Carbonation, not cremation

A more recent study of the cremation pyres by M. Tregenza (2000, p. 253) went a step farther. During a German penal trial against former SS guards, witnesses testified that the pyres used in the Belzec camp measured 5 m × 5 m and that up to five of them existed, although the defendants insisted that two of them had existed. Tregenza extrapolated the information about the death toll hitherto attributed to this camp and stated:

There is much disagreement on the subject of the number of pyres at Belzec. Witnesses from the village state that up to five pyres were in use, whereas SS personnel spoke of two pyres during the judicial proceedings in Munich in 1963/1964. According to their indications, at least 500,000 people were burned on those pyres. Assuming that a minimum of 500,000 corpses were burned on two pyres, one has to assume, for five pyres, a much higher figure – possibly twice as high – than the 600,000 persons officially assumed so far.

Such calculations merely highlight how shaky the evidentiary basis is to this very day. Tregenza’s uncritical acceptance of the size of these pyres is interesting, though, as it demonstrates how little he knows about the problems of cremating corpses, or cares about the factuality of these testimonies.

2. Cremating Animal Cadavers during the 2001 Hoof-and-Mouth Epidemic

During the year 2001 Europe and in particular Great Britain were afflicted by a major outbreak of hoof-and-mouth disease. This permits us to investigate in more detail the challenge of incinerating large amounts of human corpses outdoors, since the media gave this process considerable coverage. The various reports of carcass incineration by government authorities give us detailed information as to the procedures used, in particular regarding the amount of fuel needed, the size of the pyres, the duration of the incineration, and also the manpower and man-hours needed as well as the time it took to set up the pyres, etc.

The table at the end of this paper lists the information gathered from various newspaper articles reporting on eight actual events (some of which were mentioned by several sources) as well as two typical instruction manuals. Although these sources all relate to the incineration of animal carcasses – cattle, pigs, sheep – they can be extended to human corpses, since their consistency is very similar regarding the amount of fat, protein and water they contain. The instruction manuals quoted moreover expressly support their application to other animal species (not including humans).

An analysis of the data listed in the below table yields the following results:

2.1. Type and Amount of Fuel

All pyres are basically very similar regarding the fuels used. Coal is the main type of fuel, but since large wooden logs like railway sleepers are an essential element for constructing a pyre, they contribute a considerable amount of energy. Other types of fuels are also used, as for instance wooden skids, tires, straw bales soaked with diesel oil (to start the blaze), and finally at times thermite to ignite the fire.

Veterinary instructions indicate that processes for different species of livestock can be converted one to another for the purpose of calculating the required size of a cremation pyre. According to this, one cattle carcass corresponds to either four pigs, four shorn or three unshorn sheep. When converting the energy contents of each type of fuel into equivalents of wood, the various sources yield between 125 and 875 kg of dry wood per pig-equivalent, with an average of 310 kg. Considering the large variation of the data, it seems advisable to exclude the two extreme values, which yields a corrected average of some 270 kg of dry wood per pig-equivalent.

Fireproof garments

If looking at human corpses in this manner, it is possible to make the conservative estimate that two human bodies correspond to one pig carcass, or eight human bodies to one cattle carcass. This yields an average required amount of some 135 kg of dry wood for the incineration of one human corpse. Depending on the type of wood, this corresponds to 0.2 to 0.3 solid cubic meters of dry (!) wood.

2.2. Design of the Pyres

The sources agree that – at a given load – a narrow but long pyre is preferred to one of a more square shape. That seems obvious, as feeding the pyre with air is essential for an efficient, i.e. hot and swift, cremation. The longer the distance from the edge to the center of the pyre, the higher the risk that the burning mass located there cannot burn efficiently, merely sinking down and smoldering rather than burning. Moreover, in case of need it is exceedingly difficult to add additional fuel to spots more distant from the edge of the pyre.

The sources state in general that pyres should not be wider than some 2.5 m, which is the length of railway sleepers. This size is also conducive to constructing and loading such pyres from the long edges, as the workers can work simultaneously from both sides of the pyre. Photographs and schematic drawings show that cattle are usually placed in a single layer upon the bed of fuel, while sheep and pigs can be loaded in several layers. The total height does not exceed some 1.8 to 2 m, though. If loading is done manually, it is impossible to work at higher heights anyway. If stacked higher, the risk that the pile topples over increases considerably, for instance in case the pyre burns down unevenly or in case any frozen ground melts and thus gives way unevenly. This results in a trapezoidal cross section of the pyre with an area of some 3 to 4 m<sup>2</sup> and a volume respectively of some 3 to 4 m<sup>3</sup> for each meter of the pyre.

If the location does not allow the construction of a single long pyre, it is of course possible to build several pyres next to each other. In that case a minimum distance between individual pyres needs to be kept for safety reasons, in particular if the pyres are not lit at the same time, in which case they are each at different stages of being prepared, burning down or being cleared out. For the pyres used during the 2001 outbreak of hoof-and-mouth disease, a minimum distance of 250 m between pyres was recommended. One witness mentioned a distance of 50 m around the pyres which was too hot and/or smoky to enter (Arad, p. 175). The same is also true for other artificial or natural blazes like burning houses or forest fires.

Based upon the data from the 2001 hoof-and-mouth epidemic it can be calculated that, in case of a single pyre of 1,000 m length and 250 m safety distance around it, an area of 500 m × 1,000 m would be required, plus a safety zone at both ends of the pyre (2 semi-circles of 250 m radius), which amounts to a little more than 50 hectares (124 acres). If that pyre were to be split up into four of 250 m length each, this number would increase to almost 100 hectares (1 km<sup>2</sup> or 0.4 square mile).

2.3 Duration of the Incineration

The sources quoted give different values for the time it takes for a pyre to burn down completely, ranging from “at least 24 hours” to “one to two weeks.” The shorter times probably refer to the dying down of perceptible flames, the longer values to the time it takes for the pyres to cool down.

2.4 Labor Effort and Other Considerations

The report about the incineration of 800 sheep in France by 100 soldiers deployed for this task also mentions a fleet of trucks (and presumably other equipment) used during the event.

3. The Cremation of Bodies Outdoors in German Wartime Camps in the Light of These Data

The disposal of corpses in German wartime camps was different than the combustion of livestock carcasses in several regards:

- The human corpses had to be almost completely reduced to ashes so that no identifiable remnants would be left behind. The literature on this topic states that any bone fragments left over were even manually ground to powder. This would have been possible only after the pyres had cooled down sufficiently.
- Judging by the witness testimony available, it may be assumed that mainly wood rather than coal was used for the fires, since moderately sized pieces of wood can be transported by hand, whereas the transportation of coal or coke requires at least a modicum of mechanical devices (shovels, wheelbarrows etc.) never referred to in any witness account.
- Since wood has a much lower energy value per unit of mass than coal and coke, and also has a much lower density, such wood-fired pyres are inexorably more voluminous than those made mainly of coal/coke; this means that fewer corpses per surface area can be loaded onto wood pyres than onto coal/coke pyres.
- Wood fires generally burn at lower temperatures than coal/coke fires, which makes it more difficult to reduce corpses completely to ashes this way.
- It may be surmised that any firewood used stemmed from freshly-logged wood taken from surrounding forests. Since green, moist wood has only roughly half the net caloric yield of dried wood, this would double the amount of wood needed, lengthen the time the pyres burned, and reduce even more the average temperature of such pyres, hence complicating the entire process.

Outdoor livestock carcass cremation seen from the air. The pyres which allegedly burned at Auschwitz, Belzec, Sobibor and Treblinka would have dwarfed fires like this and would have blanketed the entire area in smoke. Nothing of that kind can be seen on any of the air photos of Auschwitz.

Based upon the above elaboration it can be deduced that the cremation of a human corpse outdoors requires at least 0.2 to 0.3 solid cubic meters of dry wood (or 0.4 to 0.6 solid cubic meters of fresh wood). Together with the corpse itself and the gaps required for an efficient cremation, a typical pyre could maybe accommodate two corpses per cubic meter of pyre for dry wood (and one for fresh wood). The optimally designed pyre for small livestock carcasses as discussed earlier could thus be loaded with some 8 to 10 human corpses per running meter (or 4 to 5 for a sub-optimal pyre using fresh wood). In practice the conditions were most certainly not ideal, meaning that the actual pyres could probably accommodate less than that.

To achieve a daily capacity of some 5,000 to 7,000 corpses, as had to be cremated in those camps if we follow the traditional narrative, dry-wood pyres of 2.5 m width would have been required which were at least some 500 to 700 m long (or 1,000 to 1,400 m in case of moist wood).

After the pyres were ignited, they would have burned for between one and two days, as was reported for the pyres of the 2001 hoof-and-mouth epidemic. Experience with large piles of hot ashes shows that such piles remain hot for numerous days up to a week after the fire was started. After this the piles had to be sifted in search of larger bone fragments in order to grind them down, which would have required probably more than a day. It is therefore realistic to assume that each load of a pyre was being processed for up to ten days before a new pyre could be erected for a new load of corpses.

For the cremation capacity mentioned or implied in the literature of up to 7,000 bodies, ten outdoor cremation sites of the above size had to exist at the same time – all in various stages of the process. If assuming a distance of only 100 m between each such site and around the periphery of all pyres, the total surface area needed for that kind of operation of some 1,000 m × 1,000 m results for dry wood (and twice that for fresh wood). Such a surface area exceeds by far the sizes described in the literature of these camps; and in fact, it exceeds by far the size of every one of these camps taken in their entireties.

The availability of fuel is of course indispensable. The traditional literature does not even raise that issue, let alone discuss it. As a matter of fact, it is claimed that very little if any fuel was required. Assuming that dry wood was the main fuel, we arrive at a requirement of 1,400 to 2,100 solid cubic meters of wood (dry and sawn) which had to be delivered into the camp every day for cremating 7,000 corpses daily. That corresponds to 200 truckloads or 70 to 100 mid-size freight cars via railway, and this every single day for several months. Considering the unreliable transport situation during the war, it would have been advisable to have a minimum reserve of two to three days' supplies, which means to store some 3,000 to 6,000 solid cubic meters of wood. If logs 2.5 m long are piled up 3 m high, the resulting wood pile would be 400 to 800 m long, and the surface area required would amount to some 1,000 to 2,000 m<sup>2</sup> – plus additional space to access the piles, many meters wide on either side of the piles. This easily amounts to another hectare (2.5 acres) of surface area. This area alone amounts to a considerable portion of the area which Arad describes as these camps' "zone of earth" (see above). If, however, freshly-logged wood was used instead, the numbers would again double. In that case, logging that many trees, transporting them into the camp, and cutting them up would pose its own logistic challenge, which shall not be investigated here in detail.

Concerning the labor effort required for the cremations themselves we may assume due to the shortage of labor during the war that mainly forced labor (slave labor) was resorted to and that assisting mechanical devices were hardly available. The excavator depicted in Arad's book, which is said to have been inoperable at times, could not have done more than lift the corpses out of the mass graves and put them at the workers' feet.

In the present paper it is not possible to thoroughly describe the workflow, but one needs to keep in mind that the vast area needed for these cremations (if it was available to begin with) would have required that the workers had to travel long distances to bring corpses from the mass graves and fuel from the wood storage area to the pyres – distances of up to a kilometer and more each way are realistic.

Outdoor livestock carcass cremation seen from the air. pit, excavated soil, massive destruction of vegetation and top-soil around the pits – nothing of that kind can be seen on any of the air photos of Auschwitz.

The orthodox literature mentions in passing that a narrow-gauge railway had been constructed. Due to the described ideal design of the pyres, this is not a practical solution, though, because the railway spur would have to run close to the pyre and would have to be relocated to another cremation pyre once one pyre was ready to be set ablaze and the work crew moved to the next cremation site – plus it would have to be a double-track line. It would have been impossible to place the tracks near a burning pyre, because the heat would have compromised both rails and sleepers. It is worth noting that rolling stock would have been almost indispensable for the transportation of 7,000 corpses and 1,400 to 2,100 metric tons of dry wood (or 2,800 to 4,200 tons of green wood) every single day.

4. Conclusions

The statements about the extermination camps made in the orthodox literature contradict the insights gained in connection with the 2001 outbreak of hoof-and-mouth disease to such a degree that it is impossible to accept the claims of the orthodox literature, according to which for several months thousands of human corpses were cremated every day within the confines of the Treblinka, Sobibór and Belzec camps. These camps probably had facilities permitting the cremation of corpses, but most likely on a much smaller scale than claimed. A generous calculation using the surface areas actually available according to the orthodox literature (1,000 to 1,500 m<sup>2</sup> for each camp) results in pyres of a size permitting the cremation of maybe some 1,500 corpses per week, but not several tens of thousands, as is usually claimed.

If following the data given by M. Tregenza for the claimed pyres (4, possibly 5 “grills”, each of 5 m × 5 m, i.e. some 100 to 125 m<sup>2</sup>), the estimates shrink even further by almost an order of magnitude to several hundred corpses which could have been disposed of within a week. In any case, the claims that fuel wood was needed only to start the fires are outside of the realm of documented experiences and must therefore be rejected. All reports about actual pyres during the 2001 hoof-and-mouth epidemic as well as instructions for the construction of such pyres emphasize the substantial fuel requirement.

This paper does not conclude that no such cremations took place at all in these camps. Crimes against humanity do not depend on a set number of victims. Legal and moral decisions follow different guidelines than technical issues. But we should reconcile ourselves to the thought that the two million victims attributed to these camps are a gross exaggeration. Considering the verifiable information about these camps and the experiences with outdoor mass cremations during livestock epidemics, we can safely assume that not more than 3,000 to 5,000 corpses could have been disposed of weekly. Applying this to the total time span during which such cremations are said to have occurred in the context of the “Aktion Reinhardt,” that is to say a four- to six-month period, no more than 80,000 to 125,000 corpses could possibly have been disposed of in that manner. The actual numbers are likely to be much lower than these, though.

Amount of Fuel Required during Hoof-and-Mouth Epidemic

Description of actual outdoor mass cremations and of livestock and instructions to construct pertinent pyres reference #	[1]	[2]	[3]	[4]	[5]	[6]	[7]	[8]	[9]	[9a]	[10]
location/authority	Heddon-on-the-Wall	Caldbeck	Shadwick	Burdon	Epynt	Oswestry	Oswestry	FAO	DOH	APHIS	Bondues, France
cattle	75	500	401	200	300	68	45 cows, 10 calves	1	1	1
pigs	850					450		or 4		or 5
sheep				730		115	90	or 4 shorn or 3 unshorn		or 5	818
pig-equivalents	1150	2000	1604	1770	1200	860	320	4	(4)	5	1100
railway sleepers	250	3800	700	800	380	200	150	1	3	3×8 sq ft	350
coal [t]	75	700	200	290	175	30	25	0.2	1	0.23	60
wood		900 skids		29 t	250 skids	4 truckloads 200 tires	2 truckloads 100 tires	35 kg	40 kg	23 kg	56 m <sup>3</sup>
diesel oil [l]		7600		3000	2800	150	150	5		3.8	(60 t?)
straw	2 truckloads	60 t		20 t	4 t	350 bales	250 bales	1 bale	1 bale	3 bales	10 t
length [m]	150			250?350?	250?500?	60	45			0.9/cattle	100
wood equivalents [t]	185	1750	450	677	400	110	75	0.5	2.3	0.87	190
wood/pig [kg]	160	875	280	360	330	130	235	125	575	174	170
wood/pig [kg]	average: 310 kg; corr. average: 270 kg (values struck through not considered)

For this study the caloric value of each type of fuel is expressed as wood equivalents. Some basic value can be found here: <http://www.brennholz-killat.de/abc/Heizwerttabelle.pdf>, from which I took “Heizöl EL” for diesel, “Brennholz (Mittel)” for average wood, “Steinkohle” for coal, “Stroh (in Ballen)” for bales of straw with 0.25 m<sup>3</sup> and 35kg per bale. Considering the frequent imprecision of the data given (skids, truckloads etc.) some calculations had to be based on educated guesses. However, in every case the contribution of coal and wood was always the decisive value. Unless indicated otherwise, a railway sleeper was calculated as a piece of wood of 2.5 m × 0.3 m × 0.2 m with a specific density of 0.5 t/m<sup>3</sup>.

5. Recommended Reading

Revisionists have dealt with the above problem in a number of their books. The results are similar to the present study, although the ways the authors arrived at them are much more complex. The present study has the advantage that it is based on real, properly documented cases of open-air mass cremations which are similar in style, scope and scale to the ones claimed for the alleged extermination camps of “Aktion Reinhardt.” The so-inclined reader may compare the present result to those obtained in these studies, of which the first three are concise while the last one is exhaustive to the point of being excessive:

- Jürgen Graf, Thomas Kues, Carlo Mattogno, Sobibór: Holocaust Propaganda and Reality, The Barnes Review, Washington, DC, 2010, pp. 130-148
- Carlo Mattogno, Belzec in Propaganda, Testimonies, Archeological Research, and History, Theses & Dissertations Press, Chicago, IL, 2004, pp. 82-87.
- Carlo Mattogno, Jürgen Graf, Treblinka: Extermination Camp or Transit Camp?, reprint of 2nd ed., The Barnes Review, Washington, D.C., 2010, pp. 145-152
- Carlo Mattogno, Thomas Kues, Jürgen Graf, The “Extermination Camps” of “Aktion Reinhardt”: An Analysis and Refutation of Factitious “Evidence,” Deceptions and Flawed Argumentation of the “Holocaust Controversies” Bloggers, Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, UK, October 2013, vol. 2, pp. 1169-1332.

Literature

- Yitzak Arad, Belzec, Sobibor, Treblinka, Indiana University Press, Bloomington/Indianapolis, 1999
- Carlo Mattogno, I forni crematori di Auschwitz: Studio storico-tecnico, Effepi, Genoa, 2011
- Jean-Claude Pressac, Technique and Operation of the Gas Chambers, Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, New York, 1989
- Jean-Claude Pressac, Die Krematorien von Auschwitz, Piper, Munich, 1994
- Michael Tregenza, “Das vergessene Lager des Holocaust,” in I. Wojak, P. Hayes (eds.), “Arisierung” im Nationalsozialismus: Volksgemeinschaft, Raub und Gedächtnis, Campus, Frankfurt/Main 2000, p. 253

References for Table Columns

[1]	The Guardian , 26 February 2001; The Times , 26 February 2001; Der Spiegel , SPIEGEL ONLINE – 26 February 2001, 06:53; www.spiegel.de/politik/ausland/0,1518,119729,00.html
[2]	The Guardian , 28 April 2001.
[3]	The Independent , 19 March 2001.
[4]	Financial Times , 5 March 2001, The Times , 2 March 2001.
[5]	Current Concerns , P.O. Box 927, CH-8044 Zürich, Archive, 2 January 2002
[6]	Village Tidings , ISSN 1353 2243, c/o Ferryhouse, Bolton Abbey, Skipton, N Yorks, BD23 6HB; e-mail: vtontheweb@planetall.com, vol. 39, summer 2001 (this pyre, as pyre no. 7, was operated during the hoof-and-mouth epidemic of 1968)
[7]	Ibid.
[8]	William A. Geering, Mary-Louise Penrith, David Nyakahuma, Manual on procedures for disease eradication by stamping out... , FAO Animal Health Manual No. 12, FAO, Rome 2001; www.fao.org/docrep/004/Y0660E/Y0660E02.htm ; last accessed on Dec. 26, 2014; this is almost identical to a French government source of that time: Direction générale de l'alimentation, Sous-direction de la santé et de la protection animales, Bureaux: Santé animale, Note de service DGAL/SDSPA/SDSSA/N2003-8050; Annexe 3: L'incineration des cadavres , Paris, March 10, 2003.
[9]	Department of Health, UK, www.doh.gov.uk/fmdguidance/disposalriskassessmentannexes.pdf ; last accessed in 2005, now removed.
[9a]	Other, newer sources give similar data; see e.g. Curtis Kastner et al. , Carcass Disposal: A Comprehensive Review , National Agricultural Biosecurity Center Consortium, Carcass Disposal Working Group, March 2004, Part 1, ch. 2, p. 9; online e.g. at http://amarillo.tamu.edu/files/2011/01/draftreport.pdf ; numbers are based on S.N. Smith, R. Southall, T.L. Taylor, APHIS Carcass Disposal Manual , operational guidelines (15th Draft, 2/22/02), United States Department of Agriculture, Animal and Plant Health Inspection Service, Washington, DC, 2002; and C. McDonald, Report to Dumfries and Galloway Council: Air monitoring of carcass pyre at Whithorn . Glasgow, Glasgow Scientific Services, 2001. See also National Animal Health Emergency Management System Guidelines: Operational Guidelines: Disposal , U.S. Department of Agriculture, April 2005, p. 11-13; www.aphis.usda.gov/emergency_response/tools/on-site/htdocs/images/nahems_disposal.pdf
[10]	La Voix du Nord , 6 March 2001, “Un bûcher de 100 m de long pour 600 moutons”

Updated version of the original German paper published as “Leichenverbrennungen im Freien,” in Vierteljahreshefte für freie Geschichtsforschung 8(4) (2004), pp. 427-432; <http://www.vho.org/VffG/2004/4/Koechel427-432.html>.

Revisionism 101 | CODOH

by Ezra Macvie

Breaking the Spell. The Holocaust: Myth and Reality. Nicholas Kollerstrom. Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, UK,[\[1\]](#) 2014. 256 pp., including index.

"Breaking the Spell," by Nicholas Kollerstrom
Published with permission from Castle Hill Publishers

Dr. Nicholas Kollerstrom, recently of University College London, is a 21st-century Holocaust victim—perhaps a Holocaust survivor, in that he is alive today and, in respects other than professional, passably well. Of course, he is not a victim of National Socialist racial policies; he is a victim of ... how can I say this? Contemporary taboos concerning historical events of the 1940s in Europe? Not too catchy, that. A Jewish plot to destroy freedom of speech in preparation for their takeover of the world? Maybe a bit too catchy, that one. Something in between, then—pick your own poison.

Call it what you will, our hapless author was excommunicated from the precincts of University College London (UCL) in 2008, when he published, in (Bradley) Smith's Report an article that described Germar Rudolf's discoveries[\[2\]](#) regarding the cyanide content of brickwork in various parts of Auschwitz and other World War II-era German camps where presumed enemies of the Reich were said to have been gassed to death in numbers reaching into the millions. Before he disclosed his interest in what chemistry-based forensics revealed regarding erroneous popular history, Kollerstrom had been a member of staff of the Department of Science and Technology Studies. But UCL could not tolerate association with anyone expressing even the slightest credence for Rudolf's heretical findings, so Kollerstrom became a nonperson, so far as UCL was concerned.

That's all background, and not even terribly important except as it may have motivated his writing of this book and, of course, for that sort of reader who is interested in what might have motivated the author of a book he chooses to read.

There are other, much-better, reasons to choose to read this book, especially if you happen to be someone already persuaded of the counterfeit nature of Holocaust history and you wish to arouse some understanding—or respect, or even just tolerance—for the extremely unstylish views you might have communicated, deliberately or carelessly, to another, who it is to be hoped is a very close friend who will honor you if not with their sympathy, then at least with their confidence.

Those long and/or deeply familiar with the debunking of the Holocaust mythology that attained critical mass in 1976 with the publication of Arthur Butz's Hoax of the 20th Century might view Kollerstrom's oeuvre as a rehash—an extensive, but still partial, listing of the reasons why people should not credit what they have been told about the cruelty and genocidal intent of the National Socialists in the 1930s and 40s. That, viewed in a wide scope, would be a mistake, for several reasons.

First, it should be noted that, besides Butz's magisterial work encompassing some 502 pages, any number of other works, some of them shorter, many more-recent, have undertaken more or less the same goal: debunking the Holocaust Myth. And many of these have done a very good job of it, including even to this day Butz's original, which stands as a masterpiece.

But those who hold views such as those advanced by Butz, Stäglich, Mattogno, Faurisson, Rudolf, Dalton and a long list of other damned blasphemers from many walks of life and linguistic backgrounds, are occasionally, even often at pains, to present a foundation for their views in a form that might appeal to some particular relative, colleague, or even superior. In view of the reflexive disapprobation to which such views are subject, one is perforce challenged to proffer to each such recipient, just exactly that example of the genus that stands the best chances of reaching his or her understanding, if not credence.

And on this score, Kollerstrom's contribution to what is happily a growing genre is a most worthy contribution, deserving in its own right both a judicious savoring by the faithful and further, in many cases, of bestowal, however timorous or diffident, upon beneficiaries presumably among the "unwashed" who constitute the huge majorities of the acquaintances adorning the lives we each enjoy in our respective free and tolerant societies.

Specifics: Kollerstrom is (was?) a respected writer of books, articles, and other tracts on the intersection of science with history, having not only edited or authored numerous books on the sociology of science reaching at least as far back as Galileo, and having participated in a number of conscience-spurring enterprises such as the investigation of the 1982 sinking of the Argentine cruiser General Belgrano, resulting in the drowning of over 800 of its complement. His is no pseudonym such as many other writers (including myself) on the present subject choose to wield—he is the scientist and historian who has already produced valuable contributions not only to knowledge, but to conscience as well, and promises, in this book as in the earlier works, to produce still more, and better, especially if he is not muted by the smothering blanket of political correctness that has been thrown over him of late.

Kollerstrom writes well. His voice is never shrill, never raised by outrage, never mortally wounded, never pleading nor importuning—somehow, he contrives to maintain emotional neutrality while still inspiring the reader’s own emotions, or curiosity, or interest, or some potent combination of these. This is no suspense novel—the informed, or even intelligent, reader knows where the “plot” is headed at all times, however unfamiliar the territory ahead might be to the uninitiated. But the “road” itself is fascinating: the scenes by the side of the road no less than the vistas looming ahead. He balances digression with forward progress with the skill of the accomplished, popular, author he in fact is.

Kollerstrom effortlessly avoids the demonization that renders some works of this kind objectionable, even prosecutable in the less-liberal regimes currently astride the continent of Europe. Myths and fables are debunked in large numbers on its pages, but allegations of sinister plots—conspiracies, even—are eschewed in favor of reasoned surveys of motivations and contexts, wherein all actors may be seen for what they are: individuals in more or less desperate circumstances trying with all their might to survive an unprecedentedly savage war with as much of their families and property intact as possible. Those likely to register an adverse reaction to Kollerstrom’s equable narrative should be only those who would react the same to any analysis, no matter how innocuously couched, reaching the ineluctable conclusions that this study reaches.

Finally, the most superficial of attributes, for whatever it might be worth to this reader or that: Kollerstrom is not German, not American, but British. The text is, in fact, spelled and worded British-ly, though by no means heavily, much less affectedly, so. Likewise, the perspective on the subject is impartial—neither British, American, German, Jewish, nor Gentile. This characteristic is as much a “flavor” as anything, but as such, is one of the many ineffable factors that can decide whether an initiate to the better view of historical mendacity completes the reading, and is informed, or breaks it off, to remain unenlightened at least until the next time some intellectual benefactor might again seek a way to break through the encrusted layers of deception and mistrust under which each of us is consigned to grope toward wisdom.

Do you wish to spread the faith? If so, Kollerstrom’s reaction to his ostracism could be of great use to you. Or do you, rather, wish only to seek understanding, if not agreement, from an intellectual soul-mate, or protégé, or even adversary toward whom you feel sympathy, or even respect? Then you should admit Kollerstrom’s worthy offering to the armamentarium with which you defend your more-challenging viewpoints.

Or are you, dear reader, feeling your own self ill-grounded in this most-contested of historical battlefields, and in want of a gentle, careful introduction to the issues therein contained, without the massive rigor of some of its running mates, nor the insinuation or aspersion of some of the others?

In all these cases, I recommend Breaking the Spell. And after you’ve succeeded in using it for one of the benefits listed above, you may even continue to use it, in other copies or your own, for yet another of the purposes I’ve surmised. But if you lend your own copy to some lucky borrower or other, I hope for your sake that he returns it promptly.

After reading it. With approbation, of course.

---

Notes:

[1]	Distributed in the United States by The Barnes Review, PO Box 15877, Washington, DC 20003.
-----	--

[2] Germar Rudolf, The Rudolf Report—Expert Report on Chemical and Technical Aspects of the “Gas Chambers” of Auschwitz. Vol. 2 of Holocaust Handbooks (Washington, D.C.: The Barnes Review, 2011).

The Milgram Experiments: Cloning the Holocaust

by Jett Rucker

Born in Brooklyn in 1933 to recent Jewish immigrants from Europe, Stanley Milgram was haunted most of his life by the Holocaust he narrowly missed. By the time he had gained his Ph.D. from Harvard and joined the faculty of Yale in 1960, he conceived a way to recreate at least what he supposed was the psychological milieu of the Holocaust: following orders to kill (or torture) strangers. It was, he revealed outside his formal publications, what SS guards must have done and felt—or not felt—as they herded crowds of innocent Jews to their deaths in gas chambers.

The experiment was fiendish enough in its own right, though it never physically harmed anyone. It involved a subject, the experimenter (often Milgram himself), and an “object”—a person realistically faking reactions to things the subject did at the behest of Milgram. Milgram instructed the subject to hurt the object by pressing numbered buttons that ostensibly administered electrical shocks at voltages shown by the numbers. The top button was labelled 450, and when it was pressed, the object portrayed utter agony, to the consternation of many of the subjects, most of whom nonetheless carried out instructions to press that button as well as the others labelled with lower, less “painful” voltages.

Most of the subjects, as it turned out, obeyed Milgram’s instructions to administer apparently painful shocks to the object, even repeatedly, as Milgram reassured them that the experiment was “for science,” which it quite arguably was. The experiments and their results, which ultimately formed the subject of a book<sup>[1]</sup> by Milgram, made his name famous even to the present day. Other books<sup>[2]</sup> on the scientist and his experiments have argued for their infamy, pointing out that some of the subjects sustained lasting psychological damage from their experience in the experiments.

Public Announcement

WE WILL PAY YOU $4.00 FOR ONE HOUR OF YOUR TIME

Persons Needed for a Study of Memory

*We will pay five hundred New Haven men to help us complete a scientific study of memory and learning. The study is being done at Yale University.

*Each person who participates will be paid $4.00 (plus 50c carfare) for approximately 1 hour's time. We need you for only one hour: there are no further obligations. You may choose the time you would like to come (evenings, weekdays, or weekends).

*No special training, education, or experience is needed. We want:

Factory workers	Businessmen	Construction workers
City employees	Clerks	Salespeople
Laborers	Professional people	White-collar workers
Barbers	Telephone workers	Others

All persons must be between the ages of 20 and 50. High school and college students cannot be used.

*If you meet these qualifications, fill out the coupon below and mail it now to Professor Stanley Milgram, Department of Psychology, Yale University, New Haven. You will be notified later of the specific time and place of the study. We reserve the right to decline any application.

*You will be paid $4.00 (plus 50c carfare) as soon as you arrive at the laboratory.

---

TO:
PROF. STANLEY MILGRAM, DEPARTMENT OF PSYCHOLOGY, YALE UNIVERSITY, NEW HAVEN, CONN. I want to take part in this study of memory and learning. I am between the ages of 20 and 50. I will be paid $4.00 (plus 50c carfare) if I participate.

NAME (Please Print) . . . . .

ADDRESS . . . . .

TELEPHONE NO. . . . . Best time to call you . . . . .

AGE . . . . . OCCUPATION . . . . . SEX . . . . .

CAN YOU COME:

WEEKDAYS . . . . . EVENINGS . . . . . WEEKENDS . . . . .

Advertisement for the recruiting of the Milgram experiment subjects
By Olivier Hammam (public domaine/self-made) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Milgram's original inspiration, and the objective he initially gave for the experiments, was to gauge the willingness of people to follow "orders," or authoritative requests, to harm strangers, something he felt Germans—or those Germans involved in the famed "crimes against humanity", at any rate—surpassed other people in, including of course the random Americans he recruited to serve as the subjects of his experiment.

It didn't turn out that way, as a recent article in the Aeon webzine details. The subjects turned out, to an utterly appalling extent, to be willing, whatever their private reservations, to inflict shocks that seemed nearly lethal upon strangers whom they could clearly see and hear, merely at the instigation of a "researcher" who was conducting an experiment. The indictment that this levelled at the ostensibly random sample of subjects and the population they were drawn from was so horrific that the author of the article states that Milgram's plans for subsequently testing a group of Germans were abandoned for being "pointless."

This change of plans, which the author does not explicitly attribute to Milgram's own thinking, illustrates the inherent weakness of all human inquiry, be it into psychology, history, crimes, or even the physical sciences: inquiry is always preceded by a hypothesis (e.g., "Germans are mindless automatons who will commit any heinous crime they are ordered to."), and tests of the experiment (with Americans, the group ready to hand around Yale) either support the methodology or, as in this case, leave hardly any room for Germans to be worse than the group on whom the methodology was test-run.

Does this make it pointless to go ahead and test the Germans? It does if you stick to the original hypothesis (Germans are worse than others). But if you have the imagination—and the disposition—to change the hypothesis to something like, "Germans are better—at least, better than the Americans so far tested—at resisting immoral orders," a very good point remains for going on with the rest of the plan. Such seems not have been the disposition of the "scientist" involved, nor of the author of the article, who mentions his own descent from Jews in the article. Perhaps the proposition would even encounter difficulty in getting funded—funders prefer to finance inquiries that promise to yield conclusions pleasing to the funders.

Oddly, my inquiry into the long and vigorous life of what I'll dub the Milgram Industry (Milgram himself died in 1984) did not turn up any study in which different groups were compared for their susceptibility to following criminal orders, even though the Aeon article mentions that Milgram-type experiments were conducted in many places, including "West Germany."

Milgram was inspired in designing his namesake experiments by his notions of what the Holocaust entailed—people (Germans) consciously administering pain and death to presumably innocent strangers (Jews and others, who in fact outnumbered the Jews). Of course, in wars such as the one in which the worst parts of the Holocaust occurred, people are consciously administering pain, death, and destruction to strangers who have given no previous offense, though from the cockpit of a bomber twenty thousand feet above "the target," interaction with the victims is absent by quite a distance. And in World War II, the Germans manifestly failed to gain first place in the deadly competition of killing and maiming "the enemy."

People out to prove something gruesome about the Holocaust, or innately evil about the Germans often run into a buzz-saw, and they always contrive exquisite machinations for recovering from the misadventure, even as Milgram himself seems to have papered over and otherwise misrepresented forms of the experiments he conducted that forcefully contradicted the initial, sensational results with which he managed to propel himself to fame[3]. An example of this was Jan Karski, who in 1943 was sent to the Belzec "extermination camp" only to discover, and report to his superiors, that he found no evidence of killing there, but only of transfer of the inmates to other, unknown destinations. That fiasco was memorably chronicled by Friedrich Jansson in the Winter 2014 issue of Inconvenient History.

Milgram's initial goal of delineating the inherent bestiality of Germans was ultimately derailed, but the silver lining on that cloud far outshone any darkness cast by the failure of his long-forgotten thesis. How much better to show the world so graphically that we're all Nazis! At the present juncture, critical studies of Milgram's actual methods, along with evidence of portions of his findings that he suppressed or misrepresented, are casting into doubt his conclusions as to what we all (inextricably including those Nazis, I should hope) really are like.

But also at this juncture, there is growing reason to question not just what we (and you-know-who) are all really like, but as well, Milgram's grotesque misapprehension of just what the National Socialists really did to their “victims,” and why, and even how. In keeping with the dominant mythology, Milgram envisioned that, at the very least, the implementers of the Final Solution were soulless zombies whose very constitutions prevented them from having the faintest glimmer of empathy for their prey.

But between the Germans’ amply documented preference to remove Jews from their midst and to other places, and the eventual desperate reversal of that impulse that caused the Germans to bring thousands of Jews back into Germany as the war turned against them, Milgram’s original phantasmagoria of SS guards banally inflicting genocidal pain and death upon an entire race begins to fade away into the mists that enshroud B-grade horror movies. It’s not, of course, that no such thing ever did happen—it most certainly did.

It is, rather, that it is not what happened. Milgram seems to have demonstrated precious little interest in these truths, which in any case were neither known nor suspected in the circles in which he travelled. So Milgram’s experiments, their incredible results, their unexpected conclusions, and the manipulations performed by Milgram in publicizing them, all were based on a myth.

Not just a myth about what Germans are like, but beneath that one, still another, about what they did.

---

Notes:

[1]	Stanley Milgram, Obedience to Authority: An Experimental View (New York: Harpercollins, 1974).
[2]	Thomas Blass, The Man Who Shocked the World: The Life and Legacy of Stanley Milgram ( New York: Basic Books, 2004).
[3]	One good analysis is by Gina Perry. Behind the Shock Machine: The Untold Story behind the Notorious Milgram Psychology Experiments . The New Press, New York, 2012.

A Tale of Intellectual Repression and its Humiliating Defeat

by Nigel Jackson

The Zhivago Affair by Peter Finn and Petra Couvée, Harvill Secker, London 2014

Boris Pasternak's novel Doctor Zhivago was published in 1957, my last year at secondary school, and led to the award for its author of the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1958, my first year at university. David Lean's film of the novel, starring Omar Sharif and Julie Christie (among others), was released in 1965, my second year of full employment after the completion of my second degree. So I am, as it were, of the "Zhivago generation," although I have to confess that it was the film, with its glorious presentation of the heroine, Lara, together with its inspired musical theme composed by Maurice Jarré, that first aroused my intense interest in the story. By then I had already determined that poetry was to be my vocation, as it has been ever since, so that identification and empathy with the tale's hero was inevitable. In 1968 Quadrant published my poem "Meeting at Varykino", an elegy for both Yury Zhivago and Pasha Antipov based on the latter's tragic suicide.<sup>1</sup> In 1975 my second book of poetry, The Hare and the Rowan,<sup>2</sup> appeared with the long title poem celebrating the novel's scintillating love story, a Russian equivalent in intensity and beauty to that in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet.

As I consider this new literary history of the advent and political effect of Doctor Zhivago, I wonder how many of today's twenty-year-olds have any interest in the novel at all. How many of them have even heard of it? Will it become a permanent classic like the Verona drama or gradually fade into the oblivion of books that have passed their time?

For Doctor Zhivago and its author, a brilliant poet with the uncanny ability to fashion words into startlingly fresh and original combinations (as did, for example, Gerard Manley Hopkins and Dylan Thomas), certainly had their time; and The Zhivago Affair is all about that.

The Nazi tyranny had been crushed in thirteen years, but the Soviet equivalent was horrifyingly present and powerful after four decades. The "Cold War" between the communist nations and the "free West" was in full swing; and, thanks partly to the recent publication of George Orwell's grim nightmare of totalitarianism, Nineteen Eighty-four, there was widespread fear that the Bolshevik tyranny might spread and engulf us all. Into that context of intense international conflict, struggle and fear, Pasternak dropped his literary bombshell – deliberately and determinedly, as The Zhivago Affair shows.

II

The essential significance of the novel is well brought out during this comprehensive narration by Finn and Couvée. "Its power lay", the authors tell us, "in its individual spirit, Pasternak's wish to find some communion with the earth, some truth in life, some love.....Doctor Zhivago stood as a rebuke to the short history of the Soviet state..... There was... a disdain for the 'deadening and merciless' ideology that animated so many of his contemporaries." Or, as it was put by John Maury, the US Central Intelligence

Agency's Soviet Russia Division chief, "Pasternak's humanistic message – that every person is entitled to a private life and deserves respect as a human being, irrespective of the extent of his political loyalty or contribution to the state – poses a fundamental challenge to the Soviet ethic of sacrifice of the individual to the Communist system.... the heresy which Doctor Zhivago preaches – political passivity – is fundamental. Pasternak suggests that the small unimportant people who remain passive to the regime's demands for active participation and emotional involvement in official campaigns are superior to the political "activists" favored by the system. Further, he dares hint that society might function better without these fanatics." The CIA chief also wrote that "the basic theme of the book itself [is] – a cry for the freedom and dignity of the individual – but also the plight of the individual in the communist society. The whole Pasternak affair is indeed a tragic but classic example of the system of thought control which the Party has always used to maintain its position of power over the intellectual. Like jamming, censorship and the Party's ideological decrees for writers and artists, the banning of this book is another example of the means which the regime must use to control the Soviet mind. It is a reflection of the... intellectual barbarity, and the cultural sterility which are features of the closed society."

Attacks made on the novel by the Soviet Government and by many of its writers and intellectuals confirm this spiritual significance from the other side. For example, the report of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union's culture department asserted that it was "a hostile attack on the October Revolution and a malicious libel of the Bolshevik revolutionaries by an author who was... a 'bourgeois individualist'." And, in rejecting the novel for publication, the editorial board of the literary journal Novy Mir stated: "The spirit of your novel is one of non-acceptance of the socialist revolution. The general tenor... is that the October Revolution, the Civil War and the social transformation involved did not give the people anything but suffering, and destroyed the Russian intelligentsia, either physically or morally." The board complained about Yury Zhivago's "hypertrophied individualism", a vice they also saw, no doubt, in the author himself. Historian Christopher Barnes pointed out years later that the authors either missed or did not articulate the novel's "most heretical insinuation: by artistically conflating the Stalinist period with early revolutionary history, Pasternak implied... that the tyranny of the last twenty-five years was a direct outcome of Bolshevism." For Pasternak, Stalinism and the purges were... a natural outgrowth of the system created by Lenin.

Publicity photo of Omar Sharif for film Dr. Zhivago.

Source: By MGM (eBay) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Ian Cummins, reviewing The Zhivago Affair for The Age in Melbourne on 26th July 2014, perceptively fixed on the novel's "skepticism about the alleged achievements of the Bolshevik revolution and indeed about the possibility of ideologically based political action improving the human condition." He provided an effective supporting quotation from Yury Zhivago within the novel itself: "Revolutions are made by fanatical men of action with one-track minds, men who are narrow-minded to the point of genius. They overturn the old order in a few hours or days... But for decades thereafter, for centuries, the spirit of narrowness which led to the upheaval is worshipped as holy."

Doctor Zhivago, as its author knew when he passed the manuscript of the novel to the West, had taken the communist totalitarian tyranny on head-on in defense of the human spirit.

“A weapon in the ideological battles between East and West – this... is part of Doctor Zhivago’s extraordinary life.” Finn and Couvée devote much of their book to a carefully researched and comprehensive account of this weapon, as it was used by the free world (led by the USA) and as the Soviet Government struggled to destroy or at least blunt it. Robert Chandler, in a review of The Zhivago Affair for The Spectator which was republished in The Australian on 26th-27th July, noted that “the main part of this book is a history, based on original research, of Pasternak’s last years and the publication of Doctor Zhivago.” He commented: “This will prove a valuable resource for scholars, though few more general readers will want to know the story in such detail.” That last arrow finds its mark: the narrative of the ideological struggle over the novel does at times become tedious, if not otiose. On the other hand, the exposé of CIA machinations is a usefully sobering reminder of how big-power politics behind the scenes can play an influential role in the cultural life of many nations. The intellectual commissars of the USSR were not the only manipulators in this drama.

It is also good to be reminded of the horrible censorship that exists under tyrannies, especially when one lives in an Australia that has been so easily duped in the last three years into maintaining repressive legislation against public discussion of sensitive controversies involving race and ethnicity. For example, we read that, after Pasternak had been awarded the Nobel Prize, Nikolai Mikhailov, Soviet minister for culture, announced that “it would be up to the writers’ union to decide if Pasternak would be allowed to receive the prize.” As though any such union should have such power over any artist or intellectual! And what a horrible pressure such a situation exerted on other writers, as an orgy of official damnation of the writer was rapidly organized: “The literary community was now ‘gripped by the sickening, clammy feeling of dread’ and it led to a near-frenzy of condemnations. These inquisitorial feelings were an almost ritualistic part of the Soviet literary system that stretched back to Stalin. Error was followed by collective attack. The fallen writer was expected to respond with contrition and self-criticism before being welcomed back in the fold.... The scale of the rhetorical assault and the global attention it drew was unprecedented.”

Fallacious terminology was devised, such as the phrase “internal emigrant,” a slander of Pasternak indeed, in view of his clearly expressed and completely sincere deep and heartfelt love for Russia. Large numbers of the Soviet public were taken in by the official onslaught of disapproval. Finn and Couvée note that historian Denis Kozlov showed how “the revolution remained central to these people’s consciousness and socio-ethical order, the sacred foundation of a mental universe; and their reaction to the Pasternak affair was above all a defence against any attempt, real or imaginary, to undermine this intellectual cornerstone of their existence.” Accounts such as this confirm the importance of political action to maintain and extend political freedom within nations, arduous and sometimes disappointing as such endeavors may be.

IV

The Zhivago Affair contains many insights into the tragedies and ironies of the Pasternak affair. Here the book undoubtedly carries great interest for the general reader. For example, we learn that the love triangle of Yury, Tonya and Lara in the novel mirrors exactly the love triangle of Pasternak, his wife Zinaida and his mistress Olga Ivinskaya; and in both cases, those of Yury and of his creator, there was an inability to choose between “two families” – an inability that Pasternak left as a jarring discord in the novel itself, which ultimately fails to answer the question of whether or not Yury and Lara were right to become lovers.

Two striking tragedies Couvée and Finn recount concern Olga and Pasternak’s first publisher, Giangiacomo Feltrinelli. Olga twice conceived by Pasternak, but lost one child by miscarriage (probably due to Soviet brutality towards her) and the other in a stillbirth. It is sad for any lover of the novel to think that this was the fate of “Lara.” As for Feltrinelli, who also deserves to be remembered and admired for his publishing of Giuseppe di Lampedusa’s The Leopard, it is sorrowful to read of his moral confusion as he was caught between traditional ethics and socialist ideology, his gradual loss of personal bearings and his sordid death: “On March 15th, 1972, the body of a man was found under a high-voltage electricity pylon in a suburb of Milan..... He was killed when the bomb he and some co-conspirators planned to use to cause a power cut went off prematurely.” It is a pity that Feltrinelli had failed to absorb the parallel wisdom in the two great novels he gave to the world – the wisdom to accept fate without illusion and without negative responses.

Doctor Zhivago was amazingly prophetic in certain ways. For example, just as Lara wept over Yury’s confined body, so did Olga weep over that of Pasternak. The account of the funeral in The Zhivago Affair echoes in several ways that of Yury’s funeral in the novel. And just as Lara was arrested after her affair with Yury and sent to a prison camp in the Gulag, so Olga was arrested after Pasternak’s death and spent several years in forced labor.

It is good, too, to read of the long-term fate of Pasternak’s first wife, Yevgenia Lurye, who also attended his burial. Her son by Pasternak, Yevgeny, was able, finally, to accept on behalf of his father the Nobel Prize in Sweden in the thirtieth year after Pasternak’s death. Yevgenia did not live to see that; but one feels that it was a providential and fitting reward for one who said once, long after he had left her, that she had never stopped loving him. (Pasternak’s second son, Leonid, by Zinaida, had already died well before 1989.)

The Zhivago Affair provides many insights into the chameleon-like character of the poet-author himself. One feels that the head of the Soviet Writers’ Union, Alexander Fadayeve, was not wrong to comment on Pasternak’s quality of “aloofness”, which he saw as a blemish, but others might praise. By contrast, Feltrinelli’s assessment (“a voice of a man alien to all political activity” which “transcends all ideological dogmatism”) needs qualification. Pasternak, in real life and in his novel, could express dogmatisms of his own; and the novel itself, as well as the activities of its protagonist, are both intensely political, although their politics is subtler and more in accord with truth than that of their adversaries. Doctor Zhivago contains several highly dubious assertions about the life and role of Jesus and his place in history. It also adopts an assimilative approach to the problem of being a Jew (Pasternak himself was Jewish) which not unnaturally drew the ire of David Ben-Gurion and others.

However, Pasternak was authentically and profoundly religious in his own way. In a letter to Dmitri Polikarpov, head of the Central Committee’s culture department, he defiantly asserted that “strength comes from on high.” He felt at home within the Russian Orthodox tradition, which he saw as inextricably intertwined with Russia’s soul and the “lost life” of the Moscow intelligentsia among which he had grown up before 1917. His style as a poet is widely recognized as being that of a difficult genius. Ernest Simmons of Columbia University is quoted as follows: “Pasternak’s fresh, innovative, difficult style [is] notable for its extraordinary imagery, elliptical language and associative method. Feeling and thought are wonderfully blended in his verse that reveals a passionately intense but always personal vision of life.” Victor Frank is reported as stating that the novel “is written by a man who has preserved and deepened his freedom – freedom from all external restraints and all internal inhibitions.” And Harvard professor Harry Levin commented that “the most extraordinary fact about his career is that, under heavy pressures forcing writers to turn their words into ideological propaganda, he has firmly adhered to those aesthetic values which his writing so richly exemplifies. He has thus set an example of artistic integrity.”

Finn and Couvée rightly pay tribute to Pasternak’s bravery: “In a totalitarian society he had long displayed an unusual fearlessness – visiting and giving money to the relatives of people who had been sent to the Gulag when the fear of taint scared so many others away; intervening with the authorities to ask for mercy for those accused of political crimes; and refusing to sign drummed up petitions demanding executions for named enemies of the state. He recoiled from the group-think of many of his fellow writers..... he was heckled for asserting [in a meeting] that writers should not be given orders.”

Yet The Zhivago Affair admits, correctly, that, just as there are significant weaknesses in Doctor Zhivago, as well as many great strengths, so Pasternak’s personal record of witness contains quite a few ethical smudges and inconsistencies.

Our authors also devote several remarks to the curious attitude that Stalin possessed towards Pasternak, just as he also apparently did to that other courageous writer-rebel, Mikhail Bulgakov. It seems that in each case the despot was psychologically drawn to a writer whom he felt to have some sacrosanct nature which should not be violated. Perhaps even tyrants are susceptible to the promptings of their “guardian angels” in such circumstances.

All in all, Finn and Couvée appear to write with an ideology-free sense of balance and fair play. Personally, I would take issue with their unqualified reference to “the poisonous anti-Communist crusade of Senator Joseph McCarthy” and would query their easy acceptance of the CIA’s policy of financing the non-Communist left rather than the right during the Cold War. There may have been less admirable reasons for that policy than the authors realize. But these are minor complaints.

At one stage in the Pasternak drama his US publisher Kurt Wolff told him: “You have moved beyond the history of literature into the history of mankind.” This book will help defend that place of honor, and one hopes that it will contribute to a new generation not forgetting the importance of Pasternak and the beauty and spiritual power of his novel.

There is scant reference to the next great Russian novelist to both win a Nobel Prize for Literature and suffer persecution by the Soviet government – Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn. At one point Finn and Couvée report that “in Ryazan, a schoolteacher [Solzhenitsyn]... ‘writhed with shame for him’ [Pasternak] – that he would ‘demean himself by pleading with the government.’” At the present time Solzhenitsyn seems himself to be a “writer under tribulation,” as is indicated by the extraordinary failure of those holding the copyright to publish in English the last two volumes of his chief work, The Red Wheel and his study of Russian-Jewish relations (including during the Russian Revolution), Two Hundred Years of Living Together. It seems that some other sinister political power may be engaged in an act of cultural repression; and perhaps Finn and Couvée might turn their attention in another book to this.

---

Notes:

1	Quadrant is Australia’s premier magazine of ideas for the Center-Right or liberal-conservative spectrum.
2	The Hawthorn Press, Melbourne.

Deutschland unter Allem: Lifting the Conquerors' Heels from Germany

by Ezra Macvie

The reason why I have not repeated the oft-told tale of Nazi crimes against humanity is that it is already familiar to every American. It is our own record which is not known, and it seems high time that the victors began to search their own consciences.

Freda Uteley, The High Cost of Vengeance, p. 303.

In rugby, a “scrum” is a play in which eight players from each side pack themselves together as tightly as possible, and then furiously tussle with each other for the ball when it is tossed into their midst. The treatment of the ball may be compared grimly with that received by Germany at the end of World War II when the four Allied powers marched into the prostrate, bleeding belligerent’s heartland and proceeded to tear its pitiable remains into yet-smaller pieces in an orgy of revenge, self-pride, and the need to make the heinous deeds that had brought them their victory seem justified. Germany, of course, was contended for not by two, but four armies, each with its own agenda inimical to Germany’s future.

Four years after the end of armed conflict, this vicious, violent scrum was still well afoot, and Freda Uteley paid a long and extensive visit to the suffering land on commission from Reader’s Digest magazine. The book here reviewed<sup>1</sup> is the product of that penetrating inquiry, conducted by a 50-year-old ex-communist woman of English birth who by that time had lived in England, the Soviet Union, China, Japan and the United States and had published at least six extensive studies of nations, their political/economic systems and their wars, including the best-selling Japan’s Feet of Clay (1937). The development of her sympathies and career resembled that of her contemporaneous countryman George Orwell, except that she never produced a work of fiction. Like Orwell, she was a devoted socialist, but went on to embrace communism, moving to the Soviet Union and marrying a Russian. Also like Orwell, she developed a profound enmity for totalitarianism and appreciated the vulnerabilities of centrally planned economies to hijacking by dictatorial regimes.

Freda Utley 1943

Source: Wikipedia.org. Work is in the Public Domain.

The research and writing of this book occurred at what in retrospect may be seen as the nadir of Germany's fortunes in the entire period from the National Socialist takeover in 1933 to the present day. The exact point in time at which her work went to press was after the currency reforms and rollback of economic regulations (price controls, rationing) that had immiserated Germany since 1936, developments that today are hailed as the genesis of the Wirtschaftswunder that brought (West) Germany roaring back into the family of nations in the 1950s.

Utley completely failed in this book to anticipate Germany's phenomenal resurrection, and one is tempted to lay this "failing" to Utley's lingering devotion to her socialist ideals, but such a conclusion is dubious on several scores. To begin with, the famous economic initiatives of Ludwig Erhard and Wilhelm Röpke were viewed with serious misgivings by professional economists of all stripes, not just socialists, and it is to be questioned whether Erhard and Röpke themselves were able inwardly to muster quite all the confidence in the outcome that their political challenges required them to manifest outwardly. For another, there was good reason to doubt that the occupying Allies would permit the program to proceed, or even to maintain the changes it had carried out in the brief period between their introduction and the time Utley took her dispiriting snapshot. Finally, it is to be noted that the Erhard/Röpke disjuncture indeed exacted severe costs at its inception, such as the decimation of the value of such savings as at least some Germans had been able to eke out through the tumultuous times that preceded the break. Utley's noting these problems without expressing any optimism for their ultimate effect might indeed have been her tactic to avoid saying anything that could possibly weaken the impetus for changes whose potential benefits she might privately have entertained very high hopes for.

There is no question that Utley, without wishing any ill upon the three Allies of the West, wished the best for chastened Germany, as she had in fact done resolutely at least since 1938, when she supported the Munich Agreement that divided up Czechoslovakia among Germany, Poland and Hungary. After the European war began, she allied herself with the America First movement that aimed at keeping the United States out of the war. And after Germany defeated France in 1940, she advocated a peace treaty between the United Kingdom and Germany. But Utley maintained no illusions about the evils inherent in the National Socialist regime, often comparing them, before the war and after, with those of the communist giant to the east. She did maintain an abiding respect for the prowess of the German war machine, but her primary motivation in assuming the positions she assumed was her intimate familiarity with the limitless propensity for death and destruction inherent in the Soviet regime, a judgment that was vindicated in countless horrific ways in the decades following the war. She regarded Germany, after the war as before, as the West's bulwark against communism, and the fear that communism might engulf Germany and turn its vast potential to its own advantage permeates virtually every paragraph of her profoundly insightful and humane analysis.

The author points an accusing finger at all four of the Allies occupying Germany at the time of her research, but details concerning the Soviet quarter of the action are very slight for at least three reasons: (a) the Soviet Zone of occupation was even by 1948 increasingly separate from the three western zones, in two of which the occupiers spoke English, the language Utley herself worked in (the book was later translated into German and published in Germany); (b) she likely regarded the Soviet regime as incorrigible of its nature, a conclusion she was able to make with much confidence; and (c) she could not risk traveling in the Soviet Zone, as her husband already by that time had been consigned to the GULAG, and she had good reason to expect the same fate for herself if she should ever set foot in a communist jurisdiction.

Utley acknowledges at a few points in her narrative where this or that stricture of Occupation policy appeared to have been relaxed somewhat, or to be about to be relaxed, even as she at numerous points details ongoing atrocities that she very reasonably feared would drive Germany, however reluctantly, into the arms of the Soviet occupier if only to escape the interminable rapacity of the western Allies. In hindsight, it might be surmised that The High Cost of Vengeance had at least some of the effect on western opinion and policy that it aimed at; certainly its effect on any attentive, reasonable reader is compelling in that and only that direction. Knowing this will forever be impossible, while it is known that the book enjoyed healthy sales and critical acclaim from at least some quarters.

At the same time, Utley and her appeal for justice for the defeated Germans attracted considerable criticism from quarters occupied by those favoring eternal suppression of Germany and Germans. And Vengeance may claim pride of place on a list that also contains the name of another English Germanophile, David Irving: Deborah Lipstadt's all-encompassing Enemies List of "Holocaust Deniers," this on account of her statement that the Allies' war crimes greatly eclipsed the magnitude of all war crimes committed by the National Socialists.<sup>2</sup> In the meantime, the entire book contains not one word of denial or justification for the crimes, real and alleged, of which the National Socialists were accused, as the quotation at the beginning of this review illustrates. This failure of denial, or of revision in any case, might also be counted among the book's failings, except for the facts that by 1948, World War II revisionism had not even begun, and that the matter was in any case altogether outside the book's brief. So Utley wisely accepted all accusations, and pressed her argument forward with quite undiminished force. She did, however, excoriate both the Nuremberg Tribunal and other trials, such as those at Dachau, conducted by the Allies as utterly unjudicial paroxysms of revenge and condemnation visited without discrimination upon the innocent as well as the guilty.

The cruel and vicious acts of each of the occupying powers must have seared the consciences of citizens of those powers as they read line after line, page after page, and chapter after chapter of injustice and inhumanity being committed in their names. The exposé, meticulously sourced and confirmed at each outrageous step, detailed the nefarious purposes and tendencies animating the occupying forces, with emphasis, as noted, on those of the three Western powers in which Utley reposed some hope of redemption, if only on the score of preventing Germany from falling into the orbit of the communist behemoth that they all feared.

France as an occupying power was seen primarily as territorially vengeful. Understandably, the French were inspired by revenge engendered by the National Socialists' invasion and occupation of most of France that began in 1940. Although on nothing like the scale of the Soviet Union's depredations to Germany's east, France undertook various territorial initiatives against formerly German territory, including the Saarland, which remained an "autonomous region" until 1957, and much of Germany's industrial heartland of the Ruhr. France undertook a plebiscite in the Saarland in which dire consequences for the voters were threatened if they did not vote to merge with France; they called France's bluff and voted in a landslide against the merger nonetheless.

Britain as an occupying power was motivated primarily by commercial and industrial rivalry with Germany that went back long before both of the world wars. British dismantlings and destruction of already-shattered German industrial capabilities were wanton and devastating, but as history has demonstrated, they ultimately failed either to greatly hamper Germany's eventual development or much to bolster their own industrial prowess.

The US forces in Germany committed their offenses under the urge for revenge for Germany's anti-Jewish policies during and prior to the war. The deliberately ruinous details of the Morgenthau Plan were well-known both to Utley and to the United States administration, if not its public, and had by late 1948 been extensively repudiated and officially discontinued. But Utley noted innumerable instances of this inhuman plan's remaining in near-full force through the agency of second- and third-tier officials who were German Jews who had emigrated to America before the war and had now returned in the uniform of the conqueror to exact revenge on their people's erstwhile malefactors. Nothing short of an outright purge could cure this disease afflicting the body of the occupying administration, and nothing of the sort seemed in prospect at the time of Utley's investigation.

Freda Utley's wisdom and insight as presented in The High Cost of Vengeance have been vindicated a thousandfold in the half-century since her shocking tale was published. A 2013 poll conducted by the BBC found Germany the most-admired country in the world—quite a contrast from the reviled outcast from western civilization depicted by her opponents in the last world war, and still, as the Folks Who Brought You the Holocaust.

None could be happier, I'm sure, that her dire fears ultimately went unrealized than Freda Utley herself.

---

Notes:

1	The book is available for free download in .pdf form at http://vho.org/dl/ENG/thcov.pdf
---	---

2 “Only one thing is certain: Hitler’s barbaric liquidation of the Jews has been outmatched by the liquidation of Germans by the “democratic, peace-loving” powers of the United Nations.” p. 202.

Holocaust Hate Speech | CODOH

by Richard A. Widmann

But what was strange was that although Goldstein was hated and despised by everybody, although every day, and a thousand times a day, on platforms, on the telescreen, in newspapers, in books, his theories were refuted, smashed, ridiculed, held up to the general gaze for the pitiful rubbish that they were—in spite of all this, his influence never seemed to grow less.

George Orwell, 1984

Heinrich Heine, a Nineteenth-Century German poet and essayist, is most remembered for his comment, “Where books are burned, in the end people will be burned too.” Today his quote is prominently displayed in the Yad Vashem Holocaust museum in Jerusalem as well as in the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (USHMM).<sup>[1]</sup> In its contemporary context, Heine’s quote is understood to mean that an ideology that refuses to tolerate minority opinion will ultimately become a mortal threat to minorities themselves. It is often associated with incidents in Germany during National Socialist rule and is typically viewed as a prophetic warning.

In Twenty-First-Century America, it seems quite misguided to be overly concerned about Nazi book burnings or Nazi human burnings for that matter. Heine, who died in 1856, was not actually concerned about Nazis but rather the immolation of ideas – of diversity of thought. Today actual book burnings are mostly symbolic. In centuries past, the burning of a book might indeed literally “holocaust” an idea, although all copies of certain books most definitely have been confiscated and macerated (pulped) in—that’s right—Germany. In the post-World War-II era, when books can easily and affordably be printed and reprinted, book burnings and censorship rarely have the impact desired.<sup>[2]</sup> Today, thanks to the Internet, traditional book burnings are generally superfluous.

Contemporary censors need not strike a match, or carry the flamethrowers of Bradbury’s Fahrenheit 451.<sup>[3]</sup> The removal from sale from on-line booksellers accomplishes the nefarious deed without the mess and air pollution of a hastily constructed bonfire. In fact, book burnings are no longer conducted in town squares but rather through well-orchestrated campaigns to remove undesirable titles from the virtual shelves of on-line booksellers, along with such tactics as denying direct sellers credit-card facilities for the use of their customers.<sup>[4]</sup>

Recent campaigns to throttle the free exchange of ideas come only months after the outrage expressed by hundreds of thousands following the 7 January 2015 massacre at the offices of the French leftist newspaper Charlie Hebdo. More than 40 world leaders showed up to demonstrate their support presumably for free speech and the free exchange of ideas. Thousands created signs emblazoned with the slogan “Je suis Charlie” (“I am Charlie”).<sup>[5]</sup> However, many of the leaders who participated in the march were leaders of countries that openly prosecute authors whose ideas are inconvenient for those in power. Specifically the so-called “denial,” or revision, of the history of the Holocaust is illegal in 14 European nations including France and Germany.<sup>[6]</sup>

Offices of the Institute for Historical Review in Torrance, California following the hateful arson attack on July 4, 1984.

Source: <http://ihr.org/books/ztn.html>

While German Prime Minister Angela Merkel marched for Charlie Hebdo it is important to recall that on 15 June 1995 a German judge ruled that all copies of the book Grundlagen zur Zeitgeschichte (Foundations of Modern History) be burned. In the runup to this order, a raid was conducted against the German publisher of this title and all copies were confiscated by the authorities. The book's editor, a German physicist named Germar Rudolf, was ordered to be arrested.<sup>[7]</sup> At the time, Grundlagen was the most up-to-date academic book dealing with forensic evidence of the murder of Jews by the National Socialist regime.

Years earlier a terror campaign resulted in a devastating arson attack against the offices of the Institute of Historical Review. Damage from this firebombing, which consumed many thousands of books, was estimated at $400,000. Two days after the attack, then-leader of the Jewish Defense League, Irv Rubin, showed up at the site and declared that he “wholeheartedly applauds the recent devastation.”<sup>[8]</sup>

The hate against Holocaust revisionists is spread not only through official governmental legislation and violent campaigns of terror, but is imbedded in the language of recondite college professors. In her Denying the Holocaust, Deborah Lipstadt used a language of hate when describing Holocaust revisionists, “Today the bacillus carried by these rats threatens to ‘kill’ those who already died at the hands of the Nazis for a second time by destroying the world’s memory of them.”<sup>[9]</sup>

Robert Faurisson hospitalized following a hateful attack on September 16, 1989. A group calling itself "The Sons of the Memory of the Jews" claimed responsibility for the savage assault.

Source: <http://codoh.com/library/document/2662/>

Hatred often does result in violence. In France, where so many were quick to declare Je suis Charlie, Europe's most prominent Holocaust revisionist scholar, Professor Robert Faurisson, sustained no less than ten physical assaults between 1978 and 1993. During one attack in 1989, assailants sprayed a stinging gas into his face temporarily blinding him. Three men then pummeled him to the ground where they repeatedly kicked him in the face and chest. At the time, Faurisson was 60 years old. The crime was ultimately attributed to "young Jewish activists from Paris."<sup>[10]</sup> Dr. Faurisson, for reasons that his opponents are eager to misrepresent, persists in his efforts to improve historical understanding.

There certainly is hate speech regarding the Holocaust circulating today. The folks at the tax-funded USHMM (United States Holocaust Memorial Museum) would have you believe that revisionists (or "deniers" as they like to defame them) are the exponents of such sentiments. But the revisionists make their case in books and in articles. Their arguments don't call for the elimination of any people, nor of books. Neither are the revisionists in positions of authority from which they could prosecute—or persecute—even those who charge quite the most-unbelievable crimes against the German people.

The language of hate directed against those who question even the smallest of details regarding the Holocaust should be a warning to all—and it is. In Orwell's prophetic 1984, the totalitarian government of Big Brother broadcast "2-Minute Hates" in which the general masses are incited to indulge in paroxysms of hatred of its purported enemies. Orwell describes the effect,

A hideous ecstasy of fear and vindictiveness, a desire to kill, to torture, to smash faces in with a sledge hammer, seemed to flow through the whole group of people like an electric current, turning one even against one's will into a grimacing, screaming lunatic.[\[11\]](#)

What Holocaust revisionists really look like.

Speakers from the Twelfth IHR Conference (1994). From left to right. Robert Faurisson, John Ball, Russ Granata, Carlo Mattogno, Ernst Zündel, Friedrich Berg, Greg Raven, David Cole, Robert Countess, Tom Marcellus, Mark Weber, David Irving, and Jürgen Graf.

Source: The Journal of Historical Review, Vol. 14, No. 6, Nov/Dec 1994.

A quick look at the entry for “Holocaust Denial” on the popular on-line encyclopedia Wikipedia reveals the prominent placement of a photo of several Ku Klux Klansmen with placards denouncing the Holocaust. The simplistic messages include, “There was no Jewish Holocaust” and “Holocaust Gigantic Zionist Hoax.” While the origin and the context of the photo are uncertain, its purpose on this page is clear – Holocaust deniers are meant to be viewed as members of extremist hate groups.[\[12\]](#) For balance, one might expect to see a photo of speakers at a revisionist conference. But there is none. The photo of the Klansmen is not displayed to accurately convey any truth, but rather to stir hatred.

Images such as this and many others employed by supporters of the regnant wartime propaganda Holocaust meme have a very emotional effect. They are used to stir people into a frenzy. Soon such indiscriminate readers ask questions like, “How can such ideas be allowed to be sold?” “How can the Holocaust be debated?” “Why are deniers not in prison?” “Why aren’t their offices burned?” “Why are they not beaten?” “Why, like the disease-bearing rats they are, are they not exterminated?” Such is the state of Holocaust hate speech today.

The ultimate irony is that Orwell’s “grimacing screaming lunatics” come from the ranks of those who profess to uphold the “official” Holocaust story. If toleration is indeed the moral of the story, these champions of orthodoxy either fail to comprehend it, or they openly choose to deny it.

---

Notes:

[1]	Online: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Heinrich_Heine
[2]	Banned books have become an industry in and of themselves. In the United States, the week of September 27th is celebrated as "Banned Books Week." Several organizations and book stores participate and urge people and especially students to read banned books. For for example: http://www.ala.org/bbooks/bannedbooksweek
[3]	Ray Bradbury's 1953 dystopian novel depicted a future world in which firemen were responsible for burning outlawed books.
[4]	Caitlin Dewey, "Amazon, PayPal and Spotify inadvertently fund white supremacists. Here's how." The Washington Post , 17 March 2015. Online: http://www.washingtonpost.com/news/the-intersect/wp/2015/03/17/amazon-paypal-and-spotify-inadvertently-fund-white-supremacists-heres-how/
[5]	Online: http://www.slate.com/blogs/the_slatest/2015/01/11/je_suis_charlie_more_than_40_world_leaders_head_up_massive_paris_march.html
[6]	Online: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Laws_against_Holocaust_denial
[7]	Richard Widmann, "Problems Warned about in Fahrenheit 451 Threaten Today's World," in Readings on Fahrenheit 451 (San Diego: Greenhaven Press, 2000), p .153. Grundlagen Zur Zeitgeschichte is published in English translation under the title Dissecting the Holocaust .
[8]	Mark Weber, The Zionist Terror Network (Newport Beach, Institute for Historical Review, 1993), pp. 10-11.
[9]	Deborah Lipstadt, Denying the Holocaust (New York, Plume, 1994), p. xvii.
[10]	Robert Faurisson, "Jewish Militants: Fifteen Years, and More, of Terrorism in France." Online: http://codoh.com/library/document/2662/
[11]	George Orwell, Nineteen Eighty-Four (New York, Harcourt , Brace and Company, 1949), p. 15-16.
[12]	Over the course of the past 30 years I have met most of the leading figures in Holocaust revisionism. None of these people was in any way affiliated with the Ku Klux Klan. It would arguably be fairer to post a photo of the Klan under the Wikipedia entry for "Democratic Party" or "Republican Party."

How Postwar German Authorities Orchestrated Witness Statements in Nazi Crime Cases

by Germar Rudolf

One of the most important standards of justice when interviewing or interrogating witnesses in a criminal case is not to ask leading questions and not to feed the witness with information about the case before he/she is interviewed/interrogated. Either technique can and will lead to witnesses adjusting their statements to what they think is expected. They may no longer report what they knew before the interview started, but rather a hopelessly polluted mixture of their own recollection with material they were just prompted with. Confronting a witness with already known or assumed information about the case should therefore be done only after the witness has made an initial deposition about what he knows all by himself. The confrontation with additional, contradicting information, existing or otherwise, can then serve to expose incorrect or deliberately false statements (lies), hence serves to gauge a witness's reliability and trustworthiness, or it can expose errors in the information the investigator had assumed to be accurate. Giving a witness additional confirming information, however, merely leads to a type of confirmation bias, where a witness tends to incorporate this information as his own in order to support his own recollections, leading the investigator to erroneously believe that the information he fed the witness is now being confirmed by the latter. This can therefore be of no use to a judge or jury, but of great use to an "investigator" intent on "proving" something that may not be so. It is, of course, especially effective with "friendly" or motivated witnesses, genuine and otherwise.

Now let's turn to criminal cases conducted in Germany against defendants who were suspected of having committed violent crimes during the Nazi era. Many revisionists have criticized the conditions of these legal proceedings.

One of the first was the German investigative journalist Regina Dahl, wife of the famous German Luftwaffe officer Walther Dahl ("Rammdahl").<sup>1</sup> Mrs. Dahl worked for the German nationalist newspaper National-Zeitung. Since this newspaper is frowned upon and even reviled by the mainstream, very little about her various articles can be found today, not even on the Internet. If mentioned by mainstream outlets at all, they are consistently disparaged without much about their contents being discussed.<sup>2</sup> Revisionist sources are usually silent about her as well. The one exception to this are references to her various papers in Josef Scheidl's self-published seven-volume work Die Geschichte der Verfemung Deutschlands (History of Germany's Delegation, Vienna 1968). On page 212-214 of volume 4 titled "Die Wahrheit über die Millionenvergassung von Juden" (The Truth about the Gassing of Millions of Jews), Scheidl wrote:<sup>3</sup>

Frau Regina Dahl is a coworker at the NZ (National-Zeitung) and a successful researcher in the area of exposing atrocity lies. [...] In the NZ (No. 35 of Sept. 30, 1966, pp. 3 ff.) she published a paper about the mendacity and perjuriousness of many witnesses in the concentration camp trials. From this revealing article we gather some details about the so-called Sobibor Trial, which started on September 4, 1965, at the Hagen Jury Court. [...]

Right from the start of the preliminary investigations, the prosecution was in close contact with Jewish organizations. Before even the first witness was interviewed, lists of persons suspected to have served at Sobibor had been sent to the Jewish Central Agency. These lists, which contained the military rank and area of responsibilities of the suspects, were constantly updated during the investigations and supplemented with pertinent photographic material. The lists and photos were meant to be given to the witnesses. It is remarkable that, in a letter sent to the World Jewish Congress, the prosecution encouragingly imparted that it would be essential for the conviction of the defendants as murderers if the witnesses could testify that the defendants had beaten them. This broad hint was subsequently fully successful.

In the following years, German publications of right-wing orientation referred repeatedly to similar methods in other trials. For instance, in 1977 the right-wing newsletter Unabhängige Nachrichten (Independent News); issue no. 7, July, pp. 9f.) mentioned a similar investigative procedure for the Majdanek trial then under way at Düsseldorf. Wilhelm Stäglich quoted this source,<sup>4</sup> claiming that this case of manipulating witnesses “was rightfully described as a scandal, and provoked a wide reaction among the general public,” yet a brief article in this obscure newsletter is hardly a wide reaction among the general public. In fact, looking for traces of this reaction today, I could not find any.

Next in line was Wilhelm Stäglich, who in his 1979 book Der Auschwitz-Mythos wrote:<sup>5</sup>

I am in possession of a photocopy of a comprehensive letter (No. 24 AR 1/62 [Z]) which the director of the North Rhine-Westphalian Chief Prosecutor’s Central Office for the Investigation of National Socialist Mass Crimes in Concentration Camps in Cologne sent to all potential witnesses in his investigation concerning the concentration camp Sachsenhausen. The whole thing goes on for more than 100 pages and is an instructive example of how the accusations against the SS personnel of Sachsenhausen were “managed.” It offers an excellent instance of the procedures of the Central Office and other departments cooperating with it. In the letter, which was signed by the prosecutor, Dr. Gierlich, it is indicated to the addressee that preliminary investigations of the SS personnel who were stationed at Sachsenhausen were to be conducted “with expert advice by the Sachsenhausen Committee” (!). The addressee is then asked to give information about his experiences “in the sense of this letter” (page 1). Extensive lists of names are enclosed with the letter. Regarding this, on page 4 of this letter it is stated: “The names of the persons about whom I seek information are found in Appendices III, IV, V, and VI. Who of these took part in the crimes committed in Sachsenhausen? Should you know the names of additional SS personnel whom you could accuse of concrete crimes, please give me this information as well...”

It goes on to say on page 5: “In the picture section – page 99ff. – you will find photographs of persons sought; unfortunately pictures of all of them could not be obtained; in part the pictures originate from a time when the defendants were not yet or no longer present in the camp, in part the pictures are recent.”

As if that weren’t enough, on pages 7ff. it is thoroughly explained what kinds of mass crimes are under consideration, so the witness not need trouble himself about that. One need only choose from a selection which contains the following references:

“Murders on the arrival of the first big transports of Jews in 1938.”

“Killing of the Jehova’s Witness August Dickmann, who was shot on the parade ground September 15, 1939.”

“Shooting of 33 Poles on November 9, 1940.

“Shooting of Russian prisoners of war at the execution grounds in autumn 1941.”

“Who took part in the gassing of Russian prisoners in gas wagons?”

“Gassing of prisoners. Who installed the facilities?” etc.

These data were probably compiled by the aforementioned “Sachsenhausen Committee.” It is especially interesting that here the “gassings” resurface. Although the Institut für Zeitgeschichte had established by August 1960 that there had been no “gassings” in the concentration camps of the Old Reich – therefore not in Sachsenhausen – the attorneys at the Central Office evidently still subscribed to this wartime propaganda lie in the years which followed. The preliminary investigations for the Sachsenhausen Trial lasted from 1962 to 1970.

In conclusion, the addressee is informed that only “murder; attempted murder; complicity in and preparation of murder; poisoning with resultant death; knowingly acquiescing in the above-mentioned crimes by superiors” were unaffected under the statute of limitations and could still be prosecuted. Nevertheless, other accusations would be thankfully acknowledged. Chief Prosecutor Dr. Gierlich writes: “It is necessary to clarify instances of mistreatment – even if not in every detail – because one might draw conclusions about states of mind in murder committed in some other circumstances. There is also the possibility that through mention of additional circumstances an instance of mistreatment is revealed as an attempted murder.” (p. 11)

Thus the door is opened for settling personal scores through every conceivable lie. The “state of mind” of the chief prosecuting attorney needs no explanation.

Stäglich’s book, of course, was ordered confiscated and destroyed by the German authorities, so the “problem” of this troublesome footnote no longer exists for the mainstream, at least not in German, nor in Germany.

The fourth reference known to me and referring to a similar case of manipulation stems from the (in)famous German lawyer and right-wing activist Jürgen Rieger, who reported about his own experiences in a small 1982 brochure published by another publication of the right wing, although he did not specify which trial this was referring to.<sup>6</sup>

The last case known to me was mentioned in a small 1991 book published by – again – a publisher of the right about the trial against former Auschwitz guard Gottfried Weise.<sup>7</sup>

All this suggests that the German prosecutorial authorities systematically influenced all potential prosecution witnesses to be heard in trials of alleged violent Nazi crimes.

Considering the reputation imposed upon all these publications, none is quotable by respectable scholars. The only way around that is to actually publish these documents of manipulation on the Internet, free from the intermediation of professionals with reputations to protect.

While I was working on my expert report in 1991/92, Karl Phillip, who at that time gave me logistical support in my research efforts and who also served as a liaison between me and several lawyers involved in the defense of Holocaust “deniers,” told me that one of these lawyers had given him a photocopy of a file which was sent to witnesses during one of these trials. He gladly prepared a photocopy for me. It turned out to be the very document from which Wilhelm Stäglich had quoted in his book and which concerned the trial against the former officials of the Sachsenhausen concentration camp. I myself quoted it in my 1993 paper on “The Value of Testimony and Confessions Concerning the Holocaust.”<sup>8</sup> However, in late summer 1993 the German police raided my home and temporarily confiscated this document. I did receive it back eventually, but my subsequent odyssey of 18 years prevented me from doing anything with it. I had simply lost track of it. Only after I returned to my family in the U.S. in 2011, did I manage to locate this copy again.

I have now scanned it and posted it as a PDF file. It has 150 pages, although two pages (38, 39) are missing, so the original had 152 pages. The document lists the names of 577 former SS men against whom the German prosecutors were asking for incriminating testimony, and it also contains 497 photos of some of the suspects. One list includes all those former officials who had already been sentenced or were being prosecuted at the time this document was prepared, including the charge and/or judgment rendered of the prosecution.

As indicated at the beginning of this article, feeding potential witnesses information about the case they are supposed to testify about can, and in most cases will, deform their memory, if not actually induce perjured statements they are already inclined to offer. This document proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that it was (and probably still is) the official policy of the German judicial authorities to systematically inform and thus influence all potential witnesses prior to the planned trial about all the “certain” (or self-evident) essentials of what was considered to be “the truth.”

During David Irving’s libel trial against Deborah Lipstadt, he and Robert van Pelt discussed to what degree Holocaust witnesses may have influenced one another by what Irving termed “cross-pollination.”<sup>9</sup> I suggest instead that this document proves that the German judicial authorities were (and probably still are) involved in a massive campaign of systematically pollinating, planting and cultivating “memories” on a massive scale, thus turning all these procedures, which were based almost exclusively on witness statements, into an indelible blot on the face of the German judicial system.

---

Notes:

1	Online: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Walther_Dahl
2	See for instance the article “Der ‘vergessene Prozeß’” in the German weekly Die Zeit , on Dec 2, 1966; www.zeit.de/1966/49/der-vergessene-prozess ; or Devin O. Pendas, “‘I didn't know what Auschwitz was’: The Frankfurt Auschwitz Trial and the German Press, 1963-1965,” Yale Journal of Law &amp; the Humanities , vol. 12, no. 2, 2000. pp. 397-446; here fn 117, p. 428; http://digitalcommons.law.yale.edu/yjhl/vol12/iss2/4
3	Page 214f. in the new, 2015 edition (Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, UK).
4	“West German Justice and So-Called National Socialist Violent Crimes,” The Journal of Historical Review , Vol. 2, No. 3, Fall 1981, pp. 247-281, here p. 257.
5	In the English edition Auschwitz: A Judge Looks at the Evidence , it is footnote 33 of Chapter Four, on p. 303f. in the 2015 edition (Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, UK).
6	Jürgen Rieger, in: Deutscher Rechtsschutkreis (ed.), Zur Problematik der Prozesse um “Nationalsozialistische Gewaltverbrechen” , Schriftenreihe zur Geschichte und Entwicklung des Rechts im politischen Bereich 3, Bochum 1982, p. 16.
7	Rüdiger Gerhard (ed.), Der Fall Gottfried Weise , Türmer, Berg 1991, p. 63.
8	Published in 1994 in E. Gauss (ed.), Grundlagen zur Zeitgeschichte , Grabert, Tübingen, pp. 61-98; fn 149 on p. 77; Engl.: G. Rudolf (ed.), Dissecting the Holocaust , 2nd ed., Theses & Dissertations Press, Chicago 2003, pp. 85-131; fn 156 on p. 104.
9	See http://www.hdot.org/en/trial/transcripts/day09/pages106-110.html ; see also Samuel Crowell’s review of van Pelt’s book at http://www.fpp.co.uk/Legal/Penguin/books/Pelt/Crowell_reviews.html .

In Seventy Years, No Forensic Study Proving the Existence and Operation of the "Nazi Gas Chambers"!

by Robert Faurisson

In tribute to Professor Ben Zion Dinur (1884-1973), founder of Yad Vashem in 1953, forced to resign in 1959 for having preferred scientific History to Jewish Memory (as explained in my article in French of June 15, 2006).1

For the most commonplace murder, the judicial authority, happily enough, is never satisfied with “testimonies” but demands, before anything else, a forensic examination; to this purpose, the technical service of the police examines both the crime scene and the murder weapon while, for their part, the forensic police put to laboratory analysis all physical elements liable to enlighten the investigators. It is afterwards, in light of the forensic examination and an analysis of the facts as materially established, that one might knowledgeably seek to gauge the value of certain witnesses’ accounts. Personally, for over half a century I have wanted to know what the formidable “murder weapon” that was the Nazi gas chamber looked like; I expected to see a technical illustration of that weapon and an explanation of its use. I noted that in some former German concentration camps, since turned into theme parks, visitors were shown a room said to be a “Nazi gas chamber” but, curiously, not the least scientific evidence could be supplied to support that assertion, no results of any forensic examination. In the early 1960s, on my first visit to the Centre de documentation juive contemporaine (CDJC) in Paris, my only question to those in charge had been: “Can you show me a photo of a Nazi gas chamber?” They were unable to do so. Ditto at the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington in 1994, and in a good number of other places. The general public may be fooled with photos like that of the American politicians “visiting the Dachau gas chamber” but no longer will anyone venture to employ the same procedure when dealing with a researcher who knows his subject.

After several years of research consisting in visits, readings, meetings with experts – for example, those of the central laboratory of the Paris police, rue de Dantzig in the 15th Arrondissement or, in the United States – right from the beginning of my investigation into the execution gas chambers of certain penitentiaries – I had accumulated a considerable amount of information 1) on German gas chambers for disinfestation using Zyklon B, a product whose main component was hydrocyanic acid, 2) on American gas chambers for the execution of a single prisoner, also by means of hydrocyanic acid. However, at the same period, I was obliged to admit that I still did not know how, technically, those supposed Nazi gas chambers, used day and night to exterminate, at Auschwitz for instance, hundreds or thousands of people at a time, could have been made and could have worked. I did not succeed in finding anyone, in France or abroad, to explain to me how the gassers and their helpers could have handled the corpses without mortally contaminating themselves (hydrocyanic acid penetrates the skin and stays there, whereas with airing out, forced ventilation and still other means, it can be removed from clothes, shorn hair, metallic objects or other things). According to a text that was presented as a confession of Rudolf Höss, one of the three successive commandants of Auschwitz, I remained puzzled and no one could explain the mysteries to me. For example, how had the members of a Sonderkommando or “special squad,” once the victims’ screaming stopped and a ventilation device was turned on, been able to enter “sofort” (immediately) what would have been a sea of hydrogen cyanide, and that while eating and smoking, in other words, without even wearing a gas mask? Zyklon B consisted of hydrocyanic acid on an inert porous base. Invented in 1922 and patented in late 1926, it had the disadvantage of being explosive, ignitable by the slightest spark, even from static electricity. To use it as we are told it was used for the Auschwitz-I “gas chamber”, in proximity to a crematory oven heating up, would have been sheer madness. It was I who, ultimately, discovered the building plans of the crematorium at Auschwitz-I and those of Crematoria II,III, IV and V at Birkenau. They had been kept hidden since the end of the war. I found them on March 19, 1976 in the archives of the Auschwitz State Museum.<sup>2</sup> Thus I can state, in knowledge of the facts, that it would have been impossible to make 2,000 persons – as asserted by R. Höss in the account he gave at Nuremberg on April 15, 1946 – enter a space of 210 square meters (where, incidentally, assuming it were possible after all, there would hardly have been any need of gas to kill them, for they would simply have died of asphyxiation due to a rapid depletion of oxygen). Never could the men of the Sonderkommando have set about, with all their might, the cyclopean task of disentangling, in an atmosphere full of hydrocyanic acid, so many bodies from one another and dragging each to a small lift connecting to the upper floor and the oven room. I learned that, for a team of exterminators carrying out the simple disinfestation of a house with Zyklon B, any physical effort was strictly prohibited, since it would have accelerated the men’s breathing and so prevented the gas mask filters from serving their purpose. The rules specified that at the end of a building’s disinfestation, when it was time to open the windows to air out the premises, one must not persist in trying to open a window that offered resistance but instead go and open the others. (To those who claim, without any evidence, that the Germans destroyed all their gas chambers, I retort: “In that case, draw me the things which, according to you, the Germans destroyed.”)

The stunning conclusion of this research: in nearly seventy years, neither the International Military Tribunal (IMT) at Nuremberg (1945-1946) nor any of the numerous other courts which have had to try cases of alleged crimes committed using gas chambers (or gas vans) has ordered a single forensic examination. Better still: at the “Auschwitz Trial” in Frankfurt, running from December 20, 1963 to August 20, 1965, an inspection of certain points of the Auschwitz-Birkenau camp was held from December 14 to 16, 1964; one of the judges, Hotz, participated along with four prosecutors; however, it appears that the five men dispensed with any detailed inspection of the places where so many criminal gassings, followed by so many cremations, were said to have occurred. How can it be? A huge show trial had focused, twenty years after the war, on Auschwitz, capital of the greatest crime in world history, and the judges-accusers made not the faintest effort to inquire as to how such mass murder was first conceived, then perpetrated – and all over a period of years? Never has anyone been able to provide me with a copy of forensic examinations of the “crime of Auschwitz.” I have been smothered with testimonies, stories, confessions, and history books of which I have imposed on myself the most scrupulous reading but, all told, only to discover vague accounts defying the laws of physics or chemistry. One forensic examination, and one only, would have sufficed.

The crematoria of Auschwitz or Birkenau had at most, as I discovered in certain documents hidden since 1945, rooms called Leichenhalle or Leichenkeller (depositories, at ground level or semi-interred, for bodies) perfectly typical in their size and, above all, in their ventilation system. In 1982 I also discovered that there had been a forensic examination of the alleged gas chamber of the Struthof camp in Alsace, which I had visited in 1974 and which had looked to me a crude fake; I was later to learn that it was, in part, the product of work carried out after the war by a firm in the town of Saint-Michel-sur-Meurthe. Entrusted to Professor René Fabre, dean of the college of pharmacy in Paris, the examination concluded, as of December 1, 1945, on the absence of any trace whatsoever of hydrocyanic acid either 1) in the exhaust chimney of the alleged gas chamber and the scrapings taken from them (X jars and Y jars) or 2) in the corpses of the alleged Struthof gassing victims found in Strasbourg civil hospital. René Fabre's report has disappeared from the French military justice archives but we know its findings thanks to a paper in the file signed by three physicians who took part in the study: Drs. Simonin, Piedelièvre and Fourcade (“Whether ‘Holocaust by gas’ or ‘Holocaust by bullets’: no physical or forensic evidence!”). The three were chagrined at the result reached by Fabre but they had still been honest and scrupulous enough to report it.

Meanwhile, I had had to wait until 1978-1979 for the daily Le Monde to publish two texts in which I demonstrated that the alleged Nazi gas chambers were technically impossible.<sup>3</sup> On February 21, 1979, the same newspaper printed a “declaration” signed by 34 historians retorting to me: “One must not ask oneself how, technically, such a mass murder was possible; it was technically possible, since it happened”. This fine bit of academic asininity was but an escape hatch allowing its authors to shirk their duty and refuse any response to my arguments, which were mainly of a physical, chemical and architectural order, but also documentary and historiographical.

However, since that date, a multitude of authors – historians, journalists – have certainly tried to defend the thesis of the supposed Nazi gas chambers' existence and operation but none has been able to answer my request, repeated a hundred times: “Show me or draw me a Nazi gas chamber!” Just recently, a big book of quite scholarly appearance has been devoted to the alleged Nazi mass murders by poison gas, but in it there is not to be found a single representation of a gas chamber, not one technical illustration, not the shadow of a concrete reply to my challenge. It is the second edition, revised and corrected – released in 2012 –, of a book first published in 2011: Neue Studien zu nationalsozialistischen Massentötungen durch Giftgas / Historische Bedeutung, Technische Entwicklung, revisionistische Leugnung, Berlin, Metropol Verlag, xxxiv + 446 pages, particularly dense. The principal authors are Günter Morsch and Bertrand Perz, with the collaboration of Astrid Ley. To these three names should be added about thirty others including, for example, Brigitte Bailer, Jean-Yves Camus, Barbara Distel, Richard J. Evans and Robert Jan van Pelt. The title means: “New studies on the National Socialist mass murders by poison gas / Historical significance, technical evolution and revisionist denial.”

But how can one devise the study of a lethal weapon's technical evolution without providing a single technical illustration of that weapon? How can one respond to “revisionist denial” without taking up its main challenge, which amounts to saying that the essential weapon of the alleged crime is obviously, quite simply, impossible to design and depict when one is aware, for example, of the unavoidable complication of an American gas chamber for the execution of a lone person? For, in an execution gassing, the difficulty lies not so much in killing another without killing oneself as in going, after the execution, to take a cyanide-infused body out of its seat and out of the chamber, without causing risk to anyone: a difficulty which, as has been noted, the Germans and the Sonderkommando members, for their part, apparently surmounted thousands of times every day. Let us repeat: to kill a crowd of people in a room with hydrocyanic acid is dangerous but not impossible; to enter the room afterwards, even with a gas mask, amid a host of cyanide-infused corpses and then proceed to extricate and carry them, in the course of a few hours, so as to make way for a new gassing of the same proportion, is in the domain of the impossible. The reader will have understood: serial mass gassings are just another silly story (as Yehuda Bauer has admitted in regard to what is commonly said about “Wannsee”) of the same kind as those about “Jewish soap”, “lampshades of human skin”, extermination of the Jewish detainees at Treblinka by steam (official Nuremberg document PS-3311), their extermination at Auschwitz by electricity and in blast furnaces (the Soviet press in early February 1945), or, near Belzec, by quicklime (Jan Karski). There is an endless list of nonsensical tales in the manner of Elie Wiesel or Father Patrick Desbois, about “geysers of blood”, or a hand emerging from a mass grave to grab a shovel, or systematic extermination under quilts or pillows (“the Holocaust by suffocation”!).

My own writings are not ignored in this big book, since my name appears 33 times (and not only 12, as the index may lead one to believe). “Mr. Faurisson, you haunt my nights!” exclaimed in 1981, in a Paris courtroom, Bernard Jouanneau, lawyer and friend of Robert Badinter. Another time, in 1982, the same Jouanneau was to burst into sobs upon suddenly realising that the evidence of the existence of Nazi gas chambers he had just offered to the first chamber of the Paris court of appeal (presiding judge: François Grégoire) “was not worth very much” (his own words, in a moment of touching sincerity). I think I have also revealed to Raul Hilberg (an American Jew) and to Robert Jan van Pelt (a Canadian Jew, his successor as historian of “the Holocaust”) how they have failed, each at his end, in their offers of proof. It is especially R. J. van Pelt who in the book in question takes charge of giving me a reply. His lines of penance (pp. 343-354), which are pathetic, are essentially based on the writings of Jean-Claude Pressac, but van Pelt avoids disclosing that their author disowned them on June 15, 1995 (a month after his appearance in the XVIIth chamber of the Paris correctional court, where barrister Eric Delcroix, aided by my information, had subjected him to outright humiliation). Pressac went so far as to admit that the present version, “though triumphant”, of the official history of the extermination of the Jews was “rotten” with too many lies and doomed to “the waste bin of history” (quoted in my analysis of May 5, 2000 entitled “Valérie Igounet: ‘Histoire du négationnisme en France’”). But has not van Pelt himself admitted – in December 2009 – that the Auschwitz-Birkenau camp, where millions of pilgrims have gone on organised visits, contains, so to speak, no “physical evidence” of what we “know” (sic) about “the Holocaust” (“A case for letting nature take back Auschwitz”, Toronto Star, December 27, 2009)? Among historians, the myth of the Nazi gas chambers is on its last legs. Instead of trying to keep it alive artificially with the persistent clamour, spectacles, advertising, repression, threats, blackmail, it would be better simply to bury it, as the State of Israel finally decided to do with the body-corpse of Ariel Sharon.

In conclusion, if there is a fact to which we revisionists ought to call the attention of the layman, is it not this tacit agreement of all French or foreign judicial systems never to demand, for 70 years, any criminological inspection of the murder weapon, that is, an unprecedented weapon that enabled the killing, in industrial proportions, of millions of victims? With one exception, that of Struthof, for which, as if by intent, a forensic examination produced a completely negative finding: no gas chambers, no gassed.

At bottom, all judicial systems have followed the example of the instance called the International Military Tribunal, which, in 1945-1946, assumed the right, as a court of “justice” set up by the winners of the recent war, to try its own vanquished. Its organiser, the American prosecutor Jackson, had declared with a fine cynicism: “As a military tribunal, this Court is a continuation of the war effort of the Allied nations”, IMT, vol. XIX, p 398 – 26 July 1946). Articles 19 and 21 of its Charter read: “The Tribunal shall not be bound by technical rules of evidence [...]. The Tribunal shall not require proof of facts of common knowledge but shall take judicial notice thereof”. Thus did allegations advanced without any proof by Allied propaganda receive the formal endorsement of a strictly Allied – and not “international” – tribunal. Better still, in accordance with the next and closing sentence of Article 21, a whole series of reports drafted by the winners on crimes imputed by themselves to the defeated were to be automatically received as authentic evidence, and no one would be allowed to challenge them! Such were the effects of that Tribunal’s “judicial notice.”

And forty-five years afterwards there was to be something even more abhorrent in the domain of law: in France, “homeland of human rights”, Laurent Fabius and his people got a Socialist-Communist majority in Parliament to pass (and to have published in the Journal Officiel de la République Française on July 14, 1990, for the 201st anniversary of the storming of the Bastille, bastion of the privilege-based regime of another time) a law forbidding, on pain of fine and imprisonment, any dispute (in whatsoever manner – including ironic expressions, as case law was to specify) of the reality of those crimes committed especially against Jews, a reality, however, never described or established by any technical or forensic police service. (On this point one will be wary of old Polish examinations attesting the existence of traces of hydrogen cyanide in hair or in metal objects – all disinfected –, or of an examination undertaken at quite a late date – around 1990 – in an attempt to reply to the “Leuchter Report” of 1988;<sup>4</sup> that study, done by the Jan Sehn Institute in Cracow, proved embarrassing for the Poles and valuable for the revisionists). And I shall not expand here on the saga, in Vienna, of the forensic examination by Gerhard Jagschitz, or that by Walter Lüftl; the reader may look up those two names in my Ecrits révisionnistes in order to have an idea of the behaviour of certain Austrian judges who, seized with daring, ordered an examination and then, taking fright, capitulated. The name of a certain captain Fribourg, of the French army, and his “beginning of a study” of the alleged Dachau gas chamber may also be found.

The lie of the Nazi gas chambers will go down one day in history as one of the most fabulous impostures of all time. This lie has developed slowly, without plot or conspiracy, and without the general public’s becoming aware of it. If the good people have been so badly taken in, it has in a way been with their consent and cooperation. They have believed, then wanted to believe, then in the end wanted to have others believe and are now legally bound to believe. All this has happened in the same way as when a government wants to launch a peaceful population into a military campaign. Such a government has no need of either plot or conspiracy. Making a show of its sentiments of goodness, it will appeal, thanks to the servility of a “free press”, to notions of rights, of justice and of virtue precisely because it is about to cynically violate rights, justice and virtue. The people will start believing the government, then go along with it and, finally, run with it. Year in, year out, they will find themselves at war, armed from head to foot. And they will readily fight “the evil beast”, against which anything goes, starting with the right to lie and hate, then to plunder, rape, kill by hanging and, supreme reward, the right of their establishment to write the history of it all as it sees fit. Spontaneously they will get into the habit of hating, lying, marching in step. And those who try to make them see reason will no longer be anything but “expert liars, gangsters of history”, diabolical “Nazis” quite simply.

The lesson has been learned well. But now it is going to have to be unlearned, reviewed, and corrected. We are at the dawn of the year 2015. Let’s draw up the death certificate of the historical lie of the magical Nazi gas chambers. In a return to respect for accuracy in history, let’s promise ourselves that this gigantic imposture will be “the very last”. Until the next one, of course. For – let’s take care not to forget it – Céline, who, as early as 1950, denounced “the magical gas chamber” and stated: “It was everything, the gas chamber. It allowed EVERYTHING!”, added nevertheless: “They’ll have to find something else, oh! my mind’s at rest”. In 1932, in Journey to the End of the Night, he warned: “The frenzy of lying and believing is catching like the itch”. Frailty of man! Where can he have got this facility, then this ardour to believe in a diabolical weapon that he is not even allowed to see? To aim straight, one must aim low. So then, let’s aim low! Let’s not have recourse to mass psychology, psychoanalysis, sociology or any other science! I wonder whether a simple point of vocabulary (in French with the curious expression “chambre à gaz”, in English with “gas chamber”, in German with “Gaskammer” and in other languages as well) would explain the ease and appetite with which such a story has been swallowed. It so happens that the French term “chambre à gaz” is based on that of “chambre à coucher” (bedroom). To name the instrument that administers death, a combination of words that implicitly evoke rest and sleep has been chosen. Why, then, rack one’s brains wondering what that instrument looked like and how it worked? A gas chamber, in the minds of the simple, is simple: it must be like a bedroom or any room, but with gas inside. A man is put in it; some time later, the individual is found dead and it only remains to take away the body; as for the gas, it has dissipated. There is no need to undertake a scientific investigation: proof of a gassing is not to be sought in a forensic examination, for testimonies will suffice. After all, hadn’t the Germans already distinguished themselves during the First World War by their use of poison gas?

One of the most brazen lies in history, the alleged Nazi gas chambers, of course originated in hatred and in the inveterate habit of lying but it has thrived on naivety. In perfectly good faith, the good people were outraged at that “Nazi horror”. In doing so, they lent a hand to a gigantic slander, a criminal lie of worldwide proportions. Sancta simplicitas! Blessed ingenuousness! Historians are beginning to show dissent against this mix of lies and candour, whilst the third post-war generation manifests annoyance at the continuing indoctrination. And the Internet is there. The conditions for a reawakening of minds seem to exist. The Jews, as a whole, and the Israelis would have been well advised to listen to the founder of Yad Vashem, Prof. Ben Zion Dinur, born Dinaburg. Some Jews, such as Josef Ginzburg (aka Joseph G. Burg), Gilad Atzmon and Paul Eisen have done so. They deserve our esteem. But, at this moment, our thoughts must go first to the sizeable cohort of revisionists humiliated, insulted, scorned, beaten, driven to ruin, suicide, sentenced to imprisonment and sometimes even forced into dishonour. And to begin with, our thoughts must go to the very first of them: the Frenchmen Maurice Bardèche, author of Nuremberg or the Promised Land (1948), and Paul Rassinier, author of Le Mensonge d’Ulysse (1950, published in English under the title The Holocaust Story and the Lies of Ulysses).

Practical conclusion: from now on, each time an opponent of revisionism takes the liberty of invoking another testimony in support of the existence of the alleged Nazi gas chambers, let’s ask him to show us instead a forensic study of the murder weapon, the weapon of the crime of all crimes. Each time, on site at Auschwitz-I, Majdanek, Mauthausen, Struthof or elsewhere, that a guide has the nerve to state: “This place is (or was) a gas chamber in which the Nazis killed Jews”, let’s demand, instead of testimonies, proof, one proof only (forensic proof supplied by the appropriate police services), in support of that accusation. To end, in the face of the judges who try us, let’s launch the question: “What right has anyone to threaten with the scourge of the law a person who refuses to believe in the existence of a prodigious weapon which, in seventy years, no one has ever been able to describe or show, not even with an explanatory drawing?” There can be no right to convict a man who asked the French University how exactly such slaughterhouses were designed and how they functioned, and to whom thirty-four members of that university pitifully replied with the asinine words quoted above: “One must not ask oneself how, technically, such a mass murder was possible; it was technically possible, since it happened”.

One proof, finally, or... let the imposters keep quiet!

***

Supplement No. 1: To end, “the killer question!”

If the innocuous body depositories of the crematoria were indeed turned respectively into undressing rooms in one place and gas chambers in another, where was it possible, day by day, to store the bodies of those who had died of natural causes? Let someone show me that area, either on the spot or in the building plans that were kept hidden until I myself discovered them! Where were the bodies put when, particularly, typhus epidemics were wreaking havoc among the detainees, the Polish and German civilians, the German soldiers and doctors in the hospital facilities reserved either for inmates or for soldiers (such as, for example, the SSRevier, situated a few paces away from the Auschwitz-I crematorium)? Let's recall that those depositories could be of three kinds: 1) for bodies not yet placed in coffins; 2) for bodies in coffins; 3) for infected bodies (with reinforced isolation of the room, which was the case in the Sachsenhausen-Oranienburg camp). Will someone have us believe that, equipped as they were with an undressing room and a gas chamber, those "Nazi" crematoria simply lacked any body depositories? Crematoria without depositories? Only in the realm of fiction!

Supplement 2: The alleged homicidal gas chamber of Auschwitz-I ("Everything in it is false," as Eric Conan ended up admitting) American gas chamber built according to the technique developed in the 1930s and '40s. Faurisson examined it in September 1979 at Baltimore penitentiary.

Below, the first photo is that of the door of a genuine gas chamber for the execution of one person alone by hydrocyanic acid (HCN). This is an American gas chamber built according to the technique developed in the 1930s and '40s. I examined it in September 1979 at Baltimore Penitentiary.5

The next two photos show one of the doors of an alleged gas chamber for the killing of a crowd of people with the same gas. This is the "gas chamber" of Auschwitz-I (main camp), thus far visited by millions of tourists. The door opens inwards, which constitutes an absurdity since the corpses strewn about on the floor inside would have prevented it from opening. The same door, closed, reveals two more absurdities, since gas would have escaped through both the keyhole and the easily breakable glass pane, thus reaching the nearby SS infirmary. In 1995 the orthodox historian Eric Conan wrote that I was right about the impressive set of "falsifications" I had discovered in 1975-1976.6 Numerous others have, in the past, denounced these falsifications. Why are they still passed over in silence today?

Doors of an alleged gas chamber for the killing of people with the same gas. This is the "gas chamber" of Auschwitz-I (main camp).

These three photos thus invite the comparison of a door of a real execution gas chamber (located in Baltimore) on the one hand, with a door, shown first open and then closed, of an alleged execution gas chamber (located at Auschwitz-I) on the other.

A real execution gas chamber door is of steel, like all the rest of the construction, and its pane is of Herculite glass. To avoid letting the hydrocyanic acid erode the door joints and so, eventually, escape and spread outside, a vacuum must be created in the chamber. But creating a vacuum can cause a general collapse. Hence the extreme and indispensable robustness of the whole. The American humanitarians who advocated execution by gas (instead of execution by shooting, hanging or electricity, considered too cruel) imagined that nothing would be simpler than the use of gas. They were to be disenchanted. It took American engineers seven years (1917-1924) to develop their first homicidal gas chamber. And the first execution, in 1924 in Carson City (Nevada), nearly resulted in disaster from the significant presence of lethal gas in the prison corridors after the death of the condemned man.

Finally, a series of twelve photos showing real execution gas chambers (in the United States) with their doors and, at the bottom, four photos showing the doors of a false gas chamber (at Auschwitz).

Gas chamber door, Nevada

Gas chamber door, Colorado

Gas chamber door, Wyoming

Gas chamber door, New Mexico

Gas chamber door, Colorado

Gas chamber door, Colorado

gas chamber door, Arizona

Gas chamber door, Missouri

Gas chamber door, Oregon

Gas chamber door, Mississippi

Gas chamber door, Colorado

Gas chamber door, California

Homicidal gas chamber door, Auschwitz

Homicidal gas chamber door, Auschwitz

Homicidal gas chamber door, Auschwitz

A series of twelve photos showing real execution gas chambers (in the United States) with their doors and, at the bottom, four photos showing the doors of a false gas chamber (at Auschwitz).

Notes:

1	Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.fr/2009/03/memoire-juive-contre-histoire-ou.html
2	Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.it/2010/09/look-back-at-my-discovery-on-march-19.html
3	Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.it/2009/09/three-letters-from-professor-faurisson.html
4	Fred A. Leuchter, Robert Faurisson, Germar Rudolf, The Leuchter Reports Critical Edition (Chicago: Theses & Dissertations Press, 2005).
5	For more photos and all pertinent explanations (in French), see http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.fr/1980/02/chambre-gaz-du-penitencier-de-baltimore.html .
6	Online: http://www.ihr.org/jhr/v15/v15n1p23_Weber.html

Setback to the Struggle for Free Speech on Race in Australia

by Nigel Jackson

- Periodicals
- English
- Inconvenient History
- Vol. 7 \(2015\)
- No. 1

Part 2

---

This document is part of the Inconvenient History periodical.
Use this menu to find more documents that are part of this periodical.

Continued from Setback to the Struggle for Free Speech on Race in Australia, Part 1.

XIII

Andrew Bolt is one of the best-known and most-controversial journalists in Australia and has been so for many years. He is a thrice-weekly columnist for Melbourne's Herald Sun newspaper and generally defends traditional values and attitudes with a pugnacious, no-holds-barred writing style. He has taken a special interest in Aboriginal affairs and frequently clashed with Professor Robert Manne, a Jewish academic from La Trobe University, about the alleged "Stolen Generation" of Aboriginal or part-Aboriginal children. Bolt claims that there were no large-scale removals of children "for purely racist reasons." Manne disagrees. Bolt has noted many instances of contemporary Aboriginal children being left "in grave danger that we would not tolerate for children of any other race because we are so terrified of the 'stolen generations' myth."<sup>[1]</sup> He is also an opponent of the extraordinary current campaign, spearheaded by Tony Abbott, supported by both major parties and promoted by big businesses and influential individuals, to insert a clause or clauses into the Australian Constitution to "recognize" our indigenous people and their prior occupancy of the continent before the European takeover.

In September 2010 nine "fair-skinned Aboriginals" (as Federal Court judge Mordecai Bromberg referred to them in his judgment of the ensuing case) sued Bolt over articles he had published in 2009 in the Herald Sun and published on his blog. These suggested it was fashionable for "fair-skinned people" of diverse ancestry to choose Aboriginal racial identity for the purposes of political and career clout.<sup>[2]</sup> The applicants included Pat Eatock, Larissa Behrendt, Bindi Cole, Anita Heiss, Geoff Clark, Mark McMillan and Wayne Atkinson. They claimed that Bolt had breached the Racial Discrimination Act.<sup>[3]</sup>

On 28th September 2011 Justice Bromberg found in their favor. He stated in his judgment that "fair-skinned Aboriginal people (or some of them) were reasonably likely, in all the circumstances, to have been offended, insulted, humiliated or intimidated" by the offending articles. “At issue was Bolt’s assertion that the applicants had chosen to identify themselves as ‘Aboriginal’ and consequently win grants, prizes and career advancement, despite their apparently fair skin and mixed heritage.” The articles, their counsel, Ron Merkel QC, had told the court, were, “a head-on assault on a group of highly successful and high-achieving Aborigines”.<sup>[4]</sup>

Justice Bromberg ruled “people should be free to fully identify with their race without fear of public disdain or loss of esteem for so identifying.” Bolt’s argument (that the nine had multiple identities open to them) was seen by some as causing the case to become an unofficial test of definitions of Aboriginality.<sup>[5]</sup>

During proceedings it had become clear that Bolt had been very careless in preparing his articles for publication. They contained bad errors of fact. For example, he wrote as though some of the applicants had only recently assumed an Aboriginal identity, when in fact they had identified as Aboriginals from childhood. An extract from the ABC News is worth quoting: “The journalist told the court he did not contact any of the subjects of his articles before publication and considered these a response to comments they had already made on the public record. An earlier witness, Professor Larissa Behrendt, said Bolt had used a photograph of her in an article picturing her with dyed blonde hair and commenting on her German heritage. She said that while her grandfather was born in England she had no knowledge of German ancestors, although she admitted her surname was German. She described herself as an Aborigine and said her father was an Aborigine and her mother was a white Australian. She told the court that she knew of a three-point test to decide if someone was an Aborigine in order to claim benefits. It covered a person’s Aboriginal descent, their acceptance among the Aboriginal community and their own self-identification of being an Aborigine. She admitted it would be ludicrous to say you were an Aborigine if you had to go back seven generations to find black heritage.”<sup>[6]</sup>

Controversy continues to rage in Australia over the nature of Aboriginal identity and the ways in which Aboriginals should be given privileged treatment.<sup>[7]</sup> Some people believe that the Aboriginal people have been used, and are still being used, as a means of covertly changing the nature of the Australian political order.<sup>[8]</sup>

The judgment of Justice Bromberg has been a subject of much discussion from the time that it was delivered. For example, veteran journalist Jonathan Holmes wrote: “His Honor’s claim that his judgment need not affect the media’s freedom to publish reports and comments on racial identity is clearly absurd... It appears to follow that any publication which discourages tolerance for racial diversity... is unlawful... Justice Bromberg makes it clear that if you write something that has a tendency to offend on the grounds of race, but you want it to be considered reasonable and in good faith, you won’t necessarily get away with opinions that would in defamation law be covered by the fair-comment defense – opinions that are extreme, or illogical, or which ‘reasonable people might find abhorrent’. On the contrary, says Justice Bromberg (in Paragraph 425), Andrew Bolt failed the test of reasonableness and good faith because ‘insufficient care and diligence was taken to minimize the offense, insult, humiliation and intimidation suffered by the people likely to be affected by the conduct and insufficient care and diligence was applied to guard against the offensive conduct reinforcing, encouraging or emboldening racial prejudice.’ And he specifically mentions, not just the wrong facts, but ‘the derisive tone, the provocative and inflammatory language and the inclusion of gratuitous asides.’... [The judgment] creates one particular area of public life where speech is regulated by tests that simply don’t apply anywhere else, and in which judges – never, for all their pontifications, friends of free speech – get to do the regulating.”<sup>[9]</sup>

The national newspaper The Australian commented in an editorial: “Andrew Bolt was prosecuted last year for articles that railed against racism. He drew attention to grants and positions reserved for indigenous people and dared to question the Aboriginal credentials of some recipients. This was uncomfortable ground to tackle and Bolt used strident language, but no sensible person would dispute the need to encourage frank consideration of such issues. For those reasons this newspaper has criticized the court’s decision (especially given Justice Mordy Bromberg’s reasoning included such matters as the ‘style and structure’ of the articles and the conveyance of meaning ‘beyond the literal meaning of the words’). This legislative and judicial overreach on racial vilification must be redressed.”[\[10\]](#)

An Aboriginal spokesperson, Marcia Langton, remarked: “What Andrew Bolt and any interested in his case should know is that many Aboriginal people are just as cynical and skeptical about all the claims made to Aboriginality by people raised in relative comfort in the suburbs. They cannot be described as disadvantaged unless you take seriously the racist proposition that one is automatically disadvantaged by having an Aboriginal ancestor. Being descended from an Aboriginal person who lived before British colonization is not sufficient reason by itself to hand out money to people who make a claim to being indigenous.”[\[11\]](#)

One of Australia’s most energetic and articulate defenders of free speech is James Allan, Garrick professor of law at the University of Queensland. He stated: “I still think that Judge Mordecai Bromberg’s decision in the Bolt case was a poor one and an appeal had a very good chance of succeeding. There are several points at which Bromberg could have interpreted the statute in a more free-speech-enabling way. But at every single one of those he chose the path that stifled speech.”[\[12\]](#)

And Chris Merritt, editor of the Legal Affairs section of The Australian, commented: “The absence of an appeal means the key issue at the heart of the case, the erosion of free speech, has been left unresolved. An appeal court ruling would have provided a conclusive decision on whether the Racial Discrimination Act was applied correctly in the Bolt case..... [The failure of the Herald Sun and Bolt to appeal] has encouraged Bromberg to believe he is required by law to take on the role of uber-editor, criticizing words and phrases and taking it on himself to list material that Bolt should have included in his columns. Within days, the nation will be treated to a spectacle that has no place in a free society. Bromberg, using the coercive power of the state, will force the free media to publish the judge’s opinion.”[\[13\]](#) And in another article Merritt noted: “This broke new ground for the judiciary and put journalists on notice that this law is unlike any other. They can now be held liable not just for what they write, but for what they do not write. Without the Bolt case, this statutory requirement for judicial over-reach might never have come to light. In this sense Bolt and those who pursued him in court have all served the public interest.”[\[14\]](#) Another objection to the Act, as interpreted by Justice Bromberg, was that it took as the “key test” for culpability “what’s offensive through the eyes of an idealized member of the group claiming victim status.”[\[15\]](#)

Some of these misgivings may have been applicable to the Scully and Töben cases; but these defendants did not have the public prestige of Bolt nor such powerful friends. So no comparable public clamor on their behalf arose.

XIV

On 6 August 2012 the leader of the Opposition, Tony Abbott, delivered an address to the Institute of Public Affairs in Sydney entitled “Freedom Wars”. As noted above, this landmark speech inaugurated an intense public debate in Australia over the question of the degree to which speech should be free in public discussion of issues involving race and ethnicity.

Abbott championed the “question everything” mindset that he saw as so important for national creativity and progress. He asserted that free speech is an essential foundation of democracy and of human integrity. He warned “a government that can censor a free press is quite capable of censoring a free people.” He pointed out that “the price of free speech... is that offense will be given, facts will be misrepresented and lies will be told”, and added that “free speech shouldn’t be restrained just to prevent hurt feelings.”

Abbott opposed the then-ALP government’s proposals for changed regulation of the press: “In the hands of the current government, any new watchdog could become a political correctness enforcement agency destined to suppress inconvenient truths and to hound from the media people whose opinions might rattle Phillip Adams’ listeners.”<sup>[16]</sup> Abbott declared that “Australia does not need more regulation of the mainstream media, but we do need a new debate about freedom of speech.”

He argued that the operation of Section 18C of the Racial Discrimination Act, which prohibits statements that “offend, insult, humiliate or intimidate” another person or a group of people on grounds of race or ethnicity was “a threat to free speech”. He said: “A ‘hurt feelings’ test is impossible to comply with while maintaining the fearless pursuit of truth.” In specifically addressing the Bolt case verdict, Abbott insisted that “people are entitled to be passionate when they are arguing for what they believe to be important and necessary. Speech that has to be inoffensive would be unerringly politically correct but it would not be free.”

Abbott then made an important pre-electoral promise: “The Coalition will repeal Section 18C in its current form. Any prohibitions on inciting hatred against or intimidation of particular racial groups should be akin to the ancient common law offenses of incitement and causing fear.” He added “expression or advocacy should never be unlawful merely because it is offensive.” And he concluded by stating that his party, the Liberal Party, was “the freedom party.”

Less than two months earlier Professor Allan had noted the successful return of free speech on race to Canadians: “Last week the Canadian parliament took the biggest step in repealing its national hate speech laws. It voted 153-136 to repeal Section 13 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, the enabling legislation that criminalized so-called hate messages. The parliamentary vote... went overwhelmingly along party lines, but one brave left-of-center MP voted for repeal... This happened despite the concerted efforts and laments of the human rights industry..... The forces at work against free speech can be overcome. If Canada can repeal its section 13 then we in Australia can repeal our Section 18C equivalent.’ Allan concluded: ‘One’s position against criminalizing words that simply offend others is the most important issue Australians face at the next election.’<sup>[17]</sup>

Abbott’s IPA address now gave hope that needed reform would occur in Australia; and this gave increased confidence that eventually free speech on race would be returned to those many nations in Europe that have lost this right since World War Two.

XV

The attempt by the ALP Government to impose a stricter regulation of the media, together with the Abbott critique of the Racial Discrimination Act, led to some profound discussion of the importance of free speech within the political order.

Liberal Party elder and former MP David Kemp recalled how Sir Robert Menzies, Australia's greatest prime minister to date in the eyes of many, warned Australians in 1942 "against the organization of society around corporate interests at the expense of individual rights." Kemp expanded on this, writing that "to treat a sector of society, or the economy, as if it were a single interest with its own rights and duties, overriding the rights of the individual people within the sector, is to take an essentially fascist view of the world, destroying the rights of individual people by subsuming them into the 'rights' and 'responsibilities' of a sector of activity considered as a collective entity."[\[18\]](#)

A former chairman of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation, Maurice Newman, deplored a situation in which "legislators give judges amorphous powers to protect those who claim their sensibilities have been insulted on racial grounds" and a resultant situation in which "risky commentary will be left for closed doors, reinforcing prejudices and dividing the community." He reflected on the apparent ease with which the Government had organized its effort to regulate the media: "Once upon a time attacks on free speech would have sparked public outrage. Today, opposition seems mild. It is as though the populace has been conditioned to accept these attacks on the media's freedoms as being disconnected from its own liberty." He saw this as a result of the trend in recent decades towards "bigger government" which "for the growing political class means opportunities to dispense patronage to rent-seekers and special-interest groups." Thus he concluded "the balance of power tips inexorably in favor of the political elites" and is "indeed the road to serfdom." He regretted that "in a system where the power of individuals has been marginalized, the public has become detached." The older generation has "watched the slow attrition of their democratic rights without any sense of what was happening to them" and their children "have mostly been immersed in a curriculum that taught them government is the solution to all problems."[\[19\]](#)

The Opposition's legal affairs spokesman, George Brandis, analyzed the ideology behind those seeking to inhibit intellectual freedom. He pointed out that Ray Finkelstein in his report[\[20\]](#) favored what he called "social responsibility" over libertarian defenses of free speech. "The new intellectual climate places higher store in collectivist, societal values and less in individualistic values." Brandis warned against "a comprehensive challenge – arising from a modern-day puritanism, driven by an ideologue's intolerance of alternative or dissenting views, and condoned if not actually encouraged by a complicit government – to the very centrality of freedom of speech as one of our society's core values." The techniques of the challengers "are sometimes subtle, like the manipulation of language and the silencing of alternative voices."[\[21\]](#)

Editor-at-large of The Australian Paul Kelly warned: "The truth is that progressive political values are being transformed. Once progressives would have endorsed Voltaire (defending to the death your right to say it), but no longer. This value is subjugated to the new gospel that your speech must reflect progressive values and beliefs as part of legislating desired social behavior and respect for human rights."[\[22\]](#)

Mick Hume, in an edited extract from his book There Is No Such Thing as a Free Press, observed that "in today's hyper-sensitive, thin-skinned culture, you are more likely to hear the argument that, yes, we should support free speech, 'but' that does not mean you are free to condemn or offend others. In the run-up to the 2010 general election in Britain, the new Labor government issued a consultation paper on 'People and Power'. This document recognized 'freedom of expression as an important British value. However, it insisted that freedom comes with responsibilities – to 'be non-judgmental, open and encouraging', to avoid 'forcing our opinions on others' and to 'accept the consequences of being outspoken.'

"In other words, freedom of expression is dependent on not being too outspoken, critical or intemperate, and if you do offend others, you must accept the punitive consequences. Yet freedom of expression does not entail any such responsibility to be ‘non-judgmental’ or inoffensive. And defending those freedoms does not mean you have to endorse what is published... The bottom line is that infringements on that freedom are always worse and more dangerous to our society than the most egregious abuse of freedom might be..... There are already far too many formal and informal constraints on a free press, from our execrable libel laws to the culture of ‘you can’t say that’ that pervades the political and media class.”[23]

Frank Furedi expressed similar sentiments: “One of the most dispiriting features of the spirit of our times is the formidable cultural valuation enjoyed by the sentiment, ‘No, you cannot say that!’... The subordination of the freedom of expression to the objective of protecting people from frank speech speaks to an ethos that has a uniquely low opinion of the capacity of people to think for themselves. It is evident that supporters of hate speech laws and advocates of the policing of freedom of expression regard ordinary human beings as children who need to be protected from bad thoughts and offensive speech..... What’s really offensive is not the speech but the arrogant assumption that would deny us the right to judge for ourselves how to interpret it..... The exhortation ‘No, you cannot say that!’ is really another way of saying ‘not in front of the children’. It is a sign of the times that frank speech is frequently stigmatized as a form of irresponsible behavior.”[24]

Information provided by Ron Merkel QC, the barrister who represented the plaintiffs against Bolt, needs to be set against this. He explained that Justice Bromberg “found that a particularly pernicious aspect of the [Bolt] articles was their intimidatory impact on younger Aboriginal people who may be more apprehensive about publicly identifying as Aboriginal. The judge found the ferocity of Bolt’s attack on the individuals dealt with in the articles would have an intimidating effect on those people... the proceeding came about because of the distress caused by the articles to young Aboriginal law students and lawyers, members of Tarwirri, a Victorian association representing their interests.” Justice Bromberg explained that “the disparagement of the ‘others’ in society because they belong to a racial group, stigmatizes the group’s members, leading to racial prejudice, discrimination, social exclusion and even violence.” Merkel believed that the Act had “nipped the harm in the bud.”[25]

Ted Lapkin, a Jewish defender of free speech, remarked: “The quashing of speech on the basis of its political content is fundamentally inimical to democracy. Every point at which freedom of expression is curtailed by government coercion means a point where parliamentary debate and the media dare not go... Rather than promoting peaceful coexistence, this regime of political censorship sets loose the specter of official tolerance enforcers. The Racial Hatred Act empowers the paranoid and petulant. And by rewarding those with the biggest chips on their shoulders, it exacerbates the ugly victim-group sweepstakes that has come to dominate ethnic politics in Australia.”[26]

XVI

In September 2013 the Liberal-National Coalition won the national elections and on 18th September Tony Abbott was sworn in as prime minister. Shortly before the elections The Australian had published a large news report on the plans of Senator George Brandis who now became Attorney General, the nation’s chief law officer. Brandis had promised that “a Coalition government would use a revitalized human-rights agenda to challenge the dominance of the Left and protect common-law freedoms” that had been “eroded by previous governments”.[27] He had also promised that “one or more ‘freedom commissioners’ would be appointed to the Australian Human Rights Commission” and honored this promise on 17 December by nominating Tim Wilson, a member of the Liberal Party and of the Institute of Public Affairs, as the new Freedom Commissioner. From that point on Brandis became the Government's main spokesman for the proposed reform of the Racial Discrimination Act; and his vigorous public statements suggested that he had every confidence that his "freedom agenda" would be implemented.

Early in November Brandis had expanded on his perspective and intentions, as The Age reported from Melbourne: "Senator Brandis told The Australian that he was certain that the changes to the act would be viewed as the Government condoning racist behavior, but said he believed "you cannot have a situation in a liberal democracy in which the expression of an opinion is rendered unlawful because somebody else ... finds it offensive or insulting. The classic liberal democratic rights that in my view are fundamental human rights have been almost pushed to the edge of the debate. It is a very important part of my agenda to re-center that debate so that when people talk about rights, they talk about the great liberal democratic rights of freedom of expression, freedom of association, freedom of worship and freedom of the press."[\[28\]](#) A few months later Brandis stressed that "laws which are designed to prohibit racial vilification should not be used as a vehicle to attack legitimate freedoms of speech."[\[29\]](#) A day later a prominent news report in The Australian headed "The recovery of liberty" featured a huge photograph of Brandis and noted that he "wants to be remembered for cultural change... the recovery of liberty."[\[30\]](#) Firmly supported by Abbott, Brandis appeared like a great cultural general well on the path to bringing significant change to the Australian political order.

Support for the Government's proposed reform continued to be vigorously expressed in public forums. James Allan noted that John Stuart Mill's famous thesis On Liberty "relied on a certain distrust of government and government agents and bureaucracies, and even judges." Allan asked: "What grounds are there, really, for thinking they know what is right and true and won't abuse their position when silencing people?"[\[31\]](#) David Rolph, an associate professor of law at Sydney University, pointed out that Section 18D "permits a greater intrusion on free speech than defamation law currently does" and that the defense of fair comment "is complex and technical and often difficult for defendants to establish." He felt that the Racial Discrimination Act and defamation law both needed reform.[\[32\]](#) One John Bell, in supporting the appointment of Wilson, noted that there had only been one "non-minority group recipient of a favorable tribunal decision in the history of the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission" (himself), thus indicating the ethnic bias inherent in the act's working.[\[33\]](#) Chris Merritt bewailed "the overwhelming silence of the publicly funded human rights industry when freedom of speech is at stake."[\[34\]](#) An Eric Lockett addressed the legalistic "nanny state" mindset behind the act: "The law can never make people good – the best it can hope for is to protect the innocent from the wrong-doing of others... We kid ourselves if we think that the law can ever be a substitute for the moral education that was once delivered at our mothers' knees, or in Sunday school."[\[35\]](#) Major newspapers agreed that change was needed. In Melbourne The Age stated: "We believe Section 18C should be abolished... The danger in the present framework is that in trying to protect tolerance and freedom, the legislation diminishes both.... The best weapon against hurtful and even vile words is public ridicule, not suppression of expression."[\[36\]](#) The Australian presciently noted: "There is, sadly, only a small and quiet constituency for press freedom and free speech in this country." It asked: "But where are the champions, many of whom are leaders in the academy, media and social movements, when the most important human right of all, free speech, is under an all-out assault?"[\[37\]](#)

Michael Sexton SC addressed the inadequate terminology of racial vilification law: "There is room for argument as to whether the prohibition on intimidation should be retained, although this could normally be dealt with by the ordinary provisions of the criminal law. The notions of offense, insult and humiliation, however, involve hurt to feelings. This is always unattractive for the subject of the verbal attack, but these shock tactics have always been legitimate tools of debate on questions of politics and public interest..... Some of the defenders of Section 18C describe it as a bulwark against ‘hate speech’. One problem about this term is that it is now frequently used with reference to publications that are merely offensive. Hatred is a very powerful emotion and one, it might be thought, relatively rarely encountered.”[38] Neil Brown QC commented on a different weakness in the act. He pointed out that in the Bolt case the judge “decided there was no role for community standards” in determining his verdict and “instead applied a test that gave priority to the views of the group claiming to have been offended.” Brown suggested that liability in the future in such cases should be determined “according to community standards of propriety generally accepted by and expected of reasonable adults. And who better to determine whether an act offended community standards than the community itself by way of a jury?”[39] Of course, such a criterion might not achieve justice in every case: a Holocaust revisionist, for example, might still find himself disadvantaged as a result of prevailing public ignorance, itself brought about by bias in the public media. Former academic Merv Bendle dealt with another defense of the act brought up in certain quarters: “Claims that the repeal of Section 18C... might “unleash a darker, even violent side of our humanity’ are absurd and offensive..... This is not Nazi Germany, it is a highly tolerant society where an Aborigine has just been made Australian of the Year to general acclaim.”[40]

Gary Johns, a former ALP MP, argued that intermarriage would be a more effective way of building racial harmony rather than “outdated laws”. He pointed out that “the rate of intermarriage for Aborigines in Sydney, Brisbane and Melbourne is more than 80 per cent. Aborigines constitute 1 per cent of the population of these places: a tiny minority. In a sea of whites, Aborigines have high intermarriage rates.”[41] The Australian drew attention to another problem faced by the Government: “Political correctness might have become so insidious that it is now a thought-crime to support the repeal of laws that stifle free speech lest we be tarred with the words of others.”[42] James Allan attacked another plank depended on by opponents of reform: “I think important policy decisions ought to be made by the elected representatives of the people..... And not those who purport to be on the side of ‘international law’. Take a closer look at international law sometime and you soon realize that treaties are made by the executive, over the head of legislature, and that so-called ‘customary international law’ hasn’t got a democratic bone in its entire body.”[43]

Tom Blackburn SC commented that section 18D does not offer a defendant sufficient protection. The term “good faith” cannot be simply equated with honesty and sincerity. This is because in a case known as Bropho it was determined that to show “objective good faith” a defendant must be able to demonstrate that he or she had (1) honestly and conscientiously had regard to minimize harm done; (2) acted with fidelity to the relevant principles in the act; and (3) indicated a conscientious approach to honoring the values asserted in the act. It might not be possible for an ordinary person to know enough law to abide by such a requirement.[44]

XVII

On 25 March 2014 the Government released an exposure draft detailing its proposed reforms to the act and called for public responses to its program. Sections 18B, 18C, 18D and 18E would be repealed. These would be replaced by a new section of four parts, as follows. “(1) It is unlawful for a person to do an act, otherwise than in private, if the act is reasonably likely to vilify another person or a group of persons, or to intimidate another person or group of persons, and the act is done because of the race, color or national or ethnic origin of that person or that group of persons. (2) For the purposes of this section, “vilify” means to incite hatred against a person or group of persons, and “intimidate” means to cause fear of physical harm. (3) Whether an act is reasonably likely to have the effect specified is to be determined by the standards of an ordinary reasonable member of the Australian community, not by the standards of any particular group within the Australian community. (4) This section does not apply to words, sounds, images or writing spoken, broadcast, published or otherwise communicated in the course of participating in the public discussion of any political, social, cultural, religious, artistic, academic or scientific matter.”

For lovers of free speech, this was a big step in the right direction and was a much more decisive reform than that adumbrated by Tony Abbott in August 2012. However, in my two submissions to the consultation process I suggested further improvements, as follows. (1) The amendments to the act should contain a specific statement that the principle of free speech takes precedence over the principle of protection from racial vilification. (2) If the term “racism” is to be used, it should be carefully defined, since not all discrimination based on race or ethnicity is unjust or not in accord with truth. (3) The existing protection against intimidation should not be preserved in the act, as there is adequate protection against intimidation and menace elsewhere in Australian law. (4) The new protection against vilification should not be included in the amendments, because the phrase “incite hatred against” is too subjective. “Vilification” is also too vague and subjective a term. (5) If the protection against intimidation is preserved, then claims that it should encompass “fear of emotional harm” (as opposed to physical harm) should be rejected, as the criterion would be too vague and subjective. (5) One word should be added to the list of kinds of matter in public discussion. The word is “historical.” Some of the most sensitive controversies bearing on race and ethnicity deal with historical topics. (6) Many valid arguments have been mounted to the effect that racial vilification is an evil which should be opposed and, where possible, curbed; but no successful argument has been raised by any person or body to show that the need to curb racial vilification is so important and so pressing that the basic principle of intellectual freedom should be forfeited.

XVIII

A torrent of discussion for and against the Brandis proposals now erupted in the public forums of Australia. Opponents of these changes unscrupulously made strident use of an unfortunate statement by the Attorney-General in Parliament to the effect that Australians “had a right to be bigots”. He meant, of course, that they had a right to express views which others would see as bigotry. He was not defending bigotry as being socially desirable or worthy in itself of legal protection. This would have been obvious to any thoughtful observer; thus, the over-the-top response to his statement, which would be sustained over the next four and a half months, suggests that crusaders against free speech on race were either possessed by a blinding spirit of fanaticism or ruthlessly determined to get their way by foul means as well as fair. A slogan involving opposition to “giving the green light to bigotry” was erected like a Chinese wall to prevent reasonable discussion. Wilson, the new Freedom Commissioner for the AHRC, perceived this and at once noted that “free speech and acceptable conduct” were “incorrectly being conflated”, since the overall issue was “not about the acceptability of racism.”<sup>[45]</sup> And retired academic Merv Bendle observed: “Ever since the 17th Century and the abolition of the Star Chamber and the proclamation of the Bill of Rights, the battle for free speech has been waged against ruling classes and elites seeking to protect their entrenched interests against public criticism. As the Andrew Bolt case revealed, nothing has changed as favored groups seek to preserve their status and privileges by prohibiting debate. Consequently, the accusations of racism and bigotry being directed against the federal government over its efforts to modify the RDA are merely a smokescreen and should be dismissed and George Brandis supported for his courageous initiative.”[46]

Some Aboriginal Australians supported the Government plan. Sue Gordon, a retired Northern Territory magistrate, was reported as saying that “the repression of free speech was damaging to race relations” and that she agreed “that people had the right to be bigots”.[47] A former member of the Government’s indigenous advisory council, Wesley Aird, stated that the amendments were needed “to bring the act into alignment with the ‘expectations of mainstream Australian society’.”[48] Anthony Dillon, an academic at the Australian Catholic University, saw opposition to the reforms as counter-productive: “Promoting the message that Australia is a racist country comes at a cost; people will see no need to take responsibility for their lives. Claims of racism provide a perfect excuse for not having to make the lifestyle changes necessary to improve quality of life. They reinforce the victim mentality, where Aborigines are presented as victims of a racist country. Propagating such myths is far easier than addressing the tough problems mentioned previously. Yes, racism exists in this country. But we are not a racist country. There is an enormous amount of goodwill towards Aboriginal Australians and other ethnic groups. Claims of racism where it does not exist are more damaging to reconciliation and the health and wellbeing of Aboriginal people than real racism. If we are to get tough on racism, shouldn’t we also get tough on people who promote it where it does not exist and accuse others of being racist simply because they have a message that may not be popular with a few?”[49] Andrew Penfold, the New South Wales Human Rights Ambassador and founder of the Australian Indigenous Education Foundation, stated: “We need to raise the threshold of section 18C so it only relates to serious vilification.”[50] Aboriginal artist, activist and businessman John Moriarty also supported the proposed reform.[51]

The Australian drew attention to the world context of the controversy and to the poor understanding of many of the opponents of reform: “However well-meaning the views of opponents to the Abbott government’s changes to race discrimination laws, many have a poor understanding of the inviolable place of free speech in our democracy..... Rather than being viewed as a one-off, Australia’s debate over racial vilification needs to be understood within the context of international trends. In a drive to clamp down on statements perceived as offensive, freedom of speech is being trampled across much of the world.” It also warned against “judicial activism”, in deprecating Judge Bromberg’s comments that the judiciary is a way of delivering “social justice”. [52]

Neil Brown QC suggested that “if we really want community standards to prevail, we should have trial by jury, so these contentious issues can be resolved by the only body really qualified to do so: twelve good men and women. After all, if the purpose of such legislation is to protect the community from racist conduct, why not ask the community, in the form of a jury, if it thinks it needs to be protected from the conduct complained of?” [53] Noted American Jewish legal expert and activist Alan Dershowitz warned “democracy cannot survive a regime of governmental censorship.” [54] Another Jew, a survivor from World War Two, Professor John Furedy, also issued a warning – against what he saw as a dangerous trend towards tyranny and argued that even “Holocaust deniers” should not be censored. [55] Former Prime Minister John Howard supported the reforms. [56] Michael Sexton SC pointed out that Sections 18C and 18D are much harder on a defendant than the corresponding clauses in defamation law, particularly as Section 18C is not concerned with truth or falsity. Thus “it is much likelier to be used... to attack controversial pieces of journalism or historical writing.” [57] One Gabrielle Lord expressed surprise at “the lack of voices from the literary world” in support of reform and argued that “freedom is the essential condition from which creativity unfolds and flourishes.” [58] Tim Wilson observed (in contrast to those who claimed that Andrew Bolt had vastly greater resources than those he attacked) that “censorship favors the powerful because they can use and abuse it to advance their ends, and also favors those with resources to use the court system to silence and censor others. It is a common criticism of Australia’s generous defamation law – it favors the rich from criticism.”<sup>[59]</sup> Barry Cohen, a former ALP minister and a Jew, insisted that “racist ideas are more effectively countered in debate, rather than in court or jail”.<sup>[60]</sup> Janet Albrechtsen, a political columnist with The Australian, discussed the change-of-heart of Canadian Alan Borovoy, who once supported legislation like section 18C but is now a disbeliever, as well as the experience of Mark Steyn, who fought the censors, and noted: “Debate in this country has become polarized between those on the Right who regard the individual right to free speech as more important than identity group rights and those on the political Left who cannot bring themselves to genuinely commit to free speech of opponents.”<sup>[61]</sup>

One Evelyn Creeton wrote that “hate speech laws are the laws that now powerful minority groups use to silence their opponents but would never agree to apply to themselves. They know that postmodern judges will use positive discrimination to protect people and opinions they agree with, even if a statute does not authorize such unequal treatment and international law forbids it.”<sup>[62]</sup> Canadian Mark Steyn, writing in Spectator Australia, commented: “I’m opposed to the notion of official ideology..... the more topics you rule out of discussion – immigration, Islam, ‘gender fluidity’ – the more you delegitimize the political system..... where we’re headed [is] a world where real, primal, universal rights – like freedom of expression – come a distant second to the new tribalism of identity group rights..... Universities are no longer institutions of inquiry.”<sup>[63]</sup> Political scientist Jennifer Oriel produced a profoundly damning analysis of the Racial Discrimination Act: “The open society dream of the West was based on the reign of reason over theocracy and the liberation of citizens from state dogma. Both precepts of open society are reversed in laws to censor speech that offends.” She warned against “a gradual insinuation of ideology into the realm of Western jurisprudence” and its “reintroduction of state censorship under the guise of racial discrimination law.” She explained that “the modern architect of civil accord by state censorship” was former Canadian prime minister Pierre Trudeau, “an ardent admirer of Mao Zedong’s approach to multiculturalism.” Oriel saw the Brandis reform proposal as seeking “to raise the evidentiary standard of justice from feelings of offense and group opinion to hard evidence and truth.” It was now encountering a backlash “from those whose public status depends on manufacturing the illusion that personal perception and mob opinion constitute fact.” In reality the proposal “extends the right of free speech to all Australians rather than reserving it for an elite class who can claim their words are especially academic, scientific or artistic.”<sup>[64]</sup>

Journalist Brendan O’Neill wondered “Why the Left has turned against the masses” and observed that “the bulk of the Left has abandoned freedom of speech, ...ceding the terrain... to the Right..... It is the newspapers that lean more to the Right that have loudly demanded reform of this legal restriction on what people can say, while papers that lean Left insist Section 18C must stay.” [The Australian and The Age respectively demonstrate that divergence.<sup>[65]</sup>] O’Neill argued that “the Left lost its faith in everyday people..... [it] has become more and more cut off from ordinary people.”<sup>[66]</sup> One Jim Ball responded that the role reversal on freedom of speech between Left and Right has occurred because “the Left is losing the argument in all respects as people are better informed and have more avenues available to vent their concerns and opinions”. The communications revolution means that “the Left can no longer contain or control the flow of information”.<sup>[67]</sup> Journalist Nick Cater claimed that “anti-discrimination legislation is just a game for lawyers..... It is human rights devoid of any sense of proportion, prudence or natural justice.”<sup>[68]</sup>

The former head of the South Australian Office of Multicultural Affairs, Sev Ozdowski, was another who supported the Brandis proposals, submitting that “it is difficult to find evidence [that] freedom of speech needs to be curtailed because it grows racism in Australia or because of sensitivities associated with Australia as a multicultural society.” He felt that education was a much more effective way of tackling racism than legal sanctions. “There is no evidence that criminalization of so-called hate speech elsewhere in the world has markedly contributed to social peace and harmony..... The only exception to freedom of speech should be when it calls for action that could result in violence... and when it threatens national security and public safety.”<sup>[69]</sup> That last point is dubious, since would-be censors have been known in Australia and overseas to deliberately threaten violence against right-wing speakers in order to get a suborned police authority to close down proposed meetings on that very ground – of public safety – rather than moving against the real trouble-makers. Chris Merritt pointed out that a danger has arisen of lawyers being seen as the natural allies of authoritarians, the latter in Australia being able to be identified “by their desire to extend state power in ways that erode the liberties that set this country apart from many of its neighbors.” He stressed that the most important rights are “products of the common law, not the gift of governments or revered founding fathers.”<sup>[70]</sup>

Gay Alcorn, a journalist with The Age, published a report on a long interview she had with Andrew Bolt (who writes for the opposition paper, the Herald Sun, which is, like The Australian, owned by Rupert Murdoch’s News Limited. It was magnanimous of The Age to give Bolt this fair hearing.) Bolt felt that the case against him had been mounted essentially to outlaw an opinion and stressed his belief that even “Holocaust denial” (which he rejects) should not be outlawed. Brendan O’Neill strongly attacked the claim that racial vilification law is needed for social cohesion. He noted that “the language of liberty has been twisted by the AHRC to make illiberal things sound liberal, authoritarianism seem just and tyranny appear enlightened.” He added that “most of the AHRC commissioners have “come down on the side of state control rather than individual liberty” and are “forever reminding folk their right to free speech can be rescinded if they say anything too outrageous or risky or threatening to public morals.” O’Neill then went on the warpath: “The paternalistic notion that certain ideas must be hidden from view because they have the power to rattle society – or ‘damage social cohesion’, as [supporters of 18C put it] – has fuelled every act of censorship from Torquemada silencing morality-corrupting heretics during the Spanish Inquisition to British censors banning Lady Chatterley’s Lover..... Arguing that prejudiced speech must be quashed to preserve social harmony may sound PC, but it’s the bastard ideological offspring of the thirst for social control and fear of the unpredictable public that have motivated every censor.” O’Neill proved his critique of the human rights movement, which he saw as coming out of “the darkest moment” of World War Two and the Nazi tyranny, by quoting from the websites of the AHRC and the European Convention on Human Rights. He contrasted this movement with that of the Eighteenth Century’s democratic rights movement, which was about restraining the state from tyrannizing over individuals.<sup>[71]</sup>

Barrister Louise Clegg wrote an authoritative justification of Senator Brandis’s remark that Australians have a right to be bigoted. She quoted from further on in his controversial speech, where he told ALP senator Penny Wong: “I would defend your right to say things that I consider to be bigoted and ignorant. That is what freedom of speech means.” Clegg concluded that “it is quite clear that Brandis was not for a second promoting bigotry of any kind, let alone racial bigotry. Nor was he suggesting that he or we should approve of or even tolerate bigotry. The senator’s clear message was that it is not possible or desirable in a free country for the state to regulate what people think or say on the basis that other people might disagree with it, be offended by it or consider it bigoted or ignorant.”<sup>[72]</sup> This had always been obvious and it is disgraceful that campaigners against reform so often and in so many forums grossly misrepresented the senator's position. Tim Wilson wrote a large article on the difference between the liberal tradition of human rights and the socialist approach. He provided a pertinent quotation from a speech by Sir Robert Menzies: "So few of us have objective minds – detached minds – and what we conceive to be the truth is very often coloured or distorted by our own passions or interests or prejudices. Hence, if truth is to emerge and in the long run be triumphant, the process of free debate – the untrammelled clash of opinion – must go on."[\[73\]](#)

Part-Aboriginal academic Anthony Dillon warned against a too-easy belief that words can hurt or offend: "People can just as easily choose not to take offense..... There seems no end to opportunities today for people to take offense, claim they are traumatized, and make someone else responsible for their suffering. Taking offense is all too often simply a ploy to silence opponents." He noted that in certain contexts involving racial discussion he could express his views without fear of being sued because his "ancestral mix includes some Aboriginality", making him and others like him beneficiaries of reverse racism. "It's all too easy to misrepresent discussions that involve race, particularly if some feel uncomfortable with the content as being blatant racism. Let's not confuse the right to have open discussion on race matters with racial hatred."[\[74\]](#) Aaron Lane, a research officer with the IPA, drew on the recent Canadian experience of the repeal of Section 13, which had enabled Canadians "to seek legal redress against those who had offended them", with the result that defendants "could be subject to lifetime speech bans, as well as monetary penalties." Lane pointed out that this repeal had not led to the unleashing of racial hatred in Canada, thus arguing that repeal of 18C in Australia would also prove innocuous.[\[75\]](#) One Lindsay Dent agreed: "Canadians learned their lesson after fellow citizens had been hounded with long-running, costly litigation merely for making reasonable comments about race or religion."[\[76\]](#)

Journalist Nick Cater argued, in contrast to some supporters of 18C, that racism is uncommon in Australia. "Few people go bonkers on public transport. Fewer still are prepared to put their bigotry on display..... Racism is somewhat less entrenched in the Australian psyche than the politically correctors claim." He, too, felt that traditional law and public disdain were sufficient sanctions against the rare outbreaks.[\[77\]](#) History professor Ross Fitzgerald wrote against "the disturbing implication of an increasing tendency to blur the distinction between words and physical violence, and instead to argue that hurtful words and ideas are actually a form of violence." He insisted that "except as metaphor, words are not weapons and that, in terms of free speech, it is crucial to maintain the distinction."[\[78\]](#)

Gabriel Sassoon, foreign-media adviser to Hilik Bar, the Deputy Speaker of Israel's parliament, an Australian living in Tel Aviv, commented on a controversial anti-Jewish (or anti-Israeli) cartoon published in The Sydney Morning Herald: "This should not be the subject of a racial vilification claim..... Free speech is sacrosanct. I've broken with the ALP, of which I'm a member, and the Australian Jewish community in backing the Government's push to repeal Section 18C."[\[79\]](#) Liberal Democrat senator David Leyonhjelm also supported the Government: "The arguments against free speech are based on concerns about what people think. Preventing speech does not alter what people are thinking; indeed, it probably reinforces it. The only way to change how people think is by speaking about it." He intended to attend the AHRC's first free-speech seminar on 7th August.[\[80\]](#) Tim Wilson, the AHRC freedom commissioner stated: "We need a fully informed debate about free speech, including the role played by non-legislative measures that help civilize conduct while avoiding the imposition of censorship."[\[81\]](#) Cassandra Wilkinson, of the liberal-conservative think-tank the Centre for Independent Studies, warned that the net of censorship often catches those for whom it was not intended: "But I do want freedom of expression for a lot of people who are often deemed offensive. I struggle to see how one kind of free speech isn't materially affected by the progress or regress of another.”[\[82\]](#)

XIX

Opponents of the proposed reform of the Racial Discrimination Act produced many arguments to support their position. (1) It would encourage racial bigotry, ethnic prejudice and racism, and give the green light to Holocaust deniers, thus leading to an increase in racism generally. (2) It would promote social disharmony and political division. (3) It is unnecessary, since the Act has not seriously eroded free speech. (4) The Act is in fact working well to diminish racism. Most cases brought before the AHRC are successfully conciliated and do not progress to a court hearing. For example, between 1989 and 2010 out of 3788 cases referred to the Commission only 68 were referred to a tribunal and only 37 of these were successful.[\[83\]](#) And Commission statistics for 2012-2014 are said to show that only 27% of 1399 reports related to racial hatred.[\[84\]](#) (5) The Act is necessary for Australia to fulfill its international obligations. (6) The Act protects vulnerable people, those who “have little voice” (in contrast, say, to an Andrew Bolt, who has a megaphone in the form of his columns, blog and other public appearances). (7) The Act actually enhances free speech, since the pain of racist abuse often disempowers victims from participating in public debate. (8) Children and adolescents of ethnic minorities may suffer a loss of dignity and security without the protection of the Act. (9) Hate speech is dangerous, as history shows, especially the history of Nazi Germany. (10) Many Australians underestimate the damage that racism can do, because, being members of the ethnic majority (Anglo/European), they do not experience it. (11) The Act has an educative function and shows the nation what kind of behavior is or is not acceptable. (12) Repeal would jeopardize the possibility of success for the proposed referendum to recognize Australia's indigenous people in the Constitution. (13) The draft proposal's definitions of “intimidation” and “vilification” are unsatisfactory.[\[85\]](#) (14) Almost all, if not all, of the nation's representative groups of ethnic minorities are opposed to change.[\[86\]](#) (15) Inciting hatred or hate speech are not forms of legitimate public discussion, so that censorship of them is not an invasion of free speech. (16) Repeal threatens the quality of life of ethnic minorities in Australia, tending to marginalize them and make social equality impossible. (17) The Act in its current form enjoys widespread community support.[\[87\]](#) (18) Bad speech cannot always be overcome by good speech; and the speech of the weak may often be unable to counter the speech of the strong; so protections should stay. (19) It is in our national interest to keep the law as it is, for it gives us a better image with overseas nations, including our near neighbors in South-East Asia.

This summary of objections to the reform proposals has been drawn from opinion articles, news reports and letters to the editor published in two of Melbourne's three major newspapers.[\[88\]](#)

What is most noticeable in the public utterances of persons and groups expressing such objections is their failure to address the real concerns of those who are aware how easily limitations on free speech for ideological purposes can be the first step towards subjection of a nation to authoritarian and then totalitarian tyranny. Very rarely do they show any sympathy for those whose intellectual freedom they seek to curb. Views on race different from their own are far too easily dismissed as racist bigotry. The extraordinary phenomenon of the suppression of historical revisionists in many nations, mainly European, gets hardly a mention. One suspects that many of the objectors have taken on board the cause of racial equality as a kind of ersatz religion.

It is not that they have no case at all. Racist abuse can indeed be painful and dispiriting to its victims. Unjust discrimination because of ethnicity understandably rankles deeply. Winding back the protections of the Act is more likely than not to encourage such negative behavior (which is regrettable), though not, however, as drastically as the objectors claim. However, public encouragement of fair play, together with education (as opposed to indoctrination) and Australia's well-known tolerance summed up in the iconic phrase "the fair go", are better ways of reducing unjust behavior towards those of other ethnicity than a political censorship which abandons a vital ethical principle.

To what extent the Act has worked well – in reducing racism without limiting free speech – is debatable. Those assuring us that it has been a blessing rather than a curse are usually partisan anti-racists. Nor can one blame minority ethnic groups for seeking their own advantage by supporting current restrictions; but one is entitled to wonder how representative ethnic councils and committees are of their whole ethnic groups, and one can also regret that ethnic leaders have not been able to look at the bigger picture and put the welfare of the nation as a whole first, before seeking benefits for their own minority groups.

Another suspicion is that exaggeration of the hurt caused by unjust racial discrimination or racial vilification has often occurred during the national debate. The truth is that rejection can often have a bracing effect; and many persons of all ethnicities have shown throughout history a capacity to work their way through mistreatment to achieve fulfilling lives.

For these and other reasons it seems to me that the case against the Government's reform proposals ultimately fails to convince.

XX

From as early as February the newspapers began reporting stories indicating that the Government's free-speech campaign was in trouble. The suggestion was made more than once after 25th March that Senator Brandis's exposure draft would be very considerably watered down. Leaders of the Institute of Public Affairs expressed their concern that the Government's will was weakening under pressure. By early August observers on both sides of the debate probably expected that only a very minor reform would actually be attempted in the parliament. However, on 5th August the Prime Minister announced that the Government had decided to abandon its push to reform the Racial Discrimination Act altogether. He referred to the project as "a needless complication" and said bluntly that it was off the shelf. He took personal responsibility for the decision and stated that it was a "captain's call" which he had made. Abbott coupled this unexpected turnaround with announcements about Australia's role in opposing the terror tactics of Muslim fundamentalists and the need to keep local moderate Muslims on side. To many observers it seemed as though he was trying to camouflage an embarrassing back-down by rhetoric about the need to combat deadly danger both in Australia and overseas. Stories circulated that cabinet knew nothing about the back-down until the morning of the 5th. The evening before, Senator Brandis had appeared on Sky television and confidently defended the intention to press ahead with reform.<sup>[89]</sup> One story was that Abbott had actually notified Andrew Bolt of his volte-face before he informed the cabinet.<sup>[90]</sup> Nevertheless, the cabinet unanimously supported his decision, determined, evidently, to maintain a public image of party unity.

During the next few days there seemed to be general agreement among political commentators across the spectrum that the Government had engaged in the back-down because the consultations process had shown that the repeal plan was widely unpopular, with minority ethnic groups almost universally hostile, as well as many other representative bodies, including the Coalition governments of Victoria and New South Wales. Compounding the Government's difficulty was the disunity within its parliamentary ranks. Ten or more backbenchers apparently opposed repeal, with a couple at least prepared to cross the floor on the issue. It was said that two senior cabinet members, Malcolm Turnbull and Joe Hockey, were also not in favor of change. There was concern that seats could be lost in the next national elections in electorates where large numbers of persons of minority ethnic groups lived.

It seems clear that the Government would have faced great embarrassment if it had introduced even watered down reforms in the House of Representatives. It might have suffered the humiliation of loss in the lower house if enough of its members broke ranks and crossed the floor. As for the Senate, it seemed obvious that it would reject any bill that came its way. Thus, in practical terms, the Abbott decision may have been no more than an acceptance of reality and a justifiable avoidance of waste of time and money on a doomed cause. However, his mode of explaining the capitulation was not entirely credible or creditable.

While there was natural jubilation among those who had opposed change, some deriding the Government for ever having engaged in its campaign and others commending it for listening to the public and accepting its verdict, there was shock and disappointment among those who had supported repeal. James Allan bitterly condemned the "caving in to the special pleading lobby groups" and stated that he was skeptical that there really were a lot of MPs "in electorates where there will be more votes for them in caving in than there would be for proceeding on principle." He felt that the Government should have insisted on getting its bill passed in the lower house, even if Senate rejection later was inevitable.<sup>[91]</sup> Andrew Bolt suggested that "surely the ethnic communities which produced those jihadists and the 21 Muslims we've jailed on terrorism offenses already need exactly the kind of scrutiny too easily shut down with cries of 'racism'" and asked: "Does free speech really have so few defenders?"<sup>[92]</sup> In a second column Bolt lamented that "now Australia assimilates to the values of the immigrants – including the most oppressive values..... muzzling Australians is now seen as necessary to please migrant communities." He condemned "politicians... so desperate for these blocs of ethnic votes that they sacrifice Australian values to accommodate imported ones." Bolt expressed especial concern that the unrepealed restrictions of Section 18C "stifle two important debates as the country slides towards this dangerous new tribalism. The first is over the Government's racist plan to change the Constitution to recognize Aborigines. Should we really be divided by law on the basis of the 'race' of one or more of our great-grandparents? To me the answer is clear, but the Racial Discrimination Act makes it dangerous to give examples of just how preposterous and artificial this racial division is." The other debate is "how to deal with the growing threat of radical Islam."<sup>[93]</sup>

The Australian laid blame on Senator Brandis for the failure of the reform plan: "But the Attorney-General's public advocacy has been poor, and the argument was effectively lost when he said: 'People do have a right to be bigots, you know.'" The newspaper, like several other commentators, noted that the senator's statement had actually been factually true. "However, it was poorly expressed, politically naïve and provided his opponents with the opening they needed. Labor and its fellow travelers have portrayed the reforms as an attempt to make bigotry legal and even legalize racism." The newspaper condemned this tactic: "The Greens-Left clique that tends to dominate political debate showed itself incapable of a mature consideration of these issues, as the ABC, Fairfax [publisher of The Age and The Sydney Morning Herald] and much of the gallery [of journalists at Parliament House] focused on Senator Brandis's gaffe as if it presented the central argument and overriding intent of proposed changes."<sup>[94]</sup> The Herald Sun asserted editorially that the back-down's "impact on freedom of speech is nonetheless damaging..... Criticism can now be curtailed on the basis that someone doesn't like what you said. This is an attack on free speech, no matter how that might be denied by some ethnic, religious and cultural groups.”<sup>[95]</sup> The Age supported the back-down because “the changes proposed were inherently flawed, and the way the Government went about promoting them was unnecessarily inflammatory.” It made the same criticism of Senator Brandis's notorious remark as did The Australian. It made a very muted criticism of the Act's “low legal threshold” for breaching the law, then firmly rejected the Government's omission of “psychological harm” as cause for complaint in the exposure draft and asserted that the proposed new exemptions were too wide. The Age also noted that the consultation process had drawn “more than 4000 submissions” (other sources say they were over 5000) and that “about 75% were opposed to any change” (according to Professor Simon Rice of the Australian National University).<sup>[96]</sup>

The Institute of Public Affairs was obviously furious about Abbott's decision and took out a full page advertisement in The Australian addressing him, quoting from his speech to it in Sydney in 2012: “Freedom of speech is an essential foundation of democracy.” The Institute then commented: “We agree. That's why we will fight to repeal Section 18C of the Racial Discrimination Act. Even if you won't.”<sup>[97]</sup> This was possibly an injudicious and quixotic response, smacking of sour grapes.

Senator David Leyonhjelm insisted that “nothing makes up for the loss of free speech” and reminded people that “laws limiting racist speech are not really about speech at all, but are intended to prevent unacceptable thoughts.” He was unimpressed by Abbott's excuse about the need for national unity and felt that Australians should “harden up.” In a liberal democracy “free speech must be the default option, with every encroachment subject to strict justification.”<sup>[98]</sup> Michael Sexton SC queried the extent of public opposition to the proposed reforms: “It is important to reject the suggestion – implicit in much of the reporting on the Government's decision – that it represents an acceptance by the Government of the view of a majority of the Australian community. Common sense suggests that a majority of the community does not have a developed opinion on this or many other questions of public policy..... The fact most of the submissions to the Government on this issue favor the retention of Section 18C says nothing about the true state of popular sentiment but a great deal about the power of these lobby groups.” Sexton pointed out, too, that “if it is really true that there is overwhelming popular support for 18C, then surely it is unnecessary.” He suggested that the back-down “reveals where the power really lies in our political system, and it is not with the majority, prejudiced or unprejudiced. The ethnic lobbies and the highly organized ‘human rights’ industry (which has obvious interests in discovering ‘racism’ around every corner) were able to prevail against an elected government that at one point seemed determined to overhaul this bad law, the real function of which is not to protect vulnerable individuals from racist abuse but to limit public discussion of highly charged questions on which people can legitimately disagree.” He concluded that “the general cause should [not] be abandoned.”<sup>[99]</sup>

Prominent monarchist and liberal conservative commentator David Flint agreed with Sexton: “It is true that the lobbies opposing change were able to put in more submissions against the exposure draft..... These hardly measure public concern about the Bolt case. Unlike the various lobbies that put in submissions, the rank and file are neither organized nor subsidized to make submissions. Nor should it be thought that this concern is limited to right-wing Tories. It probably extends to traditional Labor supporters, as well as those in many immigrant communities.” Flint felt that there are grounds for a “reconsideration of the interpretation of the section and exemption [18C and 18D], probably at the highest level – the High Court.” He justified this by questioning the judgment of Justice Bromberg. “Another judge could have come to different conclusions on the facts; for example, that there was not a sufficient nexus between the articles and the applicants” race..... While finding a nexus between the articles and race, another judge might not have found it ‘reasonably likely to offend.’ Yet again, another judge might have found that the articles represented a genuine belief held by Bolt, made reasonably and in good faith. The judge might have agreed that Bolt’s mistakes were not such as to deny him the defense, or that he should not be marked down for ‘inflammatory and provocative language.’” Flint felt that the judgment was “a particularly minimalist interpretation of the 18D exemption”. He queried “whether the legislation is constitutionally valid.” This is because, as interpreted by Bromberg, “Section 18C is more about promoting multiculturalism and racial diversity than acting on racial discrimination. The relevant treaty, the UN Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination is only about racial discrimination. Does the external affairs power [in the Constitution] authorize this? And if the legislation is to be given a wide interpretation adopted by Justice Bromberg, is it still consistent with the freedom of political communication that the High Court has found to be implied in the Constitution? It can be argued that on this interpretation, Section 18C with 18D goes beyond being reasonably appropriate and adapted to serve a legitimate end. It could be said that this is not compatible with the maintenance of government prescribed by the Constitution.”[\[100\]](#)

Journalist Nick Cater joined his voice to those skeptical of claims that most Australians wanted no change. He pointed out that “free speech is, and always has been, popular among Australians, a people with a hard-won reputation for speaking their minds” and asked: “Who can tell whether the views of, say, the West Australian Somali Cultural Awareness Association were broadly in line with those of the public? Ditto the views of the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Reference Group, the Secretariat of National Aboriginal and Islander Child Care, the Australian Tamil Congress, the Australian Lawyers Alliance, the Aboriginal Legal Service of WA (Inc.), the Muslim Legal Network, the WA Muslim Lawyers Association, and many, many more.” Cater saw “the new establishment, the enforcers of political correctness who remain firmly in control of most of Australia’s cultural institutions” as the winners from Abbott’s decision. “The repeal of 18C was a disruption to the grievance industry’s business model that they could not countenance.” Perhaps too optimistically, Cater added that he felt that such people had only obtained a Pyrrhic victory: “The chances of its [18C’s] illiberal provisions being exploited again in a case like the one brought against Bolt are practically zero. The toxic influence of the Bolt case on the climate of public debate is recognized as a price too high to pay by the wiser heads on both sides of the cultural divide..... The real issue is not 18C but the illiberal climate that encouraged the complainants in the Bolt case to pursue their audacious case..... For the first time in decades the rights industry is fighting to hold its ground rather than planning its next great adventure.”[\[101\]](#)

One Leni Palk drew attention to the fact that submissions on 18C by group bodies may not have represented truly the views of all members: “I am a lawyer. I belong to the Law Society in SA. It belongs to the Law Council of Australia. I don’t support the retention of 18C. When the Law Society adopts a view, it somehow decides for itself. I often disagree strongly with the position it adopts, but it never asks me what I think and probably isn’t interested.” Claims as to what “the legal profession” thinks and believes should not be taken to assume that lawyers “all sing with one voice.”[\[102\]](#)

David Kemp, a former Coalition cabinet minister under John Howard [PM from 1996 to 2007] and current president of the Liberal Party in Victoria, expressed deep concern at the Government’s back-down, which he wrote had “shocked many Liberals” and was having “repercussions through the Liberal Party”. He argued that hitherto the Party had seen itself as having “a historic role, a special responsibility, to defend... fundamental freedoms of speech, press, religion and association”, this self-interpretation being based on the ideals espoused by the Party’s founder, Sir Robert Menzies, seventy years ago.

“Menzies was very aware of the tendency of politics to degenerate into the appeasement of powerful vested interests. The only way for a government to rise above the struggle of vested interests for privilege, he argued, is to persuade people of the principles on which the public interest is based.” Kemp defended free speech and insisted that there was wide support in Australia for amending Section 18C. “To describe reforms to restore freedom of speech as a ‘needless complication’ in the effort to appease certain interests is to seriously misunderstand, and to affront, many Liberals, and I suspect a good number in the communities concerned. To suggest that national unity requires a legal prohibition on offending certain select groups is unbelievable and demeaning to all.” He warned that the Act “subjects our culture to the discretion of tribunals that easily end up sounding like star chambers.”[\[103\]](#)

Further criticism of Justice Bromberg’s decision in the Bolt case emerged from Chris Merritt, who suggested that it was a judicial error not to have applied community standards rather than those of the group complaining – “an embarrassing deviation from orthodox concepts of fairness.” In particular, Merritt drew attention to what he called a “notorious observation” by the judge that “to import community standards into the test of the reasonable likelihood of offense runs the risk of reinforcing the prevailing level of prejudice.” Commented Merritt: “If there is any passage of case law that deserves to be torn up and discarded, this is it. It suggests that Australians, on the whole, are racially prejudiced and their standards are flawed.”[\[104\]](#)

James Allan returned to the attack with interesting commentary on the behavior of the parliamentary Coalition members: “I was speaking recently to a government backbencher. It quickly became apparent that this MP had been one of those not in favor of proceeding with the Section 18C repeal. But you know what? This MP didn’t even know that Canada’s parliament had repealed the Canadian equivalent of our 18C hate speech laws. He didn’t have a clue..... So in selling the repeal to caucus it would seem that no one had taken the time to point out that they’d done this in Canada.” Allan added: “Ask yourself why a political party that has at most one seat at risk from the dislike of the ‘ethnic vote’ of a Section 18C repeal would weigh that as more important than the supposedly core beliefs of the Liberal Party and its longstanding supporters.”[\[105\]](#) Mike Keane, a medical specialist, challenged the validity of Justice Bromberg’s statement that none of the applicants against Bolt “chose” to be Aboriginal, arguing that “identity, like any other form of consent, is a completely contemporary phenomenon. He claimed that the judge’s decision was “ideologically charged intellectual sophistry” and deplored “the intimidation that results from the fear of being at the behest of a judge.”[\[106\]](#)

A South Australian senator, Bob Day, of the Christian-based Family First party, was so incensed by the Government’s reneging on its promise that he decided to move a private member’s bill to remove the words “offend” and “insult” from Section 18C (the minimalist reform that had been advocated by Spencer Zifcak of Liberty Victoria and many others). He was supported by Liberal Democrat senator David Leyonhjelm and two rebel Liberal senators, Cory Bernardi and Dean Smith.[\[107\]](#) It was expected that other Coalition senators would combine with ALP and Greens senators in voting against the bill on grounds of party loyalty.

XXI

While, from the time of Justice Bromberg’s decision on, there has been enormous and most detailed discussion in Australian public forums (in connection with the free speech issue) of Andrew Bolt’s journalism, the judge’s finding and associated Aboriginal issues, a quite different phenomenon can be noted in the way in which a different associated topic has been handled. I refer to what has usually been referred to as “Holocaust denial”, although I believe that “Holocaust revisionism” is a better, though not completely satisfactory, term.

Dr. Fredrick Töben, author of "Where Truth is no Defence, I Want to Break Free." Photo taken at Martin Place, Sydney. Published with permission of Fredrick Töben

In the first place, very many commentators (politicians, journalists, public figures, letter writers and others) on the issue have felt it appropriate or necessary to condemn “Holocaust denial” or “Holocaust deniers” in their statements. It is astonishing just how many have done so, almost always, if not always, with no attempt to defend their point by reasoned argument or evidence. In order to show just how pervasive this behavior has been, I propose to list most of my collected examples in an endnote.<sup>[108]</sup> There are thirty-six examples there. By contrast there has been an almost total absence of support published for revisionist historians who query the received account of the Holocaust. The Age published a letter by me on 11th November 2013 touching on that view. I related “necessary protections against racial discrimination” (which the paper had editorially advocated) to the London Declaration on Combating Anti-Semitism and wrote: “For too long certain groups and individuals, in Australia and overseas, have sought to use legislation against ‘racial vilification and hatred’ to further their own interests at the expense of the intellectual freedom of others.” On 28th March 2014 The Australian published a letter by me in which I noted that “while there have been a number of derisory comments about Holocaust deniers, there has been no serious and informed debate about the overseas persecution of revisionist historians and whether we want that here.”[\[109\]](#) The paper also published two letters by me defending Fredrick Töben. In one I suggested that “he is better described as a Holocaust revisionist, signifying that he has had the courage to challenge aspects of a key dogma of the age.”[\[110\]](#) In the other I wrote that my earlier letter had “sought explicitly to balance an unfairly negative image of the man and implicitly to protest at a person being made a social pariah because he has expressed unpopular and controversial views.”[\[111\]](#) The Australian also published a letter in which I noted that “overseas, another problem has been that judges may take judicial notice of certain issues under contention, which means the position of one side is taken as gospel truth and the other side barred from even putting an argument.”[\[112\]](#) In yet another published letter I commented that “an unwelcome adverse criticism of a person or a group or an accepted view of history may be perceived by some as vilification when it is valid intellectual dissent.”[\[113\]](#) These letters were merely a drop in the ocean of hostile comment about Holocaust deniers.

It must be admitted that it is very strange that there was so much negative commentary published on Holocaust denial and deniers, with virtually no attempt at justifying argument (occasionally certain assertions were made as though these proved the point). It was strange, too, that at such a time in the national life, when freedom of speech was a major topic of discussion, that public forums avoided publishing opinion articles exploring the nature and history of historical revisionism in general and Holocaust revisionism in particular. However, for much longer than the last three years, there seems to have been a widespread policy of not publishing anything favorable to such research. Freedom Commissioner Tim Wilson opined in one article that “it is not censorship for a newspaper to refuse to give offensive views a platform.”[\[114\]](#) Such is not necessarily always the case; and the habit of regularly publishing negative assessments of a position or a group of people without allowing them commensurate right of reply may well be political censorship exerted not by government but by media.

After all, if Holocaust revisionists are so stupid and so completely in error, as many commentators have averred, how come that they are so feared and so continually denigrated? The suspicion must arise that there is something fishy in the situation. As anyone who has bothered to actually read in detail the works of leading historical revisionists, such as Robert Faurisson, Germar Rudolf, Jürgen Graf, Wilhelm Stäglich, Arthur Butz, Carlo Mattogno and many others, it is utterly plain that misrepresentation on the grand scale is involved. The truth is, then, that in Australia recently we have witnessed mass vilification of, and hatred towards, a group of people as part of the national debate about vilification law, and that this vilification has often been made by those favoring repeal of the law and putting themselves forward as defenders of free speech! One is reminded of Puck’s words in A Midsummer Night’s Dream: “Lord, what fools these mortals be!”

It is interesting to see how prominent Jewish activist Jeremy Jones contributed to the debate. He claimed that for more than eighteen years of the operation of Section 18C, “in all that time, precisely one adjudicated complaint has been the subject of public controversy.”[\[115\]](#) He meant the Bolt case, of course. Jones referred in the same article to the Scully and Töben cases, as well as to two others involving what he felt was unfair treatment of Jews and each of which was dealt with without court action being necessary. He may have been right that the Scully and Töben cases excited little controversy at the time, but there are grounds for thinking that they should have been examined in much greater and more judicious detail by the media than was in fact the case. That is to say, they were not allowed to become controversial. It is interesting to note, in this context, that Senator Brandis, when he had announced the exposure draft, was asked whether there were cases other than that of Bolt where free speech had been stifled and could not – or did not – name a single one.[\[116\]](#) Perhaps he chose not to refer to the Scully and Töben cases through fear of being seen as a supporter of Holocaust deniers!

That the media may be to blame for an unhealthy situation of covert censorship to have developed in recent decades is suggested by behavior of The Age during the recent controversy. On 14th May the paper published a dramatic front page story headed “Holocaust denier backs Brandis race hate law” and sub-headed “The notorious Fredrick Töben may soon be free to deny this happened.” “This” was a photograph of prisoners in striped prison uniform behind barbed wire in what was evidently a German concentration camp. Now Töben has never denied that there were Nazi concentration camps in which prisoners were kept behind barbed wire and made to wear striped prison uniforms. However, when a letter was submitted pointing this out, The Age refused to publish it. Indeed, both The Age and The Australian declined during the national debate to publish any article speaking well of Holocaust revisionism, although I submitted several.

It is hard to see how The Age can justify such barefaced misrepresentation. Its behavior is a stark reminder of the fact that both the term “The Holocaust” and the term “Holocaust denial” are loaded and not neutral or impartial. Ordinary people who have never studied the writings of Holocaust revisionists genuinely imagine that they do deny that there were Nazi concentration camps in which many Jews and others were imprisoned. The revisionists do not, of course. But the blanket term “The Holocaust” has an ambiguity which suggests it. If The Age had published a picture of a homicidal gas chamber, it would have been a different matter; but perhaps it did not because none are available, for the simple reason that the gassing in Nazi camps really was directed against vermin to disinfect clothing and minimize infection by typhus or cholera, and not against human beings.

Töben is prone to exaggerate at times. The Age was able to report that he had claimed that the Racial Discrimination Act is a “flawed law, which only benefits Jewish-Zionist-Israeli interests” and that 18C and 18D are in fact a “Holocaust protection law.” In his submission on the exposure draft he had apparently stated that “the ‘Bolt law’ case was used in an attempt to hide this Holocaust matter and to make it a free expression issue.....the sole aim of this section has always been to legally protect... the Holocaust-Shoah narrative.” There is, of course, much more to the Act than that. There are many different persons and groups who have supported it, and (in some cases) benefited from it, apart from Jewish persons and groups. On the other hand, there is no doubt that many Jewish commentators have seen the Act as protecting their special interests, quite apart from its other functions.

The Age report included various condemnations of Töben. Senator Brandis was reported as having said that he is a “nutter” and that views he had heard attributed to him “are absolute rubbish.” Jewish spokesman Peter Wertheim commented: “Töben has spent a large part of his life vainly attempting to rehabilitate the disgraced record of Nazi Germany.” Tsvi Fleischer, another Jewish spokesperson, stated that Jews “do fear that people like Töben will be able to say whatever they want – which is usually how evil the Jews are all the time.” There he or she, like Töben, was grossly exaggerating. And ALP senator Lisa Singh was reported as claiming that Töben “is wrong in almost everything he says.” All of these comments are mere invective, of course.

The next day The Age returned to the attack on Töben.[\[117\]](#) The paper also published a harrowing story of a 92 year-old Holocaust survivor, Moshe Fizman, who warned that the “forces of darkness” would be unleashed if race-hate laws were watered down. It is hard to see much sign of such forces in laid-back Australia!

Two correspondents to The Australian brought the question of Holocaust denial and the Act into a sensible context. James Miller commented on an article by Mark Leibler: “If... Leibler’s true agenda is to retain so much of 18C as is required to block Holocaust denial, surely the proper way forward is for an open debate about the wisdom of a specific law to shut down such views.”<sup>[118]</sup> And Sholto Douglas disagreed with a prior suggestion that Holocaust denial should be outlawed in order to win Jewish support for free speech in other contexts of race. He pointed out that such legislation would not only be “illiberal”, but that “other groups will ask why Jews alone should have their sensitivities protected.”<sup>[119]</sup>

Journalist Nick Cater did give a kind of consideration to the problem of Holocaust revisionism within the controversy.<sup>[120]</sup> He referred to revelations by former ALP cabinet minister Bob Carr of the degree of power exercised over the Gillard government by Jewish lobby groups and sub-titled his article: “Bob Carr’s claim of a fateful faction has fired up the Fuhrer-fawning fringe.” It was soon evident that he was referring to Töben, whom he termed an “ignominious pretender”, and the Adelaide Institute. There followed the usual sort of invective: “Töben’s notoriety has ensured years of publicity. He has become a martyr within a minority of the community who regard him as a serious historian. The attempt to shut him down has reinforced their belief in an internationally sanctioned conspiracy.... Töben is an altogether more ugly beast.... Holocaust denial undoubtedly is offensive, insulting and humiliating.” However, he argued that it “in itself does not fall into the narrow category of things that can justifiably be suppressed.” Cater even teetered on the brink of opening up serious discussion about what really happened in wartime Nazi Germany, referring to “the blueprints for the factories of mass slaughter built at Auschwitz in 1943” and “architects Walter Dejaco and Fritz Erl.” Robert Faurisson, no doubt, has argued that any such blueprints referred to facilities to deal with vermin, but that is another matter. Cater also referred to Primo Levi who, he claims, “had the measure of these close-minded con men” (Töben and others). It is doubtful that Cater has read Faurisson’s detailed studies of how Levi’s testimony changed over the years in a most suspicious manner.

Some more questionable assertions were provided by Jewish former ALP minister Barry Cohen.<sup>[121]</sup> He began his article with historical assertions that I do not believe are in accord with reality: “As General Dwight Eisenhower led the Allied forces that swept across Europe, he could not believe what he saw as he walked through the concentration camps and gas chambers in which millions of Jews died, along with social democrats, communists, Gypsies, homosexuals and any group hated by the Nazis. Eisenhower demanded that everything be recorded so future generations couldn’t claim it didn’t happen. It hasn’t stopped the idiot brigade from spreading their vile ideas. Fortunately, most of the world’s population know what happened during World War II and they believe it.” Eisenhower no doubt visited German concentration camps and instructed his personnel to record details; but most or all of the rest of Cohen’s assertions may be his own elaboration on what occurred and how it is viewed.

Finally, it is worth recording Andrew Bolt’s own opinion on this aspect of the national debate. “Holocaust denial demeans us, it trivializes us. If we as a society don’t have it in us to laugh at Holocaust deniers and denounce them with our words and not the law, then we really are in a sorry mess.”<sup>[122]</sup> However, he opposed banning it by law.

All in all, the handling of the topic of Holocaust revisionism by the media in Australia during the past three years would appear to have been neither comprehensive nor impartial, this raising the question of how much they really are committed to free speech, their editorial claims notwithstanding.

Why did it happen? Why did the Abbott government fail so ignominiously to return free speech on race to Australians? The way in which the back-down was announced raised immediate suspicions that the alleged need to preserve national unity and win the support of friendly and moderate Muslims in the war against Islamist terrorists was being used as an excuse to camouflage what had really occurred and hide the real truth of the cause or causes of the retreat. The Age published a letter of mine challenging the Government: “The Prime Minister’s explanation for the Government back-down on changes to the Racial Discrimination Act rings hollow. The campaign by sectors of Australian society against reform clearly indicated that we are beset by disunity on matters of fundamental principle within our political order. Terrorism can be fought without resort to abandoning free speech. The suspicion is that the Government has been forced to back down by fear of divisions among Coalition MPs becoming apparent, to the detriment of the image of government unity, and by the danger of the loss of marginal seats at the next elections.”[\[123\]](#)

What, however, if even those explanations are operating as a cover to conceal what really happened behind the scenes? A day or so later I read an article by Brenton Sanderson on the website of The Occidental Observer which fuelled my concern. Heading his article “Australian PM caves in to Jewish lobby on free speech laws”, Sanderson drew attention to an article written by Jewish activist and former editor of The Age Michael Gawenda in Business Spectator.[\[124\]](#) On the basis of this article Sanderson concluded that what had really happened was that Abbott and his Government had capitulated to “a coordinated and sustained campaign initiated and led by Jewish activists.” Gawenda had asserted that “the Jewish community leaders have played a crucial role in organizing opposition to any potential change to the Racial Discrimination Act. It is the opposition of the Jewish communal leaders that had been of major concern to Brandis and... Tony Abbott.”[\[125\]](#)

Sanderson commented: “It is a measure of the power wielded by organized Jewry in Australia that the Prime Minister would rather damage his political credibility by breaking a clear election promise than suffer the consequences of defying the single most powerful group in Australian society.” He brushed aside Gawenda’s purported reason for this obsequiousness: “Gawenda is disingenuous in claiming that the source of the Jewish community’s power in this debate resides in its being a ‘role model for successful multiculturalism’ rather than in its status as a group with the kind of financial, political and media clout to instill genuine fear in those who oppose its interests. As in the United States, Jewish money exerts a dominating influence over Australian politics.”

Gawenda tried to dismiss such an interpretation in his piece. He stated that he was not “wishing to give succor to those who reckon the Jews are too powerful”; and he derided any reader of his article who might “believe that there is a secret cabal of Jews who control Australia – its financial institutions, the media companies, the professions, the courts.” A bullying and jeering tone seems to be detectable in these remarks, and it is difficult not to believe that Gawenda was actually engaging in an act of boasting, despite his disclaimers. “Look, you fellows! See how powerful we are!”

Over forty years ago Wilmot Robertson published a profound study of changes within the United States political order, The Dispossessed Majority[\[126\]](#) Robertson argued that the US majority, British in ethnicity, had been effectively dispossessed of its control of the nation by ethnic minorities and their supporters. He included a 45-page study of the role played by Jewish-Americans. At the present time it appears as though a similar change has happened in Australia. All of a sudden we no longer have a major political party committed to genuine intellectual freedom. Does the suppression that has occurred and is still occurring in many European nations lie just around the corner for us?

It may be difficult to avoid it. Our best literary and ideas magazine, Quadrant, appears to be thoroughly unsympathetic to Holocaust revisionism. Its May 2014 edition carried an orthodox (or bien-pensant) article entitled “The Lethal Ideology of Holocaust Inversion” by Daryl McCann.<sup>[127]</sup> The June edition carried an editorial dealing with the campaign to reform the Racial Discrimination Act, in which the editor stated that Richard Evans’s book Telling Lies about Hitler “not only cost [David] Irving his case [in the British High Court in 2000], it systematically destroyed the credibility of the entire genre of Holocaust denial”, which is a “sleazy business.” Quadrant chose not to publish a short letter I sent querying this sweeping judgment, but in its September edition it published a letter from Jewish intellectual Mark Braham claiming without qualification “Holocaust deniers are proven liars.”

The most important organization in the land that publishes dissident views on Holocaust revisionism and other ethnic controversies is the Australian League of Rights, but it appears to have little influence and was not included to any significant degree by The Australian and The Age in their coverage of the 2012-2014 debate. Perhaps the most encouraging sign is the large number of voices that defended free speech in The Australian. In the meantime, however, we are licking our wounds after a most unwelcome reversal of fortune.

Notes:

[1]	Wikipedia entry for Andrew Bolt, accessed 30th August 2014.
[2]	The articles were titled: “It’s so hip to be black”, “White is the new Black” and “White Fellas in the Black.”
[3]	Wikipedia, op.cit.
[4]	“Andrew Bolt loses racial vilification court case”, Michael Bodey, The Australian , 28th September 2011.
[5]	“Bolt loses high-profile race case”, Karl Quinn, The Age , 28th September 2011.
[6]	“Angry Bolt rejects ‘eugenics’ claim,” Tim Callanan, 30th March 2011.
[7]	See Peter B. English, Land Rights – Birth Rights (The Great Australian Hoax) , Veritas, WA, 1985. For example: “...agitation for Land Rights has not come from Aborigines themselves as direct descendants of the pre-colonization inhabitants of Australia, but from people of mixed racial origin to whom no reference was made in the Constitution, the 1967 Referendum Question nor the Constitutional Amendment resulting therefrom.... half-castes, half-breeds and people of lesser Aboriginal blood are the product of and succeeded colonization by ‘other race’ immigrants from 1788 onwards and, as such, cannot be regarded (ethnically or legally) as being ‘people of the Aboriginal race.’” (pp 94-95) That is one view. By contrast, consider what happened at a conference held under the auspices of the Whitlam ALP government in May 1973: “For voting purposes, the conference unanimously resolved that ‘an Aboriginal’ should be defined as: ‘A person of Aboriginal descent, who identifies as an Aboriginal and is accepted as such by the community with which he is associated.’” “This resolution,” comments English, “was the fatal decision that... was the gateway leading to developing racial tensions...” (p 65) The Whitlam government’s approach ensured that there would now be a much larger number of “Aboriginals” in Australia than under earlier definitions – this leading inevitably, and possibly by design, to a more explosive political situation thereafter.

[8]	See Geoff McDonald, Red over Black , Veritas, WA, 1982. McDonald, a former Communist, had as his central theme “that Australia’s future as a free Western nation was seriously threatened by two movements: one to use the Aboriginal “land rights” issue to eventually establish a separate Aboriginal nation under Communist domination; and the second to fragment a homogeneous and stable Australia by a breaking down of the traditional immigration policy, and by the deliberate fostering of a multiculturalism which could only end with the Balkanization of Australia.” (p v)
[9]	“Bolt, Bromberg and a profoundly disturbing judgment”, Jonathan Holmes, The Drum , ABC, 30th September 2011.
[10]	“Race law fight distracts focus from disadvantage”, 8 August 2012.
[11]	“Get rid of race to stop racism”, The Australian , 31 August 2012. Marcia Langton was at the time the foundation chair of Australian indigenous studies in the University of Melbourne.
[12]	“Race-hate laws must be repealed”, The Australian , 21 October 2011.
[13]	“Erosion of free speech is left unresolved”, The Australian , 21 October 2011.
[14]	“Abbott taps consensus on race act”, The Australian , 10 August 2012.
[15]	James Allan, “Coalition must go further on its defense of free speech”, The Australian , 17 August 2012.
[16]	Phillip Adams is a brilliantly successful writer and journalist of (usually) left-wing views. However, he has also often defended free speech, although his voice was largely silent on this issue after Abbott’s address.
[17]	“True beauty of free speech”, The Australian , 15 June 2012.
[18]	“It’s fine to have standards of speech, enforcing them by law is fascism”, The Australian 17 July 2012.
[19]	“Sound of silence kills free speech”, The Australian , 23 July 2012.
[20]	Ray Finkelstein QC, Federal Court judge, headed an allegedly “independent” Media inquiry (instituted by the ALP Government) from 14 September 2011 which examined the Australian media industry’s regulatory framework. The inquiry’s report was presented to the Government on 28 February 2012.
[21]	“Our right to free speech is under attack”, The Australian , 21 August 2012.
[22]	“Labor wrong on freedom wars”, The Australian , 8 August 2012.
[23]	“We’re still a long way from press freedom with no buts”, The Australian , 22-23 September 2012.
[24]	“Hate campaigns against freedom of speech go all the way back to Socrates,” The Australian , 4-5 August 2012.
[25]	“Freedom to vilify must be checked by freedom from racial vilification”, The Australian , 21 November 2011.

[26]	“Opposition leader embraces multiculturalism as Dutch walk away”, The Australian , 28 June 2011.
[27]	“Brandis to reclaim rights agenda”, The Australian , 30 August 2013.
[28]	“Brandis to repeal section of anti-racism law”, 9 November 2013.
[29]	“PM defies rebels, communities on freedom of speech”, The Australian , 19 March 2014.
[30]	20 March 2014.
[31]	“‘Bolt law’ vow must be kept”, The Australian , December 2013.
[32]	“Free speech crying out for orthodox reform”, The Australian , 13 December 2013.
[33]	Letter in The Australian , 20 December 2013.
[34]	“Rights commission’s odd man out must fix an orthodoxy of selective silence”, The Australian , 20 December 2013.
[35]	Letter in The Australian , 28-29 December 2013.
[36]	“Freedom of speech needs liberating”, 21 December 2013.
[37]	“The Left goes missing in defence of free speech”, 19 December 2013.
[38]	“We all have a right to free speech and it should be no crime to offend”, The Australian , 3 March 2014.
[39]	“Let community rule on discrimination”, The Australian , 7 March 2014.
[40]	Letter in The Australian , 7 March 2014.
[41]	“Race-hate war is already won”, The Australian , 12 March 2014.
[42]	“Political class only paying lip service to free speech”, 12 March 2014.
[43]	“Pollies should keep their word”, The Australian , 14 March 2014.
[44]	“All comment is fair as long as it’s based on fact”, The Australian , 21 March 2014.
[45]	“Free speech is best medicine for the bigotry disease”, The Australian , 26 March 2014.
[46]	Letter in The Australian , 28 March 2014.
[47]	“People should have the right to free speech, says indigenous leader”, The Australian , 27 March 2014.
[48]	“Act failing to stop black-on-black racism”, The Australian , 29-30 March 2014.
[49]	“Claims of racism more damaging than the real thing”, The Australian , 27 March 2014.
[50]	“Your rights and responsibilities”, The Australian , 1 April 2014.
[51]	“Moriarty backs Brandis on rights”, The Australian , 4 April 2014.

[52]	“Smothering free exchange of ideas a dangerous path”, 29-30 March 2014.
[53]	Letter in The Age , 1 April 2014.
[54]	“Bans on bigotry backfire”, The Australian , 2 April 2014.
[55]	“Survivor wary of ‘velvet totalitarianism’”, The Australian , 2 April 2014.
[56]	“Howard backs race act changes”, The Australian , 3 April 2014.
[57]	“We need more than libel laws”, The Australian , 4 April 2014.
[58]	Letter in The Australian , 4 April 2014.
[59]	“Insidious threats to free speech”, The Australian , 5-6 April 2014.
[60]	“Racist ideas are more effectively countered in debate, rather than in court or jail”, The Australian , 5-6 April 2014.
[61]	“One voice on free speech,” The Australian , 9 April 2014.
[62]	Letter in The Australian , 17 April 2014.
[63]	“The slow death of free speech”, 19 April 2014.
[64]	“State censorship of speech kills off the free-thinkers”, The Australian , 19-20 April.
[65]	While The Age editorially argued for reform of 18C, its overall reporting of the whole controversy has been in striking contrast to its editorial stance.
[66]	The Australian , 26-27 April.
[67]	Letter in The Australian , 28 April 2014.
[68]	“Play the race card, get out of jail”, The Australian , 29 April 2014.
[6]	“Human rights expert backs changes to 18C”, The Australian , 1 May 2014.
[70]	“Lawyers must man the rampart of freedom”, The Australian , 2 May 2014.
[71]	“Abolish the Human Rights Commission, and return us to the Enlightenment’s positive values”, The Australian , 3-4 May 2014.
[72]	“ABC could have fact-checked with Chairman Jim before judging Brandis”, The Australian , 6 May 2014.
[73]	“Opening minds to ‘forgotten freedoms’”, The Australian , 17-18 May 2014.
[74]	“Don’t confuse the right to discuss race matters openly with racial hatred”, The Australian , 2 June 2014.
[75]	“Canadians lead the way on free speech”, The Australian , 13 June 2014.
[76]	Letter in The Australian , 14-15 June 2014.
[77]	“Natural justice wins the day”, The Australian , 8 July 2014.
[78]	“Stop hiding behind legislation and allow speech to flow freely”, The Australian , 19-20 July 2014.
[79]	“Forget 18C: just rake paper over the coals”, The Australian , 1 August 2014.

[80]	“Leyonhjelm backs Brandis’s free-speech stand”, The Australian , 4 August 2014.
[81]	Ibid.
[82]	“Be careful what you wish for: bans and censorship tend to bite the hand that voted for them”, The Australian , 7-8 June 2014.
[83]	“Free speech or hate speech? The issue dividing Australia” by Gay Alcorn, The Age , 29 March 2014.
[84]	“18C not stopping racism, says law expert, as Hawke urges no change”, The Australian , 28 March 2014.
[85]	“A-G’s plan falls short of aims”, Spencer Zifcak, The Australian , 4 April 2014. Zifcak, a professor of law at the Australian Catholic University, was surely correct to claim that the Brandis plan “defines vilification and intimidation in terms far more limited than their generally accepted meaning”. He argued that a minor repeal, removing only the terms “insult” and “offend”, would be the best solution. This minimalist position undoubtedly would enjoy majority public support (compared to keeping the Act as it is).
[86]	For example, The Sunday Age reported on 27 April 2014 (“Rebel MPs defiant on hate laws”) that the Government proposals were opposed by “a powerful coalition of ethnic and religious groups” including Jewish, Chinese, Armenian, Arab, Korean, Greek, Vietnamese and Sikh groups. And The Age stated on 15 May 2014 (“Community groups join on hate laws”) that “at least 60 groups have lined up against the changes”. These included “a number of groups representing Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders” as well as some non-ethnic bodies such as the Law Council of Australia and the Australian Confederation of Trades Unions. On 17 April 2014 The Australian reported (“Dump race hate reforms: migrants”) that “the 190 ethnic communities of New South Wales” urged that no change occur. It was referring to a submission lodged by the Community Relations Commission of that state.
[87]	Several such claims have been made. For example, in The Age on 29 March 2014 Tim Soutphommasane, the AHRC’s Race Discrimination Commissioner, wrote (“What kind of society favors bigotry?”) that “a recent survey conducted by researchers at the University of Western Sydney showed that between 66 and 74 per cent of Australians agreed or strongly agreed that it should be unlawful to offend, insult or humiliate on the basis of race”. It has to be noted that such surveys may not be true indicators of overall popular feeling on the whole issue of free speech and racial language. Researchers are not always impartial; questionnaires are not always appropriately and equitably worded; selection of those questioned may be biased or otherwise unfair. On the other hand, Soutphommasane is certainly right to add: “The majority of Australians have a strong commitment to racial tolerance.”
[88]	The opinion articles include the following. From The Australian : “Anti-abuse laws pose no real threat to freedom of speech”, Daniel Meyerowitz-Katz (policy analyst at the Australia/Israel & Jewish Affairs Council), 9 December 2013; “Debate unites unlikely bedfellows”, Spencer Zifcak, 28 February 2014; “Let’s preserve our best legal weapon against racism”, Jeremy Jones (director of international and of community affairs at the Australia/Israel and Jewish Affairs Council); “Auschwitz: why I can’t back Brandis on free

	speech”, Graham Richardson (former ALP federal cabinet minister), 28 March 2014; “Race law changes seriously undermine protections”, Gillian Triggs (president of the AHRC), 28 March 2014; “Race act debate misses the point”, Warren Mundine, Aboriginal leader), 1 April 2014; “A-G’s plan falls short of aims”, Spencer Zifcak, 4 April 2014; “Repeal protects right of bigots”, Craig Emerson (former ALP federal cabinet minister), 5 April 2014. From The Age: “Beware any move to license racial hatred”, Tim Soutphommasane, 3 March 2014; “A war of words over words that wound”, Michael Gordon, 15 March 2014; “Sneers of political correctness hamper race debate”, Bruce Grant (author and former diplomat); “Brandis, bigotry and balancing free speech”, Andrew Lynch (director of the Gilbert and Tobin Centre of Public Law at the University of New South Wales), 26 March 2014; “Free speech is often not so free, Mr Brandis”, Peter Balint (Lecturer in Politics at the University of New South Wales), 27 March 2014; “Brandis’ race hate laws are whiter than white”, Waleed Aly (Muslim leader), 28 March 2014; “What kind of society favours bigotry?”, Tim Soutphommasane, 29 March 2014; “The fault line that runs through the land”, Warwick McFadyen (journalist, in the Sunday Age), 30 March 2014; “Abbott’s double act of competing narratives”, Michael Gordon (political editor), 5 April 2014; “Curse of Australia’s silent pervasive racism”, Waleed Aly, 5 April 2014; “We must stamp on the cockroach of racism”, Tim Soutphommasane, 8 April 2014; “Beware a single-minded protector of freedom”, Sarah Joseph (director of the Castan Centre for Human Rights Law at Monash University), 9 April 2014; “Hate speech bill protects the right to intimidate and vilify”, Jonathan Holmes, 23 April 2014.
[89]	“PM could learn from Pyne’s approach”, Peter van Onselen (a University of Western Australia professor), The Australian , 9-10 August 2014.
[90]	Ibid.
[91]	“Craven cave in on free speech”, The Australian , 6 August 2014.
[92]	“Who will dare to defend free speech?”, Herald Sun , 6 August 2014.
[93]	“We’re muzzled, but bigots rant”, Herald Sun , 7 August 2014.
[94]	“Freedom’s just another word”, 7 August 2014.
[95]	“Watch what you say”, 7 August 2014.
[96]	“Abbott capitulates on race debate”, 7 August 2014.
[97]	In the edition of 8 August 2014.
[98]	“Nothing makes up for silence”, The Australian , 7 August 2014.
[99]	“A pity about 18C, but there will be other free speech battles”, The Australian , 8 August 2014.
[100]	“18C ruling must not be the final word”, The Australian , 8 August 2014.
[101]	“Free-speech phobics cling on”, The Australian , 12 August 2014.
[102]	Letter in The Australian , 13 August 2014.
[103]	“Liberal dismay over 18C”, The Australian , 15 August 2014.

[104]	“Thanks to Carlton, horse has far from bolted on reform of odious provision”, The Australian , 15 August 2014.
[105]	“A shameful back-down on free speech”, The Australian , 10 September 2014.
[106]	“We are free to choose and change our identity”, The Australian , 10 October 2014.
[107]	“Lib rebel backs renewed free-speech push”, The Australian , 3 October 2014.
[108]	Letter by Ron Spielman, The Australian, 21 February 2014, “the counterpart of Thomson’s denials and lies (for example, Holocaust denial)”; “We all have a right to free speech and it should not be a crime to offend”, Michael Sexton SC, The Australian, 3 March 2014, “...Frederick Töben, who denies there is evidence that the Holocaust took place in the late 1930s and early 40s. Töben’s claim is, of course, absurd and naturally offensive to Jewish members of the community.”; The Australian (editorial), 6 March 2014, “That is why The Australian has supported the rights of Holocaust denier David Irving and Dutch anti-Islam MP Geert Wilders to visit Australia, however offensive their messages.”; The Australian (editorial), 12 March 2014, “This law has silenced anti-Semitic websites espousing crackpot theories.....Our civil society should be clever enough to take on Holocaust deniers with facts and win any arguments.”; “Ivory towers shaken by man free of legal baggage”, Janet Albrechtsen (columnist), The Australian, 19 March 2014, “This position, that we need laws such as 18C in the Racial Discrimination Act and courts to tell us that Holocaust denial is abhorrent, treats us like idiots, too stupid to work that out for ourselves.”; “MP risks conflict over race reforms” (news report), The Australian, 24 March 2014, “‘I believe that you can amend 18C without hurting our ability to punish those who racially vilify other people,’ said Mr Frydenberg (Jewish Liberal MP), who is parliamentary secretary to Tony Abbott. ‘It’s about getting that balance right. We do not want Holocaust deniers in this country.’”; “Bigot backlash sours PM’s free speech crusade” (news report), The Australian, 26 March 2014, “In a heated question time, the Opposition seized on the draft changes announced yesterday by Senator Brandis, to claim they could ‘give a green light to bigotry in Australia’ including emboldening Holocaust deniers.”; Letter by Loy Lichtman, The Age, 27 March 2014, “This is what George Brandis’ statement that ‘people have the right to be bigots’ has meant for me:... Holocaust denials made to my face...”; “Race bill sparks denial fears” (news report), The Age, 27 March 2014, “Mr. Jones said he feared this broad exemption would protect Holocaust deniers who vilify Jews under the guise of historical research or political discussion.”; “Holocaust survivors ‘appalled’” (news report), The Australian, 27 March 2014, “The Prime Minister said yesterday that statements denying the Holocaust were ‘ridiculous’, ‘hurtful’ and ‘wrong’..... Mr. Valent said Mr. Abbott’s claim that the best way to refute bad argument was with a good one did not hold true when it came to Holocaust deniers and anti-Semites. ‘These people do not argue from a logical position but rather from an emotional one,’ he said. ‘You can’t have a rational discussion with them because they are not open to logical discussion as they seek to offend, hurt and humiliate. I fear these proposed changes would give anti-Semites free rein, be it Holocaust denial or personal offense.’”; Letter by Claire Jolliffe, The Australian, 28 March 2014, “Regarding the right to be a bigot, my goodness, what century are we living in? As someone who was at the pointy end of the Holocaust, Valent’s argument is comprehensively sound.”; “Auschwitz: why I can’t back Brandis on free speech”, Graham Richardson, The Australian, 28 March 2014, “If any change in the law were to allow the likes of our own home-grown Holocaust denier Frederick Töben or that evil Englishman David Irving, or indeed that nasty piece of work who was the past president of Iran, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, to peddle their bile in our country, then I cannot sign up to it. No ideal of free speech should ever be allowed to make a mockery of the degradation and despair of my friend [an Auschwitz survivor] or the friends and relatives of the millions who died in the Nazi concentration camps...”; “Free speech or hate speech? The issue dividing Australia” (news report), The Age, 29 March 2014, “Frederick Töben....says there was never any systematic German program to kill Jewish people, denies the existence of gas chambers at Auschwitz and claims that Jews exaggerated the numbers murdered during World War II, sometimes for financial gain.... the Federal Court... found that Töben’s views weren’t part of academic debate about the Holocaust, but were designed to ‘smear’ Jews.... Peter Wertheim understands the free speech arguments, but says what is most upsetting about anti-Semitism is not that somebody writes that the Holocaust never happened. It’s the smear, the insinuation about what Jews are like, the dehumanizing of individuals. ‘There’s a role for the law in that,’ he says.”; “How old cases would fare under the new law” (news report), The Age, 29 March 2014, “He [Töben] was found to have lacked good faith because of his ‘deliberately provocative and inflammatory’ language.... [Professor Sarah Joseph] ‘Holocaust denial indicates that the Jews have concocted the Holocaust for self-serving purposes, a classic anti-Semitic idea that has historically provoked hatred against Jewish people.’”; “Smothering free exchange of ideas a dangerous path”, The Australian (editorial), 29-30 March 2014, “We respect the opinions of Holocaust survivors who have voiced their opposition to... proposed changes. It is undeniable, however, that the murderous excesses of Nazism and communism were aided and abetted by a public silence brought about by totalitarian censorship. Post-war Europe has a long tradition of banning hate speech, but...such laws have not prevented racism, anti-Semitism, Holocaust denial and anti-Muslim abuse reaching fever pitch on today’s discontented continent.”; “Act failing to stop black-on-black racism” (news report), The Australian, 29-30 March 2014, “NSW premier Barry O’Farrell....speaking to the Israeli-Australian Chamber of Commerce... said Australia had people who had become internationally notorious as Holocaust deniers. ‘Anything which allows them to get through the legal hoops without them being touched I will vigorously oppose.’”; “No respect for most basic right”, Gabriel Sassoon, The Australian, 29-30 March 2014, “I accept that ignorant bigots will use anti-Semitic stereotypes and deny the Holocaust. The correct response to such racial and ethnic abuse is ridicule.... if some hate group wishes to deny the Holocaust, I disapprove of what they say...”; Letter by John J. Furedy, The Australian, 31 March 2014, “Although a Jewish Holocaust survivor, I opposed the criminalization of statements by Holocaust deniers. Now... I am disturbed by the efforts of those who wish to criminalize rather than just ridiculing and shaming so-called hate speech. A robust freedom of speech distinguishes criminal acts from abhorrent opinions.”; Letter by John Downing, The Australian, 31 March 2014, “Some of the best comedians are Jewish and they make jokes about Jewish society – which could give offense to some – but would never consider a joke relating to the Holocaust....There are some subjects which are beyond the pale and may need to be defined.”; “PM’s council splits over free speech” (news report), The Australian, 1 April 2014, “The Nazis knew this and exploited the courts as a powerful platform for proclaiming their racist hatred when charged under anti-vilification laws in 1920s Germany. Notorious Holocaust denier David Irving is a case in point.”; “Your rights and responsibilities”, Andrew Penfold, The Australian, 1 April 2014, “In some countries (notably France) denying the Holocaust is illegal. Suppressing free speech only plays into the hands of those who peddle myths and lies.”; “Race act debate misses the point”, Warren Mundine, The Australian, 1 April 2014, “Actually, the amendments will give Holocaust deniers a wide berth to incite hatred against Jewish people in public discussion.”; “Freedom of speech needs a much better mouthpiece than Mundine”, James Allan, The Australian, 2 April 2014, “[John Stuart] Mill thought the average Joe was as likely to see through the Holocaust-denying moron or the neo-Nazi nutcase as the sociology professor.”; “Survivor wary of ‘velvet totalitarianism’” (news report), The Australian, 2 April 2014, “Notorious Holocaust-denier and anti-Semite Ernst Zündel..... ‘I have long been disgusted by Zündel’s publicly stated anti-Semitic opinions.’”; “Bans on bigotry backfire”, Alan Dershowitz, The Australian, 2 April 2014, “Jews demand an end to everything deemed to be anti-Semitic, which can include Holocaust denial.”; “Repeal protects rights of bigots”, Craig Emerson (former ALP cabinet minister), The Australian, 5 April 2014, “Yet the Government has assured the Jewish community that Holocaust denial would remain unlawful. Why? If freedom of speech is paramount, it follows logically that racial vilification – defined as inciting hatred – should be lawful.”; “Hate speech best defeated in a free exchange of ideas”, The Australian (editorial), 5-6 April 2014, “In a thoughtful article, columnist and former Labor senator Graham Richardson said no ideal of free speech should ever be allowed to make a mockery of the degradation and despair of the millions who died in the Nazi concentration camps.”; “One voice on free speech”, Janet Albrechtsen (columnist), The Australian, 9 April 2014, “No one minded this stuff [Section 13 in Canada] when it was just being applied to some Holocaust denier sitting in his bedsit writing some unread screed that he was Xeroxing and sending out to his friends.”; “Jewish leader eyes middle path on race act reform” (news report), The Australian, 15 April 2014, “Many within the Jewish community are fiercely opposed to the proposed change, arguing that it would allow Holocaust revisionists to air their views without fear of reprisals.”; “Maybe we shouldn’t have racial vilification laws at all”, Gay Alcorn, The Age, 25 April 2014, “Why should it be unlawful for an idiot like Fredrick Töben to claim the Holocaust never happened?”; “Rebel MPs defiant on hate laws” (news report), Sunday Age, 27 April, “Another flashpoint is that the proposed changes appear to give free rein to Holocaust denial and other forms of anti-Semitism.”; Letter by Moshe Gutnick, Yehoram Ulman and Meir Shlomo Kluwgant (Jewish rabbis), The Australian, 3-4 May 2014, “This week, by coincidence, Jewish communities around the world marked Holocaust Remembrance Day. None of us dares forget, and Wilson and the Government would do well to remember that racist words have evil consequences.”; “Lib states’ blow to Brandis race bid” (news report), The Australian, 3-4 April 2014, “NSW and Victoria have combined to pressure the Commonwealth to dump proposed reforms of the national race-hate laws, warning it will lead to an increase in racial intolerance and Holocaust denial.”; Letter by Merv Bendle, The Australian, 5 April 2014, “That [the Bolt case] seems to have been forgotten and the focus now is on the suppression of Holocaust denial..... the moronic claims of a small number of anti-Semitic fanatics.”; “Craven cave in on free speech”, James Allan, The Australian, 6 August 2014, “Apparently the Government now implicitly agrees that you can’t trust your average Australian to see through the rantings of Neo-Nazi Holocaust deniers.”; “Ditch the dodgy policies, Tony”, Graham Richardson, The Australian , 8 August 2014, “I cannot handle Holocaust deniers. Knowing an Auschwitz survivor who suffered appallingly and who lost many close family members means that I can’t be a party to anyone getting up and saying that her pain is nonsense. The Holocaust is not a fabrication or a devious plot. To me, saying so is such a grave offense to my friend and to every Jew that such words should never be allowed to be uttered.”

[109]	Letter published on 28 March 2014.
[110]	Letter published on 25 June 2013.
[111]	Letter published on 1 July 2013.
[112]	Letter published on 14-15 December 2013.
[113]	Letter published on 22 November 2011.
[114]	“Censorship laws not needed to tackle prejudice”, The Australian , 26 June 2014.
[115]	“Let’s preserve our best legal weapon against racism”, The Australian , 18 March 2014.
[116]	“Maybe we shouldn’t have racial vilification laws at all, Gay Alcorn, The Age , 25 April 2014.
[117]	“Community groups join on hate laws”, 15 May 2014.
[118]	Letter published on 17 April 2014.
[119]	Letter published on 6 May 2014.
[120]	“Diary changes agenda”, The Australian , 15 April 2014.
[121]	“Racist ideas are more effectively countered in debate, rather than in court or jail”, The Australian , 5-6 April 2014.
[122]	“Setting the record straight”, The Age , 3 May 2014.
[123]	Letter published on 7 August 2014.
[124]	The name Brenton Sanderson is unknown to me. The writer appears to be remarkably well informed about Australian affairs, so that I believe him to be an Australian writing under a pen name. His article was published on 8 August 2014.
[125]	“The real reason Abbott broke his promise on Section 18C”, Business Spectator online, 6 August 2014.
[126]	Howard Allen, Box 76, Cape Canaveral, Florida 32920, 1972.
[127]	Quadrant is edited by Keith Windschuttle, who has published important research exposing left-wing misrepresentations of past interactions of European settlers and the Aborigines. Its editorial address is Suite 2/5 Rosebery Place, Balmain, NSW 2041.

"Shortening the War" and "Saving Lives"

by Jett Rucker

A crawl at the end of a recently released movie<sup>1</sup> announced, as though it were some kind of fact, that breaking the encryption of German military communications during World War II “shortened the war” by two years and “saved” 14 million lives (not specifying which sides the lives were on). The hawking of such factoids as these is so profoundly mendacious as possibly to surpass all the other multitudes of lies that are concocted and put about to justify killing and destruction.

So unambiguous, so bald-faced, so inherently factual-sounding is this sort of notion that those at whom it is directed swallow it without so much as an instant of the sort of hesitation that other statements, such as “They instituted a vast program of genocide using gas chambers” could arouse in the preternaturally thoughtful. Much less do they inspire any of the retrospection that memes such as the Domino Theory arouse among those few who indulge in later reflection on ideas that they accepted in the past. Being utterly unprovable, pronouncements such as “Atomic bombs saved 500,000 American lives” pass into unassailable fact without further cavil.

This device, like many others, exploits the limitless character of the logical construct of counterfact. At its purest, counterfact can seem utterly irrefutable, as in “If I don’t pull the trigger of my gun, no bullet will emerge from its muzzle,” which is subject to extensive support, at least so long as your gun remains in your hand and under your control. Once someone else gains control of your gun, of course, a bullet may indeed emerge from its muzzle, quite without your having pulled the trigger.

Thus, the “factuality” of counterfact relies essentially upon typically unvoiced assumptions regarding context (there is, actually, no “factuality” to counterfact, as the term itself implies). This is where the use, and believability, of counterfact becomes the propagandist’s plaything and everyman’s perceptual poison pill. It exploits the universal failure to question, to wonder, to suspect. One can’t, after all, question quite everything one hears, at least not penetratingly or even sufficiently. Counterfact can have the ability to “fly under the radar” that even the most perspicacious among us devote so much of our mental energy toward maintaining.

Alan Turing statue at Bletchley Park is made of about half a million pieces of slate; coincidentally the conservative estimate of the number of German civilian casualties of Allied Strategic Bombing.

Source: By Jon Callas from San Jose, USA (Alan Turing) [CC BY 2.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/2.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Let's parse the assertions that inspired me to write this essay. "Shortened the war." Now, what war? That's obvious. It was the war between Great Britain and Grossdeutsches Reich that began on September 3, 1939 and ended on May 5, 1945 with the surrender of the latter to the former, et al. This war began when Great Britain declared war on Grossdeutsches Reich when the latter invaded Poland, not when Germany attacked Britain, as it did only after sustaining repeated bombing attacks from Britain. So, one way the war could have been shortened, at least from the British-German perspective, would have been for Britain to abstain from declaring war in the first place, for Germany's invasion of a country in fact quite far from its borders. The "war" would never have started in the first place.

But let's just assume that this "war" was in some way inevitable, immutable, required by justice, or whatever. From there, then, what was this war? It was, after the pronouncements at Casablanca of Britain then united with the USSR and the USA, that the requirements on Germany of ending the conflict were "unconditional surrender," that is, complete occupation and subjugation of the people and territory of Germany to its enemies. So, perhaps this "war" could be better described as "the campaign to conquer, occupy and utterly subjugate Germany." Now, some (on the Allied side) might see this also as a noble aim, but others, of a more-thoughtful stripe, might see it as somewhat wasteful of the blood and treasure of both sides, as well as perhaps in excess of "proportionality" of response for having invaded and trying to annex parts of neighboring territory.

But thought along those lines was near-treasonous during the titanic struggle between nations of 1939-1945, and through a pernicious form of suspended animation encouraged by those who benefit from it, the same thoughts might still be as good as treasonous to this very day. Wars, it might be said, are forever, and truces, armistices and peace treaties be damned. Those who profit from past wars number at least as many as those among us who stand to profit from future wars, and must be opposed and counteracted with at least as much vigor as we devote to scotching future projects for destruction and killing.

Let us consider some counter-counterfact. Consider, for example, that the British had not succeeded in breaking the code used by the Germans. The Germans would then have enjoyed various kinds of tactical advantages that they in the event did not enjoy. They might have been able to bomb targets in Britain with less, or no, interference from the RAF's fighter aircraft, in the process crippling British war-production capabilities more than they did.

Conceivably, they might have impaired the Allies' counter-invasion capabilities as demonstrated in Normandy on June 6, 1944 to the point where the invasion might have been repulsed, or even might not have been launched in the first place. Germany would have remained in control of the Continent for another year, during which its control might come, quite realistically, to be seen as indefatigable by the British along with at least their western allies. The Germans might have found more resources to throw against the incursions on its territory approaching from the east from the USSR and from the south up the Italian peninsula, and so on, and so on—such things are ineluctably path-dependent.

Britain and its American allies, who had yet another war to prosecute in the Pacific, after all, might have quietly stood down somewhat in their project of subjugating Germany, or even reached some sort of truce or armistice with the power so invincibly holding much of Europe in its thrall (Britain also had colonies in the Far East to regain from Japanese incursions). History even yet steadfastly maintains a smothering silence as to the numerous and generous peace offers extended to Britain and France by Germany before the entry of the United States made the outcome all but inevitable.

The “war,” however that artifact is delineated, might or might not have been wound down; if it had been, it would have entailed far fewer “deaths” (the 14 million) than in fact it did. It might have “ended” a year or two before it is recorded as having done. All the “scare quotes” around the various terms here used are not only appropriate, they are necessary, as each refers to one sort or another of nominality, such as a “state of war” existing between different polities. Such things are easy to count, but impossible to appreciate for all that they really are, much less could have been, or not been. So, the duration of a war is seen here to be virtually an abstraction, quite aside from who instigated the war, at what rate people are killed in or from it, and which side ultimately in fact wins it. But what about all those “deaths?”

Death, it would seem, cannot, could not, in any way conceivably be judged any sort of abstraction. People are killed, one clearly understands, or they are not killed—rather like the bullet emerging from the muzzle of the gun discussed above. But what is it, at the end of the day, that kills someone? Is it a bomb dropped from the bay of a Lancaster bomber, or is it the decision of Arthur “Bomber” Harris to bomb Lübeck on a certain day in 1945? Is it the decision to attain “unconditional surrender” arrived at in Casablanca on that black day in 1943, or is it the decision of Adolf Hitler to invade Poland on September 1, 1939? Maybe it was the decedent's parents having a child. Who is killed, and quite why, is usually impossible to assign a cause to. If the breaking of the German code “ended the war earlier,” perhaps that saved British lives, and German ones, and those of other nationalities. But the assignment of such non-deaths to any particular cause would seem well beyond even God's capabilities to elucidate.

And then there are the deaths that ensue from one side's gaining an advantage in the sort of killing contest that that war, like all wars, in fact was. Perhaps the people of Coventry were spared a bombing attack in 1943 because of a decryption of a German order. The crews of the intercepted bombers would have sustained quite a number of deaths from the successful interdiction by the RAF's fighters. But back in Coventry, where munitions, guns, bombs and perhaps even bombers were made, the RAF's capabilities to visit death and destruction upon the people of Germany, and even France when it came time to counter-invade that country, were significantly increased. Do the deaths thus imposed come into this calculation of 14 million lives saved? Maybe the lives saved were British, or American, and others were not counted, at least not if they were deaths instead of continued lives.

God is quite what those who announce such conclusions as the "two years" and "14 million" pretend to be. Do we who read the crawl after an interesting movie discern what is being attempted on our faculties? If we hear a voice in our dreams commanding us to go forth and ... whatever, do we understand that that was God's voice, and that we must obey, to the extent our energies and fortunes enable us to?

Actually, no. The one was a dream, and the other is a lie, perhaps invidious, perhaps merely romantic, or perhaps even just hoped to arouse favorable emotions, for whatever benefit that might eventually impart to the liars.

Propaganda is in the very air we breathe. We can no more filter out lies from our perceptions than we can hold our breaths. But, opposed to our inevitable failures, we can nonetheless extend our efforts to cleanse ourselves of the poisons in which we are immersed well above our heads every day of our lives, to find those points of greater vulnerability, and fortify those, in hopes that, thus spared, we might retain enough energy to resist yet another assault on our grasp of truth.

The assault, we may confidently expect, will be made—always and everywhere. From it, we each of us will be able to glean only such truth as we manage successfully to choose as such—or as close to it as we can get.

---

Notes:

1	The Imitation Game , a seriously ahistorical portrayal of the life and role in code-breaking of Alan Turing.
-------------------	---

The Anti-Hitler Underground within the German Conservative Revolution

by Kerry R. Bolton

In recent years more has become known about the anti-Hitler underground acting within German conservative and military circles. The book Secret Germany by Baigent and Leigh went a long way to popularize the events surrounding “Operation Valkyrie,” the assassination plot against Hitler.<sup>[1]</sup> The character of Colonel Claus von Stauffenberg, perhaps the most well-known figure in the 20 July 1944 plot, figured prominently in the Tom Cruise movie “Valkyrie” in 2008. Stauffenberg was one of an intellectual circle that gathered around the poet Stefan George.

Such circles among the military and intelligentsia were elitist and saw Hitlerism as another democratic pandering to the masses. Others, including those in what has been widely termed the “Conservative Revolution,” attempted to appeal to the masses with the ideology that the nation and the state are the organized expressions of a volk. The volk in the German sense is something other than Darwinistic race, and it is ironic that the Hitlerites embraced concepts of race that were more English than German. The volk is a spiritual-cultural entity organized into a community by the state. Therefore, there was something intrinsically “socialist” about the nationalist movements in Germany, insofar as “socialism” is defined as duty to the state as the organized volk community, as distinct from both bourgeois liberal-democratic and Marxian economic doctrines. Hence, even Oswald Spengler, one of the leading spokesmen of the conservative post-war generation, in his epochal book The Decline of the West, pointed out that so-called “proletarian movements” were merely the capitalism of the lower classes, and sought to appropriate rather than transcend capitalism.<sup>[2]</sup> Spengler referred instead to “Prussian Socialism,” defined as an ethic of duty. German “nationalists” were intrinsically “socialist” in this sense. Indeed, there is a German School of Economics, like there is an English School of Economics, the former standing for social control of the economy in the service of the nation; the latter standing for the liberal notion of the state existing as little more than a referee between individualistic relations.<sup>[3]</sup>

Among those who emerged in Germany amidst the moral, spiritual, cultural and political crises of World War I were thinkers and activists that converged from both Left and Right to form a broad movement called the “conservative revolution.” Such figures included the National Socialists, emerging prior to Hitler from Anton Drexler’s and Karl Harrer’s German Workers’ Party; the philosopher-historian Spengler; Gregor and Otto Strasser; Möller van der Bruck;<sup>[4]</sup> the writers Edgar Jung;<sup>[5]</sup> and Ernst Junger; and Ernst Niekisch, among others.

Ernst Jünger, (March 29, 1895 – February 17, 1998)
[Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Some of these luminaries of the “conservative revolution,” including Niekisch and the Strasser brothers, had started politically in the Socialist party. The First World War had caused an ideological crisis within the world socialist movement, as many leading socialists, when the call for duty towards one’s nation came, rejected “internationalism” and were among the leading spokesman for the war effort as securing their nation’s “place in the sun.” Among the most famous of these was Benito Mussolini, one of the most capable leaders of the Italian Socialist party, whose call for Italian intervention in the war placed him in alliance with the Nationalists; a unity that was to emerge as Fascism after the war. It was a phenomenon that occurred throughout the world. Even the Bolsheviks were split, with Lenin, in the pay of the Germans, demanding an immediate armistice with Germany, while Trotsky, who seems to have been backed by the Entente, resigned as foreign minister over the issue.

After 1928 there was a major shift in the Soviet Union, when Stalin began eliminating the Trotskyites and other factions, proceeding to create a modern centralized pan-Slavic state. Stalin undertook a long-term fight to eliminate the excrescences of Marxist dogma.<sup>[6]</sup> It is in Stalinist Russia that we see the origins of what became known as National Bolshevism.

Leo Schlageter

Möller van den Bruck was one of the key members of the Juni-Klub, founded in June 1919, as a non-partisan organization of intellectuals to discuss national and social issues. There were many editors, journalists, authors and others of note, including future Reich Chancellor Heinrich Brüning. Otto Strasser was also a member.<sup>[7]</sup> Hitler was a guest speaker, who was immediately impressed by van den Bruck, but the admiration was not reciprocated; van den Bruck regarded Hitler as lacking ideological depth.<sup>[8]</sup>

Although the Juni-Klub was drawn from the intelligentsia of the “conservative revolution” they sought dialogue with the radical Left in their revolt against bourgeois-liberalism; in particular Comintern representative Karl Radek. Radek was a most unlikely figure in this role, resembling an anti-Semitic stereotype of a scruffy Jewish Bolshevik. Another guest was Spengler, whose views accorded in many ways with van den Bruck's, although van den Bruck's primary contention with Spengler was that Germany – and Russia – had emerged from the war as “young peoples” detached from the decaying Western civilization, with the chance to start anew. Otto Strasser remarked how impressed the Juni-Klub members were with both Spengler and van den Bruck, the two being regarded as complementary rather than antagonistic.[\[9\]](#)

It was within this milieu of conservative revolutionaries that a strong socialist element arose that saw the “young peoples” of Russia and Germany defying the corrupt and dying bourgeois liberal-capitalist powers. Some nations were “proletarian” rather than bourgeois, insofar as work and duty rather than capital and egotism were the new ethos; what Spengler called “Prussian Socialism,”[\[10\]](#) and what others called “National Socialism,” and ‘National Bolshevism’. Seeing Germany's destiny aligned with Russia was a major impetus for the development of National Bolshevism. Many of the Nationalist Right looked to Russia beyond Marxism and saw a new, vital nation emerging that was outside of the bourgeois world system of President Woodrow Wilson's “Fourteen Points,” of global commerce and parliamentarianism. Even Spengler, whose philosophy is as far removed from Marxism as one can imagine, advocated pro-Soviet foreign and trade policies.[\[11\]](#)

The Treaty of Rapallo signed with Russia in 1922 was initiated in this widespread belief that Germany had to move towards Russia to circumvent the Versailles diktat and beyond that to forge a new destiny. General von Seeckt and other military leaders even prior to Rapallo established alliances between the German and Soviet armies to circumvent the restrictions imposed by Versailles.

Hence when Radek of the Comintern began negotiating with the German Right, as early as 1919 a pro-Soviet sentiment had already been developing even among the most militant anti-Communists. In 1921 Möller wrote of an “axis” between Communists and Nationalists against the corruption of liberal individualism, and its parliamentarianism. German Communists would have to start thinking nationally. He stated that no German worker would fight the USSR, and eschewed the call from General Ludendorff, aligned with the Nazi party, for an international crusade against the USSR. Möller welcomed Rapallo as a move in the right direction. [\[12\]](#)

With a common enemy in France, Radek made an appeal to German nationalism in his speech before the Comintern executive committee in a eulogy to Leo Schlageter, who had been executed by the French in 1923 for his part in a Freikorps sabotage attempt in the French-occupied Ruhr. That Schlageter had also been a fighter against Bolshevism was inconsequential in the broader scheme of politics. Radek suggested to the Comintern that the Russians make common cause with the Germans “to throw off the yoke of Entente capital for the enslavement of the German and Russian peoples.” Radek asked, “Against whom did the German people wish to fight: against the Entente capitalists or against the Russian people? With whom did they wish to ally themselves: with the Russian workers and peasants in order to throw off the yoke of Entente capital for the enslavement of the German and Russian peoples?” He stated “we believe that the great majority of the nationalist-minded masses belong not to the camp of the capitalists but to the camp of the workers. We want to find, and we shall find the path to these masses.”[\[13\]](#)

National Bolshevism

The term “National Bolshevism” was first applied to the doctrine of the Nationalist scholar Paul Eltzbacher, a Jewish professor of law at Berlin University in April 1919. Although a member of the German National Party, he advocated social ownership of production in the interests of the nation. This was dubbed nationaler Bolschewismus by the newspaper Deutsche Tageszeitung.<sup>[14]</sup> In November Radek referred to this, stating that “honest nationalists as Eltzbacher, displeased by the peace of Versailles [...] have looked for a union with Soviet Russia in what they have called national bolshevism [...]” The Hamburg Circle of the German Communist Party, led by Heinrich Laufenberg and Fritz Wolffheim, saw a Soviet revolt as resurrecting Germany as a great power. Radek called this doctrine “national Bolsheviki.”<sup>[15]</sup>

Hence, there was a nationalist current among the radical Left and a socialist and pro-Soviet current among the radical Right, both inimical to liberalism and the plutocracy, and seeing the possibility of Germany and Russia forming a common front.

For a few months after the Radek speech there was collaboration between the radical Left and Right. Communist party meetings in honor of Schlageter were adorned both with the Red Star and the Swastika, the latter a symbol not only of Hitler’s NSDAP but also of the Freikorps and various sundry Nationalist leagues. A pamphlet on Schlageter included Radek’s speech and articles by Möller, Count Ernst zu Reventlow, foreign policy adviser for the NSDAP, and Frölick of the Communist Party.<sup>[16]</sup>

Ernst Niekisch

The leading spokesman for the National Bolsheviks was Ernst Niekisch. He was one of a circle that formed around the writer of the frontline war generation, Ernst Jünger, and Helmut Franke, Freikorps veteran and editor of Die Standarte. They called for a “nationalist workers’ republic.”<sup>[17]</sup> Others in the circle included Niekisch’s colleague Karl O. Paetel, and Otto Strasser, future leader of the anti-Hitler underground, the Black Front. This circle that met Friday evenings throughout 1929 also included the Communists Bertold Brecht and Ernst Toller.<sup>[18]</sup>

The association between the paramilitary and youth bunds with National Bolshevism was extensive given that these associations were anti-Marxist. There was much about the new Soviet Man that was akin to the coming class of worker-soldier-technician prophesied as the New Man of the future by Jünger.<sup>[19]</sup> In 1930 Jünger became co-editor of the National Bolshevik newspaper Die Kommenden (The Coming) founded in 1925. Die Kommenden was co-edited by Niekisch’s primary National Bolshevik colleague Karl Paetel. The paper was influential among the nationalist youth leagues.

Niekisch had been a member of the short-lived Munich Soviet, an Independent Socialist, and a member of the Old Social Democratic Party. He established the Soviet of workers and soldiers at Augsburg in 1919, and served as president. He was the only Munich Soviet member to vote against Bavaria becoming a Soviet Republic, considering the region unsuitable as a Bolshevik state.

Niekisch was jailed in May 1919 by the Freikorps, which suppressed the Munich Soviet. While jailed for his role in the Soviet revolt he took an increasingly nationalistic view. He served a two-year sentence, not having supported the lunatic actions of the Bavarian Soviet Republic, and assumed a seat in the provincial parliament as a Social Democrat. He soon resigned his seat and moved to Berlin, increasingly opposed to the appeasement policy of the Social Democrats towards the French occupation of the Ruhr, and their acceptance of the Dawes Plan for reparations repayments.

In 1925 Niekisch became editor of Firn (The Snowfield), influenced by the German socialist Ferdinand Lasalle, who had been an antagonist of the Marx-Engels faction. The nationalist sentiments that were emerging among the radical Left, including the Communist Workers Party, a rival to the Communist Party, were attacked by the Leftist luminary Eduard Bernstein. However, Niekisch was far from isolated among the Left, and worked closely with the socialist youth group Circle Hofgeismar, from which he would draw support for his own newspaper. In 1926 Niekisch was expelled from the Social Democratic Party and from his presidency of the textile union.

That year Niekisch established the newspaper Widerstand (Resistance) largely for the purpose of advocating a pro-Russian direction. The byline of the paper was “Writings for a socialist-revolutionary nationalist politics.” Niekisch wrote of the common opposition to liberalism:

The liberal democratic parliamentarian flees from decision. He does not want to fight but to talk. The Communist wants a decision. In his roughness there is something of the hardness of the military camp; in him there is more Prussian hardness than he knows, even more than in a Prussian bourgeois.<sup>[20]</sup>

Niekisch was supported by the Freikorps Bund Oberland and by the Social Democrats in Saxony, and directed the newspaper Volksstaat in Dresden. In 1928 Niekisch founded a publishing house also named Widerstand, lectured throughout Germany, and gained support from the ‘Left’ of the NSDAP, Gregor and Otto Strasser, Count Ernst zu Reventlow, Joseph Goebbels, then a protégé of Gregor Strasser, and the influential conservative-Catholic judicial scholar Carl Schmitt. In October 1929 Niekisch led the opposition to the Young Plan for the payment of reparations. Most youth factions, including those of the Hitlerites, supported such opposition. Supporters of his newspaper Widerstand were organized into a movement, Circles Widerstand. The program included a strong state, withdrawal from the international economy, a Spartan lifestyle, the reinvigoration of peasantry and the rural in opposition to urbanization. Widerstand also advocated a geopolitical German-Slavic bloc embracing Russia and even then rejecting American banality.

In the conflict between Stalin and Trotsky for the soul of Russia, Niekisch and the National Bolsheviks opposed Trotsky. Niekisch praised Stalin’s economic reorganization as one of national autarky.

Niekisch also saw German collaboration in the development of Siberia as a means by which Russia could stem the “Yellow tide” in a geopolitical bloc stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific.<sup>[21]</sup>

Soviet Russia and the German Right

Niekisch traveled to the Soviet Union in 1932 where he met Radek.<sup>[22]</sup> This association between the Soviet Union and the German Right was not isolated. Arplan (Association for the Study of the Planned Economy of Soviet Russia) included Communists, and Rightists such as Count Ernst zu Reventlow; Arplan chairman, Lenz, a close associate of the National Bolsheviks; Ernst Jünger; and Römer, a prominent National Bolshevik who had served in the Oberland Bund. The Arplan members were composed of approximately one-third conservative-revolutionaries and National Bolsheviks.<sup>[23]</sup>

Another association cultivating ties between the “Right” and the Soviet Union was the BGB, Bund Geistige Berufe (League of Professional Intellectuals), founded in 1931. The aim of the BGB was “to attract into the orbit of our influence a range of highly placed intellectuals of rightist orientation,” according to Soviet documents. Niekisch, Jünger and Lenz were members.<sup>[24]</sup> David-Fox explains:

The hybrid left-right nature of both Arplan and the Bund reflects not only the breadth of interest in the Soviet economic model during the first phase of Stalinism, but also mixing the cross-fertilization among the radical intellectuals of Left and Right in social circles and salons at the end of Weimar. Many of the far-right figures in Arplan shared a fascination with the military-utopian mass mobilization and national autarky embodied in the Soviet industrialization drive.[\[25\]](#)

Hitlerism

During the 1920s Niekisch regarded the NSDAP as a genuine national-revolutionary movement. His attitude changed with the re-establishment of the party in 1925, after the release of Hitler from Landsberg Prison following the abortive Munich Putsch.

Certainly within the NSDAP there were large and important social-revolutionary factions. The most important was the North German section of the NSDAP run virtually as a separate party by Gregor Strasser.

In 1932 Niekisch wrote a warning, the book Hitler, ein deutsches Verhängnis. Like Spengler, he was suspicious of the mass demagoguery of the NSDAP. In particular he retained his support for Stalin and a Russo-German alliance. In March 1937 Niekisch and seventy Widerstand supporters were detained. In January 1939 Niekisch was sentenced to life imprisonment for “high treason.”

Other National Bolsheviks continued underground, such as Harro Schulze-Boysen, who had maintained dialogue with Communists and Nationalists during the Weimar era. He had been an advocate of a united socialist Europe, and had organized in 1932 a congress of revolutionary youth, drawing a hundred delegates from throughout Europe. A friend of Niekisch’s National Bolshevik colleague Paetel, that year Schulze-Boysen began publishing the periodical Gegner with support from the Soviet embassy, rejecting liberalism and advocating rule by a new elite.

Although he was arrested briefly in 1933, his parents’ connections were able to get him released. Schulze-Boysen had already established an underground network. In 1936 he helped form the “Red Orchestra” spy ring. With wireless contact he relayed information to the USSR. While serving as a Luftwaffe officer Schulze-Boysen was arrested by the Gestapo and shot in 1942 along with many others of the Red Orchestra. [\[26\]](#)

Gregor and Otto Strasser

The Strasser brothers were leaders of the anti-Hitler opposition, offering an alternative form of National Socialism, which they contended maintained the original revolutionary program of the NSDAP. While Gregor remained within the NSDAP, having a large personal following, in the hope of transforming the party, Otto left at an early stage and formed the League of Revolutionary National Socialists.

Otto Strasser gives a speech a year after his return home to Germany to his newly formed party - The German Social Union (1957)

By SchwarzerFront (Own work) [GFDL (<http://www.gnu.org/copyleft/fdl.html>) or CC BY-SA 3.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Otto, a wounded, decorated, frontline soldier, was a socialist, but was disgusted by the anti-national Marxism of the Communists such as Kurt Eisner. He consequently joined the Freikorps to fight the Communists in Bavaria.<sup>[27]</sup> Gregor, also with a distinguished military service, formed his own formidable Freikorps, and became a prominent personality in Lower Bavaria. <sup>[28]</sup> It is a mistake to assume that those who joined the Freikorps against the Bolsheviks were all right-wing militarists. Many were Socialists. Otto joined the German Social Democratic party, which had been prominent in resisting the Communist insurrection.<sup>[29]</sup> He was assailed from the Left for his patriotism, and from the Right for his socialism, and left the Socialist party.<sup>[30]</sup>

Gregor had joined the NSDAP in 1920, bringing over his Freikorps. Otto did not join until 1925, several years after the Munich Putsch, Gregor also having been jailed for his part in the putsch. With Hitler still in jail, Gregor assumed leadership of the NSDAP, and was elected to the Reichstag. Even after Hitler's release, the Strassers were the real leaders of the NSDAP in North Germany.<sup>[31]</sup> The Strasser faction pursued its own course, for example supporting the metalworkers' strike in Saxony, while the Hitler faction opposed it.<sup>[32]</sup> With Gregor's protégé Goebbels swayed by the Hitler faction's resources, Hitler's faction managed to isolate Strasser. In a confrontation in Berlin with Otto, Hitler accused him of "Bolshevism."<sup>[33]</sup> After a five-year struggle within the NSDAP for the direction of National Socialism, Otto and his supporters were expelled.<sup>[34]</sup>

The Black Front

Otto Strasser formed the League of Revolutionary National Socialists. After the defection of the Berlin S.A. (Brownshirted Stormtroopers) to Otto, the movement was named the Black Front. Its adherents included Major Buchrucker, who had after the world war formed a secret 100,000-strong Black Reichswehr, with the support of the regular Army to circumvent the Versailles diktat.<sup>[35]</sup> Also aligned was The Young German Order, whose leader, Lt. Mahraun, was incarcerated under the Hitler regime; and the radical peasant leader Klaus Hein, from Schleswig-Holstein. The aim was to infiltrate the NSDAP, the S.A. and all other branches of the party, for the day when Hitler might be overthrown.[36]

Until the NSDAP assumption of power, Otto was well-known for his public debates with the Left and Right alike, although Hitler refused his challenge.[37] By 1940, 600-700 Front members were incarcerated. Thousands of others had received short prison terms and had since been set free. Of course there were many others who remained working clandestinely in the party, the S.A., Labor Front etc. [38]

Germany had in fact been close to electing Gregor Strasser as Chancellor instead of Hitler, but General Schleicher's efforts were undermined by von Papen and others,[39] and Gregor did not have the Machiavellian character to play at intrigue. Such was the revolutionary-socialist sentiment within the S.A. that the infamous 1934 purge, "The Night of the Long Knives," was required to suppress it. Gregor, having left politics was nonetheless shot during the purge, as were General Schleicher and his wife.

Gregor Strasser (1928)

Bundesarchiv, Bild 119-1721 / CC-BY-SA [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Soon after Hitler assumed power, the Black Front offices in Berlin were ransacked, and thousands of members detained. Otto issued an order for all supporters who were not known to enter the ranks of the party, state and military.[40] Pursued by the SS, he crossed into Austria, where the Front had also been organized. Here he published Die Deutsche Revolution, bearing the crossed sword and hammer symbol of the Front. This was smuggled into Germany, 50,000 at a time. With the fall of Austria, Otto resumed activities in Prague. Millions of mini-stickers with the sword and hammer and slogans such as "The Black Front will oust Hitler" were sent into Germany. A radio transmitter, the "Black Front Sender," was established by Rudolf Formis, beaming into Germany, and regarded as a 'technical marvel'. [41] The march of Hitler across Europe brought Strasser to Switzerland and to Paris. He called for a broad alliance under the slogan

“Neither Fascism nor Bolshevism, but the alliance of army, workers and youth.”

Otto’s (and Gregor’s) “German Socialism” was based on thoroughly German – and wider European—traditions, including the concept that one is the custodian rather than owner of land, and hence occupancy imposes a social duty. The concept is extended to commerce, and involves the recreation of guilds and the creation of a corporatist state where the “Estates” are represented directly rather than through parties. Germany would be federated into Cantons on the Swiss model, within a federated Europe.[\[42\]](#)

Black Front branches were formed among German émigrés throughout South America, under the leadership of Bruno Fricke. Despite Otto’s record of anti-Hitler opposition, when he settled in Ottawa he was “quarantined,” despite his work to rally German-Canadians against Hitler, his newspaper articles and his “psychological profile” of Hitler for the Office of Strategic Service. While the British had assisted him in leaving Portugal, they did not want him in Britain and the USA did not want him, because his views did not accord with liberalism. He was settled in Canada.[\[43\]](#) By 1942 both British and U.S. officialdom were describing him as “a dangerous man,”[\[44\]](#) although the Canadian press called him the leader of “Germany’s greatest underground movement,” and he had wide public recognition in Canada.[\[45\]](#) By December 1942 he was totally silenced on orders from London and Washington, his mail examined, and deprived of a livelihood.[\[46\]](#)

Post-War

In 1947, with Otto barred from returning to Germany, Bruno Fricke formed the League of German Renewal. This organization however was denied a license to operate by the Allies.[\[47\]](#) Otto did not relent in denouncing the occupation of Germany by the Allies.[\[48\]](#) In December 1949 the Allies got assurances from other countries that Otto and his brother Paul would be kept out of Europe.[\[49\]](#) Otto nonetheless expanded contacts in Germany with nationalists who campaigned for neutrality during the Cold War, which many believed would become a shooting war. Despite his vitriol against the USSR the Western powers were suspicious, as he had been offered Russian assistance to return to Germany.[\[50\]](#) Soviet East Germany (the DDR) even asked Otto to become part of their “National Front” coalition of parties in 1950 and assist with the building of a Russo-German alliance. While Strasser declined, Fricke wrote an “open letter to Stalin” urging such an alliance against the West, referring to the invincibility of a “Socialist Germany and Communist Russia.”[\[51\]](#)

In 1953 Otto won his fight in the courts to become renaturalized and he could not be denied a visa, but the Bonn regime prolonged obstructions. However, with the threat from the Socialist Reich Party and other “extremists” who were demanding neutrality effectively dealt with in 1952, and the Adenauer regime entrenched, Strasser was permitted to return in 1955. The U.S. Army newspaper Stars and Stripes, full of historical errors, reported the return.[\[52\]](#) He established the Deutsche Soziale Union, advocating that Germans should be prepared to shoot anyone, Russians or Americans, to secure their freedom. The party got nowhere however, in the climate of post-war Allied repression. Disillusioned, Otto returned to Canada, and died in 1974.

Niekisch, always an advocate of a Russo-German alliance, however, did settle in the DDR. Almost blind and semi-paralyzed, Niekisch was freed from a prison at Brandenburg-Görden by the Soviet Army on 27 April 1945. He took a professorship of sociology at Humboldt University, and later became director of the Institute for the Study of Imperialism. He joined the Communist Party and the subsequent Socialist Unity Party (SED), and settled in Berlin. His prestige was such that he wrote the speech of Social Democratic leader Otto Grotewohl declaring unity between the Social Democrats and Communists in forming the SED. In 1948 he was elected to the board of the Cultural Association for the Democratic Renewal of Germany, and to the Constitutional Committee of the People's Congress that would lay the foundations of the DDR. In 1950 he became a member of the Presidium of the ruling "National Front" coalition. By 1951 however he was increasingly out of favor with the regime, his institute was closed, and by 1954 he had resigned from the SED and all offices. Under the Bonn regime, he was denied a pension from the State as a victim of Nazism because of his post-war support for the SED and DDR, finally getting compensation in 1966. Nonetheless, he remained in Berlin, where died in 1967.<sup>[53]</sup>

Questions for Today

Although it has been assumed that Niekisch became a Marxist after the war due to his joining the SED, he had always championed a Russo-German alliance. This was not on the basis of Marxism but on a widespread realization, even among Conservatives, that the USSR would transcend Marxist dogma, and that Russia and Germany were natural geopolitical allies in rejecting bourgeois-liberalism.

In 1958 Niekisch showed that he had not changed his views. He still regarded what is now widely advocated within Russia as a "Eurasian bloc" as having the greatest "reserve of energies," to which the future would belong, while the "decline and descent" of the West appeared "inexorable." The question now was whether the "best cultural values of Europe" could be "salvaged" and incorporated into a Russian-led new age. It was the basic question that had been asked by the Widerstand movement after World War I. It is the same question that today remains of paramount importance. As decaying Rome was revitalized from the North, can the West be revitalized from the East, for a new cultural symbiosis to emerge as the basis of a New Age? Niekisch in 1958 saw Russia as the arbiter of this, enacted by "an elite of the spirit," replacing the "plutocratic elite," but avoiding the demagoguery of mass democratic politics. "The Hitler-Reich" had been a triumph of this "demagogy over a spiritual elite," the "demagogue a travesty of the spiritual leader."<sup>[54]</sup>

These are questions that are again being asked over Europe and further, and one sees with ever more frequency the unfurling of the banner of the Black Front sword-and-hammer in conjunction with the Widerstand eagle-hammer-sickle-sword. One also sees such ideas discussed at the highest levels of Russian politics and academia.

---

Notes:

[1]	Michael Baigent and Richard Leigh, Secret Germany: Stauffenberg and the Mystical Crusade against Hitler (Penguin Books, 1995).
[2]	Oswald Spengler, The Decline of The West (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1971), Vol. II p. 402.
[3]	The German School was exemplified by Friedrich List, the English by Adam Smith. Marx was a product and student of the English School and hence reflects the mirror image of liberal capitalism.
[4]	Möller van der Bruck was regarded as the prime spokesman of the "conservative revolution", and coined the term "The Third Reich" with his book Das Dritte Reich . Möller was greatly admired by certain National Socialists such as Goebbels, a socialist at heart who had served his political apprenticeship in the so-called “Left wing” of the Nazi party under Gregor Strasser. However, by 1939 Möller had been repudiated by the Nazis. See Fritz Stern, The Politics of Cultural Despair: A Study in the Rise of the Germanic Ideology (Anchor Books, 1965), p. 361.

[5]	Jung was one of those killed in the 1934 purge known as The Night of the Long Knives.
[6]	K. R. Bolton, Stalin: the Enduring Legacy (London: Black House Publishing, 2012).
[7]	Fritz Stern, op. cit., pp. 279-281.
[8]	Ibid., pp. 292-293.
[9]	Ibid., p. 294.
[10]	Oswald Spengler, Prussianism and Socialism (1920), https://archive.org/details/PrussianismAndSocialism
[11]	Addressing a group of industrialists in Essen in 1922 Spengler stated that Marxism is an imported and imposed doctrine not in keeping with the Russian character, and would soon be transformed into something quite different. He urged German businessmen and politicians to align with Russia. Spengler, “The Two Faces of Russia and Germany’s Eastern Problems,” 1922; published in Politische Schriften , 1932; http://home.alphalink.com.au/~radnat/spengler/twofaces.htm
[12]	Cited by Fritz Stern, op. cit., pp. 305-306.
[13]	Karl Radek, ‘Leo Schlageter: The Wanderer into the Void’, Speech at a plenum of the Executive Committee of the Communist International, June 1923. English translation first published in Labour Monthly September 1923. https://www.marxists.org/archive/radek/1923/06/schlageter.htm
[14]	Michael David-Fox, Fascination and Enmity: Russia and Germany as Entangled Histories 1914-1945 (University of Pittsburgh Press, 2012), p. 8.
[15]	Ibid.
[16]	Bernice G. Rosenthal, New Myth, New World: From Nietzsche to Stalinism (Penn State University Press, 2004), p. 378.
[17]	See K. R. Bolton, “Jünger and National Bolshevism”, in Troy Southgate (ed.) Jünger, Thoughts &amp; Perspectives Vol. 11 (London: Black Front Press, 2012), p. 6.
[18]	Thomas R. Nevin, Ernst Jünger and Germany: Into the Abyss 1914-1945 (Duke University Press, 1996), p. 106.
[19]	See K. R. Bolton, “Jünger and National Bolshevism”, op. cit.
[20]	E. Niekisch, “Entscheidung”, Widerstand , Berlin, 1930, p. 134.
[21]	For this writer’s exposition of similar ideas see K. R. Bolton, Geopolitics of the Indo-Pacific: Emerging Conflicts, New Alliances (London: Black House Publishing, 2013).
[22]	Michael David-Fox, op. cit., p. 10.

[23]	Ibid., pp. 8-9.
[24]	Ibid., p. 10.
[25]	Ibid., p. 11.
[26]	“The National Revolutionary Movement in Weimar,” The National Revolutionary Alternative, Part II, 9 January 2012, http://national-revolutionary.blogspot.co.nz/2012/01/national-revolutionary-movement-in_09.html
[27]	Douglas Reed, Nemesis? The Story of Otto Strasser (London: Jonathon Cape, 1940), p. 51. Reed, senior London Times European correspondent between the world wars, remained Otto’s leading English-speaking protagonist. Reed was among the first to warn of the rise of Hitler. After the war he became a leading writer on the nexus between Zionism, Communism and international finance. See in particular his last book The Controversy of Zion .
[28]	Ibid., p. 58.
[29]	Ibid., p. 66.
[30]	Ibid., p. 69.
[31]	Ibid., p. 79.
[32]	Ibid., p. 92.
[33]	Ibid., p. 100.
[34]	Ibid., p. 114.
[35]	Ibid., p. 117.
[36]	Ibid., p. 115.
[37]	Ibid., p. 127.
[38]	Ibid., pp. 127-129.
[39]	Ibid., p. 137.
[40]	Ibid., p. 151.
[41]	Ibid., p. 180.
[42]	Otto Strasser, Germany Tomorrow (London: Jonathan Cape, 1940).
[43]	Deborah Kiatky, The United States and the European Right 1945-1955 (Ohio State University, 2005), p. 89.
[44]	Ibid., p. 90.
[45]	Ibid.
[46]	Ibid., p. 91.
[47]	Ibid., p. 97.
[48]	Ibid., p. 92.
[49]	Ibid., p. 97.

[50]	Ibid.
[51]	“Strasser asked to join East German Reds”, The Manitoba Ensign, 8 April, 1950. Indeed, German nationalists and prominent military veterans were included in the Soviet-run coalition, right up to the fall of the Eastern bloc. These were grouped into the National Democratic Party of Germany (NDPD) not to be confused with the so-called “neo-Nazi” NPD that continues to exist. Stalin had insisted that the DDR include German nationalists in the State apparatus, in contrast to the Allied policy of hanging, starving and impoverishing veterans, and their families. See: K. R. Bolton, ‘Stalin’s German-Nationalist Party’, Inconvenient History, Vol. 6, No. 1, 2014, http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2014/volume_6/number_1/stalins_german_nationalist_party.php
[52]	William Mahoney, “Otto Strasser returns with ‘new’ platform,” Stars and Stripes, 19 March, 1955.
[53]	Dietmar Gottfried, “The National Bolshevism of Ernst Niekisch,” Telepolis, 28 January 2012.
[54]	Ernst Niekisch, Gewagtes Leben (Cologne: Kiepenheuer and Wistch, 1958), pp. 145-155, cited by Roger Griffin, Fascism (Oxford University Press, 1995), pp. 318-319.

Winston Churchill Discreetly Veiled, Part 1

by Ralph Raico

- Periodicals
  - English
  - Inconvenient History
  - Vol. 7 \(2015\)
  - No. 2
-

This document is part of the Inconvenient History periodical. Use this menu to find more documents that are part of this periodical.

This paper is part of the series Winston Churchill Discreetly Veiled. Click below for the previous or next item of the series. Click on 'up' to return to the series' Table of Contents.

Churchill as Icon

When Professor Harry Jaffa proposed that Winston Churchill was not only the Man of the Twentieth Century but The Man of Many Centuries,[\[1\]](#) he found that many agreed with him. I did not.

Personally, Man of Many Centuries sounds absurd. Was Winnie greater than Bismarck, than Washington or Jefferson, than Isaac Newton or Martin Luther? But Man of the Twentieth Century is totally appropriate, for that was the century of the State — of the rise and hypertrophic growth of the welfare-warfare state — and Churchill was from first to last a Man of the State, of the welfare state and of the warfare state. War, of course, was his lifelong passion; and, as an admiring historian has written: "Among his other claims to fame, Winston Churchill ranks as one of the founders of the welfare state."[\[2\]](#) Thus, while Churchill never had a principle he did not in the end betray,[\[3\]](#) this does not mean that there was no slant to his actions, no systematic bias. There was, and that bias was towards lowering the barriers to state power.

To gain any understanding of Churchill, we must go beyond the heroic images propagated for over half a century. The conventional picture of Churchill, especially of his role in World War II, was first of all the work of Churchill himself, through the distorted histories he composed and rushed into print as soon as the war was over.[\[4\]](#) In more recent decades, the Churchill legend has been adopted by an internationalist establishment for which it furnishes the perfect symbol and an inexhaustible vein of high-toned blather. Churchill has become, in Christopher Hitchens's phrase, a "totem" of the American establishment, not only to the scions of the New Deal, but to the neo-conservative apparatus as well — politicians like Newt Gingrich and Dan Quayle, corporate "knights" and other denizens of the Reagan and Bush Cabinets, the editors and writers of the Wall Street Journal, and a legion of "conservative" columnists led by William Safire and William Buckley. Churchill was, as Hitchens writes, "the human bridge across which the transition was made" between a noninterventionist and a globalist America.[\[5\]](#) In the Twenty-First Century, it is not impossible that his bulldog likeness will feature in the logo of the New World Order.

Let it be freely conceded that in 1940 Churchill played his role superbly. As the military historian Major-General J.F.C. Fuller, a sharp critic of Churchill's wartime policies, wrote: "Churchill was a man cast in the heroic mold, a berserker ever ready to lead a forlorn hope or storm a breach, and at his best when things were at their worst. His glamorous rhetoric, his pugnacity, and his insistence on annihilating the enemy appealed to human instincts, and made him an outstanding war leader."[\[6\]](#) History outdid herself when she cast Churchill as the adversary in the duel with Hitler. It matters not at all that in his most famous speech — "we shall fight them on the beaches ... we shall fight them in the fields and in the streets" — he plagiarized Clemenceau at the time of the Ludendorff offensive, that there was little real threat of a German invasion or, that, perhaps, there was no reason for the duel to have occurred in the first place. For a few months in 1940, Churchill played his part magnificently and unforgettably.[\[7\]](#)

Opportunism and Rhetoric

Yet before 1940, the word most closely associated with Churchill was "opportunist."[\[8\]](#) He had twice changed his party affiliation — from Conservative to Liberal, and then back again. His move to the Liberals was allegedly on the issue of free trade. But in 1930, he sold out on free trade as well, even tariffs on food, and proclaimed that he had cast off "Cobdenism" forever.[\[9\]](#) As head of the Board of Trade before World War I, he opposed increased armaments; after he became First Lord of the Admiralty in 1911, he pushed for bigger and bigger budgets, spreading wild rumors of the growing strength of the German Navy, just as he did in the 1930s about the buildup of the German Air Force.[\[10\]](#) He attacked socialism before and after World War I, while during the War he promoted war-socialism, calling for nationalization of the railroads, and declaring in a speech: "Our whole nation must be organized, must be socialized if you like the word."[\[11\]](#) Churchill's opportunism continued to the end. In the 1945 election, he briefly latched on to Hayek's Road to Serfdom, and tried to paint the Labor Party as totalitarian, while it was Churchill himself who, in 1943, had accepted the Beveridge plans for the post-war welfare state and Keynesian management of the economy. Throughout his career his one guiding rule was to climb to power and stay there.

There were two principles that for a long while seemed dear to Churchill's heart. One was anti-Communism: he was an early and fervent opponent of Bolshevism. For years, he — very correctly — decried the "bloody baboons" and "foul murderers of Moscow." His deep early admiration of Benito Mussolini was rooted in his shrewd appreciation of what Mussolini had accomplished (or so he thought). In an Italy teetering on the brink of Leninist revolution, Il Duce had discovered the one formula that could counteract the Leninist appeal: hypernationalism with a social slant. Churchill lauded "Fascismo's triumphant struggle against the bestial appetites and passions of Leninism," claiming that "it proved the necessary antidote to the Communist poison."[\[12\]](#)

Yet the time came when Churchill made his peace with Communism. In 1941, he gave unconditional support to Stalin, welcomed him as an ally, embraced him as a friend. Churchill, as well as Roosevelt, used the affectionate nickname, "Uncle Joe"; as late as the Potsdam conference, he repeatedly announced, of Stalin: "I like that man."[\[13\]](#) In suppressing the evidence that the Polish officers at Katyn had been murdered by the Soviets, he remarked: "There is no use prowling round the three year old graves of Smolensk."[\[14\]](#) Obsessed not only with defeating Hitler, but with destroying Germany, Churchill was oblivious to the danger of a Soviet inundation of Europe until it was far too late. The climax of his infatuation came at the November, 1943, Tehran conference, when Churchill presented Stalin with a Crusader's sword.[\[15\]](#) Those who are concerned to define the word "obscenity" may wish to ponder that episode.

Finally, there was what appeared to be the abiding love of his life, the British Empire. If Churchill stood for anything at all, it was the Empire; he famously said that he had not become Prime Minister in order to preside over its liquidation. But that, of course, is precisely what he did, selling out the Empire and everything else for the sake of total victory over Germany.

Besides his opportunism, Churchill was noted for his remarkable rhetorical skill. This talent helped him wield power over men, but it pointed to a fateful failing as well. Throughout his life, many who observed Churchill closely noted a peculiar trait. In 1917, Lord Esher described it in this way:

He handles great subjects in rhythmical language, and becomes quickly enslaved to his own phrases. He deceives himself into the belief that he takes broad views, when his mind is fixed upon one comparatively small aspect of the question.[\[16\]](#)

During World War II, Robert Menzies, who was the Prime Minister of Australia, said of Churchill: "His real tyrant is the glittering phrase — so attractive to his mind that awkward facts have to give way."[\[17\]](#) Another associate wrote: "He is ... the slave of the words which his mind forms about ideas.... And he can convince himself of almost every truth if it is once allowed thus to start on its wild career through his rhetorical machinery."[\[18\]](#)

But while Winston had no principles, there was one constant in his life: the love of war. It began early. As a child, he had a huge collection of toy soldiers, 1500 of them, and he played with them for many years after most boys turn to other things. They were "all British," he tells us, and he fought battles with his brother Jack, who "was only allowed to have colored troops; and they were not allowed to have artillery."[\[19\]](#) He attended Sandhurst, the military academy, instead of the universities, and "from the moment that Churchill left Sandhurst ... he did his utmost to get into a fight, wherever a war was going on."[\[20\]](#) All his life he was most excited — on the evidence, only really excited — by war. He loved war as few modern men ever have[\[21\]](#) — he even "loved the bangs," as he called them, and he was very brave under fire.

The Prime Minister Winston Churchill fires a Thompson "Tommy" submachine gun alongside Supreme Allied Commander of the Allied Expeditionary Force General Dwight D Eisenhower as American soldiers look on in southern England in late March 1944.

By War Office official photographer Horton (Cpt) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

In 1925, Churchill wrote: "The story of the human race is war."<sup>[22]</sup> This, however, is untrue; potentially, it is disastrously untrue. Churchill lacked any grasp of the fundamentals of the social philosophy of classical liberalism. In particular, he never understood that, as Ludwig von Mises explained, the true story of the human race is the extension of social cooperation and the division of labor. Peace, not war, is the father of all things.<sup>[23]</sup> For Churchill, the years without war offered nothing to him but "the bland skies of peace and platitude." This was a man, as we shall see, who wished for more wars than actually happened.

When he was posted to India and began to read avidly, to make up for lost time, Churchill was profoundly impressed by Darwinism. He lost whatever religious faith he may have had — through reading Gibbon, he said — and took a particular dislike, for some reason, to the Catholic Church, as well as Christian missions. He became, in his own words, "a materialist — to the tips of my fingers," and he fervently upheld the worldview that human life is a struggle for existence, with the outcome the survival of the fittest.<sup>[24]</sup> This philosophy of life and history Churchill expressed in his one novel, Savrola.<sup>[25]</sup> That Churchill was a racist goes without saying, yet his racism went deeper than with most of his contemporaries.<sup>[26]</sup> It is curious how, with his stark Darwinian outlook, his elevation of war to the central place in human history, and his racism, as well as his fixation on "great leaders," Churchill's worldview resembled that of his antagonist, Hitler.

When Churchill was not actually engaged in war, he was reporting on it. He early made a reputation for himself as a war correspondent, in Kitchener's campaign in the Sudan and in the Boer War. In December 1900, a dinner was given at the Waldorf-Astoria in honor of the young journalist, recently returned from his well-publicized adventures in South Africa. Mark Twain, who introduced him, had already, it seems, caught on to Churchill. In a brief satirical speech, Twain slyly suggested that, with his English father and American mother, Churchill was the perfect representative of Anglo-American cant.[\[27\]](#)

Churchill and the "New Liberalism"

In 1900 Churchill began the career he was evidently fated for. His background — the grandson of a duke and son of a famous Tory politician — got him into the House of Commons as a Conservative. At first he seemed to be distinguished only by his restless ambition, remarkable even in parliamentary ranks. But in 1904, he crossed the floor to the Liberals, supposedly on account of his free-trade convictions. However, Robert Rhodes James, one of Churchill's admirers, wrote: "It was believed [at the time], probably rightly, that if Arthur Balfour had given him office in 1902, Churchill would not have developed such a burning interest in free trade and joined the Liberals." Clive Ponting notes that: "as he had already admitted to Rosebery, he was looking for an excuse to defect from a party that seemed reluctant to recognize his talents," and the Liberals would not accept a protectionist.[\[28\]](#)

Tossed by the tides of faddish opinion,[\[29\]](#) with no principles of his own and hungry for power, Churchill soon became an adherent of the "New Liberalism," an updated version of his father's "Tory Democracy." The "new" liberalism differed from the "old" only in the small matter of substituting incessant state activism for laissez-faire.

Although his conservative idolaters seem blithely unaware of the fact — for them it is always 1940 — Churchill was one of the chief architects of the welfare state in Britain. The modern welfare state, successor to the welfare state of 18th-century absolutism, began in the 1880s in Germany, under Bismarck.[\[30\]](#) In England, the legislative turning point came when Asquith succeeded Campbell-Bannerman as Prime Minister in 1908; his reorganized cabinet included David Lloyd George at the Exchequer and Churchill at the Board of Trade.

Of course, "the electoral dimension of social policy was well to the fore in Churchill's thinking," writes a sympathetic historian — meaning that Churchill understood it as the way to win votes.[\[31\]](#) He wrote to a friend:

No legislation at present in view interests the democracy. All their minds are turning more and more to the social and economic issue. This revolution is irresistible. They will not tolerate the existing system by which wealth is acquired, shared and employed.... They will set their faces like flint against the money power — heir of all other powers and tyrannies overthrown — and its obvious injustices. And this theoretical repulsion will ultimately extend to any party associated in maintaining the status quo.... Minimum standards of wages and comfort, insurance in some effective form or other against sickness, unemployment, old age, these are the questions and the only questions by which parties are going to live in the future. Woe to Liberalism, if they slip through its fingers.[\[32\]](#)

Churchill "had already announced his conversion to a collectivist social policy" before his move to the Board of Trade.<sup>[33]</sup> His constant theme became "the just precedence" of public over private interests. He took up the fashionable social-engineering clichés of the time, asserting that: "Science, physical and political alike, revolts at the disorganization which glares at us in so many aspects of modern life," and that "the nation demands the application of drastic corrective and curative processes." The state was to acquire canals and railroads, develop certain national industries, provide vastly augmented education, introduce the eight-hour work day, levy progressive taxes, and guarantee a national minimum living standard. It is no wonder that Beatrice Webb noted that Churchill was "definitely casting in his lot with the constructive state action."<sup>[34]</sup>

It is curious how, with his stark Darwinian outlook, his elevation of war to the central place in human history, and his racism, as well as his fixation on "great leaders," Churchill's worldview resembled that of his antagonist, Hitler.

Following a visit to Germany, Lloyd George and Churchill were both converted to the Bismarckian model of social insurance schemes.<sup>[35]</sup> As Churchill told his constituents: "My heart was filled with admiration of the patient genius which had added these social bulwarks to the many glories of the German race."<sup>[36]</sup> He set out, in his words, to "thrust a big slice of Bismarckianism over the whole underside of our industrial system."<sup>[37]</sup> In 1908, Churchill announced in a speech in Dundee: "I am on the side of those who think that a greater collective sentiment should be introduced into the State and the municipalities. I should like to see the State undertaking new functions." Still, individualism must be respected: "No man can be a collectivist alone or an individualist alone. He must be both an individualist and a collectivist. The nature of man is a dual nature. The character of the organization of human society is dual."<sup>[38]</sup> This, by the way, is a good sample of Churchill as political philosopher: it never gets much better.

But while both "collective organization" and "individual incentive" must be given their due, Churchill was certain which had gained the upper hand:

The whole tendency of civilisation is, however, towards the multiplication of the collective functions of society. The ever-growing complications of civilisation create for us new services which have to be undertaken by the State, and create for us an expansion of existing services. ... There is a pretty steady determination ... to intercept all future unearned increment which may arise from the increase in the speculative value of the land. There will be an ever-widening area of municipal enterprise.

The statist trend met with Churchill's complete approval. As he added:

I go farther; I should like to see the State embark on various novel and adventurous experiments.... I am very sorry we have not got the railways of this country in our hands. We may do something better with the canals.<sup>[39]</sup>

This grandson of a duke and glorifier of his ancestor, the arch-corruptionist Marlborough, was not above pandering to lower-class resentments. Churchill claimed that "the cause of the Liberal Party is the cause of the left-out millions," while he attacked the Conservatives as "the Party of the rich against the poor, the classes and their dependents against the masses, of the lucky, the wealthy, the happy, and the strong, against the left-out and the shut-out millions of the weak and poor."<sup>[40]</sup> Churchill became the perfect hustling political entrepreneur, eager to politicize one area of social life after the other. He berated the Conservatives for lacking even a "single plan of social reform or reconstruction," while boasting that he and his associates intended to propose "a wide, comprehensive, interdependent scheme of social organization," incorporated in "a massive series of legislative proposals and administrative acts."<sup>[41]</sup>

At this time, Churchill fell under the influence of Beatrice and Sidney Webb, the leaders of the Fabian Society. At one of her famous strategic dinner parties, Beatrice Webb introduced Churchill to a young protégé, William — later Lord — Beveridge. Churchill brought Beveridge into the Board of Trade as his advisor on social questions, thus starting him on his illustrious career.<sup>[42]</sup> Besides pushing for a variety of social insurance schemes, Churchill created the system of national labor exchanges: he wrote to Prime Minister Asquith of the need to "spread ... a sort of Germanized network of state intervention and regulation" over the British labor market.<sup>[43]</sup> But Churchill entertained much more ambitious goals for the Board of Trade. He proposed a plan whereby:

The Board of Trade was to act as the "intelligence department" of the Government, forecasting trade and employment in the regions so that the Government could allocate contracts to the most deserving areas. At the summit ... would be a Committee of National Organisation, chaired by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to supervise the economy.<sup>[44]</sup>

Finally, well aware of the electoral potential of organized labor, Churchill became a champion of the labor unions. He was a leading supporter, for instance, of the Trades Disputes Act of 1906.<sup>[45]</sup> This Act reversed the Taff Vale and other judicial decisions, which had held unions responsible for torts and wrongs committed on their behalf by their agents. The Act outraged the great liberal legal historian and theorist of the rule of law, A.V. Dicey, who charged that it confers upon a trade union a freedom from civil liability for the commission of even the most heinous wrong by the union or its servants, and in short confers upon every trade union a privilege and protection not possessed by any other person or body of persons, whether corporate or unincorporate, throughout the United Kingdom ... . It makes a trade union a privileged body exempted from the ordinary law of the land. No such privileged body has ever before been deliberately created by an English Parliament.<sup>[46]</sup>

It is ironic that the immense power of the British labor unions, the bête noire of Margaret Thatcher, was brought into being with the enthusiastic help of her great hero, Winston Churchill.

World War I

In 1911, Churchill became First Lord of the Admiralty, and now was truly in his element. Naturally, he quickly allied himself with the war party, and, during the crises that followed, fanned the flames of war. When the final crisis came, in the summer of 1914, Churchill was the only member of the cabinet who backed war from the start, with all of his accustomed energy. Asquith, his own Prime Minister, wrote of him: "Winston very bellicose and demanding immediate mobilization.... Winston, who has got all his war paint on, is longing for a sea fight in the early hours of the morning to result in the sinking of the Goeben. The whole thing fills me with sadness."<sup>[47]</sup>

On the afternoon of July 28, three days before the German invasion of Belgium, he mobilized the British Home Fleet, the greatest assemblage of naval power in the history of the world to that time. As Sidney Fay wrote, Churchill ordered that:

The fleet was to proceed during the night at high speed and without lights through the Straits of Dover from Portland to its fighting base at Scapa Flow. Fearing to bring this order before the Cabinet, lest it should be considered a provocative action likely to damage the chances of peace, Mr.

Churchill had only informed Mr. Asquith, who at once gave his approval.[\[48\]](#)

No wonder that, when war with Germany broke out, Churchill, in contrast even to the other chiefs of the war party, was all smiles, filled with a "glowing zest."[\[49\]](#)

From the outset of hostilities, Churchill, as head of the Admiralty, was instrumental in establishing the hunger blockade of Germany. This was probably the most effective weapon employed on either side in the whole conflict. The only problem was that, according to everyone's interpretation of international law except Britain's, it was illegal. The blockade was not "close-in," but depended on scattering mines, and many of the goods deemed contraband — for instance, food for civilians — had never been so classified before.[\[50\]](#) But, throughout his career, international law and the conventions by which men have tried to limit the horrors of war meant nothing to Churchill. As a German historian has dryly commented, Churchill was ready to break the rules whenever the very existence of his country was at stake, and "for him this was very often the case."[\[51\]](#)

The hunger blockade had certain rather unpleasant consequences. About 750,000 German civilians succumbed to hunger and diseases caused by malnutrition. The effect on those who survived was perhaps just as frightful in its own way. A historian of the blockade concluded: "the victimized youth [of World War I] were to become the most radical adherents of National Socialism."[\[52\]](#) It was also complications arising from the British blockade that eventually provided the pretext for Wilson's decision to go to war in 1917.

Whether Churchill actually arranged for the sinking of the Lusitania on May 7, 1915 is still unclear.[\[53\]](#) A week before the disaster, he wrote to Walter Runciman, president of the Board of Trade, that it was "most important to attract neutral shipping to our shores, in the hopes especially of embroiling the United States with Germany."[\[54\]](#) Many highly placed persons in Britain and America believed that the German sinking of the Lusitania would bring the United States into the war.

The most recent student of the subject is Patrick Beesly, whose Room 40 is a history of British Naval Intelligence in World War I. Beesly's careful account is all the more persuasive for going against the grain of his own sentiments. He points out that the British Admiralty was aware that German U-boat Command had informed U-boat captains at sea of the sailings of the Lusitania, and that the U-boat responsible for the sinking of two ships in recent days was present in the vicinity of Queenstown, off the southern coast of Ireland, in the path the Lusitania was scheduled to take. There is no surviving record of any specific warning to the Lusitania. No destroyer escort was sent to accompany the ship to port, nor were any of the readily available destroyers instructed to hunt for the submarine. In fact, "no effective steps were taken to protect the Lusitania." Beesly concludes:

unless and until fresh information comes to light, I am reluctantly driven to the conclusion that there was a conspiracy deliberately to put the Lusitania at risk in the hope that even an abortive attack on her would bring the United States into the war. Such a conspiracy could not have been put into effect without Winston Churchill's express permission and approval.[\[55\]](#)

In any case, what is certain is that Churchill's policies made the sinking very likely. The Lusitania was a passenger liner loaded with munitions of war; Churchill had given orders to the captains of merchant ships, including liners, to ram German submarines if they encountered them, and the Germans were aware of this. And, as Churchill stressed in his memoirs of World War I, embroiling neutral countries in hostilities with the enemy was a crucial part of warfare: "There are many kinds of maneuvers in war, some only of which take place on the battlefield.... The maneuver which brings an ally into the field is as serviceable as that which wins a great battle."[\[56\]](#)

In the midst of bloody conflict, Churchill was energy personified, the source of one brainstorm after another. Sometimes his hunches worked out well — he was the chief promoter of the tank in World War I — sometimes not so well, as at Gallipoli. The notoriety of that disaster, which blackened his name for years, caused him to be temporarily dropped from the Cabinet in 1915.[\[57\]](#) His reaction was typical: To one visitor, he said, pointing to the maps on the wall: "This is what I live for ... Yes, I am finished in respect of all I care for — the waging of war, the defeat of the Germans."[\[58\]](#)

Between the Wars

For the next few years, Churchill was shuttled from one ministerial post to another. As Minister of War — of Churchill in this position one may say what the revisionist historian Charles Tansill said of Henry Stimson as Secretary of War: no one ever deserved the title more — Churchill promoted a crusade to crush Bolshevism in Russia. As Colonial Secretary, he was ready to involve Britain in war with Turkey over the Chanak incident, but the British envoy to Turkey did not deliver Churchill's ultimatum, and in the end cooler heads prevailed.[\[59\]](#)

In 1924, Churchill rejoined the Conservatives and was made Chancellor of the Exchequer. His father, in the same office, was noted for having been puzzled by the decimals: what were "those damned dots"? Winston's most famous act was to return Britain to the gold standard at the unrealistic pre-war parity, thus severely damaging the export trade and ruining the good name of gold, as was pointed out by Murray N. Rothbard.[\[60\]](#) Hardly anyone today would disagree with the judgment of A.J.P. Taylor: Churchill "did not grasp the economic arguments one way or the other. What determined him was again a devotion to British greatness. The pound would once more 'look the dollar in the face'; the days of Queen Victoria would be restored."[\[61\]](#)

So far Churchill had been engaged in politics for 30 years, with not much to show for it except a certain notoriety. His great claim to fame in the modern mythology begins with his hard line against Hitler in the 1930s. But it is important to realize that Churchill had maintained a hard line against Weimar Germany, as well. He denounced all calls for Allied disarmament, even before Hitler came to power.[\[62\]](#) Like other Allied leaders, Churchill was living a protracted fantasy: that Germany would submit forever to what it viewed as the shackles of Versailles. In the end, what Britain and France refused to grant to a democratic Germany they were forced to concede to Hitler. Moreover, if most did not bother to listen when Churchill fulminated on the impending German threat, they had good reason. He had tried to whip up hysteria too often before: for a crusade against Bolshevik Russia, during the General Strike of 1926, on the mortal dangers of Indian independence, in the abdication crisis. Why pay any heed to his latest delusion?[\[63\]](#)

Churchill had been a strong Zionist practically from the start, holding that Zionism would deflect European Jews from social revolution to partnership with European imperialism in the Arab world.[\[64\]](#) Now, in 1936, he forged links with the informal London pressure group known as The Focus, whose purpose was to open the eyes of the British public to the one great menace, Nazi Germany. "The great bulk of its finance came from rich British Jews such as Sir Robert Mond (a director of several chemical firms) and Sir Robert Waley-Cohn, the managing director of Shell, the latter contributing £50,000." The Focus was to be useful in expanding Churchill's network of contacts and in pushing for his entry into the Cabinet.[\[65\]](#)

Though a Conservative MP, Churchill began berating the Conservative governments, first Baldwin's and then Chamberlain's, for their alleged blindness to the Nazi threat. He vastly exaggerated the extent of German rearmament, formidable as it was, and distorted its purpose by harping on German production of heavy bombers. This was never a German priority, and Churchill's fabrications were meant to demonstrate a German design to attack Britain, which was never Hitler's intention. At this time, Churchill busily promoted the Grand Alliance<sup>[66]</sup> that was to include Britain, France, Russia, Poland, and Czechoslovakia. Since the Poles, having nearly been conquered by the Red Army in 1920, rejected any coalition with the Soviet Union, and since the Soviets' only access to Germany was through Poland, Churchill's plan was worthless.

Ironically — considering that it was a pillar of his future fame — his drumbeating about the German danger was yet another position on which Churchill reneged. In the fall of 1937, he stated:

Three or four years ago I was myself a loud alarmist.... In spite of the risks which wait on prophecy, I declare my belief that a major war is not imminent, and I still believe that there is a good chance of no major war taking place in our lifetime.... I will not pretend that, if I had to choose between Communism and Nazism, I would choose Communism.<sup>[67]</sup>

For all the claptrap about Churchill's "farsightedness" during the 30s in opposing the "appeasers," in the end the policy of the Chamberlain government — to rearm as quickly as possible, while testing the chances for peace with Germany — was more realistic than Churchill's.

The common mythology is so far from historical truth that even an ardent Churchill sympathizer, Gordon Craig, feels obliged to write:

The time is long past when it was possible to see the protracted debate over British foreign policy in the 1930s as a struggle between Churchill, an angel of light, fighting against the velleities of uncomprehending and feeble men in high places. It is reasonably well-known today that Churchill was often ill-informed, that his claims about German strength were exaggerated and his prescriptions impractical, that his emphasis on air power was misplaced.<sup>[68]</sup>

Moreover, as a British historian has recently noted: "For the record, it is worth recalling that in the 1930s Churchill did not oppose the appeasement of either Italy or Japan."<sup>[69]</sup> It is also worth recalling that it was the pre-Churchill British governments that furnished the material with which Churchill was able to win the Battle of Britain. Clive Ponting has observed:

the Baldwin and Chamberlain Governments ... had ensured that Britain was the first country in the world to deploy a fully integrated system of air defence based on radar detection of incoming aircraft and ground control of fighters ... Churchill's contribution had been to pour scorn on radar when he was in opposition in the 1930s.<sup>[70]</sup>

---

Notes:

This article originally appeared in slightly different form as a chapter of Ralph Raico's Great Wars and Great Leaders: A Libertarian Rebuttal (Auburn, Ala: Ludwig Van Mises Institute, 2010).

[1]	Harry V. Jaffa, "In Defense of Churchill," Modern Age 34, no. 3 (Spring 1992): 281. For what it is worth, Henry Kissinger, "With Faint Praise," New York Times Book Review , July 16, 1995, p. 7, has gone so far as to call Churchill "the quintessential hero."
[2]	Paul Addison, "Churchill and Social Reform," in Churchill , Robert Blake and William Roger Louis, eds. (New York: Norton, 1993), p. 57.
[3]	A sympathetic historian, Paul Addison, Churchill on the Home Front 1900–1955 (London: Pimlico, 1993), p. 438, phrases the same point this way: "Since [Churchill] never allowed himself to be hampered by a fixed programme or a rigid ideology, his ideas evolved as he adapted himself to the times." Oddly enough, Churchill himself confessed, in 1898: "I do not care so much for the principles I advocate as for the impression which my words produce and the reputation they give me." Clive Ponting, Churchill (London: Sinclair-Stevenson, 1994), p. 32.
[4]	For some of Churchill's distortions, see Tuvia Ben-Moshe, Churchill: Strategy and History (Boulder, Colo.: Lynne Rienner, 1992), pp. 329–33; Dietrich Aigner, "Winston Churchill (1874–1965)," in Politiker des 20. Jahrhunderts , 1, Die Epoche der Weltkriege , Rolf K. Hocevar, et al., eds. (Munich: Beck, 1970), p. 318, states that Churchill, in his works on World War II, "laid the foundation of a legend that is nothing less than a straightforward travesty of the historical truth.... But the Churchill version of World War II and its prehistory remains unshaken, the power of his eloquence extends beyond the grave." Aigner, incidentally, is an informed, scholarly critic of Churchill, and by no means a "right-wing radical."
[5]	Christopher Hitchens, Blood, Class, and Nostalgia: Anglo-American Ironies (New York: Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1990), p. 186.
[6]	J.P.C. Fuller, The Conduct of War 1789–1961 (London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1961), p. 253.
[7]	For a skeptical account of Churchill in this period, see Clive Ponting, 1940: Myth and Reality (Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1991).
[8]	Cf. A.J.P. Taylor, "The Statesman," in idem, et al., Churchill Revised: A Critical Assessment (New York: Dial Press, 1969), p. 26.
[9]	Henry Pelling, Winston Churchill (New York: Dutton, 1974), pp. 347–48, 355; and Paul Addison, Churchill on the Home Front , pp. 296–99.
[10]	Taylor, "The Statesman," p. 31; Robert Rhodes James, "Churchill the Politician," in A.J.P. Taylor, et al., Churchill Revised , p. 115, writes of "Churchill's extremely exaggerated claims of German air power."
[11]	Emrys Hughes, Winston Churchill: British Bulldog (New York: Exposition, 1955), p. 104.

[12]	"Churchill Extols Fascismo for Italy" New York Times , January 21, 1927. Churchill even had admiring words for Hitler; as late as 1937, he wrote: "one may dislike Hitler's system and yet admire his patriotic achievement. If our country were defeated, I hope we should find a champion as indomitable to restore our courage and lead us back to our place among the nations." James, "Churchill the Politician," p. 118. On the conditions of the Fascist takeover in Italy, see Ralph Raico, "Mises on Fascism and Democracy," Journal of Libertarian Studies 12, no 1 (Spring 1996): 1-27.
[13]	Robin Edmonds, "Churchill and Stalin," in Churchill , Blake and Louis, eds., p. 326.
[14]	Norman Rose, Churchill: The Unruly Giant (New York: Free Press, 1994), p. 378.
[15]	J.F.C. Fuller, The Second World War 1939–45: A Strategic and Tactical History (London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1954), p. 218.
[16]	James, "Churchill the Politician," p. 79. The same quotation from Esher is cited and endorsed by Basil Liddell Hart, "The Military Strategist," in A.J.P Taylor, et al., Churchill Revised , p. 221.
[17]	David Irving, Churchill's War , vol. 1, The Struggle for Power (Bullsbrook, Western Australia: Veritas, 1987), p. 517.
[18]	Charles Masterman, cited in James, "Churchill the Politician," p. 71.
[19]	Hart, "The Military Strategist," pp. 173–74.
[20]	Ibid. , p. 174.
[21]	Churchill told Asquith's daughter in 1915: "I know this war is smashing and shattering the lives of thousands every moment — and yet — I cannot help it — I love every second I live." Michael Howard, "Churchill and the First World War," in Churchill , Blake and Louis, eds., p. 129.
[22]	Maurice Ashley, Churchill as Historian (New York: Scribner's, 1968), p. 228.
[23]	Ludwig von Mises, Liberalism: A Socio-Economic Exposition , Ralph Raico, trans. (Kansas City: Sheed Andrews and McMeel, [1927] 1985), pp. 23–27.
[24]	Ponting, Churchill , p. 23; Dietrich Aigner, Winston Churchill: Ruhm und Legende (Göttingen: Musterschmidt, 1975), p. 31.
[25]	Ibid. , pp. 40–44.
[26]	Andrew Roberts, Eminent Churchillians (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1994), pp. 211–15. Roberts finds it ironic that, given Churchill's views on race, it was "he of all Prime Ministers [who] allowed Britain to start to become a multi-racial society" through Commonwealth immigration during his last "Indian Summer" administration, 1951–55.
[27]	Mark Twain, Mark Twain's Weapons of Satire: Anti-Imperialist Writings on the Philippine-American War , Jim Zwick, ed. (Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1992), pp. 9–11.
[28]	Robert Rhodes James, "Churchill the Parliamentarian, Orator, and Statesman," in Churchill , Blake and Louis, eds., p. 510; Ponting, Churchill , p. 49.

[29]	Churchill at this time even spoke out in favor of state-enforced temperance, an amusing bit of hypocrisy in a man whose lifelong love of drink became legendary.
[30]	On the history of the German welfare state, absolutist and modern, see Gerd Habermann, Der Wohlfahrtsstaat: Geschichte eines Irrwegs (Berlin: Propyläen, 1994).
[31]	Addison, "Churchill and Social Reform," p. 60.
[32]	Addison, Churchill on the Home Front, 1900–1955 , p. 59.
[33]	Ibid, p. 51.
[34]	W. H. Greenleaf, The British Political Tradition , vol. 2, The Ideological Heritage (London: Methuen, 1983), pp. 151–54.
[35]	E. P. Hennock, British Social Reform and German Precedents: The Case of Social Insurance 1880–1914 (Oxford: Clarendon, 1987), pp. 168–69.
[36]	Gordon A. Craig, "Churchill and Germany," in Churchill , Blake and Louis, eds., p. 24.
[37]	E. P. Hennock, "The Origins of British National Insurance and the German Precedent 1880–1914," in The Emergence of the Welfare State in Britain and Germany , W.J. Mommsen and Wolfgang Mock, eds. (London: Croom Helm, 1981), p. 88.
[38]	Winston Churchill, Complete Speeches 1897–1963 , vol. 1, 1897–1908 , Robert Rhodes James, ed. (New York: Chelsea House, 1974), pp. 1029–30, 1032.
[39]	Winston Churchill, Liberalism and the Social Problem (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1909), pp. 80–81.
[40]	Ibid., pp. 78, 226.
[41]	Ibid., p. 227.
[42]	Hennock, British Social Reform , pp. 157–60.
[43]	Ibid., p. 161.
[44]	Ponting, Churchill , p. 83.
[45]	See, for instance, Churchill, Liberalism and the Social Problem , pp. 74–75.
[46]	A. V. Dicey, Lectures on the Relation between Law and Public Opinion in England during the Nineteenth Century , 2nd. ed. (London: Macmillan, [1914] 1963), pp. xlv — xlvi.
[47]	Herbert Henry Asquith, Memories and Reflections 1852–1927 (London: Cassell, 1928), 2, pp. 7, 21.
[48]	Sidney Fay, Origins of the World War , 2nd. rev. ed. (New York: Free Press, [1930] 1966), p. 495.
[49]	Lady Violet Asquith, cited in Hart, "The Military Strategist," p.182.
[50]	C. Paul Vincent, The Politics of Hunger: The Allied Blockade of Germany, 1915–1919 (Athens: Ohio University Press, 1985); see also Ralph Raico, "The Politics of Hunger: A Review," Review of Austrian Economics 3 (1988):

	253–59.
[51]	Aigner, Winston Churchill (1874–1965) , pp. 63–4.
[52]	Vincent, Politics of Hunger , p. 162. See also Peter Loewenberg, "The Psychohistorical Origins of the Nazi Youth Cohort," American Historical Review 76, no. 5 (December 1971): 1457–1502.
[53]	See Colin Simpson, The Lusitania (London: Penguin, [1972] 1983), who presents the case for Churchill's guilt; and Thomas A. Bailey and Paul B. Ryan, The Lusitania Disaster: An Episode in Modern Warfare and Diplomacy (New York: Free Press, 1975), who attempt to exculpate him. See also Hitchens, Blood, Class, and Nostalgia , pp. 189–90.
[54]	Patrick Beesly, Room 40: British Naval Intelligence 1914–18 (San Diego: Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovich, 1982), p. 90.
[55]	Ibid. , p. 122. Emphasis in original.
[56]	Winston Churchill, The World Crisis (New York: Scribner's, 1931), p. 300.
[57]	On the Dardanelles campaign, cf. Taylor, "The Statesman," pp. 21–22: "Once Churchill took up the idea, he exaggerated both the ease with which it could be carried through and the rewards it would bring. There was no enquiry into the means available. Churchill merely assumed that battleships could force the Straits unaided. When this failed, he assumed that there was a powerful army available for Gallipoli and assumed also that this inhospitable peninsula presented no formidable military obstacles. Beyond this, he assumed also that the fall of Constantinople would inflict a mortal blow on Germany. All these assumptions were wrong."
[58]	Hughes, Winston Churchill: British Bulldog , p. 78.
[59]	James, "Churchill the Politician," p. 93.
[60]	Murray N. Rothbard, America's Great Depression (Princeton, N.J.: Van Nostrand, 1963), pp. 131–37.
[61]	Taylor, "The Statesman," p. 27.
[62]	Aigner, Winston Churchill (1874–1965) , pp. 100–3. In connection with the Geneva disarmament conference 1931–32, Churchill expressed the same anti-German position as later: Germany would rise again. Aigner sees this as stemming from Churchill's social Darwinist philosophy.
[63]	Goronwy Rees, "Churchill in der Revision," Der Monat , Nr. 207 (Fall 1965): 12.
[64]	E.g., in Churchill's essay of February 1921, "Zionism vs. Bolshevism"; see Aigner, Winston Churchill (1874–1965) , p. 79. See also Oskar K. Rabinowicz, Winston Churchill on Jewish Problems: A Half Century Survey , published by the World Jewish Congress, British Section (London: Lincolns-Prager, 1956); and N. A. Rose, The Gentile Zionists: A Study in Anglo — Zionist Diplomacy, 1929–1939 (London: Cass, 1973). Early on, Churchill had shared the view current among many right-wingers of the time, of Bolshevism as a "Jewish" phenomenon: he referred to the Red leaders as "these Semitic conspirators" and "Jew Commissars." Norman Rose, Churchill: The Unruly Giant , p. 180.

[65]	John Charmley, Chamberlain and the Lost Peace (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1989), p. 55. See also Irving, Churchill's War , pp. 54–65, 67–68, and 82–83. The group's full name was the Focus for the Defense of Freedom and Peace. For a history, see Eugen Spier, Focus. A Footnote to the History of the Thirties (London: Oswald Wolff, 1963). In March 1937, after a luncheon meeting with Churchill, Spier came to the conclusion that "destiny had marked him out to become the destroyer of Hitlerism." (Ibid., p. 112) In October 1937, a representative of the Focus, H. Wickham Steed, toured Canada and the United States. Among those he found "ready to take the Focus line" were Roosevelt, Cordell Hull, and Arthur Sulzberger, owner of the New York Times . In New York, Steed addressed the Council on Foreign Relations. Others with whom Steed met included the financiers Bernard Baruch and Felix Warburg. (Ibid., pp. 124–25.) On The Focus as well as other factors influencing British public opinion in regard to Germany in the 1930s, see Dietrich Aigner, Das Ringen um England. Das deutsch-britische Verhältnis. Die öffentliche Meinung 1933–1939, Tragödie zweier Völker (Munich/Esslingen: Bechtle, 1969).
[66]	Aigner, Winston Churchill (1874–1965) , p. 105–6; see also Irving, Churchill's War , pp. 38–40, 44–45, 78–79.
[67]	Hart, "The Military Strategist," p. 204.
[68]	Craig, "Churchill and Germany," p. 35.
[69]	Donald Cameron Watt, "Churchill and Appeasement," in Churchill , Blake and Louis, eds., p. 214.
[70]	Ponting, Churchill , p. 464.

This paper is part of the series Winston Churchill Discreetly Veiled. Click below for the previous or next item of the series. Click on 'up' to return to the series' Table of Contents.

► Additional information about this document

A Calm Political Atmosphere | CODOH

by Richard A. Widmann

Harry Elmer Barnes famously defined “historical revisionism” when he wrote

Actually, revisionism means nothing more or less than the effort to revise the historical record in the light of a more complete collection of historical facts, a more calm political atmosphere, and a more objective attitude.[\[1\]](#)

Barnes’s definition may help to explain the failure (thus far) of World War II revisionism to penetrate public consciousness or to gain broad acceptance.

While it is understandable that the awesome combination of propaganda and patriotism create a sizable obstacle to truth during wartime, logic suggests that conclusion of such events would allow more-objective scholarship to occur. In fact, Barnes’s experience following 11 November 1918 certainly contributed to the formation of his definition. Barnes discovered one of the first articles to revise the origins of the Great War in July of 1920 when he first read historian Sidney Fay’s “New Light on the Origins of the World War, I. Berlin and Vienna, to July 29.”[\[2\]](#) Until that time Barnes had not only accepted the “official” version of the war’s origins, he had actively advocated military intervention even prior to Wilson’s request that the American congress declare war on Germany.

It seems that a sine qua non for revisionism to gain acceptance is “a more calm political atmosphere.” While there is little doubt that Barnes anticipated a similar calming of emotions following the Second World War as he experienced following the First, such calm never truly came.

Barnes complained,

Revisionism, when applied to the First World War, showed that the actual causes and merits of that conflict were very close to the reverse of the picture presented in the political propaganda and historical writings of the war decade. Revisionism would also produce similar results with respect to the Second World War if it were allowed to develop unimpeded. But a determined effort is being made to stifle or silence revelations which would establish the truth with regard to the causes and issues of the late world conflict.[\[3\]](#)

While Barnes witnessed a media and academic “blackout” when it came to articles and books that challenged the official version of World War II history, from the vantage point of 2015, it is clear that the 1950s and 1960s were a less-politically charged time. A significant body of World War II revisionism was published during this time, and several such volumes including A.J.P. Taylor’s The Origins of the Second World War (1961) were widely reviewed and discussed.

During Barnes’s lifetime the conception of war changed from “regulated war” to total war. In his study of Carl Schmitt[\[4\]](#), Alain de Benoist explains the principle of “regulated war:”

Carl Schmitt says that [regulated war] is a war where the belligerents respect each other at war as enemies and do not treat one another as criminals, so that a peace treaty becomes possible and even remains the normal, mutually accepted end of war. War conducted according to the old law of nations follows rules governing, for example, the conduct of troops towards prisoners and civilians, the respect for neutral parties, the immunity of ambassadors, the rules of surrendering a stronghold, and the modalities of concluding a peace treaty. It almost never aims at overthrowing a sovereign or changing the government of a country, and is usually fought simply to achieve territorial objectives.[5]

In contrast to “regulated war” is “total war,” which does not recognize any limitations. The “total war” is a type of “holy war” conducted against the enemies of God.[6] De Benoist comments, “the theory of the just war introduces a discriminatory conception of war: if there are just wars, there are also unjust wars. But it also divides humanity into two categories: against the ‘infidels’ and the ‘barbarians’ everything is permitted.”[7]

Citing Schmitt’s Die Wendung zum diskriminierenden Kriegsbegriff (The Turn toward the Discriminatory Conception of War), de Benoist identifies the era of the “modern just war” beginning with the Treaty of Versailles and the Allies’ desire to bring Kaiser Wilhelm II to justice for having started the conflagration.

In today's political atmosphere, would the Kaiser have hanged?

Emperor Wilhelm II of Germany in exile at the Dutch manor of Doorn, in civilian clothes relaxing with a cigarette. Photo September 1933.

Bundesarchiv, Bild 136-C0804 / Tellgmann, Oscar / CC-BY-SA [Public domain or CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

In the new conception of war it becomes “a battle between the forces of good and the forces of evil, between those who arrogate to themselves the right to judge and those who end up in the dock.”<sup>[8]</sup> The Second World War then becomes the first in which the enemy becomes “criminal.” De Benoist notes, “to say that the enemy is a criminal is a way of denying him all political claims, thus disqualifying him politically. The criminal cannot claim an opinion or an idea whose degree of truth or falsehood it may be necessary to evaluate; he is an intrinsically destructive being.”<sup>[9]</sup>

While declared a criminal, Kaiser Wilhelm escaped this new “justice” by going into exile in the Netherlands, where Queen Wilhelmina and the Dutch government protected him from extradition.<sup>[10]</sup> King George V however called Wilhelm “the greatest criminal in history” and British Prime Minister David Lloyd George proposed that the Allies “hang the Kaiser.”<sup>[11]</sup> By the close of the Second World War, exile was not a choice for the German leadership. The Allies set up a series of trials beginning with the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg with the specific intent of punishing enemy “criminals.”

World War II remains the ultimate “holy war” in the minds and consciousness of the American public. There is no defense of the Nazi; there is no claim or opinion by or in defense of the Nazi worth evaluating.

Today in various countries in Europe it is not only illegal to question the official narrative of the Holocaust but also even to express doubt about aspects of the Nuremberg trials. The media even rage about collectors of Nazi-era art<sup>[12]</sup> and military memorabilia. The Austrian government sentenced one such collector to 10 months’ imprisonment for having just such a collection.<sup>[13]</sup>

In today’s political atmosphere, a simplistic “politically correct” view defines the entirety of the Second World War as a war against “racism.” The super-charged topic of race reduces consideration of aspects of World War II into a simplistic caricature of history. While Hollywood seems to blur the line between “good” and “evil” in many popular films, the portrayal of the Nazi is practically always relegated to the cartoon-villain level.<sup>[14]</sup>

Recently the “holy war” against “racism” was expanded to target the display and sale of Confederate flags following the Dylann Roof church shooting.<sup>[15]</sup> The “holy war” against the Confederacy is really a Twenty-First-Century phenomenon. The South’s leaders were not viewed as forces of evil, not even in the victorious North. In fact, following General Robert E. Lee’s surrender he was allowed to return to Richmond where he assumed the presidency of Washington College (now Washington and Lee University.) Even the Confederacy’s President Jefferson Davis faced fairly lenient terms when considered in light of today’s politically charged atmosphere. While he did serve two years’ imprisonment, Davis was released on $100,000 bail. Three years following the end of the war President Johnson released Davis from all liability through a presidential amnesty issued on December 25, 1868.

The recent “holy war” against symbols of the Confederacy resulted in various commentators complaining about the sale of other symbols of other defeated enemy regimes. Many critics asked, “Why are outlets such as Amazon and eBay still selling items with Nazi symbols?”<sup>[16]</sup> Few if any commentators bothered to mention the sale of t-shirts emblazoned with the image of Che Guevara, or other items with the image of Vladimir Lenin, Joseph Stalin, or Karl Marx.

In our hyper-charged political atmosphere, various symbols have become the objects of hate. The charge of “racism” is typically all that is needed to brand an individual, a website, or a symbol with such enemy-status. In the name of tolerance and freedom, politicians and businessmen have sought out the indefensible and prohibited sale and marched in lock step to obliterate aspects of our history—and theirs. There can be no defense for those on the “wrong side of history.” Only destructive beings, barely human, can attempt to defend the indefensible. As the causes were evil, so are those who are more interested in the facts than the rhetoric.

Harry Elmer Barnes was right when he declared that a “more calm political atmosphere” would be needed for a proper revision of the historical record. He failed to see however that wars would become holy conflicts fought against the forces of evil. Who for a minute thinks that Kaiser Wilhelm, Robert E. Lee, and Jefferson Davis wouldn’t have been executed for their “crimes” in Twenty-First-Century America?

How much longer can it be before the propaganda-maddened crowd calls for a similar fate for revisionist historians and writers?

Notes:

[1]	Harry Elmer Barnes, “Revisionism: A Key to Peace” in Revisionism: A Key to Peace and Other Essays (San Francisco: Cato Institute, 1980), p. 1.
[2]	Richard A. Widmann, “The Rise and Fall of Historical Revisionism Following World War I,” Inconvenient History Vol. 6, No. 3, Fall 2014. Online: http://www.inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2014/volume_6/number_3/the_rise_and_fall_of_historical_revisionism.php
[3]	Barnes, Op. Cit., p. 76.
[4]	Alain de Benoist, Carl Schmitt Today: Terrorism, ‘Just’ War, and the State of Emergency (London: Arktos, 2013).
[5]	Ibid., p. 22.
[6]	Ibid., p. 24.
[7]	Ibid., p. 25.
[8]	Ibid., p. 26.
[9]	Ibid., pp. 26-27.
[10]	Lawrence Wilson, The Imperial Kaiser: The Life of William II (New York: Dorsett Press, 1963), pp.180-181.
[11]	Wilhelm II, German Emperor, Wikipedia article. Online: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Wilhelm_II,_German_Emperor
[12]	Online: http://www.wsj.com/articles/a-dark-niche-emerges-in-german-market-nazi-art-1432632601

[13]	Online: http://www.thelocal.at/20150703/nazi-basement-man-sentenced-to-ten-months
[14]	See for example Quentin Tarrantino's Inglourious Basterds [sic]
[15]	Online: http://www.dailycaller.com/2015/06/25/a-complete-list-of-everywhere-that-wants-the-confederate-flag-banned/
[16]	For example see: http://www.breitbart.com/big-government/2015/06/24/amazon-bans-confederate-flags-still-sells-nazi-merchandise/

Angry Sledge-Hammer Revisionism | CODOH

by Germar Rudolf

Nazi Gassings: Thoughts on Life and Death by Friedrich Paul Berg, CreateSpace, 2015, 201 pp.

Nazi Gassings by Friedrich P. Berg

For several decades now, Friedrich Berg has started arguments with fellow revisionists about certain technical issues of relevance to the orthodox Holocaust narrative. Usually these arguments were hidden from public view, as they took place mainly in email exchanges between the parties involved and some bystanders Berg tried to drag into the fray. The last of these exchanges—with Robert Faurisson and Fred Leuchter as his main adversaries—took place only a few weeks before writing these lines. It had been triggered by Berg's having read for the first time my critical edition of the Leuchter Report – ten years after its first edition had been published. I spare the reader the details of this or earlier polemic altercations, in particular since Berg's language is often disrespectful and abusive.

During an earlier episode of these Bergian temper tantrums, I tried to understand the reason for these repeated nasty attacks Berg launches against individuals who by all reckonings should be his revisionist friends and allies. I even discussed Berg's behavior with a psychologist specializing in analyzing the underlying reasons for the misbehaviors of troubled children and adolescents. Her conclusion was that Berg's immature behavior points to a severe lack of self-confidence and an inferiority complex. His screaming contests with other revisionists clearly indicate that he thinks his important technical findings are being misunderstood or even ignored by the revisionist community—a thought wholly at odds with the facts. The idea therefore crossed my mind to help boost Berg's self-perception and reputation by helping him publish a fine monograph containing all his major and minor contributions to revisionism. I suggested this to him more than a year ago. His reaction was that all he had to say is posted on his website www.nazigassings.com. He insisted that I take his material as posted and put it somehow into book form. It goes without saying that this is not the way publishers or editors work. They might be able to turn a mediocre manuscript into a respectable book, but creating a book from disorganized scrapbook-like postings on a website is not their job. That clearly is the author's obligation. Berg, however, was not willing to do it.

But he now has found someone else to do that job for him. This person disclaimed all responsibility for the book's style and contents, explaining to me that the book is exactly what Berg had ordered it to be. So I won't reveal the editor's name here. Whatever the orders were, if we look at the actual book, it becomes clear that a no-frills-approach to book creation was chosen that couldn't be any cheaper. The book has no table of contents, no footnotes, no bibliography, and only occasionally gives references to sources quoted. The text is set with wide margins (perhaps to boost the page count) and is not hyphenated. Punctuation is haphazard, spelling errors are frequent, and references to webpages and websites are usually not spelled out but contained as embedded links in the original web texts. They are still functioning links in the book's Kindle version, but in the printed version they simply show as bold and underlined text, which makes them useless to the reader of the hard copy. I have not checked any of the links as to whether they are still correct, but on p. 139 this book contains a spelled-out link to John C. Ball's former website air-photo.com which has been defunct for almost a decade. Hence it is probably safe to assume that many of the links contained in the Kindle edition are outdated as well. The book's illustrations are of low resolution, as is common for websites from which they were taken, but not conducive for printed books.

The editor confirmed that the book is basically a cut-and-paste assembly of various web texts from Berg's website. If any editing was done, it was very superficial. The cover design is cheap and ugly. The back cover, which should contain an interest-piquing summary of the book, simply is identical to the text on the book's first text page. The text of the first 13 pages is repeated at the very end of the book. This is only the most striking instance of repetitions, of which there are many throughout the book, some verbatim, some by basic contents. I've marked my hard copy with "repeated" notes in its wide margins whenever I ran into something I had read already earlier, and the book is full of them. The question, for instance, of whether and to what degree it is possible to commit mass murder with diesel exhaust – Berg's home turf – is addressed four times, thrice briefly (pp. 8-10, 32, 187-190) and once more-thoroughly (76-87). Repetitious also are several sweeping polemical statements, for example that Americans "should pray that there is no God" on the score of their holocaustian aerial warfare against civilians during World War II and later conflicts (pp. 16, 36, 51, similar pp. 47, 132), or that Hitler and the Nazis were right with the way they treated the Jews (pp. 50, 54, 56f.).

A serious flaw of this book is Berg's outdated and contradictory discussion of the infamous Auschwitz document containing the term "Vergasungskeller" (gassing cellar) in connection with Crematorium II. In his 1976 classic The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, Arthur Butz posited that this term referred to a basement where generator gas was produced from coke as fuel for the cremation furnaces. Butz later corrected that error after becoming familiar with the cremation furnaces' design, eventually settling for the hypothesis that this document referred to a basement that served as a "gas [protection] basement" as an auxiliary function (see the latest, 2015 edition of his book). On p. 128 of Berg's book, Butz's original, flawed interpretation is repeated, while on p. 115 Berg claims that this term refers to a delousing chamber. He bases this conclusion on his misinterpretation of an earlier Auschwitz document talking about large-scale delousing actions throughout the entire camp.

This, together with Berg's behind-the-scenes "discussion" of the critically commented Leuchter report ten years after the critique's first appearance, gives the impression that Berg does not keep track of revisionist research and publishing activities. Well, considering that he propounds two different, mutually exclusive and wrong interpretations of a single document just 13 pages apart, there is evidence that he doesn't even keep track of his own writings.

As to the book's contents, anyone hoping to find all of Berg's major contributions collected or at least summarized here will walk away disappointed. Berg's website is an assembly of several additional, but usually marginal findings to his older contributions, summaries of some of which are interwoven now and again. His book therefore has the same patchwork-like style and contents. "Fritz" Berg's other two main papers published in the old Journal for Historical Review – "Typhus and the Jews" and "Zyklon B and the German Delousing Chambers"—are only mentioned in passing. The Diesel issue is explained in some detail, but not as deeply as any newcomer to revisionism looking for a thorough overview might expect and hope for. Berg's ongoing disagreement with Prof. Faurisson is covered to some degree when Berg discusses railway delousing tunnels, which he thinks would have been a technology permitting large-scale conveyor-belt-style mass murders (pp. 155-174). As much as I consider Berg's hypothetical arguments valid, he loses my sympathy again when calling revisionists who disagree with him "retarded" (p. 174). Berg may be an excellent engineer, but his emotional and social intelligence, sadly, very badly impair the receptibility and understandability of what he has to say.

On the upside, there are four new insights I did take away from reading this "book":

1. Berg quotes a Japanese study of a CO suicide which I had not heard of before (p. 85).
2. Berg states that one reason the Auschwitz cremation muffles could cremate only one normal corpse at a time was that corpses should never touch the muffle walls, as this would result in local cooling of the refractory bricks leading to their accelerated deterioration (p. 120). Since he doesn't back up this reasonable claim, it requires some research to confirm it, though. However, while editing Carlo Mattogno's opus magnum on the Auschwitz cremation furnaces, this fact was nowhere mentioned, which is an omission deserving rectification in a new edition.
3. Berg points out that large-scale garbage incinerators would have been used in case of a predetermined policy of mass extermination. The actual garbage incinerator included in the chimney wing of the Birkenau Crematoria II & III, however, was physically separated from the rest of the building, clearly indicating that corpses were not to be treated as garbage at Auschwitz (pp. 120-124). This aspect also deserves to be emphasized by Mattogno in a future edition.
4. The Topf coke-fired cremation furnaces installed at Auschwitz all produced a highly toxic generator gas with some 18 to 35% carbon monoxide. This is basically the same gas produced by "wood gas generators" in some 500,000 vehicles throughout German-dominated Europe toward the war's end. This gas, rather than Zyklon B, could have easily been appropriated for mass murder. However, no such claim has ever been made (p. 127). I'll add that thought to a future edition of my expert report, which has a section discussing various alternatives to using Zyklon B.

Conclusion

I was looking forward to the publication of Berg's book, because his website, which contains a lot of valuable information, is too disorganized to make that information easily accessible to the development of understanding. Writing a book usually forces an author to take a systematic approach to his topic, and to organize his thoughts. Unfortunately this is not what Berg did to cobble together this tome. Although it does contain a summary of Friedrich Berg's most-important contribution to revisionism, this book is not an improvement compared to his website. It is of use only to those who dislike reading web pages and prefer paper pages. The book is little more than a paperback-bound collection of website printouts.

The Kindle edition of this book is of the same low quality, although it has the advantage that web links embedded into the text are actually accessible, provided one is using an eBook reader which has Internet access and can display webpages.

All told, I do not recommend this book, but if you like Berg's message, maybe you'd be better off buying a T-shirt that clearly says "Hitler was right!" (Berg's words, p. 54).

Patrick Desbois and the "Mass Graves" of Jews in Ukraine

by Carlo Mattogno

1) The empty arguments of Father Patrick Desbois

Father Patrick Desbois, an ardent champion of Judeo-Christian "friendship" and Chairman of the Yahad-In Unum Association, has acquired a certain notoriety in recent years due to his search for the mass graves of Jews murdered by the Einsatzgruppen in the Ukraine and other German theaters of operation in the years 1941-1942. Like any good Judeophile, he enjoys close relations with Israel, which showers him with awards and praise in return.<sup>[1]</sup>

Notwithstanding this lavish support of the philo-Semitic and philo-Jewish Punch-and-Judy show, Desbois has come under criticism in his country of origin, France.

The 19 June 2009 issue of Le Monde des Livres, p. 2, published an article by Thomas Wieder entitled "Querelle autour du Père Desbois"<sup>[2]</sup> ["Dispute Surrounding Father Desbois"], which begins as follows:

It is rare for Le Monde to be compelled to return to a work upon which a review has already been published in its columns. The occasion presents itself today, by reason of the growing controversy, now several weeks old, regarding a book, Porteur de mémoires [Bearer of Memories] published by Michel Lafon, 2007, [Title has been published as Holocaust by Bullets in its English edition –Ed.] and its author, Father Patrick Desbois.

On 2 November 2007, under the title 'A Priest Sets an Example for the Historians', Le Monde des Livres published a laudatory review of Father Desbois's book. This Catholic priest, director of the National Service for Relations with Judaism at the Conference of Bishops of France, describes the research conducted by himself in Ukraine starting in 2002, "on the traces of the Shoah by bullets," intended to locate the graves containing the corpses of more than one million Jews murdered during the Second World War. The author of the article, Alexandra Laignel-Lavastine, speaks of an "extraordinary undertaking," likely to "upset our preconceived ideas" on this aspect of the genocide.

Almost two years later, and after two visits to the Ukraine with Patrick Desbois and his group — first in May, and later in August 2008 — Alexandra Laignel-Lavastine declares that she "was mistaken." She makes this announcement, first of all, in "La fabrique de l'histoire" ["The History Factory"], on France Culture, on 27 May. After the broadcast, she was informed that her "collaboration" in the seminar sponsored by the Sorbonne with the historian Edouard Husson and Father Desbois in the fall of 2008 was to be "terminated effective immediately." Desbois, who refused to participate in the broadcast, has now become the target of criticism on several points.

Some regard the notion of a "Shoah by bullets," popularized by Desbois and disputed by the majority of the specialists, as "sloganeering." Other criticisms are methodological in nature and relate to Desbois's alleged tendency to depict himself as a "pioneer" while ignoring all the historians who studied this problem well before he did.

With regard to this reproach, Patrick Desbois keeps calm. "I am not a historian," he says, attributing the whole affair to a "misunderstanding," a term borrowed from Anne-Marie Revcolevschi, general director of the Foundation for the Memory of the Shoah, one of the organizations providing financial support to the Yahad-In Unum association, chaired by Desbois since 2004. She explains: "There is no need to require Father Desbois to be something which he is not. His undertaking is that of a man of the cloth and he has the right to follow his own methodology, which is not identical to that followed by university professors."

It is precisely this methodology which is causing consternation at the present time.

This consternation relates, in particular, to Desbois's tendency to ignore Ukrainian memorials [which already existed] ("to give the impression that the great majority of these graves in Ukraine had been unknown until that time", thus exaggerating "the scope of his discoveries" with recourse to a few "minor adjustments of the truth") while omitting the fact of the complicity of the Ukrainian population with the Nazis, to avoid "laying the blame on our courageous Ukrainian witnesses," in Desbois's words.

On the other hand, Alexandra Laignel-Lavastine "expresses doubt as to the scholarly value of interviews sometimes carried out "in a climate of intimidation," due to the presence of an "armed bodyguard wearing camouflage," an accusation rejected by Desbois as a "calumny."

What should be noted here is that Desbois is not a historian, but a "man of the cloth," who has, for his research, adopted a methodology based, not on scholarly standards, but, rather, on religious faith.

2) Aktion 1005 and "Negationism"

In the booklet entitled Operation 1005,<sup>[3]</sup> Desbois and Levana Frenk concern themselves with the so-called Aktion 1005, an alleged code word for an operation intended to wipe out the traces of the murder of millions of persons in occupied Europe,<sup>[4]</sup> allegedly directed by SS-Standartenführer Paul Blobel, through an operational unit commonly known as Sonderkommando 1005.<sup>[5]</sup>

In fact, the authors say nothing about Aktion 1005, but restrict themselves to compiling a biography of Blobel. The objective of their book seems in fact to consist of establishing a correlation between the above-mentioned operation and "Holocaust denial":

The operation of wiping out the traces and eliminating the bodies had direct implications, in part, upon the development of negationism, and, in part, upon the phenomena of memory. Eliminating the traces was equivalent to denying the victim their right to burial and relegating them to oblivion. On the other hand, negationism had already been committed through the process of "Vernichtung," of reducing to a nullity and annihilating all traces of the dead, without precedence in the history of genocide.<sup>[6]</sup>

The passage quoted above must therefore be kept in mind in any consideration of Desbois's famous research work in the Ukraine as a sort of response to "negationism," a term invented by the defenders of traditional Holocaust lore to discredit revisionism. The only real negationism is that professed by those who, out of intolerance, deny other people's right to freedom of expression, denying, out of pseudo-religious obtuseness and bad faith, the very foundations of historiographical and scholarly methodology itself.

The picture is becoming increasingly clear: Desbois is a "man of faith" who adopts a "faith-based" methodology for the express purpose of denying revisionism.

3) Numerical nonsense

The folder accompanying the exhibition entitled Les Fusillades Massives en Ukraine (1941-1944): La Shoah par Balles, (The Mass Shootings in Ukraine (1941-1944): The Shoah by Bullets), held at Paris on 20-30 June 2007, supplies the following information in this regard:

Between 1941 and 1944, approximately one and a half million Ukrainian Jews were murdered (in theater), the Waffen-SS, the German police and by local collaborators. Only a minority were killed after deportation to the extermination camps [...].

Since 2004, Father Patrick Desbois and the Yahad-In Unum research group found numerous Ukrainian witnesses who had seen the massacres or who had been called up [for temporary labor service] during the execution of the Jews. The testimonies gathered by the Yahad, systematically compared with written documentation, have enabled the discovery of more than five hundred previously forgotten mass graves and the collection of material evidence relating to the genocide (weapons, cartridge cases, ammunition). It has finally become possible to preserve and respect the burial of the victims [...] (emphasis added).<sup>[7]</sup>

If words still have any meaning, the presumed "discovery of more than five hundred mass graves" is a shameless lie. As we shall see, with the exception of 15 graves, with regard to which many objections can nevertheless still be raised, Desbois never located one single grave, but rather, areas in meadows, woods or agricultural lands in which he claims mass graves exist, based on mere testimonies, the reliability of which we shall now examine. Even the number of alleged victims is absurd. In his numerical tally of Holocaust victims, under the heading of "Open Air Executions," Raul Hilberg supplies the total figure of "more than 1,300,000," which includes:

Einsatzgruppen, other heads of the SS and Police, Rumanian and German armies in mobile operations; shootings in Galicia during the deportations; executions of prisoners of war and shootings in Serbia and elsewhere.<sup>[8]</sup>

It is therefore impossible to understand how one could arrive at the figure of 1.5 million victims in the Ukraine alone.

It gets worse. Desbois describes himself as a "man of the cloth," who adopts a "faith-based" methodology to combat revisionism, with recourse, euphemistically speaking, to certain "adjustments of the truth." And he does this on a vast scale, as we shall soon see.

The Italian translation of Desbois's book Porteur de mémoires, mentioned above, was published with the title "Fucilateli tutti" La prima fase della Shoah raccontata dai testimoni<sup>[9]</sup> [Shoot Them All: The Initial Phase of the Shoah as Narrated by Witnesses].

The author describes his indefatigable search for eyewitnesses in the Ukraine, who, in filmed interviews, are said to have told him of the locations of the alleged mass graves of Jews shot by the Einsatzgruppen.

The motivation alleged to have impelled him to conduct this undertaking – the desire to find the final resting place of his grandfather, a POW, in a concentration camp at Rawa Ruska, in the Ukraine – is a rather facile pretext. Desbois in fact tells us that, finding himself in Częstochowa, in central-southern Poland, during a nighttime walk, he asked his companions where they were: "Someone turned to me and answered: 'Not far from the Ukraine.'" This response is said to have shocked him, by suddenly re-awakening old memories (pp. 35-36). In reality, Częstochowa is nearly 350 kilometers away from the Ukraine as the crow flies. It is closer to Germany (less than 290 km away) than the Ukraine. Desbois's account is therefore merely a literary fiction.

4) The Eyewitnesses

Desbois supplies additional important information in this regard:

The witnesses whom we interviewed fell into three different categories: Indirect witnesses, who had not been present during the shootings, but who had heard tell of them or who saw the Jews being taken away. This class includes witnesses who described, for example, police removing Jews from their houses and taking them away.

Direct eyewitnesses: this class includes those who saw the shootings personally. [...] The majority of our witnesses fell into this class.

Finally, there were the others: civilians drafted for a day or a week, most of them boys (p. 90).

The direct eyewitnesses, however, "were only six, seven or eight years old at the time of the events in question" (pp. 89-90). In one case, only five years old, such as Maria Kedrovska, born in 1937 (p. 259, 261). This fact is repeatedly mentioned in the book:

...as children, were present at the murder of their Jewish neighbors... (p. 121);

...from their recollections, recalled through the eyes of the children that they were at that time... (p. 131);

The Germans shouted at the children not to look... (p. 156);

"When I was a little girl, I saw them taking Jews away on carts... (p. 166);

With other children, we went to see what was happening (p. 170);

A little girl at the time, she remembers running behind the carts full of bodies right up to the entrance to the cemetery (p. 220).

How reliable can these old childhood memories possibly be? Their recollections, more than sixty years later, are now indissolubly confused with what they heard or read later, a fact made obvious by their own declarations:

Only much later did we learn what had happened (p. 148);

My father, who died in 1980, was the person who told me... (p. 203);

I didn't see it personally, but someone spoke to me about it... (p. 216).

I didn't see it directly, but the villagers told me about it (p. 245).

From rumors going around... (p. 186).

These alleged "eyewitness testimonies" are thus clearly invalidated by the rumors circulating post-war. Desbois himself notes:

After the Germans abandoned an area, the Soviets opened the graves in village after village and conducted an investigation, interviewing victims, persons affected, and the survivors. They then drew up reports establishing the facts.

Sometimes, they were divined from the maps upon which the locations of the mass graves were indicated by crosses. But are these Soviet documents reliable? This type of material has been largely discredited by the Katyn Forest affair, introduced during the proceedings of the Nuremberg Trial (p. 134).

On 13 April 1943, in the Katyn forest, near Smolensk in the Soviet Union, the Germans, acting on information obtained from the local population, discovered seven mass graves containing a total of 4,143 bodies. The investigation (during which the bodies were examined by a commission consisting of forensic experts from 12 European countries, by a Commission of the Polish Red Cross and by American, British and Canadian officers selected from among POWs) showed that the crime had been committed by the Soviets. When the Soviets subsequently reoccupied the territory of Smolensk, the bodies at Katyn were once again exhumed and a commission was drawn up consisting solely of Soviet citizens (the Burdenko Commission), to shift responsibility for the massacre onto the Germans. On 15 January 1944, they also invited a group of Western journalists. This large-scale propaganda exercise in the falsification of history is still attested to in the 38 booklets relating to the Katyn case, which are still located in the State Archives of the Russian Federation. At Nuremberg, the Katyn massacre, shamelessly attributed to the Germans by the Soviets, was debated in several sessions of the Nuremberg Trial.[\[10\]](#)

The value of the above-mentioned Soviet reports can readily be assessed. There is no doubt, therefore, that the witnesses interviewed by Desbois, who were mostly mere adolescents at the time, were heavily influenced by this propaganda.

A few of the witnesses were also researchers after their own fashion, such as Polina Savchenko, "who had a passionate interest in the history of the Shoah" (p. 165), or Adolf Wislowski, who "gathered articles relating to the killing of the Jews" (p. 139), which can only have influenced their testimony.

Their tales are full of obviously apocryphal horrifying or edifying anecdotes, such as the story of the ... man who had seen a local Volksdeutscher take a childhood friend into the camp and shoot him, after which [the child] was forced to pick a cartful of sunflowers [!] to burn his friend and all the Jews who had been killed over the past week (p. 152).

Or that of the Jewess who, indifferent to the mass executions, wandered around calmly begging with her three children near the barracks housing the Gestapo. The "head of the Gestapo" shouted at her:

Jews? The woman nodded, yes. Then he took his pistol and killed them all, right there, right in front of my doorway (p. 125).

Truly a suicide looking for a place to happen.

Or the story, a truly plaintive one, of the Jewish child, "aware" that his friend Anna was watching his execution together with her friends, concealed in a nearby hayloft, waved goodbye to her before being shot; since they were watching "through cracks in the slats," and could not be seen from the outside, he was able to "make a brief gesture in their direction, as if to wave goodbye, after which he shouted: "Goodbye!" The murderers fired at that moment. (p. 213)

All this is said to have taken place in the face of imminent death by shooting, in which a true "silence of the tomb" must have reigned, enabling them to hear the child's words, from a distance, through the cracks in the hayloft.

Obviously, this little fairy tale is then said to have "almost broken" Desbois's heart (p. 213), just like this one, no doubt:

When the neighbors read "kilometer 11," the Germans had already blocked the road. All traffic was prohibited during the executions. The only vehicles authorized to continue along the road were loaded with Jews. They glimpsed little Dora on the other side of the barrier. She was naked. In the freezing cold, she begged the Germans to give her back her cloak: "Give me my cloak, I'll give you my shoes in exchange!" But the Germans never listened to any of the pleading victims. Dora was shot (p. 275).

But if the road was blocked and all traffic was prohibited, how could the "neighbors" have seen and heard such a scene, which occurred, be it noted, in the midst of a crowd of 1,500 persons?[\[11\]](#)

Not to mention the little fairy tale of the bodies piled up on top of each other and stamped on like grapes in a vat:

There were thirty of us Ukrainian young people, we had to stamp on the bodies of the Jews with our bare feet and throw a thin layer of dirt over them, so that the other Jews could lie down.

The following is Desbois's comment:

I could never have imagined that the Germans would have forced Ukrainian children to stamp on the bodies of Jews with their bare feet, as if they were Beaujolais grapes at harvest time (p. 102).

Does this require any comment at all? Alternatively, the bodies were "thrown" into the graves (p. 94), in which case it was unnecessary to "stamp" on them, but they had to be arranged in regular layers; or they were "arranged" (p. 185), in which case, it was unnecessary to "stamp" on them.

A bit of a digression here: an Internet site known as Holocaust Controversies, where the principal prize-winner for obtuseness and bad faith is a certain Roberto Muehlenkamp,[\[12\]](#) a member of the site's resident Holocaust "affirmer" crew adduces this testimony as a "concordant proof" of the "method of killing" employed by the commandants of the SS Einsatzgruppen and Police in the Ukraine.[\[13\]](#) The "stamping" method (p. 100) is said to confirm that of "Sardinenpackung," or sardine packing, said to have been practiced by Friedrich Jeckeln, Höherer SS- und Polizeiführer with the German Army Group South in Russia, and vice versa. Evidence of these claims is said to be provided by two sources explaining exactly what "sardine packing" consists of. The first says that the victims were forced to undress and to lie face-down in layers in the graves, after which they received a bullet in the back of the neck. Another layer of victims [sic!] were then forced to lie face-down on top of the layer which had just been killed [sic!] and were then shot; the procedure continued until the grave was filled.[\[14\]](#)

The second source repeats the same story, but adds that "they used Russian machine guns because the belt held fifty bullets and they could select semi-automatic fire," which is also included as falling into the definition of "sardine packing."[\[15\]](#)

In this way, the Holocaust Controversies Internet site fails to note that this contradicts one of the cardinal assertions underlying Desbois's investigations, as we shall soon see (in § 9): the alleged incriminating implications of the German cartridge casings found by the said Desbois.

It is odd that the "method" in question did not enlist the labor of the Jewish victims themselves, and that not even the Jews forced to lie down on top of the layer of bodies to be shot in turn were compelled to "stamp" on the bodies forming the underlying layer.

It might be added that if "sardine packing" were really a "method," it should have been in general use throughout the Ukraine; but not a single one of Desbois's witnesses even mentions it; on the contrary, some of the witnesses openly contradict it. For example, Stanislav claims that the victims were killed "on their knees in front of the graves, facing forward, towards the grave" (p. 224). Nikolaj Olkhuski declared that the Germans "all shot at the same time" (p. 94) at the Jewish victims on the edge of the grave, who then fell into the ditch, some of them still alive (pp. 94-95). The same method is confirmed by Ivan Fedossievich Lichnitski, according to whom, in the ditch, a group of Jews "were forced to distribute the Jews lengthwise, covering the entire breadth of the grave" (p. 173), precisely because they had been shot at the edge of the ditch.

Thus, precisely and solely this method justifies the folk legend, referred to by many witnesses, of the mass graves covered by dirt which moved for three days, because the victims were buried alive (p. 81, 109, 175, 274), with the variants of two days (p. 187), or four days (p. 267); or of the use of a "well" instead of a mass grave (p. 263), evidence of extraordinary vitality on the part of the victims, to say the least: buried alive, three days below ground, without air, after being deliberately "stamped" on, like grapes in a wine vat! If to this be added the shot in the back of the neck inflicted upon every single victim, buried alive in mass graves, for three days, only zombies would be capable of such movement.

The witness Maria, by contrast, asserts:

No, they didn't shoot them one by one, but with bursts of sub-machine-gun fire. They didn't use rifles, but sub-machine guns (p. 205).

Another refutation of the "sardine packing" method.

To conclude our review of the imaginative anecdotes reported by Desbois, the witness Evgenja Nazarenko, in 1943, at age 9, is said to have been abandoned, alone, by her mother, near an execution site at Busk, in the province of Leopoli[\[16\]](#), to allow her (the mother) to see whether or not her husband, the child's father, would also be shot, thus risking the life of the little girl (pp. 218, 241, 246).

And what can one say about the stories of Jews walled up alive (pp. 266-267) or suffocated with "Eiderdowns," i.e., feather-bed quilts [sic!]"? Desbois even entitles the paragraphs in question "The Shoah by Suffocation"! (p. 267).

No testimony is nonsensical enough to be rejected by the good priest, and certainly never as, well, not as an outright fairy tale (borrowing the priest's attitude of "Christian charity" for a moment), but at least as dubious or suspicious-sounding.

Everything his decrepit ex-child "witnesses" tell him sixty years later is sacrosanct Truth, like the Gospels (or the Talmud).

5) The Busk eyewitnesses

Claiming credit for having discovered new witnesses, Desbois declares:

These direct witnesses have never been heard and do not appear in any archive document.[\[17\]](#)

In the book, as indicated above, he mentions the (propagandistic) investigations of the various Soviet War Crimes Commissions. On p. 222, he comes back to this topic, writing:

The names of the other witnesses, other than Busk — those whose depositions were signed before the city prosecutor in 1944. The prosecutor interrogated the Ukrainian witnesses who lived in Via Chevtchenko, the long street running past the Jewish cemetery. In 2006, without having been aware of this, we knocked at the same doors where the prosecutor had introduced himself sixty-two years before. The concordance of the testimony is stupefying, in terms of both the underlying questions and the form.

But how then could he pretend that his witnesses had "never been heard" before?

This "adjustment of the truth" implies another — one even more serious.

It should be noted that the city of Busk is of capital importance in Desbois's research, because, as we shall see in § 10, it was the only locality in which any mass graves were ever opened. He declares that "it is in this city that we carried on our research for three years" (p. 210) and he then informs us that "over the course of the investigations at Busk, we met a multitude of eyewitnesses" (p. 216). We are entitled to assume that, for the purposes of his book, Desbois selected the most representative from among this "multitude of witnesses." In fact, in Chapter 17, entitled "Busk", he mentions six of them:

1) Anna (last name not indicated), interviewed on 29 April 2004 (pp. 210-213): this is the same "witness" who, as a child, is said to have witnessed a shooting while concealed in a hayloft, described above.

2) Anton Davidovich, interviewed on 5 May 2005 (pp. 214-215): a self-styled "little friend" of Anna's, who is said to have shared the same experience with her ("there were five of us children in the hayloft", p. 214).

3) Polina (last name not indicated), interviewed on 30 August 2006. Desbois repeats the story, told him by Anton Davidovich, of Jews being reduced to "sexual objects" by the Germans:

These women were not killed at Busk but in a little copse five kilometers away. By the time the Germans left the city, they were all pregnant. Since the Germans did not feel like shooting them, they entrusted the job of murdering them to a group from Sokal (p. 215).

Desbois comments:

This information is said to have found confirmation one year later, on 30 August 2006, when we met Polina, who lived at Tchuchmani, a small city six kilometers from Busk, not far from the copse in which the little Jewish girls were murdered.

Since the witness Davidovich did not witness the alleged shooting, Anna's "confirmation" presupposes that she was at least an eyewitness of the event. But these are her exact words:

There were shootings in the forest. I did not see them personally, but someone told me about them (p. 216).

For Desbois, therefore, a rumor confirms another rumor, and the two combined constitute proof demonstrating the reality of the alleged event, even if both "testimonies" were given over sixty years later!

Scientifically, this is an aberrant "faith-based" methodological principle, but not for a "person of great faith."

4) Evgenja (last name not indicated) is the child abandoned by her mother near an execution ground, as described above (pp. 216-218).

5) Stepan Davidovski (pp. 218-220) is an indirect witness.

6) Lydia (last name not indicated), interviewed on 16 April 2006 (pp. 221-222), was a child at the time of the alleged incident (p. 221) and did not see the executions, but indicated the location of the mass graves, according to Desbois.

Of these six witnesses, four were children at the time, while the ages of the other two are unknown.

The above-alleged "concordance of testimony" later mentioned by Desbois, means, therefore, that the Soviet prosecutor had interrogated the children "sixty-two years before"!

I shall return to the matter of the mass graves at Busk in § 10.

6) The shooting of the Italian soldiers

On p. 133, Desbois writes:

At a curve in a road, next to a garage, we met another old man, Adolf. Thin, short in stature and with short hair, he is a self-proclaimed 'militant of memory'. He invited us in, saying that he still had some Polish newspaper articles mentioning the body-burning squad. He shows them to us and says, 'I was present at the execution of the Italians. I climbed up into an oak tree with some friends and I saw the Italian soldiers'. We began to realize the extent of the massacre. The testimonies all agree, and, even if no one is able to reconstruct what happened, they nevertheless inform us of what had happened (emphasis added).

Another example of Desbois's "faith-based" methodology in action.

His witness continues as follows:

At this point, I salvaged the text of a survivor, Wells. This Jew worked in the camp of Janowska, an extermination camp at Leopoli. Book in hand, I followed the itinerary described by the writer, until we arrived at the same forest. Another confirmation (emphasis added).

Before commenting on this last paragraph, "Adolf's eyewitness testimony" really ought to be quoted:

And the executions of the Italians?

They were in uniform with their plumed hats; the poor boys didn't know that they were about to be killed and they undressed calmly. Their clothes were thrown into boxes. Since it was feared that they might escape, there were more Germans than usual. At any rate, they were led out in front of the graves as usual. We were amazed how resigned they were (p. 135).

The translator of the Italian edition of the Desbois's book, Carlo Saletti, informs the reader in a note:

According to the reports drawn up by the Soviet investigatory commission, the Germans murdered several thousand Italian soldiers at the sites utilized at Leopoli in the weeks following September 8th. The news was carried by Soviet sources in 1986-87, causing a sensation in our country. The then Minister of Defense, Giovanni Spadolini, created an investigatory commission intended to shed light on the reliability of this information. [...] The findings of this investigatory commission cast doubt upon the alleged mass executions (note 47 on p. 133).

On this topic, Erika Lorenzon wrote:

The debate which followed served to awaken people's interest in the Third Reich, and the fate of Italian POWs in the Soviet Union, with numerous articles in the Italian daily newspapers. While the preceding denunciations had produced a muted response, the communiqués of January 1987 were widely taken up and discussed by the Italian mass media, awakening a wave of emotion and raising many questions: the Soviet revelations, suitably verified, might shed light on the fate of thousands of Italian soldiers listed as missing on the Eastern Front. The Ministry of Defense, at that time headed by Giovanni Spadolini, thus formed an investigatory commission, presided over by Under-Secretary Tommaso Bisaglio, then by Senator Angelo Pavan, together with military and academic authorities who had participated in the war, such as Giulio Bedeschi, Mario Rigoni Stern and Nuto Revelli. In June of the following year, the latter published his findings in a report declaring that the massacre perpetrated against Italian soldiers at Leopoli should be considered assertions not yet basically proven; this statement, however, is counterbalanced by a minority report written by Lucio Ceva, Rigoni Stern and Revelli, who considered that the massacre could not be completely disproven, "although there are still reasonable grounds for doubt which make it impossible to consider the matter proven."[\[18\]](#)

But an asserted, unproven event remains just a rumor, because neither the testimonies repeated by the Soviets, nor the testimonies considered to constitute "concordance of evidence" by Desbois, has any value as proof. In practice, the good priest has simply collected a concordance of rumor.

I shall return to Wells's alleged "confirmation" somewhat later.

7) State Secrets and open secrets

Desbois claims credit for this "discovery" as well:

Another fact of capital importance: we have demolished the myth of the secret Shoah in the East. In effect, the executions took place in the light of day, in the village or just outside.[\[19\]](#)

This is said to constitute proof of the presence of the above-mentioned Ukrainians at the executions.

Desbois explicitly states that:

[T]he Germans took no precautions against the possibility that the [Ukrainians] forced to participate in the killings might reveal their secrets afterwards. The persons forced to participate were neither Ukrainian police, nor collaborators, nor auxiliaries; most of them were children, both girls and boys, or little boys, whose labor was used for one or two days after being taken from their homes, early in the morning, by an armed man. These were not the ones who watched from the windows of their houses as the columns of Jews marched to the graves, or who climbed trees or hid behind bushes. They were often present on the site to start with, well before the shootings, remaining beside the Jews and their executioners, sometimes just a few meters away, sitting on the grass (pp. 99-100).

He moreover stated that "in some cases, more than fifty young people were used for their labor" (p. 100), adding that the persons forced to participate were not killed (p. 136, 178). Therefore, there was no secrecy, and nothing to be kept secret.

All the persons forced to participate, according to Ivan Lichnitski, by German order, took empty buckets and beat on them to make a noise, to cover up the blows and screams (p. 183).

This witness also claims to have remained concealed in the usual barn overlooking the execution site, so that he saw what happened. In response to the remark that "it was a miracle that they weren't killed," he said:

And how. They even saw us, shot at us, but thanks to God they didn't capture us (p. 176).

We are thus invited (or expected) to believe that the Germans released direct eyewitnesses, who had witnessed the entire course of the executions, "remaining side by side with the Jews and their murderers, sometimes just a few meters away, seated on the grass," eyewitnesses who were then drafted again for the next round of executions (pp. 177-178), but shot at children who witnessed the shootings only by chance, partially and at some considerable distance!

8) Desbois and the witness Wells-Weliczker

Desbois tells of his meeting in New York with Leon Wells, who writes under the pen name of "Weliczker", author of a book entitled Brigada Śmierci. Pamiętnik (The Death Brigade. A Diary, Łódź, 1946, published in Italian in 1960 under the title Comando speciale 1005, Editori Riuniti, Rome.

With reference to Desbois's book, Wells writes as follows:

I consider his work, which has been used as a guide for years, in addition to reporting some of the very first eyewitness testimonies, a history book, and I did not believe that the author was still alive (p. 137, emphasis added).

I intend to analyze this alleged "history book" in another article.

Here I shall limit myself to examining Weliczker's answers to Desbois, which I shall number for purposes of simplifying the discussion.

He describes the Jewish commander who burned other Jews alive. He told me that other Jews called him Baby.<sup>[20]</sup> At the time, he was little more than a teenager.<sup>[21]</sup>

I asked him: "Whatcha doin', Baby?"

[1] I pulled the teeth out of Jews after disinterring them, collected the teeth in a bag which I gave to the Germans, every evening.

[2] And it took a long time, because there were ninety thousand bodies.

[3] I had a friend, younger than me, named Tzaler,<sup>[22]</sup> "accountant". His job was to count the bodies, at the end of the day, and jot down the number in a little notebook.

He counted the bodies? And what happened to him?

He looks discomfited. He seems disturbed. "Of course, they killed him." I told him that I had heard that the "counters" were eliminated.

"Yes," he continued, "to eliminate all trace of the numbers."

[4] They made you sleep in tents, to prevent you from seeing that the people they were killing were Jews?

[5] Yes, but I, who was just a little kid, succeeded in seeing something between the sheets of canvas, I saw the executions, and afterwards, I had to go out, undress them and burn them. It took six months.<sup>[23]</sup>

Point [1]. In his book, Weliczker makes no specific mention of "gold teeth," but, rather, of "precious metals, such as gold or platinum," which was not "disinterred," but rather, found among the crematory ashes and placed, not in a "little bag," but rather, in "special sieve"; Weliczker performed none of these tasks, since "in the evening, the sergeant<sup>[24]</sup> took it [the sieve full of precious metals], delivering it to the squad leader."<sup>[25]</sup> The recovery of the precious metals was performed by the "ashes column," of which Weliczker formed no part.

Point [2]. The figure of 90,000 bodies is not mentioned in the book, and is not the sum of the sums mentioned, a total of approximately 5,100,[\[26\]](#) plus "thousands,"[\[27\]](#) an order of magnitude far removed from 90,000. What is more, this figure is in contradiction with the procedures described by Weliczker. In fact, he claims that it took three days to eliminate 700 bodies in June of 1943 (exhumation, cremation, sifting the ashes, filling and levelling the mass graves)[\[28\]](#) and another three days to eliminate 750 bodies in August, [\[29\]](#) so that the average was 250 bodies a day, not counting Sunday, which was a holiday![\[30\]](#) It follows that the elimination of 90,000 bodies would have required 360 working days, or 420 days including Sundays, that is, 14 months. But Weliczker only spent 5 months in the "death brigade."

Point [3]. In this regard, Weliczker's book states as follows:

On the other side, the body counter, or "accountant", with a pencil and piece of paper in his hand. His job was to note the number of cremated bodies. He couldn't tell the policeman how many bodies had been burned during the day. In the evening, he had to present the Untersturmfuehrer with a detailed report. He could not, however, remember how many bodies had been burned in the past few days. If the Untersturmfuehrer asked him the next day, he was supposed to say that he had forgotten.[\[31\]](#)

There is no mention of any shooting of the "accountant". On the other hand, the possible shooting of the "accountants" would not have sufficed to ensure "no trace of the numbers remained." This story is, in fact, a bit disingenuous: the "accountant" could easily have told Weliczker himself — who, by his own account, made regular entries in a diary:

A few days afterwards, I took out my notes and reorganized them while I was on duty with the 'Death Brigade'. I owe this diary to my duties as barracks guard: I took delivery of the paper and pencils used by the 'accountants' every day to jot down the number of bodies thrown into the flames.[\[32\]](#)

This means that he was in direct contact with the "accountants" precisely by virtue of his duties; since the task of diary-keeping, performed by himself personally, was ultimately intended to gather evidentiary material against the Germans, he could easily have transcribed the number of bodies cremated each day, and presented the diary as a complete statistical record of the cremations [at a later time].

Point [4]. The motivation suggested by Desbois and declared to be the truth by Weliczker for the fact that the "Death Brigade" slept in tents (to prevent them from witnessing the killings of the Jews) is contradicted by the book itself, which says:

I will describe the appearance and organization of the new Lager. Every tent was nine meters long and six meters wide. Eighty men lived in one tent; the rest were housed in the other, intended for the 'follow-up team', specialists, service men and a few workmen, the great majority of whom had nothing to do with the bodies, at least not directly. One third of the second tent was taken up by a small office, which was separated from the rest of the tent by a wall. We also had electric light.[\[33\]](#)

The tents were therefore intended to fulfil a simple logistical function, since they were used to house men and materials.

Point [5]. In the book, the scene takes place in the barracks, the doors of which were covered "with cloaks and coats" [?]:

A few of us watched through the cracks in the roof, and described the scene to the others.[34]

Weliczker later says that, after the pitching of the tents, during the executions, the men from the "brigade" were compelled to enter the tents to avoid being present [during the executions], but on this occasion he makes no claim of anyone spying through any cracks; rather, he refers to what they "heard." [35]

There are many obvious contradictions, but Desbois raises no objections whatsoever.

And yet, according to him, Weliczker's little book would henceforth be "used as a guidebook for years to come," so that one must assume that he knows it almost by heart.

Now let us return to Weliczker's alleged "confirmation" of the shootings of the Italian soldiers. Following the route described by himself, Desbois is said to have arrived "at the same little wood", that is, in the Lysynytychi Forest, just outside Lvov. In reality, Weliczker's book mentions neither the Lysynytychi Forest, nor any bodies of Italian soldiers. According to him, the exhumation-cremations are supposed to have taken place in a "great deep gorge" in 18 August 1943, [36] in the Krzywicki Forest, [37] at Wólka, [38] Jaryczow, [39] Piaski, [40] and Szczerce [41]. But this doesn't "confirm" anything.

What really takes the cake is when Desbois, writing on p. 134, claims that, the Lysynytychi Forest was the site of the massacre which cost the lives of over 90,000 people, repeats an oral testimony from Weliczker which is flatly contradicted by Weliczker's own written testimony!

Again, omissions and lies are brushed off as merely a few more "adjustments of the truth"!

9) “Proofs of genocide”: the cartridge casings!

Desbois describes his genius for intuition in the following terms:

I couldn't get a wink of sleep all night. Did the Germans just throw their cartridge casings away? Auditing the archives was my job. I started researching the German and Soviet documents. I asked a few specialists, I studied the records of the existing testimonies. There was no mention of the Germans gathering up their cartridge casings. A glimmer of hope! I became convinced that there must still be cartridge casings, concealed beneath the Ukrainian soil, and that wherever there was a cartridge casing, a murder had been committed (pp. 69-70, emphasis added).

This is another aberrant methodological principle, the application of which by the naive priest approaches the level of the ridiculous:

The Germans only used one shot to kill a Jew. Three hundred cartridge casings, three hundred bullets: here, three hundred people were murdered. The feelings of shock I experienced would not go away. There was not a single Soviet cartridge casing. The proofs of genocide are so flagrant, so tangible! (pp. 70-71, emphasis added).

But if the "sardine packing" story is to be taken seriously, with the corollary of killing by means of a shot to the back of the neck using Soviet machine pistols, the absence of Soviet cartridge casings would be evidence against the genocide!

On p. 72 Desbois asserts :

We counted six hundred cartridge casings that day, at the restaurant. Guillaume climbed up onto the table to photograph them from above. I realized that we had a duty to collect all these traces, the traces of the murders, all these cartridge casings, equivalent to an equal number of proofs of the Shoah by shooting (emphasis added).

Thus, according to this "faith-based methodology, mere "traces", amounting to something much less than real evidence, are transformed into "proof"!

On the other hand, the principle of "one cartridge casing = one death" is contradicted by both Desbois himself, and by several of his witnesses. In fact, he writes:

The methods utilized by these mobile killing units varied. In general, the victims, once they had been gathered together, were lined up on the edge of a mass grave and killed with a pistol shot in the back of the neck or with a machine pistol. Mortally wounded, they fell into the pit. But Blobel did not like this procedure. After the war, he declared that he had personally refused to use 'specialists in shooting in the back of the neck' to avoid placing 'personal responsibility' upon his men. Ohlendorf, Blobel and Haensch declared that they preferred mass shootings at a distance.[\[42\]](#)

For Desbois, therefore, the rumors repeated by the "witnesses" and the cartridge casings are "convergent proofs of genocide," while cartridge casings are "tangible proofs of massacre" (p. 75).

He is well aware of the irremediable inconsistency of these "proofs", but – and this is the basic problem underlying his research – "since they were not permitted to open the graves" (p. 76), he had to content himself with merely superficial traces, such as cartridge casings or the statements of witnesses.

But why not open the graves?

10) The mass graves

Desbois claims that he visited London on 5 October 2006 to meet Rabbi Schlesinger:

The rabbi sat down slowly, seriously and silently, and began to examine various documents, written by hand in Yiddish on yellow and white sheets, which had been arranged on his desk for some time. These were opinions from international Orthodox rabbinical case law regarding the bodies of Jews killed during the Shoah. Holding a yellow<sup>[ed]</sup> sheet in one hand, he raised his eyes and explained to me in English that it had been established that the Jews murdered under the Third Reich were considered tsadiqim, or "saints," and that they had been granted the fullness of eternal life. For this reason, their graves, wherever they were, whether beneath a highway or a garden, must be left intact, so that their peace might not be disturbed (pp. 161-162).

But these "opinions" had already been violated by Desbois some months before. In the paragraph entitled "August 2006. Archaeological Investigation and Re-Opening of the Graves" (pp. 224-228), he describes, in fact, the re-opening of the mass graves of Busk, performed under the supervision of the son of Rabbi Meshi Zahav, founder of the Israeli organization Zaka, which "ensures that the burials of the victims were conducted according to Jewish law" (note 77 on p. 225).

Desbois explains that,

Jewish law, halakhah, states that in no case may the bodies be moved, particularly, with reference to the victims of the Shoah. Orthodox Jewish tradition establishes that the remains of the victims of the Shoah rest in the fullness of God, and that any moving of their remains disturbs their rest. Thus, the archaeologist was only permitted to work on the surface of the bodies, taking care not to move the bones (p. 225).

I shall not dwell upon this singular ban, halfway between superstition and ceremonial magic (on the one hand, the rabbi has the power to cause the victims to enjoy "the fullness of God", while on the other hand, moving their bodies "disturbs" this fullness, as if the bones could exert an influence over the soul!); rather, I shall proceed immediately with the motivation for re-opening the graves: "so that it would no longer be possible to doubt [the reality of the Shoah] because of the lack of material confirmation" (p. 224).

Finally, after chattering about the witnesses and the cartridge casings, Desbois presents his true and proper "material confirmation." Let's see what it is. After declaring that the archaeologist "estimated"[sic] the number of graves at 17 (instead of 15), Desbois says that they contain approximately 1,750 persons, most of them women and children (pp. 225-226).

He then describes the discoveries:

The bodies began to come to light: one, then another, then yet another one... We succeed in establishing whether the victim was a man, woman or child, and particularly, the cause of death. The signs of the bullet impacts and the position of the bodies showed that they died as a result of shooting, or, in some cases, because they were buried alive. Various groups of women were found in the act of protecting their infants from the shovelfuls of sand. These macabre discoveries lasted three weeks (p. 226, emphasis added).

Desbois nevertheless personally admits that "it was not possible to conduct the investigation as it should have been performed, since we had to follow Jewish law, which prohibited us from moving the bones" (p. 227), which means that the investigation is valueless from the point of view of forensics.

It should be added that Desbois's statements are in contradiction to those of the witness Stanislav, who claims that the Jews, had to gather their belongings in a pile and were then compelled to kneel before the graves in groups of ten or less, facing the graves. They were then killed with machine pistols. (pp. 223-224).

This method of execution is incompatible with the findings mentioned by Desbois, since it presupposes moving the dead bodies around, and arranging them along the entire surface area of the mass grave; for this reason, the "position of the bodies" in the grave" proves nothing, nor were any skeletons found "in the act of protecting their infants from the shovelfuls of sand."

On p. 188, a witness reports that "the Rada [Ukrainian Parliament] has recognized the genocide of the Ukrainian people during the famine of 1932 and 1933", the so-called

Holodomor, "the terrible famine which struck the Ukraine in 1932 and 1933. This was the worst catastrophe which ever struck the Ukrainian nation in modern history, since it involved the deaths of several million people (estimates vary widely). According to various historians and the Ukrainian government itself, the famine was intentionally caused by the policies of Soviet Dictator Stalin, in such a way as to enable consideration of the famine a true and proper genocide."[\[43\]](#)

What is certain is that the number of deaths caused by the genocidal famine was enormously greater than that of the "Shoah by bullets" and that women and children also died, both Ukrainians and Jews. On the other hand, the graves at Busk were discovered "in an old Jewish cemetery."

But then, without a forensic investigation, how can one state that the bones in question belonged to Jews shot by the Germans?

Strangely, in the photographic appendix to his book, Desbois fails to publish a single photograph — either of the re-opened graves, or the bones — but rather, only 4 photographs of cartridge casings (3 of which were found at Khvativ and a single photograph showing at least 30 cartridge casings, at Busk ). A few interesting photographs may be found on the Internet, however, particularly an aerial photograph showing the 15 grave sites (Fig. 1).[\[44\]](#)

Fig. 1: Aerial Photograph showing the 15 grave sites

These are the comments accompanying the photograph on the Internet:

Aerial view of the Busk site, in the Lvov region, where 15 mass graves were found in an old Jewish cemetery. An expert report ordered by the Shoah Memorial in 2006 showed the presence of Jewish victims killed by German bullets between 1942 and 1943. At the request of the Shoah Memorial in August 2006 an expert report was drawn up under the responsibility of Yahad-in Unum, by Ukrainian archaeologists from the Civil Society for Research into War Victims [called] "Memory", under the supervision of the Zaka organization, guarantor of respect for the bodies of the victims according to Jewish law.

In reality, as I have explained above, no "expert report" was ever published. For purposes of comparison, please see the expert study performed by the Germans at Vinnitsa, where 97 mass graves were discovered, at three different locations in June 1943 containing the bodies of 9,432 Ukrainians murdered by the Soviets. As in the case of Katyn, the Germans compiled the findings of the investigations in an extremely well-documented 282-page publication organized in three parts.[\[45\]](#)

The Katyn inquest,[\[46\]](#) which is also available on the Internet,[\[47\]](#) and an equally meticulous expert report.

Let us return to Desbois.

From the aerial photograph of the Busk site, it is possible to estimate that the 15 graves (considering their dimensions and the average size of a human being) were rather small, with a total surface area of approximately 300 square meters.

Another image (Fig. 2), taken from ground level, shows the skeletons in a mass grave.[\[48\]](#) This grave is bigger, with an estimated surface area of approximately 40 square meters. Another photograph depicts Desbois on the edge of this grave.[\[49\]](#)

Fig. 2: Skeletons in a mass grave.

The skeletons are not piled up on top of each other, but rather, randomly dispersed; assuming a density of 4 skeletons every 3 square meters, the 15 mass graves would only have contained 400 bodies in total. If the graves contained 1,750 each, as claimed by Desbois, this would mean that every grave contained 4 layers of bodies. But since they were not permitted to move the bodies, Desbois and his archaeologists had no way of knowing what lay beneath the layer or skeletons they were looking at. So how did they arrive at the figure of 1,750 skeletons?

The answer probably lies in the fact that, as stressed by Prof. Edouard Husson, the above-mentioned investigation succeeded in confirming the testimony of the witnesses and the investigation of the 1944-45 Soviet Commission regarding the massacre of the last 1,700 Jews.[\[50\]](#)

A "confirmation" discredited in advance.

He adds that the findings of the investigation dated 3 October 2007 have been examined at the Sorbonne by specialists in history, Second World War weaponry, ballistics experts, specialists in forensic medicine, and archaeologists.

The findings of this examination must not be very exciting, since we still haven't heard anything about them two years later.

It is, however, a fact that the good priest, in his "archaeological investigation", never even bothered to indicate the dimensions of the mass graves, and, having finished his study, was unfortunately "compelled" to cover up the graves with a particular [form of] tar, utilized for the asphaltting of airport runways, in such a way as to guarantee that no one searching for gold could ever again disturb the dead in their repose (p. 227).

Of course, this also guarantees that the graves will never again be opened to perform a forensic-medical expert examination intended to ascertain whom the skeletons belonged to, when they died, and the cause of death.

As for Desbois's witnesses, one must wonder as to the extent to which they, too, may have had recourse to little "adjustments of the truth": Desbois was looking for mass graves, and they showed him mass graves.

Of Jews? The "archaeological investigation" described by Desbois in his book never proves this.

The witness Stanislav furthermore declared that the execution of "thousands of Jews" at Busk lasted "for over a week" in May 1943, and that there were "approximately ten graves" in the Jewish cemeteries (pp. 223-224). Ignoring the number of alleged victims and graves, his assertion that "the executions lasted over a week" is in flagrant contradiction with the Holocaust claim that the executions occurred on 21 May 1943,<sup>[51]</sup> which is hard to reconcile with either the numbers or dimensions of the graves, eight of which have a total estimated surface area of approximately 100 square meters, on average little more than 12 square meters each. Why would the Germans have bothered digging so many small graves if they needed to shoot over 1,700 people total?

Fig. 1 shows that the majority of the graves are very close together, separated only by a wall of earth: this indicates successive rather than a single digging operation; in that case, the dividing walls would have been knocked down to create larger graves.

I do not wish to imply that the graves in question could not contain the remains of Jews shot by the Germans: I simply state that Desbois has provided virtually no support for this particular conclusion.

11) The cremations

In Chapter 16, Desbois concerns himself with the alleged Aktion 1005, already mentioned above. We learn that the Third Reich decided to entrust the destruction of the traces of their victims to highly qualified, trained personnel (p. 201, emphasis added).

This is a rather strange thing to say about Blobel, who had absolutely no competence in the field of cremation. As I have remarked above, at the time, according to Holocaust historiography, the Topf & Söhne company, the most important German builder of crematory ovens at the time, and its head engineer, Kurt Prüfer, an extremely highly qualified specialist in cremation, rendered their services at Auschwitz, concurrently with the extermination of the Jews. Notwithstanding this fact, the SS, for the huge task of cremating hundreds of thousands of bodies, instead of consulting real cremation specialists — particularly Prüfer himself or his colleague, Fritz Sander, certified engineer and designer, in October 1942, of a "Crematory furnace for bodies, capable of continuous functioning and intended for mass use" (Kontinuierlich arbeitender Leichen-Verbrennungsofen für Massenbetrieb),<sup>[52]</sup> is said to have had recourse to a poor semi-drunken derelict, who, as Desbois himself remarks, had "never even studied architecture," as he later declared at Nuremberg during the Einsatzgruppen trial, but had simply attended a "state technical school at Barmen-Eberfeld, where he began a half-year [course of study], during the winter of 1913-1914, before joining the army."<sup>[53]</sup>

Desbois, incredibly, adds:

Aktion 1005 was kept secret, the SS communicated with Berlin in code: the number of clouds indicated that of the re-opened graves, and the quantity of rain indicated the number of bodies that had been burned (p. 201).

Where did Desbois ever get this poppycock? From some senile "eyewitness"? What rubbish!

And if the shootings were committed "in the light of day," if their secrecy was a "myth," why were the cremations so concealed?

According to Desbois, Aktion 1005 units followed "approximately the same itinerary as the Einsatzgruppen", in search of the mass graves: but how many graves did they succeed in eliminating the "traces" of? Desbois doesn't even express an opinion on this fundamental problem, not even "approximately." The only "proof" he produces is a photograph depicting him on the ruins of a little wall in open countryside. This is the caption:

14 July 2006. We find the traces of the chicken coop in which the Soviet POWs employed in Aktion 1005 were burned!<sup>[54]</sup>

What proof! Truly overwhelming! This is how Desbois proves the reality of Aktion 1005 according to the "faith-based method."

12) The Belzec threshing machine

This is really a shocking "discovery." At Belzec, an anonymous witness ("the son of one of these peasants" whose horses were requisitioned by the camp command) told Desbois that he had seen threshing machines in operation inside [the camp]. The Nazis used them to sift the ashes and find gold fillings and teeth (p. 46).

This story has really got to be true, because it was "confirmed" to the good priest by no less than a "peasant" (not by his son, who was supposed to have seen them!), at Tomaszów, near Belzec:

The commandant of Belzec camp requisitioned my thresher. He gave me a receipt telling me I could get it back later. After a few months, since no more trainloads of Jews were arriving at the camp, I went to the camp entrance to get my machine back. The Germans told me to go into a warehouse where there were about ten machines like mine. There were poor Jews who turned the cranks. But instead of wheat, there were the ashes of the Jews.

In view of these extremely important "material proofs", attested to by two concordant rumors, Desbois did everything he could to get his hands on them:

That day, I decided to load three of these machines onto a white van, one of which is now on exhibit at the Shoah Memorial at Paris (p. 200).

The good priest must have failed to notice one not-exactly irrelevant detail: according to the official historiography concerning Belzec, the gold teeth were extracted from the victims before burial (followed by subsequent disinterment and cremation). [For example], in this regard, the witness Rudolf Reder, declares as follows in a small book of "recollections" published in 1946:

All along the path from the gas chambers to the graves, for several hundred meters, there were dentists equipped with pincers. They stopped the workers dragging the corpses, opened the mouths of the bodies, looked inside and pulled out the gold, which they then threw in a little chest.[\[55\]](#)

On the other hand, the peasant found somebody to fob his old fairy tales off on, no doubt with suitable payment.

13) More deaths = more money

Desbois describes his financiers as follows:

We have received enormous support from various organizations, particularly the Foundation for the Memory of the Shoah, and from Madame Veil, who ensured that we became well-known to the media, as well as by other foundations and personages, in the Christian world as well. Nevertheless, we had to be really active to make ends meet, because whether or not we find the bodies will depend upon our financial situation. We were thus compelled to carry on an active search for funds to raise the funds, since the entire organization is completely transparent (emphasis added).[\[56\]](#)

In other words, the more deaths, the more money. And the more deaths, the more notoriety. Which, based on the pretense that indicating the location of a few alleged mass graves [on a map] is equivalent to "the discovery of mass graves" and, therefore, proof of mass murder. Desbois vividly describes his public appearances exhibiting his "discoveries." He appeared "before representatives from the Claims Conference" at New York (p. 122) and at the Holocaust Museum at Washington, D.C. (p. 123). In this regard, very modestly, he comments:

At these meetings, before all our researchers, I realized the significance of my discoveries to the history of the Shoah. One after the other, they listed, with all their erudite language, what I had discovered on the camp. Meetings like this helped me become aware of the importance of my work. It became clear to me that I could no longer proceed merely empirically, no matter how useful that might be. My methods had to be more "professional" (p. 125).

Desbois then describes the manner in which he received the praise of German researchers at Munich (p. 126), as well as Israeli praise at the Yad Vashem Memorial (p. 126) and French praise at the Shoah Memorial at Paris (pp. 126-127). We are not informed as to whether the notoriety goes solely to the Ukrainian procurers of (alleged) mass graves. And the same could be said of Desbois's relations with the Holocaust Museum in Washington D.C. , which, in its 2007 annual report, reports that Desbois has "identified 700 graves and execution sites" and that it "estimates that more than 2,000 exist [but] have never been found."[\[57\]](#)

It may be a "sin to think evil," but there is no doubt that the alleged 1,300 alleged "sites still awaiting discovery" represent the promise of renewed financing and notoriety for Desbois.[\[58\]](#)

To erase these shadows clouding his moral character, all Desbois need do is visit the Gaza Strip with his research caravan and look for Israeli cartridge casings: "one cartridge casing= one dead Palestinian."

In that case, we could, at least, believe in his good faith.

Notes:

Originally published in November 2009 as Patrick Desbois e le "fosse comuni" di ebrei in Ucraina. English translation by Carlos Porter

[1]	See http://www.yahadinunum.org/
[2]	Available for consultation at: http://www.docstoc.com/docs/7496059/Le-Monde—Des-Libres-19-06-2009 .
[3]	Patrick Desbois, Levana Frenk, Opération 1005. Des techniques et des hommes au service de l’effacement des traces de la Shoah . Les études du Crif, 2005. Text available at : http://www.crif.org/pdf/etude_3_1ere.pdf .
[4]	Enzyklopädie des Holocaust. Die Verfolgung und Ermordung der europäischen Juden . By Eberhard Jäckel, Peter Longerich, Julius H. Schoeps. Head Director: Israel Gutman. Argon Verlag, Berlin, 1993, Vol. I, p. 10.
[5]	This pretext is refuted in my study on the topic, entitled “ Azione Reinhard ” e “ Azione 1005 ”. Effepi, Genoa, 2008.
[6]	P. Desbois, L. Frenk, Opération 1005. Des techniques et des hommes au service de l’effacement des traces de la Shoah , op. cit., p. 5.
[7]	Temporary exhibition, 20 June-30 November 2007. Les fusillades massives en ukraine (1941-1944) :la Shoah par balles , http://www.memorialdelaShoah.org/upload/medias/fr/CP_Ukraine.pdf .
[8]	R. Hilberg, La distruzione degli Ebrei d'Europa . Giulio Einaudi editore.Turin, 1995, p. 1318.
[9]	Marseilles, Venice, 2009.
[10]	See, for example, vol. VII, p. 470 (conclusions of the Soviet Investigating Commission, and Document URSS-54) from the First Nuremberg Trial, German edition. See also: Robert Faurisson, “Katyn à Nuremberg,” in: Revue d’Histoire Révisionniste , no.2, August-September-October 1990, pp. 138-144.

[11]	According to the Enzyklopädie des Holocaust , op. cit., vol. II, p. 823, 1,500 krimchaki were shot at Simferopol on 9 December 1941.
[12]	See; in this regard, my article Belžec e le Controversie olocaustiche di Roberto Muehlenkamp , in: http://ita.vho.org/BELZEC_RISPOSTA_A_MUEHLENKAMP.pdf
[13]	Father Patrick Desbois - Part 2: The Requisitioned , in: http://holocaustcontroversies.blogspot.com/2008/10/father-patrick-desbois-part-2.html
[14]	http://www.nizkor.org/ftp.cgi/places/ftp.py?places//latvia/rumbula/massacre.411130
[15]	http://www.rumbula.org/Chapter_8_Rumbula.doc
[16]	Nome italiano di L'viv; Lwów per i polacchi, L'vov (o Lvov) per i russi, Lemberg per i tedeschi.
[17]	Une interview de Patrick Desbois , by François Delpla, 4 June 2009, in: http://www.delpla.org/article.php3?id_article=415 .
[18]	E. Lorenzon, Gli Internati Militari Italiani e la memoria di una "storia produttrice" , in: http://www.centrostudiluccini.it/pubblicazioni/memoriameorie/1/internati.pdf .
[19]	Une interview de Patrick Desbois , by François Delpla, 4 June 2009, in: http://www.delpla.org/article.php3?id_article=415 .
[20]	The book contains no mention of this nickname.
[21]	At the time of his joining the "Death Brigade," on 15 June 1943, Weliczker was 18 years and 3 months old, having been born on 10 March 1925.
[22]	Zahler means "payor;" the name should be Zähler , "counter."
[23]	In the book, five months, from 15 June to 20 November 1943. L. Weliczker, Comando speciale 1005 , op. cit., p. 15.
[24]	That is, the head of the Kommando .
[25]	L. Weliczker, Comando speciale 1005 , op. cit., p. 35.
[26]	Idem, pp. 39, 47, 55, 59, 69, 77.
[27]	Idem, p. 23: "It was a mass grave, with thousands of bodies."
[28]	Idem, pp. 39-45.
[29]	Idem, p. 59.
[30]	Idem, p. 53, 57, 64.
[31]	Idem, p. 28.
[32]	Idem, p. 105.
[33]	Idem, p. 73.
[34]	Idem, p. 46.
[35]	Idem, p. 87.

[36]	L. Weliczker, Comando speciale 1005 , op. cit., p. 23 e 59.
[37]	Idem, p. 67 e 72.
[38]	Idem, p. 75 e 77.
[39]	Idem, p. 77.
[40]	Idem, p. 88.
[41]	Idem, p. 90.
[42]	Patrick Desbois, Levana Frenk, Opération 1005. Des techniques et des hommes au service de l'effacement des traces de la Shoah . Les études du Crif, 2005, op. cit., p. 18.
[43]	Ukrainian Embassy in the Republic of Italy, Holodomor 1932-33 - Genocidio contro popolo , in: http://www.mfa.gov.ua/italy/itl/17215.htm .
[44]	Les fusillades massives des juifs en Ukraine 1941-1944. La Shoah par balles, in http://www.memorialdelaShoah.org/upload/minisites/ukraine/documents.htm
[45]	Amtliches Material zum Massenmord von Winniza . Berlin, 1944.
[46]	Amtliches Material zum Massenmord von Katyn , Berlin 1943.
[47]	Amtliches Material zum Massenmord von Katyn , in: http://www.katyn.ru/index.php?go=Pages&amp;in=view&amp;id=831&amp;page=0
[48]	Les fusillades massives des juifs en Ukraine 1941-1944. La Shoah par balles, in http://www.memorialdelaShoah.org/upload/minisites/ukraine/exposition5-desbois.htm
[49]	2007 annual report of the Holocaust Museum in Washington, in: http://www.ushmm.org/museum/press/annualreport/2007/report.pdf ,
[50]	Rapport sur la création et le développement du Centre de ressources pour la recherche et l'enseignement sur la Shoah à l'Est (Paris-Sorbonne/Yahad-In Unum) . Remis par le Professeur Edouard Husson au Professeur Georges Molinié, Président de l'Université Paris-Sorbonne. Settembre 2009, in: http://www.Shoahparballes.com/dl/2009/09/rapport-crers1.doc .
[51]	Querelle autour du Père Desbois , article cited.
[52]	See, in this regard, my study Le camere a gas di Auschwitz . Edizioni Effepi, Genoa, 2009, pp. 403-407.
[53]	Patrick Desbois, Levana Frenk, Opération 1005. Des techniques et des hommes au service de l'effacement des traces de la Shoah , op. cit., p. 9. Blobel suffered from "cirrhosis of the liver undoubtedly caused by excessive drinking," p. 17.
[54]	Photographic insert from an outside source. The story is narrated on pp. 205-206.
[55]	Roberto Sforini, Il sabba di Belzec . Edizioni Shtetl, Milan, 2004, p. 123

[56]	Père P. Desbois: "Nous avons aussi nos ennemis". Par Carroll Azoulay pour Guysen International News. 1° giugno 2009, in: http://www.guysen.com/articles.php?sid=10016 .
[57]	In: http://www.ushmm.org/museum/press/annualreport/2007/report.pdf .
[58]	In an interview conducted by Carroll Azoulay for Guysen International News on 1 June 2009, Desbois stated that "for one official execution there were perhaps 10 undeclared executions". Père P. Desbois: "Nous avons aussi nos ennemis", in: http://www.guysen.com/articles.php?sid=10016 .

The Myth of the Big Business-Nazi Axis

by Kerry R. Bolton

- Periodicals
  - English
  - Inconvenient History
  - Vol. 7 \(2015\)
  - No. 3
-

This document is part of the Inconvenient History periodical.
Use this menu to find more documents that are part of this periodical.

The party-line of the Left is that Fascism and Nazism were the last resort of Capitalism.<sup>[1]</sup> Indeed, the orthodox Marxist critique does not go beyond that. In recent decades there has been serious scholarship within orthodox academe to understand Fascism as a doctrine. Among these we can include Roger Griffin,<sup>[2]</sup> Roger Eatwell,<sup>[3]</sup> and particularly Zeev Sternhell.<sup>[4]</sup> The last in particular shows that Fascism derived at least as much from the Left as from the Right, emerging from Italy but also in particular from Francophone Marxists as an effort to transcend the inadequacies of Marxism as an analysis of historical forces.

Among the National Socialists in Germany, opposition to international capital figured prominently from the start. The National Socialists, even prior to adopting that name, within the small group, the German Workers' Party, saw capital as intrinsically anti-national. The earliest party program, in 1919, stated that the party was fighting "against usury... against all those who make high profits without any mental or physical work," the "drones" who "control and rule us with their money." It is notable that even then the party did not advocate "socialization" of industry but profit-sharing and unity among all classes other than "drones."<sup>[5]</sup> As the conservative spokesman Oswald Spengler pointed out, Marxism did not wish to transcend capital but to expropriate it. Hence the spirit of the Left remained capitalist or money-centered.<sup>[6]</sup> The subordination of money to state policy was something understood in Germany even among the business elite, and large sections of the menial class; quite different to the concept of economics understood among the Anglophone world, where economics dominates state policy.

Hitler was continuing the tradition of the German economic school, which the German Workers' Party of Anton Drexler and Karl Harrer had already incorporated since the party's founding in 1919. Hitler wrote in 1924 in Mein Kampf that the state would ensure that "capital remained subservient to the State and did not allocate to itself the right to dominate national interests. Thus it could confine its activities within the two following limits: on the one side, to ensure a vital and independent system of national economy and, on the other, to safeguard the social rights of the workers." Hitler now realized the distinction between productive capital and speculative capital, from Feder who had been part of a political lecture series organized by the army. Hitler then understood that the dual nature of capital would have to be a primary factor addressed by any party for reform.<sup>[7]</sup> The lecture had been entitled "The Abolition of Interest-Servitude."<sup>[8]</sup> A "truth of transcendental importance for the future of the German people" was that "the absolute separation of stock-exchange capital from the economic life of the nation would make it possible to oppose the process of internationalization in German business without at the same time attacking capital as such..."<sup>[9]</sup> While Everette Lemons, apparently a libertarian, quotes this passage from Mein Kampf, he claims that Hitler loathed capitalism, whether national or international. As illustrated by the passage above, Hitler drew a distinction between creative and speculative capital, as did the German Workers' Party before he was a member.

Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-R98364
Foto: o. Ang. | 1936

Adolf Hitler in discussion with Reich Minister of Economics and Reichsbank President Dr. Hjalmar Schacht in 1936

Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-R98364 / CC-BY-SA [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

National economy was a widely held legacy of the German school of economics founded by Friedrich List in the 19th century, the aim being national autarchy as distinct from the English school of international free trade.<sup>[10]</sup> National economy governed German thinking like Free Trade governed British thinking. At a glance, List stated: “I would indicate, as the distinguishing characteristic of my system, NATIONALITY. On the nature of nationality, as the intermediate interest between those of individualism and of entire humanity, my whole structure is based.”<sup>[11]</sup> It was an aim that German businessmen readily embraced.

Because the Hitler regime would not or could not fulfill the entirety of the NSDAP program, and because Feder was given a humble role as an under-secretary in the economics ministry, there is a widespread assumption that the regime was a tool of big capital. The Marxist interpretation of the Third Reich as a tool of monopoly capital has been adopted and adapted by their opposite number, libertarians, particularly aided by the book of the Stanford research specialist Dr. Antony Sutton. Sutton followed up his Wall Street and the Bolshevik Revolution,<sup>[12]</sup> detailing dealings between U.S. and other business interests and the Bolshevik regime, with Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler.<sup>[13]</sup> Many libertarians welcome the second book as showing that Hitler was just as much a “socialist” as the Bolsheviks and that both had the backing of the same big-business interests that pursue a “collectivist” state. Lemons, for example, argues that Hitler’s anti-capitalism was an implementation of many of the ideas in Marx’s Communist Manifesto, thereby indicating an ignorance of German economic theory.<sup>[14]</sup> Lemons refers to Hitler’s “communist style” economy.<sup>[15]</sup>

Henry Ford – an Early Nazi Party Sponsor?

If there was any wealthy American who should or could have funded Hitler it was Henry Ford Sr. Indeed, Ford features prominently in allegations that Hitler received financial backing from wealthy elites. But Ford was not part of the financial elite. He was an industrialist who challenged Wall Street. If he had backed Hitler that would have been an example of a conflict between “industrial capital” and “financial capital” that Ford had himself recognized, and that Hitler had alluded to in Mein Kampf. Not only did his newspaper the Dearborn Independent, under the editorship of W. J. Cameron, run a series of ninety-one articles on the “Jewish question,” but that series was issued as a compendium called The International Jew, which was translated into German. Such was the pressure from Jewish Wall Street interests on the Ford Motor Company that Ford recanted, and falsely claimed that he had not authorized the series in his company newspaper.<sup>[16]</sup> Yet Ford never funded the Hitlerites, despite several direct, personal appeals for aid on the basis of “international solidarity” against Jewish influence.

Sutton did an admirable job of tracing direct and definitive links between Wall Street and the Bolsheviks. However, perhaps in his eagerness to show the common factor of “socialism” between National Socialists and Bolsheviks, and the way Wall Street backed opposing movements as part of a Hegelian dialectical strategy,<sup>[17]</sup> Sutton seems to have grasped at straws in trying to show a link between plutocrats and Nazis. Sutton repeats the myth of Ford backing of the Hitlerite party that had been in circulation since the 1920s. As early as 1922 The New York Times reported that Ford was funding the embryonic National Socialist party, and the Berliner Tageblatt called on the U.S. ambassador to investigate Ford’s supposed interference in German affairs.<sup>[18]</sup> The article in its entirety turns out to be nothing but the vaguest of rumor-mongering, of making something out of nothing at all, but it is still found to be useful by those perpetrating the myth of big-money backing for Hitler.<sup>[19]</sup> Dr. Sutton quotes the vice president of the Bavarian Diet, Auer, testifying at the trial of Hitler after the Munich Putsch in February 1923, that the Diet long had had information that Hitler was being financed by Ford. Auer alluded to a Ford agent seeking to sell tractors having been in contact with Dietrich Eckart in 1922, and that shortly after Ford money began going to Munich.<sup>[20]</sup> Having provided no evidence whatsoever, Sutton states that “these Ford funds were used by Hitler to foment the Bavarian rebellion.”<sup>[21]</sup>

Portrait of Henry Ford (ca. 1919)

By Hartsook, photographer. [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Scott Nehmer, who had his dream of an academic career aborted because he would not write his doctoral thesis according to the preconceptions of his supervisor, undertook a convincing examination of the allegations regarding the supposed link during World War II between the Third Reich, Ford, and General Motors.[\[22\]](#) His would-be dissertation was published as a book. However, it is indicative of the poor shape of scholarship in tertiary education, and not only in the USA. Mr. Nehmer writes of his recent predicament:

I intended to write my book solely concentrating on the patriotism of Ford and General Motors during World War II but my plans were altered causing me to emphasize how Marxist ideology combined with sensationalism has smeared Ford and GM. The book was conceived as a PhD in history dissertation for Central Michigan University. Almost from its inception my advisor, Eric Johnson,[\[23\]](#) attempted to force me to libel the Ford Motor Company. He ordered me to accuse Ford of betraying the United States during World War II using falsehoods based on the faulty implications of sensationalist journalists.[\[24\]](#)

What these accounts of the funding of the Nazi party and even of the Third Reich war machine amount to are descriptions of interlocking directorships and the character of what is today called globalization. Hence, if Ford, General Electric, ITT, General Motors, and Standard Oil are somehow linked to AEG, I. G. Farben, Krupp, etc., it is then alleged that Rockefeller, Ford, and even Jewish financiers such as James Warburg, were directly involved in a conspiracy to aid Nazi Germany. To prove the connections, Sutton has a convenient table which supposedly shows “Financial links between U.S. industrialists and Adolf Hitler.” For example Edsel Ford, Paul M. Warburg and two others in the USA are listed as directors of American I.G. while in Germany I.G. Farben reportedly donated 400,000 R.M. to Hitler via the Nationale Treuhand; ipso facto Edsel Ford and Paul Warburg were involved in funding Hitler.[\[25\]](#) The connections do not seem convincing. They are of an altogether different character than the connections Sutton previously documented between Wall Street and the Bolsheviks.

The story behind the Henry Ford-Nazi legend has been publicly available since 1938. Kurt Ludecke had been responsible for attempting to garner funds for the fledgling Nazi party since joining in 1922. In 1934 he had fallen out with Hitler, had been incarcerated, and then left Germany for the USA, where he wrote his memoirs, I Knew Hitler.[\[26\]](#) He sought out possible funding especially in the USA, met Hiram Wesley Evans, Imperial Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan, the organization, then 5,000,000 strong, impressing him as a good money-making racket for its recruiters, who got 20% commission on membership fees.[\[27\]](#) He met Czarist supporters of Grand Duke Cyril, claimant to the Russian throne, in Paris,[\[28\]](#) and in Britain several aristocrats suspicious of Jewish influence: the Duke of Northumberland, and Lord Sydenham.[\[29\]](#) Money was not forthcoming from any of them. Indeed, Ludecke traveled about perpetually broke.

Ludecke met Ford in 1922. He attempted to persuade Ford that international solidarity was needed to face the Jewish issue, and that the Hitler movement had the best chance of success. Ford could not relate to the political requirements and while listening had no interest in providing funds. It is evident from Ludecke that all of the party’s hopes had been pegged on Ford’s financial backing. Ford’s series on The International Jew was much admired in Nazi circles. Hitler also greatly admired Ford as an industrial innovator, a picture of the industrialist hanging up in Hitler’s office; something that is seen as of great significance to those seeking a Nazi connection.[\[30\]](#)

James Pool, on the subject of the funding of Hitler, spends thirty pages attempting to show that Ford might have given money to the NSDAP on the sole basis that he was anti-Jewish. He frequently cites Ludecke, but decides to ignore what Ludecke stated on Ford. Pool states that Frau Winifred Wagner had told him in an interview that she had arranged for Ludecke to meet Ford, which is correct, but it is evident that her claim that Ford gave Hitler money is pure assumption. Pool conjectures that the money was given by Ford to Hitler via Boris Brasol, an anti-Semitic Czarist jurist, who in 1918 had worked for U.S. Military Intelligence, and had who maintained contact with both the Nazi party and was U.S. representative for Grand Duke Cyril. Again Pool is making assumptions, on the basis that Brasol was employed by Ford. Pool’s “evidence” is the same as that used by Sutton; contemporary newspaper accounts of rumors and allegations.[\[31\]](#)

Had Ludecke succeeded in gaining funds from Ford that would not only have not been an example of funding from Wall Street and international finance, but it would have been an example of how not all wealthy individuals are part of the world's banking nexus. Ford definitely was not, and drew a distinction between creative and destructive capital. Despite his ignominious surrender and groveling to Jewish interests when the pressure mounted due to his publication of The International Jew, in 1938 Ford described to The New York Times the dichotomy that existed between the two forms of capital:

Somebody once said that sixty families have directed the destinies of the nation. It might well be said that if somebody would focus the spotlight on twenty-five persons who handle the nation's finances, the world's real war makers would be brought into bold relief. There is a creative and a destructive Wall Street... [I]f these financiers had their way we'd be in a war now. They want war because they make money out of such conflicts – out of the human misery such wars bring.[32]

Sutton dismissed this, writing: “On the other hand, when we probe behind these public statements we find that Henry Ford and son Edsel Ford have been in the forefront of American businessmen who try to walk both sides of every ideological fence in search of profit. Using Ford's own criteria, the Fords are among the ‘destructive’ elements.”[33] Contrary to Sutton, however, Pool states that Ford executives had been strongly opposed to their boss's anti-Jewish campaign, and they persuaded him to drop the campaign in the late 1920s. In the forefront of this was his son, Edsel who owned 41% of the stock.[34]

Ford's actions show that he was opposed to the forces of war. He did not do himself any favors by opposing the “destructive Wall Street.” In 1915 Ford chartered the Oscar II, otherwise known as the Ford “Peace Ship,” in the hope of persuading the belligerents of the world war to attend a peace conference. The mission received mostly ridicule. Those aboard, including Ford, were wracked with influenza. Ford continued to fund the “Peace Ship” as it traveled around Europe for two years, and despite the ridicule was widely regarded as a sincere, if naïve, pacifist. Dr. Sutton does not mention Ford's “Peace Ship” or his peace campaign during World War I. Therefore, when he was an early supporter of the America First Committee,[35] founded in 1940 to oppose Roosevelt's efforts to entangle the USA in a war against Germany, he was too easily dismissed as pro-Nazi, as was America First.[36] Very prominent Americans joined from a variety of backgrounds, including General Robert A. Wood, president of Sears Roebuck, and among the most active, aviation hero Charles Lindbergh. Socialist Party leader Norman Thomas was a regular speaker at rallies. Many Congressmen and Senators resisted the Roosevelt war machine. They included pacifists, liberals, Republicans, Democrats, conservatives. Of Henry Ford, George Eggleston, an editor of Reader's Digest, Scribner's Commentator, and formerly of Life, and a major figure in America First, recalled that so far from being a “Nazi,” Ford expressed the hope that there would be a “parliament of man,” “a world-wide spirit of brotherhood, and an end to armed conflict.”[37]

J. P. Morgan & Co. - Thomas Lamont

Thomas W. Lamont, senior partner in J. P. Morgan, was in the forefront of Wall Street agitation for war. Lamont, a supporter of Roosevelt's New Deal, was a keen protagonist of internationalism. Speaking to the Academy of Political Sciences at the Astor Hotel in New York on 15 November 1939, he stated that the war against Germany was the consequence of the failure of the Versailles treaty and the rise of economic nationalism. In contrast to Old Guard Republicans such as ex-president Herbert Hoover, Lamont did not believe that it was possible to negotiate with Hitler. However, the military defeat of Hitler would not suffice. The USA must abandon isolationism and embrace “internationalism.”[38]

Lamont indeed had it right: international capital versus economic nationalism. The latter now included imperialism, and all autarchic trading blocs and empires. International finance could no longer be constrained by empires and trading blocs. But the world order that Woodrow Wilson had tried to inaugurate after World War I with his “Fourteen Points” and the League of Nations, based around international free trade, had been repudiated even by his own country.[39] The Axis states were building autarchic economic blocs, and had been instituting barter among states, including those that they had occupied. Roosevelt was to candidly state to Churchill during the discussions on the “Atlantic Charter” that the post-war world would not tolerate any empires including the British, and would be based on free trade. He stated unequivocally that the war was being fought over the premise of free trade.[40] Roosevelt stated to Churchill, as related by the president’s son, Elliott Roosevelt: “Will anyone suggest that Germany’s attempt to dominate trade in central Europe was not a major contributing factor to war?”[41] Apparently the cause of the war was not Pearl Harbor, nor the invasion of Poland. Roosevelt made it clear that international free trade would be the foundation of the post-war world, and empires would be passé.

General Motors - James D. Mooney

Another alleged enthusiast for Nazi Germany was James D. Mooney, vice president of General Motors, in charge of European operations. General Motors plays a large role in the alleged nexus between the Nazis and Big Business because of its European affiliates operating in German-occupied countries during the war. Such was Mooney’s supposed enthusiasm for Nazism that he allegedly regarded himself as a future “Quisling” in the USA in the event of a German victory.[42] The most extraordinary nonsense has been widely repeated that Mooney practiced how to technically achieve a Nazi salute and “Sieg Heil” in front of his hotel mirror prior to meeting Hitler in 1934. How Edwin Black knows this is not stated.[43]

It is evident that, utilizing his world-wide connections, Mooney embarked on private diplomacy with the intent of avoiding war. However, already in 1938 a G.M. executive, likely to have been Mooney, approached the British War Office to discuss British requirements in the event of war with Germany. From what is indicated by Mooney’s unpublished autobiography, it seems that, unsurprisingly, a major concern was the German method of trade. A biographer states of this:

Mooney took the opportunity at the dinner to deliver his own “blockbuster”: if the Germans could negotiate some form of gold loan, would they be willing to stop their subsidized exports and special exchange practices which were so annoying to foreign traders, particularly the U.K. and the U.S? Whilst Mooney clearly honestly believed that this might ensure peace, in truth the practices had had a deleterious effect on General Motor’s extraction of profit out of Germany....[44]

Mooney formulated a list of recommendations to ease tensions. Significantly, most of the list involves the return of Germany to the world trading and banking system:

1. Limitation of armaments.
2. Non-aggression pacts.
3. Move into trade practices of western nations:
  - a. Free exchange
  - b. Discontinue subsidized exports
  - c. Move into most-favored-nation practices.
  - d. Discharge foreign obligations (pay debts).[45]

It seems evident that Mooney was acting as an emissary for international capital, if not also as an intelligence agent for the U.S.A. and/or Britain. Some efforts were made by Walther Funk of the Reichsbank to compromise on terms of trade and finance, but war intervened. On February 4, 1939 Mooney stated before an annual banquet of the American Institute of Banking that an accommodation with Hitler could not be reached.[46]

Reich Commissioner for the Handling of Enemy Property

Allied-affiliated corporations such as Opel, affiliated with General Motors, operating in German-occupied Europe during the war did so under control of the Reich Commissioner for the Handling of Enemy Property.

German state decrees of June 24 and 28, 1941 blocked the assets of American companies, following the blocking of German assets in the USA on June 14, 1941.

In a review for the U.S. National Archives. Dr. Greg Bradsher states that American company and bank assets were seized by a December 11, 1941 amendment to the “Decree Concerning the Treatment of Enemy Property of January 15, 1940.” U.S. corporate and bank assets were controlled by the Reichskommissar für die Behandlung Feindlichen Vermoegens, which was part of the Ministry of Justice. Such trusteeship was part of international law. The Reichskommissar acted as trustee for the property of enemy aliens, in accordance with the German war effort until the end of hostilities, after which they would be returned to the owners with proper accounting. A custodian was appointed for each enterprise, who rendered financial accounts to the Reichskommissar every six months. However, other enterprises were confiscated outright by the Reich Ministry of Economics.[47]

By March 1, 1945, the Reichskommissar Office had taken under administration property in excess of RM 3.5 billion. On that date, the approximately RM 945 million of US property was administered by the Reichskommissar’s Office and another RM 267 million of US property was not administered by the Reichskommissar’s Office.[48]

Therefore, foreign corporations were hardly free to pursue their profits during war-time. Communication with the home office of the corporation was discontinued. Nonetheless, the argument persists that such corporations as Ford and General Motors were in league with the enemy during the war.[49] On the basis that the same German directors of Opel in Germany prior to the war were approved by the Reich office during the war, and that Alfred P. Sloan and Mooney remained theoretically on the Opel board, this is deemed sufficient to show collusion.[50] While Dr. Bradsher is unsure as to what happened to the profits, according to the Dividend Law of 1934, corporations were restricted on the amount of profits and dividends payable to shareholders to 6%. The remainder of profits had to be reinvested into the enterprise or used to buy Government bonds.[51] In short, the foreign-affiliated corporations were run by and for Germany as one would expect, and according to the aim of national autarchy.

Dr. Sutton tries to resolve many contradictions and paradoxes by stating that they are part of a Hegelian dialectical process learned in Germany during the early 19th century by scions of Puritan finance who founded the Yale-based Skull and Bones Lodge 322.[52] Hence, the reason why sections of Big Business dealt with both National Socialist Germany and the USSR; they were promoting controlled conflict that would result in a dialectical globalist synthesis.[53]

Fritz Thyssen

Sutton quotes Fritz Thyssen as to why he supported Hitler, but does not see that the motives are different from Wall Street's. Thyssen, and other industrialists such as Krupp, who funded Hitler, did so openly and for patriotic reasons. Thyssen wrote, as cited by Sutton: “I turned to the National Socialist party only after I became convinced that the fight against the Young Plan was unavoidable if complete collapse of Germany was to be prevented.”[54] The Young Plan for the payment of World War I reparations was regarded as the means of controlling Germany with American capital.[55] Thyssen is hardly an example of a nexus between Nazism and international capitalism; to the contrary, it shows that German business was motivated by patriotic sentiment to an extent that American business was not then and is today lesser still.

Thyssen was a Catholic motivated by the Church’s social doctrine that sought an alternative to both Marxism and monopoly capitalism. Like many others throughout the world of all classes, Thyssen found the corporatist doctrines of Fascism and National Socialism to reflect Church doctrine on social justice. Thyssen was a member of the conservative National People’s Party. While one of the few industrialists who donated to the NSDAP, at a late date, even this was meagre. The denazification trials in 1948 found that Thyssen donated about 650,000 Reichsmarks to various right-wing parties and groups, of which there were many, including the NSDAP, between 1923 and 1932. He was an adherent of the corporatist theories of Austrian philosopher Othmar Spann. In 1933 Thyssen was asked by the NSDAP to set up an Institute for Corporatism in Düsseldorf.[56] However, this was regarded as rivalling the Labor Front and was closed in 1936. In 1940, after having emigrated from Germany, Thyssen and his wife were captured in France and incarcerated in Germany for the duration of the war.

Prescott Bush

A figure that is associated with Thyssen is Prescott Bush. Because he was, like his sons Presidents George H. W. and George W. Bush, initiated into Lodge 322, vastly nonsensical theories has been woven around the Yale secret society, a.k.a. The Order of the Skull and Bones, as a pro-Nazi death cult, and the scions of influential families as part of an international Nazi conspiracy for world domination.

Prescott Bush was partner with W. Averell Harriman in Brown Brothers Harriman & Co., and the Union Banking Corporation. UBC acted as a clearinghouse for Thyssen interests. Because of this UBC's assets were seized by the U.S government during the war. That Thyssen languished in Nazi concentration camps for the duration of the war is disregarded by those who seek a Wall Street connection with Hitler via Thyssen. Hence, The Guardian claimed to have new revelations in 2004 which turn out as nothing, with the focus on Thyssen being the businessman who "financed Hitler to power." However, again more is said of the character of international capital than of big business backing for Hitler. The Guardian article states:

Erwin May, a treasury attaché and officer for the department of investigation in the APC,[\[57\]](#) was assigned to look into UBC's business. The first fact to emerge was that Roland Harriman, Prescott Bush and the other directors didn't actually own their shares in UBC but merely held them on behalf of Bank voor Handel. Strangely, no one seemed to know who owned the Rotterdam-based bank, including UBC's president.

May wrote in his report of August 16 1941: "Union Banking Corporation, incorporated August 4 1924, is wholly owned by the Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart NV of Rotterdam, the Netherlands. My investigation has produced no evidence as to the ownership of the Dutch bank. Mr. Cornelis [sic] Lievense, president of UBC, claims no knowledge as to the ownership of the Bank voor Handel but believes it possible that Baron Heinrich Thyssen, brother of Fritz Thyssen, may own a substantial interest."

May cleared the bank of holding a golden nest egg for the Nazi leaders but went on to describe a network of companies spreading out from UBC across Europe, America and Canada, and how money from voor Handel traveled to these companies through UBC.

By September May had traced the origins of the non-American board members and found that Dutchman H. J. Kouwenhoven - who met with Harriman in 1924 to set up UBC - had several other jobs: in addition to being the managing director of voor Handel he was also the director of the August Thyssen bank in Berlin and a director of Fritz Thyssen's Union Steel Works, the holding company that controlled Thyssen's steel and coal mine empire in Germany.[\[58\]](#)

The connections are tenuous at best, but of the same character as the other supposed associations between transnational corporations and the Third Reich.

Who Paid the Nazi Party?

Like the assumption that Ford could have funded Hitler because they had similar views about Jews, Pool also makes the same assumption about Montagu Norman, Governor of the Bank of England, Schacht's friend, because Norman was also antagonistic towards Jews (and the French). He deplored the economic chaos wrought on Germany by the Versailles diktat and the adverse impact that was having on world trade. On that score, he could have funded the Nazi party, but there is no evidence for it. Pool's book is useful however insofar as he shows, despite himself, that the Nazi party was not a tool of big business.

I. G. Farben, for example, often depicted as one of the plutocratic wirepullers of the Nazi regime, and as the center of a Third Reich industrial death machine, was headed by liberals. Pool states that from its formation in 1925 I.G. Farben gave funding to all parties except the Nazis and the Communists. Not until 1932, with the NSDAP as the biggest party in parliament, did two representatives of the firm meet Hitler to get his views on the production of synthetic fuel.<sup>[59]</sup> Not surprisingly, Hitler was in favor, given that it was an important factor in an autarchic economy. However, the matter of funds for the party was not raised.

The upshot that we learn from Pool in regard to Nazi party funding is that, quoting economist Paul Drucker:

The really decisive backing came from sections of the lower middle classes, the farmers, and working class... As far as the Nazi Party is concerned there is good reason to believe that at least three-quarters of its funds, even after 1930, came from the weekly dues.... And from the entrance fees to the mass meetings from which members of the upper classes were always conspicuously absent.<sup>[60]</sup>

Ludecke, despite his repudiation of Hitler, nonetheless cogently pointed out the difference in world-views between National Socialism and liberal capitalism. He wrote that the “newly legalized concept of property rights in Germany differs radically from the ideas of orthodox capitalism, though Marxian groups in particular persist in the erroneous contention that the Hitler system is a phase of the reaction designed to enforce the stabilization of capitalism.” He pointed out that “this planned economy signifies complete State control of production, agriculture, and commerce; of exports, imports, and foreign markets; of prices, foreign exchange, credit, rates of interest, profits, capital investments, and merchandizing of all kinds...”<sup>[61]</sup> Ludecke quotes from an article in the Council of Foreign Relations journal Foreign Affairs (July 1937) that “the German conception of capitalism was always essentially different from the Anglo-Saxon, because it was developed under an entirely different conception of the state and government...” Interestingly, the Foreign Affairs writer pointed out that what Hitler enacted was the consolidation of what had already been put in place by Social Democracy.<sup>[62]</sup> There were Social Democratic governments that had undertaken similar measures. Anyone familiar with New Zealand’s first Labor Government, assuming power about the same time as Hitler, could easily assume that what the Foreign Affairs writer is describing is the Labor Government’s economic policies.

Hjalmar Schacht

A direct link between international capital and the Hitler regime was Hjalmar Schacht. He is instructive as to how the global banking nexus sought to co-opt the Nazi state, and how it failed. While researchers have focused on the first, they have neglected the implications of the latter. Sutton states that “Schacht was a member of the international financial elite that wields its power behind the scenes through the political apparatus of a nation. He is a key link between the Wall Street elite and Hitler’s inner circle.”<sup>[63]</sup> Schacht was a major figure in the creation of the Bank for International Settlements. The presence of German delegates to that institution during World War II is a primary element of this alleged Nazi-Wall Street nexus. One could say, and some do, the same about the International Committee of the Red Cross<sup>[64]</sup> and Interpol<sup>[65]</sup> during the war.

It is tempting to speculate as to whether Schacht was planted in the National Socialist regime to derail the more-strident aspects of the NSDAP ideology on international capitalism. It is unreasonable to claim that Hitler betrayed the National Socialist fight against international capital, because the full economic program of the NSDAP was not fulfilled. There is always going to be a difference in perspective as to what can be achieved when one is not in government. Schacht was obliged to work within National Socialist parameters and could not help but achieve some remarkable results. Like Montagu Norman and others, he was also concerned that the economic chaos in Germany engendered by the post-war Versailles diktat was having an adverse impact on world trade. Sutton does not mention that he ended up in a concentration camp because of his commitment to international capital. At least Higham states early in his book that “Hjalmar Schacht spent much of the war in Geneva and Basle pulling strings behind the scenes. However, Hitler correctly suspected him of intriguing for the overthrow of the present regime in favor of The Fraternity<sup>[66]</sup> and imprisoned him late in the war.”<sup>[67]</sup>

Hjalmar Schacht testifying for the defendant Friedrich Flick, said the industrialist contributed to the Nazi Party's campaign fund in 1933 because Hitler promised to protect private industry and to eliminate all strikes.

Date: 21 July 1947, Provenance: From Public Relations Photo Section, Office Chief of Counsel for War Crimes, Nuernberg, Germany, APO 696-A, US Army. Photo No. OMT-V-W-16. [Public Domain] via Wikimedia Commons

Hitler re-appointed Hjalmar Schacht as president of the Reichsbank in 1933, and in 1934 as minister of economics. Schacht wrote after the war:

National Socialist agitators led by Gottfried Feder had carried on a vicious campaign against private banking and against our entire currency system. Nationalization of banks, abolition of bondage to interest payments and introduction of state Giro 'Feder' money, those were the high-sounding phrases of a pressure group which aimed at the overthrow of our money and banking system. To keep this nonsense in check, [I] called a bankers' council, which made suggestions for tighter supervision and control over the banks. These suggestions were codified in the law of 1934... by increasing the powers of the bank supervisory authority. In the course of several discussions, I succeeded in dissuading Hitler from putting into practice the most foolish and dangerous of the ideas on banking and currency harbored by his party colleagues.[\[68\]](#)

What Schacht did introduce was the MEFO bill. Between 1934 and 1938 12,000,000 bills had been issued at 3,000,000 bills per year. MEFO bills were used specifically to facilitate the exchange of goods.[\[69\]](#) However, once full employment had been achieved, Schacht wanted to return to orthodox finance. Hitler objected, and it was agreed that Schacht would continue as president of the Reichsbank until 1939, on the assurance that the MEFO issue would be halted when 12,000,000 bills had been reached.[\[70\]](#) After the war Schacht assured readers that fiat money such as the MEFO,[\[71\]](#) like barter, should not become the norm for the world, despite their successes in Germany.

Likewise, Schacht opposed the autarchic aims of National Socialism. Schacht was, in short, ideologically inimical to the raison d'être of National Socialism. Today he would be a zealous exponent of globalization along with David Rockefeller and George Soros. He wrote after the war:

Exaggerated autarchy is the greatest obstacle to a world-wide culture. It is only culture which can bring people closer to one another, and world trade is the most powerful carrier of culture. For this reason I was unable to support those who advocated the autarchistic seclusion of a hermitage as a solution to Germany's problems.[\[72\]](#)

Yet Schacht was also responsible during six years for re-establishing Germany's economy, and among the achievements which were in accord with National Socialism was the creation of bilateral trade agreements based on reciprocal credits. Schacht wrote of this:

In September 1934 I introduced a new foreign trade programme which made use of offset accounts, and book entry credit...

My plan was to some extent a reversion to the primitive barter economy, only the technique was modern. The equivalent value of imported goods was credited to the foreign supplier in a German banking account, and vice versa foreign buyers of German goods could make payment by means of these accounts. No movement of money in marks or foreign currency took place. All was done through credits and debits in a bank account. Thus no foreign exchange problem came into being.[\[73\]](#)

Schacht then hints at what would result in a clash of systems, and world war:

Those interested in the exchange of goods came into conflict with those interested solely in money. There was soon a battle royal between the exporters who sold goods to Germany, and the creditors who wanted their interest. Both parties demanded to be given preference, but the decision always went in favor of foreign trade.

I concluded special agreements with a number of states which were our principal sources of raw materials and foodstuffs. Anyone who wished to sell raw materials to Germany had to purchase German industrial products. Germany could pay for goods from abroad only by means of home-produced goods, and was thus able to trade only with countries prepared to participate in this bilateral programme. There were many such countries. The whole of South America, and the Balkans were glad to avail themselves of the idea, since it favoured their raw materials production. By the spring of 1938 there were no less than 25 such offset account agreements with foreign countries, so that more than one half of Germany's foreign trade was conducted by means of this system. This trade agreement system in which two countries - Germany and one foreign country - were always involved, has entered economic history under the name of 'bilateral' trading policy. [\[74\]](#)

It created much ill-feeling in countries which were not part of the system. These were precisely those countries who were Germany's main competitors in world markets, and who had hitherto attempted to effect repayment of their loans by imposing special charges on their imports from Germany. The countries participating in bilateral trade were not amongst those which had granted Germany loans. They were primary producers or predominantly agrarian, and had hitherto scarcely been touched by industrialisation. They utilised the bilateral trading system to accelerate their own industrial development by means of machines and factory installations imported from Germany.[\[75\]](#)

However, Schacht was not even in favor of the permanence of this great alternative method of world trade that allowed for the peaceful development of backward economies. Imagine the difference to the world today had this system been allowed to live and grow. Schacht remained a member of The Fraternity, to use Higham's term, and he worried that

The bilateral trading system kept the German balance of payments under control for many years, but it was not a satisfactory solution, nor was it a permanent one. It is true that it enabled Germany to preserve its industry and to feed its populace, but the system could not provide a surplus of foreign exchange. No more was ever imported than was exported. Import and export balanced out exactly in monetary terms. Thus this system achieved the very opposite of what I, in agreement with the foreign creditors, had deemed to be necessary.[76]

As if to emphasize that he had never intended to renege on his loyalty to The Fraternity, Schacht lamented apologetically:

Already at the time when I introduced the bilateral trading system I made it known that I regarded it as a most inadequate and unpleasant system, and expressed the hope that it would soon be replaced by an all-round, free, multilateral trading policy. In fact the system did have some considerable influence on the trading policies of Germany's competitors.[77]

It seems that Schacht had unleashed forces of economic justice and equity upon the world in spite of his intentions and it could only be stopped by war. Again: "For my part I would not say that the bilateral trading system, ranks among those of my measures which are worth copying." [78] Introducing barter in world trade seems to have been the source of great shame to Schacht.

Schacht criticizes Hitler for having financed the war neither with taxation nor with the raising of loans. "Instead he chose to print banknotes," [79] which of course is anathema to a banker such as Schacht, claiming the looming prospect of "inflation." True enough, the "inflation" did not occur because of the other state controls, but Schacht stated that it did happen - in 1945. [80] At the end of the war the bills in circulation amounted to between 40 and 60 billion marks. Schacht comments that it did not result in hyperinflation, and that the aim was to keep the level at that amount. [81] Might one conclude then that the fiat money that had been issued by the Third Reich had not been the cause of inflation, but rather the destruction of German production by the end of the war? At any rate it was not until 1948 that the Allied occupation attempted currency reform, based on the recommendations of U.S. Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau Jr., by a massive devaluation of the mark. This is what had devastating consequences upon middle- and working-class Germans, and Schacht states that "malevolent intent was involved." [82] Fiat money has long been the great bugaboo among orthodox economists. Amusingly, Schacht spent two days during the Nuremberg proceedings trying to explain the MEFO bills, and when asked for a third time, gave up and refused. [83]

The Bank for International Settlements reports show that up to the end of the war the Reich Government used a variety of methods of finance, including what Schacht had ridiculed as "state Giro 'Feder' money."

Another interesting point made by Schacht is that, contrary to the widespread assumption, German economic recovery was not based on war expenditure. Schacht even criticizes Hitler with the assumption that he did not understand the requirements of war preparation. During 1935-1938 armaments expenditure was 21 billion RM. [84] Schacht assumes that this was due to Hitler's ignorance. The other alternative is that there was no long-term plan to wage a major war or prolonged aggression. There was no buildup of raw materials and no real war economy until 1939.

In 1939 Schacht was replaced by Dr. Walther Funk, who had served in 1932 as deputy chairman of the NSDAP's economic council under the chairmanship of Feder. The replacement of Schacht by Funk working under the direction of Göring the head of the Four Year Plan, seems to be an indication that a transitional phase had been completed and that the Government was well aware of Schacht's role as an agent for international capital. Otto D. Tolischus, writing from Berlin for The New York Times, commented:

Dr. Schacht was ousted because he believed that Germany had reached the limit in debt-making and currency-expansion, that any further expansion spelled danger to the economic system, for which he still considered himself responsible, and that the government would have to curtail its ambitions and confine itself to the nation's means...

No authoritative explanation of the new financial policy is available so far, but judging from hints in the highest quarters, the policy is likely to proceed about as follows:

1. Expand the currency circulation only for current exchange demands and not for special purposes.
2. Open the capital market for private industry and make private industry finance many tasks hitherto financed by the state, either directly or by prices on public orders, which have enabled industry to finance the expansion of new Four-Year Plan factories out of accumulated profits and reserves.
3. Create a non-interest bearing credit instrument with which the state, now having to share the capital market with private enterprise, will finance its own further orders in anticipation of increasing tax receipts from the resulting expansion of production.

In one respect therefore, Herr Funk presumably will continue 'pre-financing' the state's orders as did Dr. Schacht, but whereas Dr. Schacht did it with bills, loans, delivery certificates and other credit instruments, all of which cost between 4½ and 5 per cent interest per year, Herr Funk proposes doing it with non-interest-eating instruments.

How that is to be done is his secret, but the mere mention of interest-free credit instruments inevitably recalls the plan of Gottfried Feder which at one time fascinated Chancellor Hitler, but which Dr Schacht vetoed.[\[85\]](#)

What had taken place was an ultimatum from the Reichsbank, which in January 1939 refused to grant the state any further credits.[\[86\]](#) This amounted to a mutiny by orthodox banking. On January 19 Schacht was removed a president of the Reichsbank, and his position was assumed by Economics Minister Funk. Hitler issued an edict that obliged the Reichsbank to provide credit to the state.

Funk commented on Germany's monetary policy a year later:

Turning from the external to the internal sector, the question, "How is this war being financed in Germany?" is one in which the world shows a lively interest. The war is financed by work, for we are spending no money which has not been earned by our work. Bills based on labour – drawn by the Reich and discounted by the Reichsbank – are the basis of money...[\[87\]](#)

Broadly, it seems that Feder's ideas were being implemented. The NSDAP broke the bondage of the international gold merchants, and this was being openly discussed as the way of the future. Germany created an autarchic trading bloc both before and during the war, based on barter through a Reich clearing center. Pegging national currencies to the Reichsmark resulted in immediate wage increases in the occupied states. The Bank for International Settlements Annual Report for 1940-1941 quoted finance spokesmen from Fascist Italy and the Third Reich:

The development of clearings in Europe has given rise to certain fears with regard to the future position of gold as an element in the monetary structure. It has since been noted that Germany has been able to finance rearmament and war with very slight gold reserves and that the foreign trade of Germany and Italy has been carried on largely on a clearing basis. Hence the question is being asked whether a new monetary system is being developed which will altogether dispense with the services of gold.

In authoritative statements made on this subject in Germany and Italy a distinction is drawn between different functions of gold. The president of the German Reichsbank said in a speech on 26 July 1940 that "in any case in the future gold will play no role as a basis of European currencies, for a currency is not dependent upon its cover but on the value which is given to it by the state, i.e. by the economic order as regulated by the state." "It is," he added, "another matter whether gold should be regarded as a suitable medium for the settlement of debit balances between countries, but we shall never pursue a monetary policy which makes us in any way dependent upon gold, for it is impossible to tie oneself to a medium the value of which one cannot determine oneself.”[88]

After the war Schacht, while acquitted of charges at Nuremberg, did not escape the vindictiveness of the Allies, despite the testimonials of those who stated that he was from the start an enemy of Hitler. In 1959 Donald R. Heath, American ambassador to Saudi Arabia, who had been director of political affairs for the American military government during the time of the Nuremberg trials, wrote to Schacht telling him that he had tried to intervene for Schacht with U.S. prosecutor Robert Jackson:

After consultation with Robert Murphy, now Under Secretary of State, and with the permission of General Clay, I went to Nürnberg to see Jackson. I told Jackson not only should you never have been brought before that tribunal but that you had consistently been working for the downfall of the Nazi regime. I told him that I had been in touch with you consistently during the first part of the war and Under Secretary of State Wells through me, and that you had passed on to me information adverse to the Nazi cause...[89]

In 1952 Schacht applied to establish a bank in Hamburg but was refused on the basis that the MEFO bills had offended banking morality. Notably, it was the Socialists who found the MEFO objectionable. [90]

Who Wanted War?

If some industrialists and businessmen such as Henry Ford Sr. did not want war and supported the America First Committee, others, including those supposedly pro-Nazi, were clamoring for aid to Britain and antagonism towards Germany well before Pearl Harbor. Senator Rush D. Holt, a liberal pacifist, during the last session of the 76th Congress, exposed the oligarchs promoting belligerence against Germany. Commenting on an influential committee, Defend America by Aiding the Allies, headed by newspaperman William Allen White, to agitate for war against Germany, or at least “all aid short of war” to Britain, Senator Holt said the founders included “eighteen prominent bankers.” Among those present at its April 1940 founding were Henry L. Stimson, who had served as counsel for J. P. Morgan and senior Morgan partner Thomas W. Lamont.[91] The campaign began on June 10, 1940, with advertisements entitled “Stop Hitler Now” appearing in newspapers throughout the USA. There was an allusion to the advertisements being paid for by “a number of patriotic American citizens.” On July 11 Senator Holt spoke to the Senate on the advertisement:

You find it is not the little fellows who paid for this advertisement, “Stop Hitler Now!” ... Listen to these banks. The directors of these banks, or the families of directors, paid for this advertisement. Who are they? No wonder they want Hitler stopped. Director of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co.; Director of Drexel & Co.; Director of Kuhn, Loeb Co., - Senators have heard that name before – Kuhn, Loeb & Co. international banking. No wonder Kuhn, Loeb & Co. helped finance such an advertisement. A Director of Lehman Bros., another international banking firm, helped pay for this “Stop Hitler” advisement, and a number of others.[92]

Holt, referring to a list of names of the advertisement sponsors, stated that they are not the types who die in battle, or the fathers of those who die in battle. He named the wives of international financiers W. Averell Harriman,[93] H. P. Davison,[94] the late Daniel Guggenheim,[95] and John Schiff of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. Other sponsors included Frederick M. Warburg,[96] a partner of Kuhn, Loeb & Co.; Cornelius V. Whitney, mining magnate associated with Rockefeller and Morgan interests; and Thomas W. Lamont of J. P. Morgan Co. In communications, there was Henry Luce, publisher of Time, and Samuel Goldman, the Hollywood mogul. Holt described these sponsors not as “patriots,” but as “paytriots.”

In his farewell speech to the Senate, Holt nailed exactly what was behind the agitation for war against Germany, and the different attitude towards the USSR: “Germany is a factor in world trade against England, Russia is not.” “American boys are going to be sent once again to Europe, in the next session of Congress, not to destroy dictatorship or to preserve democracy but to preserve the balance of power and protect world trade.” It is interesting to read now that in reply Senator Josh Lee reminded Holt that Roosevelt had promised that “no American expeditionary force would be sent to Europe.” Holt replied that Roosevelt had broken many promises.[97]

A survey of the newspaper headlines also indicates those most avid in calling for U.S. war against Germany, from as early as 1938; and indeed the war hysteria that was being pushed against Germany from an early date. Apart from President Franklin D. Roosevelt promising that he would not involve the USA in another European war, out of one side one his mouth while out of the other demanding an urgent military buildup, the two individuals who stand out most prominently in war-mongering are presidential confidant and Wall Street financier Bernard M. Baruch and New York Governor Herbert H. Lehman of Lehman Brothers. In October 1938 Baruch and Roosevelt were both calling for increased military spending by the USA. In January 1939 Baruch offered $3,300,000 of his own fortune to help equip the U.S. army. In February 1939 Roosevelt was saying that U.S. involvement in helping Britain and France was “inevitable,” although hostilities were not declared until September. In May 1940, amidst war-mongering by “rabbis” and Roosevelt, “Baruch exhorts U.S. to re-arm.” In June “Lehman tells Roosevelt to send all arms asked.” A few days later James P. Warburg, of the famous banking dynasty, “says only force will stop Hitler.” In July Lehman called for compulsory military service. In January 1941 James P. Warburg “asks for speed” in rearming the USA. A few days previously Rabbi Stephen S. Wise urged “all aid short of war” to Britain, as Roosevelt asked “billions in loans to fight Axis,” and Lehman “urges speedy passage of aid measure.” In February “Jewish Institute to Plan Role in New World Order,” and “Lehman Urges Speed in Voting British Aid Bill.”[98] Lehman, U.S. diplomat Bullitt, and others of the pro-war party were pitching to the American public, overwhelmingly opposed to war, that if Britain is defeated, the USA faced impending invasion.[99] Those such as Colonel Charles Lindbergh, who showed that such alarmist claims were utter nonsense, were pilloried as “pro-Nazi.”

Conclusion

Some Wall Street luminaries who are supposed to have been “pro-Nazi” on the basis of business affiliations in Germany were among those agitating for war against Germany. Foreign business holdings were held in trust throughout the war by Germany in accordance with international law. The one individual who had convincing links with international capital, Hjalmar Schacht, was relieved of all positions by 1939 and ended up in a concentration camp. Those German businessmen who did provide funds to the Nazi party did so at a comparatively late date, and were of nationalistic sentiments in a German tradition that was alien to that of the self-interest of the English free-trade school. Even those foreign businessmen who might reasonably have been expected to fund the NSDAP on ideological grounds, primarily Henry Ford, did not do so, persistent allegations to the contrary.

The Third Reich was a command economy, and corporate executives became “trustees” of their firms, subject to state supervision. The NSDAP premise: “the common interest before self-interest” was upheld throughout the regime. Dividends and profits were limited to a large extent. While it is a widespread assumption that Hitler reneged on the “socialist” principles of the NSDAP program, what the regime did carry out was extensive in terms of bilateral trade, and the use of unorthodox methods of finance. The machinations of international capital, including those who were supposedly pro-German, were for war, especially if Germany could not be persuaded to return to orthodox methods of trade and finance. War came the same year as Schacht was dismissed from office.

---

Notes:

[1]	See for example: “Fascism” in ABC of Political Terms (Moscow: Novosti Press Agency Publishing House, 1982), pp. 29-30; cited in Roger Griffin, Fascism (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), pp. 282-283.
-----	---

[2]	Ibid.
[3]	Roger Eatwell, Fascism: A History (London: Vintage, 1995).
[4]	Zeev Sternhell, The Birth of Fascist Ideology (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1980); Neither Left nor Right: Fascist Ideology in France (Princeton, 1986).
[5]	“Guidelines of the German Workers’ Party,” January 5, 1919, in Barbara M. Lane and Leila J. Rupp, Nazi Ideology Before 1933 (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1978), pp. 9-11.
[6]	Oswald Spengler [1926], The Decline of the West (London: George Allen & Unwin, 1971), Vol. 2, p. 402.
[7]	Hitler, Mein Kampf (London; Hurst and Blackett, 1939), pp. 180-181.
[8]	Ibid., p. 183.
[9]	Ibid.
[10]	Friedrich List, The National System of Political Economy (1841) online at: http://oll.libertyfund.org/titles/315
[11]	Ibid., “Author’s Preface.”
[12]	Antony Sutton, Wall Street and the Bolshevik Revolution (New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House Publishers, 1974).
[13]	Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler (Suffolk: Broomfield Books, 1976).
[14]	Everette O. Lemons, A Revolution in Ideological Inhumanity (Lulu Press, 2013), Vol. 1 pp. 339-340.
[15]	Ibid. , p. 389.
[16]	Kurt G. W. Ludecke, I Knew Hitler (London: Jarrolds Publishers, 1938), pp. 287-288.
[17]	Sutton, How The Order Creates War and Revolution (Bullsbrook, W. Australia: Veritas Publishing (1985). Sutton’s evidence for Wall Street funding of Hitler comprises nothing other than the supposed links with Fritz Thyssen (pp. 58-63), which will be considered below.
[18]	“Berlin hears Ford is backing Hitler,” New York Times , December 20, 1922, cited by Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler , pp. 90-92.
[19]	See for example: “ The Constantine Report,” http://www.constantinereport.com/new-york-times-dec-20-1922-berlin-hears-ford-backing-hitler/ Also the citing of the article in a university thesis: Daniel Walsh, “The Silent Partner: how the Ford Motor Company Became an Arsenal of Nazism,” p. 4, University of Pennsylvania, http://repository.upenn.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=1018&amp;context=hist_honors
[20]	Antony Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler (Suffolk: Broomfield Books, 1976), p. 92.
[21]	Ibid.
[22]	Scott Nehmer, Ford, General Motors and the Nazis: Marxist Myths About Production, Patriotism and Philosophies (Bloomington, Indiana: Author House LLC, 2013).
[23]	Professor Eric Johnson seems to be particularly close to Jewish interests, which might explain his outrage at Mr. Nehmer’s lack of subservience. See: Central Michigan University, History Department Newsletter , “Faculty Publications and Activities,”

	June 2010, p. 2, https://www.cmich.edu/colleges/chsbs/history/about/documents/historynewsletter2010.pdf
[24]	Scott Nehmer, "Ford General Motors, and the Nazis," http://scottneher.weebly.com/
[25]	Antony Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler , pp. 104-105. Trading with the Enemy (London: Robert Hale, 1983), by Charles Higham, is along the same lines.
[26]	Kurt G. W. Ludecke, I Knew Hitler (London: Jarrolds Publishers, 1938).
[27]	Ibid., p. 196.
[28]	Ibid., p. 203.
[29]	Ibid., p. 201.
[30]	Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler , p. 92.
[31]	James Pool, Who Financed Hitler (New York: Pocket Books, 1997), pp. 65-96.
[32]	New York Times , June 4, 1938; quoted by Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler , pp. 90-91.
[33]	Ibid., p. 90.
[34]	Pool, p. 84.
[35]	George T. Eggleston, Roosevelt, Churchill and the World War II Opposition (Old Greenwich, Conn.: The Devin-Adair Co., 1979), pp. 96-97.
[36]	Ibid., pp. 101, 146, 147, 164, 165.
[37]	Ibid., p. 101.
[38]	Thomas Lamont, "American Business in War and Peace: Economic Peace Essential to Political Peace," speech before the Academy of Political Sciences, November 15, 1939, quoted by Peter Luddington, Why the Good War was Good: Franklin D. Roosevelt's New World Order , doctoral thesis, UCLA (Ann Arbor: ProQuest LLC, 2008), pp. 112-113.
[39]	K. R. Bolton, "The Geopolitics of White Dispossession" in Radix , Vol. 1, No. 1, 2012, pp. 108-110.
[40]	Ibid., pp. 112-114.
[41]	Elliott Roosevelt, As He Saw It (New York: Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1946), p. 35.
[42]	Charles Higham, Trading with the Enemy: How the Allied Multinationals supplied Nazi Germany throughout World War Two (London: Robert Hale, 1983), pp. 166-177.
[43]	Edwin Black, "Hitler's Car Maker: The Inside Story of How General Motors Helped Mobilize the Third Reich," History News Network, http://historynewsnetwork.org/article/37935
[44]	James D. Mooney, Always the Unexpected , unpublished autobiography, ed. Louis P. Lochner, (State Historical Society of Wisconsin, Madison, 1948), p. 24; cited by David Hayward, Automotive History , "Mr. James D. Mooney: A Man of Missions," http://www.gmhistory.chevytalk.org/James_D_Mooney_by_David_Hayward.html
[45]	Mooney, ibid. , p. 27.
[46]	Luddington, p. 113.

[47]	Dr. Greg Bradsher, "German Administration of American Companies 1940-1945: A Very Brief Review," U.S. National Archives, June 6, 2001, http://www.archives.gov/research/holocaust/articles-and-papers/german-administration-of-american-companies.html
[48]	Ibid.
[49]	Rinehold Billstein, et al Working for the Enemy: Ford, General Motors and Forced Labor in Germany During the Second World War (Berghahn Books, 2004), p. 141.
[50]	Anita Kugler, Working for the Enemy , ibid., p. 36.
[51]	Richard Overy, The Dictators (London: Allen Lane, 2004), p.p. 438-439.
[52]	Antony Sutton, How The Order Creates War and Revolution , pp. 3-9.
[53]	Ibid, inter alia .
[54]	Fritz Thyssen, I Paid Hitler (New York: Farrar & Rinehart Inc., n.d.) p. 88, cited by Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler , p. 25.
[55]	Sutton, ibid., p. 25.
[56]	"Fritz Thyssen," ThyssenKrupp, http://www.thyssenkrupp.com/en/konzern/geschichte_grfam_t2.html
[57]	Alien Property Commission.
[58]	"How Bush's Grandfather Helped Hitler's Rise to Power," The Guardian , September 25, 2004, http://www.theguardian.com/world/2004/sep/25/usa.secondworldwar
[59]	Pool, pp. 336-337.
[60]	Paul Drucker, The End of Economic Man (London: 1939), p. 105; quoted by Pool, p. 272.
[61]	Ludecke, p. 692.
[62]	Ibid., p. 693.
[63]	Sutton, Wall Street and the Rise of Hitler , p. 18.
[64]	Arthur Spiegelman, "WWII Documents Bolster Nazi-Red Cross Connection," Detroit Free Press , August 30, 1996, p. 6A.
[65]	Gerald L. Posner, "Interpol's Nazi Affiliations Continued after War," New York Times , March 6, 1990, http://www.nytimes.com/1990/03/06/opinion/l-interpol-s-nazi-affiliations-continued-after-war-137690.html
[66]	Higham's term for the international financial cabal.
[67]	Higham, pp. 9-10.
[68]	Hjalmar Schacht, The Magic of Money (London: Oldbourne, 1967), p. 49; http://www.autentopia.se/blogg/wp-content/uploads/2013/09/schacht_the_magic_of_money.pdf
[69]	Ibid., p. 117.
[70]	Ibid., p. 114.
[71]	Ibid., p. 116.
[72]	Ibid., p. 85.
[73]	Ibid., pp. 85-86.

[74]	Ibid., p. 86.
[75]	Ibid., p. 87.
[76]	Ibid., p. 87.
[77]	Ibid., p. 87.
[78]	Ibid., p. 89.
[79]	Ibid., p. 98.
[80]	Ibid., p. 143.
[81]	Ibid., p. 109.
[82]	Ibid., p. 121.
[83]	Ibid., p. 118.
[84]	Ibid., p. 101.
[85]	“The Abolition of Debt-Bonds Is the Story behind the Removal of Dr. Schacht,” Social Justice , February 13, 1939, p. 11
[86]	Schacht, p. 117.
[87]	Walther Funk, “The Economic Re-Organisation of Europe,” Speech: July 25, 1940.
[88]	The Bank for International Settlements Annual Report for 1940-1941 , Eleventh Annual Report, June 9, 1941, p. 96.
[89]	Hjalmar Schacht, p. 107.
[90]	Ibid., p. 118.
[91]	“Rabid Tory Propagandists are Worst War Profiteers,” Weekly Roll-Call , January 25, 1941, p. 6; citing Chicago Daily Tribune , June 12, 1940.
[92]	“Aid to Britain Screech comes from Wall Street Profiteers facing loss,” Weekly Roll-Call , February 3, 1941, p. 5.
[93]	An elder statesman of American diplomacy under several presidents, he was a founder of Brown Brothers Harriman international bank, one of whose partners was fellow Lodge 322 initiate Prescott Bush. On account of business affiliations with German corporations such as those of Fritz Thyssen, Harriman is assumed to have been a Wall Street backer of Hitler, along with Prescott Bush. His sponsorship of war agitation shows this is not the case.
[94]	Associated with J.P Morgan interests, he was a Lodge 322 initiate in 1920.
[95]	Guggenheim, the copper magnate, had been a member of the National Security League, headed by J. P. Morgan, which had agitated for war against Germany during World War I.
[96]	A director in Harriman railway interests.
[97]	“Senator Holt in Farewell Speech calls Pro-War agitators ‘Traitors’,” Weekly Roll-Call , January 11, 1941, p. 9.
[98]	“The Chronology of the Devil who wants War,” Weekly Roll-Call , February 17, 1941, p. 2.
[99]	“Prompt passage of aid bill urged,” The Pittsburgh Press , January 26, 1941, pp. 1, 12. “U.S. envoys who saw Nazis in action fear invasion, back Lend-Lease Bill,” Pittsburgh Press , p. 12.

---

► Additional information about this document

The Passenger | CODOH

by Arthur R. Butz

The Passenger, opera in two acts by Mieczyslaw Weinberg. Libretto by Alexander Medvedev. Based on the novel of the same name by Zofia Posmysz.

The Passenger, promoted as "a Holocaust-themed opera," was written in the Soviet Union by Weinberg during the 1960s but, despite enthusiastic support from Dmitri Shostakovich, had to wait until 2010 to premiere, at the Bregenz Festival in Austria. Festival director David Pountney then brought it to Warsaw, London and Madrid before its US premiere in Houston in 2014, followed by a performance in New York later in 2014. It was first performed in Chicago in Feb. 2015, with Pountney as stage director.

I attended a performance for reasons that were not completely clear to me. First, like many operagoers, I view the great age of opera as having ended with Richard Strauss; some would even end it with Giacomo Puccini. I considered it likely that, on purely artistic grounds, I would not enjoy it very much. Second, my quarrel with the "Holocaust" has to do with its historicity; the problem of dramatic representation would seem, at first thought, to be unimportant, since most dramas are fictitious anyway. A statue, if invited to dinner, will not nod acceptance, let alone come, but that fact doesn't diminish the awe that we feel for Mozart's Don Giovanni, which is universally considered a masterpiece.

This is a review of Weinberg's opera, not the specific performance I saw in March 2015, so names of the performing artists are irrelevant. My final verdict on the opera's artistic merits: not bad for a modern opera, but it isn't about the "Holocaust."

Composer Mieczysław Weinberg. (Public domain)

Polish writer Zofia Posmysz had been arrested in her late teens by the German occupation authorities, with three male comrades, for attending illegal meetings, and sent to Auschwitz in 1942, where she was quartered in a women's camp. Of course she and her fellow inmates were not gassed. Her novel is said to be based on her experiences there, and she attended the Chicago premiere of the opera.

The heroine of the fictitious drama is camp prisoner Marta, who is the special target of Liese, a cruel German SS guard. Apart from some silly heiling while strutting around in parade black SS uniforms, and an enigmatic episode of "selection"[\[1\]](#), the action is on a credible level, and could correspond to many contexts of incarceration, in camps or prisons, then or today. Marta's fiancé Tadeusz is incarcerated in the men's camp, a fact that Liese uses wickedly, though on that I think Weinberg missed an opportunity to portray a level of evil comparable to, say, the wicked trick that Baron Scarpia plays on Puccini's Tosca, though Tadeusz is eventually reported as sent to his death.

In the opera Liese had married a German diplomat after the war and they were travelling as passengers on a ship to Brazil, where he was to take up a new post. Liese spies another passenger who reminds her of Marta and is terrified that her dark secret, unknown to her husband, could be exposed by this woman.[\[2\]](#)

This story is not about the "Holocaust" which, in the common understanding, is about the alleged mass physical extermination of the Jews, usually in gas chambers. I believe the failure to represent it dramatically, over many years, inheres in the nature of the allegation.

Most of us will remember Schindler's List, the movie based on a novel that transformed Steven Spielberg's image from producer of technically marvelous junk into sensitive artist. There was a terrifying scene in which the audience was encouraged to assume that a group of women was about to be gassed. Even I got scared, but then water came out of the showerheads!

I don't believe Spielberg was too squeamish to portray a gassing, since there was also a scene in the film showing a huge open wagon full of corpses. Also, Spielberg was the guy who presented us, in another movie, with a man being eaten, whole and alive, by a giant Great White shark. Rather, I think there are grave practical problems in representing a gassing even approximately as claimed in the legend. Robert Faurisson has described some such problems in detail.[\[3\]](#)

To give another example, in 1978 NBC televised a "docudrama" entitled "Holocaust," and I wrote a review of it for the weekly Spotlight newspaper, predecessor of today's fortnightly American Free Press. I wrote (May 8, 1978):

The extermination allegation entails dramatic impossibilities.

It is one thing to read in a book that the Jews didn't resist being killed. It is quite another experience to see on our TV screens scenes where people are, as if at the supermarket or bank, quietly and cooperatively waiting in line to be machine-gunned, or calmly filing into a "shower" that at least some of them know to be in reality a gas chamber.

That expresses the problem, also, of creating a true "Holocaust opera." If it is credible at all, it will not even aim at its target. David Poutney concedes "There some people who say you can't make an opera on the Holocaust," and I think those people are right, but I add that the barrier consists mainly in the absurdity of the allegations.

We should chew on that for a while. Despite the mania for talking about it, this "Holocaust" still lacks commensurate dramatic representation. I believe that all such attempts will either be ludicrous on their faces, or give us something like the Spielberg movie, which represents genocide somewhat the way a performance of Tristan and Isolde, abruptly ending with Act II, might represent a love story.

---

Notes:

[1]	Of course it is not claimed that Polish political prisoners were "gassed" or "exterminated." However as early internees they were hard hit by the typhus epidemics of 1942-43.
[2]	For sources and more commentary see the articles by John von Rhein and Howard Reich in the Chicago Tribune , Feb. 18 & 26, 2015.
[3]	Robert Faurisson, "The Mechanics of Gassing," Journal of Historical Review , Vol. 1, No. 1, pp. 23-30, Spring 1980. Online: http://codoh.com/media/files/jhr/v1n1.pdf

The Tyranny of Silence, Demonstrated

by Ezra Macvie

This book's author, a Danish journalist now 57 years old despite the many death threats he has received, was catapulted to fame, to his great surprise, after the publication by his employer of a group of cartoons depicting Islam's central prophet Mohammed in a number of unflattering, even risible poses. The international kerfuffle that ensued lasted for years, inflamed passions in countries all over the world, resulted in at least a dozen actual deaths, and illuminated as perhaps nothing before it the value and costs of freedom of expression. Though the support of his employer and his country were occasionally to be found wanting, at least in the eyes of "free-speech fundamentalists" such as are likely to be found among the readers of Inconvenient History, Flemming Rose's defense of his editorial decisions to assemble and publish the offending sketches is courageous, fulsome, admirable, and even inspiring.

The story of these developments might have made compelling reading from the pen of a more vivid narrator, or the embellishments of a sensationalist seeking to promote his heroism in the face of threats that might cause many a stout heart to skip a beat or even stop altogether. But this writer uses a matter-of-fact style that ultimately so downplays the genuine drama that must have throbbed from the very course of its events that the end result is occasionally a bit boring for the less-focused sort of reader, which most of us in fact are, most of the time. I put it down myself to modesty and perhaps the tendency to understatement that helps us differentiate between Scandinavians and, say, Mediterranean types. It buttresses the impression of honesty and accuracy that books of this kind depend upon to persuade readers who make it their business to think things through.

Flemming Rose at the 2015 European Students For Liberty Conference in Berlin.

By derthis (Own work) [CC BY-SA 4.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/4.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

But the book is not about Flemming Rose; it is a far more-encompassing discussion of freedom of speech in the present day around the world from the special perspective of the author of what has become known as the Cartoon Crisis. Rose's own story, mixed throughout with the stories of others, permeates the narrative, but it serves merely as an incomparable vehicle for exploring the profound subject it treats of.

Throughout my reading of this book advocating what might be the most-precious of all rights, I was deafened by a roar in my mind's ear that only increased as I approached the book's end. This anti-silence was ear-splitting, or mind-splitting, as I realized that nowhere in all these pages about every kind and shape of censorship imaginable was I going to find the slightest mention of the 800-pound gorilla of the species, the criminalization of "Holocaust denial." The closest it came to mentioning the elephant in this living room was where he wrote:

An advisor to the Afghan minister of culture told the British daily the Independent that he supported the verdict [to execute a blasphemer of Islam], contending that Europe restricted Holocaust denial in much the same way: "Every country has its own limits on freedom. European people have the right to protect their opinions about ideas which are supposed to be dangerous for their civilization."

Rose even claimed to have decried the criminalization of Holocaust denial in a speech he gave in Israel, and to have defended his position against complainants who claimed to be related to Jews who died in the Holocaust. At least he was on the right side of the issue when he brought it up, and apparently intrepid about when and where he did so.

But in Chapter 10, he lists five recent cases of legal suppression of speech, which fell out as follows:

Country	Victim/Target	Offender	Sentence
Egypt	Islam	Muslim	4 years imprisonment
Russia	Orthodox Christianity	Non-religious	$3,600 fine; lost job
India	Hinduism	Muslim	Persecution, exile
Afghanistan	Islam	Muslim	Death (not carried out)
Pakistan	Islam	Muslim	Death (vacated)

Is anything missing here? How about Ernst Zündel (Canada)? Jürgen Graf (Switzerland)? Germar Rudolf (Germany)? Sylvia Stolz (Germany)? The list goes on and on, for (western) country after country, replete with the entire panoply of penalties including fines, loss of employment, exile, imprisonment and, if not death sentences, murders in any case.

Despite this resounding omission of probably the most-powerful group advocating censorship anywhere in the world, the book actually scores worthwhile points in the contest to defend freedom of speech, including at least one that, if not necessarily original, nonetheless so counters superficially logical thinking that it is well worth repeating: the presence within a single society of differing, even opposite-minded groups, including large majorities and small minorities does not impose a need for censorship to prevent people from offending, insulting, or even threatening any of these groups. To the contrary, such diversity in a polity increases the need for freedom of expression, if only to prevent groups from contending with each other for power over the processes that enact and enforce the laws that impose censorship. The Charlie Hebdo massacre of early this year in the land of the Loi Gayssot criminalizing "Holocaust denial" is an object example of this process. The mechanism is available to, and used by, the Jews of France, while access to it is denied the Muslims of France. This logically brings on the AK-47s. The book here reviewed was originally written in 2010, so the incident is not mentioned, as it surely would have been had the event occurred before its writing.

In the above-listed case concerning India, in particular, Rose recounts in hair-raising detail how the tyranny of silence seems to have descended over all the expressive arts and media in India, with law after law and case after case arising at the behest of one religion, race, profession, geographic area, or other affiliation of any kind whatsoever. The case of India looks to be the world's grim future if the trends of grievance outlined by Rose continue in the direction they've already traveled so far in. The recent history of neighboring Pakistan, recounted in the case study associated with that country, provides no relief whatever despite its more particularist focus on Islam.

Rose is frequently at pains to emphasize his well-supported view that even honest, "balanced" programs of censorship designed to minimize intergroup friction fail to do so. What he might not have emphasized sufficiently, though he implies it, is that such programs, especially of course those that (as in France) favor one group while neglecting another(s), seriously aggravate intergroup conflict, quite aside from the deleterious effect such oppression obviously has on the quality and content of public discourse and consensus-seeking in general.

This is an important book on an important subject. That it silently demonstrates, in favor of the Holocaust scripture and its devotees, the very evil that it bemoans ultimately strengthens its impact enormously, at least for readers who are sufficiently attuned to the detection of such insidious silences.

For such readers, there will be no need for any injunction to bear this self-censorship in mind; it will resound from practically every page. For other readers, it will nonetheless incline the intelligent to improved thinking on the subject, hopefully including the monstrous case that it so quietly neglects.

War Criminals in Israel | CODOH

by Jett Rucker

Israel collects war criminals. Of course, in the course of its never-ending conflicts with its neighbors, it has produced its own abundant crops of home-grown, even native, war criminals, but here, I wish to concentrate on war criminals, real and supposed, imported from other lands whose crimes even antedate Israel itself—I am interested, in fact, in war criminals whose crimes were committed, if crimes they were, in Europe during and immediately after World War II, either upon Jews or by Jews. In fact, four famous and not-so-famous cases themselves embody such a wide variety of charges, apprehensions, verdicts, trials and sentences that they will suffice for the exploration of the subject that I contemplate.

The most-famous of these accused war criminals is Adolf Eichmann, who needs no more introduction than his name. Next most-famous, perhaps, is Yitzhak Arad, a Jew from Lithuania who has lived most of his life in Israel and gained a name in certain circles of scholarly advocacy as the author of several books purporting to describe, in great detail, various phases of the historical subject embraced by the term “the Holocaust.” Next would come the late John Demjanjuk, a Gentile from Ukraine who lived most of his life in America whose citizenship in that country was twice granted, and twice revoked during the travails he experienced in the last three decades of his life while persecuted by a succession of international Holocaust avengers. The one most spared the revealing light of international notoriety, and even a trial, is one Salomon Morel, a Jew from Poland who was commandant of the post-war Zgoda/Świętochłowice concentration camp for Prussian German expellees in Poland, and also spent the latter part of his life in Israel without calling any further attention to himself, nor having it come to him in the manner experienced by the Gentiles in this list. The cases will be reviewed in the order in which they became public.

Adolf Eichmann's extension of arrest hearing

Photo: 1961.

By Israel Government Press Office (Israel National Photo Collection D412-001) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Adolf Eichmann is the only German in this group, a member of the National Socialist Party and an officer in the infamous Schutz Staffel, or SS, an organization whose vast functions and enterprises encompassed carrying out most of the dealings of the German government with Jews in territories it controlled in the course of World War II. Eichmann is the only one of the four cases in which Communists are not directly involved, neither as adversaries nor as allies. His case might bear a distant—and foreshortened—comparison with that of Yitzhak Arad in that he embarked on an abortive authorial enterprise in which he hoped to gain publication of his work, which appears to have been largely autobiographical. The corpus of works about Eichmann<sup>[1]</sup> greatly exceed in bulk and renown anything Eichmann is known even to have planned, much less realized.

Israel abducted Eichmann in Argentina in 1960, after Eichmann had been living there since the war, and secretly spirited him to Israel, where Israel proudly proclaimed its violation of Argentina's sovereignty, and proceeded to put on a show "trial" of this early Holocaust defendant, which concluded with his being sentenced to death, and duly hanged in 1961. While Israel's Gestapo, the Mossad, is known to have murdered a good number of people outside Israel, and Israel is known to have extradited a comparable number of unfortunates for crimes such as those of which Eichmann was accused, Eichmann's would appear to be the only case of covert "extradition" performed by the Mossad without the host country's knowledge or permission.

Eichmann doggedly testified at his "trial," confirming in the minds of his captors and their sympathizers his guilt for all time. The same testimony, in the minds of otherwise-motivated auditors, largely exonerated Eichmann of anything worse than carrying out his orders, and even indicted some leaders of Jewish communities for at least as much guilt in carrying out the Holocaust as Eichmann himself could be seen to bear. While the entire process was literally terminal for Eichmann, it provided an auspicious launch not only for the Holocaust culture we observe everywhere today, but for its unlovely offspring, the aggressive young Israel. Eichmann “gave” his life for Israel, and for generations of Holocaust victims as yet unborn.

Salomon Morel’s story is much befogged by blood and smoke, arising as it does during the early 1940s when invasions, conquests and occupations from both east and west washed over his birthplace in Poland. His own area did not become subject to German occupation until after Operation Barbarossa was launched from the German side on June 22, 1941, after which he went underground in a manner that the Polish Institute of National Remembrance describes as rankly opportunist, if not outright predatory. When the gang of robbers of which he was a member was captured by the Polish People’s Army, he skedaddled over to the communist side of the resistance, leaving his brothers and fellow gang members to face the consequences. Morel found success as a communist and, when Soviet communists became the masters of Poland, Salomon Morel found his calling—and an opportunity for revenge—as a jailer.

Specifically, newly minted Colonel Morel became commandant of the Zgoda/Świętochłowice concentration camp for Prussian German expellees in Poland, a camp full, as he likely saw it, of people related to those who identified his fellow Jews as enemies and subsequently enslaved them in great numbers in the course of fighting a war that ultimately took on existential consequences for the Germans. He may also have believed the tales of mass torture or even genocide the Germans are supposed to have committed against his people.

Whatever Morel’s beliefs, the Zgoda camp became legendary as one of many counter-concentration camps for Germans in which, even if there were no gas chambers, Polish-German men, women and children died in great numbers in the most horrendous conditions imaginable, even to those who imagined horrendous conditions in the camps established by the German government. Morel and his murderous Jewish cadre of camp operatives were immortally documented in John Sack’s An Eye for an Eye<sup>[2]</sup>, an account of revenge taken by Jews in Europe after World War II against people they felt were “German enough” to merit retribution for the atrocities they felt had been committed against Jews under the National Socialist policies that ruled Germany from 1933 to 1945.

In 1990, however, Morel’s red star began to set with the fall of the Soviet Union. By 1992, Colonel Morel could read the writing on the wall, and he lit out, as fellow Communist Yitzhak Arad had long since done (see below) for Israel, to make Aliyah. Israel met Poland’s 1998 request for Morel’s extradition for crimes against humanity with the response that the statute of limitations had run out.

Statutes of limitation don’t apply to such as Oskar Groening or John Demjanjuk (see below), but they certainly do to Salomon Morel, especially when he is safely ensconced in the national home of the Jews, where he died a peaceful death in 2007.

John Demjanjuk hearing his death sentence. Photo: 25 April 1988
USHMM Photograph #65266, courtesy of Israel Government Press Office, [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

John Demjanjuk was a farm boy from Ukraine, which was invaded and occupied by Germany in 1941, when Demjanjuk was 21. Demjanjuk had by that time been drafted into the Red Army that opposed the German invasion, but he became a prisoner of war of the Germans after an engagement in which his side lost. Demjanjuk's story at this time becomes, like the stories of many of the other war criminals, befogged by blood, smoke and war. At some point during this tumultuous period, however, it seems Demjanjuk took up duty, nominally on the German side, as a guard at certain concentration camps in which the occupying Germans confined and enslaved various people they felt threatened their control of the areas, including Jews. It is alleged, in fact, that the Germans deliberately killed Jews and perhaps others in such places, and the legal standards that grew up around such allegations, on the part of parties connected with the victorious Allies, implicated even such passive agents as guards (Demjanjuk's role) in the alleged enterprise.

Demjanjuk, however, got away from all this quite handily when, in 1952, he managed to emigrate to the United States, where he became an auto worker. There he lived, worked, and raised a family in much the same manner as other Americans, native-born or immigrant alike, until Demjanjuk rashly allowed his wife Vera to return to their native Ukraine. There, Vera let it out that John, for whom his mother had been receiving survivor's benefits from the government, was still very much alive. She didn't realize that this revelation put her husband under suspicion of having been a turncoat.

Demjanjuk's mother's benefactors were not long in exacting revenge for this assault on the national treasury of the Ukrainian people committed unwittingly by the bereft mother. The authorities, in possession of Demjanjuk's postwar applications for a driver's license in East Germany, cobbled up a much-discredited "identification card" for Demjanjuk as a guard at the notorious Trawniki concentration camp, and we were off to the races. Demjanjuk's troubles with the laws of Israel, Germany and the US never ended after that.

He was extradited to Israel (the place whose statutes of limitation barred the extradition of Salomon Morel), tried there, sentenced to death, and subsequently freed by the Israeli Supreme Court's ruling that there was insufficient evidence to convict him, and a subsequent case, brought after restoration of his US citizenship from Germany, where he was again being tried in the light of "new evidence."

He died during that trial, a casualty of ... something. Of World War II? Of Nazism? Of Communism? Of Zionism? Of American immigration law? It might seem, at least in John Demjanjuk's case, that the vises of history close from every direction imaginable. Who won the war? Who controls the apparatus of the state after the war? Who controls the media after the war? Who has the most money after the war?

Yitzhak Arad grew up Jewish in a place that was part of Poland until he was 19, after which it was part of Lithuania. Alone among our war criminals, Arad enjoys a reputation, at least in certain partisan quarters, as a "historian," or at least, narrator-from-the-scene, of innumerable atrocities, or resistance measures depending on your perspective, not only in the area in which he was born, but as well in Israel, in the violent gestation of which he participated quite as much, and quite as particularly, as he participated in the removal of German occupiers of his native lands, along with other persons whose ethnic, religious or political affiliations differed from his own.

Specifically, Arad participated (in Europe, at least) in intra-resistance conflicts in which he is recorded as having killed other resistance fighters whose affiliations lacked the Soviet/communist/Jewish ones enjoyed by the partisans among whom he fought. Whether Arad committed his atrocities in the name of Jewish domination or communist domination remains ambiguous to this very day; it certainly would have been ambiguous to Arad at the time, though it is likewise unclear to what extent the distinction mattered to him.

As it turned out, Arad's communists won, but Arad took off for the Promised Land in 1945, where there was plenty of activity of the sort in which he had been successful already. Arad's side won again in 1948, when the state of Israel was born amid the ashes of Palestine, and Arad became a brigadier general in Israel's Defense Force before segueing to his career as an academic historian. Bloody times, it might be reasoned, are the better recalled and recounted when your own hands are covered with the stuff. Arad has commanded not only such credibility, but credence as well on the part of people eager to support his particular view of the events.

But back home in Lithuania, Arad's old friends the communists were ousted in 1990. But it wasn't until 2007 that historical investigators of the new regime got around to Arad's actions during World War II against their side of the resistance to Lithuania's many occupations. But, fortunately for Arad, his adopted country just said the claim was an anti-Semitic plot, and refused to cooperate with it.

Countries involved in the foregoing list include Argentina, Germany, Israel, Lithuania, Poland and the United States. Israel, of course, is the one common to all the cases. Israel extradites people accused of harming Jews, however peripherally and long ago that may be, or it just abducts them outright, and it sentences them to death. Those (Jews) accused of harming non-Jews, it welcomes in, and once they are safely ensconced within the walls rising even now around Eretz Israel, it rebuffs efforts to bring them to justice with impunity.

Israel's wards may plainly be seen to be, or have been, partisans. Of Israel itself, it may also be said that it is partisan—in every pejorative sense of the word.

---

Notes:

- |                     |   |
|---------------------|---|
| [1] | The most famous of these works is Hannah Arendt's Eichmann in Jerusalem (New York: Viking Press, 1963), but an even better account of the trial is The Real Eichmann Trial by Paul Rassinier (English translation Steppingstones Publications, Silver Spring, Md., 1979). |
|---------------------|---|

[2] John Sack, An Eye for an Eye: The Untold Story of Jewish Revenge against Germans in 1945 (New York: Basic Books, 1993).

Winston Churchill Discreetly Veiled, Part 2

by Ralph Raico

- Periodicals
  - English
  - Inconvenient History
  - Vol. 7 \(2015\)
  - No. 3
-

This document is part of the Inconvenient History periodical.
Use this menu to find more documents that are part of this periodical.

This paper is part of the series Winston Churchill Discreetly Veiled. Click below for the previous or next item of the series. Click on 'up' to return to the series' Table of Contents.

Embroiding America in War — Again

In September 1939, Britain went to war with Germany, pursuant to the guarantee which Chamberlain had been panicked into extending to Poland in March. Lloyd George had termed the guarantee "hare-brained," while Churchill had supported it. Nonetheless, in his history of the war Churchill wrote: "Here was decision at last, taken at the worst possible moment and on the least satisfactory ground which must surely lead to the slaughter of tens of millions of people."<sup>[1]</sup> With the war on, Winston was recalled to his old job as First Lord of the Admiralty. Then, in the first month of the war, an astonishing thing happened: the president of the United States initiated a personal correspondence not with the Prime Minister, but with the head of the British Admiralty, by-passing all the ordinary diplomatic channels.<sup>[2]</sup>

The messages that passed between the president and the First Lord were surrounded by a frantic secrecy, culminating in the affair of Tyler Kent, the American cipher clerk at the US London embassy who was tried and imprisoned by the British authorities. The problem was that some of the messages contained allusions to Roosevelt's agreement — even before the war began — to a blatantly unneutral cooperation with a belligerent Britain.<sup>[3]</sup>

On June 10, 1939, George VI and his wife, Queen Mary, visited the Roosevelts at Hyde Park. In private conversations with the King, Roosevelt promised full support for Britain in case of war. He intended to set up a zone in the Atlantic to be patrolled by the US Navy, and, according to the King's notes, the president stated that "if he saw a U boat he would sink her at once & wait for the consequences." The biographer of George VI, Wheeler-Bennett, considered that these conversations "contained the germ of the future Bases-for-Destroyers deal, and also of the Lend-Lease Agreement itself."<sup>[4]</sup> In communicating with the First Lord of the Admiralty, Roosevelt was aware that he was in touch with the one member of Chamberlain's cabinet whose belligerence matched his own.

In 1940, Churchill at last became Prime Minister, ironically enough when the Chamberlain government resigned because of the Norwegian fiasco — which Churchill, more than anyone else, had helped to bring about.<sup>[5]</sup> As he had fought against a negotiated peace after the fall of Poland, so he continued to resist any suggestion of negotiations with Hitler. Many of the relevant documents are still sealed — after all these years<sup>[6]</sup> — but it is clear that a strong peace party existed in the country and the government. It included Lloyd George in the House of Commons, and Halifax, the Foreign Secretary, in the Cabinet. Even after the fall of France, Churchill rejected Hitler's renewed peace overtures. This, more than anything else, is supposed to be the foundation of his greatness. The British historian John Charmley raised a storm of outraged protest when he suggested that a negotiated peace in 1940 might have been to the advantage of Britain and Europe.<sup>[7]</sup> A Yale historian, writing in the New York Times Book Review, referred to Charmley's thesis as "morally sickening."<sup>[8]</sup> Yet Charmley's scholarly and detailed work makes the crucial point that Churchill's adamant refusal even to listen to peace terms in 1940 doomed what he claimed was dearest to him — the Empire and a Britain that was non-socialist and independent in world affairs. One may add that it probably also doomed European Jewry.<sup>[9]</sup> It is amazing that seventy-five years after the fact, there are critical theses concerning World War II that are off-limits to historical debate.

Lloyd George, Halifax, and the others were open to a compromise peace because they understood that Britain and the Dominions alone could not defeat Germany.<sup>[10]</sup> After the fall of France, Churchill's aim of total victory could be realized only under one condition: that the United States become embroiled in another world war. No wonder that Churchill put his heart and soul into ensuring precisely that.

After a talk with Churchill, Joseph Kennedy, American ambassador to Britain, noted: "Every hour will be spent by the British in trying to figure out how we can be gotten in." When he left from Lisbon on a ship to New York, Kennedy pleaded with the State Department to announce that if the ship should happen to blow up mysteriously in the mid-Atlantic, the United States would not consider it a cause for war with Germany. In his unpublished memoirs, Kennedy wrote: "I thought that would give me some protection against Churchill's placing a bomb on the ship."<sup>[11]</sup>

Kennedy's fears were perhaps not exaggerated. For, while it had been important for British policy in World War I, involving America was the sine qua non of Churchill's policy in World War II. In Franklin Roosevelt, he found a ready accomplice.

Churchill at the Cairo conference with Chiang Kai-shek and Franklin D. Roosevelt, November 25, 1943.

[Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

That Roosevelt, through his actions and private words, evinced a clear design for war before December 7, 1941, has never really been in dispute. Arguments have raged over such questions as his possible foreknowledge of the Pearl Harbor attack. In 1948, Thomas A. Bailey, diplomatic historian at Stanford, already put the real pro-Roosevelt case:

Franklin Roosevelt repeatedly deceived the American people during the period before Pearl Harbor.... He was like a physician who must tell the patient lies for the patient's own good.... The country was overwhelmingly noninterventionist to the very day of Pearl Harbor, and an overt attempt to lead the people into war would have resulted in certain failure and an almost certain ousting of Roosevelt in 1940, with a complete defeat of his ultimate aims.[\[12\]](#)

Churchill himself never bothered to conceal Roosevelt's role as co-conspirator. In January, 1941, Harry Hopkins visited London. Churchill described him as "the most faithful and perfect channel of communication between the President and me ... the main prop and animator of Roosevelt himself":

I soon comprehended [Hopkins's] personal dynamism and the outstanding importance of his mission ... here was an envoy from the President of supreme importance to our life. With gleaming eye and quiet, constrained passion he said: "The President is determined that we shall win the war together. Make no mistake about it. He has sent me here to tell you that at all costs and by all means he will carry you through, no matter what happens to him — there is nothing that he will not do so far as he has human power." There he sat, slim, frail, ill, but absolutely glowing with refined comprehension of the Cause. It was to be the defeat, ruin, and slaughter of Hitler, to the exclusion of all other purposes, loyalties and aims.[\[13\]](#)

In 1976, the public finally learned the story of William Stephenson, the British agent code named "Intrepid," sent by Churchill to the United States in 1940.[\[14\]](#) Stephenson set up headquarters in Rockefeller Center, with orders to use any means necessary to help bring the United States into the war. With the full knowledge and cooperation of Roosevelt and the collaboration of federal agencies, Stephenson and his 300 or so agents "intercepted mail, tapped wires, cracked safes, kidnapped, ... rumor mongered" and incessantly smeared their favorite targets, the "isolationists." Through Stephenson, Churchill was virtually in control of William Donovan's organization, the embryonic US intelligence service.[\[15\]](#)

Churchill even had a hand in the barrage of pro-British, anti-German propaganda that issued from Hollywood in the years before the United States entered the war. Gore Vidal, in Screening History, perceptively notes that starting around 1937, Americans were subjected to one film after another glorifying England and the warrior heroes who built the Empire. As spectators of these productions, Vidal says: "We served neither Lincoln nor Jefferson Davis; we served the Crown."[\[16\]](#) A key Hollywood figure in generating the movies that "were making us all weirdly English" was the Hungarian émigré and friend of Churchill, Alexander Korda.[\[17\]](#) Vidal very aptly writes:

For those who find disagreeable today's Zionist propaganda, I can only say that gallant little Israel of today must have learned a great deal from the gallant little Englishers of the 1930s. The English kept up a propaganda barrage that was to permeate our entire culture ... Hollywood was subtly and not so subtly infiltrated by British propagandists.[\[18\]](#)

While the Americans were being worked on, the two confederates consulted on how to arrange for direct hostilities between the United States and Germany. In August 1941, Roosevelt and Churchill met at the Atlantic conference. Here they produced the Atlantic Charter, with its "four freedoms," including "the freedom from want" — a blank-check to spread Anglo-American Sozialpolitik around the globe. When Churchill returned to London, he informed the Cabinet of what had been agreed to. Thirty years later, the British documents were released. Here is how the New York Times reported the revelations:

Formerly top secret British Government papers made public today said that President Franklin D. Roosevelt told Prime Minister Winston Churchill in August, 1941, that he was looking for an incident to justify opening hostilities against Nazi Germany.... On August 19 Churchill reported to the War Cabinet in London on other aspects of the Newfoundland [Atlantic Charter] meeting that were not made public. ... "He [Roosevelt] obviously was determined that they should come in. If he were to put the issue of peace and war to Congress, they would debate it for months," the Cabinet minutes added. "The President had said he would wage war but not declare it and that he would become more and more provocative. If the Germans did not like it, they could attack American forces.... Everything was to be done to force an incident."[\[19\]](#)

On July 15, 1941, Admiral Little, of the British naval delegation in Washington, wrote to Admiral Pound, the First Sea Lord: "the brightest hope for getting America into the war lies in the escorting arrangements to Iceland, and let us hope the Germans will not be slow in attacking them." Little added, perhaps jokingly: "Otherwise I think it would be best for us to organize an attack by our own submarines and preferably on the escort!" A few weeks earlier, Churchill, looking for a chance to bring America into the war, wrote to Pound regarding the German warship Prinz Eugen: "It would be better for instance that she should be located by a US ship as this might tempt her to fire on that ship, thus providing the incident for which the US government would be so grateful."[\[20\]](#) Incidents in the North Atlantic did occur, increasingly, as the United States approached war with Germany.[\[21\]](#)

But Churchill did not neglect the "back door to war" — embroiling the United States with Japan — as a way of bringing America into the conflict with Hitler. Sir Robert Craigie, the British ambassador to Tokyo, like the American ambassador Joseph Grew, was working feverishly to avoid war. Churchill directed his foreign secretary, Anthony Eden, to whip Craigie into line:

He should surely be told forthwith that the entry of the United States into war either with Germany and Italy or with Japan, is fully conformable with British interests. Nothing in the munitions sphere can compare with the importance of the British Empire and the United States being co-belligerent.[\[22\]](#)

Churchill threw his influence into the balance to harden American policy towards Japan, especially in the last days before the Pearl Harbor attack.[\[23\]](#) A sympathetic critic of Churchill, Richard Lamb, has recently written:

Was [Churchill] justified in trying to provoke Japan to attack the United States? ... in 1941 Britain had no prospect of defeating Germany without the aid of the USA as an active ally. Churchill believed Congress would never authorize Roosevelt to declare war on Germany ... . In war, decisions by national leaders must be made according to their effect on the war effort. There is truth in the old adage: "All's fair in love and war."[\[24\]](#)

No wonder that, in the House of Commons, on February 15, 1942, Churchill declared, of America's entry into the war: "This is what I have dreamed of, aimed at, worked for, and now it has come to pass."[\[25\]](#)

Churchill's devotees by no means hold his role in bringing America into World War II against him. On the contrary, they count it in his favor. Harry Jaffa, in his uninformed and frantic apology, seems to be the last person alive who refuses to believe that the Man of Many Centuries was responsible to any degree for America's entry into the war: after all, wasn't it the Japanese who bombed Pearl Harbor?[\[26\]](#)

But what of the American Republic? What does it mean for us that a president collaborated with a foreign head of government to entangle us in a world war? The question would have mattered little to Churchill. He had no concern with the United States as a sovereign, independent nation, with its own character and place in the scheme of things. For him, Americans were one of "the English-speaking peoples." He looked forward to a common citizenship for Britons and Americans, a "mixing together," on the road to Anglo-American world hegemony.[\[27\]](#)

But the Churchill-Roosevelt intrigue should, one might think, matter to Americans. Here, however, criticism is halted before it starts. A moral postulate of our time is that in pursuit of the destruction of Hitler, all things were permissible. Yet why is it self-evident that morality required a crusade against Hitler in 1939 and 1940, and not against Stalin? At that point, Hitler had slain his thousands, but Stalin had already slain his millions. In fact, up to June, 1941, the Soviets behaved far more murderously toward the Poles in their zone of occupation than the Nazis did in theirs. Around 1,500,000 Poles were deported to the Gulag, with about half of them dying within the first two years. As Norman Davies writes: "Stalin was outpacing Hitler in his desire to reduce the Poles to the condition of a slave nation."[\[28\]](#) Of course, there were balance-of-power considerations that created distinctions between the two dictators. But it has yet to be explained why there should exist a double standard ordaining that compromise with one dictator would have been "morally sickening," while collaboration with the other was morally irreproachable.[\[29\]](#)

"First Catch Your Hare"

Early in the war, Churchill, declared: "I have only one aim in life, the defeat of Hitler, and this makes things very simple for me."[\[30\]](#) "Victory — victory at all costs," understood literally, was his policy practically to the end. This points to Churchill's fundamental and fatal mistake in World War II: his separation of operational from political strategy. To the first — the planning and direction of military campaigns — he devoted all of his time and energy; after all, he did so enjoy it. To the second, the fitting of military operations to the larger and much more significant political aims they were supposed to serve, he devoted no effort at all.

Stalin, on the other hand, understood perfectly that the entire purpose of war is to enforce certain political claims. This is the meaning of Clausewitz's famous dictum that war is the continuation of policy by other means. On Eden's visit to Moscow in December 1941, with the Wehrmacht in the Moscow suburbs, Stalin was ready with his demands: British recognition of Soviet rule over the Baltic states and the territories he had just seized from Finland, Poland, and Romania. (They were eventually granted.) Throughout the war he never lost sight of these and other crucial political goals. But Churchill, despite frequent prodding from Eden, never gave a thought to his, whatever they might be.[\[31\]](#) His approach, he explained, was that of Mrs. Glass's recipe for Jugged Hare: "First catch your hare."[\[32\]](#) First beat Hitler, then start thinking of the future of Britain and Europe. Churchill put in so many words: "the defeat, ruin, and slaughter of Hitler, to the exclusion of all other purposes, loyalties and aims."

Tuvia Ben-Moshe has shrewdly pinpointed one of the sources of this grotesque indifference:

Thirty years earlier, Churchill had told Asquith that ... his life's ambition was "to command great victorious armies in battle." During World War II he was determined to take nothing less than full advantage of the opportunity given him — the almost unhampered military management of the great conflict. He was prone to ignore or postpone the treatment of matters likely to detract from that pleasure ... . In so doing, he deferred, or even shelved altogether, treatment of the issues that he should have dealt with in his capacity as Prime Minister.[\[33\]](#)

Churchill's policy of all-out support of Stalin foreclosed other, potentially more favorable approaches. The military expert Hanson Baldwin, for instance, stated:

There is no doubt whatsoever that it would have been in the interest of Britain, the United States, and the world to have allowed — and indeed, to have encouraged — the world's two great dictatorships to fight each other to a frazzle. Such a struggle, with its resultant weakening of both Communism and Nazism, could not but have aided in the establishment of a more stable peace.[\[34\]](#)

Instead of adopting this approach, or, for example, promoting the overthrow of Hitler by anti-Nazi Germans — instead of even considering such alternatives — Churchill from the start threw all of his support to Soviet Russia.

Franklin Roosevelt's fatuousness towards Joseph Stalin is well-known. He looked on Stalin as a fellow "progressive" and an invaluable collaborator in creating the future New World Order.<sup>[35]</sup> But the neo-conservatives and others who counterpose to Roosevelt's inanity in this matter Churchill's Old World cunning and sagacity are sadly in error. Roosevelt's nauseating flattery of Stalin is easily matched by Churchill's. Just like Roosevelt, Churchill heaped fulsome praise on the Communist murderer, and was anxious for Stalin's personal friendship. Moreover, his adulation of Stalin and his version of Communism — so different from the repellent "Trotskyite" kind — was no different in private than in public. In January 1944, he was still speaking to Eden of the "deep-seated changes which have taken place in the character of the Russian state and government, the new confidence which has grown in our hearts towards Stalin."<sup>[36]</sup> In a letter to his wife, Clementine, Churchill wrote, following the October 1944 conference in Moscow: "I have had very nice talks with the old Bear. I like him the more I see him. Now they respect us & I am sure they wish to work with us."<sup>[37]</sup> Writers like Isaiah Berlin, who try to give the impression that Churchill hated or despised all dictators, including Stalin, are either ignorant or dishonest.<sup>[38]</sup>

Triple handshake, with, from left to right, Winston Churchill, President Harry S. Truman, and Generalissimus Joseph Stalin at the Potsdam Conference.

[Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Churchill's supporters often claim that, unlike the Americans, the seasoned and crafty British statesman foresaw the danger from the Soviet Union and worked doggedly to thwart it. Churchill's famous "Mediterranean" strategy — to attack Europe through its "soft underbelly," rather than concentrating on an invasion of northern France — is supposed to be the proof of this.<sup>[39]</sup> But this was an ex post facto defense, concocted by Churchill once the Cold War had started: there is little, if any, contemporary evidence that the desire to beat the Russians to Vienna and Budapest formed any part of Churchill's motivation in advocating the "soft underbelly" strategy. At the time, Churchill gave purely military reasons for it.<sup>[40]</sup> As Ben-Moshe states: "The official British historians have ascertained that not until the second half of 1944 and after the Channel crossing did Churchill first begin to consider preempting the Russians in southeastern Europe by military means."<sup>[41]</sup> By then, such a move would have been impossible for several reasons. It was another of Churchill's bizarre military notions, like invading Fortress Europe through Norway, or putting off the invasion of northern France until 1945 — by which time the Russians would have reached the Rhine.<sup>[42]</sup>

Moreover, the American opposition to Churchill's southern strategy did not stem from blindness to the Communist danger. As General Albert C. Wedemeyer, one of the firmest anti-Communists in the American military, wrote:

if we had invaded the Balkans through the Ljubljana Gap, we might theoretically have beaten the Russians to Vienna and Budapest. But logistics would have been against us there: it would have been next to impossible to supply more than two divisions through the Adriatic ports. ... The proposal to save the Balkans from communism could never have been made good by a "soft underbelly" invasion, for Churchill himself had already cleared the way for the success of Tito . . . [who] had been firmly ensconced in Yugoslavia with British aid long before Italy itself was conquered.<sup>[43]</sup>

Wedemeyer's remarks about Yugoslavia were on the mark. On this issue, Churchill rejected the advice of his own Foreign Office, depending instead on information provided especially by the head of the Cairo office of the SOE — the Special Operations branch — headed by a Communist agent named James Klugman. Churchill withdrew British support from the Loyalist guerrilla army of General Mihailovic and threw it to the Communist Partisan leader Tito.<sup>[44]</sup> What a victory for Tito would mean was no secret to Churchill.<sup>[45]</sup> When Fitzroy Maclean was interviewed by Churchill before being sent as liaison to Tito, Maclean observed that, under Communist leadership, the Partisans' ultimate aim would undoubtedly be to establish in Yugoslavia a Communist regime closely linked to Moscow. How did His Majesty's Government view such an eventuality? ... Mr. Churchill's reply left me in no doubt as to the answer to my problem. So long, he said, as the whole of Western civilization was threatened by the Nazi menace, we could not afford to let our attention be diverted from the immediate issue by considerations of long-term policy ... . Politics must be a secondary consideration.<sup>[46]</sup>

It would be difficult to think of a more frivolous attitude to waging war than considering "politics" to be a "secondary consideration." As for the "human costs" of Churchill's policy, when an aide pointed out that Tito intended to transform Yugoslavia into a Communist dictatorship on the Soviet model, Churchill retorted: "Do you intend to live there?"<sup>[47]</sup>

Churchill's benign view of Stalin and Russia contrasts sharply with his view of Germany. Behind Hitler, Churchill discerned the old specter of Prussianism, which had caused, allegedly, not only the two world wars, but the Franco Prussian War as well. What he was battling now was "Nazi tyranny and Prussian militarism," the "two main elements in German life which must be absolutely destroyed."[\[48\]](#) In October 1944, Churchill was still explaining to Stalin that: "The problem was how to prevent Germany getting on her feet in the lifetime of our grandchildren."[\[49\]](#) Churchill harbored a "confusion of mind on the subject of the Prussian aristocracy, Nazism, and the sources of German militarist expansionism ... [his view] was remarkably similar to that entertained by Sir Robert Vansittart and Sir Warren Fisher; that is to say, it arose from a combination of almost racist antipathy and balance of power calculations."[\[50\]](#) Churchill's aim was not simply to save world civilization from the Nazis, but, in his words, the "indefinite prevention of their [the Germans'] rising again as an Armed Power."[\[51\]](#)

Little wonder, then, that Churchill refused even to listen to the pleas of the anti-Hitler German opposition, which tried repeatedly to establish liaison with the British government. Instead of making every effort to encourage and assist an anti-Nazi coup in Germany, Churchill responded to the feelers sent out by the German resistance with cold silence.[\[52\]](#) Reiterated warnings from Adam von Trott and other resistance leaders of the impending "bolshevization" of Europe made no impression at all on Churchill.[\[53\]](#) A recent historian has written, "by his intransigence and refusal to countenance talks with dissident Germans, Churchill threw away an opportunity to end the war in July 1944."[\[54\]](#) To add infamy to stupidity, Churchill and his crowd had only words of scorn for the valiant German officers even as they were being slaughtered by the Gestapo.[\[55\]](#)

In place of help, all Churchill offered Germans looking for a way to end the war before the Red Army flooded into central Europe was the slogan of unconditional surrender. Afterwards, Churchill lied in the House of Commons about his role at Casablanca in connection with Roosevelt's announcement of the policy of unconditional surrender, and was forced to retract his statements.[\[56\]](#) Eisenhower, among others, strenuously and persistently objected to the unconditional surrender formula as hampering the war effort by raising the morale of the Wehrmacht.[\[57\]](#) In fact, the slogan was seized on by Goebbels, and contributed to the Germans' holding out to the bitter end.

The pernicious effect of the policy was immeasurably bolstered by the Morgenthau Plan, which gave the Germans a terrifying picture of what "unconditional surrender" would mean.[\[58\]](#) This plan, initialed by Roosevelt and Churchill at Quebec, called for turning Germany into an agricultural and pastoral country; even the coal mines of the Ruhr were to be wrecked. The fact that it would have led to the deaths of tens of millions of Germans made it a perfect analog to Hitler's schemes for dealing with Russia and the Ukraine.

Churchill was initially averse to the plan. However, he was won over by Professor Lindemann, as maniacal a German-hater as Morgenthau himself. Lindemann stated to Lord Moran, Churchill's personal physician: "I explained to Winston that the plan would save Britain from bankruptcy by eliminating a dangerous competitor.... Winston had not thought of it in that way, and he said no more about a cruel threat to the German people."[\[59\]](#) According to Morgenthau, the wording of the scheme was drafted entirely by Churchill. When Roosevelt returned to Washington, Hull and Stimson expressed their horror, and quickly disabused the president. Churchill, on the other hand, was unrepentant. When it came time to mention the Morgenthau Plan in his history of the war, he distorted its provisions and, by implication, lied about his role in supporting it.[\[60\]](#)

Beyond the issue of the plan itself, Lord Moran wondered how it had been possible for Churchill to appear at the Quebec conference "without any thought out views on the future of Germany, although she seemed to be on the point of surrender." The answer was that "he had become so engrossed in the conduct of the war that little time was left to plan for the future":

Military detail had long fascinated him, while he was frankly bored by the kind of problem which might take up the time of the Peace Conference.... The P. M. was frittering away his waning strength on matters which rightly belonged to soldiers. My diary in the autumn of 1942 tells how I talked to Sir Stafford Cripps and found that he shared my cares. He wanted the P. M. to concentrate on the broad strategy of the war and on high policy.... No one could make [Churchill] see his errors.[61]

War Crimes Discreetly Veiled

There are a number of episodes during the war revealing of Churchill's character that deserve to be mentioned. A relatively minor incident was the British attack on the French fleet, at Mers-el-Kebir (Oran), off the coast of Algeria. After the fall of France, Churchill demanded that the French surrender their fleet to Britain. The French declined, promising that they would scuttle the ships before allowing them to fall into German hands. Against the advice of his naval officers, Churchill ordered British ships off the Algerian coast to open fire. About 1500 French sailors were killed. This was obviously a war crime, by anyone's definition: an unprovoked attack on the forces of an ally without a declaration of war. At Nuremberg, German officers were sentenced to prison for less. Realizing this, Churchill lied about Mers-el-Kebir in his history, and suppressed evidence concerning it in the official British histories of the war.[62] With the attack on the French fleet, Churchill confirmed his position as the prime subverter through two world wars of the system of rules of warfare that had evolved in the West over centuries.

But the great war crime which will be forever linked to Churchill's name is the terror-bombing of the cities of Germany that in the end cost the lives of around 600,000 civilians and left some 800,000 seriously injured.[63] (Compare this to the roughly 70,000 British lives lost to German air attacks. In fact, there were nearly as many Frenchmen killed by Allied air attacks as there were Englishmen killed by Germans.[64]) The plan was conceived mainly by Churchill's friend and scientific advisor, Professor Lindemann, and carried out by the head of Bomber Command, Arthur Harris ("Bomber Harris"). Harris stated: "In Bomber Command we have always worked on the assumption that bombing anything in Germany is better than bombing nothing." [65] Harris and other British airforce leaders boasted that Britain had been the pioneer in the massive use of strategic bombing. J.M. Spaight, former Principal Assistant Secretary of the Air Ministry, noted that while the Germans (and the French) looked on air power as largely an extension of artillery, a support to the armies in the field, the British understood its capacity to destroy the enemy's home-base. They built their bombers and established Bomber Command accordingly.[66]

Churchill among the ruins

Winston Churchill looks over the Rhine from the ruins of the west end of the bridge at Wesel during a visit to the front. Photo: 25 March 1945.

By US Army Signal Corps photographer Post-Work: User:W.wolny [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Brazenly lying to the House of Commons and the public, Churchill claimed that only military and industrial installations were targeted. In fact, the aim was to kill as many civilians as possible — thus, "area" bombing, or "carpet" bombing — and in this way to break the morale of the Germans and terrorize them into surrendering.<sup>[67]</sup>

Harris at least had the courage of his convictions. He urged that the government openly announce that:

the aim of the Combined Bomber Offensive ... should be unambiguously stated [as] the destruction of German cities, the killing of German workers, and the disruption of civilized life throughout Germany.<sup>[68]</sup>

The campaign of murder from the air leveled Germany. A thousand-year-old urban culture was annihilated, as great cities, famed in the annals of science and art, were reduced to heaps of smoldering ruins. There were high points: the bombing of Lübeck, when that ancient Hanseatic town "burned like kindling"; the 1000-bomber raid over Cologne, and the following raids that somehow, miraculously, mostly spared the great Cathedral but destroyed the rest of the city, including thirteen Romanesque churches; the firestorm that consumed Hamburg and killed some 42,000 people. No wonder that, learning of this, a civilized European man like Joseph Schumpeter, at Harvard, was driven to telling "anyone who would listen" that Churchill and Roosevelt were destroying more than Genghis Khan.<sup>[69]</sup>

The most infamous act was the destruction of Dresden, in February 1945. According to the official history of the Royal Air Force: "The destruction of Germany was by then on a scale which might have appalled Attila or Genghis Khan."<sup>[70]</sup> Dresden, which was the capital of the old kingdom of Saxony, was an indispensable stop on the Grand Tour, the baroque gem of Europe. The war was practically over, the city filled with masses of helpless refugees escaping the advancing Red Army. Still, for three days and nights, from February 13 to 15, Dresden was pounded with bombs. At least 30,000 people were killed, perhaps as many as 135,000 or more. The Zwinger Palace; Our Lady's Church (die Frauenkirche); the Bruhl Terrace, overlooking the Elbe where, in Turgenev's Fathers and Sons, Uncle Pavel went to spend his last years; the Semper Opera House, where Richard Strauss conducted the premiere of Rosenkavalier; and practically everything else was incinerated. Churchill had fomented it. But he was shaken by the outcry that followed. While in Georgetown and Hollywood, few had ever heard of Dresden, the city meant something in Stockholm, Zurich, and the Vatican, and even in London. What did our hero do? He sent a memorandum to the Chiefs of Staff:

It seems to me that the moment has come when the question of bombing of German cities simply for the sake of increasing the terror, though under other pretexts, should be reviewed. Otherwise, we shall come into control of an utterly ruined land.... The destruction of Dresden remains a serious query against the conduct of Allied bombing.... I feel the need for more precise concentration upon military objectives ... rather than on mere acts of terror and wanton destruction, however impressive. [71]

The military chiefs saw through Churchill's contemptible ploy: realizing that they were being set up, they refused to accept the memorandum. After the war, Churchill casually disclaimed any knowledge of the Dresden bombing, saying: "I thought the Americans did it." [72]

And still the bombing continued. On March 16, in a period of 20 minutes, Würzburg was razed to the ground. As late as the middle of April, Berlin and Potsdam were bombed yet again, killing another 5,000 civilians. Finally, it stopped; as Bomber Harris noted, there were essentially no more targets to be bombed in Germany. [73] It need hardly be recorded that Churchill supported the atom-bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, which resulted in the deaths of another 100,000 or more civilians. When Truman fabricated the myth of the "500,000 U.S. lives saved" by avoiding an invasion of the Home Islands — the highest military estimate had been 46,000 — Churchill topped his lie: the atom-bombings had saved 1,200,000 lives, including 1,000,000 Americans, he fantasized. [74]

The eagerness with which Churchill directed or applauded the destruction of cities from the air should raise questions for those who still consider him the great "conservative" of his — or perhaps of all — time. They would do well to consider the judgment of an authentic conservative like Erik von Kuehnelt-Leddihn, who wrote: "Non-Britishers did not matter to Mr. Churchill, who sacrificed human beings — their lives, their welfare, their liberty — with the same elegant disdain as his colleague in the White House." [75]

1945: The Dark Side

And so we come to 1945 and the ever-radiant triumph of Absolute Good over Absolute Evil. So potent is the mystique of that year that the insipid welfare states of today's Europe clutch at it at every opportunity, in search of a few much-needed shreds of glory.

The dark side of that triumph, however, has been all but suppressed. It is the story of the crimes and atrocities of the victors and their protégés. Since Winston Churchill played a central role in the Allied victory, it is the story also of the crimes and atrocities in which Churchill was implicated. These include the forced repatriation of some two million Soviet subjects to the Soviet Union. Among these were tens of thousands who had fought with the Germans against Stalin, under the sponsorship of General Vlasov and his

"Russian Army of Liberation." This is what Alexander Solzhenitsyn wrote in The Gulag Archipelago:

In their own country, Roosevelt and Churchill are honored as embodiments of statesmanlike wisdom. To us, in our Russian prison conversations, their consistent shortsightedness and stupidity stood out as astonishingly obvious ... what was the military or political sense in their surrendering to destruction at Stalin's hands hundreds of thousands of armed Soviet citizens determined not to surrender.[\[76\]](#)

Most shameful of all was the handing over of the Cossacks. They had never been Soviet citizens, since they had fought against the Red Army in the Civil War and then emigrated. Stalin, understandably, was particularly keen to get hold of them, and the British obliged. Solzhenitsyn wrote of Winston Churchill:

He turned over to the Soviet command the Cossack corps of 90,000 men. Along with them he also handed over many wagonloads of old people, women, and children.... This great hero, monuments to whom will in time cover all England, ordered that they, too, be surrendered to their deaths.[\[77\]](#)

The "purge" of alleged collaborators in France was a blood-bath that claimed more victims than the Reign of Terror in the Great Revolution — and not just among those who in one way or other had aided the Germans: included were any right-wingers the Communist resistance groups wished to liquidate.[\[78\]](#)

The massacres carried out by Churchill's protégé Tito must be added to this list: tens of thousands of Croats, not simply the Ustasha, but any "class-enemies," in classical Communist style. There was also the murder of some 20,000 Slovene anti-Communist fighters by Tito and his killing squads. When Tito's Partisans rampaged in Trieste, which he was attempting to grab in 1945, additional thousands of Italian anti-Communists were massacred.[\[79\]](#)

As the troops of Churchill's Soviet ally swept through central Europe and the Balkans, the mass deportations began. Some in the British government had qualms, feeling a certain responsibility. Churchill would have none of it. In January 1945, for instance, he noted to the Foreign Office: "Why are we making a fuss about the Russian deportations in Rumania of Saxons [Germans] and others? ... I cannot see the Russians are wrong in making 100 or 150 thousand of these people work their passage.... I cannot myself consider that it is wrong of the Russians to take Rumanians of any origin they like to work in the Russian coal-fields."[\[80\]](#) About 500,000 German civilians were deported to work in Soviet Russia, in accordance with Churchill and Roosevelt's agreement at Yalta that such slave labor constituted a proper form of "reparations."[\[81\]](#)

Worst of all was the expulsion of some 15 million Germans from their ancestral homelands in East and West Prussia, Silesia, Pomerania, and the Sudetenland. This was done pursuant to the agreements at Tehran, where Churchill proposed that Poland be "moved west," and to Churchill's acquiescence in the Czech leader Eduard Benes's plan for the "ethnic cleansing" of Bohemia and Moravia. Around one-and-a-half to two million German civilians died in this process.[\[82\]](#) As the Hungarian liberal Gaspar Tamas wrote, in driving out the Germans of east-central Europe, "whose ancestors built our cathedrals, monasteries, universities, and railroad stations," a whole ancient culture was effaced.[\[83\]](#) But why should that mean anything to the Churchill devotees who call themselves "conservatives" in America today?

Then, to top it all, came the Nuremberg Trials, a travesty of justice condemned by the great Senator Robert Taft, where Stalin's judges and prosecutors — seasoned veterans of the purges of the 30s — participated in another great show-trial.[\[84\]](#)

By 1946, Churchill was complaining in a voice of outrage of the happenings in eastern Europe: "From Stettin on the Baltic to Trieste on the Adriatic, an iron curtain has descended over Europe." Goebbels had popularized the phrase "iron curtain," but it was accurate enough.

The European continent now contained a single, hegemonic power. "As the blinkers of war were removed," John Charmley writes, "Churchill began to perceive the magnitude of the mistake which had been made."[\[85\]](#) In fact, Churchill's own expressions of profound self-doubt comport oddly with his admirers' retrospective triumphalism. After the war, he told Robert Boothby: "Historians are apt to judge war ministers less by the victories achieved under their direction than by the political results which flowed from them. Judged by that standard, I am not sure that I shall be held to have done very well."[\[86\]](#) In the preface to the first volume of his history of World War II, Churchill explained why he was so troubled:

The human tragedy reaches its climax in the fact that after all the exertions and sacrifices of hundreds of millions of people and of the victories of the Righteous Cause, we have still not found Peace or Security, and that we lie in the grip of even worse perils than those we have surmounted.[\[87\]](#)

On V-E Day, he had announced the victory of "the cause of freedom in every land." But to his private secretary, he mused: "What will lie between the white snows of Russia and the white cliffs of Dover?"[\[88\]](#) It was a bit late to raise the question. Really, what are we to make of a statesman who for years ignored the fact that the extinction of Germany as a power in Europe entailed ... certain consequences? Is this another Bismarck or Metternich we are dealing with here? Or is it a case of a Woodrow Wilson redivivus — of another Prince of Fools?

With the balance of power in Europe wrecked by his own policy, there was only one recourse open to Churchill: to bring America into Europe permanently. Thus, his anxious expostulations to the Americans, including his Fulton, Missouri "Iron Curtain" speech. Having destroyed Germany as the natural balance to Russia on the continent, he was now forced to try to embroil the United States in yet another war — this time a Cold War, that would last 45 years, and change America fundamentally, and perhaps irrevocably.[\[89\]](#)

Churchill sits on one of the damaged chairs from Hitler's bunker in Berlin.
By No 5 Army Film and Photographic Unit, Malindine E G (Capt), Lockeyear W T (Capt) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

The Triumph of the Welfare State

In 1945, general elections were held in Britain, and the Labor Party won a landslide victory. Clement Attlee and his colleagues took power and created the socialist welfare state. But the socializing of Britain was probably inevitable, given the war. It was a natural outgrowth of the wartime sense of solidarity and collectivist emotion, of the feeling that the experience of war had somehow rendered class structure and hierarchy — normal features of any advanced society — obsolete and indecent. And there was a second factor — British society had already been to a large extent socialized in the war years, under Churchill himself. As Ludwig von Mises wrote:

Marching ever further on the way of interventionism, first Germany, then Great Britain and many other European countries have adopted central planning, the Hindenburg pattern of socialism. It is noteworthy that in Germany the deciding measures were not resorted to by the Nazis, but some time before Hitler seized power by Brüning ... and in Great Britain not by the Labour Party but by the Tory Prime Minister, Mr. Churchill.<sup>[90]</sup>

While Churchill waged war, he allowed Attlee to head various Cabinet committees on domestic policy and devise proposals on health, unemployment, education, etc.<sup>[91]</sup> Churchill himself had already accepted the master-blueprint for the welfare state, the Beveridge Report. As he put it in a radio speech:

You must rank me and my colleagues as strong partisans of national compulsory insurance for all classes for all purposes from the cradle to the grave.<sup>[92]</sup>

That Mises was correct in his judgment on Churchill's role is indicated by the conclusion of W. H. Greenleaf, in his monumental study of individualism and collectivism in modern Britain. Greenleaf states that it was Churchill who during the war years, instructed R. A. Butler to improve the education of the people and who accepted and sponsored the idea of a four-year plan for national development and the commitment to sustain full employment in the post-war period. As well he approved proposals to establish a national insurance scheme, services for housing and health, and was prepared to accept a broadening field of state enterprises. It was because of this coalition policy that Enoch Powell referred to the veritable social revolution which occurred in the years 1942–44. Aims of this kind were embodied in the Conservative declaration of policy issued by the Premier before the 1945 election.<sup>[93]</sup>

When the Tories returned to power in 1951, "Churchill chose a Government which was the least recognizably Conservative in history."<sup>[94]</sup> There was no attempt to roll back the welfare state, and the only industry that was really reprivatized was road haulage.<sup>[95]</sup> Churchill "left the core of its [the Labor government's] work inviolate."<sup>[96]</sup> The "Conservative" victory functioned like Republican victories in the United States, from Eisenhower on — to consolidate socialism. Churchill even undertook to make up for "deficiencies" in the welfare programs of the previous Labor government, in housing and public works.<sup>[97]</sup> Most insidiously of all, he directed his leftist Labor Minister, Walter Monckton, to appease the unions at all costs. Churchill's surrender to the unions, "dictated by sheer political expediency," set the stage for the quagmire in labor relations that prevailed in Britain for the next two decades.<sup>[98]</sup>

Yet, in truth, Churchill never cared a great deal about domestic affairs, even welfarism, except as a means of attaining and keeping office. What he loved was power, and the opportunities power provided to live a life of drama and struggle and endless war.

There is a way of looking at Winston Churchill that is very tempting: that he was a deeply flawed creature, who was summoned at a critical moment to do battle with a uniquely appalling evil, and whose very flaws contributed to a glorious victory — in a way, like Merlin in C.S. Lewis's great Christian novel, That Hideous Strength.<sup>[99]</sup> Such a judgment would, I believe, be superficial. A candid examination of his career, I suggest, yields a different conclusion: that, when all is said and done, Winston Churchill was a Man of Blood and a politico without principle, whose apotheosis serves to corrupt every standard of honesty and morality in politics and history.

This essay, which originally appears in The Costs of War: America's Pyrrhic Victories, is respectfully dedicated to the memory of Henry Regnery, who was, of course, not responsible for its content. It is republished with permission by its author.

---

Notes:

- |                |   |
|----------------|---|
| <sup>[1]</sup> | Winston Churchill, The Gathering Storm , vol. 1, The Second World War (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1948), p. 347. Churchill commented that the guarantee was extended to a Poland "which with hyena appetite had only six months before joined in the pillage and destruction of the Czechoslovak State." He was referring to the annexation of the Teschen district, by which Poland |
|----------------|---|

	had reclaimed the ethnically Polish areas of that bizarre concoction Churchill was pleased to dignify as "the Czechoslovak State."
[2]	David Irving, Churchill's War, vol. 1, The Struggle for Power (Bullsbrook, Western Australia: Veritas, 1987), pp. 193–96.
[3]	James Leutze, "The Secret of the Churchill-Roosevelt Correspondence: September 1939 — May 1940," Journal of Contemporary History 10, no. 3 (July 1975): 465–91; Leutze concludes that this was the real reason the two governments colluded to silence Tyler Kent.
[4]	John W. Wheeler-Bennett, King George VI: His Life and Reign (New York: St. Martin's, 1958), pp. 390–92. Wheeler-Bennett added: "On his return to London the King communicated the essence of his talks with the President to the proper quarters, and so greatly did he esteem their importance that he carried the original manuscript of his notes about him in his dispatch case throughout the war."
[5]	Hart, "The Military Strategist," p. 208.
[6]	John Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1993), p 423.
[7]	See also Charmley's review of Clive Ponting's work, in the Times Literary Supplement , May 13, 1994, p. 8.
[8]	Gaddis Smith, "Whose Finest Hour?" New York Times Book Review , August 29, 1993, p. 3.
[9]	On March 27, 1942, Goebbels commented in his diary on the destruction of the European Jews, which was then underway: "Here, too, the Führer is the undismayed champion of a radical solution necessitated by conditions and therefore inexorable. Fortunately, a whole series of possibilities presents itself for us in wartime that would be denied us in peacetime. We shall have to profit by this." He added: "the fact that Jewry's representatives in England and America are today organizing and sponsoring the war against Germany must be paid for dearly by its representatives in Europe — and that's only right." The Goebbels Diaries, 1942–1943 , Louis P. Lochner ed. and trans. (Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1948), p. 148.
[10]	Paul Addison, "Lloyd George and Compromise Peace in the Second World War," in Lloyd George: Twelve Essays , A.J.P. Taylor, ed. (New York: Atheneum, 1971), pp. 359–84. Churchill himself told Stalin in 1944: "We never thought of making a separate peace even the year when we were all alone and could easily have made one without serious loss to the British Empire and largely at your expense." Ibid , p. 383.
[11]	Irving, Churchill's War , pp. 193, 207.
[12]	Thomas A. Bailey, The Man in the Street: The Impact of American Public Opinion on Foreign Policy (New York: Macmillan, 1948), p. 13. A recent writer has commented on Bailey's position: "In reality, when Roosevelt and other presidents lied, they did it for their own good, or what they believed to be their own good. But they were often mistaken because they have tended to be at least as shortsighted as the masses ... Roosevelt's destroyer deal marked a watershed in the use and abuse of presidential power, foreshadowing a series of dangerous and often disastrous adventures abroad." Robert Shogan, Hard Bargain (New York: Scribner's, 1995), pp.271, 278. The classical revisionist case on Roosevelt's war policy was presented in Charles A. Beard, President Roosevelt and the Coming of War 1941 (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1949); and Perpetual War for Perpetual Peace , Harry Elmer Barnes, ed. (Caldwell, Idaho: Caxton, 1953), among other works.

[13]	Winston S. Churchill, The Grand Alliance , vol. 3, The Second World War (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1950), pp. 23–24.
[14]	William Stevenson, A Man Called Intrepid (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1976).
[15]	Irving, Churchill's War , pp. 524–27.
[16]	Gore Vidal, Screening History (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1992), p.40.
[17]	Ibid. , p. 47.
[18]	Ibid. , p. 33.
[19]	"War-Entry Plans Laid to Roosevelt," New York Times , January 2, 1972.
[20]	Beesly, Room 40 , p. 121 n. 1.
[21]	See, for instance, William Henry Chamberlin, America's Second Crusade (Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1950), pp. 124–47.
[22]	Richard Lamb, Churchill as War Leader (New York: Carroll and Graf, 1991), p. 149.
[23]	Ibid. , pp. 147–62.
[24]	Ibid. , p. 162.
[25]	Chamberlin, America's Second Crusade , p. 177. On Churchill's use of the "backdoor to war" for the United States, see John Costello, Days of Infamy. MacArthur, Roosevelt, Churchill — The Shocking Truth Revealed (New York: Pocket Books, 1994). On the question of Pearl Harbor, it is interesting to note that even as "mainstream" a historian as Warren F. Kimball, editor of the Churchill-Roosevelt correspondence, writes: "Doubts have not yet been laid to rest concerning still-closed British intelligence files about the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor: information that Churchill may have chosen not to pass on to the Americans in the hope that such an attack would draw the United States into war." See also Warren F. Kimball, "Wheel within a Wheel: Churchill, Roosevelt, and the Special Relationship," in Churchill , Blake and Louis, eds., p. 298, where Kimball cites James Rusbridger and Eric Nave, Betrayal at Pearl Harbor: How Churchill Lured Roosevelt into World War II (New York: Summit, 1991). Kimball complains that, despite written requests from him and other historians, British government files on relations with Japan in late 1941 remain closed. Churchill , p. 546 n. 29. Robert Smith Thompson, in A Time for War: Franklin Delano Roosevelt and the Path to Pearl Harbor (New York: Prentice Hall, 1991), presents a useful recent account of the coming of the war with Japan.
[26]	Jaffa, "In Defense of Churchill," p. 277.
[27]	Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory , p. 538.

[28]	Norman Davies, God's Playground: A History of Poland , vol. 2, 1795 to the Present (New York: Columbia University Press, 1982), pp. 447–53.
[29]	For a critique of the view that Hitler's aim was to "conquer the world," see Geoffrey Stoakes, Hitler and the Quest for World Domination (Leamington Spa, England: Berg, 1986).
[30]	Taylor, "The Statesman," p. 43.
[31]	For instance, in May 1944, Eden protested to Churchill, regarding the prospect of the "Communization of the Balkans": "We must think of the after-effect of these developments, instead of confining ourselves as hitherto to the short-term view of what will give the best dividends during the war and for the war." Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory , p. 538.
[32]	Ben-Moshe, Churchill: Strategy and History , pp. 236–37.
[33]	Ibid., 241.
[34]	Hanson W. Baldwin, Great Mistakes of the War (New York: Harper, 1949), p. 10.
[35]	Roosevelt's attitude is epitomized in his statement: "If I give him [Stalin] everything I possibly can, and ask nothing of him in return, [then] noblesse oblige , he won't try to annex anything and will work with me for a world of peace and democracy." Robert Nisbet, Roosevelt and Stalin: The Failed Courtship (Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1988), p. 6. Joseph Sobran's remarks in his brief essay, "Pal Joey," Sobran's 2 , no. 8 (August 1995): pp. 5–6, are characteristically insightful.
[36]	Ben-Moshe, Churchill: Strategy and History , pp. 287–88, 305–6.
[37]	Ponting, Churchill , p. 665.
[38]	Isaiah Berlin, "Winston Churchill," in idem, Personal Impressions , Henry Hardy, ed. (New York: Viking, 1980), p. 16., where Churchill is quoted as saying of Stalin that he is "at once a callous, a crafty, and an ill-informed giant." Note, however, that even this quotation shows that Churchill placed Stalin in an entirely different category from the unspeakably evil Hitler. In fact, as the works by Charmley, Ponting, and Ben-Moshe amply demonstrate, until the end of the war Churchill's typical attitude toward Stalin was friendly and admiring. Berlin's essay, with its mawkish infatuation with "the largest human being of our time," has to be read to be believed. An indication of one source of Berlin's passion is his reference to Churchill's sympathy for "the struggle of the Jews for self-determination in Palestine."
[39]	Cf. Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory , pp. 572–73, on "Operation Armpit," the extension of the Italian campaign and a thrust towards Vienna; Charmley concludes that, contrary to Churchill's Cold War defenders: "there is little evidence to show that Churchill's support for 'Armpit' was based upon political motives ... [He supported it] for the reason which any student of his career will be familiar with — it fired his imagination."
[40]	Cf. Taylor, "The Statesman," pp. 56–57: "According to one version, Churchill was alarmed at the growth of Soviet power and tried to take precautions against it, if not in 1942 at least well before the end of the war.... It is hard to sustain this view from contemporary records. Churchill never wavered from his determination that Nazi Germany must be utterly defeated.... Churchill had no European policy in any wider sense. His outlook was purely negative: the defeat of Germany.... With Churchill it was always one thing at a time." See also Ben-Moshe, Churchill: Strategy and History , pp. 292–99, on the southern strategy not being aimed at forestalling Soviet gains.

[41]	Ibid., p. 287.
[42]	An instance of the lengths to which Churchill's apologists will go is provided by John Keegan, in "Churchill's Strategy," in Churchill , Blake and Louis, eds., p. 328, where he states of Churchill: "Yet he never espoused any truly unwise strategic course, nor did he contemplate one. His commitment to a campaign in the Balkans was unsound, but such a campaign would not have risked losing the war." Risking losing the war would appear to be an excessively stringent criterion for a truly unwise strategic course.
[43]	Albert C. Wedemeyer, Wedemeyer Reports! (New York: Holt, 1958), p. 230. Everyone else was against Churchill's plan, including his own military advisors. Brooke pointed out to his chief that, if they followed through with his idea, "we should embark on a campaign through the Alps in winter." Ponting, Churchill , p. 625.
[44]	Lamb, Churchill as War Leader , pp. 250–75.
[45]	Churchill's own Foreign Office informed him that: "we would land ourselves with a Communist state closely linked to the USSR after the war who would employ the usual terrorist methods to overcome opposition." Ibid., p. 256. Anthony Eden told the Cabinet in June 1944: "If anyone is to blame for the present situation in which Communist-led movements are the most powerful elements in Yugoslavia and Greece, it is we ourselves." British agents, according to Eden, had done the work of the Russians for them. Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory , p. 580.
[46]	Fitzroy Maclean Eastern Approaches (London: Jonathan Cape, 1949), p. 281.
[47]	Lamb, Churchill as War Leader , p. 259. Churchill believed Tito's promises of a free election and a plebiscite on the monarchy; above all, he concentrated on a single issue: killing Germans. See also Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory , p. 558.
[48]	On September 21, 1943, for instance, Churchill stated: "The twin roots of all our evils, Nazi tyranny and Prussian militarism, must be extirpated. Until this is achieved, there are no sacrifices we will not make and no lengths in violence to which we will not go." Russell Grenfell, Unconditional Hatred (New York: Devin-Adair, 1953), p. 92.
[49]	Ponting, Churchill , p. 675.
[50]	Watt, "Churchill and Appeasement," p. 210.
[51]	In a memorandum to Alexander Cadogan, of the Foreign Office; Richard Lamb, The Ghosts of Peace, 1935–1945 (Salisbury, England: Michael Russell, 1987), p. 133.
[52]	Peter Hoffmann, German Resistance to Hitler (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1988), pp. 95–105; idem, The History of the German Resistance , Richard Barry, trans. (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1977), pp. 205–48; and idem, "The Question of Western Allied Co-Operation with the German Anti-Nazi Conspiracy, 1938–1944," The Historical Journal 34, no. 2

	(1991): 437–64.
[53]	Giles MacDonogh, A Good German: Adam von Trott zu Solz (Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 1992), pp. 236–37.
[54]	Lamb, Churchill as War Leader , p. 292. Lamb argues this thesis at length and persuasively in his The Ghosts of Peace, 1935–1945 , pp. 248–320. A less conclusive judgment is reached by Klemens von Klemperer, German Resistance against Hitler: The Search for Allies Abroad 1938–1945 (Oxford: Clarendon, 1992), esp. pp. 432–41, who emphasizes the difficulties in the way of any agreement between the British government and the German resistance. These included, in particular, the loyalty of the former to its Soviet ally and the insistence of the latter on post-war Germany's keeping ethnically German areas, such as Danzig and the Sudetenland.
[55]	Marie Vassiltchikov, who was close to the conspirators, in her Berlin Diaries, 1940–1945 (New York: Knopf, 1987), p. 218, expressed her bafflement at the line taken by the British: "The Allied radio makes no sense to us: they keep naming people who, they claim, took part in the plot. And yet some of these have not yet been officially implicated. I remember warning Adam Trott that this would happen. He kept hoping for Allied support of a 'decent' Germany and I kept saying that at this point they were out to destroy Germany, any Germany, and would not stop at eliminating the 'good' Germans with the 'bad.'"
[56]	Ben-Moshe, Churchill: Strategy and History , pp. 307–16. See also Anne Armstrong, Unconditional Surrender (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, [1961] 1974); and Lamb, The Ghosts of Peace, 1935–1945 , pp. 215–35. Among the strongest wartime critics of the unconditional surrender policy, as well as of the bombing of civilians, was the military expert, Liddell Hart; see Brian Bond, Liddell Hart: A Study of his Military Thought (New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 1977), pp. 119–63.
[57]	Lamb, The Ghosts of Peace, 1935–1945 , p. 232.
[58]	Ibid. , pp. 236–45.
[59]	Lord Moran, Churchill: The Struggle for Survival, 1940–1965 (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1966), pp. 190–91. Churchill's ready acceptance of this specious argument casts considerable doubt on the claim of Paul Addison, Churchill on the Home Front , p. 437, that Churchill was "schooled" in free-trade doctrines, which were "ingrained" in him. More consistent with the evidence, including his outright rejection of free trade beginning in 1930, is that Churchill used or cast aside the economic theory of the market economy as it suited his political purposes.
[60]	Moran, Churchill: The Struggle for Survival, 1940–1965 , pp. 195–96.
[61]	Ibid. , p. 193. That the spirit at least of the Morgenthau Plan continued to guide Allied policy in post-war Germany is shown in Freda Utley's The High Cost of Vengeance (Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1949).
[62]	Lamb, Churchill as War Leader , pp. 63–73. See also Ponting, Churchill , pp. 450–54; and Hart, "The Military Strategist," pp. 210–21.
[63]	The "British obsession with heavy bombers" had consequences for the war effort as well; it led, for instance, to the lack of fighter planes at Singapore. Taylor, "The Statesman," p. 54. On the whole issue, see Stephen A. Garrett, Ethics and Airpower in World War II: The British Bombing of German Cities

	(New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993). See also Max Hastings, Bomber Command (New York: Dial Press, 1979); David Irving, The Destruction of Dresden (New York: Ballantine, 1963); and Benjamin Colby, 'Twas a Famous Victory (New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1974), pp. 173–202. On the British use of airpower to "pacify" colonial populations, see Charles Townshend, "Civilization and 'Frightfulness': Air Control in the Middle East between the Wars," in Warfare, Diplomacy, and Politics: Essays in Honor of A.J.P. Taylor , Chris Wrigley, ed. (London: Hamish Hamilton, 1986), pp. 142–62.
[64]	Ponting, Churchill , p. 620.
[65]	Hastings, Bomber Command , p. 339. In 1945, Harris wrote: "I would not regard the whole of the remaining cities of Germany as worth the bones of one British grenadier." Ibid. , p. 344. Harris later wrote "The Germans had allowed their soldiers to dictate the whole policy of the Luftwaffe, which was designed expressly to assist the army in rapid advances.... Much too late in the day they saw the advantage of a strategic bombing force." Hughes, Winston Churchill: British Bulldog , p 189.
[66]	J.M. Spaight, Bombing Vindicated (London: Geoffrey Bles, 1944), p. 70–71. Spaight declared that Britons should be proud of the fact that "we began to bomb objectives on the German mainland before the Germans began to bomb objectives on the British mainland." Hitler, while ready enough to use strategic bombing on occasion, "did not want [it] to become the practice. He had done his best to have it banned by international agreement." Ibid. , pp. 68, 60. Writing during the war, Spaight, of course, lied to his readers in asserting that German civilians were being killed only incidentally by the British bombing.
[67]	On February 14, 1942, Directive No. 22 was issued to Bomber Command, stipulating that efforts were now to be "focused on the morale of the enemy civil population and in particular of the industrial workers." The next day, the chief of the Air Staff added: "Ref the new bombing directive: I suppose it is dear that the aiming points are to be the built-up areas, not, for instance, the dockyards or aircraft factories." Garrett, Ethics and Air Power in World War II , p. 11. By lying about the goal of the bombing and attempting a cover-up after the war, Churchill implicitly conceded that Britain had committed breaches of the rules of warfare. Ibid. , pp. 36–37.
[68]	Ibid. , pp. 32–33.
[69]	Richard Swedberg, Schumpeter: A Biography (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1991), p. 141.
[70]	Garrett, Ethics and Air Power in World War II , p. 202.
[71]	Hastings, Bomber Command , pp. 343–44. In November, 1942, Churchill had proposed that in the Italian campaign: "All the industrial centers should be attacked in an intense fashion, every effort being made to render them uninhabitable and to terrorise and paralyse the population." Ponting, Churchill , p. 614.
[72]	To a historian who wished to verify some details, Churchill replied: "I cannot recall anything about it. I thought the Americans did it. Air Chief Marshal Harris would be the person to contact." Rose, Churchill: The Unruly Giant , p. 338.

[73]	Garrett, Ethics and Air Power in World War II , p. 21.
[74]	See Barton J. Bernstein, "A postwar myth: 500,000 U.S. lives saved," Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists 42, no. 6 (June/July 1986): 38–40; and, idem, "Wrong Numbers," The Independent Monthly (July 1995): 41–44. See also, idem, "Seizing the Contested Terrain of Early Nuclear History: Stimson, Conant, and Their Allies Explain the Decision to Use the Atomic Bomb," Diplomatic History 17, no. 1 (Winter 1993): 35–72, where the point is made that a major motive in the political elite's early propaganda campaign justifying the use of the atomic bombs was to forestall a feared retreat into "isolationism" by the American people. It is interesting to note that Richard Nixon, sometimes known as the "Mad Bomber" of Indo-China, justified "deliberate attacks on civilians" by citing the atomic bombings of the Japanese cities, as well as the attacks on Hamburg and Dresden. Richard M. Nixon, "Letters to the Editor," New York Times , May 15, 1983.
[75]	Erik von Kuehnelt-Leddihn, Leftism Revisited: From de Sade and Marx to Hitler and Pol Pot (Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 1990), p. 281. This work contains numerous perceptive passages on Churchill, e.g., pp. 261–65, 273, and 280–81, as well as on Roosevelt.
[76]	Aleksandr I. Solzhenitsyn, The Gulag Archipelago, 1918–1956: An Experiment in Literary Investigation , Thomas P. Whitney, trans. (New York: Harper and Row, 1973), 1–2, p. 259n.
[77]	Ibid. , pp. 259–60.
[78]	Sisley Huddleston, France: The Tragic Years, 1939–1947 (New York: Devin-Adair, 1955), pp. 285–324.
[79]	See, for instance, Richard West, Tito and the Rise and Fall of Yugoslavia (New York: Carroll and Graf, 1995), pp. 192–93.
[80]	Ponting, Churchill , p. 665.
[81]	Herbert Mitzka, Zur Geschichte der Massendeportationen von Ostdeutschen in die Sowjetunion im Jahre 1945 (Einhausen: Atelier Hübner, 1986). On other crimes against German civilians in the aftermath of the war, see, among other works, Heinz Nawratil, Die deutschen Nachkriegsverluste unter Vertriebenen, Gefangenen, und Verschleppten (Munich/Berlin: Herbig, 1986); John Sack, An Eye for an Eye (New York: Basic Books, 1993); and James Bacque, Verschwiegene Schuld: Die alliierte Besatzungspolitik in Deutschland nach 1945 , Hans-Ulrich Seebohm, trans. (Berlin/Frankfurt a. M.: Ullstein, 1995).
[82]	Alfred de Zayas, Nemesis at Potsdam: The Anglo-Americans and the Expulsion of the Germans. Background, Execution, Consequences (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1977).
[83]	Gaspar M. Tamas, "The Vanishing Germans," The Spectator , May 6, 1989, p. 15.
[84]	Critiques of the Nuremberg Trials are included in Lord Hankey, Politics, Trials, and Errors (Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1950), and F.J.P. Veale, Advance to Barbarism: The Development of Total Warfare from Sarajevo to Hiroshima (New York: Devin-Adair, 1968).
[85]	Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory , p. 622.

[86]	Robert Boothy, Recollections of a Rebel (London: Hutchison, 1978), pp. 183–84.
[87]	Churchill, The Gathering Storm , pp. iv — v.
[88]	Nisbet, Roosevelt and Stalin: The Failed Courtship , p. 106.
[89]	Cf. Robert Higgs, "The Cold War Economy: Opportunity Costs, Ideology, and the Politics of Crisis," Explorations in Economic History 31 (1994): 283–312.
[90]	Ludwig von Mises, Human Action (New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1949), p. 855.
[91]	Charmley, Churchill: The End of Glory , p. 610, 618. Cf. Peter Clarke, Liberals and Social Democrats (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978), p. 281: "When the Churchill Coalition was formed in May 1940 it gave progressivism a central political role which it had lacked since 1914.... The people's war brought a people's government in which ordinary Labour and good Liberals were the ascendant elements.... Anti-appeasement was the dominant myth; it helped displace the Guilty Men of Munich; and it prepared the ground for the overthrow of the Chamberlain consensus in domestic policy too. Keynes suddenly moved to a pivotal position inside the Treasury. Labour's patriotic response to the common cause was symbolised by the massive presence of Ernest Bevan as Minister of Labour."
[92]	Addison, "Churchill and Social Reform," p. 73. Addison states: "By the spring of 1945 the Coalition government had prepared draft bills for comprehensive social insurance, family allowances, and a national health service." As Leader of the Opposition for the next six years, "in social policy [Churchill] invariably contested the Labour Party's claim to a monopoly of social concern, and insisted that the credit for devising the post-war welfare state should be given to the wartime Coalition, and not to the Attlee government." For a contrasting view, see Kevin Jeffreys, The Churchill Coalition and Wartime Politics, 1940–1945 (Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1991).
[93]	Greenleaf, The British Political Tradition , pp. 254–55.
[94]	Roberts, Eminent Churchillians , p. 258.
[95]	Ibid., p. 254. Roberts points out that "when the iron and steel industries were denationalized in 1953, they effectively continued to be run via the Iron and Steel Board."
[96]	Roy Jenkins, "Churchill: The Government of 1951–1955," in Churchill , Blake and Louis, eds., p. 499.
[97]	Addison, "Churchill and Social Reform," p. 76.
[98]	Roberts, Eminent Churchillians , pp. 243–85.
[99]	C.S. Lewis, That Hideous Strength: A Modern Fairy-Tale for Grown-Ups (New York: Collier, [1946] 1965), p. 291.

This paper is part of the series Winston Churchill Discreetly Veiled. Click below for the previous or next item of the series. Click on 'up' to return to the series' Table of Contents.

► Additional information about this document

Debating, Round 2: Maintaining Balance

by Ezra Macvie

Debating the Holocaust, 2nd edition, by Thomas Dalton, Ph.D., Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, UK, 2015, 323 pp.

Debating the Holocaust: A New Look at Both Sides 2nd Edition by Thomas Dalton

Inconvenient History carried a review of the first edition of Thomas Dalton's Debating the Holocaust. The second edition has now been published, and the mask is down: Dr. Dalton admits—professes, in fact—that he is, indeed, a Holocaust revisionist, much as everyone, friend and foe alike, has long presumed.

So, his purportedly “balanced” weighing of the arguments for the Big Holocaust, so to call the version of the period that reigns undisturbed today in the public perception and the law, is in the dustbin and, to no one's surprise, in its place emerges ... a balanced weighing of the arguments for the Big Holocaust, and against it. If the first edition's but-lightly feigned agnosticism is abandoned, how, then, one might ask, can its successor aspire to any such descriptor as “balanced?”

It's done in a way that is not only more-credible to those who concern themselves with the author's true outlook on things, but further lends considerably greater impact to the analysis so conducted. As in the first edition, the arguments and “evidence” that support the regnant version of the story are presented, fully and fairly, or at least as much so as are the countervailing elements. Then, carefully compared at all salient points, the revisionists' arguments are presented. But in this second edition, Dr. Dalton does not trouble himself to pretend that he may at any point have found the opposing arguments in any way comparable in his judgment. He grants up-front and beforehand that he in general has decided in favor of the revised version, and he carefully details exactly why in terms that should appeal to any devotee of the traditional perspective so long as said devotee has retained with his devotion, a comparable devotion to logic and the quality of evidence.

The presentation remains, as before, if not "balanced" in terms of the temper of the narrative, at the very least fair and equitable in terms of the presentation of the evidence and of the conclusions following therefrom. And it is in the details (details, details!) of this evidence and these conclusions that Dalton's readers remain totally free to follow their own dictates of reason and due consideration of evidence. What Dr. Dalton does not countenance, and this he does most tellingly, is acceding to the authoritarian, moralistic, even artful blandishments in which we all are daily immersed to the point of suffocation. In a manner doing credit to all the heroic heretics of history from Herodotus to Harry Elmer Barnes, Dalton propels the reader through the standard litanies, admitting them so to be, of the opposing sides. At the end, the author declares the winner to be: revisionism!

Debating is much more a forensic assembly and analysis of data than it is a sociological study. For example, anyone expecting to find an account of the origins of the Holocaust or National Socialist policies and practices regarding Jews or race generally will be disappointed. The scope of Debating is strictly what happened, when, where and how. Motivations are not contemplated, neither of the actors nor of the historians quibbling about the whole thing in latter times. Fortunately, despite this omission of preambles (about which in any case there would seem to be rather less debate), Dalton does carry the reader into the present day with some contemplation of the "uses" to which the Holocaust tradition has been put in the time since the events first studied. Since exploitation of the Holocaust mythology in fact animates the debate that forms the subject of the book, it is indeed fitting that this connection be clearly made and documented in substantial detail. The entire section in effect addresses the question occasionally heard, "Why concern ourselves today with what did or did not happen so long ago?"

The release of the second edition marks the incorporation of Debating into the growing Holocaust Handbooks series of Castle Hill Publishers as Number 32. This incorporation brings with it the signature forest-green cover, attractive layout, punctilious editing and typography and quality printing and binding, along with the mandatory availability in e-book format. My only quibble with the transition is that industry-standard chapter labelling on the recto pages has been dispensed with, as in all recent releases of Holocaust Handbooks. This defect annoyingly hampers use of the book for reference purposes, a purpose I should think central to the purposes of the series, and is at odds with the quality attributes elsewhere in such abundance.

Debating's supreme virtue since its first publication has been in the volume's broadly covering all major factors in such debate of the Holocaust as can be conducted in the shadow of censorship and criminalization. This being the case, the work's currency is of greater importance to its value than it would be, say, to a work of a more purely historical bent. It's gratifying to report that this edition is as up-to-the-minute as any fixed body of work could be; anything and everything that changed since the first edition is updated, and corrections to the earlier work made as appropriate. Dalton even revised his best estimate of the number of Holocaust fatalities implied by the sum of the latest revisionist studies, of which there have been many. Dalton's expressly unmagical number of aggregate deaths per revisionism rose from 516,000 to 570,000. At this rate, he'll be back to six million by the 5,990th edition. Don't hold your breath!

Objectivity is the understanding of a robot. Only a machine, somehow made capable of ingesting inputs of some kind, could objectively calculate a result of the inputs. We have computers that are doing just this even as I type, and likely as you read. But my typing—and your reading—these are not, and could never be, objective, nor mindless. At the same time, they could be, if we tried to make them so, open to a wide range of interpretations, conclusions, and other reactions still so cognizant as to keep the end conclusions related to those inputs—the data as it were. We—we humans at the beginnings and ends of these processes—can better reconcile our conclusions, our feelings, our worldviews, to the data that we perceive in those inputs, the better we steel our reflexes against what offends our previous conceptions and habitual loyalties.

In its most-valuable essence, Debating remains what its first edition was: an encompassing overview of the debate (so to misname a confrontation in which one side has—and uses—the prerogative of calling down the law against the other side) that fairly presents the best arguments of both sides and, admittedly with prompting, still allows each reader, if not to actually adopt final conclusions, at least enables—nay, encourages—each to embark on the long and in many cases soul-searching intellectual voyage that could ultimately avail the reader's final, exhausted washing-up on the distant shores of an informed and reasonably confident understanding.

On those far-sought shores, one might find Dr. Dalton him- (or her-)self. Or one might find Elie Wiesel or Raul Hilberg. But above all, first and foremost, one would find oneself.

Disorder in the Courts (1990-2000), Part 1

by Joseph P. Bellinger

The late Joseph Bellinger had intended the current article to be a chapter in a book that remained unpublished at the time of his death, The Prohibition of “Holocaust Denial.” — Ed.

The last decade of the Twentieth Century brought increasing challenges to revisionist scholars, researchers and sympathizers as existing European laws related to “Holocaust denial” were toughened and expanded to encompass greater numbers of individuals within the legal net. Especially disconcerting was the fact that several European nations soon enacted copycat legislation intended to punish and deter outspoken citizens for freely expressing their opinions on a controversial subject objectionable to Jewish organizations. These new legal measures were largely successful as a result of the determined efforts put forth by the World Jewish Congress and its affiliated agencies in their concerted attempt to outlaw “Holocaust denial.”

Indeed, Jewish groups such as the “Institute of Jewish Affairs,” an affiliated agency of the World Jewish Congress, had energetically worked to ensure the passage of anti-revisionist legislation based upon their perceptions that historical revisionism is synonymous with racial anti-Semitism. For over a decade, Jewish groups still rankled over the first Faurisson trial in France, complaining that Professor Faurisson perversely misrepresented the facts of the “Holocaust.”

Particularly irksome to Jewish sensibilities was Faurisson’s remark that the “Holocaust” had been a “hoax faked by Jews or Zionists for ulterior motives: to extort money from Germany and sympathy from the world.”<sup>[1]</sup>

Addressing the possible repercussions and implications attendant to the public dissemination of Faurisson’s statement, Jewish analysts argued:

These slurs, presenting Jews as the perpetrators of a despicable swindle, could, if believed, bring them into disrepute and expose them to contempt and hatred. There can be no doubt, therefore, that these defamations represent an incitement to hatred of the Jews. As the 17th Chambre Correctionnelle of Paris put it in their verdict of 5 July 1981...“in accusing the Jews publicly of being guilty through cupidity of a particularly odious lie and of a gigantic swindle...Robert Faurisson could not be unaware that his words would arouse in his very large audience feelings of contempt, of hatred and violence toward the Jews of France...”<sup>[2]</sup>

Responding positively to France’s prosecution of Professor Faurisson, legal analysts applauded the fact that Faurisson’s prosecution had only been possible due to precise legal terminology which declared that offended individuals and/or certain human rights organizations were legally entitled to institute proceedings against him. In this instance, the organization referred to in the matter of Robert Faurisson is the left-wing Ligue Internationale Contre le Racisme et l’Antisemitisme, better known by its acronym, LICRA.

Thus, the nuisance suit formally lodged by LICRA against Professor Faurisson would seem to have been politically motivated.

Rather astonishingly, the report notes with a certain amount of approbation that “It is not the denial of the Holocaust but the concomitant allegation of a ‘Jewish swindle’ that is the basis of the prosecution. Without that additional calumny against the Jews, (or, for that matter, Zionists) the mere negation of historical events does not constitute a crime under the laws of any country known to us.”<sup>[3]</sup>

However correct the assessment may be, that perception of the law and “Holocaust” denial stands in contradistinction to Israel’s passage of the world’s first “Holocaust Denial” law in 1986.

Indeed, legal analysts representing the World Jewish Congress and the Institute for Jewish Affairs were devising novel legal precedents whereby more people might be liable to prosecution by a careful rewording of current and proposed future legislation applicable to “Holocaust Denial.” In the same report cited above, the legal analysts suggest that “even if not accompanied by the charge of ‘Jewish Fabrication’ individuals might be prosecuted on the grounds that “it attacks human dignity – in this case, the dignity of the Jews or of the survivors.”<sup>[4]</sup>

The obvious intent of the critics was to reformulate “Holocaust denial” laws throughout Europe ostensibly to accommodate a disputably highly influential group of people whose sensibilities had suffered umbrage. The Federal Republic of Germany seemed to offer the most encouraging possibilities for testing new legislation designed to curtail freedom of speech throughout the European Union. In fact, the compilers of the report remark favorably upon Article 130 of the German penal code, which makes it a criminal offense to “attack the human dignity of others, in a manner capable of disturbing the public peace...by insulting them, maliciously exposing them to contempt or slandering them.”

Article 131 of the revised German penal code elicited particular interest, in that it expanded upon the definition of what may be legally prosecutable, and includes such phraseology as whitewashing a crime and declares that whoever glorifies acts of violence or makes them appear harmless will be subject to prosecution.

Jewish reaction to the newly worded legislation was mixed. Dissatisfied, yet intrigued by the wording of such legislation, legal pundits set about the challenging task of trying to revise and improve terms and definitions to their satisfaction, yet noted with ill-concealed chagrin the paradox which revisionism represents because “cruelty and inhumanity are exactly the facts they dispute.”<sup>[5]</sup>

While these matters were earnestly debated among various legal experts, Jewish Community leader Jeremy Jones, secretary of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry and Sydney director of Australia/Israel Publications, argued to outlaw “Holocaust” denial in Australia.

Sounding a familiar note of alarm, Jones opined that, “One of the most insidious and evil forms of anti-Jewish racism is the claim that the Holocaust never occurred and that the ‘Christian West’ has been the victim of moral blackmail and financial extortion. This argument is not only offensive to students of history and all Australians concerned with truth and knowledge, but has as its underlying logic a world view in which Jewish people are dishonest, deceitful, and perpetrators of massive fraud.”<sup>[6]</sup>

Jones emphasized the point that “Holocaust revisionists promote almost unparalleled hatred of Jews, who they claim have wrongly received sympathy, understanding or, in their view, or even worse – support.”<sup>[7]</sup>

Amazingly, Jones’s words were an almost-verbatim rehash of what the Institute of Jewish Affairs had published in its Research Report in 1982.

Coincidentally, Mr. Jones had already formulated possible solutions to the problem of “Holocaust denial” which he submitted for the consideration of Australia’s legislators, and suggested that “Holocaust denial” should be “clearly and specifically identified as racism and covered by the same laws that will apply to more readily understood promotions of racial hatred.”<sup>[8]</sup>

In an effort to galvanize popular legislative support for these proposals, Jones tendered his suggestions to the Australian Law Reform Commission in what was subsequently described as a “private submission.” Jones urged the Commission to prosecute “Holocaust deniers” to the fullest extent provided by law and recommended that “racist motivation” be taken into consideration at the time of sentencing, in order to tack additional time onto their sentence.

In a curious aside, Jones cited by way of example the case of Sheikh Imam Taj Eldine El-Hilaly, who in September 1988 delivered a controversial speech in which he claimed that “Jews were the underlying cause of all wars and controlled the world by secret movements, destructive doctrines, Communism and libertinism.”[\[9\]](#)

Australia did in fact subsequently pass a “Racial Hatred Bill” which, according to former Australian Justice Minister Mr. Lavarch, “is about protection of groups and individuals from threats of violence and the incitement of racial hatred, which leads inevitably to violence.”[\[10\]](#)

In theory, at least, the law supposedly “does not prohibit actions or words committed in good faith in the course of any statement, publication, discussion or debate for an academic, artistic or scientific purpose or any other purpose in the public interest.”[\[11\]](#)

As will presently be seen, the actual application of the law prompted difficulties with this wording and will be addressed in the case of Fredrick Töben, the director of Australia’s Adelaide Foundation.

The Case of Walter Lüftl

Austria proved to be the next legal testing ground when in March, 1992, Water Lüftl, a highly qualified engineer in Austria, posed a challenge to the courts following an essay he had written entitled, “Holocaust: Belief and Facts,” which raised uncomfortable questions in respect to the gas chambers of Auschwitz.

Lüftl had elicited the attention of the Austrian authorities as well as the national press because he had arrived at the conclusion that the homicidal gas chambers of Auschwitz and Mauthausen, as described, were technically impossible. Based upon his own extensive research, Lüftl pronounced the described operations of the gas chambers to be incompatible with the laws of nature and scientifically refuted survivor accounts describing flames shooting directly from crematoria chimneys. Lüftl’s essay also drew into question key elements of the “Holocaust story” such as the widely referenced Kurt Gerstein Report, mass murder by diesel engine exhaust, as well as published statistics in respect to cremation.

After a flurry of heated international protests, Lüftl was pressed to resign from his position as president of Austria’s association of professional engineers, following which he was arrested and charged with violating Austria’s “Holocaust denial” laws, which make it a crime to “deny, grossly play-down, approve of, or seek to deny...National Socialist genocide or any other National Socialist crimes against humanity.”[\[12\]](#)

Austrian law does not prescribe prosecution or punishment for those who deny or minimize Bolshevik crimes against humanity as they do not fall within the scope of these statutes, which are exclusively applied to National Socialism and the persecution of the Jews.

Although Lüftl was initially charged with “Holocaust denial,” these charges were later dropped, and a new indictment was drawn up under a decades-old law which was drafted under Allied auspices to punish any “attempts to revive or restore National Socialism” –the same criteria which would be applied in Austria’s prosecution of David Irving in 2004.

In respect to Lüftl, the Austrian prosecutor charged that the engineer had drafted his essay “in a way that appears to be scholarly, to refute important historical facts of the National Socialist killing machinery,” and to make his report available to others whom he must “have known” would use it “publicly to whitewash and justify the National Socialist killing machinery.”[\[13\]](#)

Clearly, the flimsy charge was based upon a mere assumption on the part of the prosecution in attempting to divine the mind and intent of the essayist. Moreover, the allegation that the essay might be used or cited by self-serving anti-Semitic groups was prima facie absurd, in view of the fact that the material might just as easily be cited by those with opposing views for completely legitimate academic reasons.

In response to the prosecutor's asseverations, Lüftl countered that his essay was intended to serve as a scholarly, academic, scientific study, while underscoring the fact that he did not deny National Socialist crimes overall but was merely addressing technical issues respectively.

As it turned out, Lüftl was fortunate. In June 1994, Austria's District Criminal Court dismissed all charges. In addition, the Austrian Ministry of Justice released a statement conceding that it had been unable to uncover credible evidence proving that Lüftl had deliberately penned his essay with the intention of reviving National Socialism.

While sidestepping the issue of Lüftl's evidence and conclusions, critics grunted their disapproval and declared that the legal ruling would henceforth provide 'Holocaust deniers' with a convenient loophole to camouflage their "propaganda" in the guise of scholarly reports.

German and Jewish legal strategists alike had been closely monitoring the Lüftl case, and their subsequent disappointment spurred them on to greater efforts to further tighten existing loopholes pursuant to "Holocaust denial" laws in Germany.

In respect to Germany, Herta Daebler-Gmelin, the deputy of the liberal left-wing Social Democratic Party, declared in an article published in the Sueddeutsche Zeitung that "It is unbearable that propagandists openly deny or minimize Nazi crimes."[\[14\]](#)

Apparently oblivious of the brazen challenge to freedom of expression that characterized her comments, Daebler-Gmelin stressed the absolute necessity of making an example of those who "deny the Holocaust" in the only terms they will understand: prosecution and imprisonment. According to Daebler-Gmelin:

These right wing agitators do not deny or gloss over the crimes of the Nazis out of stupidity or ignorance. There is nothing new to offer by way of research and no new theories that need to be tested. No other epoch in our history has been so well researched and documented as this horrible criminal regime in Germany... The mockery of millions of victims of genocide disrupts the public peace and heaps renewed humiliation upon the survivors. All this is well known - not only by us, but also by the right wing extremists. What they are really after is to fabricate a new legend by means of ideology and propaganda. Their denial of the gas ovens of Auschwitz and the state sponsored genocide in Nazi Germany goes hand in hand with their assertion that there were neither victims nor perpetrators. The Germans will once again have to be preserved from danger – above all, from the Jews, thereby forging the same old chains to provide a spiritual justification for discrimination, for further agitation, for further terror, for further attacks.[\[15\]](#)

In summation, Daebler-Gmelin proffered an emotional appeal to German legislators: "We hope that the deputies of the other parties in the Bundestag will support our suggestions."[\[16\]](#)

The plea did not fall upon deaf ears, yet observers in the revisionist camp were quick to perceive the fact that Daebler-Gmelin's overall assessment had deliberately conflated legitimate, scholarly inquiry with respect to homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz, Treblinka, Maidanek, Sobibor and Belzec with "Holocaust denial," as if the latter is solely predicated upon unquestioning acceptance of the former, completely overlooking the fact that, while the two subjects are relative and relevant, the gas chambers are not by any means exclusively synonymous with the "Holocaust" per se, but serve to underscore the extent and scope of the tragedy. By way of illustration, mainstream historians generally view the gas chambers as the culmination of years of anti-Jewish persecution, rather than one singular defining episode, which, if it had never occurred, would have precluded use of the term "Holocaust" in reference to the Nazi persecution of the Jews. Moreover, it is academically debatable whether these same historians would have recast any reference to the Nazis' policies towards the Jews in any terms other than a 'Holocaust' even if the gas chambers had never existed.

Nevertheless, for the Jewish people, [and this is a belief shared to a great extent by the world at large], the "Holocaust" represents the Nazis' determined attempt to utterly exterminate the Jewish population of Europe that lay within their grasp, primarily, but not exclusively, by means of homicidal gas chambers. In fact, the very word “Holocaust” refers to a burnt offering, evoking in the minds of many commentators, horrific images of the crematoria of Auschwitz and the burning pits of Treblinka.

Perceived within this context, any denial or critical questioning of the homicidal gas chambers is perceived as synonymous with “Holocaust denial.” Concomitantly, any questioning of the overall figure of six million Jewish deaths is likewise perceived as a form of denial constituting a challenge to the veracity of the survivors and a brazen insult to the memory of the dead.

As such, revisionist historians are often portrayed as being insensitive to the suffering of the Jewish people.

Nevertheless, historians as well as scientists are under an obligation to be truthful and accurate in their investigation and presentation of facts, insofar as that is humanly possible. While one may and should empathize with the victims, the obligation to scientifically document the crime remains of paramount concern to honest scholars and researchers legitimately interested in fully establishing the truth of precisely what did or did not occur at Auschwitz, and no aspect of evidence may be ignored to the exclusion of others, however “offensive” it may be to the mind and memory of anyone.

Yet any meaningful research into the facts of the Holocaust has been nearly stifled since the subject has been declared legally off limits to any but “establishment” historians toeing the officially accepted line. Ergo, the “Holocaust” has been declared a closed subject brooking no clarification, qualification, contradiction or revision if it happens to come into conflict with the officially accepted, legally mandated version. Restrained, intimidated and hamstrung by means of legal tyranny, highly qualified historians may soon find themselves arraigned before the courts like common criminals, facing terms in excess of five years’ imprisonment in some instances, and having no other option open to them than to ‘recant’ and “confess” in macabre Kafkaesque scenes reminiscent of Stalin’s infamous show trials. Such proceedings constitute a mockery of justice, since neither truth nor documentary evidence may be used as a means of vindication on behalf of the accused. Attorneys for the accused or judges renowned for their probity who hand down lenient sentences also run the risk of being charged, disbarred or censured. In fact, such instances are a rather common occurrence in those polities that have already criminalized “Holocaust denial.”

One need look no further than the daily news for evidence pertaining to miscarriages of justice, whereby individuals who were falsely accused and convicted of heinous crimes are suddenly, after enduring years of imprisonment, vindicated and released on the basis of new scientific evidence proving their innocence. In perhaps no other epoch of contemporary history are science and history more closely interrelated than in respect to the “Holocaust” and the gas chambers of Auschwitz, for not only is it alleged that a crime of historical magnitude occurred, but Auschwitz is also unique in that the installations allegedly used to implement the massacre still exist more or less intact and may be scientifically examined by means of the latest forensic technology. Although the crime occurred on Polish soil, it has since become, at the insistence of Jewish organizations and the United Nations, of historic interest to the international community, in spite of the fact that Jewish organizations repeatedly aver that their self-interests surpass and supersede those of the Polish state, the Catholic Church and the concomitant totality of non-Jewish victims who perished in Auschwitz. By insisting that the legacy of Auschwitz is of import to all humanity, Jewish commentators opened the door to further inquiry, leading a reasonable person to infer that Jewish organizations would undoubtedly welcome the long overdue suggestion that an independent, unbiased international team of forensic scientists ought to be commissioned to exhaustively inspect and investigate the still-extant bunkers of Auschwitz in order to lay this highly controversial matter to rest once and for all.

Unfortunately, the more prosaic reality proves that Jewish organizations have in fact jammed a wedge under the door they themselves opened by diligently working to outlaw all forms of independent inquiry pertaining to the gas chambers of Auschwitz.

In Munich on January 13, 1993 David Irving was defended by lawyers Hajo Herrmann (center), and Herbert Schaller (who also acted successfully for him in Vienna in 2006, aged 84).
Source: Focal Point http://www.fpp.co.uk/Irving/photos/1990s/Munich\_lawyers\_130193.html

David Irving Fined

Auschwitz again became the focus of international attention when British author David Irving was fined the equivalent of $6,000 by a Munich court on 5 May 1992 for “denying that Jews died in the gas chambers of the Auschwitz concentration camp,” and “disparaging the memory of the [Jewish] dead.”<sup>[17]</sup> German Judge Thomas Stelzner rejected Irving’s appeal of a previous fine of $4,300 for remarking during the course of a meeting held in April 1990 in Munich that the building shown in Auschwitz as a “homicidal gas chamber” was in fact a phony reconstruction [Atrappen] built after the war. Stelzner responded by increasing the fine because of Irving’s apparent ‘lack of understanding’ and the fact that he had earned money from disseminating his opinion that the Auschwitz gas chambers were lies.

Refusing to retract his previous statements, Irving defiantly declared to the presiding judge, “I have found not one piece of evidence that there are gas chambers at Auschwitz.”<sup>[18]</sup>

Irving’s attorneys attempted to call a certified chemist, Germar Rudolf, to provide expert testimony that “the buildings in question at Auschwitz were never used as Zyklon B gas chambers, for killing people.”

Rudolf’s testimony was abruptly cut short by the judge the moment the question of the gas chambers was raised by defense counsel. After a flurry of protests from Irving’s attorneys, the judge proceeded to rule that all testimony pertaining to gas chambers was inadmissible.

When asked by counsel to explain his bizarre ruling, the flustered judge managed to stammer that the testimony “of the expert witness, certified chemist Rudolf, is completely unsuitable for evidence” in this case, and noted that Rudolf had not actually been questioned on the issue of gas chambers anyway.

Flabbergasted by Stelzner’s response, Irving’s advocate reminded the judge of his own ruling, which had forbid Rudolf to testify on the subject of the gas chambers in the first place!

In response, the judge painfully stuttered, “I, uh, can only confirm that the witness was not asked about this.”

Although the judge himself conceded that the structures shown to tourists at Auschwitz are not the original “gas chambers,” he nevertheless proceeded to reject every exhibit and expert witness for the defense on the grounds that the Auschwitz gas chambers have been historically proven.

“If that is true,” the attorney interjected, “what would anyone have to lose by permitting Rudolf to testify?”

Judge Selzner replied, “Uh, well, time would be lost. It would also be illegal.”

In effect, the judge’s statement seemed to suggest that when the truth becomes uncomfortable, all one needs to do is outlaw it!

Perturbed with the judge’s wretched equivocations, attorney Klaus Goebel protested:

I have the impression that this court has something to hide, otherwise it would permit the expert witness to testify. I understand that the prosecuting attorney and the court is under political pressure. Nevertheless, the accused must be given the opportunity to prove his statements. It is intolerable that in a society of law that you can prevent me from questioning the expert witness about his on-site work, and then reject him because he was not asked about this. You are preventing any discussion of a matter of evidence.[\[19\]](#)

Replying to these objections, the judge insipidly droned, “Yes, it may very well be that, from your point of view, I am hindering the presentation of the defense case.”

The court also refused Irving’s request to subpoena Franciszek Piper as a witness for the defense. At the time of the trial, Piper was serving as the director of the Auschwitz State Museum in Poland, and Irving’s attorneys intended to ask Piper, under oath, to confirm that he had “confided to Freiburg historian Prof. Martin that the Auschwitz “gas chamber” shown to tourists was actually a phony reconstruction.”

As witness after witness was rejected, Irving’s two exasperated attorneys stalked out of the courtroom in protest, whilst the court spectators burst out in supportive applause.

In his closing statement to the court, David Irving, confident and defiant, declared that the hearing was in fact a political trial in which the verdict had already been decided upon before it began.

Irving noted that, prior to the trial’s commencement, he had sent out to various German historians detailed photographs of Auschwitz taken by Allied reconnaissance planes in 1944, asking them to examine them and point out where the alleged gas chambers were located. With obvious disdain in his voice, Irving dryly commented that not one of them had the courage to reply.

Irving concluded his statement by admonishing the judge: “We both have our duties. My duty as historian is to establish the truth. Your duty is also to establish the truth, but you have a problem in Germany.”[\[20\]](#)

Germany’s ultimate response to the problem of David Irving was to refuse to consider any further appeals of the verdict, after which the combative historian lodged a protest with the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. One year thereafter authorities in Munich permanently banned David Irving from setting foot on German soil, ostensibly because ‘revisionist, right-wing extremist and neo-Nazi groups’ continue to express their desire to have Irving speak at their meetings.

Hans-Peter Uhl, a district governmental official declared, “Public appearances in Munich by people such as Irving cannot be tolerated.”[\[21\]](#)

In attempting to justify the ban, German authorities declared they had neither the time nor the desire to attend all of Irving’s numerous lectures in order to monitor his statements for possible violations of the law.

According to the directive, Irving’s public appearances had helped to endanger public security and order, thereby seriously harming the reputation of the German Federal Republic. German officials issued this ban, at least in large part, in response to pressure from foreign organizations that are seeking to suppress dissident revisionist views of the “Holocaust extermination story.”[\[22\]](#)

In more practical terms, Irving’s presence in Germany would henceforth constitute an act of “incitement” by inciting the authorities to take him into custody and deport him.

Prosecution of Revisionists in Switzerland

One year following Irving’s trial in Munich, Swiss legislators appended Article No. 261 to the nation’s existing penal code. Although ostensibly dealing with hate crimes, the all-too-familiar wording of the law indisputably proved that “Holocaust deniers” were the primary target behind the legislation:

He who in public incites to hatred of or discrimination against a person or group of persons because of their racial, ethnic or religious relationship...He who in public propagates ideologies based on a systematic deprecation or defamation of members of a race, ethnic group or religion...He who for this same end organizes, promotes or takes part in propaganda activities...He who in public by means of the spoken word, writings, pictorial descriptions, gestures, acts of violence and in any other manner degrades and discriminates in a way that infringes the human dignity of a person or group of persons because of their racial, ethnic or religious relationship, or who for one of these reasons denies, grossly minimizes or tries to justify a genocide or other crimes against humanity...will be punished with jail or with a fine.[\[23\]](#)

Three months later, a brilliant Swiss pedagogue, Jürgen Graf, was abruptly suspended after passing out copies of his premiere revisionist book The Holocaust on the Test Stand: Eyewitness Reports versus the Laws of Nature, to colleagues, journalists and politicians across Switzerland.

The courageous teacher crossed his Rubicon fully cognizant of the possible repercussions of his act. Although Graf never discussed historical matters in his classes where he taught Latin and French, Swiss Federal Education Authorities brusquely declared that, under the circumstances, he “obviously” could not remain a teacher.

Unbeknownst to Graf, his tribulations had only just begun.

In July 1998, the then-47-year-old Graf was charged, tried and convicted of allegedly publishing anti-Jewish books. Convicted along with him on the same charges was 78-year-old retired engineer Gerhard Förster. Both men received fines and prison terms – 15 months in the case of Graf and 12 months’ imprisonment for Förster. The court also imposed an additional fine of 8,000 Swiss francs ($5,000) and ordered both men to relinquish over 55,000 francs (38,000) from their earnings as a result of book sales to the court. Förster was ordered to pay 45,000 and Graf, 10,000.[\[24\]](#)

While imposing sentence upon the defendants, Presiding Judge Andrea Staubli referred to their “remarkable criminal energy,” as a factor compounding their guilt, and cited their apparent lack of remorse as a contributing factor in her decision not to impose a more lenient sentence. The five members comprising the court - three women and two men, unanimously concurred in their verdict.

Judge Staubli rejected the defendant’s arguments that their books were scholarly. In the opinion of the judge, Graf’s meticulously researched books were “criminal, cynical and inhuman.”

Graf and Förster appealed the harsh verdict.

News coverage of the trial in Switzerland was generally unfavorable toward and slanted against the accused. A front-page commentary published in the popular daily Tages-Anzeiger (July 22, 1998) warned its readers that the defendants were not as harmless as they appear. Arguing in favor of the court's harsh sentence, the newspaper proclaimed:

Holocaust deniers, with their unspeakable theories, injure the human dignity of the Jews, the memory of the victims, and their history... Their goal is to stir up hatred against the Jews, and their hidden motive is to whitewash the National Socialists and make their dangerous ideology once again acceptable.[25]

The newspaper conspicuously failed to explain by what means it had actually divined the "hidden motives" of the accused.

Two years following Graf's conviction, 79-year-old revisionist publisher Gaston-Armand Amaudruz was convicted in a Swiss court and sentenced to one year imprisonment for "denying that millions of Jews were exterminated in gas chambers by Nazi Germany during World War Two." [26]

Mr. Amaudruz was placed on trial due to published comments he had authored in his monthly newsletter, Le Courrier du Continent, with a circulation of 400 subscribers. The offending passage read: "For my part, I maintain my position: I don't believe in the gas chambers. Let the exterminationists provide the proof and I will believe it. But as I've been waiting for this proof for decades, I don't believe I will see it soon." [27]

One day prior to the commencement of his trial, Amaudruz composed a deliberately provocative article entitled, "Long Live Revisionism," in which he averred, "My trial is a political trial. The judgment is purely opportunistic. I prefer to follow my conscience rather than an immoral law of a criminal nature. I maintain my point of view." [28]

Ostensibly as a result of concerns expressed by the suing civil parties, the Court precluded any presentation of evidence by the defense contesting the existence of homicidal gas chambers by taking "official notice of their existence," based upon the asseverations of former concentration-camp survivors and prior precedents established by the Swiss Supreme Court.

Underlining his enthusiastic support of this strategy was attorney Philippe A. Grumbach, who energetically took part in the campaign to outlaw "racism and anti-Semitic conduct" in Switzerland, resulting in the ratification of Article 261, later appended to the Swiss penal code. Coincidentally, Grumbach is also a member of the Swiss Committee of LICRA (International League against Racism and Anti-Semitism).

In November 2001, Grumbach was elected as President of the CICAD, (Coordination Intercommunautaire contre l'Antisemitisme et la Diffamation) which is described as an "independent association fighting against Anti-Semitism in all its guises by teaching the history of Anti-Semitism and the Shoah." [29]

Grumbach's peculiar nomenclature transforms "Holocaust" revisionism into "negationist propaganda," which he defines as a "denial of the existence of the gas chambers, minimizing the number of Jews killed in the Holocaust and asserting that Jews derived an economic advantage from this period of their history." [30]

Expanding upon his definition of the word, Grumbach avers that "negationism is a form of racial discrimination which causes offence to the community to which the victims of genocide belong." Grumbach attempts to argue that Article 261 of the Swiss Penal Code does not inhibit free speech or debate or the right to freedom of expression, but "seeks only to prevent the publication of statements the purpose of which is to minimize the importance of crimes against humanity or which aims at negating their barbarous and monstrous nature. Establishing the element of deliberate racist motivation plays a crucial role in the enforcement of this provision." [31]

However one chooses to interpret Grumbach's legalese, the end result is censorship and prosecution for thought crimes, and the fact remains that these laws to date have only been used to prosecute individuals who raise valid evidential questions and doubts in respect to Nazi Germany's internment of the Jews.

Grumbach's irritation with revisionism becomes manifest when he complains that "Amaudruz's articles in Le Courrier du Continent all contain extracts which purport to negate the existence of the gas chambers, cast doubt on the extent of Shoah and in effect deny its existence and make reference to blackmail for which the figure of six million victims was allegedly used."[\[32\]](#)

At other times, Grumbach refers to the Holocaust in quasi-religious, mystical tones when he writes "the Lausanne Court found that these extracts constituted a serious affront to the dignity of Jews in general. The Court also recognized that these extracts amounted to an offence against the sacrosanct memory of the victims as well as a defamatory attack against the history of the Jewish community."[\[33\]](#)

After due consideration of Mr. Grumbach's published opinions relative to "Holocaust denial," the rationale prompting his comment that, "The main concern of the Court and the Associations and civil plaintiffs was to avoid making the history of the Second World War the central issue of the trial" becomes more vividly understood.[\[34\]](#)

Conversely, Amaudruz had no other option available to him other than to contest and protest the legality of the Swiss law applicable to "Holocaust denial."

On the day of sentencing Judge Carrard described the accused as a "life-long racist" who "showed no remorse" during the course of his three-day trial, and ordered the accused to pay the court costs of his trial, along with an additional fine in the form of "damages" to four Jewish organizations that had filed suit against him.

The organizations in question were the Federation of Swiss Jewish Communities, the League against Racism and Anti-Semitism and an organization entitled 'Les Fils et Filles des Deportés Juifs de France,' the latter claiming to represent sons and daughters of Jewish deportees from France during the Second World War. Serge Klarsfeld, a widely recognized "Holocaust" activist, serves as president of the latter organization and was personally present at the trial of Amaudruz.

In his concluding statement to the court, Jürgen Graf made reference to his "friend in western Switzerland, Gaston-Armand Amaudruz, against whom a trial is being prepared in Lausanne that is similar to the one here today against Förster and me. In issue number 371 of his Le Courrier du Continent newsletter, Amaudruz writes: 'As once in early historical times, it is a sign of weakness to try to impose a dogma by force. The exterminationists may win trials through laws that muzzle freedom of speech. But they will lose the final trial before the court of future generations.'[\[35\]](#)

Such idealistic phrases might very well be lost on Philippe Grumbach, who expressed his overall satisfaction with the Amaudruz verdict in the following terms:

The importance of Amaudruz's trial and conviction and the keen interest with which it has been followed, has been widely acknowledged in both the Swiss national and international press. A man of advanced years, Amaudruz nonetheless represents a threat to society, as do all Holocaust deniers... There can be no doubt that the fight must be continued against all Holocaust-deniers and racists for the simple reason that those who forget the past, are condemned to relive it.[\[36\]](#)

Put in other words, Grumbach evidently feels that if the scientific arguments advanced by revisionists should be vindicated, he may very well be condemned to a gas chamber at some point in the future.

Against such fanatical 'logic' it is impossible to argue.

David Irving Banned from Auschwitz

In October 1997, David Irving received an invitation from the BBC to assist in a proposed documentary dealing with the suppression of free speech in Europe. Irving accepted the invitation and contacted officials at the Auschwitz State Museum to request permission to peruse their archives for documentation related to construction plans, administration, and photographs of the camp.

Approximately one month prior to his scheduled flight to Poland, Irving received a message from BBC producer Nicholas Fraser, advising him:

We've just received notice from the Auschwitz Museum, to the effect that they will not allow you access to the library or to any of the camp grounds. They control every inch of what used to be the Auschwitz complex and it would seem that we would be unable to film with you there. Reluctantly we have decided that we can't go ahead with our original plan. It just isn't possible.

Needless to say I am very sorry about this and I have tried in vain to convince the museum that this is not necessarily a way to promote freedom of speech. However, they are quite adamant and there is nothing I can do. We propose instead to film with you in London...[\[37\]](#)

Irving quipped, "What are they fearful of? It shows a grave insecurity, a lack of historical detachment. It's like the suspect saying, "We don't mind investigators – just don't let in Lieutenant Columbo!"[\[38\]](#)

It would seem that Irving's clever analogy had grounds. During the course of an interview granted to a journalist working for the prestigious French newsmagazine L'Express, Museum official Krystyna Oleksy candidly conceded "the room shown to tourists as a supposed execution 'gas chamber' in its 'original state' is a fraud actually built after the war under Polish Communist supervision."[\[39\]](#)

Of course this is what David Irving had maintained all along, the difference between the two being that Oleksy wasn't fined for her comments or banned from entering Germany or France for saying it. Rather astoundingly, however, Irving is banned from Auschwitz!

Considering the circumstances involved, it would perhaps not be unreasonable to conclude that it was a combination of factors, such as fear, embarrassment and irritation, which prompted the Auschwitz curators to deny David Irving access to their archives. It is tempting to speculate what further admissions might have ensued if the intrepid Irving had been allowed full access to the extensive Auschwitz repository.

In the midst of these expanding international controversies and perversions of justice, revisionist historians continued to insist that the scientific evidence suggested that the homicidal gas chambers of Auschwitz were in fact either a post-war creation, or were simply morgues attached to the crematoria buildings that were later misrepresented as gas chambers. In response to this ongoing research, the German government beefed up its "Holocaust denial" laws by appending an amendment to the existing legal code, after receiving repeated complaints and exhortations from the Central Council of Jews in Germany and affiliated agencies, who complained that not enough was being done to stem the tide of revisionism and 'racism' in the Federal Republic.

This new amendment prescribed harsher punishments for any individual running afoul of the new provisions. Whereas under the old law terms of up to one year's imprisonment were prescribed for offenders, the new law provided a prison term of up to five years or a fine. Spokespersons for interested Jewish organizations expressed their general satisfaction with the new legislation.

In 1994 two German judges faced the possibility of being arraigned on a charge of "inciting racial hatred" in Frankfurt after giving Guenther Deckert a suspended sentence on charges of "denying that the Holocaust happened."[\[40\]](#)

Abraham H. Foxman, National Director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith lent his own voice to the chorus of critics and sent a letter to the president of the Federal Courts in Germany, Professor Walter Odersky. Foxman urged the court to affirm the “undesirability of the Holocaust” and applauded “legislative efforts now underway [that] will make it easier for judges in Germany to punish hatemongering and incitement to violence against minorities.”<sup>[41]</sup>

Deckert, who was 55 years old at the time, had been charged with “defamation of the dead,” and “inciting racial hatred.” The former school teacher and leader of a small nationalist political party, the 5,000-member “National Democratic Party,” had run afoul of German law after hosting a meeting which featured Fred Leuchter, an American expert in execution technologies.

During the course of this public meeting, Leuchter expressed his professional opinion, based upon an on-site examination of the purported execution facilities at Auschwitz and Maidanek concentration camps, that the structures simply could not have been used for the purpose of mass murder, as had been alleged. Deckert translated the speech into German and publicly expressed his agreement with Leuchter’s conclusions. At no time during the course of the meeting did either man preach or advocate ‘hatemongering’, much less incite anyone to violence against minorities.

In fact, in the strict legal sense, it is academically debatable as to whether Foxman’s letter to the president of the Federal Courts in Germany constituted an incitement to persecute and unjustly prosecute Deckert and Leuchter, who clearly represent a ‘minority.’

The two jurists who had presided over Deckert’s case were suspended and subsequently reinstated, but prosecutors were clearly displeased by the judges’ characterization of the affable Deckert, whom they described as “an intelligent man of character and clear principles which he takes to heart...He defends those convictions with great engagement and a considerable amount of time and energy. The accused has stood up for a legitimate interest by trying to fend off further Holocaust reparation requests against Germany – half a century after the Holocaust.”<sup>[42]</sup>

After an unholy furor had been deliberately stirred up in the cauldrons of the world press, the two judges predictably recanted.

The presiding judge assigned to the Deckert case, Wolfgang Mueller, could only manage to mumble a few words of penitence to the effect that the judge’s choice of words had been “unfortunate formulations.”<sup>[43]</sup>

Germany’s Federal Court of Justice intervened and ordered a regional court in Karlsruhe to review the case and impose a new sentence, which it did in December 1994. Deckert was thereafter sentenced to two years’ imprisonment for “denying the Holocaust.”

Unbowed and unrepentant, Deckert vowed to “continue the struggle for freedom of thought, research and opinion.”<sup>[44]</sup>

Ignaz Bubis, the former chairman of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, expressed his satisfaction with the verdict and groaned that Deckert’s revisionist opinions constituted a direct attack upon Germany’s democratic constitution and urged other European nations to enact similar laws restricting freedom of speech for those who dared to publicly challenge the mainstream version of the “Holocaust.” Bubis admonished, “It is time for the European countries to busy themselves with this.”<sup>[45]</sup>

As if acting on cue, European countries proceeded to do just that, beginning with Switzerland.

In 1995, Spain and Belgium jumped on the bandwagon and outlawed ‘Holocaust denial.’ In the case of Belgium, the government had apparently been under pressure from various Jewish organizations that took offense at Belgium-published revisionist literature. A triumphant article printed in the London Jewish Chronicle candidly revealed that “the Belgian Government intends to co-operate with B’nai B’rith in prosecuting the publisher, printer and distributor of a Dutch-language revisionist pamphlet printed in Antwerp.”<sup>[46]</sup> working hand in hand in prosecuting revisionist researchers.

Thus, Jewish watchdog organizations and the Belgian government acted in collusion together,

The laws subsequently promulgated in Spain and Belgium were formulated along similar lines as those already existing in Israel, France and Germany. In Belgium, two Socialist Party members of Parliament, Yvon Mayeur and Claude Eerdeken introduced the law, which provided for up to one year's imprisonment and a $160.00 fine for those found guilty of violating its provisions.

In fact, the wordings of the various "Holocaust-denial" laws are so strikingly similar to laws in other European nations that one might be tempted to conclude that they all bear the stamp of a common author.

On March 1, 1996, twenty-one scholars and historians from various universities throughout Italy published a statement in defense of free speech and historical research. The professors courageously criticized the enactment of "Holocaust-denial" laws in France, Germany and other countries, specifically citing a French government ban on a book authored by Jürgen Graf simply because it denied the "Holocaust." The scholars pleaded for reason to prevail over repression:

We are appealing ...to the scholarly community to which we belong, and also to the political world and to the press, so that they react to this state of affairs, and put an end to a tendency that wherever it develops, may put freedom of speech, press and culture in European countries at risk.[\[47\]](#)

Needless to say, the sensibly worded appeal fell upon deaf ears, for the milieu in which "Holocaust denial" laws were first devised was precisely in those areas alluded to by the Italian professors - the political arena and the world press. Thus, "Holocaust-denial" laws were purposely designed to curtail freedom of speech and subvert other fundamental human rights. Practically speaking, human rights in Europe were no longer 'at risk' – they were in fact in headlong flight under attack by tyrants posing as moderate liberals.

Far from prompting a crisis of conscience, the legal repression of French and German revisionists escalated when on October 23, 1996, French lawyer Eric Delacroix was convicted by the XVIIth Correctional Chamber of the Paris Tribunal under the Fabius-Gayssot law, which prohibits criticism of the Nuremberg trials. Thus, counsel for those accused of "Holocaust denial" were now themselves susceptible to prosecution and at risk of being disbarred for defending their clients too energetically. Under such circumstances, the client-attorney relationship is critically ruptured, and becomes a mere mockery of justice. Truth be told, these repressive laws are precisely designed to deprive individuals of their basic civil liberties. These deleterious laws constitute a negation of the fundamental right entitling every accused individual to retain the best possible legal defense available when facing the possibility of years of imprisonment.

One suspects that the ultimate objective of such laws is to dispense with the farce of a public trial and simply sentence the accused in a sub-rosa star chamber comprised of a camarilla whose members are specifically appointed to impose the proper draconian sentence upon the accused without any attendant publicity. No other qualifications are necessary and there is no point in pleading or argumentation, as proof of guilt is already established by virtue of being denounced and accused.

While this Kafkaesque scenario may appear shocking to the sensibilities of those who truly value civil liberties and freedom of speech, the fact is this is precisely the sinister direction in which current "Holocaust-denial" laws are heading.

St. Martin's Press Drops Irving

David Irving was once again the center of media attention in 1996 when, "in the wake of unprecedented protests from respected literary figures and outrage from the Jewish community, the New York-based St. Martin's Press reversed its decision to publish Goebbels: Mastermind of the Third Reich.”[\[48\]](#) Company executives had convened an emergency meeting that April by company Chairman Thomas J. MacCormack, after Irving’s book had been unjustly denounced and panned by the usual critics as a “distortion of history expressing sympathy for Nazism.”

Irving had been forced to turn to publishers in the United States following a successfully orchestrated smear campaign by similar groups in Great Britain, which resulted in his book being blacklisted.

The Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center candidly confirmed the fact that pressure on St. Martin’s not to confer legitimacy upon Irving by publishing what it sarcastically referred to as “the novel” was intense.[\[49\]](#) In its magazine, Response, the Center proudly published a prototype of the poison-pen letters that inundated St. Martin’s in an attempt to force them to abrogate their contract with Irving. The Center cited an excerpt from a scathing letter penned by bestselling Jewish author Jonathan Kellerman, who wrote:

David Irving’s identity as a neo-Nazi and Holocaust denier is well known, and because of it he has been forced to self-publish in the U. K. Your attempt to elevate him to mainstream status in the U. S. is the single most repugnant act I’ve witnessed in over a decade of publishing. You should be ashamed of yourself. Don’t send me any more books for blurbs. Anything with the St. Martin’s label on it will go straight in the trash.[\[50\]](#)

Sadly, instead of ignoring the rants of a highly organized minority of unappeasable critics, St. Martin’s opted to trash Irving. In spite of the best efforts to stifle its publication, Irving’s book still went on to become widely read and much debated.

Udo Walendy

The case of Udo Walendy, who was sentenced to 15 months’ imprisonment in 1997, merits special mention because it reveals the ludicrous depths to which German jurists will descend when attempting to individually interpret and apply laws specifically concerned with “Holocaust denial.” At the time of his sentencing, Walendy was seventy years of age, having been previously sentenced in 1996 to a term of 29 months’ imprisonment for publishing two controversial issues dealing with the “Holocaust” in his series, Historical Facts. The two offending issues, numbered 66 and 68 respectively, had crossed the legal line by questioning specific details related to the “Holocaust.”

During the course of his summation, presiding judge Kroener explained that Walendy was not being sentenced on the basis of what he had written, but for what he had failed to write!

Lecturing the accused, Judge Kroener declared,

This [case] is not about what was written – that’s not for this court to determine – but rather about what was not written. If you had devoted just a fraction of the same exactitude to highlighting the other side [of the Holocaust issue] you would not have been sentenced. However, your total one-sidedness is precisely the opposite of the scholarly method. You continually suggest to your readers that if this and that point [of official Holocaust history] is not correct, the rest can’t quite be true either. In this way, the Holocaust is reduced to the level of an industrial accident.[\[51\]](#)

In handing down judgment, the court ruled that the accused had left historically factual information out of his précis, which the judge felt would have given the articles more balance, and for that reason, he was guilty.

The judge expressed his irritation with Walendy in the following terms:

Walendy, on a very scholarly, historical basis, cites “quotations and facts that contradict,” in many specific points, the accepted version for German guilt for the Holocaust and other National Socialist crimes and seizes on weak points...and greatly blows them up in order to encourage a feeling of doubt in the reader.

One observant wag later perceived Walendy's predicament in the following terms:

A man accused of a crime stands before the court. As it later turns out, the suspicion is unfounded, but the judge condemns him anyway. Not because he committed the crime, but because he didn't commit it.

The presiding judge obviously did not concur with that sentiment and most likely viewed Walendy as a "recidivist offender" in view of his past collisions with the law. For example, in November 1996 Walendy was fined 20,000 marks by a district court in Dortmund for having in his possession twelve illegal copies of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf. The judge noted sourly,

The planned distribution of the books manifests an extreme and therefore particularly dangerous mindset. The books are propaganda for dismantling the constitutional and legal system of the Federal Republic of Germany, and establishing a National Socialist system of injustice... This must be judged very severely.[\[52\]](#)

However, judging by the appearance and physical condition of the offender, who at the time was 70 years of age and suffering from progressive heart disease, it would seem that the judge's characterization of him as an "agitator" intent on "dismantling the constitutional and legal system of the Federal Republic of Germany" in order to "establish a National Socialist system of injustice" seems a bit far-fetched.

Contrary to the judge's evaluation of the man, Walendy had earned a "Diplom-Politologe" certificate in 1956 affirming his specialized field of academic study and knowledge, having also graduated from the prestigious German Institute of Political Science as well as the Aachen School of Journalism. Additionally, Walendy worked for a time as a teacher in the employ of the German Red Cross and served as director of the Volksschule in Herford.

In spite of all the impressive credits to his name and reputation as an educator and scholar, his unswerving commitment to historical accuracy inevitably led to a collision with Germany's "Holocaust-denial" laws. As the German translator and publisher of Professor Arthur Butz's Hoax of the Twentieth Century, which was later banned by German authorities, Walendy was arraigned before a court and convicted of 'incitement' - presumably against Jews. His subsequent conviction resulted in a 15-month penalty tacked onto his previous conviction, both sentences to run concurrently. For a man of Walendy's age, this could very well amount to a sentence of death in prison. Such a grave misapplication of justice for one man's "crime" of honestly expressing his opinion and refusing to retract has rarely been seen since the days when brute beasts of the field were arraigned before medieval magistrates to answer for 'crimes,' after which they were duly hanged, drawn and quartered or burned at the stake.

Speaking of which, on a lighter note, a rather odd case distributed in the world press on October 10, 2003 related the story of Roland Thein, age 54, of the Berlin suburb of Lichtenrade, who had trained his black sheepdog, named Adolf, to raise his front paw in a Hitler salute. Thein was stopped and questioned by police after he and his dog had been seen saluting together in the vicinity of a local school. A group of alien residents observed the antics and reported Thein to the police.

Moments after police arrived, Thein repeated the little trick for their entertainment, ordering, "Adolf, sitz! Mach den Gruss!" [Adolf, sit, give the salute], and the dog obediently obliged by hoisting his right paw in the air. The police were not amused and took Thein and his dog into custody. German prosecutors charged Thein with "using the characteristic marks of an unconstitutional organization," - a punishable offense that falls under Paragraph 86a of the Federal Criminal Code, which forbids neo-Nazi activities, and prescribes a penalty of three years' imprisonment, if convicted.

A spokesperson for the Berlin criminal court declared that "Adolf" would not be called as a witness. Thein's attorney, Nicole Burmann-Zarske, told reporters, "Adolf is a very sweet dog.

He loves cookies, just like his owner.” A friend of the accused later informed reporters that the dog had since been struck by a car and suffered a serious injury to its right paw, dejectedly adding, “It’s all bent, he can’t stick it out anymore.”

They were fortunate to be let off with probation.

In a far more serious case, by way of contrast to Udo Walendy’s treatment, two former East German border guards were arraigned before a court in Magdeburg and charged with the cold-blooded shooting of a 15-year-old boy attempting to flee to freedom in the west. Found guilty of the crime of homicide, they each received 15 months’ probation – just one month’s probation for each year of the victim’s life.[\[53\]](#)

In consideration of the circumstances involved in the prosecution of Udo Walendy, there appears to be no doubt whatsoever as to which ‘mindset’ constitutes the greater danger to society and civil liberties.

Within the same year, Guenter Deckert was denied parole at the insistence of the state prosecutor, even though Deckert had already served 2/3 of his sentence. In the bizarre domain of contemporary German jurisprudence, violent offenders served less time than Deckert and were quickly reintegrated back into German society.[\[54\]](#)

Meanwhile, Erwin Adler, a 62-year-old lecturer in politics and social science at the University of Munich, where he had been employed for twenty-five years, was summarily suspended for questioning the existence of homicidal gas chambers. University rector Professor Andrew Heldrich disagreed with Adler’s opinion, which he characterized as “frightful and unacceptable,” and confirmed that the outspoken professor would be summarily dismissed due to his “lack of sensitivity.”

An unidentified reporter from the Sueddeutsche Zeitung had attended Adler’s lecture, surreptitiously taping the professor’s comments, which were later cited in the press. During the course of his provocative lecture, Adler freely admitted that the Jews had been removed from society by a variety of methods but rhetorically posed the question:

Were they gassed systematically or were they not gassed?

Responding to his own query in the form of an afterthought, the professor commented: “On that I must withhold my personal opinion. I simply do not know. I wasn’t there,” and pointed out that whether an inmate actually perished as a consequence of starvation, shooting, beating or epidemic, the end result is still the same. “So what,” asked the professor perplexedly, “is all the fuss about gassing?”[\[55\]](#)

---

Notes:

[1]	Research Report, “Making the Denial of the Holocaust a Crime in Law,” (London), March 6, 1982 No. 1, p. 2. Institute of Jewish Affairs
[2]	Ibid, pp. 2,3.
[3]	Ibid, p. 3.
[4]	Ibid, p. 5.
[5]	Ibid, p. 7.
[6]	“Call to outlaw Holocaust denial,” Australian Jewish News , Sept. 9, 1991.
[7]	Ibid.
[8]	Ibid.

[9]	Ibid.
[10]	UN statement on racism , July 31, 1996 p. 17.
[11]	Ibid.
[12]	“Charges Dropped against Engineer for Scholarly Report Disputing Gassing Claims,” Journal of Historical Review Vol. 15, No. 5, Sept.-Oct. 1995, p. 30.
[13]	Ibid.
[14]	“Rechtsextreme Hetzer muessen bestraft warden,” Sueddeutsche Zeitung , April 21, 1994.
[15]	Ibid.
[16]	Ibid.
[17]	“German court rejects Irving appeal,” Daily Telegraph , (London), May 6, 1992.
[18]	Ibid.
[19]	“Historian Fined $6,000 in German “Gas Chamber” Trial,” IHR Newsletter , No. 88, July-August 1993.
[20]	Ibid.
[21]	Sueddeutsche Zeitung , (Munich), Nov. 11, 1993, p. 35. As cited in The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 15, No. 6, March-April 1995, p. 28.
[22]	“Irving Protests German Persecution of Holocaust Skeptics,” The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 15, No. 2, March-April 1995, p. 28.
[23]	“Das Schweizer Antirassismus-Gesetz im Wortlaut,” Nation und Europa (Coburg), Nov.-Dec. 1997, Heft 11-12, p. 48.
[24]	“Swiss Court Punishes Two Revisionists,” The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 17, No. 4, July-August, 1998, p. 2.
[25]	Ibid.
[26]	“Holocaust Revisionist Sentenced,” BBC News , (Europe), April 11, 2000. http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/europe/708778.stm .
[27]	Ibid.
[28]	“Notorious Swiss Holocaust Denier Imprisoned,” Justice , Summer, 2000, p. 12.
[29]	General biographical information may be accessed at: http://www.praetor.ch/en/cv/grumbach/grumbachbio.htm
[30]	“Notorious Swiss Holocaust Denier Imprisoned,” Justice , Summer, 2000, p. 13, cited above.
[31]	Ibid.
[32]	Ibid.
[33]	Ibid.
[34]	Ibid.
[35]	“Swiss Court Punishes Two Revisionists,” The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 17, No. 4, July-August, 1998, p. 9.

[36]	"Notorious Swiss Holocaust Denier Imprisoned," Justice , Summer, 2000, p. 13, cited above.
[37]	"Polish Authorities Ban BBC Team and David Irving from Auschwitz," The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 17, No. 4, July-August, 1998, p. 16.
[38]	Ibid.
[39]	Ibid, pp. 16-17.
[40]	"Judicial Boost for Neo-Nazis," Response , Fall-Winter, 1994/1995, Vol. 15, No. 3, p. 7.
[41]	"ADL Concerned by German High Courts' Ruling on Holocaust Denial," Jewish Press , Friday, April 1, 1994.
[42]	"Judicial Boost for Neo-Nazis," Response , (Fall-Winter, 1994/1995), Vol. 15, No. 3, p. 7.
[43]	Ibid.
[44]	"Two Year Prison Sentence for 'Holocaust Denial,' The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 15, No. 3, May-June 1995, p. 40.
[45]	Die Welt , August 30, 1994, as cited in: The Journal of Historical Review , May-June 1995, Vol. 15, No. 3, p. 40.
[46]	Jewish Chronicle , (London), June 17, 1992.
[47]	La Stampa , March 1, 1996.
[48]	"St. Martin's Forced to Drop Irving Book Deal," Response , Spring 1996, Vol. 17, No. 1, p. 12.
[49]	Ibid.
[50]	Ibid.
[51]	"Dissident German Historian Punished for Revisionist Writings," The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 17, No. 4, July-August 1998, p. 14.
[52]	Ibid.
[53]	"Das Ende der Meinungsfreiheit," Nation und Europa , (Coburg), July-August, 1996, pp. 5, 6.
[54]	"Deckert weiter in Haft," Umschau, Deutschland in Geschichte und Gegenwart , 1997, Dec. Heft 4, p. 42.
[55]	"Law Report," David Irving Action Report , July, 1996, p. 16.

Holocaust Jurisprudence in Europe | CODOH

by Nicholas Kollerstrom

This article originally appeared as Appendix IV “Your Rights” in Kollerstrom’s Breaking the Spell. —Ed

1948: Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Article 71:

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

1953: European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights, Article 10:

Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers. This article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television or cinema enterprises.

Restrictions on this apply “for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others...

There is a content-based restriction to this protection of rights, and that deals with the “dissemination of ideas promoting racism and the Nazi ideology, and inciting to hatred and racial discrimination.” This is said to reflect the “paradox of tolerance: an absolute tolerance may lead to the tolerance of the ideas promoting intolerance, and the latter could then destroy the tolerance.”

Our concern here has been with what the Nazis did, historically: which does not constitute an endorsement of their actions. Indeed, research into what they did, which is the normal business of the historian, must surely help in enforcing a law prohibiting the “promoting” of “Nazi ideology,” so that it can be applied more effectively.

1976: European Court of Human Rights

Ideas that offend, shock, or disturb the State or part of the population are deemed to have the full protection under freedom of speech. It considers that any limitation of this freedom must correspond to an “imperative social need,” affirming this in the landmark case of Handyside:[\[1\]](#)

Freedom of expression constitutes one of the essential foundations of [a democratic] society, one of the basic conditions for its progress and for the development of every man. Subject to Paragraph 2 of Article 10... it is applicable not only to ‘information’ or ‘ideas’ that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also those that offend, shock or disturb the State or any sector of the population. Such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no ‘democratic society.’

This “Handyside paradigm” means that a democracy is required to protect the right to express minority opinions. But such a right to freedom of expression is not absolute, as indicated by Section 2 of Article 10 of the European Convention, above-cited.[\[2\]](#)

It should be the business of courts to sentence crime and promote justice, not attempt to throttle historical investigation by enforcing belief in US/UK atrocity propaganda left over from World War II, in which only a minority of the world still believes due to its vanishing credibility. The concept of crime involves in essence the inflicting of unacceptable harm on another, and should not cover a possible effect of fear induced in an ethnic or racial group, whether intentionally or not.

Revisionists are liable to find themselves accused of promoting anti-Semitism or hate-crime: it therefore becomes important to affirm that it is the currently accepted view which is promoting race-hatred – against Germans – whereas a revisionist view endeavors to describe European history without the hate and blame, but rather with mutual responsibility. It is the demonized-enemy images that create the hate.

2008: EU Legislation

In 2008 the European Union adopted a motion “Combating Racism and Xenophobia”, which obliged all EU member states to criminalize certain forms of so-called “hate speech.” “Hate speech” is a notoriously woolly concept, whose definition is always going to depend on who is in power. Its Article 1 defines criminal law applicable to member states:

Each Member State shall take the measures necessary to ensure that the following intentional conduct is punishable:

- (a) publicly inciting to violence or hatred directed against a group of persons or a member of such a group defined by reference to race, color, religion, descent or national or ethnic origin;
- (b) the commission of an act referred to in point (a) by public dissemination or distribution of tracts, pictures or other material;
- (c) publicly condoning, denying or grossly trivializing crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes as defined in Articles 6, 7 and 8 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court, directed against a group of persons or a member of such a group defined by reference to race, color, religion, descent or national or ethnic origin when the conduct is carried out in a manner likely to incite to violence or hatred against such a group or a member of such a group.

Here, it is not the belief as such which can put anyone in jail, but beliefs which are liable to incite violence etc. The legal trigger is the act of incitement, not the “denial” as such. And nothing in this text alludes to World War II: the Rome Statute of the ICC here alluded to sets up quite general definitions, e.g., of genocide. The denying or trivializing of “crimes of genocide” is said to be punishable, but this law does not say what these crimes are; and moreover, it is only punishable if it is likely to cause something publicly visible, i.e. incites violence. The mere expressing of an opinion is not here defined as crime.

Anyone accused of inciting “hate speech” should insist that a qualified psychologist is present to testify that the emotion in question, namely hate, has been aroused, and say in whom, where and when it was aroused, as a consequence of the said speech: the court should not just accept the word of the prosecution concerning the alleged emotion.

A revisionist accused under this legislation may wish to bring a copy of Shlomo Sand’s book The Invention of the Jewish People into the courtroom: that Jewish history professor shows in this book that European Jews are not an ethnic, national or racial group: Ashkenazi Jews may share some racial-genetic characteristics, but these are not however shared by the Sephardic Jews; Jews are an international and cosmopolitan social elite, of whom a small proportion are religious. The categories of this Act are not applicable to them.

Article (c) is actually incoherent and does not make sense: for example, if a historian investigates the alleged genocide of Armenians by Turks in 1915-16 (the “denial” of which has been made a crime in France, as of 2012): that investigation cannot be “directed against” a group of persons of a race, colour, nation etc. – that does not make sense. A historian’s conclusion may spark anger, but that is no reason to criminalize it.

2011: UN Human Rights Committee

Laws that penalize the expression of opinions about historical facts are incompatible with the obligations that the Covenant imposes on States parties in relation to the respect for freedom of opinion and expression. The Covenant does not permit general prohibition of expressions of an erroneous opinion or an incorrect interpretation of past events. Restrictions on the right of freedom of opinion should never be imposed and, with regard to freedom of expression, they should not go beyond what is permitted in Paragraph 3 or required under Article 20.[\[3\]](#)

There is a helpful discussion of this important new edict by Fredrick Töben.[\[4\]](#) The first sentence of the above quote has a footnote alluding to the Faurisson case: “So called ‘memory-laws,’ see Communication No. 550/93, Faurisson v. France.” Here, the UN Human Rights Committee is affirming that “laws that penalize the expression of opinions about historical facts,” like France’s Gayssot Act used to outlaw revisionism, are incompatible with the criteria for “freedom of opinion and expression.”

Turning to the previous paragraph of the 2011 UN document, it places a limit upon the application of blasphemy laws – “Prohibitions of displays of lack of respect for a religion or other belief system.” Over the decades of its sorry existence, European legislation against Holocaust revisionism has only ever protected the allegedly hurt feelings of one specific ethnic or religious group, viz. Jews. This paragraph makes clear that

It would be impermissible for any such laws to discriminate in favour of or against one or certain religions or belief systems, or their adherents over another, or religious believers over non-believers.

French lawyers need to discuss how this impacts upon enforcements of the Gayssot Act, which in practice has always protected only one specific belief system.

Just Law

Crime should be in essence a deed, not an intention or feeling. The policeman catches the villain who has committed a crime: the criminal has done something wrong. But, once the category of “Thoughtcrime” is introduced, then respect for the law will soon be replaced by fear of law enforcement. If Jews have collectively a self-perception of their ancestors being put into gas chambers, and if they “feel” that they do not like people pointing out that this perception is untrue, then that is regrettable – but, it has no business being a crime. Citizens need to demand that the laws of their nation are just and fair.

Explaining why the right of freedom of speech as expressed in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) was not applicable to Faurisson, after he appealed to them, the UN’s Human rights Committee alluded to a right of “the Jewish community to live free from fear.” Was any psychologist present to testify that Faurisson’s writings had induced fear in anyone? Faurisson was beaten up by a Jewish gang in 1989. Is anyone concerned that he has a right to live free from that fear? If the term “hate speech” is going to be used against revisionists in return for their work in ascertaining what happened in World War II, then a court needs to summon a psychologist to testify that such an emotion has in fact been generated. Citizens should campaign against bad law which convicts on the basis of an alleged emotion that might have been aroused.

Portrait of Dutch philosopher Baruch de Spinoza (1632-1677), ca. 1665
[Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

The great Dutch philosopher Spinoza wrote books about just law. Holland is a nation that has traditionally cared passionately about individual liberties, has no Holocaust Denial ban in its law and has only about half the fraction of its population in jail as compared to that in the UK. Let's have a quote from Spinoza that might be engraved on the walls of police stations:

Those laws which prohibit one from doing that which causes no harm to one's neighbor, are fit only for ridicule.

This is a secular humanist viewpoint, differing from that of earlier centuries, when voicing defiance or heresy upon sacred matters could land one in jail; an era which, unless we are careful, may now be coming back.

Dutch prosecutions do however take place on grounds of racial discrimination: it being there prohibited to "deliberately offend a group of people because of their race, their religion or beliefs." Accused in this manner, one should tell the Court that most people could be glad, not offended, at being told that their relatives had not died in gas chambers.

Bad Law

Of the new Oxford University Press textbook on the subject,<sup>[5]</sup> Michael Hoffman has rightly argued:

Genocide Denials and the Law is intended to serve as an inquisitor's manual, providing the definitive legal rationale for jailing modern-day heretics in the dungeons of Europe by first dehumanizing them as 'deniers.' [...] a manual for inquisitors cloaked as an Oxford law study. It offers a rationale for punishing gas chamber heretics with long imprisonment, as a just and imperative penalty for daring to reject idolatry and collective false witness. This is a disgraceful work. ("On the Contrary" 20 June 2011) (<http://revisionistreview.blogspot.com/2011/06/bow-to-their-holocaust-idol-or-go-to.html>)

Its chapter titled "Defending Truth" is about how the people who are trying to find the truth need to be jailed. Its author Kenneth Lasson, Professor of Law at the University of Baltimore, a Jew, has basically written a chapter about how the goyim have to believe what they are told and how they need to be jailed if they don't.

The American authors of this text need to be asked why they have omitted to mention the fifty to a hundred million Native Americans whose lives were erased by the White Man, the greatest genocide in recorded human history. It's one that did really happen, so they would presumably argue that nobody is trying to "deny" it. Native Americans are America's real "Holocaust survivors."

Two people have been jailed in the UK for "denying the Holocaust," after distributing a comic book called Tales of the Holohoax. It seems to have been the pushy way they distributed this sensitive material rather than the content itself which landed them in jail. They posted it to the local synagogue in Leeds. This comic (with some rather fine text by Michael Hoffman) is in the great tradition of British satire, from William Hogarth to Private Eye.

They were jailed under the Public Order Act, with the Crown Prosecution Service saying they had gone too far, they had crossed the line, etc. Muslims might want to test the water by re-publishing this and selling it. After all, the Mohammed cartoons were allowed, and so was Salman Rushdie's Satanic Verses, which scoffed at Islam.

We now examine two national Holocaust-Denial laws, French and German.

1990: The French Gayssot Act

On the subject of the liberty of the press, France's Gayssot Act of 1990 made it an offense "to contest the category of crimes against humanity<sup>[6]</sup> as defined in the London Charter of 1945." It applied to the press, i.e. newspapers, specifying how they will be punished if they contest:

l'existence d'un ou plusieurs crimes contre l'humanité tels qu'ils sont définis par l'article 6 du statut du tribunal militaire international annexé à l'accord de Londres du 8 août 1945.

Can this be used to convict revisionists, accused of "denying the Holocaust"? Nothing in it alludes to ordinary citizens; it is simply an Act "sur la liberté de la presse." Yet twenty or so French revisionists have been prosecuted under it.

The London Charter of the International Military Tribunal here alluded to (of 8th August 1945) simply laid down the procedures by which the Nuremberg trials were to be conducted. (NB: This was in-between the bombings of Hiroshima and Nagasaki!) That Charter established three new categories of crime that were going to be applied retrospectively against the defeated Nazis: crimes against peace, war crimes, and crimes against humanity.<sup>[Z]</sup> The judgement of Nuremberg was handed down in 1946, but this Gayssot Act relates solely to the category of crime to be used there – not to any later judgements, as is commonly supposed.

The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court of 2002 re-stated these three new categories of crime as laid down in 1945. I suggest any French revisionist on trial should bring a copy of this into the Court and read out these categories, affirming that he/she is in no way disputing or contesting them. Article 6 of the Charter states, for instance:

For the purpose of this Statute, ‘genocide’ means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:

(a) Killing members of the group;

(b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group, etc. One should welcome the category of Crimes against Humanity – and hope that Bush and Blair will in due time be prosecuted under them. Revisionists are in no way called upon to doubt or “contest” these categories, through whatever process of historical inquiry they are led.

France’s Gayssot Act also prohibited “any discrimination founded on membership or non-membership of an ethnic group, a nation, a race or a religion.” So France, wishing to promote uniformity and full racial-cultural assimilation, has in essence banned any clubs or meetings that are for a specific religion, race or nationality. Again I don’t see why this should be a problem for revisionists.

Robert Faurisson was deprived of his professorship in symbolist poetry at the University of Lyon in 1991 under this law, and he appealed to the UN Human Rights Committee, on the basis of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. His appeal (Robert Faurisson v. France, 1996) was denied – on the basis that Faurisson’s statements were “of a nature as to raise or strengthen anti-Semitic feelings.”

Prosecutions brought under that Gayssot Act in the two decades it has been working have all been against one specific ethnic/racial group, viz. Gentile French males, with charges brought by one ethnic/racial group, viz. Jews; which in itself sounds rather discriminatory under the terms of this act.

1985 The German “Public Incitement” Law (with Major Revisions in 1994 and 2005)

(1) Whoever, in a manner that is capable of disturbing the public peace:

a. incites hatred against segments of the population or calls for violent or arbitrary measures against them; or

b. assaults the human dignity of others by insulting, maliciously maligning, or defaming segments of the population, shall be punished [...]

(3) Whoever publicly or in a meeting approves of, denies or belittles an act committed under the rule of National Socialism of the type indicated in Section 6 Subsection (1) of the Code of Crimes against International Law [=Acts of Genocide], in a manner capable of disturbing the public peace shall be punished [...]

(4) Whoever, publicly or in a meeting, approves of, glorifies or justifies the violent and arbitrary National Socialist rule, and by so doing disturbs the public peace in a manner that assaults the human dignity of the victims, shall be punished [...]

Strangely, this law is primarily emotional, concerning various people's alleged feelings, rather than facts. There are several kinds of untruths which a prosecution under this Act imposes upon the accused, untruths concerning  motive  and  identity . I therefore suggest the accused needs to feel their own innocence, feel whatever heart-purity they can summon, upon walking into the Court, and maybe say to themselves the words of Jimi Hendrix: "I am who I am, thank God." German courts have no jury and so the judge will be the final authority for whatever calumny the court casts upon the revisionist.

The worst course of action for the revisionist is to attempt to defend the truth of whatever they have said: propounding such historical-factual issues is likely to be viewed by the Court as compounding the offense – and providing grounds for further charges!

Against the accusation of "inciting hatred against sections of the population [...] in a manner that is capable of disturbing the public peace," witnesses have been summoned to testify that the views expressed have not disturbed nor are they capable of disturbing the public peace, but in vain – these have not been allowed, or have been disregarded. It should however be no business of the accused to summon such witnesses because citizens should be presumed innocent until proved guilty, not the other way round – the onus should lie upon the prosecution to demonstrate the impossibly vague notion of "capable of disturbing the public peace." Every one of us knows what disturbs the "public peace" – guns, loud noises, unruly crowds, people with megaphones etc. Nobody can disturb the public peace by writing a book. In vain an author may dream or hope of disturbing the public peace by writing a book, but it's not going to happen!

The mere testimony of the prosecution cannot here suffice as regards what might possibly disturb the public peace.

Whoever "assaults the human dignity of others by insulting, maliciously maligning, or defaming segments of the population" is here liable to imprisonment. It is the normal business of comedians to do this; indeed it could be hard to ply that trade, if this crime-category is insisted upon. A crime should involve  unacceptable  harm or loss and not just a  feeling  that someone has been insulted.

The third section ("Whoever publicly or in a meeting approves of, denies or belittles an act committed under the rule of National Socialism...") is hardly relevant, because revisionists are not known for proclaiming their views at public meetings. Publishing a book is a public act and so could here be alluded to. The last book to appear "in a manner capable of disturbing the public peace" was arguably Karl Marx's  Communist Manifesto  of 1848.

The accused may tell the Court that persons disturbing the public peace generally do not read books, that pamphlets and flyers rather than books have disturbed the public peace, and that, if they wish to prosecute on such grounds, the onus lies on them to explain why the millions of books published since Marx's Communist Manifesto have failed to cause any such disturbance. The whole idea of this clause is inherently absurd as applied to revisionists. The accused should tell the Court that this clause might have been relevant to a previous generation who grew up in the aftermath of the War, but applied to modern truth-seeker historians is simply absurd.

The slur or untruth is here cast against the revisionist, that their motive in ascertaining historical truth is political, namely that they are covert neo-Nazis. The Court is here lying through its teeth and knows it. The accused should use polite and respectful language, e.g. state that, in the past, German courts have deceitfully sought to ban inquiry into World War II historical truth by pretending that it was motivated by pro-Hitler loyalty or anti-Jewish feeling, and he trusts that the present court will not likewise err. If the aim is to criminalize anyone who "approves of, denies or belittles an act committed under the rule of National Socialism," then clearly historical investigation must be permitted into what those acts were. Otherwise, how can the Court know whom to punish? Judges are not trained to be historians, as historians are not trained as judges.

Implicit in this encounter is the judge's presumption that his career depends upon his accepting the good-versus-evil victor's narrative laid down at Nuremberg, so that anyone who tries to re-tell the German history must therefore be a wicked Nazi. The revisionist in the dock has to affirm that he or she is the historian, is the only historian present in the Court, and is therefore competent to advise the Court about "an act committed under the rule of National Socialism" in relation to genocide, as this Volksverhetzung law specifies.<sup>[8]</sup> An act not subsumed under said rule cannot be of relevance to the Court, can it?

The fourth section is more of the same: "whoever, publicly or in a meeting, approves of, glorifies or justifies the violent and arbitrary National Socialist rule, and by so doing disturbs the public peace in a manner that assaults the human dignity of the victims" – again this cannot logically be applicable, because, as we have seen, a book published can hardly disturb the peace, and other private statements by revisionists likewise will not do so. Witnesses need to be called by the prosecution to demonstrate that any such approval or "glorification" has publicly taken place.

The definition of revisionism by Faurisson should be given to the Court, whereby it is not a political program but "a quest for historical exactitude." The accused needs to believe he or she is harmless. Only that can negate the various afactual categories tied up in this nefarious law. The Court should be told how only a quest for historical truth in World War II can properly share out blame and responsibility and thereby dissolve the hate images. It is not or should not be the business of the historian to endorse a Manichaeic dualism, a cosmic good-versus-evil struggle, found within the historical process – as is implied by this Act.

The first section of this Act will work better under a mirror-reversal, whereby it is promoters of the Holocaust mythology who are continually inciting "hatred against segments of the population" and who are assaulting "the human dignity of others," in a manner prohibited under this Act, whereby a "segment of the population" is made to suffer continually for something that should be relegated to the past. (The "segment" here comprises the remaining but diminishing older generation who fought in the War.) The public peace is very much disturbed by the inquisitors who check through personal libraries for books to be banned and burnt, and who monitor e-mails.

It is probably best to avoid using the J-word, but if it is insisted upon, one could point out that there were various social groups in the German labor-camps: gypsies, Poles and Russians as well as Jews, and that the story of what happened does not belong exclusively to any one of them.

In summary I suggest it is not this law as such which puts the revisionist behind bars, but rather its misuse through unfair and untrue indictments and judgments.

---

Notes:

[1]	Handyside v. UK , 1976.
[2]	Genocide Denials and the Law , L. Hennebel & T. Hochman, Oxford University Press 2011.
[3]	UN Report of the Human Rights Committee CCPR Centre 2011 : para 49 of a section “International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights,” p. 257.
[4]	Dr. Fredrick Töben, “Human Rights, the Holocaust-Shoah and Historical Truth,” The Barnes Review Blog , 15 April 2012, here starting at Section “9. Human Rights, the United Nations, and Free Expression” (online).
[5]	Genocide Denials and the Law , Ed. L. Hennebel and T Hochmann, 2011.
[6]	Online: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Crimes_against_humanity
[7]	These three categories have been more recently re-stated in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court of 2002.
[8]	Online: http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Volksverhetzung

Obsolete Opinion, or Forgetting Yesterday's Future

by Jett Rucker

One of my favorite things about b&bs is the books one finds in the great majority of them. These books aren't today's best-sellers; they might not even have been best sellers in their own day. Like books in general, most of them are rubbish, and/or, being fiction, are of little interest to me. But some of the books are non-fiction, and many of them, in turn, concern history. As I said, these books may never have commanded much notice in their own day, but it remains that each of them was at least important enough to its author to take the trouble to write it, and further that each of them was promising enough to its publisher to merit the not-inconsiderable effort of publishing them. So there is a bare minimum of note that can be ascribed to even the most-obscure of these, and others may have commanded a great deal of credence despite being themselves, as they say, "in the dustbin of history"—or relegated to the dusty shelves of b&bs that may indeed have purchased them by the yard for mere decoration.

I was stunned, for example, to read an account in Larner's World History's chapter on Austria-Hungary that Emperor Franz-Joseph of Austria had just sustained the third sudden loss of a family member to death by gunshot: the heir to his throne Archduke Ferdinand, assassinated in Sarajevo while on a state visit. Since he had lost his wife, the Empress Elisabeth, to an assassin in 1898, and his son Crown Prince Rudolf in 1889 in a suicide, this account primarily sympathized with the presumably lonely old emperor in Vienna, the while not bothering to belabor the longer-term implications even on the succession to the Austro-Hungarian throne.

Wait a minute! I shouted in my head. What about World War I and all that? Hadn't the tragic assassination started World War I? What kind of history was this? I leafed quickly to the book's front matter (it was in fact one of five volumes, so limitation of space wasn't an explanation) and found my answer: the year of publication was 1914. Our historian was, after all, not a fortune-teller; he thought the Sarajevo incident was most unfortunate for Franz-Joseph, and that was about all that occurred to him by press time. Today, of course, we all "know" that the event sparked a chain of events that became something first called the Great War, and later became the first in a woeful numbered series that presently stands at Two.

Gavrilo Princip was a Bosnian Serb who assassinated Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria and his wife, Sophie, Duchess of Hohenberg, in Sarajevo on 28 June 1914. His act resulted in events that left over 17 million dead. Work is in Public Domain via Wikimedia Commons.

Unlike many historical cause-and-effect sequences, the one linking Gavrilo Princip's murderous 1914 deed to the fall of the Russian, German and Austro-Hungarian empires seems little contested even from the time of its first description, no doubt well before the end of the conflict itself in 1918. In its broad outlines it is, if not outright obvious, at least unambiguous and easily described in plausible detail. So, mightn't we have expected Historian Lerner to have had, and voiced, some premonition at least as to the possible catastrophic consequences of Sarajevo? Well, he didn't, and I have no reason, from reading the rest of his work, to feel he is in any way inferior to the general run of historians, then or now. Rather the contrary, in fact—his hindsight, never a thing to belittle the value of—seemed to be superior not only to the historiography of his day, but in many ways to today's renditions of many of the same subjects.

Everyone contemplating things done in the past is hampered by knowledge—accurate and otherwise—of things that were done since, even in the same places and/or by the same people, and the “arrow of time,” as it is called, can get reversed after enough hours of contemplation of ancient causes and effects, perceptions and motivations, superstitions and fears, and inspirations and hopes. One regularly encounters phrases in careless—or deceitful—writing such as “with World War II looming less than a month away.”

What World War II? Like what has been called World War I for my entire life (of seventy years), World War II didn't even acquire its name (and number) until almost three years after the date it is now said to have begun in Europe. Even calling that unpleasant interlude "World War II" is revisionist; it was no such thing before December 1941. And the Great War didn't get its number until that late time.

All history is revisionism, and all revisionism is a relentless search for Clio's prize, context. And context, most-obviously, and most-easily overlooked, does not include knowledge or even, typically, fear of events later seen to have occurred in the time since the events being studied. It is, of course, often the subsequent events that inspire interest in the subject events in the first place. The shooting of Archduke Ferdinand would remain a footnote in Lerner's History but for subsequent events that have, apparently to everyone's satisfaction, been firmly connected to the shooting. But Princip, and Ferdinand, and Lerner, and most of the rest of those aware of the incident in the first place, knew not one iota of the vast and horrible history we now all command of World War I.

Putting all that out of your mind when contemplating what happened in Sarajevo in 1914 is nonetheless utterly essential for evaluating the things that did happen later, both in consequence and having their origins other places entirely, such as the trade rivalries between Germany and Great Britain, or the ambitions of the young First Sea Lord Winston Churchill. Yet it is practically superhuman to be able to do so. Sitting in a b&b and stumbling across Lerner's blinkered account of the Austrian royal family's misfortunes is the sort of shot between the eyes that can bring one up, at least momentarily, face-to-face with both the importance of forgetting yesterday's future and the impossibility of ever succeeding in doing so.

One thing that might spur one's efforts to better perform the insuperable task is the awareness that most historical "connections" are in fact reverse-engineered speculations inspired not only by the historian's predilections and limitations of data but further and often more-forcefully, by what the historian may sense—consciously or not—would best advance his career in the great imbroglio of prejudice, ignorance and fear in which ultimately his conclusions will be received. Historians and others voicing unpopular conclusions have in the past lost far more than "just" their jobs and their families.

An intrepid Israeli blogger named Rafi Farber recently aired his well-founded musings to the effect that the war waged against Germany from 1939 to 1945 to a great extent actually caused what now is described in six million different ways as "the Holocaust." Farber's country is one of many in which "Holocaust denial" is a crime; that some zealot would charge him with that crime for his proposition lies well within my imagination. His "armor" against such attacks includes not only that he is an observant Jew who made aliyah from the United States, but further that he does not claim to be a historian and accordingly is not subject to the institutional pressures that bear on virtually every historian in the world who enjoys the advantage of drawing a salary.

But Farber's vital insight, long widely accepted to at least some degree by revisionists who have considered the events in question, relies on yet another shibboleth that lies even outside Clio's legendary trove of historical treasures: counterfact—the construction of answers to the question, "What if not?" Without counterfact, unconsciously assumed or carefully assembled, causation is impossible to infer. Farber's spectacular (in view of where he aired it from and who he is) feat entailed a scrupulous analysis of things that did not happen: what if Britain and France had not declared war on Germany when Germany's Wehrmacht took back from Poland, lands in which numerous Germans had lived for many centuries? Obviously, there is no way surely to know these things, and such a truism might deter people from believing that one can know and fully understand things that really did happen.

Well, such uncertainties are no deterrent at all to historians who understand that, even in those rare cases where it is fully understood what really did happen, what remains unknowable still (who did it, why did they do it, what else was done, and by whom?) is so extensive and profound that no more certainty actually inheres in “the past” than might inhere in the non-past.

History (i.e., revisionism) is no hobby for the intellectually faint-hearted. Without bold, even daring, imagination, the entire subject disintegrates into the dry dust that we all rightly paid no attention to in school, and have quite forgotten to our everlasting benefit. It isn't easy, it isn't simple, it usually isn't pretty, and it can be quite dangerous.

And it isn't even really fun. It's much, much better than that.

Religion, Mysticism and the Myth of the "Occult Reich"

by Kerry R. Bolton

- Periodicals
- English
- Inconvenient History
- Vol. 7 \(2015\)
- No. 4

---

This document is part of the Inconvenient History periodical.
Use this menu to find more documents that are part of this periodical.

There's nothing quite like the sensationalism of combining Nazism with black magic to ensure attention for an author. Since Hitler's National Socialism has been regarded as "the ultimate in evil," linking Hitlerism with black magic and Satanism is a logical development. It could be contended that the sensationalism of the dime novel, pop history, and Hollywood in portraying Hitler as having sold his soul to Mephistopheles, Faustus-style, is a piece of historical grotesquerie for which supposedly serious scholars must be ultimately held responsible.

Much of this can be traced to a piece of wartime propaganda, Hitler Speaks, by Hermann Rauschning, who claimed to be one of Hitler's "inner circle." In this book there are many references to Hitler's dealing with black magic and dark powers, and to the presence of an early NSDAP member, Marthe Kuntzel, who was also both a theosophist and a leading German follower of the British occultist Aleister Crowley.<sup>[1]</sup> Rauschning was taken seriously by historians until quite recently. Mark Weber writes that in 1983 a Swiss historian exposed the hoax:

Haenel was able to conclusively establish that Rauschning's claim to have met with Hitler "more than a hundred times" is a lie. The two actually met only four times, and never alone. The words attributed to Hitler, he showed, were simply invented or lifted from many different sources, including writings by Juenger and Friedrich Nietzsche. An account of Hitler hearing voices, waking at night with convulsive shrieks and pointing in terror at an empty corner while shouting "There, there, in the corner!" was taken from a short story by French writer Guy de Maupassant.<sup>[2]</sup>

Hence, the proliferation of pop-history works trying to prove a link between the Third Reich and the occult, such as The Morning of the Magicians,<sup>[3]</sup> The Occult Reich,<sup>[4]</sup> Satan and Swastika,<sup>[5]</sup> and The Spear of Destiny.<sup>[6]</sup> One can generally make any allegations about "Nazism," "Fascism" or the "Right" without being challenged. Entertainment has also increasingly drawn on this imaginative pop-history in television series such as "True Blood"<sup>[7]</sup>, where the German post-war underground, the "Werwolves,"<sup>[8]</sup> are depicted as being actual lycanthropes. There is also something of a self-fulfilling prophesy about it insofar as there have been post-war attempts to portray National Socialism and the Third Reich as manifestations of some type of occult force.<sup>[9]</sup> Included in this is the more sober attempt by the Chilean diplomat Miguel Serrano, whose "esoteric Hitlerism" included the worship of Lucifer, as a god of light, and of Shiva as the equivalent of Wotan,<sup>[10]</sup> and of the "esoteric Hitlerism" of the Greek convert to

Hinduism, Savitri Devi.[\[11\]](#) Somewhat comic-opera attempts at a Nazi-Gothic-Satanist synthesis focus mainly on Radio Werewolf/Werewolf Order and elements of the Church of Satan, on the assumption that National Socialism and Satanism share a common doctrine of misanthropy and elitism.[\[12\]](#)

One of the few scholarly efforts to trace connections between the occult and the National Socialist party is the late Dr. Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke's Occult Roots of Nazism.[\[13\]](#) Goodrick-Clarke, while establishing a very indirect link between pre-World War I "Ariosophy" and the National Socialist party, rejects the exaggerations that have linked Ariosophy, the Thule Society, the Vril Society, et al to the rise of Hitler. For example he states that Dietrich Eckart, Hitler's early mentor, and Alfred Rosenberg, were "never more than guests of Thule during its heyday," while the geopolitical theorist Karl Haushofer, did not have any link to the society, despite much fantasy being woven around these individuals and their alleged occult links.[\[14\]](#) The influence of Lanz von Liebenfels and his Ordo Novi Templi in pre-World War I Austro-Hungary on the young Hitler and subsequently on the Third Reich is also put into context, Goodrick-Clarke pointing out that the Order was dissolved by the Nazis and Lanz was prohibited from publishing with the advent of the Third Reich.[\[15\]](#)

It should be kept in mind that Hitler's views were rather prevalent in Central Europe in his youth and his ideas in Mein Kampf are not original but came from a widespread intellectual milieu, of which the Lanz movement was one manifestation.

Another was the Wotensist and runic mysticism of Guido Von List, likewise without influence on Hitler. While Rudolf von Sebottendorff, founder of the Thule Society, was influenced by both Lanz and von List, the influence of Thule on the foundation of the NSDAP has been exaggerated. Sebottendorff was gone from the scene by 1919. "There no evidence Hitler ever attended the Thule Society," states Goodrick-Clarke, "and such theorists were increasingly marginalized well before the party assumed power." Furthermore, occult societies were prohibited in the Third Reich, including those with a racial foundation.[\[16\]](#)

Reichsführer SS Heinrich Himmler (1938)

Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-R99621 / CC-BY-SA 3.0 [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Karl Maria Wiligut: The Secret King

As far as the English language goes, apart from Goodrick-Clarke's Occult Roots of Nazism, the only other credible book on the subject seems to be The Secret King: Karl Maria Wiligut: Himmler's Lord of the Runes.<sup>[17]</sup> The advantage of this book is that it is a collection of what is by-lined as "the real documents of Nazi occultism," and lets those documents largely speak for themselves.

Michael Moynihan, the editor, in the preface comments:

A veritable cottage industry exists for lurid books on “Nazi Occultism,” but few people have had the opportunity to assess real source documents of this nature – and it is clear that most of the authors of the pulp histories certainly made no effort to do so!

Along with the fantastical tales of Nazis and the Occult, claims are often made regarding the “pagan” agenda of the Third Reich, especially in regard to Himmler’s SS organization. If one investigates the writings of prominent National Socialist ideologues such as Alfred Rosenberg, however, a far more ambiguous picture emerges of the state-sanctioned religiosity of the time.<sup>[18]</sup>

Moynihan alludes to the neo-pagan festivals of the SS compiled into a book by Friz Weitzl in 1939, Die Gestaltung der Feste im Jahres- und Lebenslauf in der SS-Familie (The Structuring of Festivals during the Year and Life of the SS-Family).<sup>[19]</sup> Moynihan states that this was issued as a small print run and can therefore be assumed to have reflected the view of a “minority” within the SS.<sup>[20]</sup>

Himmler was one of those who promoted a neo-pagan outlook. Under his patronage the most enduring occult influence on an aspect of the Third Reich was Karl Maria Wiligut, the runic mystic who advised Himmler on the redesign of Wewelsburg Castle as the SS “center of the world.”<sup>[21]</sup> If Wiligut had a certain influence within the SS, he was also met with influential opposition, meaning that the SS, like all other departments and divisions of the NSDAP and the Third Reich administration, were not as monolithic as popularly supposed. Wiligut and other esoteric runologists were opposed in particular by the Ahnenerbe, a scholarly research division of the SS,<sup>[22]</sup> itself often the center of pop-history fantasies about occultism.

Dr. Stephen Flowers provides an introductory biography on Wiligut without ideologically driven interpretations. Born in 1866, Wiligut wrote his first book, Seyfrieds Runen in 1903 when he was a captain in the Austrian army. The book is an epic poem on the legend of King Seyfried of Rabenstein. In 1908 Wiligut wrote “The Nine Commandments of Gôt’ for the first time since the book-burnings of Ludwig the Pious.” He was also at the time associated with several initiates of Lanz von Liebenfels’ Ordo Novi Templi. However Wiligut’s active interest in the occult can be traced to 1889 when he joined what Flowers calls the “quasi-Masonic lodge” Schlarraffia, which did not have a völkische connection. Wiligut resigned from the lodge in 1909, perhaps as a result of the rivalry existing between Masonry and the völkische occult.<sup>[23]</sup>

This was a time when there was much interest in the occult revival in Europe and Britain. The Theosophical Society was founded during the 1870s, with the catchcry of “universal brotherhood,”<sup>[24]</sup> despite the way its doctrine on “root traces” has been claimed as an inspiration for National Socialist and other völkische movements. The neo-Rosicrucian “Order of the Golden Dawn” in Britain was an influential organization in the occult revival that included W.B. Yeats and his antagonist Aleister Crowley. The Ordo Templi Orientis was founded in Germany by Theodor Reuss, who appeared to have been a German intelligence agent, and reached England, where Aleister Crowley, who appears to have been a British intelligence operative when in the USA,<sup>[25]</sup> had assumed leadership. There was also Fraternis Saturni, which followed Crowley’s religion of “Thelema” without following Crowley the person, whose doctrine Flowers has also documented.<sup>[26]</sup> Guido von List’s rune-mysticism in Austria was an important element in the völkische movement, and was allied with Von Liebenfels. There is no evidence that Hitler had any association with any of these orders beyond reading von Liebenfels’s journal Ostara, the focus of which was a dualistic battle between the Satanic Jews and the Godly Aryans.<sup>[27]</sup>

Wiligut, serving on the Russian front with distinction during World War I, rose to the rank of colonel. With his retirement from the army, he was cultivated for support by the New Templars. Von Liebenfels's agent, Theodor Czepl, reported that Wiligut considered himself the "secret King of Germany," from a family tradition as heir of the Ueiskuning, or "holy clan." He believed that the Bible had originated in Germany and had been intentionally distorted. Wiligut gave to Czepl a poem entitled Deutscher Gottes-glaube ("German Faith in God"), which was said to contain the "whole essence and doctrine of Irminic Christianity."<sup>[28]</sup> In the 1920s Wiligut edited a journal, Der eiserne Besen ("The Iron Broom") attacking Jews, Freemasons and Catholics.<sup>[29]</sup> In 1924, with hard times and strain between himself and his wife after the death of their infant son, Wiligut was forcibly taken by ambulance to an insane asylum while sitting at a cafe with friends, having been committed by his wife. Interestingly, after a year, his continued confinement was noted by the asylum authorities as being due to his religious ideas, and his tracing his descent back to Wodan. (It seems however that he merely claimed descent from a chieftain named Wodan). He was nonetheless able to maintain contact with friends in the New Templars and the Edda Society.<sup>[30]</sup> Wiligut's religious beliefs were not that out of kilter with large sections of Austrian and German society at the time, including those of many prominent individuals, as Goodrick-Clarke shows.

In 1932 Frieda Dorenberg, a member of the German Workers' Party prior to Hitler and a member of the Edda Society, visited Wiligut. She and other Edda members "smuggled" Wiligut into Munich, where he taught for an esoteric group, Free Sons of the North and Baltic Seas, and under the pseudonym Jarl Widar, wrote for the journal Hagal. Wiligut's friend Richard Anders, a member of the SS, introduced him to Himmler in 1933, at a conference of the Nordic Society, after the assumption of Hitler to government.<sup>[31]</sup> Flowers does not mention any other association between Wiligut and the NSDAP prior to this and the Dorenberg association. In September 1933 Wiligut joined the SS under the name Karl Maria Wiligut-Weisthor. In November he was appointed head of the Department for Pre- and Early History at the Reich Office for Race and Settlement. In 1934 he was promoted to colonel in the Allgemeine SS. Flowers states that Wiligut worked as Himmler's personal adviser, and was not part of the Ahnenerbe (concerned with the study of ancient and ancestral history).<sup>[32]</sup> It might here be surmised that this was because Wiligut's studies were intuitive (or imaginary) and those of the Ahnenerbe empirical, or what Flowers calls "more objective academic standards." Wiligut's contributions to Himmler included the conceptualization of Wewelsburg Castle, where a chivalric order of SS elite would be founded as the "center of the world;" the designs for the SS Totenkopfring; formulation of SS ceremonies; design of ceremonial objects such as a wedding bowl, and reports on history and cosmology for Himmler.<sup>[33]</sup>

Karl Maria Wiligut was inducted into the SS (under the pseudonym "Karl Maria Weisthor") to head a Department for Pre- and Early History which was created for him within the SS Race and Settlement Main Office (RuSHA).

Photo is in Public Domain.

One of the most important aspects of Wiligut's work, states Flowers, was his composition of a series of mantras (Halgarita-Sayings) designed to open the ancestral, astral memory.<sup>[34]</sup> The efficacy of such things from an esoteric point of view is to use the conscious to evoke the unconscious memory, and beyond this, the astral or collective memory. The imagery and ideas that flow forth into the conscious beyond with such techniques would then be used to reconstruct the "Irminist" faith. Whatever one thinks of such matters, they had their counterpart not just in esoterica, but also in Jungian analytical psychology. The Jungians developed a counterpart with the concept of "active imagination," whereby one meditates on a single dream image, and allows associated images to arise spontaneously. The Jungians are also in accord with the esotericists in stating that the individual mind can tap into the collective unconscious, and here Jungians also referred to the "racial memory." It is not surprising then that Jung's "Aryan psychology" as distinct from Jewish versions such as that of Freud in particular, attracted German race-mystics. In particular there was an association between Jungianism and the German Faith Movement.<sup>[35]</sup> Jung believed that Hitler was the embodiment of Wotan as an archetype and that National Socialism unleashed the repressed atavism of the Germanic folk that had been repressed near the surface of civilization by Christianity. Jungian psychology contends that repressed traits will re-emerge somehow, and that the longer they are pent up, the more violently they will burst forth like a torrent through a broken dam. Jung hoped that Hitlerism could release the repressed atavisms in an orderly rather than in a destructive manner. That is the theme of his famous 1936 essay on "Wotan" that got him into so much trouble. Jung regarded the neo-heathen "German Faith Movement" as a preferable religion to a Germanized Christianity.<sup>[36]</sup>

Among the colleagues of Wiligut was Otto Rahn, around whom there has been much mythologizing due to his esoteric expeditions ranging from southern France to Iceland. In particular it is because Rahn was a "Luciferian," insofar as he believed that Lucifer, the "Light-Bringer" was a good spirit in opposition to the Jewish God Jehovah. His main book was entitled Lucifer's Retinue: A Journey to the Good Spirits of Europe.<sup>[37]</sup> Not surprisingly, such a topic provides plenty of scope for writers of pop-history in attempting to portray the Third Reich as a “satanic” conspiracy or as evoking “satanic” forces. However it is a Gnostic heresy rather than Satanism, such heresies regarding Jehovah as “Satan” and Lucifer not as Satan but as an enlightened antagonist. One can see something of the doctrine in the Anthroposophy of Rudolf Steiner, whose rather positive movement was unfortunately also banned in the Third Reich, despite Steiner’s antagonism to the same Masonic secret societies as the National Socialists.[\[38\]](#) These heresies provided a fanciful basis for post-war Hitlerites such as the Chilean diplomat Miguel Serrano to develop a cosmological view of National Socialism that is “Luciferian” and Gnostic.[\[39\]](#)

While those eager to see an occult influence, whether for good or evil, within the Third Reich, and in particular the SS, have uncommonly reliable information to draw from in The Secret King, Flowers also points out that Wiligut had important enemies within the SS, and in particular within the scholarly Ahnenerbe. Himmler’s chief of staff, Karl Wolff, dissolved Wiligut’s department, and he retired into oblivion in 1939. He died in 1946.[\[40\]](#)

Flowers explains that Wiligut’s theology was not “Wotanism,” but what he regarded as the original religion of the Germanics, “Irmin-Kristianity.” This is similar to the theology of the most well known of the Austro-German runologists of the time, Guido von List, who also believed that “Armanism” predated the more exotic Wuotanism.” However List saw Armanism and Wuotanism as working in historical tandem, whereas Wiligut regarded Irminism and Wotanism as being engaged in an “ancestral feud.” Flowers writes that this attempt to Aryanize Christianity was quite popular among National Socialists.[\[41\]](#) However, that is not to say that Wiligut was the primary or most influential proponent of Germanic Christianity. Indeed, as Steigmann-Gall points out in The Holy Reich, a Germanic Christianity was the primary religious influence among the National Socialists from the start of the NSDAP,[\[42\]](#) not paganism, luciferianism, thelema, theosophy, or satanism. Indeed, such Orders were banned in the Third Reich as inimical to National Socialism of which the fight against Freemasonry was an aspect.

[

The Black Sun floor ornament in "Obergruppenfuhrer hall" of Wewelsburg in Buren. The term Black Sun (Schwarze Sonne), also referred to as the Sun Wheel (Sonnenrad), is a symbol of esoteric and occult significance.

By Schwarze_sonne.jpg: Sunnydog derivative work: Saibo (Δ) (Schwarze_sonne.jpg) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Flowers concludes that Wiligut is the most important person in trying to establish a link between the esoteric and National Socialism. However, Flowers also states that similarities between occultists and National Socialists are more ascribable to them both being part of the same "common cultural matrix and were part of the same Zeitgeist."<sup>[43]</sup> Wiligut had an enduring influence primarily as the designer of the SS death's-head ring, SS rituals and aspects of Wewelsburg castle as Himmler's visualised center of a Germanic world empire. It depends as to whether one regards the influence in these matters as of notable significance. The value of most of The Secret King is the translation of Wiligut's texts. The first is "The Nine Commandments of Gôt," explaining Wiligut's fundamental cosmology that Gôt is a "dyad" of spirit and matter, acting as a triad of Spirit, Energy and Matter in his "circulating current." Gôt is eternal, is "cause and effect," out of which flows "right, might, duty and happiness," eternally generating through matter, energy and light; "beyond concepts of good and evil," carrying the "seven epochs" of human history.<sup>[44]</sup> Much of the rest of the Wiligut documents are esoteric explanations of the runes, the evolution of the races and cosmic cycles.

Third Reich and the Occult

At a very fundamental level, much of the occult revival of the latter part of the 19th century were emanations of Freemasonry. These are universalistic and therefore antithetical to the Right. To make the situation more ambiguous, however, not all esoteric bodies emanating from Freemasonry are universalistic, and indeed some such as Crowley's Thelema, are conservative.[45] Crowley was critical towards the Theosophical Society for example, and scathing of its attempt to foist an Indian "messiah," Krishnamurti, on the world, calling on whites to unite against this travesty in imperialistic terms typical of the times.[46] However, Thelema fared no better under National Socialism than other occult societies.

Much has been made by some authors of an early NSDAP member, Marthe Kuntzel being a leading Thelemite in Germany. Kuntzel had indeed sought to convert Hitler, on the basis that Crowley had said that any state that adopts Thelema will master the world. Even Francis King, writing on "Nazi occultism," rejects the idea that Kuntzel or Crowley had any influence on Hitler.[47]

It is convincingly stated that Crowley served British interests in the USA during World War I, and worked with British Intelligence during World War II.[48] With the looming advent of Hitler to office, Crowley quickly left Berlin.[49] Karl Germer, the OTO head in Germany, was arrested by the Gestapo in 1935 for disseminating the teachings of "High grade Freemason Crowley,"[50] and ended up in the USA. In 1937 all Masonic and quasi-Masonic associations were banned, including the völkisch followers of von List and Liebenfels.[51]

In May 1939 Crowley wrote to Kuntzel stating that Germans were well below Jews, and stood on the same level vis-à-vis monkeys to men, although he did not wish to insult monkeys. He ended: "the Hun will be wiped out." [52] Crowley had worked with German propagandists, in particular the literary figure George Viereck in the USA during World War I for British Intelligence,[53] and was keen to offer his services against Hitler, especially since Hitler had not shown any interest in Thelema despite the efforts of Kuntzel. Crowley had also worked for Britain's Special Branch in Berlin reporting on Communists. He worked on British propaganda during World War II, and is credited with the famous "V" for Victory sign, an occult symbol waved about merrily by Churchill et al.[54]

Christian Heresies

Professor James B. Whisker found an altogether different inspiration for elements in the Third Reich, Gnostic Christian heresies. In his Philosophy of Alfred Rosenberg, subtitled "Origins of the National Socialist Myth," Whisker focuses on Rosenberg's interest in the Cathar heresy as the means by which Christianity could be de-Judaized of what was regarded as Jewish elements introduced by the apostle Paul. For Rosenberg however what was also required was de-Romanization. Whisker comments that both the Roman and the Jewish minds had made religion into "legal formalities," whereas for the Germanic mind none of this was required. Martin Luther, although a folk hero, had maintained a Jewish outlook through the influence of Paul.[55] There had been a growing movement during the 18th and 19th centuries among German Protestant theologians to remove the Old Testament from Christian theology, and Rosenberg maintained this legacy.[56] One of the precursors of National Socialism, Richard Wagner's English son-in-law, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, racial theorist and Germanophile already well-known in Wilhelmine Germany, was among those who expounded the notion of the "Aryan Jesus," as a Galilean, not a Jew.[57] Chamberlain was a seminal influence on Rosenberg's thinking.

Although Rosenberg's influence on Hitler and the Third Reich as the "philosopher of National Socialism," is debatable, his aim of creating a "German national religion" based on Protestantism was in accord with Hitler's aim of a unified German national church, as shown by Steigmann-Gall in The Holy Reich.

Whisker states that in gnosticism Rosenberg found a religious opposition to the Jewish god Jehovah, regarded by Gnostics as the "demiurge" who had created a corrupt world to trap humanity's spirit in the material, while the true God was remote.[58] Such sects included the Marcionites (ca. 2nd century A.D.), and for Rosenberg in particular the Cathars, aka Albigensians or Manichaeans (ca. 1000 A.D.)[59] Whisker comments that again much has been spun around the Cathars in relation to the Third Reich and in particular the SS (especially through the interests of Otto Rahn) in claiming that this was a type of Gnostic "satanism." [60] However, for their part, the Gnostics regarded Jehovah as the "devil." [61]

Dietrich Eckart – "Satanic" mentor?

Dietrich Eckart, celebrated poet and playwright since the Wilhelmine era, was the mentor of both Alfred Rosenberg and Hitler from the start of their political activism. He has been a particular focus of those who try to portray the NSDAP as driven by dark forces. According to Trevor Ravenscroft, Eckart said on his death bed that he had initiated Hitler into the "Secret Doctrine," opened his powers of astral communication and given him the means to communicate with "the Powers." Ravenscroft does not cite a reference for this quote.[62] Ravenscroft states that few suspected that this jovial bohemian was "a dedicated Satanist, the supreme adept of the arts and ritual of Black Magic and the central figure in a powerful and widespread circle of occultists – the Thule Group." [63] With Rosenberg and several White Russian émigrés Eckart was supposedly the "master of ceremonies" at seances that evoked dark spirits.[64] In a chapter discussing "The Modern Mythology of Nazi Occultism," Goodrick-Clarke shows that the legends about Eckart and the occult, and communication with dark powers, that were revived by Ravenscroft, had been previously perpetrated by Pauwels and Bergier.[65] Despite persistent claims, Goodrick-Clarke alludes to supposed Thulists such as Eckart, Hess and Rosenberg as being nothing other than "guests" of the society, which included many other political activists from a broad range of the "Right," such as the National Liberal Party.[66]

Hitler dedicated the second volume of Mein Kampf to Dietrich Eckart, and also named the arena near the Olympic Stadium in Berlin, now known as the Waldbühne (Forest Stage), the "Dietrich-Eckart-Bühne" when it was opened for the 1936 Summer Olympics.
By Karl Bauer [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Ironically Eckart, the high-ranking “Satanic adept,” based his world-view on a heroic interpretation of Jesus and Germany’s Christian world mission. In an essay Bolshevism from Moses to Lenin, published posthumously in 1923, Luther is criticized for his having been influenced by Jews in his interpretation of the Old Testament and its importance in Lutheran theology.<sup>[67]</sup> Christ was never anything other than frank with Jews, taking up the theme of Houston Stewart Chamberlain et al that Jesus was a Galilean, “from the land of the gentiles.”<sup>[68]</sup> Jesus was not tolerant towards the Jews, striking them with His whip and sharply condemning the Pharisees (the rabbinic of his day) as nothing less than the sons of the devil. The NSDAP was “defending the Christian foundations of our nation without mental reservations... But we want Germanism, we want genuine Christianity, we want order and propriety...”<sup>[69]</sup> It was Paul who had distorted Christianity and brought it to the Gentiles as a subversive, weakening influence.<sup>[70]</sup> These are themes that had become increasingly widespread among German theologians and scholars during the 19th century.

Written as a dialogue between Eckart and Hitler, Bolshevism from Moses to Lenin refers to Hitler and himself as both being Catholics, and it is because they were that they must speak out against the Judaic spirit that infects their Church. There remained an incorruptible Catholic faith, whatever the corrupt influences that might hold sway in the Church at times. Giordano Bruno, burned at the stake, was one of those who had spoken out against Jewish influence, calling the Jews a “pestilential, leprosy and publicly dangerous race.” Of the many critics of the Church in Italy at the time, why was Bruno singled out for death? Hitler responds to Eckart in this dialogue: “Rome will pull herself together, but only if we pull ourselves together first. And one day it can be said that the Church is whole again.” Eckart retorts that this will happen when the Jewish influences, which have set Christians against each other, have been purged from the Christian community. As for Protestantism, it was more heavily infiltrated than Catholicism. Eckart saw the division of the Catholic Church by Luther as a misfortune to Christendom, and a wreaking of bloody conflict among Germanic folk while the battle against the perennial Jewish influence had been deflected. Luther should have focused on the Jews subverting Catholicism, not on attacking the Church per se.<sup>[71]</sup>

Steigmann-Gall quoted a passage from Eckart that I have been unable to find in the Pierce translation, in describing Christ as a leader to be emulated: “In Christ, the embodiment of all manliness, we find all that we need. And if we occasionally speak of Baldur, our words always contain some joy, some satisfaction, that our pagan ancestors were already so Christian as to have indications of Christ in this ideal figure.”<sup>[72]</sup> That was Eckart’s final work, and was unfinished at the time of his death. Steigmann-Gall states that Eckart’s Christianity was the basis of his worldview. He saw the world war in which he had fought in dualistic terms as a fight between “Christ and Antichrist.” The post-war conflict was one between “Germandom and Jewry,” the conflict between light and darkness.<sup>[73]</sup>

Conclusion

Whatever might be alleged or repudiated regarding the murderous character of the Third Reich, Hitler’s outlook was not that of a nihilistic, satanic apocalypse. While armaments minister Albert Speer was after the war at pains to distance himself from his ex-Führer, he noted that Hitler never encouraged a nuclear program. Hitler had no intention of setting off a course of events that might engulf the world. His scientists were not able to answer the question as to whether nuclear fission could be controlled or would set up a chain reaction. “Hitler was plainly not delighted with the possibility that the earth under his rule might be transformed into a glowing star. Occasionally, however, he joked that the scientists in their unworldly urge to lay bare all the secrets under heaven might some day set the globe on fire.”<sup>[74]</sup> The attitude seems distinctly un-Faustian. There were limits, and from what Speer states, it seems that Hitler was not so hubristic as to wish to be another Faustus or Prometheus. From what Speer records of Hitler’s sentiments these can be seen as antithetical to that claimed by Rauschning for example. There was no will-to-destruction, nor a Faustian/Promethean will to deny the Gods or God.

Hitler ridiculed “superstition” but recognized the role it played on the psyche, and rejected the efficacy of prophecies and of astrology.<sup>[75]</sup> The National Socialist party, so far from being neo-heathen, as is often contended, while reviving many old Germanic customs and festivals, from the start had a wide Christian base, particularly of Lutherans, and many Lutheran pastors were officers of the SA. They held early party meetings in their parsonages. Hitler became disillusioned with the failure of the Christian denominations to unite as a German national church, however he also remained dismissive of attempts at reviving paganism.<sup>[76]</sup> The latter remained a peripheral influence within an inner core of the SS.

Himmler sought to create the SS as a neo-heathen order with its own marriage, birth and death ceremonies outside the Christian churches, and with SS officers serving as the priests.<sup>[77]</sup> The Feast of Midsummer was substituted for Christmas. However, these measures that Himmler attempted to impose were so unpopular and disregarded among the SS that by November 1940 he was obliged to abrogate previous punishments for disobeying regulations on religion. Himmler was also unsuccessful in weaning his SS away from Christianity. “Two thirds of the Allgemeine-SS remained in the Church – 54.2 percent Evangelicals and 23.7 percent Catholics.”<sup>[78]</sup>

---

Notes:

[1]	Herman Rauschning, Hitler Speaks (London: Thornton Butterworth, 1939).
[2]	Mark Weber, “Rauschning’s Phony ‘Conversations With Hitler’: An Update,” The Journal of Historical Review , Winter 1985-86, Vol. 6, No. 4, pp. 499-500. http://www.ihr.org/jhr/v06/v06p499_Weber.html
[3]	Louis Pauwels and Jacques Bergier, The Morning of the Magicians (St Albans, 1971).
[4]	J.H. Brennan, The Occult Reich (New York: Signet Books, 1974).
[5]	Francis King, Satan and Swastika (Hertfordshire: Mayflower Books, 1976).
[6]	Trevor Ravenscroft, The Spear of Destiny (Maine: Samuel Weiser, 1982).
[7]	“Operation Werewolf,” television episode, “True Blood,” 2011.
[8]	J.C. Fagnon, SS Werwolf combat instruction manual (Boulder: Paladin Press, 1982).
[9]	Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, Black Sun: Aryan Cults, Esoteric Nazism and the Politics of Identity (New York University Press, 2002).
[10]	Ibid, pp. 173-192.
[11]	Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, Hitler’s Priestess: Savitri Devi, the Hindu-Aryan Myth, and Neo-Nazism (New York: University Press, 1998).
[12]	K.R. Bolton, “Gothic Nazi: ‘Fascist’ manifestations in Neo-Gothic subculture,” T. Southgate, ed., Helios: Journal of Metaphysical and Occult Studies Vol. 1(London: Black Front Press, 2011), pp. 122-154.
[13]	Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke, The Occult Roots of Nazism (Northamptonshire: The Aquarian Press, 1985).
[14]	Ibid, pp. 220-221.
[15]	Ibid, pp. 198.
[16]	Ibid, pp. 202-203.
[17]	Stephen E. Flowers (translator), Michael Moynihan (editor), The Secret King: Karl Maria Wiligut – Himmler’s Lord of the Runes (Vermont: Dominion Press, 2001).
[18]	Ibid, “Preface.”
[19]	Ibid.
[20]	Ibid.
[21]	Ibid, pp. 22.
[22]	Ibid, pp. 32.

[23]	Ibid, pp. 16-17.
[24]	Theosophical Society, 'Objects', http://www.ts-adyar.org/content/objects
[25]	Tobias Churton, Aleister Crowley: The Biography (London: Watkins Publishing, 2011), pp. 185-215.
[26]	Flowers, Fire &amp; Ice: Magical teachings of Germany's Greatest Secret Occult Order (St. Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1990).
[27]	Goodrick-Clarke, Occult Roots , op. cit., pp. 194-195.
[28]	Flowers, Moynihan, op. cit., p. 19.
[29]	Ibid.
[30]	Ibid, p. 20.
[31]	Ibid, p. 20-21.
[32]	Ibid, p. 21.
[33]	Ibid, p. 23.
[34]	Ibid, p. 29.
[35]	Carl Jung, "Wotan," Essays on Contemporary Events (London: Kegan Paul, 1947), ch. 1; cited in Bolton, "Woden as archetype: the Carl Jung Essay," Woden: Thoughts &amp; Perspectives , Vol. 4, ed. T. Southgate (London: Black Front Press, 2011), p. 38.
[36]	Ibid.
[37]	Flowers, op. cit., p. 30.
[38]	R. Steiner, "The Work of the Secret Societies in the World," Berlin, 23 December 1904, http://wn.rsarchive.org/Lectures/19041223p02.html ; "The Ahrimanic Deception," Zurich, 27 October 1919, http://wn.rsarchive.org/Lectures/AhrDec_index.html
[39]	Miguel Serrano 1994 interview with Kerry Bolton, http://www.wermodandwermod.com/newsitems/news130120121632.html
[40]	Ibid, pp. 32-33.
[41]	Ibid, pp. 33-34.
[42]	Point 24 of the NSDAP programme, 1920, reads: "The party as such subscribes to a positive Christianity without binding itself to a specific denomination. It opposes the Jewish materialistic spirit within and around us ..."
[43]	Flowers, op. cit., p. 40.
[44]	Ibid, p. 51.
[45]	K.R. Bolton, "Aleister Crowley as a Political Theorist," Crowley: Thoughts and Perspectives , Vol. 2, Troy Southgate, editor (London: Black Front Press, 2011), pp. 5-28.
[46]	K.R. Bolton, "Thelema, Imperialism, and the 'Black Messiah': Aleister Crowley and the Conflict Between Schools of Magick 'Black' and 'White'", Helios: Journal of Metaphysical and Occult Studies , Vol. 2, Troy Southgate, editor (London: Black Front Press, 2011), pp. 40-77.

[47]	Francis King, op. cit., p. 142.
[48]	Richard Spence, "The Magus was a Spy: Aleister Crowley and the Curious Connections between Intelligence and the Occult," Melbourne, New Dawn , No. 105, November-December 2007.
[49]	Tobias Churton, Aleister Crowley: The Biography (London: Watkins Publishing, 2011), p. 354.
[50]	Ibid, p. 364.
[51]	Flowers, Fire &amp; Ice (St Paul, Minn.: Llewellyn Publications, 1990), p. 23.
[52]	Churton, p. 375.
[53]	Ibid, pp. 186-215.
[54]	Ibid, pp. 376-386.
[55]	James B. Whisker, The Philosophy of Alfred Rosenberg (Costa Mesa, California: Noontide Press, 1990), pp. 20-21.
[56]	Ibid, p. 23.
[57]	Ibid, p. 41. Chamberlain, Foundations of the Nineteenth Century Vol. 1 (London: John Lane Co., 1911), pp. 174-250.
[58]	Whisker, Ibid, p. 45.
[59]	Ibid, p. 59.
[60]	Ibid, pp. 80-81.
[61]	On Gnostic-Christian doctrines and sects see: Elaine Pagels, The Gnostic Gospels (Penguin Books, 1979).
[62]	Ravenscroft, op. cit., p. 91.
[63]	Ibid.
[64]	Ibid, p. 104.
[65]	Goodrick-Clarke, p. 220.
[66]	Ibid, p. 149.
[67]	Eckart, "Bolshevism from Moses to Lenin," translated by Dr. William Pierce, National Socialist World , Arlington, No. 2, Fall 1966, p. 27.
[68]	Ibid, p. IV.
[69]	Ibid.
[70]	Ibid, p. V.
[71]	Ibid, p. VI.
[72]	Richard Steigmann-Gall, The Holy Reich: Nazi Conceptions of Christianity 1919-1945 (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003), p. 18, citing Eckart.
[73]	Ibid, pp. 18-19.

[74]	Albert Speer, Inside the Third Reich (New York: The Macmillan Company, 1970), p. 227.
[75]	Hitler's Secret Conversations (Signet Books), 19 July 1942, pp. 544-545.
[76]	Steigmann-Gall, op. cit.
[77]	Heinz Höhne, The Order of the Death's Head (London: Martin Secker & Warburg, 1969), p. 143.
[78]	Ibid, p.144.

► Additional information about this document

The Great War Retold | CODOH

by Ralph Raico

These are boom times for histories of World War I. Like its sequel, though to a lesser degree, it seems to be the war that never ends. Works keep appearing on issues once considered settled, such as the "Belgian atrocities" and the reputation of commanders like Douglas Haig. Last year, Cambridge published a collection of 500-plus pages on one of the most exhaustively examined subjects in the whole history of historical writing, the origins of the First World War. As for general works, in the past few years at least six have appeared in English, by both academic and popular historians. The Western Front: Battle Ground and Home Front in the First World War (New York: Palgrave, Macmillan, 2003) by Hunt Tooley, who teaches at Austin College in Texas, falls into the academic category, and for such a short volume (305 pages) it offers a very great deal indeed.

Tooley traces the roots of the world-historical catastrophe of 1914—1918 to the Franco-Prussian war, which, while achieving German unification in 1871, understandably fostered an enduring resentment in France, "a country that was accustomed to humiliating others during 400 years of warmaking and aggression" (p. 5). Bismarck sought to ensure the Second Reich's security through defensive treaties with the remaining continental powers (the ones with Austria-Hungary and Italy constituted the Triple Alliance). But under the new (and last) kaiser, Wilhelm II, the treaty with Russia was permitted to lapse, freeing Russia to ally with France. The over-ambitious Wilhelm's extensive naval program was perceived by the British as a mortal threat; starting in 1904 they developed an entente cordiale (cordial understanding) with France, enlarged in 1907 to include Russia. Now the Germans had good reason to fear a massive Einkreisung (encirclement).

A series of diplomatic crises increased tensions, aggravated by the two Balkan wars of 1912—1913, from which a strong Serbia emerged, evidently aiming at the disintegration of the Habsburg monarchy. With Russia acting as Serbia's mentor and growing in power every year, military men in Vienna and Berlin reflected that if the great conflict was destined to come, then better sooner than later.

Tooley lays out this background clearly and faultlessly, but he points out that the period preceding the war was by no means one of unalloyed hostility among the European nations. Cooperation was also apparent, formally, through the Hague agreements of 1899 and 1907, encouraging arbitration of disputes and the amelioration of warfare, and, more important, through the vast informal network of international commerce, undergirded by what he calls the "unique advantage" (p. 8) of the international gold standard. It was a time of remarkable prosperity and rising living standards, which, one might add, provoked the revisionist crisis in Marxist thought. Offsetting these gains were the steady growth of state apparatuses and the rise of protectionism and neomercantilism, providing a pretext for colonial expansion. In turn, the quest for colonies and spheres of influence fueled the spirit of militant rivalry among the powers.

Tooley deals deftly with the intellectual and cultural currents of pre-war Europe. Contributing to the proneness to violence were a bastardized Nietzscheanism and the anarchosyndicalism of Georges Sorel, but most of all Social Darwinism — really, just Darwinism — which taught the eternal conflict among the races and tribes of the human as of other species. The press and popular fiction, especially "boys' fiction," glorified the derring-do of war, while avoiding any graphic, off-putting descriptions, much as the American media do today.

French soldiers of the 87th Regiment, 6th Division, at Côte 304, (Hill 304), northwest of Verdun, 1916.

Public Domain, via Wikimedia Commons

Archduke Franz Ferdinand's assassination in Sarajevo by a Bosnian Serb set "the stone rolling down the hill," as the German chancellor bleakly put it. Mobilizations and ultimatums followed, and a few days later the giant conscript armies of the continental powers were in motion.

In democratic Britain, the commitment to France had been hidden from the public, from Parliament, and even from most of the cabinet. The German declaration of war on Russia and France placed the Asquith government in a grave quandary, but, as Tooley writes, "the first German footfall in Belgium salvaged the situation" (p. 39). Now Foreign Secretary Edward Grey could deceitfully claim that England was joining its entente partners simply to defend Belgian neutrality.

The war was greeted as a cleansing, purifying moment, at least by the urban masses, whose enthusiasm easily outweighed the rural population's relative passivity. As Tooley states, untold millions were infused with a sense of "community"; finally they had found a purpose in their lives, "even perhaps a kind of salvation" (p. 43). Thus, back in 1914 the same dismal motivation was at work that Chris Hedges documents for more recent conflicts, in his War is a Force That Gives Us Meaning (New York: Public Affairs, 2002).

Especially ecstatic were the intellectuals, who viewed the war as a triumph of "idealism" over the selfish individualism and crass materialism of "the trading and shopkeeping spirit" (p. 43). The poet Rupert Brooke (who was to die a year later) spoke for many of them on both sides when he wrote: "Now, God be thanked Who has matched us with His hour, / And caught our youth, and wakened us from sleeping..."

Socialist parties, except in Russia and later Italy, added their eager support, as did even celebrated anarchists like Benjamin Tucker and Peter Kropotkin.

The German strategy in the event of war on two fronts, the famous Schlieffen Plan, foolishly assumed the infallibility of its execution and ignored the factors that doomed it: active Belgian resistance, the rapid Russian mobilization, and the landing of a British Expeditionary Force (those mercenaries who, as another poet, A. E. Housman, wrote, "saved the sum of things for pay"). Tooley highlights the sometimes critical role of individual character here and at other points. The vacillating German commander Helmut von Moltke botched the invasion, suffered a nervous breakdown and was demoted.

Though many battles have been billed as a turning point in history, the first battle of the Marne actually was. The German Army cracked its head against a wall of "French decadence," some twenty-five miles north of Paris. The Germans pulled back, and the ensuing consolidation of the battle lines formed the Western Front, which would not move more than a few dozen miles in either direction for the next three and a half years.

The author explains how advanced military technology — machine guns, flamethrowers, grenades, poison gas, above all, improved heavy artillery — soon began taking a toll no one could have imagined. The interplay of military hardware and evolving tactics is set forth plainly and intelligibly, even for those who, like me, had little or no previous knowledge of how armies operate in battle.

In 1916 "the butcher's bill," as Robert Graves called it, came due, at Verdun and at the Somme. Ill-educated neoconservatives who in 2002—2003 derided France as a nation of cowards seem never to have heard of Verdun, where a half million French casualties were the price of keeping the Germans at bay. On the first day of the battle of the Somme, the brainchild of Field Marshal Haig, the British lost more men than on any other single day in the history of the Empire, more than in acquiring Canada and India combined. Tooley's description of both murderous, months-long battles, as of all the major fighting on the front, is masterly.

The author states that his main theme is "the relationship between the battle front and the home fronts" (p. 1), and the dialectic between the two is sustained all through the book.

The dichotomy of a militarized Germany and a liberal West, Tooley shows, is seriously overdrawn. To be sure, the Germans pioneered and practiced "war socialism" most methodically (at the time that this book was written, in the Federal Republic, the man in charge, Walter Rathenau, was, predictably, honored as a great liberal). In Britain, France, and later the United States, proponents of centralization and planning gleefully exploited the occasion to extend state activism into every corner of the economy.

The quickly escalating costs of the war led to unprecedented taxation and a vast redistribution of wealth, basically from the middle classes to the recipients of government funds: contractors and workers in war industries, subsidized industrialists and farmers, and, most of all, financiers. The deluded patriots who purchased government war bonds were crippled by inflation, now "introduced [to] the twentieth century...as a way of life" (p. 113). Tooley cites Murray Rothbard on one of the hidden detriments of the war: it initiated the inflationary business cycle that ended in the Great Depression.

Freedom of expression was beaten down everywhere. Many readers will be familiar with the outlines of the story as regards the United States, but Tooley fills in revealing details of the national ignominy: for instance, the U. S. attorney general's imprisonment of Americans for even discussing whether conscription was unconstitutional or for recalling that Wilson had won the 1916 election on the slogan, "He kept us out of war," and groups of Boy Scouts stealing and destroying bundles of German-American newspapers that the alert lads intuited were fomenting treason and insurrection. In some countries the suppression was worse. Australia, we learn, prohibited the teaching and use of the German language, incarcerated 4,500 citizens of German descent, and expropriated and deported those broadly defined as "enemy aliens." The aggrandizement of state power in the combatant nations reached, Tooley notes, a kind of reductio ad absurdum in what was probably the war's worst result: the establishment of a terrorist totalitarian regime by the Bolsheviks in Russia.

American entry had been virtually determined in the wake of the sinking of the Lusitania, when the terminally Anglophiliac Wilson administration declared that the Germans would be held "strictly accountable" for the loss of any Americans' lives through U-boat action, even when those Americans were traveling on armed British merchant ships that carried munitions of war. Wilson's "neutrality" was, in Tooley's term, seriously "lopsided" (p. 81), since the administration declined to challenge the British over their hunger-blockade — "ruthless, inexorable" (pp. 81—82), as well as illegal by the standards of international law — which was aimed at starving the whole German civilian population into submission. British propaganda was, as always, topnotch. Its high point was the mendacious Bryce report on the "Belgian atrocities." Admittedly, the Germans had behaved brutally in Belgium (as the Russians had in the east), but it was the report's "bizarre and clinical sadism" (p. 128) that set American blood boiling, at least the blue blood of the East Coast Anglo elite. After the desperate Germans announced unrestricted submarine warfare, Wilson asked Congress for a declaration of war, not just to call Germany to account for supposed violations of U. S. rights, but to "make the world safe for democracy." How warmongering clergymen manipulated public opinion on behalf of Wilson's open-ended crusade is detailed in another recent work, Richard Gamble's excellent study, The War for Righteousness: Progressive Christianity, the Great War, and the Rise of the Messianic Nation (Wilmington, Del., ISI, 2003).

The Bolshevik coup d'état of November 1917 led to an armistice in the East, and the Germans launched their final, va-banque push on the western front. The Ludendorff offensive made some initial breakthroughs but petered out, as Erich Maria Remarque describes in the last pages of All Quiet on the Western Front, for lack of materiel and reserves. By the summer, the American expeditionary force under John G. Pershing amounted to 2 million men, many of them keen to make the whole world safe for democracy. Their Meuse-Argonne offensive, beginning in September 1918 helped to convince the Germans that the time had come for an armistice. At the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of November, the guns fell silent on the Western front.

At the Paris Conference of 1919, face to face with the seasoned and crafty politicians of the other victorious powers, Wilson, in Tooley's apt phrase, resembled "the parson showing up a high-stakes poker game" (p. 252). It was a game at which the Princeton professor was pathetically inept. Fearing a Bolshevik revolution that might engulf central Europe, "the Allies imposed as punitive a treaty as they dared upon the Germans" (p. 252). A century earlier, after the Napoleonic wars, the aristocrats at the Congress of Vienna fashioned a viable system that avoided general war for another hundred years. At Paris in 1919, the diplomats, now answerable to their democratic constituencies, set the stage for a virtually inevitable future conflict. Tooley very correctly places the word "peace," as in the Versailles "peace" treaty, in ironic quotes.

On the overall consequences of the war, the author utilizes Robert Higgs's conceptual framework in his seminal Crisis and Leviathan: Critical Episodes in the Growth of American Government (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987). In U.S. history it has been crises, most often wars, that result in a great expansion of state power. Once the crisis is over, the state and its budgets, deficits, functionaries, and regulations are cut back to more normal levels, but never to what they were before, and they go on from there. Ideology, the underlying political mentality of the people, is also permanently skewed in a state-receptive direction. As Tooley sums up: "If the twentieth century became the century of managerial control, of the prioritizing of group goals and group efficiency over the autonomies of individuals, families, and regions, then we will find in World War I the accelerator of processes which were emerging before then" (p. 267).

I have touched on some of the main features of Tooley's Book. Amazingly for such a short work, it contains a great deal more. The only fault I can find is its somewhat misleading title. The Western Front is by no means merely an account of the war in the West. In my opinion, this is the best introduction we now have to the history of the Great War altogether.

The Victories of Revisionism (Part 1)

by Robert Faurisson

- Periodicals
- English
- Inconvenient History
- Vol. 7 \(2015\)
- No. 4

Teheran, December 11, 2006

---

This document is part of the Inconvenient History periodical.
Use this menu to find more documents that are part of this periodical.

This paper is part of the series The Victories of Revisionism. Click below for the previous or next item of the series. Click on 'up' to return to the series' Table of Contents.

Professor Faurisson recently appeared in court in Paris for having participated at the Tehran Holocaust conference. Then French President Jacques Chirac, upon hearing that the gathering was taking place, made an unprecedented request to the justice system to prosecute the négationniste Faurisson. The case finally came up on June 25, 2015, only to be adjourned to June of next year. The presiding (and anonymous) female judge had recently broken with established practice by silencing Faurisson during a hearing held the previous week, also to try him under the anti-revisionism law, this time for a 93-minute online video (please see see the English-subtitled version at <https://archive.org/details/AMan-RobertFaurissonTalksWithPaulEricBlanrue>). She refused outright to let him explain why he'd said what he'd said in the recording: "I'm not interested in négationnisme." This constitutes another new twist in state repression of thought, for in his past trials he had always been allowed to offer an in-depth justification of his writings and public declarations. What follows is the paper that he presented in Tehran on December 11, 2006.— Ed.

To President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

To our prisoners of conscience Ernst Zündel, Germar Rudolf, Horst Mahler

To Arthur Butz, Fred Leuchter, Barbara Kulaszka, Ahmed Rami, Gerd Honsik, Heinz Koppe

Abstract

At the Nuremberg trial (1945-1946), a tribunal of the victors accused a defeated Germany notably

1. of having ordered and planned the physical extermination of the Jews of Europe;
2. of having, to that end, designed and used certain weapons of mass destruction, in particular those that it called "gas chambers";
3. of having, essentially with those weapons but also through other means, caused the death of six million Jews.

In support of that threefold accusation, regularly taken up over the past sixty years by all the main communications media in the West, no proof capable of standing up to examination has been produced. Professor Robert Faurisson concluded in 1980:

“The alleged Hitlerite gas chambers and the alleged genocide of the Jews form one and the same historical lie, which has permitted a gigantic political and financial swindle whose main beneficiaries are the state of Israel and international Zionism and whose main victims are the German people – but not their leaders – and the Palestinian people in their entirety.”

In 2006 he maintains that conclusion in full. In nearly sixty years, the revisionists, beginning with the Frenchmen Maurice Bardèche and Paul Rassinier, have accumulated, from the historical and scientific point of view, an impressive series of victories over their opponents. Twenty examples of such victories, running from 1951 to today, are given here.

Revisionism is not an ideology but a method inspired by the search for exactitude in matters of history. Circumstances have seen to it that revisionism is also the great intellectual adventure of the present time.

Born in 1929 of a French father and a Scottish mother, R. Faurisson taught classical letters (French, Latin, Greek) before specialising first in the analysis of modern and contemporary French literary texts and, finally, in the appraisal of texts and documents (literature, history, media). He was professor at the Sorbonne and the University of Lyon. Because of his historical revisionist stands, he was effectively forbidden from teaching. He has incurred many convictions in the law courts and has suffered ten physical assaults. In France, access to the press, radio and television is barred to him, as it is to all revisionists. Amongst his works: Écrits révisionnistes (1974-1998), in four volumes (2nd edition, LV-2027 p.).

Foreword

The present summary has as its title “The Victories of Revisionism” and not “History of Revisionism” or “Arguments of the Revisionist Case”. It deals only with victories that our opponents have had to concede to us either explicitly or implicitly. Therefore one must not expect to find here a systematic mention of revisionist authors, works or arguments. If still I had to recommend a short sample of revisionist readings, I should suggest the prime work of reference that is The Hoax of the Twentieth Century / The Case Against the Presumed Extermination of European Jewry, published by Arthur Robert Butz in 1976. The book is masterful. In the thirty years of its existence no one has attempted the least refutation, so solidly is it built; I especially recommend the 2003 edition, enhanced by five remarkable supplements. It would also be appropriate to read Fred Leuchter’s famous study, An Engineering Report on the Alleged Execution Gas Chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau and Majdanek, Poland, particularly in the gilt cover edition issued by Samisdat Publishers in Toronto in 1988, containing, on page 42, the text of a letter of capital importance, dated May 14, 1988, on the utter absence of openings in the roofs of the alleged gas chambers of crematoria II and III at Auschwitz-Birkenau. F. Leuchter has also produced three other reports on the gas chamber question. Not to be missed is German research chemist Germar Rudolf’s Lectures on the Holocaust / Controversial Issues Cross Examined, Theses & Dissertations Press (PO Box 257768, Chicago, IL 60625, USA), 2005, 566 p., along with the same author’s impressive periodical series (more than thirty issues to date) that he has brought out under the title Vierteljahreshefte für freie Geschichtsforschung, not to mention his English language magazine The Revisionist and a fair number of other publications. All told, the work done thus far by G. Rudolf (now aged 42 and imprisoned in Germany) amounts to a formidable scientific landmark. Finally, let us cite Canadian barrister Barbara Kulaszka's opus magnum Did Six Million Really Die ? / Report of the Evidence in the Canadian "False News" Trial of Ernst Zündel, 1988, published in 1992; with its compact print it is equivalent to a volume of about a thousand pages in regular book format. The text shows how, during Ernst Zündel's two long trials in Toronto in 1985 and 1988, the other side, when confronted with the revisionist argumentation, simply collapsed: a real Stalingrad for the orthodox historians, beginning with the biggest of them all, Raul Hilberg. Essential studies have been written by the Germans Wilhelm Stäglich and Udo Walendy, the Italian Carlo Mattogno, the Spaniard Enrique Aynat Eknes, the Swiss Jürgen Graf and ten or so other authors. The 97 issues of The Journal of Historical Review (1980-2002), in good part due to the American Mark Weber, constitute a mine of information on all aspects of revisionist research. In France, Pierre Guillaume, Serge Thion, Henri Roques, Pierre Marais, Vincent Reynouard, Jean Plantin have picked up where Maurice Bardèche and Paul Rassinier left off. There are now countless revisionist-oriented publications and websites throughout the world, and this despite the prevailing censorship and repression.

Nonetheless the "Holocaust" remains the lone official religion of the entire West, a murderous religion if ever there was one. And one that continues to fool millions of good souls in the crudest ways: the display of heaps of eyeglasses, hair, shoes or valises presented as "relics" of the "gassed", faked or deceptively exploited photographs, texts of innocuous papers altered or purposely misinterpreted, endless proliferation of monuments, ceremonies, shows, the drumming of the Shoah into our heads as early as primary school, organised excursions to the holy sites of alleged Jewish martyrdom and great show trials with their calls for lynch-law.

* * *

President Ahmadinejad has used the right word: the alleged "Holocaust" of the Jews is a "myth", that is, a belief maintained by credulity or ignorance. In France it is perfectly lawful to proclaim unbelief in God but it is forbidden to say that one does not believe in the "Holocaust", or simply that one has doubts about it. This prohibition of any kind of disputing became formal and official with the law of July 13, 1990. The said law was published in the Journal officiel de la République française on the next day, that is, the 14th of July, day of commemoration of the Republic and of Freedom. It states that the punishment may run to as much as a year's imprisonment and a fine of up to €45,000, but there may also be orders to pay damages and the considerable costs of judicial publication. Relevant case law specifies that all this applies "even if [such disputing] is presented in veiled or dubitative form or by way of insinuation" (Code pénal, Paris, Dalloz, 2006, p. 2059). Thus France has but one official myth, that of the "Holocaust", and knows but one form of blasphemy, that which offends the "Holocaust".

On July 11, 2006 I personally was once more summoned to appear before a Paris court on the grounds of that special law. The presiding judge, Nicolas Bonnal, had recently attended a training course on the means of cracking down on revisionism over the Internet, a course organised by the European office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, in Paris, under the auspices of the Conseil représentatif des institutions juives de France (CRIF) (Representative Council of Jewish Institutions of France)! In a release triumphantly headed "The CRIF plays an active part in the training of European judges" this Jewish body, whose political force is exorbitant, was not afraid of announcing urbi et orbi that it listed Nicolas Bonnal amongst its pupils or trainees (www.crif.org/?page=articles\_display/detail&aid=7222&artyd=2&stinfo=297.376.1467)

). And that is not all. At my trial, for good measure, the State prosecutrix happened to be a Jewess by the name of Anne de Fontette; in the closing words of her talk requesting conviction and sentencing, she, although supposedly speaking in the name of a secular State, called for the vengeance of “Yahweh, protector of his chosen people” against “the lying lips” of Faurisson, guilty of having granted a telephone interview of revisionist character to an Iranian radio and television station, Sahar 1.

The findings of revisionist research

The Germans of the Third Reich wanted to extirpate the Jews from Europe but not to exterminate them. They sought “a definitive — or final — territorial solution of the Jewish question” and not a “final solution” in the sense of any physical suppression (to want a “final solution of unemployment” is not to desire the death of the unemployed). The Germans had concentration camps but not “extermination camps” (an expression forged by Allied propaganda). They used disinfection gas chambers operating notably with an insecticide called Zyklon-B (the active ingredient of which was hydrogen cyanide) but never had any homicidal gas chambers or homicidal gas vans. They used crematory ovens to incinerate corpses and not to throw living beings into them. After the war, the photographs purportedly exposing “Nazi atrocities” showed us camp inmates who were either sick, dying or dead, but not killed. What with the Allies’ blockade and their “area” bombing of Germany, and the apocalypse experienced by the latter towards the end of a nearly six-year long conflict, famine and epidemics, notably of typhus, had ravaged the country and, in particular, the camps in the western regions, overwhelmed by the arrivals en masse of detainees evacuated from the camps in the East, and thus severely lacking in food, medicine and the Zyklon-B needed for protection against typhus.

In the butchery that is a war, people suffer. In a modern war, the belligerent nations’ civilians at times suffer as much if not more than their soldiers. During the conflict that, from 1933 to 1945, pitted them against the Germans, the European Jews thus had occasion to suffer but infinitely less so than they dare to assert with such a nerve. Certainly the Germans treated them as a hostile or dangerous minority (there were reasons for that), and against these people the Third Reich authorities were led to take, due to the war, more and more coercive police or military security measures. In certain cases those measures amounted to placement in internment camps or indeed to deportation to concentration or forced labour camps. Sometimes Jews were even executed for sabotage, spying, terrorism and, especially, for guerrilla activities in favour of the Allies, mainly on the Russian front, but not for the simple reason that they were Jewish. Never did Hitler order or permit the killing of a person because of his or her race or religion. As for the figure of six million Jewish deaths, it is a pure invention that has never been substantiated despite the efforts in that regard by the Yad Vashem Institute of Jerusalem.

In the face of the formidable accusations thrown at a defeated Germany the revisionists have said to the accusers:

1. Show us one single document that, in your view, proves that Hitler or any other National-Socialist ordered and planned the physical extermination of the Jews;
2. Show us that weapon of mass destruction which, as alleged, was a gas chamber; show us a single one of them, at Auschwitz or elsewhere; and if, by chance, you claim that you cannot show us any because, according to you, the Germans destroyed the “murder weapon”, provide us at least with a technical drawing representing one of those slaughterhouses which, as you say, the Germans destroyed and explain to us how that weapon with such a fabulous killing performance had been able to work without bringing on the death of either those who ran it or their helpers;

3. Explain to us how you have arrived at your figure of six million victims.

However, in over sixty years, the Jewish or non-Jewish accusing historians have shown themselves to be incapable of offering a response to these requests. Thus they have been accusing without any evidence. That is what is called slander.

But there is something yet more serious: the revisionists have set forth a series of established facts proving that the physical extermination, gas chambers and six million in question cannot have existed.

1. The first of these facts is that, for the entire duration of the war, millions of European Jews lived, plain for all to see, amidst the rest of the population, a good part of them being employed in factories by the Germans who were cruelly short of manpower, and those millions of Jews were therefore not killed. Better still: the Germans stubbornly offered to hand over to the Allies, up to the last months of the conflict, as many Jews as they might want on the express condition that they must not subsequently send them to Palestine; this proviso was made out of respect for “the noble and valiant Arab people” of that region, already violently beset by Jewish colonists.
2. The second fact, which is carefully hidden from us, is that excesses which might be committed against Jews could well bring on the severest sanctions: the killing of a single Jew or Jewess could get the perpetrator, although he be a German soldier, sentenced to death by court martial and shot. In other words, the Jews under German rule continued to enjoy, if they observed the regulations in place, the protection of penal law, even in the face of the armed forces.
3. The third of these facts is that the alleged Nazi gas chambers of Auschwitz or elsewhere are quite simply inconceivable for obvious physical and chemical reasons; never after the purported hydrogen cyanide gassing of hundreds or thousands of persons in a closed space could others have soon entered in a veritable bath of that poison and proceeded to handle and remove so many corpses which, steeped with cyanide gas on both outside and inside, would have become untouchable. Hydrogen cyanide adheres firmly to surfaces; it penetrates even cement and bricks and is very difficult to remove from a room by ventilation; it penetrates the skin, it settles within the body, mixing with its fluids. In the United States it is precisely this poison that is used still today in an execution chamber to kill a condemned prisoner, but that precise chamber is of steel and glass and is equipped with machinery which is, of necessity, quite complex, calling for extraordinary precautions in its use; it is enough to see an American gas chamber designed for putting to death a lone individual to realise that the alleged Auschwitz gas chambers, which supposedly served to kill crowds of individuals, day after day, can neither have existed nor functioned.

But then, as people will ask, what became of all those Jews concerning whom we revisionists have concluded from our research that they were never killed? The answer is already there, right before our eyes and within everyone’s grasp: a part of the Jewish population of Europe died, like tens of millions of non-Jews, due to the war and to hunger and disease, and another part plainly and simply survived the war in their millions. These latter fraudulently had themselves dubbed “miraculous” survivors. In 1945 the “survivors” and “miraculous escapees” were there to be counted by the million and they spread throughout the world to fifty or so countries, beginning with Palestine. How could an alleged decision of total physical extermination of the Jews have so engendered millions of “miraculous” Jewish survivors? With millions of “miraculous survivors” there is no longer any miracle: it is a false miracle, a lie, a fraud.

For my part, in 1980 I summed up, in a sentence of sixty French words, the findings produced by revisionist research:

The alleged Hitlerite gas chambers and the alleged genocide of the Jews form one and the same historical lie, which has permitted a gigantic political and financial swindle whose main beneficiaries are the state of Israel and international Zionism and whose main victims are the German people – but not their leaders – and the Palestinian people in their entirety.

Today, in 2006, that is, twenty-six years later, I maintain that sentence in full. It had not been inspired by any political or religious sympathy or antipathy whatsoever. It had its ground in certified facts that had begun to be brought to light, on the one hand, by Maurice Bardèche in 1948 and 1950 in his two books on the Nuremberg trial and, on the other hand, by Paul Rassinier who, also in 1950, published his Le Mensonge d'Ulysse (Ulysses's Lie) (See The Holocaust Story and the Lies of Ulysses, Costa Mesa, California, Institute for Historical Review, 1990, XVIII-447 p.). From 1951 onwards, year after year, our adversaries, so rich, so mighty, so bent on practising all possible forms of repression against historical revisionism, have found themselves progressively forced to admit that we are right on the technical, scientific and historical levels. The victories achieved by Second World War revisionism are many and significant, but, as must sadly be recognised, they still remain, in our day, almost wholly unknown to the greater public. The mighty have done everything to conceal these victories from the world. That is understandable: their domination and sharing of the world between them are in a way grounded in the religion of the alleged "Holocaust" of the Jews. Calling the "Holocaust" into question, publicly disclosing the extraordinary imposture of it all, pulling the masks off the politicians, journalists, historians, academics and people of the churches, clans and coteries who, for more than sixty years, have been preaching falsehoods whilst all the time casting anathema on the unbelievers, amounts to a perilous adventure. But, as will be seen here, despite the repression, time seems in the end to be on the revisionists' side.

Examples of revisionist victories

I shall recall here just twenty of these victories:

1. In 1951 the Jew Léon Poliakov, who had been part of the French delegation at the Nuremberg trial (1945-1946), stated his conclusion that we had at our disposal an overabundance of documents for all points of the history of the Third Reich, with the exception of one point alone: the "campaign to exterminate the Jews". For this, he wrote, "No document remains, perhaps none has ever existed" (Bréviaire de la haine, Paris, Calmann-Lévy, 1974 [1951], p. 171; English version: Harvest of Hate, New York, Holocaust Library, 1979, revised and expanded edition).

Remark: There is here an extraordinary concession to the revisionist case. In effect, such a formidable criminal undertaking supposedly conceived, ordered, organised and perpetrated by the Germans would have necessitated an order, a plan, instructions, a budget, ... Such an undertaking, carried out over several years on a whole continent and generating the death of millions of victims, would have left a flood of documentary evidence. Consequently, if we are told that there perhaps has never existed any such documentary evidence, it is because the crime in question was not perpetrated. In the complete absence of documents, the historian has no longer anything to do but keep quiet. L. Poliakov made this concession in 1951, that is, fifty-five years ago. However, it must be noted that, from 1951 to 2006, his successors have equally failed to find the least documentary evidence. Occasionally, here and there, we have witnessed attempts at making us believe in such or such discovery but each time, as will be seen below, the “discoverers” and their publicists have had to drop their claim.

2. In 1960 Martin Broszat, a member of the Institute of Contemporary History in Munich, wrote: “Neither at Dachau, nor at Bergen-Belsen, nor at Buchenwald were any Jews or other detainees gassed” (“Keine Vergasung in Dachau”, Die Zeit, August 19, 1960, p. 16)\.

Remark: This sudden and unexplained concession is significant. At the Nuremberg trial the only homicidal gas chamber that the accusation ventured to show in a film had been that of Dachau, and the testimonies telling of alleged homicidal gassings in the three above-mentioned camps had been numerous. M. Broszat thus implicitly acknowledged that those testimonies were false. He did not tell us in what respect they were false. Nor did he tell us in what respect other such testimonies relating, for example, to Auschwitz, Majdanek, Treblinka, Sobibor or Belzec should, for their part, go on being deemed reliable. In the 1980s, at Dachau, a sign indicated in five languages that the “gas chamber disguised as showers”, visited by the tourists, was “never used” as such. The revisionists had then asked in what respect the room could be termed a homicidal “gas chamber”, whereupon the Dachau Museum authorities took down the sign and replaced it with another on which, in German and English, can now be read: “Gas chamber. This was the center of potential mass murder. The room was disguised as ‘showers’ and equipped with fake shower spouts to mislead the victims and prevent them from refusing to enter the room. During a period of 20 minutes up to 150 people at a time could be suffocated to death through prussic acid poison gas (Zyklon B).” One will note the words “potential” and “could”, the choice of which attests to a fine bit of trickery: the information spawns in visitors’ minds the idea that the said “gas chamber” was effectively used for killing but, at the same time, it enables the museum to retort to revisionists: “We haven’t expressly said that this gas chamber was used for killing; we’ve merely said that it could be or could have been, at the time, used to kill a certain number of people”. To conclude, in 1960 M. Broszat, without any explanation, decreed in a simple letter that no one had been gassed at Dachau; thenceforth, the Dachau Museum authorities, quite embarrassed, have tried, by means of assorted deceitful ploys varying over time, to fool their visitors into believing that, in this room that looks like showers (and for good reason, since that is what it was), people had well and truly been gassed.

3. In 1968 the Jewish historian Olga Wormser-Migot, in her thesis on Le Système concentrationnaire nazi, 1933-1945, (Paris, Presses universitaires de France), gave an ample exposition of what she called “the problem of the gas chambers” (p. 541-544). She voiced her scepticism as to the worth of some well-known witnesses’ accounts attesting to the existence of gas chambers in camps such as Mauthausen or Ravensbrück. On Auschwitz-I she was categorical: that camp where, still today, tourists visit an alleged gas chamber was, in reality, “without any gas chamber” (p. 157)\.

Remark: To bring their horrible charges of homicidal gassings against the defeated, the accusers have relied solely on testimonies and those testimonies have not been verified. Let us take note of the particular case of Auschwitz-I: it was thus 38 years ago that a Jewish historian had the courage to write that this camp was “without any gas chamber”; however, still today, in 2006, crowds of tourists there visit an enclosed space that the authorities dare to present, fallaciously, as a “gas chamber”. Here we see a practice of outright deceit.

4. In 1979 thirty-four French historians signed a lengthy joint declaration in reply to my technical arguments aiming to demonstrate that the allegation of the existence and functioning of the Nazi gas chambers ran up against certain radical material impossibilities. According to the official version, Rudolf Höss, one of the three successive Auschwitz commandants, had confessed (!) and described how Jews had been gassed at Auschwitz and Birkenau. According to that very vague confession, when the victims appeared to have breathed their last gasp, a ventilation apparatus was switched on and a squad of Jewish prisoners immediately entered the vast room to remove the corpses and carry them as far as the crematory ovens. R. Höss said that those Jews went about this work nonchalantly, whilst smoking and eating. I had pointed out that this could not be: one cannot go into premises saturated with hydrogen cyanide gas (a poisonous, penetrating and explosive compound) whilst smoking and eating and then touch, handle and take out, using all one's strength, thousands of bodies suffused with that poison and therefore untouchable. In their declaration the thirty-four historians answered me thus: “It must not be asked how, technically, such a mass-murder was possible. It was technically possible, since it happened” (Le Monde, February 21, 1979, p. 23).

Remark: That answer amounts to a dodging of the enquiry put forth. If someone shirks a question in this manner, it is because he is incapable of answering. And if thirty-four historians find themselves to such a degree unable to explain how a crime of these dimensions was perpetrated, it is because that crime defies the laws of nature; it is therefore imaginary.

5. Also in 1979, the American authorities finally decided to make public certain aerial photographs of Auschwitz which, up to then, they had kept hidden. With either cynicism or naivety, the two authors of the publication, former CIA men Dino A. Brugioni and Robert G. Poirier, gave their little set of photos the title The Holocaust Revisited and tacked on here and there labels bearing the words “gas chamber(s)”, but, in their commentaries, there was nothing whatever to justify those designations. (Central Intelligence Agency, Washington, February 1979, ST-79-10001).

Remark: Today, in 2006, this trickery makes our thoughts turn to the miserable demonstration by the former American government minister Colin Powell when trying to prove, by the same device of having labels stuck onto aerial photos, the existence of works for the manufacture of “weapons of mass destruction” in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. In reality, those photos of Auschwitz slap discredit on the case for Nazi gas chambers. What can be distinctly made out on them are serene crematoria structures, with no crowds huddled outside waiting to enter the alleged changing rooms and the alleged death chambers. The surrounding grounds are free of obstruction and visible from all directions. The flowerbeds in the patches of garden round the crematories are neatly laid-out and bear no trace of being stamped upon, every day, by thousands of people. Crematorium n°3, for instance, abuts on what we know to have been, thanks to sound documents from the Auschwitz State Museum, a football field and is close to a volleyball court (Hefte von Auschwitz, 15, 1975, plate on page 56 and page 64). It is also close to eighteen hospital barracks of the men's camp. There were thirty-two Allied air missions above this zone which also comprised the large industrial installations of Monowitz. It is understandable that the Allied aviation should have attacked the industrial sector several times whilst sparing as much as possible what was obviously a concentration, labour and transit camp and not an “extermination camp”, on which there fell, in the end, only a few stray bombs.

6. On April 21, 1982 an association (the “ASSAG”), was created in Paris for “the study of murders by gassing under the National-Socialist regime”, “with a view to seeking and verifying elements bearing proof of the use of poison gasses in Europe by the officials of the National-Socialist regime to kill persons of various nationalities, to contributing to the publication of this evidence, to making, to that purpose, all useful contacts on the national and international level”. Article 2 of the association’s charter stipulates: “The Association shall last as long as shall be necessary to attain the objectives set forth in Article 1.” However, this association, founded by fourteen persons, amongst whom Germaine Tillion, Georges Wellers, Geneviève Anthonioz née de Gaulle, barrister Bernard Jouanneau and Pierre Vidal-Naquet, has, in nearly a quarter of a century, never published anything and, to this day in 2006, remains in existence. In the event that it be maintained, wrongly, that the group has produced a book entitled Chambres à gaz, secret d’État (Gas chambers, State secret), it will be fitting to recall that the book in question is in fact the French translation of a work first published in German by Eugen Kogon, Hermann Langbein and Adalbert Rückerl and in which there featured a few contributions by a few members of the “ASSAG” (Paris, Editions de Minuit, 1984; English translation published as Nazi Mass Murder: a documentary history of the use of poison gas, New Haven, Yale University Press, 1994).

Remark: By itself the book’s French title gives a fair idea of the contents: instead of proof, supported by photographs of gas chambers, drawings, sketches, forensic reports on the crime weapon, the reader finds only speculations based on what is called “evidence” (éléments de preuve, “elements of proof”, not proof), and this because, we are told, those gas chambers had constituted the greatest possible secret, a “State secret”. If ever there were a “weapon of mass destruction” that deserved a well-done forensic examination, it was indeed this one. In effect, it constitutes an anomaly in the history of science for at least two reasons: it had no precedent and has had no continuation; it arose out of nothing only to return to nothingness. However, the history of science knows of no such phenomenon. In any case, by the very fact of its existence yet today in 2006, one may say that the ASSAG association has still not attained the objective for which it was founded nearly twenty-five years ago. It has still found neither proof nor even any evidence of the “Nazi gas chambers” existence.

7. In 1982, from June 29 to July 2, an international symposium was held in Paris, at the Sorbonne, under the chairmanship of two Jewish historians, François Furet and Raymond Aron. According to the organisers, it was to reply authoritatively and publicly to Robert Faurisson and “a handful of anarcho-communists” who had given him their support (an allusion to Pierre Guillaume, Jean-Gabriel Cohn-Bendit, Serge Thion and a few other free-thinking persons, some of them Jewish). On the last day, at a much-awaited press conference, the two chairmen had to admit publicly that, “despite the most scholarly research”, no order given by Hitler to kill the Jews had been found. As for the gas chambers, they did not even make an allusion to them.

Remark: This symposium constituted the first out-in-the-open attempt to show the general public that the revisionists were lying. As at other gatherings of the same kind (notably one held in 1987, again at the Sorbonne), revisionists were barred entry and, like all other such gatherings without exception, it ended in utter failure for the organisers.

8. On April 26, 1983, the long-running lawsuit against me for “personal injury through falsification of history” (sic), begun, notably by Jewish organisations, in 1979, came to an end. On that day the first chamber of the Paris Court of Appeal, civil division section A, presided by judge Grégoire, whilst upholding a judgment finding me liable for “personal injury”, paid solid tribute to the quality of my work. It ruled, in effect, that there could be detected in my writings on the gas chambers no trace of rashness, no trace of negligence, no trace of having deliberately overlooked anything, nor any trace of a lie and that, as a consequence, “the appraisal of the value of the findings [on the gas chambers] defended by Mr Faurisson is a matter, therefore, solely for experts, historians and the public.”

Remark: If there cannot be found in the work of an author proposing to refute the case for the gas chambers either any rashness, negligence, deliberate oversight, lies or “falsification”, that is proof that the work in question is the product of a serious, careful, conscientious, upright and genuine researcher, proof good enough to ensure the legal right to maintain publicly, as he himself does, that the said gas chambers are but a myth.

9. In 1983, on May 7, Simone Veil, who is Jewish and herself a “survivor of the genocide”, declared on the subject of the gas chambers: “In the course of a case brought against Faurisson for having denied the existence of the gas chambers, those who bring the case are compelled to provide formal proof of the gas chambers’ reality. However, everyone knows that the Nazis destroyed those gas chambers and systematically did away with all the witnesses” (France-Soir Magazine, May 7, 1983, p. 47).

Remark: If there are neither any murder weapons nor testimonies, then what is left? What is one to think of the places presented to millions of deceived visitors as gas chambers? What must be thought of the individuals who introduce themselves as witnesses or miraculous survivors of the gas chambers? For her part, S. Veil is the first holocaustic authority to have thus given to understand that any alleged witness to gassings can only be a false witness. Already on March 6, 1979, in the course of a televised discussion presented by the French programme “Dossiers de l’écran” (Screen Files) about the airing of the American series “Holocaust”, she had displayed her contempt for one Maurice Benroubi, introduced as a “witness of the gas chambers”. The latter, as a result, adopted an attitude of extreme discretion compared with that shown in his “testimony”, which had appeared shortly before in the weekly L’Express (March 3-9, 1979, p. 107-110).

10. In 1961 the Jew Raul Hilberg, orthodox historian Number One, published the first edition of his major work, The Destruction of the European Jews, and it was in 1985 that he brought out the second edition, a profoundly revised and corrected version. The distance between the two is considerable and can only be explained by the succession of victories achieved in the meantime by the revisionists. In the first edition the author had brazenly affirmed that “the destruction of the Jews of Europe” had been set off following two consecutive orders given by Hitler. He neither specified the date nor reproduced the wording thereof. Then he professed to explain in detail the political, administrative and bureaucratic process of that destruction; for example he went so far as to write that at Auschwitz the extermination of the Jews was organised by an office that was in charge of both the disinfection of clothing and the extermination of human beings (The Destruction of the European Jews, 1961, republished in 1979 by Quadrangle Books, Chicago, p. 177, 570). However, in 1983, going back completely on that explanation, Hilberg suddenly proceeded to state that the business of “the destruction of the European Jews” had, after all, gone on without a plan, without any organisation, centralisation, project or budget, but altogether thanks to “an incredible meeting of minds, a consensus-mind reading by a far-flung bureaucracy” (Newsday, New York, February 23, 1983, p. II/3). He would confirm this explanation under oath at the first Zündel trial in Toronto on January 16, 1985 (verbatim transcript, p. 848); he would soon afterwards confirm it anew but with other words in the greatly revised version of his above-mentioned work (New York, Holmes & Meier, 1985, p. 53, 55, 62). He has just recently, in October 2006, confirmed it yet again in an interview given to Le Monde: “There was no pre-established guiding plan. As for the question of the decision, it is in part unsolvable: no order signed by Hitler has ever been found, doubtless because no such document ever existed. I am persuaded that the bureaucracies moved through a sort of latent structure: each decision brings on another, then another, and so forth, even if it isn’t possible to foresee exactly the next step” (Le Monde des livres, October 20, 2006, p. 12).

Remark: The Number One historian of the Jewish genocide, at a certain point, thus found himself so helpless that he suddenly proceeded to disown his first version and to explain a gigantic undertaking of collective murder as if it had all been carried out through something like the workings of the Holy Spirit. In effect, since then he has evoked a “meeting of minds” within a bureaucracy, terming this meeting “incredible”. If it is “incredible” or unbelievable, why then should it be believed? Must one believe the unbelievable? He also brings up “mind reading” and states it was performed by “consensus”, but this is a matter of pure intellectual speculation grounded in a belief in the supernatural. How can one believe in such a phenomenon, particularly within a vast bureaucratic structure and, still more particularly, within the bureaucracy of the Third Reich? It is worth noting that on R. Hilberg’s example the other official historians set about, in the 1980s and 1990s, abandoning history and lapsed into metaphysics and jargon. They questioned themselves on the point of whether one should be “intentionalist” or “functionalist”: must it be supposed that the extermination of the Jews occurred subsequent to an “intent” (not yet proved) and in line with a concerted plan (not yet found), or instead had that extermination happened all by itself, spontaneously and through improvisation, without there being any formal intent and with no plan? This type of woolly controversy attests to the disarray of historians who, unable to provide evidence and real documents to back their case, are thus reduced to theorising in the void. At bottom, those on one side, the “intentionalists”, tell us: “There were necessarily an intent and a plan, which we haven’t yet found but which we shall perhaps indeed discover one day”, whereas the others affirm: “There is no need to go looking for evidence of an intent and a plan, for everything was able to occur without intent, without plan and without leaving any traces; such traces are not to be found because they have never existed.”

11. In May 1986 in France, certain Jews, alarmed upon realising that they could not manage to answer the revisionists on the simple plane of reason, decided to take action with a view to obtaining a legal prohibition of revisionism. Chief amongst them were Georges Wellers and Pierre Vidal-Naquet, grouped, with their friends, round the country’s head rabbi René-Samuel Sirat (Bulletin quotidien de l’Agence télégraphique juive, June 1986, p. 1, 3). After four years, on July 13, 1990, they would get, thanks notably to Jewish former Prime Minister Laurent Fabius, then president of the National Assembly, a special law passed allowing for the punishment of any person who publicly made revisionist statements on the subject of the “extermination of the Jews”: up to a year’s imprisonment, a fine of €45,000 and still other sanctions. This recourse to force is a flagrant admission of weakness.

Remark: G. Wellers and P. Vidal-Naquet were especially alarmed by the court decision of April 26, 1983 (see paragraph 8 above). The former wrote: “The court admitted that [Faurisson] was well documented, which is false. It is astonishing that the court should fall for that” (Le Droit de vivre, June-July 1987, p. 13). The latter wrote that the Paris Court of Appeal “recognised the seriousness of Faurisson’s work — which is quite outrageous — and finally found him guilty only of having acted malevolently by summarising his theses as slogans” (Les Assassins de la mémoire, Paris, La Découverte, 1987, p. 182; here quoted the English translation: Assassins of Memory, New York, Columbia University Press, 1992).

12. In August 1986 Michel de Boüard, himself deported during the war as a résistant, professor of history and Dean of letters at the University of Caen (Normandy), member of the Institut de France and former head of the Commission d’histoire de la déportation within the official Comité d’histoire de la deuxième guerre mondiale, declared that, all told, “the dossier is rotten”. He specified that the dossier in question, that of the history of the German concentration camp system, was “rotten” due to, in his own words, “a huge amount of made-up stories, inaccuracies stubbornly repeated — particularly where numbers are concerned — amalgamations and generalisations”. Alluding to the revisionists’ studies, he added that there were “on the other side, very carefully done critical studies demonstrating the inanity of those exaggerations” (Ouest-France of August 2nd and 3rd, 1986, p. 6).

Remark: Michel de Boüard was a professional historian, indeed the ablest French historian on the subject of the wartime deportations. Up to 1985 he defended the strictly orthodox and official position. Upon reading the revisionist Henri Roques’s doctoral thesis on the alleged testimony of SS man Kurt Gerstein, he saw his error. He honestly acknowledged it, going so far as to say that, if he hitherto personally upheld the existence of a gas chamber in the Mauthausen camp, he had done so wrongly, on the faith of what was said around him. (His untimely death in 1989 deprived the revisionist camp of an eminent personality who had resolved to publish a new work aiming to put historians on their guard against the official lies of Second World War history).

13. In 1988 Arno Mayer, an American professor of Jewish origin teaching contemporary European history at Princeton University, wrote on the subject of the Nazi gas chambers: “Sources for the study of the gas chambers are at once rare and unreliable” (The “Final Solution” in History, New York, Pantheon Books, p. 362).

Remark: Still today in, 2006, the greater public persist in believing that, as the media tirelessly suggest, the sources for the study of the gas chambers are innumerable and unquestionable. At the Sorbonne symposium of 1982, A. Mayer, like his friend Pierre Vidal-Naquet, could not find words harsh enough for the revisionists; however, six years later, here was an ultra-orthodox historian who had drawn considerably closer to the revisionists’ findings.

14. In 1989 Swiss historian Philippe Burrin, laying down as a premise, without demonstration, the reality of Nazi gas chambers and Jewish genocide, attempted to determine at what date and by whom the decision to exterminate physically the Jews of Europe had been taken. He did not succeed any more than all his “intentionalist” or “functionalist” colleagues (Hitler et les juifs / Genèse d’un génocide, Paris, Seuil; English version: Hitler and the Jews: the Genesis of the Holocaust, London, Edward Arnold, 1994). He had to remark the absence of traces of the crime and note what he decided to call “the stubborn erasure of the trace of anyone’s passing through” (p. 9). He bemoaned “the large gaps in the documentation” and added: “There subsists no document bearing an extermination order signed by Hitler. [...] In all likelihood, the orders were given verbally. [...] here the traces are not only few and far between, but difficult to interpret” (p. 13).\

Remark: Here again is a professional historian who acknowledges that he can produce no documents in support of the official case. The greater public imagine that the traces of Hitler’s crime are many and unambiguous but the historian who has examined the relevant documentation has, for his part, found nothing but sparse semblances and “traces”, and wonders what interpretation to give to them.

15. In 1992 Yehuda Bauer, professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, stated at an international conference on the genocide of the Jews held in London: “The public still repeats, time after time, the silly story that at Wannsee the extermination of the Jews was arrived at” (Jewish Telegraphic Agency release published as “Wannsee’s importance rejected”, Canadian Jewish News, January 30, 1992, p. 8).\

Remark: Apart from the fact that a careful reading of the “minutes” of the Berlin-Wannsee meeting of January 20, 1942 proves that the Germans envisaged a “territorial final solution [eine territoriale Endlösung] of the Jewish question” in a geographical space to be determined, Yehuda Bauer’s quite belated declaration confirms that this major point of the case alleging the extermination of the Jews is in fact worthless. Let us add, in our turn, that the extermination of the Jews was decided on neither at Wannsee nor anywhere else; the expression “extermination camps” is but an invention of American war propaganda and there are examples proving that, during that war, the killing of a single Jewish man or woman exposed the perpetrator, whether soldier or civilian, member of the SS or not, to German military justice proceedings and the possibility of being shot by firing squad (in sixty years, never has a sole orthodox historian provided an explanation for such facts, revealed by the defence before the Nuremberg tribunal itself).

16. In January 1995 French historian Eric Conan, co-author with Henry Rousso of Vichy, un passé qui ne passe pas (Paris, Gallimard, 2001 [1994, 1996]; English edition: Vichy: an ever-present past, Hanover, New Hampshire and London, University Press of New England, 1998), wrote that I had been right after all to certify, in the late 1970s, that the gas chamber thus far visited by millions of tourists at Auschwitz was completely fake. According to E. Conan, expressing himself in a leading French weekly: “Everything in it is false [...]. In the late 1970s, Robert Faurisson exploited these falsifications all the better as the [Auschwitz] museum administration balked at acknowledging them”. Conan went on: “[Some people], like Théo Klein [former president of the CRIF, the ‘Representative Council of Jewish Institutions of France’], prefer to leave it in its present state, whilst explaining the misrepresentation to the public: ‘History is what it is; it suffices to tell it, even when it is not simple, rather than to add artifice to artifice’”. Conan then related a staggering remark by Krystyna Oleksy, deputy director of the Auschwitz National Museum, who, for her part, could not find the resolve to explain the misrepresentation to the public. He wrote: “Krystyna Oleksy [...] can’t bring herself to do so: ‘For the time being [the room designated as a gas chamber] is to be left “as is”, with nothing specified to the visitor. It’s too complicated. We’ll see to it later on’” (“Auschwitz: la mémoire du mal” [Auschwitz: the remembrance of evil], L’Express, January 19-25, 1995, p. 68).\

Remark: This statement by a Polish official means, in plain language: we have lied, we are lying and, until further notice, we shall continue to lie. In 2005 I asked E. Conan whether the Auschwitz Museum authorities had issued a denial or raised any protest against the statement that he, in 1995, had ascribed to K. Oleksy. His answer was that there had been neither denial nor protest. In 1996, this imposture and others as well concerning the Auschwitz-I camp were denounced by two Jewish authors, Robert Jan van Pelt and Deborah Dwork, in a work they produced together: Auschwitz, 1270 to the Present, Yale University Press, 443 p. Here is a sampling of their words in that regard: “postwar obfuscation”, “additions”, “deletions”, “suppression”, “reconstruction”, “largely a postwar reconstruction” (p. 363), “reconstructed”, “usurpation”, “re-created”, “four hatched openings in the roof, as if for pouring Zyklon B into the gas chamber below, were installed [after the war]” (p. 364), “falsified”, “inexact”, “misinformation”, “inappropriate” (p. 367), “falsifying” (p. 369). In 2001 the fallacious character of this Potemkin village gas chamber was also acknowledged in a French booklet accompanying two CD-Roms entitled Le Négationnisme; written by Jean-Marc Turine and Valérie Igounet, it was prefaced by Simone Veil (Radio France-INA, Vincennes, Frémeaux & Associés).

17. In 1996 the leftwing French historian Jacques Baynac, a staunch antirevisionist since 1978, ended up admitting, after due consideration, that there was no evidence of the Nazi gas chambers’ existence. One could not fail to note, wrote Baynac, “the absence of documents, traces or other material evidence” (Le Nouveau Quotidien de Lausanne [Switzerland], September 2, 1996, p. 16, and September 3, 1996, p. 14). But he said that he carried on believing in the existence of those magical gas chambers\.

Remark: All in all, J. Baynac says: “There is no evidence but I believe”, whereas a revisionist thinks: “There is no evidence, therefore I refuse to believe and it is my duty to dispute.”

18. In 2000, at the end of her book Histoire du négationnisme en France (Paris, Gallimard), Valérie Igounet published a long text by Jean-Claude Pressac at the end of which the latter, who had been one of the revisionists’ most determined opponents, signed a veritable act of surrender. In effect, taking up the words of professor Michel de Boüard, he stated that the dossier on the concentration camp system was “rotten”, and irremediably so. He wrote asking: “Can things be put back on an even keel?” and answered: “It is too late”. He added: “The current form, albeit triumphant, of the presentation of the camp universe is doomed”. He finished by surmising that everything that had been invented around sufferings all too real was bound “for the rubbish bins of history” (p. 651-652). In 1993-1994, that protégé of the French Jew Serge Klarsfeld and the American rabbi Michael Berenbaum, “Project Director” at the Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, had been acclaimed worldwide as an extraordinary researcher who, in his book on Les Crématoires d’Auschwitz, la machinerie du meurtre de masse (Paris, CNRS éditions, 1993; English title: The Auschwitz Crematories. The Machinery of Mass Murder ), had, it appeared, felled the hydra of revisionism. Here, in V. Igounet’s book, he was seen signing his act of surrender\.

Remark: The greater public are kept in ignorance of a major fact: the man who had supposedly saved the day for History, who once was presented by the world press as an extraordinary researcher who had at last discovered the scientific proof of the Nazi gas chambers’ existence, ended up acknowledging his error. A few years later, not a single newspaper or magazine announced his death.

19. In 2002, R. J. van Pelt, already mentioned, published The Case for Auschwitz. Evidence from the Irving Trial, Indiana University Press, XVIII-571 p. As is widely known, David Irving, who at the very most is a semi-revisionist ill-acquainted with the revisionist argumentation, lost the libel suit he had recklessly brought against the Jewish-American academic Deborah Lipstadt. He tried clumsily to make the case — a perfectly right one, for that matter — that there had existed no homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz. But he nonetheless scored an essential point and, if Justice Charles Gray and other judges after him had had more courage, that point would have enabled him to succeed in his claim. The argument was summed up in a four-word phrase that I first put forth in 1994: “No holes, no Holocaust”. My reasoning behind it was as follows: 1. Auschwitz is at the centre of the “Holocaust”; 2. The great crematoria of Auschwitz-Birkenau, or Auschwitz-II, are at the centre of the vast Auschwitz complex; 3. At the heart of these crematoria there were, supposedly, one or several homicidal gas chambers; 4. At a single one of these crematoria (crematorium n° 2), although it is in ruins, is it today possible to go and examine the room said to have been a gas chamber; it is the presumed scene of the crime, itself presumed as well; 5. We are told that, in order to kill the Jewish detainees locked inside, an SS man, moving about on the concrete roof of the said gas chamber, poured Zyklon-B pellets through four regular openings situated in the roof; 6. However, one need only have eyes to realise that no such openings have ever existed there; 7. Therefore the crime cannot have been committed. For R. J. van Pelt, testifying against Irving, it was near torture trying to find a reply to this argument. Justice Gray as well had to acknowledge “the apparent absence of evidence of holes” (p. 490 of the verbatim transcript) and, in a more general way, he conceded that “contemporaneous documents yield little clear evidence of the existence of gas chambers designed to kill humans” (p. 489; for more details one may consult pages 458-460, 466-467, 475-478 and 490-506). In the text of his judgment, Charles Gray admitted surprise: “I have to confess that, in common I suspect with most other people, I had supposed that the evidence of mass extermination of Jews in the gas chambers at Auschwitz was compelling. I have, however, set aside this preconception when assessing the evidence adduced by the parties in these proceedings” (13.71). Here the failure of the accusing historians is flagrant and Irving ought to have won his case thanks to that observation by a judge who was hostile towards him: the documents of the era furnish us with but decidedly little clear evidence of the Nazi gas chambers’ existence and thus of a German policy to exterminate the Jews. Is this not, after all — as we have seen above —, what several Jewish historians had already concluded, beginning with Léon Poliakov in 1951?
20. In 2004 French historian Florent Brayard published a work entitled La « solution finale de la question juive ». La technique, le temps et les catégories de la décision, Paris, Fayard, 640 p. In 2005, in a review of this book, the following three sentences could be read: “It is known that the Führer neither drafted nor signed any order to eliminate the Jews, that the decisions — for there were several — were taken in the secrecy of talks with Himmler, perhaps Heydrich and/or Göring. It is supposed that, rather than an explicit order, Hitler gave his consent to his interlocutors’ requests or projects. Perhaps he did not even put it into words, but made himself understood by a silence or an acquiescence” (Yves Ternon, Revue d’histoire de la Shoah, July-December 2005, p. 537).\.

Remark: At nearly every word, these sentences show that their author is reduced to adventurous speculations. When he dares to express, without the benefit of the least clue, the notion that Hitler perhaps made himself understood “by a silence or an acquiescence”, he is merely taking up the theory of the “nod” (the Führer’s mere nod!) first voiced by American professor Christopher Browning at the Zündel trial in Toronto in 1988. No academic of antirevisionist persuasion has shown himself to be more pitiful and foolish than that shabbos-goy. So true is it that, destroyed by the revisionist victories, the official case has ended up being emptied of all scientific content.

An assessment of these revisionist victories

Let us briefly recapitulate these revisionist victories.

Their backs set to the wall by the revisionists, the official historians of the alleged physical extermination of the Jews have ended up acknowledging that, from the historical and scientific viewpoint, they are left without a single argument to support their ghastly accusation. They admit, in effect: 1) that they cannot invoke a single document proving the crime; 2) that they are unable to provide the least representation of the crime weapon; 3) that they do not possess any proof nor even any evidence; 4) that they cannot name a single truthful witness (see above, S. Veil's opinion on the matter); 5) that their dossier is rotten (twice repeated), irremediably rotten and that it is bound for the rubbish bins of history; 6) that the sources formerly invoked have revealed themselves to be not only rarer than was claimed but also unreliable; 7) that the alleged traces of the crime are few and far between, and difficult to interpret; 8) that at their end there have been falsifications, misrepresentation, artifice; 9) that in support of their case there has too often been invoked a "silly [sic] story", that of a decision to exterminate the Jews supposedly taken on January 20, 1942 at Berlin-Wannsee; 10) that the foremost of their number, Raul Hilberg, is today reduced to explaining it all, in a nonsensical way, by supposed initiatives that the German bureaucracy had, according to him, boldly taken without any order, plan, instruction or supervision and thanks simply, it seems, to an incredible meeting of minds and a consensus-mind reading. These official historians have not known how to answer any of the revisionists' requests or observations in the style of: 1) "Show me or draw me a Nazi gas chamber"; 2) "Bring me one proof, one single piece of evidence of your own choosing, on the grounds of which to assert that there was a genocide"; 3) "Bring me one testimony, one single testimony, the best one in your opinion" or again: 4) "No holes, no Holocaust". Finding themselves on the ropes, the court historians have called on the law-courts to find against the revisionists, but, contrary to all expectation, it has sometimes happened that the judges have gone so far as to pay tribute to the revisionists' uprightness or to show their surprise before the sparseness or absence of the accusers' documentary evidence. Then, first in France and later in a number of other countries in Europe, these accusers have called for the passing of special laws to silence the revisionists. Here they have sealed their doom. To resort to special laws, to the police and prisons is to admit one's utter inability to use the arguments of reason, history and science.

A hundred other arguments again could be recalled here to prove that, on the plane of history and science, the immense edifice of lies put up by the "Holocaust" or "Shoah" sect has been thrown down, with not one stone left upon another. In contrast to this expanse of ruins, we have seen the construction of a whole revisionist literature. In it can be discovered a profusion of documents, photographs, expert studies, trial transcripts, technical and scientific reports, testimonies, statistical studies, all of which bearing on a hundred aspects of the history of the Second World War that show what the lot of the European Jews was in reality, and demonstrate in striking manner that the Jewish version of that war is largely of the order of myth. From the myth, the Jews have gone on to mythology and from mythology on to religion or, rather, to a semblance of religion. Today the servants of that false religion appear more and more like priests who carry on officiating and turning over the hallowed phrases but, manifestly, no longer have the faith. They seem no longer really to believe in their “credo”. So it is, for instance, that for about the last ten years they have been seen advising their flocks to observe the greatest possible discretion on the subject of the gas chambers. In his memoirs, published in French in 1994 and in English in 1995, the big false witness Elie Wiesel wrote: "Let the gas chambers remain closed to prying eyes, and to imagination" (All Rivers Run to the Sea, New York, Knopf [Random House], p. 74). Claude Lanzmann (maker of the film Shoah), Daniel Goldhagen (author of Hitler's Willing Executioners), Simone Veil (former president of the European Parliament, quoted above), François Léotard (a former French government minister) have in the last few years become surprisingly reserved, cautious or silent on the matter. Some months ago, Jacques Attali (a Jewish businessman and historian) decreed: "The immense majority of Jews murdered were killed by German soldiers' and military policemen's individual weapons, between 1940 and 1942, and not by the death-works, which were put into place afterwards" ("Groupes de criminels?", L'Express, June 1, 2006, p. 60). This implicit way of writing off the alleged Nazi gas chambers is becoming regular practice. Attempts are made to replace the Auschwitz lie with the lie of Babi Yar or those of other fantastical slaughters in the Ukraine or the Baltic countries but not once are we provided with scientific evidence concerning them, such as reports of exhumation and post-mortems as has been the case with the real massacres perpetrated by the Soviets at Katyn, Vinnitsa or elsewhere. As for the number of dead at Auschwitz, we are hardly told any longer that it was 9,000,000 (as in the film Nuit et Brouillard [Night and Fog]), 8,000,000, 6,000,000 or 4,000,000 (as at the Nuremberg trial or on the commemorative stones at Auschwitz-Birkenau until 1990). The new religion's clerics are settling for 1,500,000 (as marked on those same stones since 1995), or for 1,100,000, or for 700,000, (as J.-C. Pressac wrote), or still for 510,000 (as Fritjof Meyer concluded in 2002: "Die Zahl der Opfer von Auschwitz", Osteuropa, May 2003, p. 631-641), all these latter figures being no better founded than the previous ones.

General Conclusion

We are granted the privilege of witnessing, in this beginning of the 21st century, a serious calling into question of one of the greatest lies in history. The myth of the "Holocaust" may well be aglow with a thousand lights: in reality it is burning itself out. It has served to justify the creation in the land of Palestine of a warlike colony that has taken the name of "Jewish State" and endowed itself with a "Jewish Army". It imposes on the Western world the yoke of a Jewish or Zionist tyranny bringing itself to bear in all fields of intellectual, academic and media activity. It poisons the very soul of a great country, Germany. It has allowed the extortion from the latter, as well as from a good number of other Western countries, of exorbitant sums in marks, in dollars or in euros. It overwhelms us with films, with museums, with books that keep the flame of a Talmudic-style hatred burning. It makes it possible to call for an armed crusade against "the axis of evil" and, for this, to fabricate, on demand, the most shameless lies precisely in the pattern of the Great Lie of the "Holocaust", for there is no difference between Adolf Hitler's "weapons of mass destruction" and those of Saddam Hussein. It makes it possible to accuse nearly the whole world and to demand "repentance" and "reparations" everywhere, either for alleged actions directed against "Yahweh's chosen people", an alleged complicity in the crime, or an alleged general indifference to the fate of the Jews during the Second World War. Under its belt it has a glut of rigged trials, beginning with the loathsome Nuremberg trial. It has sanctioned thousands of hangings of defeated soldiers, an atrocious post-war Purge, the deportation of millions of civilians chased from their ancestral homelands, indescribable pillaging, tens of thousands of scandalous legal proceedings, including those carried out today against octogenarians or nonagenarians, attacked by "miraculous" Jewish survivors giving their false testimony. These abominations, this outrage of lies and hatred, this hubris that one day or another destiny always comes to punish, in short, all these excesses must end. No nation has shown more patience with this Jewish or Zionist hubris than the Arab nation; however we see that this nation itself has now run out of patience. It is going to throw off the Israeli yoke and have the West understand that the time has come to seek real peace instead of supporting and arming an artificial State that maintains itself only by force. Even in the West, even in the United States, the scales are falling off some people's eyes and there is now a certain awareness of the hazards imposed on the international community by such prolonged submission to the false religion of the "Holocaust", no. 1 weapon, sword and shield of the State of Israel.

Practical Conclusion

There exist some practical means to launch a real action against this false religion with its sanctuary located at Auschwitz.

As is known, in the heart of Auschwitz there is an emblematic gas chamber. Up to now thirty million tourists have visited it. It is an imposture; all the historians are aware of this, as the authorities of the Auschwitz State Museum know better than anyone. Yet UNESCO (the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization), on October 26, 1979, at the request of the Polish government, put this camp on its list of World Heritage and Cultural Property Sites, thus assuming the duty of preserving its authenticity. For my part, I suggest therefore that the matter of this fraud be formally referred to UNESCO, as it constitutes an offence against education, science and culture. In a more general manner, we could take up the words of Jean-Gabriel Cohn Bendit in 1979: "Let us fight for the destruction of those gas chambers they show tourists in the camps where there were none, as we now know" (Libération, March 5, 1979, p. 4).

There exist other practical means to fight the tyranny of the "Holocaust" myth, first amongst which is to announce to the whole world these "revisionist victories" which have thus far been kept hidden from it. I trust the revisionists present at this gathering will suggest other means and discuss them with us.

Practising mendacity on a grand scale, the "Holocaust" religionists have made themselves, little by little, the enemies of the human race. For more than sixty years they have progressively been putting the whole world, or just about, under indictment. Their main target has, of course, been Germany and all those who, alongside that country, had thought it their duty to fight against Stalin in the same way that others, in the opposing camp, believed they must fight against Hitler. But, in their accusatory frenzy, Jewish organisations have gone so far as to rebuke the wartime Allies for an alleged criminal "indifference" to the lot of the European Jews. They have attacked Roosevelt, Churchill, De Gaulle, Pope Pius XII, the International Committee of the Red Cross and numerous other personalities, official bodies or countries for not having denounced the existence of the "gas chambers". But how could what was so obviously just a grotesque war rumour have been considered verified? It is enough to read the book by the Jew Walter Laqueur, The Terrible Secret (London, Weidenfeld & Nicholson, 1980, 262 p.), to gather thirty or so references to the widespread and thoroughly justified scepticism in the Allied camp before the flood of rumours originating from Jewish sources. Inquiries were carried out enabling officials to conclude that the rumours were unfounded. It was thus clear-sightedness and not indifference that the Allies and others charged showed. It was that same clear-sightedness which, after the war, in their speeches or in their memoirs, Churchill, De Gaulle and Eisenhower showed as they avoided mentioning, even so much as once, the said "gas chambers".

War and war propaganda need lies just as crusades and the crusader spirit are fuelled by hatred. On the other side, peace and friendship between peoples can only gain from care being taken to achieve exactitude in historical research, research that all must be able to carry out in complete freedom.

Two appendices concerning the alleged gas chamber of Auschwitz-I

1) Eric Conan's 1995 statement in its entirety

Another delicate subject: what to do about the falsifications bequeathed by the Communist administration? In the fifties and sixties, several buildings which had either disappeared or been put to other use were reconstructed, with serious errors, and presented as genuine. Some, too "new", were closed to the public. To say nothing of the delousing chambers that were at times presented as execution gas chambers. These aberrations have been of great service to the negationists, who have drawn on them for the main substance of their fabrications. The example of crematorium I, the lone one at Auschwitz I, is significant. In its morgue was installed the first gas chamber. It functioned for a short time, in early 1942: the isolation of the zone, called for by the gassings, disrupted the camp's activity. It was therefore decided, towards the end of April 1942, to transfer these lethal gassings to Birkenau, where they were carried out, on essentially Jewish victims, on an industrial scale. Crematorium I was subsequently turned into an air-raid shelter, with an operating room. In 1948, during the museum's creation, crematorium I was reconstituted in its supposed original state. Everything in it is false: the gas chamber's dimensions, the location of the doors, the openings for the pouring in of the Zyklon B, the ovens, rebuilt according to what the survivors remembered, the height of the chimney. In the late 1970's, Robert Faurisson exploited these falsifications all the better as the museum administration balked at acknowledging them. An American negationist has recently shot a video inside the gas chamber (still presented as authentic): in it he can be seen addressing his "revelations" to the visitors. Jean-Claude Pressac, one of the first to establish exactly the history of this gas chamber and its modifications during and after the war, proposes that it be restored to its 1942 state, basing his suggestion on the German blueprints that he has recently found in the Soviet archives. Others, like Théo Klein, prefer to leave it in its present state, whilst explaining the misrepresentation to the public: 'History is what it is; it suffices to tell it, even when it is not simple, rather than to add artifice to artifice.' Krystyna Oleksy, whose director's office, which occupies the old SS hospital, looks straight out on to crematorium I, has not resigned herself to do so: 'For the time being, it is to be left "as is", with nothing specified to the visitor. It's too complicated. We'll see to it later on.' " (Eric Conan, "Auschwitz: la mémoire du mal", L'Express, January 19-25, 1995, pages 54-69; p. 68)

In his lengthy study, E. Conan wanted to show the great distance between "remembrance" and history. He did so without calling into question the dogma of the "Holocaust"; he even went so far as to state his belief in the existence of the weapon of mass destruction called "gas chamber", and he posited certain assertions devoid of the least scientific foundation as being exact and demonstrated. Nonetheless he had the courage to denounce some serious lies, amongst which that of the emblematic "gas chamber" presented today to visitors at Auschwitz. And he dares to admit that, in the late 1970s, I was right about the matter. In 2005 I asked him whether his study had given rise to any rectifications or protests, particularly on the part of the Auschwitz State Museum authorities and Krystyna Oleksy. His answer was: "None".

2) The full relevant passage in a CD-Rom booklet prefaced by Simone

Veil

[Robert Faurisson] has the motivation: exclusive love of the truth; this would seem to be an obsession of his. An academic, Robert Faurisson was never to cease using this scientific surety, a presumed pledge of respectability. He read Maurice Bardèche. He discovered Paul Rassinier. He “dissected” Rimbaud, Lautréamont and Apollinaire. A brilliant and cultured man, he is nonetheless one bent on causing trouble. Through the seventies, Robert Faurisson worked. He outlined his historico-literary method. He went to the Auschwitz archives. His denial was to build itself there. It rests on a real fact: the gas chamber at the Auschwitz I camp is a “reconstitution”, for it served as a storehouse for SS medical supplies and as an air-raid shelter after the gas chambers at Auschwitz II Birkenau were put into service; what he was able to see (and what can still be seen) is a supposed gas chamber. This is undeniable. Be that as it may, for Robert Faurisson it is a put-up job done by the Jews. (Le Négationnisme (1948-2000). Interviews broadcast on the radio network France-Culture, produced by Jean-Marc Turine. Booklet by Valérie Igounet and Jean-Marc Turine with a preface by Simone Veil, Vincennes, Frémeaux et associés, 2001, 48 pages; p. 27-28).

Chard | France | 2nd Prix

Trophée + Mention Honorable

Myth of the Gas Chambers

“Who knocked it down?” “Faurisson.”

November 1, 2006: this drawing by “Chard” (the Frenchwoman Françoise Pichard, of Paris) received second prize in the international cartoon contest on the “Holocaust” organised by Iran.

“And yet it doesn’t gas...”

[colloquial French for “it’s no good” or “it doesn’t work”]

Professor Bruno Gollnisch had merely stated that, on the subject of the gas chambers, historians ought to be able to express themselves freely. He was first suspended from teaching for five years by the University of Lyon-III. Then, on November 7th and 8th, 2006, he had to appear before a court in Lyon made up of presiding judge Fernand Schir and two associates. Pressures and blackmail led him to break down and acknowledge before his judges the existence of the genocide of the Jews and the Nazi gas chambers. The court’s decision will be pronounced on January 18, 2007. It must be realised that French law prohibits any disputing of the reality of Nazi crimes against the Jews “even if [such disputing] is presented in veiled or dubitative form or by way of insinuation”(Code pénal, 2006, p. 2059). Consequently, with regard to this matter one must neither dispute nor even appear to dispute.

---

---

This paper is part of the series The Victories of Revisionism. Click below for the previous or next item of the series. Click on 'up' to return to the series' Table of Contents.

► Additional information about this document

The Worst Generation | CODOH

by Jett Rucker

We in the West, particularly in the English-speaking areas most-exposed to the maunderings of Tom Brokaw,<sup>[1]</sup> have heard much about “the greatest generation,” the cohort of Americans (and perhaps British, French, and maybe even Soviet in about that order) who grew up during the Great Depression and went on (at least, some of them, mostly the males) to fight in World War II against the Axis countries which, having lost that war, still today bear most of the blame for having started it, at least from the Western perspective that dominates not only the victorious countries, but also at least Germany, whose language and location expose it more to the victors’ domination than, say, Japan, which lost the same war to the same opponents.

This generation, among which might number, apparently, Tom Brokaw’s parents (Brokaw was born in 1940) grew up in a time of (government) monetarily triggered penury in which Europe was ineluctably swept along. Worst-fated among these European countries were Germany and Austria, to the latter of which’s Credit Anstalt a seminal role was subsequently allotted in “starting” that Depression in 1931. Therewith, perhaps, began that historico-propagandistic project that, from today’s remove, can clearly be seen to have assigned the blame for the subsequent miseries known as World War II to (Germany and) Austria.

The people who inhabited, and voted in, and paid taxes in, and sacrificed their sons to conscription in, those countries ... they must be the worst generation in—what? History? The world? Both? And the sons, too—and the daughters as well. What, indeed, might it require to elevate the cohort of the US population containing Brokaw’s parents to the sainthood of “the greatest generation?” It requires, in at least some places containing a great number of active, capable people, a worst generation—a generation given over, for some inscrutable reason, to evil, to harming humanity in general, if not, as in today’s environmentally sensitive times, the planet itself.

We, of any given society on the face of the earth, limn ourselves, each other, our parents, our parents’ generation, in terms that must demonize, revile, condemn, those of other societies that may be seen as having opposed whatever values we ascribe to the sanctified group, and in having done so, having relegated themselves to damnation—or at least some secular contrivance resembling damnation, if not damnation as it is known the religious context.

Religion. Perhaps we might discern a dynamic that we know best, in history, as the religious sentiment, in the protestations that elevate some people’s parents, as a group, to sainthood, as against the status accorded thereby to the parents of other people to that of ... demons.

This is nothing, neither more nor less, than the ideologues’ standard tactic of “divide and conquer.” They are demons; we (and/or our parents) are saints. Such are, since time immemorial, the devices of those who would gain power over us—power over our ability to produce economic value, over our sons' (and daughters') lives in time, and over our own thoughts and sentiments as may bear on those other matters.

There are, of course, institutions for gaining, keeping, and directing power over these factors (call them “minds and hearts”), and these are, in our regulated and law-driven societies, various entities known as “the government,” “the press,” “the academy,” “the church,” and they all communicate, as they must, with each other as to such matters as “the behavior of Allied soldiers” while invading and occupying, the motivations of our leaders, the motivations of their leaders, and finally, over their motivations themselves, as opposed, of course, to ours.

Given the ennobled/damned dichotomy ruling the same generation across both sides of the events in the period they shared, it might profit understanding to consider the experiences of the two opposing groups. While the Japanese (and Chinese, and Soviet) generations would qualify for a broader study of the subjects, concentration here is focused on the closer kin of Americans (British, French, etc.) vis-à-vis Germans (Austrians, Italians, etc.), the better to perceive the contrasts between otherwise-similar groups.

Start the comparison in 1919, the first year after the First World War ended. In the US, a wave of virtuous fervor engulfed the land—or the political process, at least—in the form of Prohibition. The Greatest Generation was going to start out sober, at least so far as the often-slighted Law was concerned. While the Americans were abstaining (or not) from alcohol, the Germans were struggling desperately to get a bite to eat, never mind the intoxicating beverages. This, of course, was because Britain and France maintained their wartime blockade of all shipping into and out of Germany quite in defiance of the Armistice that had been signed in November 1918. It only began to relax when the Treaty of Versailles was imposed in late June 1919. Thousands of the Worst Generation starved along with their parents, while the rest grew up in conditions of deprivation that may have poisoned their sentiments at least until the beginning of the subsequent world war.

Americans may have been too busy staying sober to take much note of the grim and unjust events occurring “over there.” Be that as it may, the same Treaty of Versailles that permitted the relaxation of the blockade imposed on Germans the millstone of compensating the victors of World War I for the costs of defeating them; never mind what costs they might have borne in the course of losing the conflict. Again, members of the Greatest Generation in the US were able to evade blame for the situation through not collecting any of the Versailles-dictated reparations; never mind that the 1917 entry of America into the War tipped the balance of the stalemate, enabling a decisive victory for the vengeful Western powers.

The carnage of the "Greatest Generation." Piles of corpses after the air strikes from the 13 and 14 February 1945 in Dresden
Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-08778-0001 / Hahn / CC-BY-SA 3.0 [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Hardly a year after the end of Prohibition, the Greatest Generation sustained a new government-imposed deprivation that, like the one involving alcohol, was not shared by their European cousins, neither victors nor vanquished: the right to own gold. The US government decided that (all) gold was required for manipulating the value of the dollar vis-à-vis the currencies of other currencies, and so denied that medium (along with silver) to its own people for facilitating the economic exchanges by means of which they fed, sheltered, and clothed each other. The Depression, begun in 1931, marched right past this development and the Greatest Generation, despite a brief and illusory reprieve in 1936-37, remained impoverished not only in comparison with their European cousins (at least, the victors), but likewise in comparison with their own parents, the presumed progenitors of the Greatest Generation.

In Germany, punishing reparations payments to Britain and France (the blockaders, remember?) continued for fifteen years, until 1933, when Germany proclaimed its power—and need, and right—to repudiate the “debts” imposed upon it by the Versailles Diktat. From that time forward, Germany descended—or rose, depending on how one looks at it—into a command economy that favored, as all command economies do, long-term capital projects (selected and designed by the government, of course) and full employment even more than the leaf-raking and public-works projects so favored at the same time by the US government led by Franklin D. Roosevelt. While the Autobahn and the Hindenburg much burnished Germany’s image worldwide, and even heartened many of Germany’s own citizens, it would seem in view of subsequent events to have in fact availed Germans and Germany but little, much as the WPA, the NRA and the rest of the alphabet soup never lifted Americans out of their economic quagmire.

But then, there was War. That did the job—at least for those it didn't kill, those it didn't maim, those it didn't starve to death, and those whose homes and cities it didn't obliterate. The Greatest Generation went off to war, leaving loved ones back home in peace and the false prosperity induced by various wartime exflations. Their opponents, the Worst Generation, also went off to war but eventually found themselves being driven back where they came from even while clouds of bombers obscured the sun while raining bombs and death down on the loved ones they had left behind. And whether they fought on the Eastern or the Western front, they knew their homeland was threatened from the other direction even as they fought the enemy on their own particular front.

Apparently, suffering, fear, and the desperate desire to save one's homeland from invasion do not impart Greatness to just any generation so engaged. Rather, it would seem, in Brokaw's words, to be a matter of Doing the Right Thing(s). Scourging the cities, treasures, homes, and lives of several great civilizations, from Tokyo to Berlin, even while introducing the world to the horrendous novelty of nuclear holocaust. Helping, indispensably, to erect the West's next great bogeyman, Communism, as the hegemon over eastern and central Europe, and shortly thereafter, over China. Beclouding the world with a penumbra of ICBM-borne thermonuclear devastation in Cold War during which most of us have spent our entire, fear-wracked lives. And even, by 1948, enabling the forcible insertion into the ever-volatile Middle East a new colony of dispossessed Europeans who, after clearing for themselves a suitable domain in several religions' Holy Lands, stole the means to project nuclear terror from yet another sore on a globe already afflicted with many such metastasizing tumors.

Yes, today's world is inevitably the product of that Greatest Generation in which the popular writer Brokaw would have at least some of us take such great pride. A better world is hardly to be imagined, is it?

The world imagined, or desperately—and vainly, in the event—hoped for by the defeated and decimated Worst Generation could never have been remotely as good, now, could it?

After all, what they were doing, for whatever reasons in their millions of dashed, dishonored hopes, must have been the Wrong Thing(s).

Tell yourself that, anyway. Again and again.

It's supposed to make you feel good.

---

Notes:

[1]	Brokaw, Tom. The Greatest Generation . Random House, New York, 1997.
-----	---

A Connoisseur of Conquerors | CODOH

by Ezra Macvie

The Normandy Diary of Marie-Louise Osmont. George L. Newman (translator). Random House, New York, 1994, 113 pp.

In 1940, the widow Marie-Louise Osmont owned and lived in a manoir in Périers-sur-le-Dan in Normandy, France, and experienced the invasion and occupation by Germany's Wehrmacht up-close and personally: troops encamped on her grounds and officers were bivouacked in her house with her. This all happened to her without any shooting.

The way out of these circumstances, unfortunately, involved huge amounts of shooting, and bombing, destruction, terror and death. Not only was Périers-sur-le-Dan a mere three miles inland from Sword Beach of the D-Day invasion, but it was a mere five miles north of Caen, arguably the most-heavily bombed and fought-over city west of Germany in World War II. If Marie-Louise Osmont's estate wasn't in the center of the cauldron of France's 1944 "liberation," it was in the center of the fire beneath the cauldron. Miraculously, Mme. Osmont and her house not only survived, but a diary she kept from August 6, 1940 to August 17, 1944 also survived to the present day in the form of this book, whose English translation is here reviewed.

This virtually unique and precious document is characterized by no less a luminary than John Keegan, OBE, who wrote its introduction after having become possibly the foremost among all military historians—at least of those writing in English. He wrote, "What would we give for a similar diary by a countrywoman whose house stood on the front line between Union and Confederacy outside Richmond in 1864, a German diary of the battle of Berlin, a Russian diary from Stalingrad, a British diary from the Indian mutiny?" Atop Mme. Osmont's incredibly fortuitous location in her time, we have the benefits of her insight, her sympathy, her freedom from cant or partisanship and finally, the skill and assiduity of her translator. The perspective afforded by the scant 113 pages of this book exceeds what a hundred volumes in the average specialist library might yield.

A general view of Caen showing the extensive damage caused by Allied bombing, 9 July 1944.

By No 5 Army Film and Photographic Unit, Stewart (Maj) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

The account opens with the report of the arrival of six German soldiers assigned to live in Mme. Osmont's admittedly underpopulated chateau. It is at this point that the invasion and occupation of the author's country, for whose army she drove an ambulance during World War I, is redoubled severalfold by the invasion of her house by six foreigners whose good breeding and consideration for her property and her presumable sentiments she is nonetheless unable to deny. Thus began an ordeal for the mistress of the manoir whose conclusion so exceeded its long preamble in devastation and danger that it is hard to imagine that she might not have opted for its eternal continuation in preference to its catastrophic termination.

She would not, of course, have wished any such thing for the sake of her gentle invaders, though her reaction to her (also foreign) liberators leaves the reader with the feeling that, all things considered, she actually preferred the German invaders to the British liberators, one by each, as individuals. The numerous comparisons she makes during and after liberation are, for me, the most-fascinating part of the account; accounts of the fighting for Normandy abound, from winners, losers and civilian bystanders alike, including accounts whose literary and historical value match that of this little widow's diary. Rather than the momentous, the spectacular, the history-making, this account derives even greater value from its scrupulous recording of the everyday—the everyday of the conquerors, of the liberators, and of those in and around whose ancestral homes it all happens.

Some of the differences between the members of the opposing armies besides their national origins would seem obviously to arise from their differing circumstances upon arrival at Chateau de Périers. The Germans, while possibly veterans of combat, had experienced their combat far away, long ago, or both by the time of their appearance in the pages of Mme. Osmont's diary. Until D-Day, their sojourn at her premises was one of respite and welcome peace, even while the situation of their country and their families back home grew ever more-precarious. The British, with their own homeland recently freed of the threats of bombing and invasion from Germany, had fought their way all the way from the beaches to the Osmonts' land, and faced continued fighting just up the road in the direction they were headed. They were for the most part brief visitors under violent circumstances, and they knew their stay would be short even as they and their hostess endured bombing and artillery barrages from the retreating Germans.

Other rather stark differences between the opposing occupiers may in part have arisen from these circumstantial differences. Especially with the passage of time, she observed a growing war-weariness in her German guests that was notably absent among the more-cheerful British contingents that came in their wake. This seemed especially evident in their singing. The Germans, who sang somewhat less often than their successors, sang wistful, even sad songs of their distant homeland and other such themes, and sang them in exquisite harmonies that qualified them as genuine music. The British seemed to sing more-spontaneously, with great ribaldry, louder, and with little to none of the nuance that characterizes actual melody. The British also seemed far more-larcenous, but that could very well have arisen from their awareness of their brief tenure there. Finally, they seemed little wearied by war; possibly many were innocent of combat prior to their arrival on the beaches of Normandy. As for veterans of Dunkirk, Greece, Crete, North Africa and such, one can only speculate if in fact they were less wearied by the most-wearisome experiences one might hope never to experience. Finally, the author charitably notes that the Germans, for all the vaunted superiority of their equipment, were execrable drivers, continually running over and knocking down structures of every description on the estate with their vehicles. But those British, as though driving on the left side of the road had better prepared them, drove "smoothly and precisely" in comparison to their Teutonic foes.

The author's accounts of mayhem on her neighbors and the livestock that lived with them were especially piteous as were, of course, her accounts of woundings and deaths among the soldiers of both sides. She likewise had many friends and relatives who lived in nearby Caen, where civilian casualties of the Allied bombing may have exceeded the civilian casualties from any other single place west of Germany. As the fighting on her side of Caen settled down to a murderous rhythm, she found her stables converted to a field hospital in which she, together with Allied medical personnel, took up the burden of caring for the wounded of both contending armies. In fact, in the invidious aftermath of these events, she found herself charged with collaboration for the courtesies and care she extended to those on the losing side of the war; she dispatched these with comparative ease.

Her account closes with a hideously dispiriting daytrip to ravaged Caen, which she had known well. Controversy regarding the necessity and even effect of the devastating Allied bombing raids on several cities of occupied France rages on to this day, as does a gruesome contest for primacy between two civilian-casualty figures. The deaths in Britain laid to German bombing of that country during World War II are reckoned in the neighborhood of 60,000 to 70,000. The deaths in France laid to Allied bombing of that country only a couple of years later also lie squarely in that range. The inconsequential question of which number is greater invariably resolved in favor of the devotional proclivities of whoever is making the comparison. But the comparison itself renders the answer moot, while a related question yields a seven-to-one ratio: that of the tonnages of bombs dropped by the Germans on Britain (75,000, including the V rockets) and by the Allies on France (518,000).

The lessons of war come to us but faintly, from old veterans with failing memories, from politicians fulminating on matters of national pride, from acre upon acre of headstones, and charred remnants of photographs and documents stiff with age and riddled with fakery.

For ourselves and our progeny, let us all and each of us attend with renewed perspicacity to the thankless task of winnowing from all this chaff, the most-vital truths that might be ours to gain.

Disorder in the Courts (1990-2000), Part 2

by Joseph P. Bellinger

The late Joseph Bellinger had intended the current article to be a chapter in a book that remained unpublished at the time of his death, The Prohibition of “Holocaust Denial.” Part One was published in the last issue of Inconvenient History. — Ed.

The Case of Abbé Pierre

In a non-related incident, 83-year-old Abbé Pierre, a highly popular, outspoken French Catholic priest who tirelessly campaigned on behalf of the homeless, ignited a similar controversy in France.

The French cleric provoked Jewish outrage when he stated during the course of an interview published in the Swiss daily Le Matin that “according to the Bible, the Jews committed genocide comparable with the Holocaust when they entered Palestine 11 or 12 centuries before the birth of Jesus.”<sup>[1]</sup>

Expanding on his theme, the Abbé declared:

There were not 6 million victims because of Hitler, there were 50 million. And of what importance is it that there were 6 or 7 or 5 million persecuted Jews? All my life I have been intrigued by the people of Israel, and reading the Bible I note that when Joshua crossed the Jordan to enter the Holy Land, he killed everyone down to the last chicken. It was the Shoah before the Shoah.<sup>[2]</sup>

As a result of his outspoken criticism of Zionism as a form of racism and his unabashed defense of accused “Holocaust denier,” Roger Garaudy, the Abbé was “punished” by being excluded from the “International League against Racism and Anti-Semitism.” Facing mounting criticism from his colleagues in France, Abbé Pierre was forced to seek refuge for a time in a monastery in northern Italy. During the Abbe’s self-imposed exile, Roger Garaudy rose to his defense and drafted a thirty-eight-page treatise entitled, “Response to the Media’s Lynching of Abbé Pierre and Roger Garaudy.”

Abbe Pierre, Founder of the Emmaus movement. Born 5 August 1912 in Lyon, France, died 22 January 2007 (aged 94) Paris, France

By ABBE_PIERRE-24x30-1999.jpg: Studio Harcourt derivative work: Manu (ABBE_PIERRE-24x30-1999.jpg) [CC BY 3.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/3.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Roger Garaudy

Garaudy's case attracted the attention of Muslims throughout the world when the 84-year-old former Catholic and convert to Islam was arraigned before a Paris court on February 27 1998 for statements made in his book Les Mythes fondateurs de la politique israelienne.<sup>[3]</sup>

Garaudy, a former Communist, was subsequently found guilty of “denying crimes against humanity” for expressing scholarly doubts over the “Holocaust” extermination story and for “racist defamation” related to his candid exposé detailing Jewish influence and domination in the Western media.

Immediately following the announcement of the court’s verdict, at least eight revisionists were assaulted and injured by thirty thugs representing the militant Jewish Youth Organization “Bethar.” Elderly revisionists were compelled to escape possible harm via an underground passage located below the building.[4]

French writer Roger Garaudy

See page for author [CC BY-SA 4.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/4.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Renewed Attempts to Outlaw “Holocaust Denial” in the United Kingdom

In Great Britain, a renewed drive to outlaw “Holocaust denial” erupted in 1996 at the behest of the usual instigators. The suggestion of enacting a “Holocaust-denial” bill similar to others existing in Israel and Europe was enthusiastically hailed by the Labor Party, and a motion was introduced to that effect by Labor legislator Michael Gapes, who declared, “There is no such thing as absolute freedom of speech. It is a question of balance.”[5]

Labor leader Tony Blair, during the course of a speech given during the opening of an Anne Frank exhibition, immediately lent his support to the bill, remarking that there was a “very strong case that denial of the Holocaust should be a specific offense,” and vowed to give “active consideration as to how this should be achieved.”[6]

Britain’s prime minister at the time, John Major, declared that in his view a “Holocaust denial” law was impractical, but voiced affirmations of empathy for the hurt and distress felt by those who “suffered at that time.” While not committing himself on the issue either way, the prime minister expressed his desire to first consult with members of the Jewish community in order to hear their opinions on the subject as they were the ones “most concerned with this matter.”

David Cesarani, a professor of modern Jewish history at Southampton University and director of London’s Wiener Library, was among the first to proclaim his enthusiastic support for the suggested bill and Blair’s offer to prosecute ‘deniers.’ In an article published in the Guardian on January 30, 1997, Cesarani cackled, “This is cheering news to the Board of Deputies of British Jews and others who have been calling for such legislation.”

Cesarani stressed the necessity of avoiding any open dialogue with revisionists, because “Debates simply give them credibility and offer a platform for a vile brand of racism.” In an astonishing statement Cesarani went so far as to proclaim that prosecuting individuals for thought crimes actually “strengthens free speech!”[7]

Obviously failing to recognize the irony inherent in his own statements, Cesarani postulated that “Holocaust denial,” rather than despotic laws and legislators who seek to prosecute and imprison individuals for freely expressing their opinions after conducting fully legitimate historical research, constitutes “an attack on truth and democracy.” Artfully employing all the usual catchphrases and buzzwords so often used in the media to elicit the proper emotional response in their intended audience, Cesarani liberally invoked words such as “racism,” and “rehabilitating Nazism,” whilst pleading “If we protect children against violence on TV, control pornography and outlaw racist acts, why should Holocaust survivors be left to the mercy of hate-mongers?”[8]

Cesarani’s emotionally laden appeal naturally overlooks the fact that adults are not children, and should not be treated as children by the paternal, disciplinarian hand of the government. Historical revisionism is in fact a valid method of historical methodology. Neither does “Holocaust” revisionism constitute any threat to octogenarian “Holocaust” survivors; unless he means to imply that they are somehow threatened by the truth. Thus, Cesarani’s attempts to equate “Holocaust” revisionism with racism, hate-mongering, child-endangerment, pornography, and threats to the elderly can only be described as a rather lurid example of what is usually known in the trade as “yellow journalism.”

Interestingly, when prodded by a reporter for his own views relative to the matter, David Irving, in contrast to Cesarani’s effusive outburst, pragmatically retorted, “I have never allowed the law to affect my research into history.”

Neville Nagler, Chief Executive for the Board of Deputies of British Jews, apparently disagreed with Irving’s definition of unhampered historical research. In a letter that was sent to the London Times and published on October 6, 1996, Nagler wrote:

We are delighted that the Labor party has voted for legislation to make it a criminal offense to deny the Holocaust... The Board of Deputies believes that the unique nature of the Holocaust justifies exceptional measures to prevent the willful and malicious falsification of history by neo-Nazi supporters... Denial forms a part of a political agenda which regards the Holocaust as a Jewish fabrication calculated to gain the sympathy of the world. Postwar societies have a duty to resist Nazism in all its guises and to reinforce the message to future generations. Holocaust denial is a spurious trap. It has no redeeming merit... Parliament should recognize the harm caused by Holocaust denial and support the creation of a specific criminal offense.[9]

In a well-reasoned editorial response to Nagler’s diatribe against revisionism that deserves to be quoted at length, Jeffrey Turner wrote:

It is quite true that some of the people who promote Holocaust revisionism are National Socialists, but a great many are not. [Among the many prominent names cited by Turner are French socialist and anti-Nazi Paul Rassinier, Robert Faurisson, Michael Hoffman II, Roger Garaudy, Fred Leuchter, and David Cole.]

But even if it could be proven that all Holocaust-deniers are motivated by a desire to resurrect “Nazism,” that would not justify their suppression. In a democracy, the exponents of every political viewpoint are supposed to be entitled to their rights and their freedoms. To deny these to people merely on the grounds that they are Nazis would be to practice the very methods of totalitarianism of which the original Nazis stood accused and which is cited as a major reason for rejecting their doctrines.

Mr. Nagler of course would not seem to agree. "Post-war societies," he says, "have a duty to resist Nazism in all its guises." Well, if he means that post-war societies should oppose Nazism by free discussion and debate, convincing people by superior argument that it was wrong, very few would question their right to do so. That, however, would not appear to be what he means; what he means, from his manner of approaching the subject, is that Nazism should not be tolerated in any shape or form, and that intolerance should include outright suppression and the locking up of anyone who dares to express a Nazi viewpoint!"

Does anyone seriously believe that Holocaust stories are pounded into our minds every day and sometimes for hours a day for no political motive? Indeed just such a political motive is made clear by the frantic urgency by which this practice is pursued, and by the quite fanatical zeal with which Holocaust affirmers try to prevent the expression of any contrary viewpoint.

If it is insulting to Jews to claim that the Holocaust never occurred, could it not be argued that it is insulting to Germans to claim that it did? Indeed, if Holocaust denial is to be forbidden on the grounds that its effect will be to stir up hatred against Jews, might not Holocaust affirmation be forbidden on the grounds that it will stir up hatred against Germans?[10]

The article concludes with a very sensible appeal to the public for reason to prevail over demagoguery, based upon the idea that any government confident of the inherent principles of justice and fair play on which it is founded should not fear open debate on any subject relevant to those fundamental principles and policies.

Turner's views were more or less shared by Chaim Bermant, a Jewish journalist with his own weekly column in the widely read London Jewish Chronicle. Bermant authored an eloquent appeal in support of free speech shortly before his death in January 1998, writing,

If the freedom of speech means anything at all, it includes the right to be wrong and tendentious, and the right even to cause offense. And if we, as Jews, now live in comparative security, it is largely because we have the good fortune to live in societies where such freedom is taken for granted. The whole process of historiography is one of revision, not only because new facts and documents come to light, but also because even established facts can be reassessed and reinterpreted, for one generation rarely sees events through the perspective of another. To demand laws that the received wisdom surrounding the Holocaust should forever be insulated from the process goes against every dictate of reason. Such laws are wrong in principle and are ineffective and possibly harmful in practice.[11]

On the other side of the coin, Bermant rather arbitrarily accuses revisionists of approaching the subject of the "Holocaust" with "preconceived views, selecting evidence to support their case and suppressing evidence which might contradict it." Bermant claims to have arrived at this general conclusion based upon his discussions with a few (unidentified) revisionists he had personally met with and later assessed as "confirmed anti-Semites." [12]

After specifically isolating revisionists as the primary reason for the proposed enactment of “Holocaust-denial” laws, Bermant nevertheless possessed enough good common sense to warn:

Any attempt to stifle their work, however, will always be open to the suspicion that one has something to hide. And nothing such people can say is quite as damaging as the suppression of their right to say it.[13]

In the midst of these controversies, European Union Commissioner Sir Leon Brittan, who is himself Jewish, came down hard on the suggestion that “Holocaust denial” should constitute a criminal offense throughout Europe. During the course of a speech addressed to Jewish community leaders, foreign diplomats and members of Parliament, Brittan warned that such laws represented a dangerous threat to civil liberties:

If we have a law to stop people saying things, even though they are palpably untrue, then God help us. I do not favor a law against Holocaust denial in the EU or in Britain either. It is one thing to incite hatred and another to express views, however disagreeable, on historic events.[14]

Eldred Tabachnik, president of the European Jewish Congress, voiced his displeasure over the commissioner’s comments and wailed over Britain’s perceived isolation from the rest of Europe, which had subserviently fallen into line by enacting “Holocaust-denial” legislation.

Tabachnik insisted that “Holocaust denial” was a matter of grave concern, “not only for Jews and other victims of Nazism, but for all democratic forces determined that neo-Nazi ideology should not be allowed to acquire political legitimacy in Europe.”[15]

In a letter specifically addressing the points raised by Eldred Tabachnik, who also happened to serve as the president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, Prime Minister John Major argued that adopting Tabachnik’s suggestions would be tantamount to “suppression of opinion.”

Peter Simple, in a column published in the London Daily Telegraph, added his voice of support for the prime minister, stressing his conviction that “freedom of thought is indivisible: a free people must be free to hold differing opinions, as on other matters, on those events, great and small, and occurring at different times and places which have come to be known collectively as ‘the Holocaust.’ Historians should be as free to conduct impartial research into the details of those events as they would be with any other historical phenomenon. If we make them conform to a previously ordained conclusion, we shall be adopting totalitarian methods of thought- control ourselves.”[16]

Nettled by the persuasive arguments and warnings of free-speech advocates, the irrepressible Board of Jewish Deputies nevertheless vowed to continue to pressure the British government to outlaw “Holocaust denial.”

Board Chief Executive Neville Nagler opined, “Our view is that this is not a matter of free speech. Denying the Holocaust is an anti-Semitic stance that is intended to cause offense.”[17]

To the great vexation of numerous Jewish organizations, British Home Secretary Michael Howard, whose Jewish family emigrated from Rumania to Britain in 1938, vigorously blocked attempts to introduce “Holocaust-denial” laws in the United Kingdom. For his efforts, Howard received the enthusiastic support of many grass-roots British organizations.

In an attempt to placate critics, Howard proposed a compromise whereby “each of the organization’s 15 member states would seize racist literature published with the intention of inciting racial hatred.”[18]

Editorials published throughout the British press generally praised Howard’s initiative, as is reflected in the following passage excerpted from the Daily Express:

To oppose the EU policy is not to show oneself soft on racism, but to show oneself passionate for freedom...Mr. Howard, a much-maligned minister, has done the right thing in vetoing this plan. Free men and women through Europe should thank him for it.[19]

For the time being, Great Britain had weathered the storm to assail and dismantle its civil liberties. England’s rich heritage guaranteeing free speech for all had prevailed, but Jewish efforts to undermine these rights and pressure the government into compliance with their agenda would continue unabated, with renewed determination and intensity. Jewish organizations continued to look toward Tony Blair’s Labor Party as the most adventitious means of effecting compliance with their agenda.

The year 1997 raised new challenges to civil liberties throughout Europe. In Paris, Jean-Marie Le Pen, the popular leader of the National Front, was charged with and convicted of “the crime of denying Nazi crimes against humanity” when he dismissed the gas chambers of World War two as a “detail in history” during the course of an interview in Munich, Germany.[20]

After nine alleged ‘civil rights groups’ filed a formal complaint against him, Le Pen was ordered to pay $50,000 to publish the court’s judgment in a dozen French newspapers.

Le Pen accused the French government of malicious prosecution and justified his statement by remarking “if you take a book of 2000 pages on this war, the concentration camps fill two pages and the gas chambers take up 10 to 12 lines. That’s what you call a detail.”[21]

In 1987 Le Pen had made similar comments and was convicted by the same court, which ordered him to pay $200,000 “restitution” to each of the nine complaining “civil rights organizations” that had filed suit against him.

The Simon Wiesenthal Center was in the forefront of organizations clamoring for Le Pen’s prosecution. Shimon Samuels, head of the center’s “European branch,” brazenly called for “the waiver of Le Pen’s European Parliamentary immunity in order that he be liable for prosecution and declared ineligible for further European election.”[22]

Samuels also dispatched an irate letter to Bavarian State President Edmund Stoiber in which he demanded that Le Pen be banned from re-entering Bavaria, as “his presence in the shadow of Dachau [concentration camp] is a desecration for all victims of Nazism.”[23]

All histrionics aside, the more prosaic fact remains that Le Pen’s hefty court-ordered payment of $200,000 to each of the nine complaining ‘civil rights organizations’ seemed to indicate that ‘desecration’ proved to be a profitable venture for all concerned, with the exception of Le Pen.

Profits continued to accrue for the “International League against Racism and Anti-Semitism” when in March 1997, Gabriel Andreas, the editor of a periodical entitled “Rot un Wiss,” [Red and White], received a suspended six-month jail sentence and a fine of $5,200 to be paid to the “League against Racism’ for publishing articles which questioned the existence of homicidal gas chambers at Struthof, a former concentration camp situated near the French-German border. Despite the fact that mainstream historians do not claim that six million Jews were gassed at Struthof, and that Andreas neither claimed nor implied that the “Holocaust” never occurred, he was nevertheless found guilty of “denying the Holocaust.”[24]

Pedro Varela Convicted

In Spain, just two weeks prior to Christmas 1996, book confiscations and arrest were the order of the day when police raided the bookstore Librería Europa in Barcelona. Police seized the entire inventory of twenty thousand books, taking into custody bookstore owner Pedro Varela, who at the time of the raid was 39, on suspicion of “defending genocide.” Deprived of his freedom and livelihood, Varela was left with no other option than to close down his book business.

Professor Fernando Savater of the University of Madrid decried the police raid and the laws that had made it possible, warning that such arbitrary actions constituted a palpable threat to civil liberties. The professor intoned that such laws were setting a dangerous precedent and voiced his dismay over the fact that the raid was generally hailed in the liberal media as a “victory for progress.”[25]

Two years passed before Valera’s case was finally adjudicated, after which the hapless book vendor was sentenced to five years’ imprisonment. The Jewish community organization of Barcelona [ATID] assisted the prosecution in preparing its case against Valera.

During the course of the two-day trial, Valera’s two attorneys vainly argued for an acquittal and implored the court to declare the law under which their client had been charged unconstitutional.

The defendant had been charged and convicted of offering thirty books for sale that presented Adolf Hitler in a favorable light, defended the policies of the Third Reich, and presented revisionist arguments with respect to the “Holocaust.”

In attempting to defend himself against these accusations, Varela drew the court’s attention to the fact that he had never provoked or encouraged racial hatred and that as a historian, he “has the moral duty to tell the truth.”[26]

In support of his personal integrity, Varela stated, “Every historian must be skeptical of everything and must also review what has been said thus far. Revisionists question the scope and degree of the alleged persecutions of National Socialist Germany.”[27]

In his concluding statement, Varela reiterated his innocence before the court, reaffirming that he had never committed, advocated, or otherwise promoted genocide or any other form of violence directed against innocent people.

The court took no apparent notice of Varela’s impassioned protestations of innocence and fined the accused the equivalent of $5,000 in addition to the five-year sentence. In addition, the court ordered that his entire inventory of 20,000 books be consigned to the flames, in spite of the fact that only 30 titles out of 200 had been deemed to be in violation of the law.

It may be reasonably inferred that Varela’s unapologetic admiration for Adolf Hitler and the policies of the Third Reich played a crucial role in his prosecution and to date Varela is the only known individual to be tried under Spain’s ambiguously worded ‘genocide law.’ One will search in vain for a similar case being filed against left-wing activists who deny, minimize, apologize for or trivialize Bolshevism’s murderous persecution of Christianity or Stalin’s program of mass extermination of the Ukrainians.

Professor Robert Hepp

In yet another bizarre example of German jurisprudence, Professor Robert Hepp, a University of Osnabrueck professor of sociology, was found guilty in 1998 of contravening the law by writing a sentence in Latin, appearing as footnote number 74 in a 544-page book lauding the career of German historian Hellmut Diwald.

The book under investigation, Helmut Diwald: His Legacy for Germany, had been scoured by state prosecutors for passages that might constitute a violation of “Holocaust denial” laws. The offending footnote condemned by the court referred to claims of systematic extermination of Jews by means of cyanide gas at Auschwitz as a “fable” [fabula].

The court ruled that this sentence constituted ‘incitement’ and vilified the memory of the [Jewish] dead, thereby resulting in a breach of “trust in legal security of Jews living in the Federal Republic [of Germany], and considerably diminishing their mental-emotional ability to live in peace and freedom.”[28]

On the basis of this one sentence written in Latin and buried in a footnote, the court ordered all extant copies of the book confiscated throughout the length and breadth of Germany, thereafter to be destroyed in a garbage-burning facility. This would be “democratic” Germany’s legacy to Helmut Diwald.

The 1990s might well be described as the “decade of book burnings in the name of democracy.” That the good name of democracy should be so vilely abused in this regard constitutes a scandal which would undoubtedly cause the former propaganda minister of Nazi Germany to blush with envy. In the final decade of the 20th century, thousands upon thousands of books were confiscated by the authorities and quietly consigned to destruction. The names of revisionist authors whose books have been confiscated, banned or destroyed by the authorities in the finest totalitarian tradition are Ingrid Weckert, (Feuerzeichen), American author John Sack, (Eye for an Eye), Ernst Gauss, et. al., (Foundations of Contemporary History), Serge Thion, (Historical or Political Truth? The Power of the Media: The Faurisson Case), Steffen Werner, (The Second Babylonian Captivity), John C. Ball, (The Ball Report), and miscellaneous titles by Germar Rudolf, Arthur Butz, Roger Garaudy, Jürgen Graf, and Otto-Ernst Remer.

In the July 1997 issue of his Action Report, under the heading “Books banned and burned,” British historian David Irving succinctly described the methodology employed by the German government in stifling free speech and historical inquiry. Irving writes,

All property is abandoned when a magistrate orders the Seizure and Destruction of a title. Police raid the publisher at dawn, search the premises and seize any other banned books they find as well...The police seize the publisher’s computerized customer database – a violation of the country’s data protection laws. Any customers found to have purchased two or more copies of the now banned title is also raided: his computers are seized and searched for names, and his bookshelves are scoured for further prohibited titles. The customers are fined or jailed for possession of titles which were not even banned at the time they purchased them. It is easy to get a criminal record in the new democratic Germany.[29]

The confiscation and destruction of indexed books in the “new democratic Germany” is in many respects merely a continuation of Allied occupation policy in Germany during the period 1946-1950. The victorious Allied powers in the western zones of occupation based their censorship policy upon a prior order issued by Soviet authorities on September 9, 1945.

Eight months later, the Allied Control Council issued Order No. 4 on May 13, 1946, which concerned the confiscation and destruction of literature “of a military nature” as well as select titles published prior to and during the National Socialist era.

Detailed lists of indexed books, authors and publications, which had been originally compiled by the Soviets, were adopted by the western occupying powers and distributed amongst specially created bureaus specifically formed to identify, seek out and destroy Nationalist Socialist publications or literature deemed to be militaristic. It is estimated that in 1946 alone 34,000 titles were confiscated and destroyed, including all schoolbooks printed from 1933-1945.

By way of contrast, book titles banned by the National Socialist regime were usually secreted in libraries and various archives, whilst Allied policy in all four zones of occupation dictated that all confiscated literature was to be utterly destroyed. The Allied occupation forces ordered that all state and local libraries, universities and higher institutions of education and learning, research institutes and academies, scientific institutes, elementary and secondary schools, privately owned bookstores as well as publishing houses, were to be scoured for all books that, in the opinion of the Allies, “constituted National Socialist propaganda, propagated race theories, preached incitement to violence, or directed propaganda against the United Nations.” When found, all titles were to be set aside, confiscated and destroyed.

This unprecedented ransacking of schools and libraries by government decree unquestionably qualifies as the most relentless obliteration of books and literature in contemporary human history.

Outside Germany, Jewish organizations rebounded quickly from the setback in Great Britain and launched a new offensive calculated to refocus public attention on the subject of revisionism.

On June 28, 1998, an article published on the front page of the Athens News underscored on-going efforts by the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, who pressed for a unified response to Holocaust revisionism worldwide. In part, the article stated:

An international conference of Jewish jurists, held in the northern Greek city of Thessaloniki, warned that the international revisionist movement, using the Internet and an orchestrated propaganda campaign, could warp the historical memory of younger generations.<sup>[30]</sup>

Itzhak Nener, an Israeli national and deputy president of the Association, alluded to the California-based Institute for Historical Review as an organization “whose real aim is to deny the Holocaust.” Moreover, Nener warned that the “denial movement” has ‘tremendous sums of money’ at its disposal.<sup>[31]</sup>

The stated aim of the conference was to convince more than twenty European countries to enact more-stringent “Holocaust-denial” laws to punish revisionists. Voicing his displeasure over the current sentences provided by law, Nener recommended that more countries “crack down on people claiming the Nazi slaughter of Jews never took place.”<sup>[32]</sup>

Another participant of the conference, Isidor Wolfe, a lawyer from Vancouver, Canada, exclaimed, “This growing revisionist group is using web sites to make amazingly ridiculous claims, like that they measured the gas chambers and found they were not big enough for people.”

The Jewish jurists were also highly critical of Bradley Smith’s Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust, articulating their displeasure over the fact that the organization regularly sends “information packets” through the U. S. mail to college newspapers and “takes out advertisements for videos and books that claim Allied soldiers faked evidence of the Holocaust.”[\[33\]](#)

Emphasizing the scope and urgency of the matter under discussion, the legal experts referred to these efforts as “historical manipulation,” and declared “No one should have to prove that the Holocaust took place.”[\[34\]](#)

Mark Weber, director of the Institute for Historical Review, characterized Nener’s allegations regarding the financial resources of the international revisionist movement as “absurd.” In addition, the jurist’s statements “grotesquely misrepresent revisionist arguments and findings...If revisionist arguments were really as absurd as these Jewish legal experts contend, there would hardly be a need for laws to punish anyone espousing them.”[\[35\]](#)

In Weber’s view, the convocation of the conference itself served to “confirm the tremendous importance of the “Holocaust” story for Jewish-Zionist interests,” and underscored their “inability...to respond to revisionist evidence and arguments with compelling evidence of their own.”[\[36\]](#)

Based upon their past record, the director of the IHR predicted that the call for harsher anti-revisionist laws was likely to be successful, in that European governments “have generally been unwilling to resist Jewish demands for money or legal measures directed against real or perceived enemies”[\[37\]](#)

Dariusz Ratajczak

In Poland, events related to “Holocaust denial” proceeded along a more-sinister course when Professor Dariusz Ratajczak was suspended from his job at the Historical Institute of the University of Opole after state prosecutors received complaints about a book he had authored entitled Dangerous Themes. In this book, the author presented revisionist arguments claiming that the gas chambers in Nazi camps were used to kill lice on clothes and prisoners and refers to testimony from eyewitnesses as “useless.” In addition, the book made reference to mainstream researchers of Nazi crimes as “followers of the religion of the Holocaust” who impose on others “a false image of the past.”

Prosecutors subsequently charged Ratajczak with violation of Polish law, which bans public denial of Nazi and communist crimes. Prosecutor Roman Wawrzynek stated that if convicted, the popular professor could face up to three years’ imprisonment.

During the trial hearing that followed, Ratajczak defended himself by stating that he had merely summarized the opinions of historians who deny the existence of homicidal gas chambers and protested that his own views were not in line with all the opinions cited in his book.

In his opening statement to the court, Ratajczak proclaimed:

Historical revisionism is a historical and social fact. A historian must not close his eyes to it...my only intention was to present the problem...without author's commentary.

The Polish historian also emphatically insisted that approximately three million Jews died during the course of the "Holocaust," and not six million, as is generally maintained by most mainstream "Holocaust" historians, and underlined his conviction that the Nazis possessed no systematic plan to exterminate the Jews of Europe.

Although the charges preferred against him were eventually dismissed, Ratajczak was deprived of his livelihood and his book was withdrawn from circulation. A Jewish community leader referred to the verdict as "outrageous," and "a poor testimonial to Polish democracy," and vowed that the Jewish community would protest.

Swiss educator and revisionist author Jürgen Graf, a man personally acquainted with the forces of repression and censorship, offered insightful observations in respect to the case of Darius Ratajczak:

There is concern that Ratajczak's acquittal will be overturned on appeal as a result of pressure from the Jewish Lobby, which is extraordinarily powerful in Poland. Especially vicious in the hate campaign against him has been the Jew Adam Michnik, who was a prominent "dissident" during the communist era.

Dr. Dariusz Ratajczak is a man of firm political and religious convictions, a man of character. Such men are disliked by the government of "liberal democratic" Poland no less than they were by the government of the Polish "people's democracy."[\[38\]](#)

In his book, Ratajczak himself clearly understood the consequences ultimately faced by those who decide to risk their entire livelihood and reputation in the service of truth. Living under the sword of Damocles, with no further opportunity to support himself and his family in Poland, the highly gifted Ratajczak retreated to England where he was reduced to earning a scanty living by means of menial labor in fulfillment of his own prophecy:

The results are often tragic: social exclusion (everyone has the friends he deserves), muzzling of journalistic and publishing activities, and, finally, professional ruin.[\[39\]](#)

Further Examples of German Injustice

In Germany, the wheels of repression continued to grind inexorably when Mannheim attorney Ludwig Block was arraigned before a court on charges of "denying the Holocaust" as a consequence of his too-vigorous defense of his former client, Günter Deckert. The hapless Block was cited for his use of fifty arguments presented for the consideration of the court during Deckert's trial. Although many of Block's arguments were tossed out of court by the presiding judge during the course of the trial, he was nevertheless charged with having had the temerity to present them in the first place!

At about the same time, German right-wing activist Manfred Roeder received a sentence of two years' imprisonment on a charge of "Holocaust denial," and "incitement of the people."

On the first day of his trial, the flamboyant Roeder, attired in knickerbockers and checkered jacket, strode into the courtroom at Grevesmuehlen flanked by scores of enthusiastic supporters.

Responding to the clicks of multiple cameras, Roeder proclaimed that only his Christian faith would be able to help him resist the overwhelming preponderance of Jewish influence which threatened to squeeze the life out of Germany. Brandishing a Bible in his hands, the 72-year-old Roeder obligingly held it aloft at the request of media photographers and proclaimed: “The Bible is my last defense against Jewish tyranny, since other recognized forms of evidence are not permitted.”[\[40\]](#)

During the course of an NPD meeting which he had hosted in August 1998 Roeder was alleged to have publicly denied “the genocide of the European Jews by the National Socialists.” Prosecutors charged that during this meeting, while speaking to his audience on the subject of the “Holocaust”, Roeder imprudently added the phrase, “as you well know never happened.”

Roeder disputed the statement attributed to him and contested a taped recording of the speech that was introduced into evidence, claiming that the item had been tampered with by a member of the “Jewish Reuters Press Agency.”[\[41\]](#)

In turn the prosecutor called three witnesses to the stand who testified that Roeder had made the comments in question. The prosecution raised additional objections to Roeder’s comments in respect to the “Holocaust,” when the latter asserted that he had spent time in the same cell with the former commandant of Auschwitz and asseverated, “Therefore I know what I am talking about.”

State prosecutor Wulf Kollorz later referred to Roeder’s statement as an ‘evil outburst,’ and made a motion to the court to confine all further statements from the accused to writing, in order to “spare the court any further painful theatrics’ on the part of the defendant.

Roeder brusquely responded by remarking, “I as a German have less rights here than the smallest minorities.”

Manfred Roeder fully recognized that he would not walk out of court as a free man, and therefore brought his case to the attention of the public by the liberal use of provocative tactics.

For example, Roeder requested that the Israeli ambassador be called to the witness stand, along with former German chancellors Helmut Kohl, Gerhard Schroeder, and other prominent individuals. In like manner, accused attorney Ludwig Block compiled a similar list of prominent witnesses in order to “consider the fact that massive political interests are hindering the breakthrough of the Holocaust’s historical truth.”[\[42\]](#)

One of the highlights of his trial occurred when Roeder turned to the judge and declared, “Nothing against you, judge, but even you are suspended 10 centimeters above ground, just like everyone else in this country.”

At these words, the spectators in the public gallery burst out with cries of “Bravo!, and “Hear, Hear!,” whilst members of the press shook their heads in disbelief.

Unsurprisingly, the media evinced nary a shred of sympathy for the accused and a reporter described him as,

...a dinosaur from a past age - a slobbering 70-year old with a pompous face. An observer is tempted to view him as a tragic figure – which would be a fatal error. In 1982, Roeder, who was sentenced to 13 years as the ringleader of a “terror-group” knows exactly what he is doing. “We want to provoke,” he says in the direction of his young supporters, “even with such trials.[43]

The curt media description of Roeder’s past ‘terrorism’ is a reference to Roeder’s pivotal role in founding the Deutschen Aktionsgruppen [German Action Groups] in 1980, who were said to have initiated attacks upon buildings offering sanctuary to asylum seekers and illegal aliens living in Germany. Roeder was released after having served eight years for good behavior and perceived social rehabilitation.

In fact, Manfred Roeder has come into frequent conflict with the German authorities, primarily due to his conviction that Germany continues to be an occupied country still under the heel of the Allied conquerors. In 1996 Roeder was charged with vandalism after taking offense at an exhibit in Erfurt that detailed the alleged crimes of the German Wehrmacht in the Second World War. In September 2004 he was charged in Frankfurt with ‘contempt of the state,’ and again in February 2005 for the same offense by a court in Schalmstadt. On May 12, 2005, he began serving his sentence in Giessen.

At the announcement of his verdict in 1999, presiding Judge Robert Piepel agreed with the prosecutor that it was the solemn duty of the court to punish the accused with “necessary severity” and ordered that Roeder be imprisoned for two years for the crime of expressing his opinion.

With respect to “necessary severity” it should be mentioned that Germany’s “Holocaust-denial” laws are so bizarrely formulated and interpreted that, for example, whosoever should publicly declare that the First World War never took place, would perhaps provoke in people a few smiles or chuckles, and certainly would not find themselves tossed into a prison for five years. By comparison, if one were to state, under present German law, that the Second World War never occurred, an energetic state prosecutor could draw from that statement the conclusion that one was also implying that the Holocaust never occurred, and for that reason the hapless culprit might soon find himself handcuffed by the police and charged with “Holocaust denial.”

As might be expected, as the final decade of the Twentieth Century came to an end, the number of individuals prosecuted for thought-related crimes reached a crescendo.

In Germany alone, the list of victims of increased exponentially. Many of the victims were elderly and in various stages of declining health. Among the few names among many that might be presently cited, some will be familiar to us, although most will not, yet each and every one of them shares similar trials and tribulations: Udo Walendy, who at the age of 72 was still languishing in prison serving a three-year sentence, suffering with progressive heart disease, Günter Deckert, 57, served five years for expressing his opinion, Erhard Kemper, 70, arrested, released, recharged and re-sentenced. Fritz Rebhandel, 80, a former journalist and historian, who was sentenced to four years’ imprisonment in spite of the fact that he was seriously ill. Herbert Schweiger, 73, author, sentenced to 25 months in jail. Engineer Emil Lachout, who found himself in a similar situation as American poet Ezra Pound, who was railroaded in a political show trial and declared by court-appointed psychiatrists to be of “unsound mind.” Franz Radl, a student, received up to three years’ imprisonment for passing out flyers. Jürgen Graf, teacher, author, historian, linguist, sentenced to 18 months, now living in exile. Arthur Vogt, 80 years of age and ailing, one year’s imprisonment. Tiudar Rudolph, 92, repeatedly incarcerated for expressing unpopular opinions. General Major Otto Ernst Remer, 85, sentenced to two years’ imprisonment, succeeded in fleeing to Spain with the help of friends, where he died whilst confined to a wheelchair after living four years in exile. His crime? Seeking to come to terms with his nation's past and determine what did or did not occur in the concentration camps during the war years.

As the world prepared to enter the 21st Century, public attention was once again riveted on the issue of "Holocaust denial" when Germar Rudolf, who had sought asylum in Great Britain, fled to American shores after an article published in the Sunday Telegraph revealed the fact that he had been secretly hiding in Great Britain under his wife's maiden name. The "expose" duplicitously referred to Rudolf as a "neo-Nazi," who had "absconded in 1995 rather than serve a 14-month jail sentence for breaching Germany's Holocaust-denial legislation."[\[44\]](#)

Revealingly, the Telegraph completely sidestepped the issue of the German government's irrational persecution of an incorruptible researcher whose only "crime" had been to apply the same standards of evidence to the "Holocaust" as are applied to any other alleged crime of this magnitude. Instead, the newspaper groaned over the fact that Rudolf had dared to question the allegation that millions of Jews had died in the gas chambers of Auschwitz.

Many independent observers felt at the time that Rudolf had been victimized, denounced and fed to the media wolves. As if on cue, a second pack of wolves commonly identified by their determination to squelch free speech and historical inquiry, vented their rage over the fact that Rudolf had been openly living as a free man in Great Britain over a period of three years.

Rudolf's case provided the usual suspects with the pretext they needed to try and reintroduce legislation outlawing "Holocaust denial" in Great Britain.

Andrew Dismore, the Labor MP for Hendon and a member of the Council against Anti-Semitism, said: "I think a case like this can only strengthen the case for Holocaust-denial legislation to be introduced in Britain. I hope the German authorities will take immediate action to deal with this man. I intend to refer the case to the Director of Public Prosecutions."

Lord Janner, chairman of the Holocaust Education Trust, threatened to refer Rudolf's case to the Home Secretary.

In fact, such public fanfaronades constituted an act of bathos that amounted to much ado about nothing while British authorities and media pundits acted as if they had nabbed Adolf Hitler himself. As a consequence of the hysteria whipped up by the British press, Jewish organizations and supportive politicians, Germar Rudolf fled to the United States and applied for political asylum.

Thus, those revisionists who were still able fled from political persecution seeking refuge in the few bastions of free speech remaining in Europe and North America.

Conversely, the determined opponents of free expression resolutely sought to seal off these few remaining sanctuaries, tightening a noose around the necks of the exiles, as otherwise-enlightened European nations succumbed in turn to the combined pressure of international Jewish organizations and the German government to outlaw "Holocaust denial."

This phenomenon, essentially unique within the 20th and 21st Centuries, constitutes a form of mass hysteria similar to the outbreak of Tarantism and the witch-hunts so closely identified with medieval Europe.

Revisionists, skeptics, truth-seekers, intellectuals and free thinkers throughout Europe have been relentlessly persecuted, prosecuted, reviled, beaten, exiled, ostracized, imprisoned, hounded, harassed, hunted, pursued from nation to nation, deprived of liberty, family, livelihood and sustenance, turned into pariahs and outlaws, calumniated, slandered and libeled as “racists, bigots, heretics, liars, hate-mongers, deniers, neo-Nazis and anti-Semites.”

Neither appeals before the Court of Human Rights, Amnesty International, nor the Vatican has resulted in relief or succor; all alike have turned their backs on the plight of revisionist scholars.

]Notes:

[1]	“Abbe’ Plays down Holocaust Figure,” International Herald Tribune (Paris), June 8, 1996.
[2]	Ibid.
[3]	An English-language edition of Roger Garaudy’s book has been published by the Institute for Historical Review under the title The Founding Myths of Modern Israel .
[4]	Mark Weber, “French Courts Punish Holocaust Apostasy,” The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 17, No. 2, March / April 1998, pp. 17-18.
[5]	“Blair Favors Holocaust Denial Ban,” The Guardian , (London), January 30, 1997, p. 8.
[6]	Ibid.
[7]	“Why we must outlaw these race lies,” The Guardian , (London), January 30, 1997, p. 19.
[8]	Ibid.
[9]	“Rationale for Suppression,” Spearhead , Nov., 1996. p. 4
[10]	Ibid.
[11]	“Wrong way to combat those in the wrong,” Jewish Chronicle , (London), May 10, 1996, “Opinion Section.”
[12]	Ibid.
[13]	Ibid.
[14]	“Brittan opposes Euro-law against Holocaust Denial,” Jewish Chronicle , (London), May 10, 1996, p. 9.
[15]	“Leaders Blast Britain over Holocaust Denial,” Forward , (New York), March 29, 1996, p. 9.
[16]	“No,” Daily Telegraph , (London) October 22, 1999, p. 28.
[17]	“Brittan opposes Euro-law against Holocaust Denial,” Jewish Chronicle , (London), p. 9.
[18]	“Leaders Blast Britain Over Holocaust Denial,” Jewish Forward , March 29, 1996, p. 9.

[19]	Daily Express , 25 November 1995, Opinion section.
[20]	“French Far-Right Leader Convicted of Slighting Holocaust,” The New York Times , December 27, 1997, p. A5.
[21]	Ibid.
[22]	Agence France Presse , (Bonn), Dec. 8, 1997.
[23]	Ibid.
[24]	“Journalist Fined For WW II Story,” The Christian News , March 31, 1997, p. 2.
[25]	David Irving’s Action Report , No. 12, July 1997, p. 23.
[26]	“Spanish Court Sentences ‘Thought Criminal,’” The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 17, No. 6, November-December, 1998, p. 21.
[27]	Ibid.
[28]	“Prof. Hepp ein Volksverhetzer?,” Nation und Europa , (Coburg), July-August 1998, Heft. 7-8, p. 37.
[29]	David Irving’s Action Report , AR no. 12, July 1997.
[30]	“Jewish Jurists Fight Holocaust Denial,” Athens News , June 28, 1998, p. 1.
[31]	“Fight Over Holocaust Denial,” International Herald Tribune , June 29, 1998, p. 30.
[32]	“Jewish Jurists Fight Holocaust Denial,” Athens News , June 28, 1998, p. 1, cited above.
[33]	“Fight over Holocaust Denial,” International Herald Tribune , June 29, 1998, p. 30
[34]	Ibid.
[35]	“Jewish Group Demands More Anti-Revisionist Laws,” The Journal for Historical Review Vol. 17, No. 4, July-August 1998, p. 22.
[36]	Ibid.
[37]	Ibid.
[38]	“No Punishment for Polish ‘Holocaust Denier,’” The Journal of Historical Review Vol. 18, No. 5-6, Sept.-Dec., 1999, p. 47.
[39]	Ibid.
[40]	“Rechtsextremist Roeder nutzt den Gerichtssaal als Buehne,” Die Welt , November 26, 1999.
[41]	Ibid.
[42]	“Freedoms under Attack,” The Spotlight , (Washington, D.C.) 23 August 1999, p. 11.
[43]	“Rechtsextremist Roeder nutzt den Gerichtssaal als Buehne,” Die Welt , November 26, 1999, cited above.

[44] “German neo-Nazi fugitive is found hiding in Britain,” Sunday Telegraph, (London), October 17, 1999.

Rethinking "Mein Kampf" | CODOH

by Thomas Dalton

On 1 January 2016, Mein Kampf came out of copyright. It has now been 70 years since the author's death, and by international copyright law, legal protection for the book has expired. Thus it is perhaps a good time to reconsider and reexamine this most notorious work—and perhaps to banish some of the many myths surrounding it to history.

In fact, we are long overdue for a revisionist treatment of this work. In my experience, very few people really understand what's in it. The common man, even the well-educated one, likely knows little more than the title and the author. Revisionists who work on the Holocaust or either of the world wars often bypass the book completely, as if it had no relevance at all; most likely, they have never read it. Traditional journalists, academics, and alleged experts frequently display their ignorance by taking passages out of context, overlooking key facts, or simply failing to cite the author appropriately. More generally, the mainstream approach to Mein Kampf seems to be rather similar to its tactics with regard to Holocaust revisionism: ignore, censor, or disparage. It is simply too problematic to discuss this work in a fashion that might lead readers to ask tough questions, or to seek out the book itself.

A large part of the reason for the book's obscurity is the sorry state of its many English translations. These will be discussed and critiqued below. This is also one of the reasons that I am currently working on a new, parallel German-English translation—the first ever, in fact. I will attempt to remedy many of the shortcomings in current versions, and provide something of a revisionist perspective on the entire work. In the present essay, I examine the translations, discuss some main themes of the book, and argue for its relevance in the present day.

A Most Consequential Work

Mein Kampf is the autobiography and articulated worldview of one of the most consequential and visionary leaders in world history. It is also one of the most maligned and misrepresented texts of the 20th century. There have been so many obfuscations, deceptions, and outright falsehoods circulated about this work that one scarcely knows where to begin. Nonetheless, the time has come to set the story straight.

That Adolf Hitler would even have undertaken such a work is most fortunate. Being neither a formal academic nor a natural writer, and being fully preoccupied with pragmatic matters of party-building, he might never have begun such a major task—were it not for the luxury of a year-long jail term. In one of the many ironies of Hitler's life, it took just such an adverse event to prompt him to dictate his party's early history and his own life story. This would become Volume One of his two-part, 700-page magnum opus. It would have a dramatic effect on world history, and initiate a chain of events that has yet to fully play out. In this sense, Mein Kampf is as relevant today as when it was first written.

Display of Copies of Hitlers Mein Kampf - Documentation Center in Congress Hall - Nuremberg-Nurnberg - Germany

By Adam Jones, Ph.D. (Own work) [CC BY-SA 3.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Perhaps the place to begin is with the rationale for the book. Why did Hitler write it at all? Clearly it was not a requirement; many major politicians in history have come and gone without leaving a personal written record. Even his time in prison could have been spent communicating with party leaders, building support, soliciting allies, and so on. But he chose to spend much of his stay documenting the origins and growth of his new movement. And this was a boon to history as well as to understanding of the human spirit.

The work at hand seems to have served at least four purposes for its author. First, it is autobiographical. This aspect consumes most of the first two chapters, and is repeatedly woven into the remainder of Volume One. For those curious about the first 35 years of Hitler's life, this aspect is invaluable. It gives an accurate and relevant account of his upbringing, his education, and the early development of his worldview. Like any good autobiography, it provides an irreplaceable first-hand description of a life. But as well, it offers the usual temptation to cast events in a flattering light, to downplay shortcomings, or to bypass inconvenient episodes. On this count, Hitler fares well; he provides an honest and open life story, devoid of known fabrications or omissions—one that is essential for understanding his thinking and attitudes on social, economic, and political matters.

Second, Mein Kampf is a kind of history lesson on Europe around the turn of the 20th century. Hitler was a proximate observer—and often first-hand witness—to many of the major events of the time. He served in the trenches of World War One for more than four years, which was virtually the entire duration of the war. Serving on the 'losing' side, he naturally gives a different interpretation of events than is commonly portrayed by historians of the victorious nations. But this fact should be welcomed by any impartial observer, and in itself makes the book worth reading. With rare exceptions—such as Jünger's Storm of Steel—no other non-fiction contemporary German source of this time is readily available in English. For those interested in the Great War and its immediate aftermath, this book is irreplaceable.

In its third aspect, the book serves to document the origins and basic features of Hitler's worldview. This, unsurprisingly, is the most distorted part of the book, in standard Western versions. Here we find the insights and trigger events that led a young man without formal higher education to develop a strikingly visionary, expansive, and forward-looking ideology. Hitler's primary concern, as we read, was the future and well-being of the German people—all Germans, regardless of the political unit in which they lived. The German people, or Volk, were, he believed, a single ethnicity with unique and singular self-interests. They were—indisputably—responsible for many of the greatest achievements in Western history. They were among the leading lights in music, literature, architecture, science, and technology. They were great warriors, and great nation-builders. They were, in large part, the driving force behind Western civilization itself. Hitler was justly proud of his heritage. Equally is he outraged at the indignities suffered by this great people in then-recent decades—culminating in the disastrous humiliation of World War I and the Treaty of Versailles. He seeks, above all, to remedy these injustices and restore the mantle of greatness to the German people. To do this, he needs to identify both their primary opponents and the defective political ideologies and structures that bind them. Then he undertakes to outline a new socio-political system that can carry them forward to a higher and rightful destiny.

Finally, in its fourth aspect, Mein Kampf is a kind of blueprint for action. It describes the evolution and aims of National Socialism and the NSDAP, or Nazi Party, in compelling detail. Hitler naturally wants his new movement to succeed in assuming power in Germany and in a future German Reich. But this is no theoretical analysis. Hitler is nothing if not pragmatic. He has concrete goals and specific means of achieving them. He has nothing but disdain for the geistige Waffen, the intellectual weapons, of the impotent intelligentsia. He demands results, and success.

Importantly, his analysis is, in large part, independent of context. It does not pertain only to Germans, or only to the circumstances of the mid-1920s. It is a broadly universal approach based on the conditions of the modern world, and on human nature. As such, Hitler's analysis of action is relevant and useful for many people today—for all those who might strive for national greatness in body and spirit.

This complex textual structure of Mein Kampf explains some of the complaints of modern-day critics who decry Hitler's lack of 'coherence' or 'narrative flow.' He has many objectives here, and in their implementation, many points overlap. Perhaps he should have written four books, not one. Perhaps. But Hitler was a doer, not a writer. We must accept this fact, take what we have, and do our best to understand it in an open and objective fashion. He was not striving for a best-selling novel. He wanted to document history and advance a movement, and to these ends he succeeded most admirably.

Origins and Context

Born on 20 April 1889 in present-day Austria, Hitler grew up as a citizen of the multi-ethnic state known as the Austro-Hungarian Empire. This disparate amalgamation was formed in 1867, with the union of the Austrian and Hungarian monarchies; thus does Hitler refer to the state as the "Dual Monarchy." Throughout its 50-year history, it was always a loose conjunction of many ethnicities, and never a truly unified state. The ethnic Germans in it were a minority, and had to struggle to promote their own interests. This fact caused Hitler no end of distress; he explicitly felt more attachment to the broader German Volk than to the multi-ethnic state into which he was born.

As a youth, his interests tended toward the arts, painting, and history. This led to conflict with his obstinate father, who envisioned a safe, comfortable bureaucratic career for his son. But his father's death on 3 January 1903, when Adolf was 13, allowed the young man to determine his own future. Two years later he moved to Vienna, scraping by with menial jobs to survive. In late 1907, his mother died. At the age of 18, he then applied to enter the Viennese Arts Academy in painting, but was diverted to architecture. He worked and studied for two more years, eventually becoming skilled enough to work full-time as a draftsman and painter of watercolors.

All the while, he studied the mass of humanity around him. He read the various writings and publications of the political parties. He observed the workings of the press. He watched how unions functioned. He sat in on Parliament. He followed events in neighboring Germany. And he became intrigued by the comings and goings of one particular minority in Vienna: the Jews.

Gradually he became convinced that the two dominant threats to German well-being were Marxism—a Jewish form of communism—and the international-capitalist Jews. The problems were compounded by the fundamentally inept workings of a representative democracy that tried to serve diverse ethnicities. In the end, the fine and noble concept of democracy became nothing other than a “Jewish democracy,” working for the best interests of Jews instead of Austrians or Germans.

Upon turning 23 in 1912, Hitler went to Munich. It was his first extended contact with German culture, and he found it invigorating. He lived there for two years, until the outbreak of World War I in July 1914. Thrilled at the opportunity to defend the German homeland, he enlisted, serving on the Western front in Belgium. After more than 2 years of service, he was slightly wounded in October 1916 and sent back to Germany, spending some time in a reserve battalion in Munich. Appalled at both the role of Jews there and the negative public attitude, he returned to the front in March 1917.

By this time, the war had been dragging on for some two and a half years. It had effectively become a stalemate. Even the looming entrance of the Americans into the war—President Wilson would call for war the next month, and US troops would soon follow—would have little near-term effect. As Hitler explains, however, the Germans actually had reasons for optimism by late 1917. The Central Powers (primarily Germany and Austria-Hungary) had inflicted a decisive defeat on Italy in the Battle of Caporetto, and the Russians had pulled out of the war after the Bolshevik Revolution, thus freeing up German troops for the Western front. Hitler recalls that his compatriots “looked forward with confidence” to the spring of 1918, when they anticipated final victory.

November Revolution, and a New Movement

But things would turn out differently. Germans’ dissatisfaction with the prolonged war effort was being fanned by Jewish activists calling for mass demonstrations, strikes, and even revolution against the Kaiser. In late January 1918 there was a large munitions strike. Various workers’ actions and riots followed for months afterward. The Western front held, but Germany was weakening internally.

In mid-October of 1918, the German front near Ypres, Belgium was hit with mustard gas. Hitler’s eyes were badly affected, and he was sent to a military hospital in Pasewalk, north of Berlin. In late October, a minor naval revolt in Kiel began to spread to the wider population. Two major Jewish-led parties, the Social Democrats (SPD) and the Independent Social Democratic Party (USPD), agitated for the Kaiser to abdicate—which he did, on November 9. Jewish activists in Berlin and Munich then declared independent “soviet” states; for a detailed discussion of these events, see Dalton (2014). Germany formally capitulated on November 11. After the dust had settled, a new ‘Weimar’ government was formed, one that was notably susceptible to Jewish influence.

Hearing about the revolution from his hospital bed, Hitler was devastated. All the effort and sacrifices made at the front had proven worthless. Jewish agitators in the homeland had succeeded in whipping up local dissatisfaction to the point that the Kaiser was driven from power. The revolutionaries then assumed power and immediately surrendered to the enemy. This was the infamous “stab in the back” that would haunt German nationalists for years to come. And it was the triggering event that caused Hitler to enter politics.

In September 1919, working for the government, he was assigned to follow and report on a little-known group called the Deutsche Arbeiterpartei, or German Workers’ Party (DAP). He ended up joining the group, and quickly assumed a leadership role. By early 1920, Hitler’s speeches were drawing hundreds or thousands of people. On February 24, he announced that the party would henceforth be known as the National Socialist German Workers’ Party, or NSDAP—‘Nazi,’ in the parlance of its detractors. It is with this “first great mass meeting” that Hitler closes Volume One of his book.

The new movement grew rapidly. Hitler formalized his leadership in July 1921. A series of stormy and occasionally violent public events occurred in the following months. In November 1922, ideological compatriot Mussolini took power in Italy, which served to bolster both National Socialist efforts domestically and their international reputation. It was on November 21 that the New York Times printed its first major article on Hitler: “New Popular Idol Rises in Bavaria.” Calling the National Socialists “violently anti-Semitic” and “reactionary” but “well disciplined,” the NYT viewed them as “potentially dangerous, though not for the immediate future.” Indeed—it would not be for another 10 years that they would assume power in Germany.

Soon thereafter, other events would favor the National Socialists. France had occupied the Ruhr Valley in January 1923, claiming a violation of Versailles; this was taken as a grave insult to German sovereignty. It was also at this time that the infamous German hyperinflation took hold, wiping out the savings of ordinary Germans and forcing them to haul around bushels of cash for even the smallest purchases. By the end of the year, Germany was in a full-blown financial crisis. This led Hitler and the NSDAP leadership to plan for a revolutionary take-over of Munich on 9 November 1923.

This attempted Putsch, or coup, would fail. In a brief shoot-out, 16 Nazis and four policemen were killed. Hitler and the other leaders were arrested within days, put on trial in February 1924, and sentenced to light prison terms. In all, Hitler spent some 13 months in confinement, obtaining release in December of that year. It was during this time that he dictated what would become Volume One of his book.

Hitler reportedly wanted to call his new book, “Four and a Half Years of Struggle against Lies, Stupidity, and Cowardice.” The publisher adroitly suggested a shorter title: “My Struggle,” or Mein Kampf. It would initially be published in July of 1925.

Hitler then began a second, shorter volume to complete his program. This appeared in December of 1926. The next year, the two volumes were slightly revised and combined into one work. This so-called ‘second edition’ of Mein Kampf was published when Hitler was 38 years old.

Adolf Hitler and Nazi Reich treasurer Franz Xaver Schwarz at the inauguration of the renovation of the Palais Barlow in Briennerstrasse the "Brown House," Munich 1930.

Bundesarchiv, Bild 119-0289 / Unknown / CC-BY-SA 3.0 [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Chapter Synopses

It will be useful to provide a very brief summary of the main themes of each of the 27 chapters.

Volume 1

- Chapter 1: Hitler's early life. Relationship with parents. Early education. Interest in history and art. Budding nationalism. Covers birth in 1889 to mother's death in late 1907, when Hitler was 18 years old.
- Chapter 2: Time alone in Vienna. Marxism and international Jewry as main threats. Assessment and critique of Viennese government. Life of the working class. Study of the Social Democratic party, and its Jewish influence. Role of unions. Burgeoning anti-Semitism. Study of the destructive role of Marxism.
- Chapter 3: General reflections on Austrian politics, and representative democracy. Failings of multi-ethnic states. Critique of Western democracy. Failings of 'majority rule.' Demise of the pan-German movement. Unfortunate conflict with the Catholic Church. Anti-Semitism and religion. Covers period up to age 23 (1912).
- Chapter 4: Moves to Munich. Critique of German alliances. Four possible paths of German policy. Population growth, and the need for land. Need for alliance with England. Initial discussion of the role of Aryans. Marxism as mortal foe. Covers up to mid-1914.
- Chapter 5: Outbreak of World War One. Hitler enlists, at age 25. "Baptism by fire."
- Chapter 6: Role and need for propaganda. Effective use by England; failure by Germany.
- Chapter 7: Course of the Great War. Wounded in late 1916. Jews and negative attitudes rampant in Munich. Munitions strike in early 1918. Poisoned by mustard gas in October 1918, at age 29. November Revolution.
- Chapter 8: Postwar time in Munich. Need for a new party. Negative role of global capitalism.
- Chapter 9: Encounters German Workers' Party (DAP). Early meetings. Joins DAP, as member #7, at age 30.
- Chapter 10: Analysis of the collapse of the German Empire in 1918. Dominance of international capitalism. Effect of the press on the masses. Jewish control of press. Combating the syphilis epidemic. Cultural decay in modern art. Ineffective parliament. The army as a source of discipline.
- Chapter 11: Detailed racial theory. Nature strives to improve species. Racial mixing between 'higher' and 'lower' types yields physical, moral, and cultural decay. Aryans as true founders of civilization. Aryan tendency for self-sacrifice. Aryan versus Jew. Jews as parasites. Fake Jewish 'religion.' Extended examination of "the way of Jewry"—historical, sociological, political. Marxist worldview. Jewish subversion of democracy. Ill effects of racial impurity.
- Chapter 12: Evolution of DAP. Extended discussion of the need to nationalize the masses. How to organize a party. Gaining publicity. Second major meeting in October 1919. Growing success. Rejection of 'intellectual' weapons. First true mass meeting in February 1920. Transition to NSDAP.

Volume 2

- Chapter 1: Corruption of democracy. Concept of 'folkish.' Transforming ideals into practice. Marxism pushes race equality. State must serve racial function: to promote the best.
- Chapter 2: Three conventional concepts of state. State as means to end: advancing human race. Must maintain racial integrity. Strong minorities end up ruling. Racial mixing leads to decay. State must promote healthy children. Basic eugenic theory. Folkish education, for physical, mental, and moral strength. Promote willpower, determination, responsibility. Meritocracy.

- Chapter 3: Citizenship based on race. Three classes: citizen, subject, foreigner.
- Chapter 4: Aristocratic principle. Value of the individual. Marxism promotes mass thinking. Government rule by the best individuals, not majority.
- Chapter 5: Need for an uncompromising worldview. Need for decisive leadership. 25-point NSDAP program is unshakable. Only NSDAP is truly folkish.
- Chapter 6: Resumes autobiography. NSDAP must dominate mass opinion. Must fight against common views. Brest-Litovsk and Versailles. Importance of spoken word. Marxism flourished with speeches. Need for mass meetings.
- Chapter 7: Lame bourgeois mass meetings. Need for publicity. Control of mass meetings. Violent protests. Party flag and symbol: swastika. First use in summer 1920. Party strength by early 1921. Mass meeting 3 Feb at Circus Krone. Attempted disruption.
- Chapter 8: Right of priority. Many folkish movements. Futility of compromise and coalition.
- Chapter 9: Three pillars of authority. In warfare, survival of the inferior. Deserters and Jewish revolutionaries in November 1918. Bourgeois capitulation. Need for a great ideal. Creation of the SA (storm troops). NSDAP is neither secret nor illegal. SA as trained fighters. March to Coburg in Oct 1922. French occupation of the Ruhr.
- Chapter 10: War industries in World War I. Bavaria versus Prussia as diversion. Kurt Eisner, Jewish revolutionary. Growth of anti-Semitism from 1918. Catholic versus Protestant as diversion. Federation versus unification. Opposition to Jewish Weimar.
- Chapter 11: Role of propaganda. Supporters and members. Need for restricted growth. Leadership principle versus majority rule. Acquisition of Völkischer Beobachter. Building the party. Dissolution on 9 Nov 1923.
- Chapter 12: Question of trade unions. Necessity of unions. NSDAP must form a union. Union in service to the people. Priority of worldview.
- Chapter 13: Foreign policy as means for promoting national interest. Unification of German people. England against Germany. France against England. Need for alliance with England and Italy. Jews seek world conquest, racial contamination. Question of South Tyrol. Jews oppose German-Italian alliance. Only fascist Italy is opposing Jews. Jews gain power in America.
- Chapter 14: Russia policy is foremost. Top priority: need for land, living space. Victory goes to the strong. No colonies, but only an expanded Reich. Look to the East. Russia is ruled by Jews, cannot be an ally. Only possible alliances: England and Italy.
- Chapter 15: German submission. Locarno Treaty as further submission. France seeks to dismember Germany. War with France is inevitable. France occupies Ruhr, opposes England. Must confront and destroy Marxism. Failure of Cuno's passive resistance.

Even this concise summary demonstrates the controversial nature of the text.

Previous English Translations

For the first several years of its existence, there was no real need for English publishers to produce a translation of Mein Kampf. The Nazi movement was small, limited more or less to Bavaria. It had little prospect for growth or real power. There was simply not much interest in an obscure Bavarian politician.

All this changed when Hitler took power in 1933. Suddenly there was a need to understand this man who had risen to power at only 44 years of age. A British translator, Edgar Dugdale, undertook the initial effort to produce an English version. It was a highly abridged edition, covering only some 45 percent of the full text. It was published in England by Hurst & Blackett, and in the US by Houghton-Mifflin, in late 1933.

In 1936, the German government decided that they would sponsor their own, complete, English translation. They hired a British writer and journalist, James Murphy. There not yet having been a second world war, and the worst excesses of Nazism still in the future, Murphy was inclined to produce a favorable and sympathetic translation. Unfortunately, there was a falling out with National Socialist officials and Murphy was ‘fired’ sometime in 1938, his project incomplete. Through some obscure process, the Germans completed Murphy’s draft version on their own, and published it in the late 1930s. Today this is known as the Stalag edition, and is currently available in print in two forms: one by Ostara Publications, and one by Elite Minds (the “official Nazi English translation”). To call this version ‘unpolished’ is an understatement; more below.

By 1939, four new versions had appeared. After his dismissal, Murphy returned to England and revised and completed his translation, which was published by Hurst & Blackett in 1939. This is ‘the’ Murphy translation; it is widely available on the Internet, and through various reprints. Under the Hutchinson imprint, the Murphy translation was republished in 1969 with a lengthy and hostile introduction by British historian D. C. Watt.

Secondly, the British firm Reynal & Hitchcock enlisted a team of people, headed by Alvin Johnson, to do their own translation. It was notably hostile to the content of the book and the National Socialist movement generally.

Third, an American publisher, Stackpole and Sons, produced a version under the direction of a Jewish editor, William Soskin. They hired a Jewish socialist, Ludwig Lore, to write the preface. Unsurprisingly, this too was a hostile effort. Soskin was successfully sued by Houghton-Mifflin for copyright infringement, and production was halted after only a few months.

The final work of 1939 was a second abridgment, produced by American journalist—and future senator—Alan Cranston. Cranston was also sued; he too lost, but not before allegedly selling several hundred thousand copies.

Dissatisfied with the abridged Dugdale translation, Houghton-Mifflin embarked on a new, full translation, by Jewish-German writer Ralph Manheim. They also solicited a short introduction by a Jewish-German journalist, Konrad Heiden. As expected, it was another blatantly hostile production. The book appeared in 1943, and has been continuously in print since then. To the present day, the Manheim version functions as the ‘official’ translation of Mein Kampf; it is the one quoted by nearly all academics and journalists. The latest Houghton edition, issued in 1998, includes an introduction by notorious Jewish Zionist Abraham Foxman. Clearly, little has changed in the intervening years.

For several decades, these were the extant English translations. Then in 2009, a little-known writer, Michael Ford, published his own translation through Elite Minds. This edition has several shortcomings, as explained below.

Something of the flavor of these efforts can be seen in the very first words of the book. In my forthcoming translation, Chapter 1 is titled “In My Parents’ House.” (Original: Im Elternhaus.) The first sentence: “I consider it most fortunate today that destiny selected Braunau-on-the-Inn to be my birthplace” (Als glückliche Bestimmung gilt es mir heute, dass das Schicksal mir zum Geburtsort gerade Braunau am Inn zuwies.) The table below gives the chapter title and the first few words, in the various translations.

Translation	Chapter 1	Initial words
Dugdale	My Home	It stands me in good stead today that Fate...

Johnson	At Home	Today I consider it my good fortune that Fate...
Murphy (Stalag)	My Home	To-day I consider it a good omen that destiny...
Murphy ('standard')	In the Home of my Parents	It has turned out fortunate for me to-day that destiny...
Manheim	In the House of my Parents	Today it seems to me providential that Fate...
Soskin	Childhood Home	Today I regard it as a happy change that Fate...
Ford	Childhood Home	Today, I am pleased that Fate chose the city...

The variability of even this simple leading sentence is striking. One can imagine the issues involved with the many more-complicated thoughts that follow.

Why a New Translation?

As it happens, every one of the previous translations has major problems and disadvantages, for a modern English reader.

The two primary versions—Murphy and Manheim—are written in the style of early-20th-century British writers. They use a wide array of archaic ‘British-isms’ and British spellings that make reading awkward, particularly for Americans in the present day. Worse, they attempt to follow too closely Hitler’s original style. Like most Germans of the time, Hitler wrote long sentences, fashioned into long, complex paragraphs. Manheim follows this style scrupulously, to the detriment of the reader; Murphy at least occasionally breaks up long sentences into more readable segments.

Worst of all, both major translations are simply poor efforts. They do not read well. One repeatedly encounters passages that are awkward, incoherent, or incomprehensible. There is little of the fluidity and lyrical power of the German original. For his part, Murphy takes a considerable amount of ‘translator’s license,’ interjecting unwarranted terminology and wording, or simply leaving things out. Manheim is more literal, but in the end is scarcely more readable. The reader simply needs to scan a sampling of either text to understand the situation.

This is unfortunate, to say the least. It is almost as if the publishers intended, or at least preferred, that the translations be difficult to read. Certainly this limits the circulation of Hitler’s ideas, and makes it easier to dismiss them—a convenient situation for the many critics of the book’s import.

With the exception of Murphy, all of the standard editions betray their intentions with aggressive, hostile, and slanderous comments in their introductions. Consider this selection of remarks:

- Johnson: Hitler is “no artist in literary expression,” and “often indifferent to grammar and syntax.” The book is “a propagandistic essay by a violent partisan” that “warps historical truth” or “ignores it completely.” Hitler’s discussions on race can be safely dismissed, because “the greatest anthropologists of the 20th century are agreed that ‘race’ is a practically meaningless word.”
- Lore: “I cannot conceive of any book of which I more positively disapprove.” The book has an “atrocious style” and “countless contradictions.” In essence, the book is “an outpouring of willful perversion, clumsy forgery, vitriolic hatred, and violent denunciation.”
- Manheim: Hitler is a “paranoiac” who offers us “disjointed facts” and “largely unintelligible flights of Wagnerian fantasy.” He creates “a dream-world,” one “without color and movement.”

- Heiden: Mein Kampf was written “in white-hot hatred.” It is “ill-founded, undocumented, and badly written.” “The book may well be called a kind of satanic Bible.”
- Watt: The book is “lengthy, dull, bombastic, repetitious and extremely badly written.” “Most of its statements of fact...are demonstrably untrue.” It yields “an intolerably prolix German style and a total lack of any intellectual precision.” As a work of political philosophy, “it has no claims whatever to be taken seriously.” Hitler’s racial theory—a “mystical racist mumbo-jumbo of Aryanism”—is a “revolting mixture of pseudo-science and bogus historicism.” The work is self-consistent, but this only betrays “the terrible consistency of the insane.” In the end, Hitler is nothing more than a “master of the inept, the undigested, the half-baked and the untrue.”
- Foxman: Hitler’s “theories have long since been discredited.” The book is “a work of ugliness and depravity.” It is “unreliable as a source of historical data,” full of “lies, omissions, and half-truths.” The book’s “atrocious style, puerile digressions, and narcissistic self-absorption” are obvious. Its theories are “extremist, immoral, and seem to promise war.” Hitler’s “lunatic plan” is “absurd” and even “comical.” All in all, “a ridiculous tract.”

Any translator, editor, or publisher who would include such words can hardly be trusted to do an honest job. The intent to bias the reader is plain. Certainly there is no concern here for the author to obtain a fair and objective reading. In fact, precisely the opposite.

The recent Ford translation, while not overtly hostile, has several other major flaws. Ford has no discernible credentials, no publishing record, nor any documented history with such academic works. His ‘in text’ notes are awkward and distracting. The book includes many amateurish and cartoonish ‘photos.’ There is no index. And his so-called publishing house, Elite Minds, appears to be some kind of environmental group that focuses on the ecology of sharks, of all things. This is unfortunate; the last thing the public needs is another misleading, ill-conceived, and unqualified version of Mein Kampf.

The ‘Nazi’ or ‘Stalag’ edition of Murphy has its own problems. The version published by Elite Minds claims to be authentic, which means that they retained all the original flaws of grammar, punctuation, and spelling. The result is nearly unreadable. The edition published by Ostara fixes many of these problems, but still reads poorly. It does break up the long paragraphs, but to an extreme degree; one typically finds single-sentence paragraphs, as in a newspaper. This move destroys all flow and connection of ideas. And neither version has an index or explanatory footnotes.

My forthcoming translation addresses and resolves many of these unfortunate drawbacks. First, by including the full and original German text, in a parallel translation, the English wording can be easily verified. This technique has often been used with classic Greek and Latin authors, but never before with Mein Kampf. Section headings have been added, in text, in bold. The German original employed such headings, but only at the top of each page; the reader thus never knew where a new section actually began. These headings have been translated and inserted at the appropriate points, in my estimation, and directly in the text. My translation also has helpful and relevant footnotes, a useful index, and a bibliography of relevant secondary source material. Most important of all, though, is the fact that the English reads smoothly and naturally.

Some Contentious Topics

It goes without saying that this book is controversial. In fact, it may well be named as the single most controversial book in history. As such, the typical reader is more or less guaranteed to get a slanted and biased account of it. Of Hitler’s many controversial statements and topics, four subjects warrant a brief mention here: National Socialism, race theory, religion, and the Jews.

Of the many simplistic and overused hyperboles in modern usage, the use of ‘Nazi’ surely ranks among the worst. It’s a crude and almost comical synonym for evil, hateful, cruel, tyrannical, and so on. This is consistent with the general demonization of everything Hitler.

‘Nazi’ is, of course, an abbreviation for National Socialist (Nationalsozialist). It was prompted by an earlier term, ‘Sozi,’ which was short for Sozialdemokrat, referring to the Social Democrat party that had been in existence since the mid-1800s. Hitler and colleagues rarely used ‘Nazi,’ generally viewing it as derogatory—although Goebbels did write an essay and short book titled The Nazi-Sozi.

As an ideology, National Socialism is utterly misunderstood. In fact, surprisingly, many people around the world today implicitly endorse some form of it. Most European countries, and many others globally, are some form of socialist. Socialism—loosely defined as government control and oversight of at least certain key portions of the economic sector—stands in contrast to free-market capitalism, in which for-profit corporations control such things. Suffice it to say that socialism is a respected political and economic system around the globe.

Nationalism places high priority on the well-being of the nation-state and its traditional residents. It is inward-looking, rather than outward. It tends toward economic independence and autonomy rather than globalization and inter-connectedness. It typically supports and strengthens the dominant ethnicity and culture, and largely ignores that of minorities. This, too, is hardly unknown; there are strong nationalist movements in many countries around the world today.

As it happens, the United States is neither nationalist nor socialist. Thus, its media and its economic and political elite tend to dismiss or abuse both of these concepts. Americans are functionally brainwashed to believe that socialism is evil—witness the pejorative application of the label to President Obama in recent years—and that nationalism is the hallmark of crude and primitive autocrats, and racist as well. This fact is revealing; the American power elite wants no one to get the idea that anything like nationalism or socialism—or, God forbid, national socialism—should become a credible ideology.

Now, it is true that Hitler’s form of national socialism went further than these basic concepts. It explicitly targeted Marxists, Jews, and global capitalists as enemies of the German people. It also sought to replace representative democracy with a more efficient and accountable centralized governance. Hitler had rational arguments for all these issues, as he explains in his book.

In fact, the formal declaration of the National Socialist system—as stated in Hitler’s “25 Points”—is remarkably progressive and, dare we say, tame. They call for equal rights (Points 2 and 9). They give citizens the right to select the laws and governmental structure (6). They abolish war-profiteering (12). They call for corporate profit-sharing with employees (14). They support retirement pensions, a strong middle class, free higher education, public health, maternity welfare, and religious freedom, including explicit support for “a positive Christianity” (15, 16, 20, 21, 24).

On the ‘down’ side, only a relative few points appear threatening or aggressive. They grant citizenship only to ethnic Germans, explicitly denying it to Jews (4). They block further immigration, and compel recent immigrants to leave (8). They seek to prohibit all financial speculation in land (17). They call for a death penalty against “traitors, usurers, and profiteers” (18). They demand that the German-language press be controlled only by ethnic Germans—but they don’t restrict press in other languages (23). And they call for “a strong central authority in the State” (25).

As anti-Semitic as Hitler was, it is surprising how lightly the Jews get off. They are banned from citizenship, and therefore from any role in government or the press. Recent (since August 1914) Jewish immigrants, like all immigrants, must leave. And the National Socialist view of religious freedom “fights against the Jewish materialist spirit” (24). But no threats to imprison or kill Jews. Longtime Jewish residents can stay in the country. No confiscation of wealth, with the stated exceptions. And certainly nothing that sounds like a looming ‘Holocaust.’

In sum, Hitler’s National Socialism is essentially the product of German nationalism and progressive socialism, combined with a mild form of anti-Semitism. Hardly the embodiment of evil.

Racial Theory

Mein Kampf contains numerous references to ‘blood’ (Blut) and ‘race’ (Rasse). This is always portrayed in the worst possible terms, as some kind of demonic, hate-filled, blind racism. But we must first realize that such talk was commonplace in the early 20th Century; Hitler’s terminology, though shocking today, was actually quite conventional at the time. Not being a scientist, and few having much understanding of genetics at the time, it is understandable that he would use such terms.

Therefore, a literal interpretation of such words is misleading. In modern terminology, Hitler’s ‘race’ is better viewed as ‘ethnicity.’ He was more an ethnacist than a racist. His call for justice for the “German race” is really on behalf of ethnic Germans—the Volk. Thus understood, his view is much less threatening than commonly portrayed. Yes, he viewed ethnic Germans as superior. Yes, he wanted the best for his people. Yes, he was not much interested in the welfare of minorities or other nationalities. This is hardly a sin. Many people around the world today fight for precisely such things, for their own ethnicities. And they are right to do so.

Even today, it is reasonable and appropriate to discuss issues of race. It is a relevant term in biological taxonomy, indicating the highest-level sub-grouping within the species Homo sapiens. By some accounts, there are three races: White/Caucasian, Black/Negroid, and Mongoloid/Asian. Within each race, we have the various ethnicities—of which there are some 5,000 worldwide.

By this measure, Hitler cared little about race. He made a few dismissive comments about Blacks, but nothing that wasn’t standard at the time. He actually admired certain people of the Asian race, especially the Japanese. But his primary concern was among the various White ethnicities. He sought a position of strength and influence for ethnic Germans; he sought alliances with ethnic Britons; and he sought to oppose ethnic Jews.

Then there is Hitler’s infamous talk of ‘Aryan.’ Apart from passing mention elsewhere in the book, it is discussed in detail only in Chapter 11 of Volume 1. While there is no talk of any ‘superman’—no reference to Nietzsche’s Übermensch, for example—it is clear that Hitler views the Aryan as the highest human type, the greatest ethnicity, mover and creator of civilization. Notably, he never defines Aryan. Rather, we learn only what the Aryan is not: he is not Black, not Oriental, and certainly not Jewish. The Jew is the anti-Aryan, his dark and corrupting opposite. The Aryan builds, the Jew destroys. The Aryan produces, the Jew consumes. The Aryan is idealistic, the Jew materialistic.

In the end, the Aryan is distinguished not by his superior intelligence, nor his great creativity, but mainly by his altruism: the Aryan is a self-sacrificing person, more willing than any others to work on behalf of society. Thus he builds civilization and culture, and spreads it to the world. Non-Aryans, to the extent that they have a culture, get it from the Aryans, even as they customize it to their own needs. But the original source and sustainer is the self-sacrificing Aryan.

The word ‘Aryan’ has an interesting origin, and it has nothing to do with the Germans. It comes from the Sanskrit arya, meaning ‘noble.’ It originally referred to the people and language that moved into India from the north around 1500 BC. In the Indian caste system, the Aryans became the Brahmins—the highest and noblest caste. It was they who cultivated the Sanskrit language, and ultimately developed Indian culture. And a final point of interest: Those immigrants from the north came from the region that is known today as the Iranian plateau. In fact, the word ‘Iran’ derives directly from ‘Aryan’; the Iranians were the original Aryans.

Not being a scholar of ancient history, and having no Internet at hand, Hitler knew little of all this. He simply picked up on prior German and European usage. In fact, talk of Aryans as a superior race predated Hitler by several decades. It was a main theme of Frenchman Arthur de Gobineau’s book Essay on the Inequality of the Human Races, of 1855. And it was prominent in Briton-turned-German author Houston Stewart Chamberlain’s book Foundations of the Nineteenth Century, published in 1899. By the time Hitler picked up on the term, it was old hat.

On Religion

Among other calumnies, Hitler is often portrayed as a godless atheist, a devil worshipper, the antichrist, or some kind of maniacal pagan. In fact he was none of these.

Rather, Hitler was broadly supportive of Christianity. He called it “the Religion of Love,” and referred to Jesus, indirectly, as its “sublime founder.” He argued that the masses are not and cannot be philosophical; their ethics must come from traditional religious sources. And he believed in separation of church and state: “political parties have no right to meddle in religious questions.” He condemned the Jews because they mock religion, and portray ethics and morality as “antiquated sentiment.”

His view on God is quite intriguing. Frequently he refers to a kind of cosmic deity or divine power, but in a variety of unconventional terms. We find many references, for example, to Schicksal—fate or destiny. We read of the “Goddess of Destiny” (Schicksalgöttin). He writes of “Providence” (Vorsehung), “Doom” or “Fate” (Verhängnis), and “the Lord” (Herr). Elsewhere we find reference to “Chance” (Zufall) and “the eternal Creator” (ewige Schöpfer). Volume 1 closes with a reference to “the Goddess of Inexorable Vengeance” (die Göttin der unerbittlichen Rache). These are not mere metaphors. It seems to be a kind of recognition of higher powers in the cosmos, but not those of traditional religions.

In the end, Hitler was most offended by crude materialism: the quest for money and material power. This view has no concept of idealism, no notion of spirituality, no vision of higher powers in the universe. Materialism was the essence of both Marxism and capitalism—and both were embodied in the Jew. That’s why these things were, according to Hitler, the mortal enemy of anyone seeking higher aims in life.

Hitler himself was no fan of religious dogma, but seems to have envisioned a future that moved toward a new kind of spirituality, one aligned with the workings of nature. We may perhaps best view him as a ‘spiritual but not religious’ sort of person—a view that is notably widespread today.

On the Jews

If nothing else, Hitler is inevitably depicted as a confirmed anti-Semite and Jew-hater. We should be clear: this is absolutely true. There are many lies spread about Hitler, but this is not one of them. The key is understanding why he held this view.

In the second half of Chapter 2 (Volume 1), he describes in striking detail his gradual discovery of the role and effects of Jews in society. He recalls that, as a youth, he had only known one Jewish boy, but had no particular feelings toward him one way or the other. He hadn’t even heard them discussed much until his mid-teens, and then only in a vaguely negative political context. When he moved to Vienna at age 15, he encountered a city of 2 million that was 10 percent Jewish. At first, he barely noticed them. When he did, he viewed them as representatives of a rather strange religion, but since he was generally tolerant of religious diversity, he gave them little thought. He was put off by the “anti-Semitic” press. As he says, “on grounds of human tolerance, I opposed the idea that [the Jew] should be attacked because he had a different faith.”

But then Hitler began to pay attention to the mainstream press. They were informative and liberal, but yet often flamboyant and garish. They seemed anxious to curry favor with the corrupt monarchy. And they were uniformly critical of the German Kaiser and his people. He noticed that some of the anti-Semitic papers were actually more skeptical of Viennese authority, and more open-minded regarding the Germans. At the same time, he realized that the Jews were more numerous than he previously believed. In fact, certain districts of Vienna were 50 percent Jewish, or more. And they all seemed to endorse a strange ideology: Zionism.

Furthermore, they were visually and physically repellent. Their black caftans and braided hair locks looked comical. They had their own odd concept of ‘cleanliness’: “That they were not water-lovers was obvious upon first glance.” They smelled bad: “The odor of those people in caftans often made me sick to my stomach.” This was topped off by “the unkempt clothes and the generally ignoble appearance.” All in all, a sorry sight.

Worst of all, hidden away inside, was their “moral rot.” Jews seemed to be involved in all manner of shady, unethical, and illegal activities. Hitler began to study the situation in more detail. “The fact was that 90 percent of all the filthy literature, artistic trash, and theatrical idiocy had to be charged to the account of a people who formed scarcely one percent of the nation. This fact could not be denied.” Pornography, lewd art and theater, prostitution, human trafficking...all could be tied to the Jews.

The famed mainstream Viennese press, Hitler discovered, was almost completely a Jewish enterprise. Jewish writers repeatedly praised Jewish actors, authors, and businessmen. People, events, and policies favorable to Jews were lauded, and those that were disadvantageous were condemned. Even the dominant political party, the Social Democrats, was found to be led by Jews. Upon this realization, says Hitler, “the scales fell from my eyes.” The whole pattern came together: a Jewish press supporting a Jewish political system, even as other Jews profited from the moral corruption of the people. Profit and power at all cost; lies and deceit without compunction; and an utter lack of concern for fairness, democracy, human welfare or even human decency. “I gradually came to hate them,” he said.

Considered globally, the situation was even worse. Marxism—the product of a Jew, Karl Marx—was promulgated by Jews in Europe and around the world. It sought to dominate and control nature. It sought to level all social differences, thereby subverting the natural order in which the truly best people rightly flourish. In essence, it was a teaching and a means by which Jews could ruthlessly assume control of entire nations. Once that happened, thousands or even millions of natives would die. The 1917 Bolshevik Revolution in Russia was proof enough.

In other parts of Europe, the dominant ideology was capitalism. Here, money ruled. Here, the bankers and corporate moguls dictated even to kings. Markets must be opened, international trade promoted, and loans used to extract wealth from the masses. And when these titans of capital were investigated, they were found to be, more often than not, Jews.

For Hitler, these realizations were devastating. The recognition of the insidious role of the Jews was “the greatest inner revolution that I had yet experienced.” Indeed: “From being a soft-hearted cosmopolitan, I became an out-and-out anti-Semite.” No hidden views here.

Hitler’s conversion to anti-Semitism was remarkable. In contrast to the common view, it was neither arbitrary nor irrational. He was not a born Jew-hater. It was a step-by-step process, taken over a long period of time, and based on his data and observations about the real world. His was a “rational” anti-Semitism. As he saw it, any person of dignity and self-respect, anyone with a concern for human life, anyone committed to the integrity of the natural world, would of necessity be an anti-Semite. In their ruthless pursuit of their own self-interest, Jews, said Hitler, become the enemy of all mankind. Anyone not recognizing this fact—and acting accordingly—he thought a fool.

The modern person today winces at such talk. “A monster!” we say. “Hate speech!” “The devil!” And yet, these are not rational responses. The modern man is conditioned to say such things. We must be objective here. Hitler was not inventing facts. His observations were largely true, even if he had no access to formal data or statistics. Jews did dominate in Vienna, and even more so in Germany. Consider the following numbers, cited by Gordon (1984: 8-15):

The reader may be surprised to learn that Jews were never a large percentage of the total German population; at no time did they exceed 1.09 percent of the population during the years 1871 to 1933... [In spite of this, Jews] were overrepresented in business, commerce, and public and private service... Within the fields of business and commerce, Jews... represented 25 percent of all individuals employed in retail business and handled 25 percent of total sales...; they owned 41 percent of iron and scrap iron firms and 57 percent of other metal businesses.... Jews were [also] prominent in private banking under both Jewish and non-Jewish ownership or control. They were especially visible in private banking in Berlin, which in 1923 had 150 private (versus state) Jewish banks, as opposed to only 11 private non-Jewish banks....

This trend held true in the academic and cultural spheres as well: “Jews were overrepresented among university professors and students between 1870 and 1933.... [A]lmost 19 percent of the instructors in Germany were of Jewish origin.... Jews were also highly active in the theater, the arts, film, and journalism. For example, in 1931, 50 percent of the 234 theater directors in Germany were Jewish, and in Berlin the number was 80 percent..." Hitler was not imaging things.

Furthermore, Jews did in fact curry favor with the monarchy when it was in their interest, but they were quick to revolt if that could yield a greater gain. Jewish Marxists had succeeded in Russia, and were prominent in the November Revolution in Germany, making them responsible, in part, for Germany's defeat in World War I. Jews were eager to profit by any means possible: war, corruption, immorality, exploitation, deception. And many were Zionists: committed to creating a Jewish state in Palestine, and willing to do whatever it took to achieve this.

What to do? For Hitler, there was only one logical conclusion: Drive them out. This meant pushing them out of society, out of the economy, and restoring control of the media and government to non-Jews. It meant creating a Judenrein, or Jew-free, society, one that was free from internal and external manipulation by Jewish interests. This, in fact, was Hitler's conclusion years before he began Mein Kampf. In late 1919, as he was just becoming acquainted with the DAP, he wrote a letter to one of his officers regarding how to respond to the Jewish question. This striking early letter concludes as follows:

Rational anti-Semitism...must lead to a systematic and legal struggle against, and eradication of, the privileges the Jews enjoy over the other foreigners living among us (Alien Laws). Its final objective, however, must be the total removal of all Jews (die Entfernung der Juden überhaupt) from our midst. Both objectives can only be achieved by a government of national strength, never by a government of national impotence. (in Maser 1974: 215)

His view did not change in Mein Kampf, nor evidently anytime later in his life. His solution was always the same: drive them out. Total removal. Ruthlessly if necessary, but out they must go.

Here is one striking point, however: With one minor exception, Hitler never called for killing the Jews. Though his terminology shifted over time, his words always referred to some form of removal: Jews should be "deported," "expelled," "rooted out." Their role and their power in the German Reich must be "destroyed" or "liquidated." But explicit words like 'killing,' 'shooting,' 'murder,' 'gassing,' virtually never appear in his speeches, writings, or even private conversations.

The one exception is at the very end of Mein Kampf. There were about 600,000 Jews in Germany at the start of World War I, a war that ended in the deaths of over 2 million Germans. Hitler argues that killing "12 or 15 thousand Hebrew corrupters" at the start of the war, by a poison gas such as fell on the German troops in the battlefield, would have spared a million lives and led to German victory. Not all the Jews, or even most of them; just one or two percent would have sufficed, to derail their pernicious aims. But this seems to be the last such reference by Hitler, in any documented writing or speech.

English sources always translate Hitler's wording as wanting to "exterminate," "destroy," or "annihilate" the Jews; but this is another deception. None of his actual words demands mass killing—or even any killing at all. If the Jews have been driven out of Germany, they have indeed been 'exterminated' (lit. 'driven beyond the border'). If their control over the economy has been terminated, their power has indeed been 'annihilated,' or 'reduced to nothing.' If Jewish society has been removed, it may rightly be said to have been 'destroyed' (lit. 'un-built' or 'deconstructed'). Hitler's tough talk was never any different than that of any world leader when confronting a mortal enemy. President Obama often speaks of "destroying" the "cancer" of the Islamic State, but no one accuses him of attempted genocide.

Thus we find no talk of mass murder (with the lone exception), extermination camps, genocide, or anything like this in Mein Kampf. Hitler's opponents search in vain for signs of an impending 'Holocaust' in which the mass of German Jewry would be murdered. The reader is invited to do the same. It is simply not there—much to the chagrin of his critics.

From all this, it should be clear that Hitler had only one real enemy in the Jews. He was not some all-purpose hater of humanity. He disliked the French, respected the British and Americans, and sympathized with the Russians, but didn't hate them. Even the "lesser" races were never a target of contempt, but rather, if anything, pity. Today we are under the impression that, in 1940, the entire world quivered at the thought of a Nazi takeover. But this was never more than trumped-up propaganda. Hitler wanted to be a world power—like all major nations—but never a world ruler.

In short, unless you were a Jew, you had nothing to fear. Whites had nothing to fear—unless they allowed themselves to be ruled by Jewish Marxists or Jewish capitalists. Hispanics, Blacks, and Orientals, though of lower status, had nothing to fear. France and England had nothing to fear—until they declared war on Germany. America never had anything to fear—until Roosevelt made the unwise decision to harass Germany and Japan into conflict. It was always and only the Jews who were his enemy.

From the Jewish perspective, of course, this is the ultimate evil: a man who seeks to destroy Jewish power, confiscate their obscene wealth, and create a Jew-free society. Should he succeed, and should his new society flourish, it would mean catastrophe for Jews worldwide. People everywhere might begin to perceive treachery in Jewish influence.

This is why Mein Kampf is so dangerous.

Hitler's Legacy

Hitler had a great and noble vision for his people. He desperately wanted Germany to assume its rightful place in the world, and to set an example for all those who aspired to something better than a crude material existence. By contrast, the social vision of virtually every other world leader of the 20th Century—or the 21st—pales.

Hitler had concrete goals in mind for his nation, and concrete plans to get there. He faced three fundamental challenges: (1) to restore the economy, (2) to achieve security and independence by becoming a world power, and (3) to create an idealistic, uplifting, and sustainable German society. He put his plan into action as soon as he came to power in 1933. And it worked. It worked so well that a beleaguered, beaten-down, hyper-inflated, emasculated German nation rose up to become a world power with astonishing speed. Consider: After just three years, Hitler's Germany had conquered inflation, driven down unemployment, and put industry back to work—all in the midst of a global depression. After six years, it was a world power. After eight years, his nation was so powerful that it took the combined effort of virtually the entire rest of the world to defeat it.

The first two aspects of his plan were attained. But the rest of the world, driven in part by Jewish hatred, jealousy, and spite, could not bear this, and so they sought to crush him and his German nation—which they did. The real tragedy of Hitler's story is that he never had time to tackle his third great challenge: to create a flourishing German society. Sadly, we will never know the long-term potential consequences of National Socialism, or whether a truly great society could have been constructed.

But what about the Holocaust? What about the death camps and gas chambers? Isn't this the terrible, inevitable outcome of Hitler's warped vision?

Here we have perhaps the greatest deception of all. In order to show the world the horrible outcome of a potent anti-Semitism, a tale of monumental human disaster had to be constructed, promoted, and sustained. The undeniable and tragic death of several hundred thousand Jews—which included many deaths by old age, disease, injury, suicide, and in combat situations—would have to become “6 million.” Tough talk against Jews, aimed at driving them out of Germany, would have to become “euphemisms for mass murder.” Rooms designed to disinfect clothing and bedding against disease-carrying lice would have to become “homicidal gas chambers.” Hundreds of thousands of Jewish bodies would have to be burned down to ash, and then made to completely vanish. Transit camps constructed to move Jews out of the Reich—Treblinka, Belzec, Sobibor—would have to become “extermination camps” designed for mass-murder; and with diesel-engine exhaust, no less. And a forced-labor camp in which thousands of Jews died from typhus—Auschwitz—would have to become “the greatest death camp of all time.”

Clearly there is much more to be said here. For those interested readers, sources such as Dalton (2014b, 2015) or Rudolf (2011) are recommended. Suffice it to say that the Holocaust, as commonly portrayed, is an unsubstantiated, unwarranted, and unjustified exaggeration of epic proportions. Nearly every aspect of the story crumbles as soon as it is put to the test. The alleged horror of the Holocaust becomes, in the end, a story of the dispossession and expulsion of one particular minority community that held disproportionate power in a nation that did not want them, and that bore disproportionate guilt for that nation's misfortunes. That they themselves should have suffered as a result is unsurprising.

Mein Kampf is one man's assessment of history and vision for the future. It is blunt; it is harsh; it is unapologetic. It does not comply with contemporary expectations of politeness, objectivity, and political correctness. It sounds offensive to sensitive modern ears. But the book is undeniably important. It is more consequential than perhaps any other political work in history. It deserves to be read. And each reader will then be free to determine its ultimate value and meaning for themselves.

---

Bibliography

- Barnes, J. 1980. Hitler's Mein Kampf in Britain and America. Cambridge University Press.
- Dalton, T. 2014. "The Jewish Hand in the World Wars" (Part 2). Online: www.inconvenienthistory.com
- Dalton, T. 2014b. "The Great Holocaust Mystery." Online: www.inconvenienthistory.com
- Dalton, T. 2015. Debating the Holocaust (2nd ed). Castle Hill.
- Gordon, S. 1984. Hitler, Germans, and the 'Jewish Question.' Princeton University Press.
- Hitler, A. 1927/1933. Mein Kampf (E. Dugdale, trans.) Houghton Mifflin.
- Hitler, A. 1927/1939. Mein Kampf (J. Murphy, trans.) Hurst & Blackett.
- Hitler, A. 1927/1939. Mein Kampf (A. Johnson et al, trans.) Reynal & Hitchcock.
- Hitler, A. 1927/1939. Mein Kampf (W. Soskin, trans.) Stackpole Sons.
- Hitler, A. 1927/1943. Mein Kampf (R. Manheim, trans.) Houghton Mifflin.
- Hitler, A. 1927/1999. Mein Kampf (R. Manheim, trans.; A. Foxman, intro.) Houghton Mifflin.
- Hitler, A. 2009. Mein Kampf (M. Ford, trans.) Elite Minds.
- Hitler, A. 2009. Mein Kampf Official Nazi English Translation. Elite Minds.
- Maser, W. 1974. Hitler's Letters and Notes. Harper and Row.
- Rudolf, G. 2011. Lectures on the Holocaust (2nd ed). Barnes Review.

Springtime for Trotsky | CODOH

by Ralph Raico

Leon Trotsky. By Irving Howe. Viking Press, 1978, 214 pages.

Leon Trotsky has always had a certain appeal for intellectuals that the other Bolshevik leaders lacked. The reasons for this are clear enough. He was a writer, an occasional literary critic — according to Irving Howe, a very good one — and an historian (of the revolutions of 1905 and 1917). He had an interest in psychoanalysis and modern developments in physics, and, even when in power, suggested that the new Communist thought-controllers shouldn't be too harsh on writers with such ideas — not exactly a Nat Hentoff position on freedom of expression, but about as good as one can expect among Communists.

Above all, Trotsky was himself an intellectual, and one who played a great part in what many of that breed have considered to be the real world — the world of revolutionary bloodshed and terror. He was second only to Lenin in 1917; in the Civil War he was the leader of the Red Army and the Organizer of Victory. As Howe says, "For intellectuals throughout the world there was something fascinating about the spectacle of a man of words transforming himself through sheer will into a man of deeds."

Trotsky lost out to Stalin in the power struggle of the 1920s, and in exile became a severe and knowledgeable critic of his great antagonist; thus, for intellectuals with no access to other critics of Stalinism — classical liberal, anarchist, or conservative — Trotsky's writings in the 1930s opened their eyes to some aspects at least of the charnel-house that was Stalin's Russia. During the period of the Great Purge and the Moscow show trials, Trotsky was placed at the center of the myth of treason and collaboration with Germany and Japan that Stalin spun as a pretext for eliminating his old comrades. In 1940, an agent of the Soviet secret police, Ramon Mercador, sought Trotsky out at his home in Mexico City and killed him with an ice ax to the head.

Mugshot of Trotsky after Soviet members were arrested during a meeting in Free Economic Society building. Photo taken 3 December 1905. Saint Petersburg police department.

Public domain, via Wikimedia Commons.

Irving Howe, the distinguished literary critic and editor of Dissent, tells the story of this interesting life with great lucidity, economy, and grace. The emphasis is on Trotsky's thought, with which Howe has concerned himself for almost the past 40 years. As a young man, he states, "I came for a brief time under Trotsky's influence, and since then, even though or perhaps because I have remained a socialist, I have found myself moving farther and farther away from his ideas."

Howe is in fact considerably more critical of Trotsky than I had expected. He identifies many of Trotsky's crucial errors, and uses them to cast light on the flaws in Marxism, Leninism, and the Soviet regime that Trotsky contributed so much to creating. And yet there is a curious ambivalence in the book. Somehow the ignorance and evil in Trotsky's life are never allowed their full weight in the balance, and, in the end, he turns out to be, in Howe's view, a hero and "titan" of the 20th century. It's as if Howe had chosen not to think out fully the moral implications of what it means to have said and done the things that Trotsky said and did.

We can take as our first example Howe's discussion of the final outcome of Trotsky's political labors: the Bolshevik revolution and the Soviet regime. Throughout this book Howe makes cogent points regarding the real class character of this regime and other Communist governments — which, he notes, manifested itself very early on:

A new social stratum — it had sprung up the very morning of the revolution — began to consolidate itself: the party-state bureaucracy which found its support in the technical intelligentsia, the factory managers, the military officials, and, above all, the party functionaries.... To speak of a party-state bureaucracy in a country where industry has been nationalized means to speak of a new ruling elite, perhaps a new ruling class, which parasitically fastened itself upon every institution of Russian life. [emphasis in original]

Howe goes on to say that it was not to be expected that the Bolsheviks themselves would realize what they had done and what class they had actually raised to power: "It was a historical novelty for which little provision had been made in the Marxist scheme of things, except perhaps in some occasional passages to be found in Marx's writings about the distinctive social character of Oriental despotism."

This is not entirely correct. Howe himself shows how Trotsky, in his book 1905 (a history of the Russian revolution of that year), had had a glimpse of this form of society, one in which the state bureaucracy was itself the ruling class. In analyzing the Tsarist regime, Trotsky had picked up on the strand of Marxist thought that saw the state as an independent parasitic body, feeding on all the social classes engaged in the process of production. This was a view that Marx expressed, for instance, in his Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte.

More importantly, the class character of Marxism itself — as well as the probable consequences of the coming to power of a Marxist Party — had been identified well before Trotsky's time. The great 19th-century anarchist Michael Bakunin — whose name does not even appear in Howe's book, just as not a single other anarchist is even mentioned anywhere in it — had already subjected Marxism to critical scrutiny in the 1870s. In the course of this, Bakunin had uncovered the dirty little secret of the future Marxist state:

The State has always been the patrimony of some privileged class or other; a priestly class, an aristocratic class, a bourgeois class, and finally a bureaucratic class.... But in the People's State of Marx, there will be, we are told, no privileged class at all ... but there will be a government, which will not content itself with governing and administering the masses politically, as all governments do today, but which will also administer them economically, concentrating in its own hands the production and the just division of wealth, the cultivation of land, the establishment and development of factories, the organization and direction of commerce, finally the application of capital to production by the only banker, the State. All that will demand an immense knowledge and many "heads overflowing with brains" in this government. It will be the reign of scientific intelligence, the most aristocratic, despotic, arrogant, and contemptuous of all regimes. There will be a new class, a new hierarchy of real and pretended scientists and scholars. [Emphasis added.]

This perspective was taken up somewhat later by the Polish-Russian revolutionist, Wacław Machajski, who held, in the words of Max Nomad, that — "nineteenth century socialism was not the expression of the interests of the manual workers but the ideology of the impecunious, malcontent, lower middle-class intellectual workers ... behind the socialist 'ideal' was a new form of exploitation for the benefit of the officeholders and managers of the socialized state."

Thus, that Marxism in power would mean the rule of state functionaries was not merely intrinsically probable — given the massive increment of state power envisaged by Marxists, what else could it be? — but it had also been predicted by writers well known to a revolutionary like Trotsky. Trotsky, however, had not permitted himself to take this analysis seriously before committing himself to the Marxist revolutionary enterprise. More than that: "To the end of his days," as Howe writes, he "held that Stalinist Russia should still be designated as a 'degenerated workers' state' because it preserved the nationalized property forms that were a 'conquest' of the Russian Revolution" — as if nationalized property and the planned economy were not the very instruments of rule of the new class in Soviet Russia!

It remained for some of Trotsky's more critical disciples, especially Max Shachtman in the United States, to point out to their master what had actually happened in Russia: that the Revolution had not produced a "workers' State," nor was there any danger that "capitalism" would be restored, as Trotsky continued to fret it would. Instead, there had come into an existence in Russia a "bureaucratic collectivism" even more reactionary and oppressive than what had gone before.

Trotsky rejected this interpretation. In fact he had no choice. For, as Howe states, the dissidents "called into question the entire revolutionary perspective upon which [Trotsky] continued to base his politics.... There was the further possibility, if Trotsky's critics were right, that the whole perspective of socialism might have to be revised." Indeed.

To his credit, Howe recognizes that a key period for understanding Bolshevism, including the thought of Trotsky, is the period of war communism, from 1918 to 1921. As he describes it, "Industry was almost completely nationalized. Private trade was banned. Party squads were sent into the countryside to requisition food from the peasants." The results were tragic on a vast scale. The economic system simply broke down, with all the immense suffering and all the countless deaths from starvation that such a small statement implies. As Trotsky himself later put it, "The collapse of the productive forces surpassed anything of the kind that history had ever seen. The country, and the government with it, were at the very edge of the abyss."

How had this come about? Here Howe follows the orthodox interpretation: War communism was merely the product of emergency conditions, created by the Revolution and the Civil War. It was a system of "extreme measures [which the Bolsheviks] had never dreamt of in their earlier programs."

Now, this last may be, strictly speaking, correct. It may well be, that is, that the Bolsheviks had never had the slightest idea of what their aims would mean concretely for the economic life of Russia, how those aims would of necessity have to be implemented, or what the consequences would be.

But war communism was no mere "improvisation," whose horrors are to be chalked up to the chaos in Russia at the time. The system was willed and itself helped produce that chaos. As Paul Craig Roberts has argued in his brilliant book Alienation and the Soviet Economy, war communism was an attempt to translate into "Reality" the Marxist ideal: the abolition of "commodity production," of the price system and the market.

This, as Roberts demonstrates, was what Marxism was all about. This is what the end of "alienation" and the final liberation of mankind consisted in. Why should it be surprising that when self-confident and determined Marxists like Lenin and Trotsky seized power in a great nation, they tried to put into effect the very policy that was their whole reason for being?

As evidence for this interpretation, Roberts quotes Trotsky himself (ironically, from a book of Trotsky's writings edited by Irving Howe):

[T]he period of so-called "war communism" [was a period when] economic life was wholly subjected to the needs of the front ... it is necessary to acknowledge, however, that in its original conception it pursued broader aims. The Soviet government hoped and strove to develop these methods of regimentation directly into a system of planned economy in distribution as well as production. In other words, from "war communism" it hoped gradually, but without destroying the system, to arrive at genuine communism ... reality, however, came into increasing conflict with the program of "war communism." Production continually declined, and not only because of the destructive action of the war.

Roberts goes on to quote Victor Serge: "The social system of those years was later called 'War Communism.' At the time it was called simply 'Communism' ... Trotsky had just written that this system would last over decades if the transition to a genuine, unfettered Socialism was to be assured. Bukharin ... considered the present mode of production to be final."

One slight obstacle was encountered, however, on the road to the abolition of the price system and the market: "Reality," as Trotsky noted, "came into increasing conflict" with the economic "system" that the Bolshevik rulers had fastened on Russia. After a few years of misery and famine for the Russian masses — there is no record of any Bolshevik leader having died of starvation in this period — the rulers thought again, and a New Economic Policy (NEP) — including elements of private ownership and allowing for market transactions — was decreed.

The significance of all this cannot be exaggerated. What we have with Trotsky and his comrades in the Great October Revolution is the spectacle of a few literary-philosophical intellectuals seizing power in a great country with the aim of overturning the whole economic system — but without the slightest idea of how an economic system works. In State and Revolution, written just before he took power, Lenin wrote,

The accounting and control necessary [for the operation of a national economy] have been simplified by capitalism to the utmost, till they have become the extraordinarily simple operations of watching, recording and issuing receipts, within the reach of anybody who can read and write and knows the first four rules of arithmetic.

With this piece of cretinism Trotsky doubtless agreed. And why wouldn't he? Lenin, Trotsky, and the rest had all their lives been professional revolutionaries, with no connection at all to the process of production and, except for Bukharin, little interest in the real workings of an economic system. Their concerns had been the strategy and tactics of revolution and the perpetual, monkish exegesis of the holy books of Marxism.

The nitty-gritty of how an economic system functions — how, in our world, men and women work, produce, exchange, and survive— was something from which they prudishly averted their eyes, as pertaining to the nether-regions. These "materialists" and "scientific socialists" lived in a mental world where understanding Hegel, Feuerbach, and the hideousness of Eugen Duehring's philosophical errors was infinitely more important than understanding what might be the meaning of a price.

Of the actual operations of social production and exchange they had about the same appreciation as John Henry Newman or, indeed, St. Bernard of Clairvaux. This is a common enough circumstance among intellectuals; the tragedy here is that the Bolsheviks came to rule over millions of real workers, real peasants, and real businessmen.

Howe puts the matter rather too sweetly: once in power, he says, "Trotsky was trying to think his way through difficulties no Russian Marxist had quite foreseen." And what did the brilliant intellectual propose as a solution to the problems Russia now faced? "In December 1919 Trotsky put forward a series of 'theses' [sic] before the party's Central Committee in which he argued for compulsory work and labor armies ruled through military discipline...."

So, forced labor, and not just for political opponents, but for the Russian working class. Let Daniel and Gabriel Cohn-Bendit, the left-anarchists from the May days of 1968 in Paris, take up the argument:

"Was it so true," Trotsky asked, "that compulsory labor was always unproductive?" He denounced this view as "wretched and miserable liberal prejudice," learnedly pointing out that "chattel slavery, too, was productive" and that compulsory serf labor was in its times "a progressive phenomenon." He told the unions [at the Third Congress of Trade Unions] that "coercion, regimentation, and militarization of labor were no mere emergency measures and that the workers' State normally had the right to coerce any citizen to perform any work at any place of its choosing."

And why not? Hadn't Marx and Engels, in their ten-point program for revolutionary government in The Communist Manifesto, demanded as Point Eight, "Equal liability for all to labor. Establishment of industrial armies, especially for agriculture"? Neither Marx nor Engels ever disavowed their claim that those in charge of "the workers' state" had the right to enslave the workers and peasants whenever the need might arise. Now, having annihilated the hated market, the Bolsheviks found that the need for enslavement had, indeed, arisen. And of all the Bolshevik leaders, the most ardent and aggressive advocate of forced labor was Leon Trotsky.

There are other areas in which Howe's critique of Trotsky is not penetrating enough, in which it turns out to be altogether too soft-focused and oblique. For instance, he taxes Trotsky with certain philosophical contradictions stemming from his belief in "historical materialism." All through his life, Howe asserts, Trotsky employed "moral criteria by no means simply derived from or reducible to class interest. He would speak of honor, courage, and truth as if these were known constants, for somewhere in the orthodox Marxist there survived a streak of nineteenth century Russian ethicism, earnest and romantic."

Let us leave aside the silly implication that there is something "romantic" about belief in ethical values, as against the "scientific" character of orthodox Marxism. In this passage, Howe seems to be saying that adherence to certain commonly accepted values is, among Marxists, a rare kind of atavism on Trotsky's part. Not at all.

Of course historical materialism dismisses ethical rules as nothing more than the "expression," or "reflection," or whatever, of "underlying class relationships" and, ultimately, of "the material productive forces." But no Marxist has ever taken this seriously, except as pretext for breaking ethical rules (as when Lenin and Trotsky argued in justification of their terror). Even Marx and Engels, in their "Inaugural Address of the First International," wrote that the International's foreign policy would be to "vindicate the simple laws of morals and justice [sic] which ought to govern the relations of private individuals, as the laws paramount of the intercourse of nations."

That Trotsky admired honor, courage, and truth is not something that cries out for explanation by reference to Russian tradition of "ethicism" (whatever that might be). The admiration of those values is a part of the common heritage of us all. To think that there is a problem here that needs explaining is to take "historical materialism" much too seriously to begin with.

Similarly with other contradictions Howe thinks he has discovered between Trotsky's Marxist philosophy and certain statements Trotsky made in commenting on real political events. Of the Bolshevik Revolution itself, Trotsky says that it would have taken place even if he had not been in Petrograd, "on condition that Lenin was present and in command." Howe asks, "What happens to historical materialism?" The point Howe is making, of course, is that in the Marxist view individuals are not allowed to play any critical role in shaping really important historical events, let alone in determining whether or not they occur.

But the answer to Howe's question is that, when Trotsky commits a blunder like this, nothing happens. Nothing happens, because "historical materialism" was pretentious nonsense from the beginning, a political strategy rather than a philosophical position. Occasionally, in daubing in some of the light patches of sky that are intended to make up for the dark ones in Trotsky's life, Howe comes perilously close to slipping into a fantasy world.

He says that in the struggle with Stalin, Trotsky was at a disadvantage, because he "fought on the terrain of the enemy, accepting the damaging assumption of a Bolshevik monopoly of power." But why is this assumption located on the enemy's terrain? Trotsky shared that view with Stalin. He no more believed that a supporter of capitalism had a right to propagate his ideas than a medieval inquisitor believed in a witch's personal life style. And as for the rights even of other socialists — Trotsky in 1921 had led the attack on the Kronstadt rebels, who merely demanded freedom for socialists other than the Bolsheviks. At the time, Trotsky boasted that the rebels would be shot "like partridges" — as, pursuant to his orders, they were.

Howe even stoops to trying a touch of pathos. In sketching the tactics Stalin used in the struggle with Trotsky, he speaks of "the organized harassment to which Trotskyist leaders, distinguished Old Bolsheviks, were subjected by hooligans in the employ of the party apparatus, the severe threats made against all within the party...." Really now — is it political violence used against Leon Trotsky and his "distinguished" followers that is supposed to make our blood run cold? No: if there was ever a satisfying case of poetic justice, the "harassment" and "persecution" of Trotsky — down to and including the ice-ax incident — is surely it.

The best example of Howe's strange gentleness toward Trotsky I have saved for the last. What, when all is said and done, was Trotsky's picture of the Communist society of the future? Howe does quote from Trotsky's Literature and Revolution the famous, and ridiculous, last lines: "The average human type [Trotsky wrote] will rise to the heights of an Aristotle, a Goethe, or a Marx. And above this ridge new peaks will rise." He doesn't, however, tell us what precedes these lines — Trotsky's sketch of the future society, his passionate dream. Under Communism, Trotsky states, Man will reconstruct society and himself in accordance with his own plan.... The imperceptible, ant-like piling up of quarters and streets, brick by brick, from generation to generation, will give way to the titanic construction of city-villages, with map and compass in hand.... Communist life will not be formed blindly, like coral islands, but will be built up consciously, will be erected and corrected.... Even purely physiologic life will become subject to collective experiments. The human species, the coagulated Homo sapiens, will once more enter into a state of radical transformation, and, in his own hands, will become an object of the most complicated methods of artificial selection and psycho-physical training.... [It will be] possible to reconstruct fundamentally the traditional family life.... The human race will not have ceased to crawl on all fours before God, kings and capital, in order later to submit humbly before the laws of heredity and sexual selection! ... Man will make it his purpose ... to create a higher social biological type, or, if you please, a superman.

"Man ... his own plan ... his purpose... his own hands." When Trotsky promoted the formation of worker-slave armies in industry, he believed that his own will was the will of the Proletarian Man. It is easy to guess whose will would stand in for that of Communist Man when the time came to direct the collective experiments on the physiological life, the complicated methods of artificial selection and psycho-physiological training, the reconstruction of the traditional family, the substitution of "something else" for blind sexual selection in the reproduction of human beings, and the creation of the superhuman.

This, then, is Trotsky's final goal: a world where mankind is "free" in the sense that Marxism understands the term — where all of human life, starting from the economic, but going on to embrace everything, even the most private and intimate parts of human existence — is consciously planned by "society," which is assumed to have a single will. And it is this — this disgusting positivist nightmare — that, for him, made all the enslavement and killings acceptable!

Surely, this was another dirty little secret that Howe had an obligation to let us in on.

Howe ends by saying of Trotsky that "the example of his energy and heroism is likely to grip the imagination of generations to come," adding that, "even those of us who cannot heed his word may recognize that Leon Trotsky, in his power and his fall, is one of the titans of our century."

This is the kind of writing that covers the great issues of right and wrong in human affairs with a blanket of historicist snow. The fact is that Trotsky used his talents to take power in order to impose his willful dream — the abolition of the market, private property, and the bourgeoisie. His actions brought untold misery and death to his country.

Yet, to the end of his life, he tried in every way he could to bring the Marxist revolution to other peoples — to the French, the Germans, the Italians — with what probable consequences, he, better than anyone else, had reason to know. He was a champion of thought-control, prison camps, and the firing squad for his opponents, and of forced labor for ordinary, nonbrilliant working people. He openly defended chattel slavery — which, even in our century, must surely put him into a quite select company.

He was an intellectual who never asked himself such a simple question as: "What reason do I have to believe that the economic condition of workers under socialism will be better than under capitalism?" To the last, he never permitted himself to glimpse the possibility that the bloody, bureaucratic tyranny over which Stalin presided might never have come into existence but for his own efforts.

A hero? Well, no thank you — I'll find my own heroes somewhere else. A titan of the 20th century? In a sense, yes. At least Leon Trotsky shares with the other "titans" of our century this characteristic: it would have been better if he had never been born.

---

This review originally appeared in Libertarian Review, March 1979. It is republished with permission by the author.

"The Enemy Is Listening!" | CODOH

by Christoph M. Wieland

In his book, The Ultra Secret,<sup>[1]</sup> published in 1974, author Frederick W. Winterbotham revealed, for the first time, that the British Intelligence Service was able to eavesdrop on almost all German military radio communications from a very early date, shortly after the outbreak of World War II. As a captain in the Royal Air Force and officer of the Military Intelligence Service, Winterbotham supervised the work of the Government Code & Cipher School in Bletchley Park, where cryptanalysts cracked the "Enigma" code used in German cipher machines to scramble messages transmitted by the German army, navy and air force.

Seven more years were fated to pass by before the public was permitted to learn that Bletchley Park personnel were capable of far more than simply reading written German military messages. In 1981, cryptanalyst Francis H. Hinsley published the second volume of his book British Intelligence in the Second World War.<sup>[2]</sup> Hinsley's book revealed that the British Intelligence Service also eavesdropped on radio signals transmitted by the German police, SD and SS. This enabled the British to obtain not only reliable information on events behind the Russian Front, but on events in the German concentration camps as well.

On 19 May 1997, the British government transferred the decoded documents in Bletchley Park to the Public Records Office in London, thereby making them accessible to the public for research purposes.<sup>[3]</sup> Oddly, only a very few Holocaust historians were interested in the information on the concentration camps. The reason for this astonishing lack of interest is presumably due to the following remark by author Hinsley:

The messages from Auschwitz, the largest camp, with 20,000 inmates,<sup>[4]</sup> mention disease as the chief cause of death, but also include references to executions by hanging and shooting. The decoded messages contain no references to gassings.<sup>[5]</sup>

The present article is intended to summarize the information obtained at Bletchley Park on events in Auschwitz Concentration Camp. Despite Hinsley's unambiguous statement, British Intelligence Service information continues to give rise to a multiplicity of interpretations and speculation, just as before. At the same time, the question of what the British "knew about the Holocaust" always takes priority over everything else.

As shown by the Bletchley Park documents, the commandant of Auschwitz had to file a report every single day. With the exception of Sunday, these messages consisted of daily reports on population [Bestand], arrivals [Zugänge], and departures [Abgänge] from the concentration camps. For over thirteen months, from January 1942 to January 1943, the British Intelligence Service followed up and decoded these reports from Auschwitz Concentration Camp to the SS Head Business Administration Office [SS-Wirtschafts-Verwaltungshauptamt] in Oranienburg.

The decoded messages enabled the compilation of very exact statistics. The radio messages from 28 October 1942 – taking a single day at random – reveal, for example, that Auschwitz Concentration Camp contained a total, all told, of 25,298 inmates: 18,754 men and 6,544 women; including 10,755 Jews, 8,822 Poles, 1,369 Russians and 1,578 Germans. It was also learned that there were exactly 787 Zugänge and 168 Abgänge on 28 July 1942; Zugänge referred to the arrival of new inmates; Abgänge referred to deaths, executions, releases and inmates transferred to other camps.

These daily radio messages also contained additional information related to Auschwitz. Thus, it was reported, for example, that Jewish watchmakers were being transferred to Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp; that Polish workers could only be sent elsewhere [verschickt] after release from quarantine; that British POWs were considered to be urgently needed to work as kapos; and that efforts were being made to locate a successor to the then-acting garrison doctor by September 1942.

With regard to the Holocaust, the Abgänge were naturally of particular interest. In actual fact, the monthly number of Abgänge in the year 1942 fluctuated in an unusual manner. While the number of Abgänge normally amounted to approximately 2,000 inmates per month, there was a great increase in these figures in July, August, September and October. For example, 8,352 Abgänge were reported for the month of August 1942.

As is readily apparent from the radio messages, this unusually high number of Abgänge was due to a typhus epidemic at Auschwitz.[6] Typhus, sometimes also known as “camp fever” is, as is well known, transmitted by fleas and lice; under poor hygienic circumstances it will inevitably appear in almost any such camp. According to the decoded radio messages, it took the Auschwitz authorities approximately four months to bring the epidemic under control. The numbers only fell back down to the average figure of approximately 2,000 Abgänge per month in November and December 1942.

Dr. Eduard Wirths, Chief SS doctor (SS-Standortarzt) at the Auschwitz concentration camp from September 1942 to January 1945. Wirths is third from right in front row

By Jesse Hofseth (Own work) [CC BY-SA 4.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/4.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Auschwitz Concentration Camp, as mentioned above, had requested a successor to their current on-duty garrison physician in August 1942. This successor, who took over in his official capacity on 6 September 1942, was Dr. Eduard Wirths. In his notes, Wirths left a vivid report on conditions in Auschwitz at that time:[7]

I found inconceivable inmate conditions. There was no running water, no working toilets, no way to bathe. The barracks lodging the prisoners were overfilled and there was a shortage of beds. There were masses of lice all over the floors, clothing and inmates' bodies. The walls were black with fleas. The condition of the inmates was simply unbelievable, emaciated to their very bones, devoured by vermin, with dead bodies lying around between living inmates. Hundreds of dying inmates were taken away, but sometimes they lay around among the living for days.

It was obvious that the epidemic would spread to the guard personnel as well. The Bletchley Park intercepts reported, for example, that, on 4 September “the entire camp was subjected to quarantine”[8] and “in October, 11 SS-Men were hospitalized with suspected typhus.”[9]

Wirths succeeded temporarily in bringing the epidemic under control by building additional barracks, infirmaries, installing additional drains and water pipes, latrines and targeted use of measures intended to combat infection:

Through the chamber of physicians [Ärzttekammer], we applied for permission to distribute white bread and milk. Instead of polluted drinking water, I took care to distribute drinks such as coffee and tea. I ordered the organization of field kitchens for working inmates, due to the great distances between the worksites and their living quarters and commissaries, which meant that otherwise the workers would get no hot food all day. When the construction of field kitchens was impracticable, I had hot food delivered to the work sites by vehicle. I requested permission to allow recovering inmates to gather wild vegetables, medicinal herbs. At the same time, I wanted Jewish women confined by the camp administration to be able to move about in the open. I requested rest for physically weakened inmates, even the construction of entire rest departments.[10]

Dr. Wirths’s struggle against the epidemics must have been a real labor of Sisyphus. Obviously, fresh cases of typhus arrived in the camp with each new rail transport. Thus, on 28 January 1943, Bletchley Park issued a report to the effect that “there were 36 cases of typhus among the inmates arriving on 22 January.”[11]

In the summer of 1942, the first Polish and Jewish reports appeared[12] alleging the commission of mass murder on an industrial scale in Auschwitz. According to these reports, 2,000 inmates were being killed in gas chambers every day. Since the number of Abgänge reported amounted to approximately 2,000 inmates per month, and not 2,000 inmates per day, the British Intelligence Service rejected these reports as war propaganda. Thus, the president of the British Joint Intelligence Committee, Victor Cavendish-Bentinck, on 27 August 1943, wrote that the reports from Poles and Jews were devoid of all basis in fact:[13]

The allegations of mass executions in gas chambers are reminiscent of the atrocity stories from the last war, according to which the Germans were processing corpses into fat – a grotesque lie, which was immediately unmasked as pure propaganda.

The first historian ever permitted to examine the deciphered messages from Bletchley Park was Richard Breitman. In his book, Official Secrets: What the Nazis Planned, What the British and Americans Knew,[14] published in 1998, Breitman made serious accusations against the Allies. As indicated in the translation back to English of the German translation of his book – State Secrets: Nazi Crimes Tolerated by the Allies [Staatsgeheimnisse: Die Verbrechen der Nazis – von den Alliierten toleriert], he accuses the British and Americans of having known about the Holocaust from the very beginning, but of deliberately concealing this information. In particular, he accused Cavendish-Bentinck of rejecting the “Information from Polish and Jewish sources as invented.”[15] This accusation is, however, entirely unjustified. Why should Cavendish-Bentinck have accorded credibility to unreliable reports when he was in possession of reliable radio messages from Auschwitz itself?

That Cavendish-Bentinck rejected the credibility of reports from Polish and Jewish underground sources is all the more understandable when one reads some of the documents cited by Breitman. Thus, for example, he reports that “a Polish underground courier who had succeeded in escaping to London” had made the following statements on Auschwitz Concentration Camp:[16]

I lived a few weeks in Auschwitz.[...] Based on the information which I gathered, together with my own observations, I can assure you that the Germans used the following killing methods. A) Gas chambers: the victims were forced naked into the chambers, where they suffocated. B) Electrical chambers: these chambers had metal walls. The victims were driven inside and then killed by high-voltage electrical current. C) The so-called pneumatic hammer system: a pneumatic hammer designed to kill by means of pneumatic pressure.

Is it really so remarkable that Cavendish-Bentinck considered such reports unworthy of belief? Obviously not. Any similar report would be immediately rejected as false, even today.

But there is more: According to information provided by “a Polish woman with the code name Wanda,” “98% of all arrivals at Auschwitz were gassed.”<sup>[17]</sup> Auschwitz was a forced-labor camp suffering from a severe shortage of manpower, as the officials at Bletchley Park well knew. Why should Cavendish-Bentinck lend the slightest credence to the allegation that 98% of all inmates were gassed immediately after their arrival?

The British Intelligence Service had every reason to consider the decoded radio messages of the SS the most reliable source of information on events in Auschwitz. In view of the available data, it was, therefore, furthermore assumed that the local mortality rates amounted to approximately 2,000 per month, instead of 2,000 per day. According to the figures reported by the SS, there were exactly 52,996 Abgänge in the entire year of 1942. The unusually high number is, as stated above, attributable to the series of typhus epidemics which can easily be proven to have broken out in the late summer of 1942. If there had been 2,000 deaths per day in 1942, the number of Abgänge would have amounted to at least 730,000.

The figures decoded in Bletchley Park obviously caused confusion among historians. The official number of Auschwitz victims amounts, as is well known, to 1 million. But how is it possible to arrive at such a high figure based on the SS radio messages deciphered by the British Intelligence Service?

Bundesarchiv, Bild 101I-241-2173-09
Foto: Grupp | 10-43/1044

Encryption device Enigma in use, 1943.

Bundesarchiv, Bild 101I-241-2173-09 / Grupp / CC-BY-SA 3.0 [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

In an attempt to shore up the official figure of Auschwitz victims, Breitman claims that the number of actual victims were subject to particularly severe measures of official censorship and confidentiality when reported by radio:<sup>[18]</sup>

Strict secrecy was still maintained within the SS, regardless of Enigma. Top secret information was still transmitted by courier only.

This allegation is really not very convincing. Why should the mass gassings at Auschwitz not be reported through Enigma when the mass shootings on the Eastern Front were reported through Enigma, i.e., in precisely the same way? Regardless of whether it was a matter of mass executions in Riga, Minsk or Kiev – oddly, Breitman's book constantly proves its points based on the reports from Bletchley Park, which the author obviously considers reliable.

Just how arbitrary the above allegation by Breitman really is, is made clear, last but not least of all, by the fact that the Germans entrusted Enigma with information of crucial, even decisive, information on their maneuvers, such as the current position of U-boats or the exact dates involved in future German air attacks.

Obviously less than completely convinced by his own arguments, Breitman resorts, only a few pages further on, to another explanation. Here, he states:[19]

The statistics only include inmates who were registered in the Auschwitz camps.[...] The statistics nevertheless lack all mention of Jews who were selected for the gas chambers immediately after their arrival.

What is the evidence for this assumption? As Breitman himself had already stated, “Himmler wanted to know how many inmates were released, and how many died, in each.”[20] But if Himmler ordered the camps to report the number of deaths, why should the commandant of Auschwitz withhold this same number? Breitman's assumption appears to be a purely ad hoc hypothesis intended simply to enable the writer to continue clinging to the official number of victims at Auschwitz.

Another book on Bletchley Park and the Holocaust was published in 2004. Historian Nicholas Terry, in Yad Vashem Studies, published an article entitled “Conflicting Signals,”[21] defended the British Intelligence Service against Richard Breitman's accusations: the British Intelligence Service had, in fact, according to him, discovered no clear evidence of extermination of Jews based on radio messages deciphered at Bletchley Park.

First of all, Terry straightens out a misunderstanding on Breitman's part. Of course, an order was, in fact, actually issued on 13 September 1941 prohibiting all further reporting of victim numbers by radio, but, rather, ordering that all such figures be communicated by courier only; but this order only applied to the three Higher SS and Police Leaders (HSSPF).[22] On 24 August 1941, Winston Churchill had made the mistake, in a radio address, of denouncing the mass shootings carried out behind the Russian front by the German Ordnungspolizei [NS regular police].[23] Churchill's remarks remained, of course, very vague, but aroused the suspicion on the part of the head of the German Ordnungspolizei, Kurt Daluge, that the British had been eavesdropping on German radio reports. Daluge therefore issued an order to the heads of the Ordnungspolizei, deciphered by the British, prohibiting the mention, for the time being, of victim numbers by radio. In response to a suggestion by SS-Obergruppenführer Friedrich Jeckeln, the victim figures were not, however, deleted, but, rather, merely camouflaged, i.e., henceforth reported under the heading of “Action under the Customs of War.”[24]

The decisive point is that the order issued by Daluge was addressed to the HSSPF, not the SS. The Auschwitz Commandant's office therefore continued to report its Abgänge on a regular basis. On 28 January 1943, Bletchley Park even reported that the Oranienburg office issued an order to compile detailed statistics and to report the exact numbers of deceased inmates and new arrivals.[25]

Like Richard Breitman, Nicholas Terry also alleges that the people murdered immediately after their arrival were not included in the lists of Abgänge because they were never registered, but were, instead, taken straight to the gas chambers.[26] This is, of course, entirely conceivable. But without a single document expressly ordering that inmates murdered in gas chambers directly after their arrival should not be reported, the assumption remains merely an ad hoc hypothesis.

That this ad hoc hypothesis is merely a far-fetched assumption is easily demonstrated by reference to a very few simple considerations. How was the Reichsführer SS supposed to know how the "Final Solution to the Jewish Question" was progressing unless the commandant of Auschwitz regularly reported the fate of each individual incoming transport? It goes without saying that Himmler had to be informed of the numbers of inmates arriving at Auschwitz, being transferred to other concentration camps or being killed in the gas chambers. The SS Head Business Administration Office [SS-Wirtschaft-Verwaltungshauptamt] must have insisted upon exact statistics as well. Since it was responsible for all concentration camps, it would have needed to be informed, not only of the number of able-bodied, working inmates, but the number of unregistered, non-able-bodied inmates as well, even if only to justify the quantities of Zyklon B requested for the gas chambers as well as for the requested quantities of coke for the crematoria.

Altogether, it would be a gross underestimation of German bureaucracy to assume that exact records were not kept of every procedure. At Auschwitz, not a single birth, death, delousing, release, punishment, execution, case of illness or cremation could occur without being reported to Agency Group [Amtsgruppe] D of the SS-WVHA in Oranienburg by the camp commandant's office.

Finally, Jürgen Graf and Carlo Mattogno have discovered numerous documents in the Moscow archives illustrating not only the extent of German bureaucracy, but the unlikelihood of any Holocaust as well. As one example, I would like to cite the report from Dr. Horst Fischer to Dr. Eduard Wirths. In a letter dated 13 April 1943, the camp physician Dr. Fischer at Buna wrote to the garrison physician Dr. Wirths informing him of the arrival of 658 inmates at Auschwitz Camp. Of these 658 inmates, 109, after a thorough medical examination, were found to be unable to work. And of these 109 non-able-bodied inmates, 25 were sent to one of the rest and recovery wards at Buna, 33 were sent to the inmate infirmary at Buna, and 51 were transferred to the much better-equipped inmate hospital at Auschwitz I.

To sum up, the following facts may be considered established: The messages deciphered at Bletchley Park undoubtedly constitute one of the most reliable sources on the course of events during the Second World War. They provide information on undertakings of the German army, navy, and air force. They provide an insight into the events occurring behind the Russian front and the conditions in the concentration camps. Since the reports from Auschwitz contain no information on mass killings, the question of whether the British Intelligence Service "knew about the Holocaust," can be answered with a single word: "No!"[\[27\]](#)

In view of the fact that the messages from Auschwitz contain no mention of gas chambers or mass murders, the real question is: what was there really for anybody to "know" about? In other words: was there any Holocaust at all? Regardless of the general belief that hardly any historical event has ever been so thoroughly "proven," one must, once again, expressly point out that, until the present, not one single material or documentary proof for the reality of any mass killings in gas chambers has ever been found. The only thing that exists, at most, is mutually contradictory "eyewitness testimonies" and "confessions," which can, at least in the latter case, easily be shown to have been given under duress.

The most reliable documents on Auschwitz – the Sterbebücher von Auschwitz,[\[28\]](#) the Kommandanturbefehle von Auschwitz[\[29\]](#) and the "radio messages from Auschwitz, deciphered by the Allies"[\[30\]](#) – contain not the slightest reference to mass killings by means of toxic gas. This is in addition to the fact that the number of victims reported by the British Intelligence Service largely coincide with the numbers of victims reported in the Auschwitz "Death Books."

As already mentioned, Auschwitz Concentration Camp reported a total of 52,996 Abgänge for the year 1942 as a whole. According to the "Death Books," there are supposed to have been a total of 36,958 deaths at Auschwitz in 1942. The fact that the numbers of Abgänge is greater than the number of deaths, is easily explained, since the term Abgänge includes, as mentioned above, not only natural deaths and victims of execution, but also inmates who had been released or transferred elsewhere. It is therefore entirely conceivable that the number of 36,958 deaths given in the "Death Books" for the year 1942 is quite correct. The existing discrepancy of 16,038 could reflect the number of inmates transferred to other camps or released. Pending the discovery of a document unambiguously proving the gassing of thousands of human beings at Auschwitz by Zyklon B, we are perfectly justified in casting doubt upon the official version of the "Holocaust."

---

Notes:

Translated from German by Carlos W. Porter

[1]	Frederick W. Winterbotham, The Ultra Secret (London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1974).
[2]	Francis H. Hinsley British Intelligence in the Second World War. Volume II: Its Influence on Strategy and Operations (London: Stationary Books, 1981).
[3]	BBC Holocaust Documents Released. 20 May 1997. Online: http://www.bbc.co.uk/archive/holocaust/5114.shtml
[4]	The number of prisoners at Auschwitz grew continuously over the years. By 22 August 1944 the number of prisoners had grown to 104,891.
[5]	Francis H. Hinsley, op. cit. , p. 673.
[6]	Bletchley Park Summary Reports ZIP/OS1 of 21 August 1942.
[7]	Ulrich Völklein, Dr. med. Eduard Wirths: Ein Arzt in Auschwitz. Eine Quellenedition (Norderstedt: Books on Demand, 2005), p. 40.
[8]	Bletchley Park Summary Reports ZIP/OS2 of 27 September 1942.
[9]	Bletchley Park Summary Reports ZIP/OS3 of 29 October 1942.
[10]	Ulrich Völklein, op. cit. , S. 42.
[11]	Bletchley Park Summary Reports ZIP/OS6 of 28 January 1943.
[12]	The first report of extermination of Jews was presented in the so-called "Riegner Telegram" of 8 August 1942. On 8 August 1942 the bureau chief of the Jewish World Congress in Geneva wrote to the governments in London and Washington that it had been decided in Berlin to "exterminate with one blow" all deported Jews.
[13]	Bletchley Park PRO FO 371/34551 of 27 August 1943.
[14]	Richard Breitman, Official Secrets: What the Nazis Planned, What the British and Americans Knew (New York: Hill & Wang, 1998). All citations from this book are taken from the German translation.: Richard Breitman, Staatsgeheimnisse: Die Verbrechen der Nazis – von den Alliierten toleriert (Munich: Goldmann, 2001).
[15]	Ibid, p. 162.
[16]	Ibid, p. 160.
[17]	Ibid, p. 164.
[18]	Ibid, p. 154.
[19]	Ibid, p. 157.
[20]	Ibid, p. 156.
[21]	Nicholas Terry, "Conflicting Signals: British Intelligence on the 'Final Solution' through Radio Intercepts and Other Sources." Yad Vashem Studies 32: 351-396, 2004.

[22]	Ibid, pp. 365f.
[23]	Ibid, p. 360.
[24]	Ibid, p. 366.
[25]	Bletchley Park Summary Reports ZIP/OS6 of 28 January 1942.
[26]	Terry, op. cit. , p. 388.
[27]	Or better stated: the radio communications deciphered at Bletchley Park contain only information regarding mass shootings behind the front, but not regarding mass gassings at Auschwitz ( Oder behutsamer formuliert: Die in Bletchley Park entschlüsselten Funksprüche enthalten nur Informationen zu Masserschießungen hinter der Front, nicht aber zu Massenvergasungen in Auschwitz. )
[28]	Staatliches Museum Auschwitz, Sterbebücher von Auschwitz (Berlin: De Gruyter, 1995).
[29]	Norbert Frei (ed.), Darstellungen und Quellen zur Geschichte von Auschwitz: Standort- und Kommandanturbefehle des Konzentrationslagers Auschwitz 1940 – 1945 (Berlin: De Gruyter, 2000).
[30]	David Bankier (Ed.), Secret Intelligence and the Holocaust. Collected Essays from the Colloquium at the City University of New York (Jerusalem: Yad Vashem, 2006).

The Holocaust by Bullets | CODOH

by Kosto Tamo

In the immediate after-war period, it was widely believed that Nazi extermination camps existed in Germany and Poland. The barbaric Allied saturation bombing,<sup>[1]</sup> which had led to the collapse of the German transportation, food-distribution and medical networks, provoked a chaos exacerbated by the arrival of millions of refugees fleeing the Soviet invasion in the East. The result was starvation and the spread of disease (typhus, cholera) among millions of unfortunates, including camp inmates – many of whom succumbed. Photos of skeletal survivors were seized upon for hate-propaganda purposes, while the camps which still managed to function with some degree of normality and whose inmates were in relatively good shape, were largely ignored.

Subsequently, it became evident from available documentation and material evidence that no order had been given for the mass murder of Jews. No trace has been found of any plan, budget, or weapon, nor has a single autopsied body been shown to have been gassed.

During and after the war there were “eyewitnesses” to mass gassings at Buchenwald, Bergen-Belsen, Dachau, and other camps in Germany proper. Today, virtually all recognized scholars dismiss this testimony as false. Establishment historians, however, still claim that mass gassings happened at several camps in Poland. The evidence for this claim is, in reality, qualitatively no different to the false testimony and evidence for the alleged mass gassings at the camps in Germany proper.<sup>[2]</sup>

The “confessions” obtained in Nuremberg were not infrequently obtained through torture or the threat of being handed over to the Soviets.

Under these circumstances, the search was on to find new “killing fields.” To the rescue came an organization called Yahad - In Unum and its director Father Patrick Desbois. This organization was created in January 2004 on the initiative of three French archbishops (including a former Archbishop of Paris Mgr. Lustiger, a Polish Jew who, according to his wishes, is buried in Israel), Rabbi Israël Singer, a former President of the World Jewish Congress, Mr. Serge Cwajgenbaum, Secretary-General of the World Jewish Congress, and Mr. Pinchas Shapiro. It is sponsored by a number of foundations and organizations as well as by the Municipality of Paris.<sup>[3]</sup> Father Desbois is also director of the (French) Episcopal Committee for Relations with Judaism.

On May 12, 2011, Special Envoy to Monitor and Combat Anti-Semitism Hannah Rosenthal recognized the work of Father Patrick Desbois, President of the Yahad-In Unum Association of France, with a Tribute of Appreciation certificate. By U.S. Department of State, photographer not specified [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Desbois and his team set to work scouring the Ukrainian and Belorussian country sides for evidence of mass executions, plumbing the memories of local populations for clues. Evidence was forthcoming of what was duly dubbed a “Holocaust by Bullets” which began in 1941—that is, before the Wannsee Conference (January 1942) and before the alleged Polish and German camp exterminations.

In 2008 Father Desbois’s account of his work, Porteur de mémoires : Sur les traces de la Shoah par balles, appeared in its English translation as The Holocaust by Bullets: A Priest’s Journey to Uncover the Truth behind the Murder of 1.5 Million Jews.<sup>[4]</sup> One must wonder if any normally endowed person perusing this exposé could still seriously entertain the veracity of the Shoah. Inter alia, it recounts uncritically what we consider metaphysical phenomena and proffers unsubstantiated assertions designed to convey a picture of diabolically sadistic murderers intent on maximizing the suffering of their victims. The book amounts to an extended diatribe of hatred toward Germans.

In establishing his credentials, Desbois assures us of his own and his family’s near-saintly qualities. On p. 67 he confides modestly:

With the influence of my family and my religious tradition, I have always taken the position of resistance in the face of evil—I am a person who unites with others to fight evil wherever it resides, ...

— in sum, a modern-day Don Quixote. His Acknowledgements (p. 215) first cite “my grandfather, Claudius Desbois, who gave me the thirst for truth. Thank you to my father and mother who gave me the taste for justice and truth.” On page 5 he tells us:

I didn’t find out till much later that the German pilots taken prisoner by the Maquis [anti-Nazi guerillas — Ed.] had been tortured in my grandparents’ farm before being shot in the forest across from the house.

So it would seem that the parents’ taste for justice didn’t come from Grandfather Claudius; but of course the pilots were only German boche, unworthy of being treated as prisoners-of-war. On the other hand, when beggars came into the family shop, his mother used to say:

“You have to give them half a rabbit, but only give them the good bits, the thighs!” And we were perfectly happy to eat the rabbit ribs ourselves.

Patrick Desbois should not be confused with Robin Des Bois (the French name for Robin Hood). Rather, he is an anti-Robin Hood who is out to rob poor Europeans to give to rich Jewish organizations. On p. 100 he recounts presenting his research to the Claims Conference (the Conference on Jewish Material Claims against Germany) which, as the book explains, was founded in 1951 in New York “to represent and offer reparations for the victims and the Jewish survivors of the Shoah.” The Conference happens to be one of Yahad - In Unum’s sponsors. However, lest we misunderstand, Desbois takes the bull by the horns on p. 166:

Money and Jews, Jews and money. I am very familiar with this kind of association. These clichés often lead insidiously to hatred and violence.

We suggest he contemplate Nahum Goldmann’s viewpoint as expressed in The Jewish Paradox (Athenäum, Frankfurt 1988, p. 77):

I hardly exaggerate. Jewish life exists of two elements: extracting money and whining.

On p. 121 the author, in professing his belief in the Providence of God but also his awareness of the abominable face of the world, confides that both were received from his family, his Church, “but also from the Jewish tradition. A single human race, created in the image of God.” Alas! The image of a single human race, if implying equality between races, certainly didn’t come from the Jewish tradition. Just as Animal Farm’s governing pigs proclaimed that: “All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others,” Deuteronomy 7:6 assures the chosen people:

For you are people consecrated to the Lord your God: of all the peoples on earth the Lord your God chose you to be His treasured people.

In case Gentiles didn’t quite get the message clearly enough, Professor Mordechai Nisan cleared up any ambiguity in Kivunim (August 1984, pp. 151-156):

If Gentiles refuse to live a life of inferiority, then this signals their rebellion and the unavoidable necessity of Jewish warfare against their very presence.

Page 131 of the book captures Father Desbois in a reflective mood:

I thought of the incomprehension, contempt, pogroms, and expulsions that had marked the centuries of relationships between Catholics and Jews, preventing the coming together of our two traditions.

Since by our reading, this text nails Catholics as the villains and Jews as the innocent victims, we suggest that he might discover the motivations for this goyish behavior in the texts cited above. Also, he could fruitfully check out the Talmud.<sup>[5]</sup>

There remains a nagging question as to how 1.5 million people could have been murdered across thousands of sites without this having come to public notice much earlier. Chapter XV is entitled “An Extermination in Every Village.” This title is justified on p. 147:

The landscape of Ukraine, village after village, east to west, was transforming itself under my eyes into an ocean of exterminations. Whether in Bahkir in west Ukraine, or in Nikolayev in east Ukraine . . . The horrors of the Holocaust were not necessarily exactly the same from one place to another, but they did unfortunately cover the whole country without exceptions.

Or again on p. 178 the author notes in despair:

I imagine that if we could open all the mass graves we would have to take aerial photos of the whole of the Ukraine. A mass cemetery of anonymous pits into which men, women and children were thrown. Not a camp but a country of graves.

The foreword to the book provides some clues to solve the mystery:

Their [the Holocaust victims’] stories and fates of their communities were obscured by clouds of Soviet secrecy and anti-Semitism.

Furthermore, there were problems related to deciphering hand-written documents and the Soviet regime’s misrepresentation of the truth (p. x).

While all this is true, we are told on p. 155 that:

The Germans had learned that whenever the Soviets arrived in a village, the first thing they would do was open the graves, photograph the bodies, and draw up a document with the help of the inhabitants of the village, the teacher, the priest, and any surviving Jews. They would also proceed with a thorough scientific analysis of the bodies.

It was this information which led the Germans to undertake “Operation 1005” (of which more below). What remains puzzling is why the Soviets apparently kept mum about their findings. It will be remembered that Churchill and Roosevelt forbade revealing the truth about Katyn. The Russians had every reason to shout to high heaven about alleged German crimes and to shift their own atrocities onto them. Had any entity such as the Red Cross or other humanitarian agencies, the Allied or neutral governments, or well-placed individuals such as Roosevelt, Truman, Churchill, or Eisenhower been apprised of the killings, they would certainly have condemned them.

As indicated above, the “Holocaust by Bullets” took place before the Wannsee Conference, from which the order for the liquidation of the Jews allegedly emanated. From where did the orders for such a massive operation come? Were they issued on the independent initiatives of local commanders? The following text from p. 67 hints at an order from a centralized authority:

We found out that the Germans had had carte blanche regarding how to kill the Jews. A legal framework was in place that required them to assassinate the Jews, but the methods used were left to their initiative, even their sadism.

No attempt is made to justify this bald assertion. What evidence was found of a carte blanche's having been given? What was the legal framework requiring them to assassinate the Jews? Was all this mere hearsay?

Yahad - In Unum set out to record the testimony of surviving eyewitnesses of the exterminations. How reliable is such evidence? An article in the Scientific American of 8 January 2009 entitled, "Why Science Tells Us Not to Rely on Eyewitness Accounts" and sub-titled "Eyewitness testimony is fickle and, all too often, shockingly inaccurate," contends:

The uncritical acceptance of eyewitness accounts may stem from a popular misconception of how memory works. Many people believe that human memory works like a video recorder: the mind records events and then, on cue, plays back an exact replica of them. On the contrary, psychologists have found that memories are reconstructed rather than played back each time we recall them. The act of remembering, says eminent memory researcher and psychologist Elizabeth F. Loftus of the University of California, Irvine, is 'more akin to putting puzzle pieces together than retrieving a video recording.' Even questioning by a lawyer can alter the witness's testimony because fragments of the memory may unknowingly be combined with information provided by the questioner, leading to inaccurate recall.

The final sentence is particularly relevant in the present context, as is also the article's concluding paragraph:

Many researchers have created false memories in normal individuals; what is more, many of these subjects are certain that the memories are real. In one well-known study, Loftus and her colleague Jacqueline Pickrell gave subjects written accounts of four events, three of which they had actually experienced. The fourth story was fiction; it centered on the subject being lost in a mall or another public place when he or she was between four and six years old. A relative provided realistic details for the false story, such as a description of the mall at which the subject's parents shopped. After reading each story, subjects were asked to write down what else they remembered about the incident or to indicate that they did not remember it at all. Remarkably about one third of the subjects reported partially or fully remembering the false event. In two follow-up interviews, 25 percent still claimed that they remembered the untrue story, a figure consistent with the findings of similar studies.

Nevertheless, in his Foreword to the book, Mr. Paul A. Shapiro claims:[6]

Similarly, the Soviet investigation and trial records confirm that the individuals giving testimony to Father Desbois today are remembering accurately what they saw, despite the passage of more than 60 years.

Father Desbois also assures us (p. 86) that: "The witnesses' narratives were relentlessly precise"; but later admits (p. 204):

Weary of the stories that were not exactly true, weary of meeting people who said they wanted to tell us all but who didn't want us to know everything.

This is not surprising; as mentioned elsewhere, many Jews were slaughtered by local populations after the Soviet retreat since they were identified with Soviet atrocities (not the least of which was the early-1930s famine).

In the small Ukrainian town of Busk, which formerly was home to an important Jewish community, an exchange with one witness (Stepan Davidovski) was as follows (p. 183):

Q. Did the Jewish police remain until the end of the ghetto?

A. Yes. They weren't shot. They were sent to the ghetto of Olensko, where the police were sent.

On p. 186 we find the following exchange with Eugenia Nazarenko, who confirmed that she was referring to the Jewish police:

Q. Were the police also killed in the cemetery?

A. Yes, in the same pit. First they brought the civilians, then the police.

But Nazarenko later admits that she didn't actually see the killings:

I didn't see it myself; it was the people of the village who talked about it.

In the Crimean town of Kertch the team "happened to run into" a sailor who, "his eyes filled with tears," related (p. 107):

The sea was black. The Jews who had come here had all thrown themselves into the sea at Azov to try to achieve their last hope of survival—reaching the Russian shores. Many of them drowned.

Now, Azov is a town situated in Russia on the River Don at the other extremity of the Sea of Azov from Kertch and about 16 km inland from the sea. We presume that the Jews had in fact jumped into the sea at Kertch. Since the Kertch Strait is 3.1 km wide at its narrowest, it would seem suicidal for all but the strongest to throw themselves lemming-like into the sea.

In his foreword (p. xi) Mr. Shapiro confirms:

[W]e can now know the whole truth in all of its frightening detail. Through a magical marriage of the evidence—60-year old Soviet documents and riveting testimonies taken today, to which Father Desbois has added astonishing ballistic and forensic findings as well—we are finally able to see clearly.

We subscribe to the attributes "magical" and "astonishing" in this statement, but to not much else. We have already considered the reliability of the "riveting testimonies." While Mr. Shapiro evokes a "magical marriage," we consider this epithet accurately describes certain events uncovered by our Yahad - In Unum sleuths and which we term supernatural (see below). As regards the "ballistic" findings, the procedure is described on p. 53.

The Germans did not use more than one bullet to kill a Jew. Three hundred cartridges, 300 bullets, 300 people executed here. . . .The proof of genocide was so flagrant and so real. (p. 53).

True to say, proceeding in this fashion in the Ukraine, which saw very heavy fighting during the Second World War, could be qualified as “astonishing.” While Mr. Shapiro is able to see the course of events clearly, that is unfortunately not our case.

Yahad found cartridge casings used by the Nazis to murder 1,400 Jews. Motol, Belarus. Photo Credit: Nicolas Tkatchouk/Yahad-In Unum Photo Archives

In Busk the team wished to carry out “archaeological research,”<sup>[7]</sup> and to ensure that Jewish law was not contravened arranged for the presence of a rabbi (p. 175).

The Jewish law, the Halakha, specifies that bodies must not be moved under any circumstances, particularly the victims of the Holocaust (p. 176).

On p. 177 it is confirmed that:

It was impossible to carry out a typical scientific study because we had to respect Jewish law and not move any of the bones. We could therefore only observe what appeared on the surface.

Recourse had to be had to the German and Soviet archives for the “missing information.”

Consequently, the foreword’s reference to the team’s (astonishing) forensic findings leaves us puzzled. What were they exactly? It would seem that the “archaeological research” consisted solely of uncovering the bodies to confirm death by shooting and then covering them up again.

In fact, Professor Robert Faurisson denies the claim that Jewish law forbids the moving of bodies, pointing out that the exhumation and examination of bodies is authorized in criminal cases. He refers to the Encyclopedia Judaica (1978) under the entries “Autopsies” and “Dissection.”

When he visited Belzec (Poland) Desbois met inter alia (p. 23): “the carpenter who made the gas chamber.” We wonder whether a carpenter would have the savoir-faire to construct a gas chamber?

The assassins resorted to various subtleties to cover the sound of their misdeeds. Banging on empty buckets or requisitioning a musician to play the buben (a wooden percussion instrument) (p. 139). To muffle the cries of the Jews, peasants were recruited to bang saucepans, and one villager had been requisitioned to play the drum every morning (p. 136).

In June 2002 Desbois visited Rawa-Ruska, where his grandfather Claudius had been held prisoner, with René Chevalier (p. 27). René noted that fewer Jews used to return to the ghetto after work than had gone in the morning. When asked where the missing were buried, he confided:

You know, there were many holes in the airport runway at that time . . .

We imagine that there would also be a number of aircrew and passengers buried in the vicinity.

On p. 84 we find the following testimony:

We were three Ukrainian girls who, in our bare feet, had to pack down the bodies of the Jews and throw a fine layer of sand on top of them so that other Jews could lay down.

This chore was carried out after each volley of shots. As one can readily imagine, this was not an easy task; as the witness admitted (p. 85):

Many Jews were only wounded ... We had trouble walking on them.

This evidence made a marked impression on the Yahad - In Unum team:

That evening when we got back into the van, our eyes were full of images of these three village girls running down into the pit, trampling on the bodies, throwing sand, and coming out again on the orders of Hummel, trying to catch their breath before the next shooting.

A German policeman called Humpel performed the same duty in the village of Senkivishvka:

[He] advanced, upright, walking on the dead bodies, pistol in hand, and murdered each Jew, one after the other, with a bullet in the back of the neck (pp. xviii-xix).

Prof. Faurisson remarks that in this type of massacre the victims' abdomens explode, spraying fecal matter everywhere; the stench is unbearable, and the corpses assume all manner of postures. It would be impossible, even for expert gymnasts, to walk on this mass of entangled corpses without slipping and falling into the blood and fecal matter.[8]

Desbois seems obsessed with showing that the Germans resorted to burying people alive. For example, in Busk:

The impact of the bullets and the position of the bodies showed that they had all been shot and buried alive. Many of the women's bodies were found holding a baby, to protect it from the flow of sand. It was three weeks of macabre discoveries (p. 177).

The impact of the bullets would certainly show that they had been shot, but how does the position of the bodies determine that they had all been buried alive? Since all the victims were only wounded, the executioners must either have been extraordinarily bad shots or else have deliberately avoided killing outright. The case of finding female bodies holding babies is also a recurring theme in the exposé.

Confrontation with the macabre leads us into the supernatural. On p. 65 we find:

These peasants also spoke to me of the pits as if they were alive. How was I to understand what they meant? How was I to accept the witnesses' repeated assertion that the pits 'breathed' for three days afterward?

The narrative then refers presumably to the Arabski event mentioned below, and continues:

I understood then that all the witnesses who had told us about the pits moving, accompanying their words by an up and down movement of the hand, had signified in fact that a pit took three days to quiet down because many of the victims had been buried alive. After understanding that, I accepted the true meaning of these words: ‘The pit took three days to die . . .’ ‘the well shouted for three days.’ The victims suffocated in the two or three meters of sand that was thrown on top of them.

On p. 74 we come face to face with the miraculous Arabski incident:

I remember one man, Samuel Arabski, who had been watching from behind a bush when he was requisitioned to fill in the pit. Now an old man, he explained to us, his eyes full of terror, that a Jew’s hand had emerged from the pit and seized his spade. He had fainted. The pit was covered but “it was moving all over.”

We are not surprised that our witness fainted. We shan’t know whether the hand was trying to stop, or offering to help with, the digging.

A case of immurement in a village called Sataniv is recorded on p. 205:

“What happened during the war?” They replied, lifting their hands to the sky: “The Jews . . . the Jews . . . They were walled up. They were walled up under the marketplace in a cellar.” The Germans had burnt some straw to make smoke and smother them. Then, after closing the door, they had piled two meters of earth on top. The women told us that, for four days afterwards, the Jews had tried to get out, and that one could see the ground of the marketplace moving. On the fifth day, the silence was total. The story stunned me; I had never heard anything like it. How far could people go in terms of sadism, evil, and negating others? It was an example of a limitless imagination in service of destruction.

We are just as stunned by this story as Father Desbois, who subsequently discovered in the Soviet archives that:

this immurement, carried out by the Ukrainian police, took place on May 15, 1942. According to these archives, the smoke asphyxiated the imprisoned.

So who was responsible? — Germans or Ukrainians? Were the victims asphyxiated by smoke as claimed by the Soviets, or from being buried alive as implied by the villagers? We refer back to the problem of trustworthiness of eyewitness accounts.

How long can a person survive if buried alive? The Popular Science forum<sup>[9]</sup> calculates that for an average person in an average casket, all oxygen would be used up after 5½ hours. But it adds, and this is more to the point in our cases:

Even if you were able to get out of the coffin without exhausting your air supply first, you’d find yourself in a situation similar to being buried in a mega-landslide or avalanche. The dirt would be so dense and heavy that your chest wouldn’t be able to expand. ‘It’d be like concrete setting in the course of seconds,’ says Ethan Greene, Director of the Colorado Avalanche Information Center. Snow is heavy, but earth is even heavier. And if you were able to move, the dirt would fall into your mouth or nostrils and could end up clogging your airways.

So the Sataniv victims were of particularly hardy stock. Not only were they perhaps first asphyxiated, but they then lasted for four whole days – one day better than their brethren mentioned earlier. We agree that this episode is an example of “a limitless imagination” — that of eyewitnesses.

Desbois’s reference to “the well shouted for three days” presumably evokes an interview in a Ukrainian village, Bobovry Kut. The well in question “must have been around 80 meters deep” (p. 199). On p. 200 we find the following exchange:

Q. How long did the shooting last?

A. Around two hours. Some people fell into the well alive. Shouts were heard for three days.

Now, “about 80 meters” would be approximately the height of a 20-story building.

We are willing to concede that Yahweh may well have endowed his chosen people with special qualities to reinforce their powers of survival. However, until such time as the above-cited phenomena can be reproduced under controlled conditions, we reject them as pure fantasy. We do not demand 4 or even 3 days of live burial, just one day. For the well episode, just one-quarter of the height cited (i.e. 20 meters).

On p. 207 we learn that a “Holocaust by smothering” occurred in a Ukrainian village called Bertniki. A local resident who hid Jews smothered them with quilts during the night. On the other hand, a witness in Busk spoke of a woman who managed to hide an entire Jewish family in her cellar, while two Germans also lived with her—a commendable feat of concealment.

Father Desbois’s disclosure of the need to mount guard at night (p. 177), or to cover graves with a special tar (p. 178), in order to prevent grave robbers from stealing dental gold was not particularly flattering for the host population.

One can readily sympathize with the Yahad - In Unum team that theirs was a particularly arduous task; harrowing both physically and above all psychologically in view of the horrors encountered. But the job had to be done. Desbois confesses stoically on p. 109:

I had to accept to hear the unspeakable. I had to get over the disgust provoked by the accounts of infinite sadism. Sometimes we had to stop in the middle of an interview, when the horror had surpassed our understanding. We had to calm ourselves down, catch our breath, drag ourselves out of the narrative, and detach ourselves from the obscenities performed on women and children.

Hopefully, the honors which have been bestowed upon at least the team’s leader (see below) have helped compensate for the traumas occasioned by these ordeals.

Operation 1005

As mentioned above, the Germans’ awareness of Russian investigations into their activities drove the former to try to cover their tracks. Chapter XVI is devoted to this episode which involved digging up all the victims of the Reich in Eastern Europe and burning the bodies in large furnaces. Special furnaces were designed that could fit up to two thousand bodies. The purpose was to hide all traces of the executions, particularly those performed by the Einsatzgruppen. (p.

153).

Since they sought to recover all bodies, this would have necessitated inter alia digging up the Rawa-Ruska airport runway.

In charge was an SS Paul Blobel who devised a particular technique to make the burning of the bodies more efficient: he had the bodies layered with wood on metal rails as in a pyre; when it was set on fire the cremation was extremely rapid. The same method was frequently used in the extermination camps afterwards (pp. 153f.).

Was this technique an adaptation of the special furnaces or an alternative?

Operation 1005 was kept secret, the SS communicated with Berlin by means of meteorological codes: the number of clouds indicated the graves opened, and the height of the rainfall the number of bodies burnt (p. 155).

Decidedly there is no limit to human inventiveness —particularly when in the service of evil. The manipulation of such natural phenomena as clouds and rain by the Nazis represents a significant technological advance over the North American Indians' system of smoke signals. Unfortunately, Desbois does not enter into details of how the system actually functioned. How had German genius contrived to bend meteorological phenomena to its will? For example, what happened on cloudless days or when the sky was completely overcast. Perhaps they were obliged to suspend activities on such occasions. How are clouds counted? How is the height of the rain calculated? What happens when there are clouds but no rain? What if the wind was blowing in the wrong direction such that the signals went to e.g. Moscow instead of Berlin?

These extraordinary communications measures were contrived despite the fact that the whole undertaking was an open secret locally. How could one hope to hide pyres burning 2000 bodies? As Desbois notes:

Although surrounded by absolute secrecy, Operation 1005 was doubtless the best known German operation in the immediate neighborhood of the cremation sites during the genocide of the Jews (p. 154).

The situation would seem quite grotesque.

On 15-16 June 2009 an International Conference was organized in Paris on the subject of Operation 1005. We don't know if any of the questions posed above were elucidated by the participants.

Another illustration of German inventiveness in the cause of evil is furnished on p. 98:

The Nazis had taken away beauty from everything. The most luscious green landscapes became extermination fields, and Ukrainian children became the hired hands of death. The perpetrators of genocide used everything — cliffs, grain silos, beaches, irrigation wells, ditches. Everything that could be closed off was used as a prison. Schools, town halls, synagogues, wine cellars, police stations, shops, the kolkhoz pigsties, chicken houses, and stables, had become, one after the other, the antechambers of death. The landscape, buildings, and children became, in the hands of the assassins, tools to exterminate the people of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

The Count

The foreword (p. vii) claims “over 1.5 million” victims. How does one arrive at this figure?

There seem to have been two methods employed for assessing the number of victims – counting of bodies and the counting of empty German cartridge casings. Apart from our reservations about the latter procedure, we would also add:

1. For executions carried out within villages the casings were presumably no longer recoverable.
2. Given that bodies should not be moved, how were the numbers of victims thrown down wells or buried in pits in multiple layers assessed?
3. How many drowned in the Sea of Azov (which was black with Jews trying to reach Russia)?

We were surprised to learn on p. 115 that the Germans, normally so meticulous in such matters, had charged a local boy under 14 years of age with the task of counting bodies.

How can we know that all the victims were Jews? We wonder how many of the human remains located were those of the 10-15 million estimated to have been murdered by Stalin’s Jewish henchman Lazar Kaganovich in the notorious induced starvation of the early 1930s? Since we are told “the work is characterized by its rigor” (p. 59), a future edition of The Holocaust by Bullets may elucidate this question.

As our modern-day Don Quixote and his team pursue their research, who knows what further wondrous phenomena might come to light. Perhaps even evidence of a “Holocaust by Hypnosis”? It is a pity that the team doesn’t seem to have a Sancho Panza.

Public Reaction to the Book

Here are some of the (shorter) blurbs presented in the book itself:

“Father Desbois is a generation too late to save lives. Instead, he has saved memory and history.” — The Wall Street Journal

“[T]his modest Roman Catholic priest from Paris, without using much more than his calm voice and Roman collar, has shattered the silence surrounding a largely untold chapter of the Holocaust when Nazis killed 1.5 million Jews in Ukraine from 1941 to 1944.”—Chicago Tribune

“An important addition to studies of the Shoah, agonizing to read and utterly necessary.” — Kirkus Reviews

“One of the most moving, troubling and insightful books on the Holocaust, or for that matter any other subject, that I have ever read.” — The Catholic Review

It would be a sad comment on the intelligence of the reviewers concerned if they had actually read the book. Perhaps they were merely handed the blurb and told to sign it.

In France the book received favorable press, radio and TV coverage. Criticism by local historians centered mainly on Father Desbois’s tendency to present himself as a pioneer, neglecting previous research on the subject.[10]

The French magazine L'Express of 5 October, 2009 published an article which included criticisms of Desbois's procedures by people who had initially collaborated with him. The lack of scientific method in interviewing witnesses was denounced, as well as a systematic evasion of local populations' participation in the massacre of Jews, which sidestepped the reality of the situation on the ground. Following the founding of the Soviet Union, the conflict between Ukrainian Communists and Nationalists was such that a number of the latter joined the SS-Volunteer Division "Galicia." A lack of precision in the localization of certain pits was criticized, as also the occasional non-respect of the halakha (Jewish law).

L'Express relates that, following this criticism, Desbois retained the services of an American public relations firm to enhance his image. He also pleaded "I am not an historian."

Not surprisingly, Jewish organizations are solidly behind him.[11]

The United Nations was harnessed to the propaganda task when its International Day of Commemoration in Memory of the Victims of the Holocaust celebrated "Holocaust by Bullets" on 28 January 2013.

International Day of Commemoration Flyer

A year later The New York Times ran an article from Oswiecim (Auschwitz) which is worth quoting liberally:[12]

Monday, the 69th anniversary of the day Soviet forces liberated Auschwitz, was observed as International Holocaust Remembrance Day. Yet a third or more of the almost six million Jews killed in the Holocaust perished not in the industrial-scale murder of the camps, but in executions at what historians call killing sites: thousands of villages, quarries, forests, wells, streets and homes that dot the map of Eastern Europe.

The vast numbers killed in what some have termed a ‘Holocaust by bullets’ have slowly garnered greater attention in recent years as historians sift through often sketchy and incomplete records that became available after the collapse of the Soviet Union.

As the number of Holocaust survivors gradually declines, these documents or witness accounts — from Belarus, Ukraine, parts of Russia and the Baltic States — have illuminated a new picture of the Nazis’ methods.

In the years after 1945, the executions were not discussed much. The shock of the discovery of concentration camps was one factor. The camps had survivors, found in place, who told their unimaginable tale. By contrast, the local executions terrorized and silenced survivors in the eastern regions. In addition, after World War II, many witnesses were left behind the Iron Curtain, and no one was interested in their memories.

On the ground, ‘news about killing in local fields spread much more quickly than the murky rumors’ about gassing at concentration camps, Dr. Pohl said.

‘Only a few survivors could testify after 1945,’ he added. As a result, ‘there is still no comprehensive overview of the killing sites.’

Dr. Silberklang said that ‘in the popular mind, this subject is far less known than the Holocaust.’ The executions became, he said, ‘in a sense, invisible.’

One man who has sought out testimony for 12 years is the Rev. Patrick Desbois, a Roman Catholic priest from France who became involved after stumbling across Rava-Ruska, the location of a World War II prison camp in Ukraine for French soldiers where his paternal grandfather was interned.

Father Desbois, the only one in his family curious enough to have gotten his grandfather to discuss his memories, now has 23 full-time employees in Paris who crisscross former Soviet territory interviewing witnesses, 90 percent of whom had never told their tale, he said.

The killing was “secret for Western countries, at a high level,” he said. “It was ultra-public in a village.”

Father Desbois has worked with the American Jewish Committee on five sites in Ukraine and Belarus to clear them, find their parameters and have them marked. One difficulty, said Deidre Berger, the head of the committee in Berlin, is that Jewish tradition prohibits exhumation.

It is painstaking work, uncovering “a tragedy of vast dimensions that has been very little researched,” Ms. Berger said at the Krakow conference. Yet, she noted, the work has huge significance, given that “more Jews were killed by shooting in Ukraine” — an estimated 1.5 million — “than murdered in Auschwitz in the crematoria.”

Often, Ms. Berger said, “what we thought were facts are not facts at all.”

“We must anticipate tomorrow,” Father Desbois added, referring to still powerful anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial, “when people will start to say, ‘No, nothing happened here.’”

So here we have “a new picture of the Nazis’ methods.” The NYT plays fast and loose with its statistics. We are told that the number of Holocaust victims was “almost six million” and that “a third or more” perished in “what historians call killing sites: thousands of villages, quarries, forests, wells, streets and homes that dot the map of Eastern Europe.” Later in the article the number involved is “an estimated 1.5 million.” Now 1.5 is one-third of 4.5. If it was more than one-third – e.g. one-half, then the total number of Holocaust dead would be 3.0 million. But even our 4.5 figure is not really almost 6. But then, as Dr. Pohl (a professor of history at Klagenfurt University) states, the gassings were just “murky rumors.”

We return to the problem of why it had taken so long to discover these murders which took place everywhere in the Ukraine? The answer: A combination of “The shock of the discovery of concentration camps” plus “the local executions terrorized and silenced survivors in the eastern regions,” plus “After World War II, many witnesses were left behind the Iron Curtain, and no one was interested in their memories.” That the news of mass killings on such a scale at thousands of sites should take a half-century to reach Western ears is stretching our credulity a bit far, even allowing for the terrible shock imparted by discovery of the concentration camps. Particularly as Dr. Pohl assures us that “news about killing in local fields spread much more quickly than the murky rumors” about gassing at concentration camps, and Father Desbois confirms that the killing “was ultra-public in a village.” Furthermore, the Soviet authorities had every interest to load murders onto the Nazis—as in the case of Katyn—when the news reached their ears. Hence we are surprised that no one was interested in their memories.

Although the executions took place at thousands of sites, Dr. Silberklang observes that they became “in a sense, invisible.” The method of achieving such a mass disappearing trick would surely interest professional magicians.

The Rev. Patrick Desbois reportedly “stumbled” across Rava-Ruska. The fact that his grandfather was imprisoned there surely helped orient the stumbling.

Ms. Berger laments that their painstaking work faces one difficulty — Jewish tradition prohibits exhumation. But the work has huge significance, since “more Jews were killed by shooting in Ukraine” — an estimated 1.5 million — “than murdered in Auschwitz in the crematoria.” The veto on exhumation (which, as noted earlier, is contested by Prof. Faurisson) conveniently prevents painstaking forensic work.

Finally, Ms. Berger pronounces enigmatically: “what we thought were facts are not facts at all.” What exactly does this mean?

More recently, UNESCO in Paris organized a “Shoah by Bullets” exhibition between 26 January and 10 February 2015. Exhibitions also opened in Vilnius (Lithuania) on 1 October 2015 and, for the first time in Latin America, in Guatemala City on 5 October 2015.

Father Desbois was elected Doctor Honoris Causa by Yeshiva University, New York in 2011, by New York University in 2012, and by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, New York, in 2015. He was also made an Honorary Doctor of Divinity by the University of Winnipeg in 2013, and has been distinguished by a slew of Israeli universities and Jewish organizations. Furthermore, the Université Paris 1 Pantheon-

Sorbonne is holding seminars on La "Shoah par Balles" during the current academic year.

The then French President Sarkozy decorated Desbois with the Légion d'honneur on 12 June 2008 for "a major contribution to historic and scientific knowledge of the extermination of the Jews of Europe."

The degree to which The Holocaust by Bullets has been hailed as a seminal work of historic significance and the extraordinary naivety with which its findings have been accepted in the absence of critical appraisal would be incomprehensible were it not for the fact that it deals with the Shoah. Was the story concocted by Monique de Wael in the hoax Misha: A Mémoire of the Holocaust Years any less probable than several phenomena we have identified in The Holocaust by Bullets?

When it comes to the Shoah, we are transported outside the realm of normality into a virtual reality where the generally accepted rules of reasoning and research no longer apply. In response to two letters from Professor Faurisson published by the French daily Le Monde, 34 French historians published a declaration ("The Hitlerite Extermination Policy: a Declaration by Historians") in the 21 February 1979 issue of this same newspaper. The concluding sentences of this declaration amount to a denunciation of scholarship and, like the Decalogue, deserve to be carved into stone:

Technical questions as to how such a mass murder was possible are beside the point. It was technically possible since it happened. Acceptance of this fact is a sine qua non for any enquiry into this subject matter. It was incumbent upon us to re-state this truth. There is not, and there cannot be, any debate about the existence of the gas chambers.

Le Monde refused Prof. Faurisson the right to publish his reply to this article.

Fundamentally, the Shoah has become holy writ whose sanctity is assured by an all-powerful Thought Police which exercises sway over politicians, academe, the media, etc. Its task is to track down and suppress manifestations of heresy. In Europe, which lacks a First Amendment [to the Constitution of the United States], it has obtained the passage of legislation to stifle freedom of expression in a number of countries. While the EU Human Rights Guidelines on Freedom of Expression Online and Offline trumpets urbi et orbi that: "Freedom of opinion and expression are fundamental rights of every human being," it is a dead letter as far as the Shoah is concerned.[13]

Judicial repression is complemented by well-proven and very effective measures to suppress "unorthodox" views. Owners of auditoria are threatened either physically or with being black-listed, newspapers are threatened with the withdrawal of advertising. Apostates risk professional and/or financial ruin. The ultimate resort is to physical violence. Professor Faurisson, writing in 2013, conveys an idea of the treatment to which non-conformist researchers are subjected:[14]

In total, from November 1978 to May 1993, I was to suffer ten assaults in Lyon, Paris, Stockholm and Vichy. I cannot say how many court cases have been brought against me, or that I myself have had to bring, from 1978 until today. I shall not devote space here to the convictions, fines, police searches and seizures at my house and arrests for questioning. Unlike so many revisionists who have had to do years in prison (up to twelve years in one case), I have never been sentenced to actual imprisonment. At the age of 83, I have just been served notice of three criminal proceedings and a fourth looms likely.

What the custodians of orthodoxy fear above all is an open debate on television. In an interview accorded Le Monde on 4 August 2006, when it was put to P. Vidal-Naquet that a proposal to convene a meeting of historians on the Shoah would risk providing a forum for negationists, he agreed wholeheartedly:

Of course, I refuse this in the strongest possible terms. The day one accepts one of these individuals in a public debate on television or in a colloquium of historians, they will have won the game. They would be considered a (legitimate) school of thought. We must be ruthless in denying them this.

The reception accorded The Holocaust by Bullets and the honors bestowed upon its author are to be viewed against this background. Father Desbois's exploitation of the rich Shoah vein has projected him from obscurity to become something of a celebrity and a protégé of powerful interests.

We owe respect to the living; to the dead we owe only truth (On doit des égards aux vivants; on ne doit aux morts que la vérité).
— Voltaire, Lettres écrites en 1719 qui contiennent la critique de l'

Notes:

[1]	See e.g. F. J. P. Veale, Advance to Barbarism (Appleton Wisc.: C.C. Nelson Publishing, 1953).
[2]	See http://www.balderexlibris.com/index.php?post/The-holocaust-controversy-The-case-for-open-debate .
[3]	The French newspaper Le Figaro of 15 October 2009 reported that the German Government paid a 500 thousand Euros subsidy to Yahad - In Unum in 2009 and that the European Union also participates in its financing.
[4]	Quotes are from The First St. Martin's Griffin Edition: November 2009.
[5]	Page ix in the foreword flags the fact that Father Desbois's activities are supported by the Catholic Church of France, footnoting that "Archbishop of Paris Jean-Marie Cardinal Lustiger, now deceased, and Andre Cardinal Vingt-Trois, who succeeded him, have both provided strong backing. Both visited the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, in 2006 and 2008 respectively, for the purpose of speaking publicly about the imperative of Holocaust education and the importance of cooperative work by Christians and Jews to study the Holocaust."
[6]	Director, Center for Advanced Holocaust Studies, United States Holocaust Memorial Museum.
[7]	In normal usage "archaeological" relates to the study of antiquities, or pre-historic remains.
[8]	See http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/2008/09/pour-finir-la-mascarade-du-pere-patrick.html
[9]	Online: http://www.popsoci.com/article/science/how-long-could-you-survive-coffin-if-you-were-buried-alive .
[10]	See http://www.delpla.org/article.php3?id_article=416 and http://www.cairn.info/revue-vingtieme-siecle-revue-d-histoire-2009-2-page-3.htm . Desbois does, however, recognize the earlier work of Leon Weliczewski (see p. 114).

[11]	In France in particular S. Klarsfeld of the “Association of the Sons and Daughters of Jews deported from France.” See the reference to delpla.org in Footnote 10.
[12]	Online: http://www.nytimes.com/2014/01/28/world/europe/a-light-on-a-vast-toll-of-jews-killed-away-from-the-death-camps.html
[13]	Framework Decision 2008/913/JHA on combating certain forms and expressions of racism and xenophobia by means of criminal law. Article 1: Offences concerning racism and xenophobia. Each Member State shall take the measures necessary to ensure that the following intentional conduct is punishable: d) publicly condoning, denying or grossly trivialising the crimes defined in Article 6 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal appended to the London Agreement of 8 August 1945, directed against a group of persons or a member of such a group defined by reference to race, colour, religion, descent or national or ethnic origin when the conduct is carried out in a manner likely to incite to violence or hatred against such a group or a member of such a group. Online: http://eeas.europa.eu/delegations/documents/eu_human_rights_guidelines_on_freedom_of_expression_online_and_offline_en.pdf
[14]	Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/2012/08/on-december-29-1978-le-monde-published.html . This site also furnishes a chronology of how revisionist views have progressed despite the repression.

The Victories of Revisionism (Part 2)

by Robert Faurisson

The article that follows was written on September 11, 2011 as a continuation to the paper "The Victories of Revisionism" that Professor Faurisson presented in Tehran on December 11, 2006. For that presentation Professor Faurisson is being prosecuted by the French government. His case was recently adjourned until June 2016.— Ed.

On December 11, 2006 I completed a twenty-page study entitled "The Victories of Revisionism." In it I noted, as examples, twenty victories won by the revisionists on the strictly historical and scientific level, whereas, on the media and judicial levels, their opponents continued to occupy nearly all the terrain. The "Holocaust" sectarians concealed their defeats and went on deceiving the public as they had been doing since 1945. But now, suddenly, the accelerated development of the Internet and the evolution of the world situation, so unfortunate for the State of Israel and the United States of America, have gradually changed the order of things. Revisionism's victories have started getting talked about. In particular, there is a proliferation of websites, forums and blogs where visitors have been able to learn, first, of the concessions made to the revisionists by "Holocaust" historians, and then of the real capitulations to which some of the latter have been driven.

To begin, in 1979, a group of 34 French academics signed a joint statement that was most revealing of their inability to describe the operation of "the magical gas chamber" (Louis-Ferdinand Céline); they pitifully declared: "One must not ask oneself how, technically, such a mass-murder was possible. It was technically possible, since it happened" (Le Monde, February 21, 1979, p. 23). In 1985 Raul Hilberg, the most eminent historian of the "Holocaust," finally acknowledged that there was, after all, no known evidence of the reality of any order, plan or organization aiming at the physical destruction of the European Jews and, in order to continue upholding that fiction nonetheless, he decided to resort to some astonishing explanations in the vein of what might be called "group parapsychology" (see below). In 1995 Jean-Claude Pressac, Serge Klarsfeld's liege man, definitively laid down his arms (see below). In the years thereafter something of a general desertion or rout could be observed among historians of the "Holocaust": feigning ignorance of what, in 1968 in her main academic dissertation, the Jewish historian Olga Wormser-Migot had herself been compelled to call "the problem of the gas chambers" and passing over in silence a number of other historical "problems" of that kind, they were content to repeat the purely gratuitous statements of the judges at Nuremberg and, for the most part, did not venture to look for historical and scientific evidence of their "Holocaust."

But one Jewish researcher remained in the running, the one whom I, for my part, called "the last of the Jewish Mohicans"; that was my sobriquet for Robert Jan van Pelt. However, once again, the matter was to end with a kind of capitulation. As will be seen below, on December 27, 2009 the fellow wound up his lengthy research work with the following observation: as concerns Auschwitz, for virtually everything "we know" about that camp (capital of the "Holocaust," visited by millions of believers) there is simply no evidence to be found...there at Auschwitz; it would be better to stop spending so much money trying to preserve the place; nature should take it back! This researcher's embarrassment is indeed understandable: he would prefer to see the pure fabrications, like the crematorium at Auschwitz I, disappear ("Everything in it is false," as French historian Eric Conan eventually found in 1995: L'Express, January 19-25, 1995, p. 68; on this subject see point no. 16 at <http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/2006/12/victories-of-revisionism.html> and the article at http://www.ihr.org/jhr/v15/v15n1p23\_Weber.html).

From 1979 to 2009, that is, for thirty years, the proponents of the authorized version of Second World War history have failed in their attempts to reply to the revisionists on the level of history, science, material research and the careful study of documents and testimonies. To compensate for this failure the “Holocaust” worshipers have sought refuge via the reserves of imagination or belief; hence a remarkable propagation of novels, notoriously false “testimonies,” plays, films, ceremonies, pilgrimages. And so it is that “Shoah Business” and the “Holocaust Religion” have flooded the world with their products and their phantasmagoria.

For their part, feeling the wind is in their sails, the revisionists will continue staying the course taken back in the late 1940s by, in particular, Maurice Bardèche and Paul Rassinier. Revisionist authors or activists have appeared in many countries around the world, especially in Europe and the United States. The most outstanding of the authors is unquestionably the American Arthur R. Butz; in order not to compromise his personal safety I shall avoid giving the name here of the most extraordinary activist. I also have in mind a number of other authors, in particular authors of German, Austrian, Belgian, Spanish, French, Italian, Swiss, Canadian, Australian or South American nationality. The list of North Americans who have participated in the past or who, like Bradley Smith and his friends, are active in the revisionist struggle today is relatively long.

An image haunts our contemporaries, that of the mounds of bodies discovered at the liberation of the German concentration camps in 1945. In that dreadful, fixating image they think they see proof of the inhumanity of the “Nazis” and, as a result, they believe by instinct that the revisionists are basically individuals who have taken up the task of rehabilitating Adolf Hitler. I wish these uninitiated, who, at the outset, close their hearts and minds to revisionism and let themselves be carried by their emotions, would start making an effort to reflect on the reality that lay behind the photographs and films in which they believe they see the harrowing proof of “Nazi atrocities.”

The Photographs and Films Showing Corpses

In my youth I myself had been shocked by the spectacle of the dead and the walking corpses in the camp at Bergen-Belsen. A bulldozer was seen pushing bodies of inmates towards the edge of great ditches, bodies which SS women then threw into those ditches. We were shown an SS physician, Dr. Fritz Klein, seated, legs apart, in the midst of one of them and appearing to think rather highly of himself, while Franz Hössler, another SS man, was seen standing before a truck laden with corpses, seemingly giving a self-satisfied speech. Many years later I would come to realize that, in this case, I had actually been the victim of a propaganda film and its artifices.

In the last months of an atrocious war, in the chaos to which Germany had been reduced, Bergen-Belsen, utterly swamped with detainees coming from the East, had been ravaged by a typhus epidemic. In the days following the camp’s liberation on April 15, 1945 – that is, when the British had taken charge – perhaps close to 14,000 people would still die, especially of typhus. In what remained of their cities the civilians had become cave dwellers, staying in whatever holes in the ground they could find, fallen prey to hunger and cold. At Bergen-Belsen there were practically no more supplies, medicine or means of disinfection.

It was in this disastrous situation that the SS officer Josef Kramer, commandant of the camp, decided to send a delegation under a white flag in the direction of British Field Marshal Montgomery's troops so as to warn them that they were approaching a huge den of infection, and that the detainees, once released, would have to be prevented from spreading typhus among the Allied soldiers and the German population. A cooperation agreement was made between, on the one hand, the Wehrmacht (excluding the SS) and, on the other hand, senior British army officers. The latter, once having arrived on the scene, decided to open the common graves and count the dead, then, after the count, reburied them in new ditches. Actually, a bulldozer did push the bodies to the edge of the ditches but the driver was a Tommy, whom I, like masses of other spectators before me, had once taken for a German soldier. As late as 1978 – the better to maintain that same error in peoples' minds, presumably – a photograph would be published which “beheaded” the driver of that bulldozer (Arthur Suzman & Denis Diamond, Six Million Did Die: The Truth Shall Prevail, Johannesburg, South African Jewish Board of Deputies, Second Edition, 1978, p. 19). SS women were made to stand alongside the ditch and then throw the bodies in, barehanded. As for Dr. F. Klein and F. Hössler, they were made to play an affected role and thus appear to illustrate the pride inspired by SS men in their supposed work of death. J. Kramer, himself, after being beaten by soldiers of the Royal British Artillery, was to be locked up for a whole night in a refrigeration room to break his “arrogance” (Dr. G.-L. Fréjafon, Bergen-Belsen Bagne Sanatorium, Paris, Librairie Valois, 1947, p. 22). A good many other camps offered the spectacle of hundreds of corpses and one can easily imagine the disgust of the liberators, arrested by the smell of victims of either typhus or dysentery whom, given their numbers, it had not been possible to bury.

To take another example of deception by photography, everyone may well have felt revulsion upon seeing the neatly aligned corpses in the Nordhausen camp, but it was to be learned after some time that those dead were in fact victims of an Allied bombing raid targeting mainly the military barracks called Bölke Kaserne. Meanwhile, at Dachau, Buchenwald and elsewhere identical sights lent credence to the legend that those camps, conceived and run as “death camps,” had been equipped with homicidal “gas chambers” regularly achieving an extravagant daily turnover. Upon verification, the official historians had admitted, under the pressure exerted by revisionist authors and especially by Paul Rassinier, author of The Holocaust Story and the Lies of Ulysses, that despite the many “testimonies” of priests, professors and doctors, the alleged “gassings” of detainees there had never taken place (Martin Broszat, of the Institut für Zeitgeschichte in Munich, “Keine Vergasung in Dachau [Bergen-Belsen, Buchenwald]”, Die Zeit, August 19, 1960, p. 16).

Shame on the Germans? Or on the Allies? Or on War?

The day when Copernicus showed that the sun did not revolve around the earth but that, on the contrary, the earth revolved around the sun there occurred what it has become customary to call a “Copernican revolution.” The expression means not only that reality may differ from appearance – a fact easily noted – but also that reality can be situated at the exact opposite of appearance. This is what happened after the war when some researchers realized that a number of the horrors first attributed to the losers, that is to say, in Europe mainly the Germans, were perhaps, in reality, attributable to the Allies. Consequently, in the face of all those photographs that made people cry out “Shame on Germany!”, it would perhaps be more just to say “Shame on the Allies who put Germany in that state!”, or else to conclude “Shame on war and its train of abominations!” Upon advancing into Germany the GI's themselves had been surprised at the extent of damage wrought by their aviation. One should be conscious of the fact that Churchill and Roosevelt had innovated when, fitting out their aircraft fleets with adequate capability, they had set about waging a systematic war – against civilians – on such a scale as history had never known. They had decided to raze the cities, big or small, and sometimes even the villages. From their standpoint it was necessary, by fire from the sky, bombardments of towns and villages, low-flying machine-gunning of city-dwellers trying to escape from the furnaces or of farmers in their fields, to make life impossible for all Germans without exception. Houses, hospitals, schools, universities, men, women, children, old people, livestock, everything had to disappear. The trains must no longer be able to run: they would need several days to make a journey that would normally have taken a few hours; one can imagine in what state convoys of detainees, for example, arrived at their destination after leaving, by force or by choice, the camps in the East before the arrival of the Soviets. Taking into consideration the decision made by Roosevelt and Churchill, one must agree that it was easier to attack civilians in that way rather than military personnel. Sometimes in the camp of the Western Allies certain lofty consciences, notably clerics, were heard protesting against such savagery, of which the Dresden bombings remain the prime example. But the propaganda, for its part, argued for the duty to destroy all that in one way or another stood for Satan or, in the minds of Jewish propagandists, Amalek. Indeed, since then, in Japan, Vietnam, Iraq and a few other corners of the globe, the Americans have been led to wage the same type of devastating war.

The Judicial Masquerades of Victors Putting the Vanquished on Trial

I myself, being, if I may say so, at the extreme center of opinions concerning politics or history, cannot pronounce condemnation of a given belligerent's having sought, as in a kind of competition in the matter, to invent still more means of killing than its opponent. I would be content to say that for me, every war is a butchery; the winner is a good butcher and the loser not so good a butcher; on the other hand, at the end of a war, the winner may at most administer to the vanquished lessons in butchery but not lessons in law, justice or virtue. Yet that is what happened at the Nuremberg trial (1945-1946) and in a thousand other "trials" of the same calibre up to today where we see Jewish organizations demanding that sickly nonagenarians be carried into court on a stretcher for "crimes" generally going back seventy years and for which there is no evidence nor sometimes even the least witness: the defendant had perhaps simply found himself in the wrong place at the wrong time; for instance, he had supposedly been at Treblinka, a camp in which some presume to say, without the least evidence, that, according to certain persons, homicidal "steam chambers" operated (Nuremberg Document PS-3311), and according to others, homicidal "gas chambers": the "testimonies" are vague, contradictory and the trouble has never been taken to verify them, which, as certain revisionists like the Australian Richard Krege have proved, is nonetheless possible and shows that the revisionists are right ("Treblinka Ground Radar Examination Finds No Trace of Mass Graves," in The Journal of Historical Review, Vol. 19, No. 3, May-June 2000, p. 20: http://www.ihr.org/jhr/v19/v19n3p20\_radar.html).

At Nuremberg the victors tried the vanquished; they were thus both judge and party to the case; they had decided beforehand that, if necessary, one would do without real evidence: "The Tribunal shall not be bound by technical rules of evidence [...]. The Tribunal shall not require proof of facts of common knowledge but shall take judicial notice thereof [...]" (Articles 19 and 21 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal). Moreover, the victors' justice violated the usages of normal justice in ignoring the separation of powers (some of those who took part in the drafting of the Charter went on to become judges and prosecutors), instituting collective responsibility (any member of a group declared "criminal" was automatically considered a criminal himself), implementing retroactivity of laws and denying those convicted any possibility of appeal. No representatives of the neutral nations were among the judges and prosecutors. In all seriousness the Soviets, with the concurrence of the American, British and French judges, had the audacity to rebuke the Germans for having carried out deportations and used concentration camps or forced-labor camps! Resorting to an additional specification of Article 19 of the Charter, the Soviet prosecutor got the judges to refuse any serious investigation of the crime in Katyn Forest imputed to the Germans. As for the principal Soviet judge, Major General I.T. Nikitchenko, he had served as prosecutor in 1936 at the previous judicial masquerades called “the Moscow trials,” something that had not kept him from being recruited for Nuremberg.

At bottom, if one keeps in mind the crimes perpetrated against the German people by means of an air war aiming to exterminate civilians, if one recalls the deportations (called displacements) of the German minorities from Central and Eastern Europe, if one adds to that both the serial rapes of German women and girls (as happened, for example, at the age of twelve, to Hannelore Kohl, future wife of the chancellor; see Heribert Schwan, Die Frau an seiner Seite / Leben und Leiden der Hannelore Kohl, Munich, Wilhelm Heyne Verlag, 2011, p. 54-58), if one bears in mind the looting, the official grabbing by the Allies of Germany’s silver, gold, platinum, jewelry, securities, properties, banks, museums, scientific and industrial patents and if, to cap it all, one notes that the Nuremberg trials of German leaders earned the description, by some, of “a farce” or, in the words of Harlan Fiske Stone, Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, a “high-grade lynching party,” one can only find it deplorable that, for 66 years, our schools, universities and media have ceaselessly been telling us that, during the last world war, the victors represented Good and the vanquished, Evil.

Elie Wiesel aged 15 in late 1943 or early 1944.

Elie Wiesel [CC BY 3.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/3.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Elie Wiesel: a Prominent False Witness

Elie Wiesel ideally embodies this lack of understanding of human nature, which everywhere, in fact, is made up of a combination of Good and Evil. This unintelligence leads him, in his efforts to uphold the argument that the people of Israel is the salt of the earth and suffers from Evil more than any other, to lie with assurance, preach hatred for the opponent and untiringly ask us all to go and, in a way, spit on the graves of the defeated. In January 1945 he and his father had had the choice, offered by the Germans, between staying on at Auschwitz until the arrival of the Soviets, or being transferred to a camp inside Germany; the two of them, after careful consideration, chose to leave with their exterminators rather than wait for their liberators. Having gotten to Buchenwald, where his father was to die of dysentery and where, it seems, the Germans were killing 10,000 people a day (Stephan Kaptai, "Author, Teacher, Witness," Time Magazine, March 18, 1985, p. 79: <http://www.time.com/time/magazine/article/0,9171,963362,00.html>), he nonetheless played chess there at times (Jorge Semprun and Elie Wiesel, Se taire est impossible (Keeping Silent Is Impossible), Paris, Arte Editions, 1997, p. 12). In Elie Wiesel, as will have been noted, there is much of the clown who knows that the more he exaggerates, the more the audience will appreciate him. On February 7, 1996, he received the decoration of an honorary doctorate from the University of Picardy - Jules Verne. In its issue of February 9, Le Courrier Picard wrote of the talk that Wiesel gave there and of his replies to questions from those attending: "One query came from many in the audience: 'What do you think of the emergence of revisionist and denialist currents?' [E. Wiesel answered:] 'They are virulent anti-Semites, depraved, organized and well funded. The day I received the Nobel Prize [December 10, 1986 in Oslo], there were hundreds of them in the streets demonstrating against me. Never will I grant them the dignity of a debate. They are morally sick beings. I think I know how to fight injustice, I don't know how to fight ugliness.'" As Serge Thion and Pierre Guillaume, who accompanied me in Oslo in 1986, can attest, along with myself, the number of demonstrators there that day amounted quite precisely to zero. The truth is that with my two revisionist friends I handed out that day copies, in English and Swedish (easily readable for Norwegians), of my flier on "Elie Wiesel: a Prominent False Witness" (<http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/2010/04/prominent-false-witness-elie-wiesel.html>). At the entrance to the hall where the award was about to be presented we had, in an extremely quick action, distributed the text to about forty people; then we in turn entered the hall where, for my part, I struggled to contain my laughter when the Nobel candidate started intoning something of a chant, perhaps a Jewish one, but to an assuredly buffoonish effect. At the exit, the billionaire philosopher Bernard-Henri Levy, flanking Elie Wiesel on the left, cast a dark look at us.

We Need a Return to the Search for Accuracy

But, personally, I have a dream: the day may come when, after a screening of Night and Fog (the classic propaganda film by Alain Resnais), imposed on all children in France, the teacher, instead of fostering the pupils' tendency to unthinking indignation and rash judgment, will ask them to reflect a bit. He or she will teach them to gauge the distance there can be, in this film as in numerous other documentaries-documentaries, between image and commentary. These images we are shown here: what exactly do they signify? What do those abominations, those piles of corpses, that bulldozer mean? As for that concrete room with the "ceiling, furrowed by fingernails": on the basis of what forensic investigation is it called a "gas chamber," that is, a chemical slaughterhouse for human beings? Where have fingernails (of mere keratin) ever been known to "furnow" a concrete surface? Upon seeing so many corpses, whom is one to accuse? The loser? Or, quite simply, war and its inevitable train of horrors? Or again, in this particular case, all things considered, would it not be the ruthless war policy conducted by the winner?

Later on there will still be time to teach the adolescents or the adults that the pupils have become, that, as all too often in the human adventure, "the first casualty in any war is the truth," that "it's the winner who writes history," that "justice gladly lies down in the winner's bed" and that, in the words of the foremost French author of the 20th century, L.-F. Céline, "the frenzy of lying and believing is catching like the itch". Yes, lying and credulity often go together. We need to try to guard against the two evils, or else get cured of their effects. For this it is essential, before pronouncing a judgment on anything, to work, reflect, examine, weigh, and, again to weigh, examine, reflect, and work again. There is no tougher school than the revision of conventional wisdom. This school is none other than that of revisionism. The revisionists do not deny; they are neither deniers nor denialists; they strive to be constructive, positive and at times some of them might be classed as positivists. Their research method is as old as the world; it is like the thirst for knowledge or the love of science and the exact. Let us be modest and avoid claiming that we seek the truth, or that we have found it. "The truth," especially when that word is adorned with a capital letter, risks being vague or inaccessible. What should be sought is accuracy, that is to say, at each instant a small verifiable truth; it is the sum of those little verifiable truths which, at the end, will make it possible to enunciate a conclusion that, in turn, has some chance of being exact.

The Black Boxes of the "Holocaust" Have to Be Rooted out and Their Contents Examined

This type of revisionist research or activity is not without hazard. To embark upon, and, especially, to keep on with revisionist action takes guts. Elie Wiesel and his friends stand guard around the black boxes of the "Holocaust": there is no question of letting us approach and see what they contain. Yet, personally, I had the luck one day of discovering and opening for an instant the black box of Auschwitz and Birkenau at the Auschwitz State Museum. This happened in two stages. In 1975, during my first examination of the scenes of the "crime," I had detected some downright anomalies in what is shown to us as a crematorium in its original state (Krema I at Auschwitz proper, that is, Auschwitz I main camp) or crematoria in ruins (Kremas II and III as well as IV and V at Birkenau, or "Auschwitz II"). I then got a senior official of the museum to acknowledge that Krema I had been "reconstructed," whereas the public thought they were seeing a genuine crematorium kept in its original state. I had him note the absence of any soot at the mouth of a crematory oven, which he assured me was "original"; then he told me that the said oven was actually a "reconstruction," whereupon I made him admit that the "reconstruction" necessarily implied the knowledge and, therefore, the existence of building plans for the crematoria. I asked him where the plans were. Not without embarrassment he confessed that they were in the camp archives. Being obliged to return to France, I put off my visit to the archives till the following year. I shall pass over the details of the difficulties encountered then and come straight to the conclusion: on March 19, 1976 I discovered in the archives of the State Museum the building plans of the Auschwitz and Birkenau crematoria, supposed to have contained the homicidal "gas chambers." Those plans had been kept hidden from us since 1945 (see my piece "A Look back at My Discovery, on March 19 1976, of the Building Plans for the Auschwitz and Birkenau Crematoria": <http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/2010/09/look-back-at-my-discovery-on-march-19.html>).

And for good reason, as they now revealed a special secret. In the small Krematorium I, the room said to have been a homicidal "gas chamber" had in reality been a "Leichenhalle," that is, an innocuous depository or mortuary room in which to put corpses awaiting cremation. The large Krematoriums II and III of Birkenau had possessed only "Leichenkeller," that is depositories built partly underground to ensure a relatively cool interior. Krematoriums IV and V, also located at Birkenau, contained only harmless rooms some of which were equipped with stoves and which could never have served as "gas chambers." At the end of prolonged studies, one after another, on Zyklon B (a product based on hydrogen cyanide gas, invented in 1922 by an assistant of the German Jewish chemist Fritz Haber and patented on December 27, 1926), the disinfecting or delousing gas chambers and, especially, the American execution gas chambers using cyanide gas, I concluded that the “testimonies” or “confessions” concerning the systematic execution of Jews in “gas chambers” ran into radical physical and chemical impossibilities.

Even today I am still amazed at the fact that the United States, swamped in Holocaust literature but possessing so many men of science, both in chemistry and engineering, should have had no one to proceed with a comparison between the somewhat vague Nazi “gas chambers” and the easily verifiable reality (at least up until a recent time) of the American gas chambers. It is enough to see one of these to realize instantly that the Nazi “gas chambers” are purely a figment of the imagination. A real gas chamber for the execution of a single person is necessarily a terribly complicated thing, for the gasser must avoid gassing himself 1) either in the execution phase, 2) or during ventilation, 3) or when entering the chamber and handling and removing a highly cyanided body which, being so, remains highly dangerous. I repeat that it would suffice, even for the uninitiated, to see up close an American prison’s gas chamber and to have its operation explained to understand that not only did the Nazi “gas chambers” not exist but also that they could not even have existed. For my part, in 1979, I had seen and studied the gas chamber in Baltimore, Maryland. Also in 1979, in Los Angeles, at the first international conference of the Institute for Historical Review, I made public my discovery of the black box of Auschwitz and Birkenau. “This is dynamite!”, one lady in the audience judged.

The victories of revisionism

Three years earlier, in 1976, an American academic, Arthur Robert Butz, had published on the subject of the alleged extermination of the Jews a masterful book entitled The Hoax of the Twentieth Century. In 1985 and again in 1988 in Toronto, at the trials of Ernst Zündel, the revisionists annihilated first Raul Hilberg, the Number One historian for the exterminationist case, then Rudolf Vrba, the Number One witness of the alleged criminal gassings at Auschwitz, and finally, thanks in particular to the examinations made by Fred Leuchter, the whole myth of the gassings was at the point of death. Afterwards this central element, the “heart” of the charges against the Germans of the Third Reich, would be seen slowly disintegrating. For example, in 1988, Arno Mayer, professor of history at Princeton, wrote: “Sources for the study of the gas chambers are at once rare and unreliable” (Why Did the Heavens Not Darken? The “Final Solution” in History, New York, Pantheon Books, p. 362). Other researchers, who before had trumpeted their certainty of the existence of those “gas chambers”, have ended up admitting that there is no proof thereof. The Frenchman Jean-Claude Pressac, protégé of Beate and Serge Klarsfeld – themselves “hunters of former Nazis” – went so far as to acknowledge that the whole dossier of the history of the wartime deportation was “rotten” with too many lies and that this dossier, notwithstanding the real sufferings of so many deportees, was henceforth good only for the “rubbish bins of history”; Pressac wrote that in 1995 but his capitulation was revealed only in 2000. To those wishing to learn more about the matter I would recommend my study on “The Victories of Revisionism” of December 11, 2006 (<http://codoh.com/library/document/99/>).

The coup de grâce Given, on December 27, 2009, to the Myth of the Nazi “ Gas Chambers”

Three years afterwards, on December 27, 2009, the myth of Auschwitz received the coup de grâce. The blow was administered by a Jewish academic, Robert Jan van Pelt, whom one may consider the last person to have sought to prove scientifically that Auschwitz, the capital of the “Holocaust,” had been an “extermination camp” (an American term coined in November 1944), that is, a camp equipped with extermination “gas chambers.” The revisionists had no opponent more determined and more resolved to fight them on the historical and scientific level than this professor teaching the history of architecture at the University of Waterloo (Ontario, Canada). He defended the usual argument holding that, to gas several thousand Jews at a time, an SS man, having gotten up on the roof of certain “gas chambers,” poured Zyklon B pellets through four holes made in the concrete ceiling of the said “gas chambers.” Ever under the pressure of revisionist discoveries, he had been bound to concur that the holes in the small Krematorium I had been created by... the Soviets and the Polish communists. But R. J. van Pelt and his friends were sure of finding such holes in the concrete roofs, in ruins, of Krematoriums II and III. However, after years of research, they proved unable to supply a single photograph of those holes or of the perforated shafts (?) that allegedly had allowed the diffusion of hydrogen cyanide gas underneath, thus failing to meet my challenge summed up in the formula: “No holes, no Holocaust.” Hence the capitulation of R. J. van Pelt. On December 27, 2009, quoted in an article in the Toronto Star, he revealed that, in his opinion, the conservation of Auschwitz-Birkenau made little sense: it was better to let nature take it back. And he added, speaking of what we are supposed to know about the camp (that is, that there were “gas chambers,” etc. there), these precise words: “Ninety-nine per cent of what we know we do not actually have the physical evidence to prove”, going on to say of the “Holocaust” in general that, in future: “We will know about it from literature and eyewitness testimony [...]. To demand that we have more material evidence is actually us somehow giving in to the Holocaust deniers by providing some sort of special evidence” (“A case for letting nature take back Auschwitz”, Toronto Star, December 27, 2009).

Those lines did not fail to remind me of the extraordinary admission, of the kind to make revisionists celebrate, to which English judge Charles Gray was reduced when, on April 11, 2000, he handed down his decision in the libel case brought in London by David Irving against Penguin Books and Deborah Lipstadt. Miss Lipstadt had gotten van Pelt to attend and support her defense, while Irving, whose acquaintance with revisionist argumentation was mediocre, for fear of being associated with Germar Rudolf and myself did not want our assistance: he had even gone so far as to base his lawsuit on the fact that he had been presented to the world as a “Holocaust denier.” The admission by the judge was devastating for van Pelt, who had devoted part of his life to trying to find evidence of the homicidal “gas chambers” existence. Here it is: “I have to confess that, in common I suspect with most other people, I had supposed that the evidence of mass extermination of Jews in the gas chambers at Auschwitz was compelling. I have, however, set aside this preconception when assessing the evidence adduced by the parties in these proceedings” (High Court of Justice, Queen’s Bench Division 1996-I-1113, Judgment, § 13.71; <http://www.fpp.co.uk/docs/trial/judgment/extract1.html>).

Immediately after the paragraph bearing his stunning “admission” the judge gives us, in § 13.72, 13.73 and 13.74, the specific reasons why he, like a revisionist, has revised and corrected his “preconception.” What we see here, essentially, is a British judge taking up, in April 2000 in London, the finding pronounced seventeen years before, on April 26, 1983, in Paris, by the First Chamber of the Court of Appeal (Section A, presided over by François Grégoire): for it, Robert Faurisson, accused by Jewish organizations essentially of having, in his work, exhibited 1) levity, 2) negligence, 3) willful ignorance and 4) mendacity, to arrive at the conclusion that the Nazi “gas chambers” had never existed, had in fact done a job where there could not be found a trace either of 1) levity, 2) negligence, 3) willful ignorance or 4) mendacity. The judges then stated: “The worth of the findings defended by Mr. Faurisson [on the problem of the gas chambers] is therefore [my emphasis] a matter solely for the appraisal of experts, historians and the public.” In plain language this meant that, in view of the serious nature of Faurisson’s writings on the subject, everyone should have the right to say: “The alleged Hitlerite gas chambers never existed.”

But, of course, on that day in Paris back in 1983 I was nonetheless held liable for “personal injury” because, it seems, I had been malevolent; in particular, I found myself reproached for having “never seen fit to find a word of respect for the victims” (which was inaccurate), and my “‘revisionism’ [might] appear like an attempt at overall rehabilitation of the Nazi war criminals” (which was a thought or an afterthought that I had never had). On his end, David Irving lost his case in London on April 14, 2000 because, it seems, he had been as malevolent as a racist can be.

The Einsatzgruppen: No Order to Kill the Jews

What with the case for the existence of the Nazi “gas chambers” becoming ever more difficult to uphold, the official historians and the media have set about focusing on the Einsatzgruppen. Not shrinking from any manner of cheating, they have in some instances begun dressing up those “Intervention Groups” with the label, invented by themselves, “Mobile killing squads.”

The Einsatzgruppen carrying out their activities in the USSR had the job of protecting the advancing army’s rear, particularly due to the presence of snipers and partisans who succeeded in killing numerous German soldiers and perpetrating sabotage. Never did the Einsatzgruppen receive an order to execute Jews as such. Jews could be shot for acts of either terrorism or sabotage or, as hostages in retaliation either for such acts or for some similar reason. The assertions to the contrary and the mental constructions made around a supposed “Kommissar Befehl” or the confession of SS General Otto Ohlendorf at Nuremberg are on the order of myth. In general, “despite the most erudite research” (François Furet, speaking at the end of a conference at the Sorbonne on July 2, 1982), never has such an order been found. Even the most indulgent or subservient historians have had to admit this; see particularly, for example, regarding the Einsatzgruppen, Helmut Krausnick and Hans-Heinrich Wilhelm in Die Truppe des Weltanschauungskrieges / Die Einsatzgruppen des Sicherheitspolizei und des SD, Stuttgart, Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt, 1981, p. 634; also, Yaacov Lozowick in “Rollbahn: The Early Activities of Einsatzgruppe C,” Holocaust and Genocide Studies, Oxford, 1987, Vol. 2, p. 221-241.

For Want of Evidence, Raul Hilberg Explains It All by the Paranormal

As for the deliberate character of the alleged extermination of the Jews of a whole continent, Raul Hilberg was not afraid of stating, in 1961 in the first edition of his work of reference, that there had been two orders from Hitler to kill the Jews (The Destruction of the European Jews, Chicago, Quadrangle Books, p. 177). Following the emergence of historical revisionism on the international scene he abandoned that statement, which had not been accompanied by any document or evidence, and came up with another, asserting that, if no document or evidence could be found, it was because the destruction of European Jewry had been done spontaneously, without orders, without a plan, without anything, thanks to the initiative and action of a large bureaucracy working to that purpose by means of thought transmission (The Destruction of the European Jews, Revised and Definitive Edition, New York and London, Holmes & Meier, 3 volumes, 1985, pp. 53, 55, 62)! According to the new Hilberg, that strange bureaucracy, thought to be so obedient and punctilious, had at some point suddenly taken the initiative to throw overboard all bureaucratic restraint and all obedience to whatever orders came from above, and did so to set about killing the Jews ; from then on it had worked only “by an incredible meeting of minds, a consensus-mind reading”, and without any “basic plan,” with “written directives not published,” “broad authorizations to subordinates, not published,” “oral directives and authorizations,” “basic understandings of officials resulting in decisions not requiring orders or explanations.” Hilberg explains that “no one agency was charged with the whole operation”; “no single organization directed or coordinated the entire process”; “no special agency was created and no special budget was devised to destroy the Jews of Europe”; “In the final analysis, the destruction of the Jews was not so much a product of laws and commands, as it was a matter of spirit, of shared comprehension, of consonance and synchronization” (“Raul Hilberg explique maintenant le génocide par télépathie” [Raul Hilberg now explains the genocide by telepathy], <http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/1988/09/raul-hilberg-explique-maintenant-le.html>).

One can only stand dumbfounded when faced with these phantasmagoria invented by the Number One “Holocaust” historian, with these absurd explanations by the working of the Holy Spirit within the German bureaucracy, this “meeting of minds” described by Hilberg in person as “incredible”; before this recourse to the power of “consensus-mind reading,” this “matter of spirit,” this “shared comprehension,” this “consonance” and “synchronization.” Never, I think, in world historiography has an argument been put forth and defended by the use of notions that belong to such an extent to the realm of magic. And black magic at that, when one thinks of the harmful or criminal effects that the general belief in “the destruction of the European Jews” has since 1945 been able to have on billions of people around the world.

Facts Refute the Reality of a Destruction of European Jewry

Curiously, the authors who presume to uphold the case for the existence of a Third Reich policy to exterminate the Jews fail to explain a considerable number of facts which, had there been such a policy, would be incomprehensible. As A. R. Butz wrote, “The simplest valid reason for being skeptical about the extermination claim is also the simplest conceivable reason: at the end of the war they were still there” (The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, p. 10). In 1945, at war’s end, the number of Jewish “survivors” or “miraculous” Jewish survivors was staggering. So many “miraculous survivors” could not be a miracle but rather the manifestation of a natural fact. Each survivor who dares to testify that people of his or her category were systematically slaughtered is making, by the sheer fact of still being alive, a self-refutation argument: he or she is “living proof” that the statement is absurd. Still in 1997, fifty-two years after the war, the official number of Jewish survivors was assessed, by some at 834,000 and by others at 960,000 (“Holocaust Survivors” by Adina Mishkoff, Administrative Assistant, Amcha, Jerusalem, August 13, 1997; these figures were provided by the office of the Israeli Prime Minister).

According to an estimate by the Swedish statistician Carl Nordling, to whom I submitted the Israeli government assessments, if those figures are rounded to an average of 900,000 then it will be reasonable to conclude that in 1945 the number of survivors slightly exceeded three million. Even today, the “survivors” organizations abound under the most varied names; they bring together former Jewish résistants, Jewish forced laborers, Jews who were fugitives or living undercover during the war as well as former “children of Auschwitz”; this last group includes Jewish children born in that camp or interned there from infancy with their parents. Auschwitz, like many other camps, was equipped with hospital buildings or infirmaries where Jews, like Elie Wiesel himself, had access to care.

In the Middle of the Reich, at the Height of the War, Homes and Hospitals for Jews

In German cities, up to the end of the war, there were hospitals or homes reserved for Jews. We may take the example of Vienna: according to a German document published in English translation by R. Hilberg himself, on October 17, 1944, that is, several months before the end of the war, the Council of Elders of the Jews in Vienna was responsible for Jewish hospitals, a children's home and day school, a community kitchen, a bathhouse, a poor people's home (for the elderly), a clothes and furniture depot, a relief (or welfare) division, a library, cemetery administration and grounds, a technical column with its workshop. The whole was spread out over eleven different points in the city. On October 17, 1944 an Allied bombing raid completely destroyed the children's hospital. In the night that followed, a new makeshift hospital had to be installed ("as an emergency measure a new hospital had to be set up overnight") and, in agreement with "the Secret State Police (Gestapo) Main Directorate for Vienna and the City Construction Office," "the Council handed the supervision of building and carpentry to a competent architect against payment of a lump sum." The community kitchen, reserved primarily for Jewish workers (43,892 meals served in 1944), was hit during the raid of November 5, 1944 but the damage was very quickly repaired (Yad Vashem document O 30 / 5, Excerpts from the Annual Report of the Director of the Council of Elders of the Jews in Vienna, signed Josef Israel Lowenherz, dated January 22, 1945, Documents of Destruction / Germany and Jewry 1933-1945, Edited with Commentary by Raul Hilberg, Chicago, Quadrangle Books, 1971, p. 125-130, p. 127-128).

Another example, one that speaks volumes, is that of Berlin and, especially, of its "Hospital of the Jewish community" (Krankenhaus der Jüdischen Gemeinde) at No. 2 Iranischestrasse. A book to read on this subject is Daniel B. Silver's Refuge in Hell / How Berlin's Jewish Hospital Outlasted the Nazis, Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 2003, p. 352. The author, a Jewish lawyer, and his Jewish witnesses rack their brains trying to solve the problem: "With Hitler having decided to exterminate the Jews, how is it that so many Jews, all through the war, should have received regular medical care in this hospital run by Dr. Walter Lustig?" In the end, the answer consists in just two short sentences: "There is no explaining it. It was all a miracle." The miracle itself was presumably composed of two main factors: "sheer blind luck and bureaucratic infighting among Nazi organizations" (as the back cover presentation puts it). If there was a consuming fear in the hearts of all Berlin's Jews – including the patients, surgeons and physicians, nurses and other staff of their hospital – it was that of the terrifying, indiscriminate bombing by the Anglo-American air squadrons.

Finally, with regard to facts opposing the assertion, made without evidence, that Third Reich Germany was exterminating the Jews, a French study is worth reading, rich in astonishing revelations; entitled "Vie quotidienne des juifs allemands pendant la guerre (Trois documents)" (Daily Life of German Jews during the War – Three Documents), it appeared in the Revue d'histoire révisionniste n° 6 (May 1992), p. 131-140. The piece bore the byline of "Célestin Loos" but actually had two authors: the Belgian Pierre Moreau, recently deceased, and myself. The case of the Berlin Jewish hospital (director: Dr Walter Lustig) is mentioned in passing (p. 138, note 3).

Jewish Collaboration with the German Occupiers

In a 1992 study on the "Brown Jews," reproduced in my Ecrits révisionnistes (1974-1998) (pages 1421 to 1433: <http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/1992/05/propos->

de-larret-touvier-laffaire-des.html), I brought up the existence and role of the “Jewish Councils in Europe” (pp. 1429-1430) in the following terms:

From late 1939 the Germans imposed the creation of “Jewish Councils” for the administration of Jewish communities in Poland in cities, provinces or ghettos. Some Councils tried hard to thwart German policy, but most brought an important contribution to the German war effort. They provided labour and manufactured goods. This policy of resolved collaboration was followed by Mordechai Chaim Rumkowski, the famous “King of Lodz”, who went so far as to issue his own currency, Jacob Gens of Vilnius, Moshe Merin of Sosnowiec in Silesia and Efraim Barasz of Bialystok. These Councils condemned armed struggle against the Germans, some going so far as to combat the resistance fighters. Germany had its “Representation of German Jews of the Reich,” France had its “General Union of Jews of France” [UGIF], Belgium an “Association of Jews in Belgium”. The Netherlands, Slovakia, Hungary, Romania and, in Greece, Salonika had their Jewish Councils. Those of the Netherlands, Slovakia and Hungary were particularly cooperative. Through their collaboration with the Germans many Jews amply secured their subsistence: certain of them, such as Joinovici and Skolnikoff, built colossal fortunes.

During the war, contacts between certain Zionist circles and the Germans continued. In 1941 the “Stern Gang” and “Lehi” even offered a military alliance with Germany against Britain. An emissary of the Jewish body, Naftali Lubenchik, met the diplomat Otto Werner von Hentig in Beirut for talks on the subject.

Germany Was Ready to Hand Jews over to the Americans and the British

After considering several possible territorial solutions of the Jewish question, solutions which, like the “Madagaskar Projekt,” proved unworkable, Germany was ready to hand over the Jews of Europe to the Americans and British but on the condition that they keep those Jews within their own territories until the end of the war and not allow them to emigrate to Palestine, in order to spare “the noble and valiant Arab people.”

Indeed, for example in 1944, the German Foreign Ministry (headed by Joachim von Ribbentrop) informed the British government that Germany was ready to hand over 5,000 “non-Aryan” persons – of whom 85% would be children and the other 15% adults accompanying them – from Poland, Lithuania and Latvia, but on condition of receiving the guarantee that they would be hosted till the end of the war in the British Empire (for example in Canada), barring Palestine and the rest of the Middle East. “The Reich Government cannot lend itself to taking part in a manoeuvre that would tend to let the Jews chase the noble and valiant Arab people from their homeland, Palestine” (Nuremberg document NG-1794, Eberhardt von Thadden, on 29 April and 5 May 1944; Wagner, July 29, 1944. Henri Monneray, former deputy prosecutor at the International Military Tribunal, La persécution des juifs dans les pays de l’Est présentée à Nuremberg, Paris, Editions du Centre de documentation juive contemporaine, 1949, p. 168-169).

On January 15, 1945 Heinrich Himmler met the former Swiss President Jean Marie Musy in the Black Forest town of Wildbad; the latter was there at the behest of the Americans to discuss once again “the improvement of the Jews’ lot.” Previous talks had already had their effect on one point: previously subject to being assigned, like all others, to the hardest labor, the Jews were now granted a privilege, that of not being assigned to “hard labor” but only to “normal work.” In a note on this meeting Himmler wrote:

I again put forth my position to him. We assign the Jews to labor and that, of course, includes hard work such as the building of roads and canals, mining, and there they have a high mortality rate. Since the start of discussions on improving the Jews’ lot, they have been employed in normal work, but it goes without saying that they must, like all Germans, work in armaments production. Our view on the Jewish question is as follows: the position taken by America and England regarding the Jews does not interest us in any way. What is clear is that we do not want to have them in Germany and in the German living space, given the decades of experience since the [First] World War, and we shall not join in any discussion on the matter. If America wants to take them, we are glad of it. But it must be ruled out, and here a guarantee will have to be given to us, that the Jews whom we allow to leave [continental Europe] via Switzerland can ever be sent back to Palestine. We know that the Arabs, just as much as we Germans, reject the Jews and we do not want to partake in such an indecency as the sending of more Jews to that poor nation tormented by the Jews (zu einer solchen Unanständigkeit, diesem armen, von der Juden gequälten Volke neue Juden hinzuschicken) (document of the US Document Center, Berlin. Photograph in Werner Maser, Nürnberg, Tribunal der Sieger, Munich-Zürich, Droemer Knauer, 1979, p. 262-263).

Excesses Committed against Jews Could be Punished by Death

Many other precise material details exclude the possibility of the German authorities’ having pursued a policy to exterminate the Jews, but I think the very strongest evidence of the non-existence of such a policy lies in the fact that, during the war, the murder of a sole Jewish man or woman by a German ran the latter the risk of a sentence up to the death penalty, and execution. For lack of space here, I refer the reader to the text of a talk on this subject that I gave in 2002 entitled “Punishment of Germans, by Third Reich Authorities, for Mistreatment of Jews (1939-1945)” (<http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/2002/06/punishment-of-germans-by-third-reich.html>).

The Imposture of the Six Million. Wilhelm Höttl and the Nuremberg Tribunal Unmasked

In the next few paragraphs I intend to show first how the myth of the Six Million Jews supposedly killed or otherwise deceased during the Second World War was born, then through what lies it came to be endorsed – thanks to its particular lying inventor – by the International Military Tribunal (IMT) of Nuremberg and, finally how, in 1987, I personally managed, in the presence of a witness, to confound former SS officer Wilhelm Höttl for having given false testimony by stating in writing and under oath that he had gotten that figure from the mouth of Adolf Eichmann himself.

It was in 2003 that the American Don Heddesheimer, a lawyer by profession, revealed to us that the myth of the Six Million had arisen from the most sordid source imaginable: from 1900 (and perhaps even earlier) certain Jews in New York had made up and launched a lucrative advertising slogan that allowed them to collect millions of dollars through fundraising campaigns. The slogan they devised was of two short sentences: “At this time millions of our brothers are dying in Europe. Give us money to come to their aid.” In general, those European Jews were supposed to number “five million” or “more than five million” or, especially, “six million.” Depending on the circumstances and periods, the Jews’ killers were presented as being the Russians, the Ukrainians, the Tsars, the Poles, ... (The First Holocaust / Jewish Fund-Raising Campaigns with Holocaust Claims during and after World War One, Preface by Germar Rudolf, Theses & Dissertations Press, Chicago, October 2003, p. 144). The newspaper contributing most to the dissemination of slogans peculiar to such campaigns was the New York Times. One of the most active personalities involved was Rabbi Stephen Wise (1874-1949), a friend, successively, of Presidents Wilson and, especially, F. D. Roosevelt; founder of the World Jewish Congress, he was a militant Zionist.

With the start of the Second World War the designated killers became Hitler or the Germans, while the European Jews were decreed “dead” or “killed” and no longer merely “dying.” In 1945-1946 75% of the American delegation at the Nuremberg Trial happened, it seems, to be Jewish; the estimate is that of U.S. Executive Trial Counsel Thomas J. Dodd (from the September 20, 1945 letter to his wife, published in a book co-authored by his son, Christopher J. Dodd, and Larry Bloom, Letters [of Thomas J. Dodd] from Nuremberg, Crown Publishers [Random House], p. 136). Presumably at least some of the Jews there, having grown up with the refrain of “millions of European Jews being dead or bound to die” in their ears, ended up believing in good faith what they heard or read on the subject. For them, the main thing was to have that belief endorsed by the Nuremberg judges.

To attain their objective they would use a most dubious character, a former SS major and lieutenant-colonel who, in the last months of the war, in Italy, sensing that he risked ejection from the SS for both embezzlement and contact with the enemy, had gotten in quite close touch with the Allied authorities. At war’s end, having become one of their exemplarily docile prisoners, he was transferred to Nuremberg, where he fully cooperated with the prosecution. It was to him, in particular, that the prosecutors owed the impressive organization chart of the German Security Police and the Security Service (Document 2346-PS) bearing his signature. On November 26, 1945 he agreed to sign an affidavit (Document PS-2738) in which he claimed that at the end of August 1944, at his apartment in Budapest, he received a visit from his colleague Lieutenant Colonel Adolf Eichmann, who advised him that he had recently submitted a report to Himmler, who had wanted to know the exact number of Jews killed thus far. According to the report, Eichmann put it exactly this way: “Approximately 4,000,000 Jews had been killed (getötet) in the various extermination camps (Vernichtungslagern), while an additional 2,000,000 met their death in other ways, the major part of whom were shot by operational squads of the Security Police during the campaign against Russia.” And he added that Himmler had not appreciated this report because, for him, the number of Jews killed had to be more than six million.

The affidavit was read out in court on December 14, 1945 by the American assistant trial counsel William Walsh, who committed the dishonesty of translating the suspect word Vernichtungslagern by the classic phrase “concentration camps.” A German lawyer spoke up, requesting the appearance of Höttl. He would never obtain it. And the height of it all was reached when, in the final ruling, the Tribunal presumed to conclude, on September 30, 1946: “Adolf Eichmann, who had been put in charge of this program by Hitler, has estimated that the policy pursued resulted in the killing of six million Jews, of which four million were killed in the extermination institutions” (IMT, I, p. 252-253). The truth is that never had Hitler put Eichmann or anyone else in charge of such a program, and that the estimate was not that of Eichmann but, instead, had been attributed to him by W. Höttl. After the war Höttl continued to work with the Allies in the fear of being handed over to a Hungary governed by communists who would not have failed to execute him.

Meanwhile his colleague Eichmann lived in Argentina until the day in 1960 when he was kidnapped by the Mossad and taken by force to Israel to be found guilty at the end of a judicial farce even worse than that of Nuremberg. In the investigatory phase of his case, examining magistrate Avner Less, a captain in the Israeli Army, asked Eichmann whether he had any comments on the statements made about him by Höttl, and the response was: “Yes indeed! Höttl’s allegations are a hotchpotch of muddles that the man has stuffed his head with” (Jawohl! Die Angaben von Höttl, das ist ein von Sammelsurium von Durcheinander, das der Mann seinen Kopf bekommen hat; see Jochen von Lang, Das Eichmann-Protokoll, Berlin, Severin und Siedler, 1982, p. 107). Eichmann then pointed out that the advent, after the war, of millions of survivors belied the possibility that there had existed any programme of physical extermination of the Jews. He stated, for example, on the next page: “Captain, after the war the Allies nonetheless counted – I think – 2.4 million Jews. And hundreds and hundreds of thousands of Jews came out of the concentration camps” (Herr Hauptmann, da sind immerhin – glaube ich – wie gesagt, es sind 2.4 Millionen von den nach Alliierten Kriegsschluss gezählt worden. Und Hunderttausende von Juden kamen aus den Konzentrationslagern). When, for his part, he employed the word “Vernichtung” regarding the Jews, he had in mind the annihilation of the Jews’ power (in the framework of the search for a possible “final territorial solution to the Jewish question”) and not the sense that the translators like to give that word, that is, “physical extermination” (p. 110).

In 1987 W. Höttl, beset by his compatriots’ criticism or requests for clarification about the words he had ascribed to his colleague Eichmann, began to retreat. He suddenly claimed that it was under the influence of alcohol that the latter had spoken; he had, apparently, let Eichmann drink profusely of his favorite apricot-based Hungarian spirit, barack (Welt am Sonntag, March 8, 1987, p. 2). I wrote to him at his home in Altaussee in Austria, where he was a school principal. I got him to promise to see me on two consecutive days in the company of an Austrian called R. M. On February 3, 1989 R. M. and I were received in Höttl’s office. I had not hidden anything about my revisionist beliefs from him. I asked him some questions about his August 1944 interview with Eichmann. I let him talk at length, but suddenly I told him that, for at least two reasons, I did not believe the contents of his affidavit: firstly, six million Jews killed by July or August 1944, when there were still about nine months of war to come, would imply for the whole duration of the war an even higher figure than the already huge and unproved one of six million (the equivalent of the population of a country like Switzerland); then, I noted in the same affidavit a word that seemed an anachronism – and it is well known that in history anachronism is one of the signs of falsehood. The word in question was Vernichtungslagern, that is, “extermination camps.” It is precisely the German translation of an American neologism, “extermination camps,” having first appeared in Washington in November 1944 in the famous “War Refugee Report” or “Auschwitz Protocol[s]”, which the world owes to the mythomaniac “Holocaust” witness Rudolf Vrba (<http://www.holocaustresearchproject.org/othercamps/auschproto.html>). It is most unlikely that Eichmann should have used such an expression in August 1944 in Budapest.

Visibly struck by the argument, our interlocutor, losing all self-assurance, asked us in a plaintive tone: “Why do you lend so much importance to that statement of Eichmann’s?” And he explained that the man was under the influence of alcohol and that he suffered relative to himself, Wilhelm Höttl, from an inferiority complex, which led him to inflate the facts and figures. In other words, Höttl suddenly called into question the central point of his own affidavit. He even withdrew all value from it. However, it was that ringing declaration which, subsequently, would allow the Tribunal to launch the announcement to the world of Germany’s extermination of six million Jews. Höttl had lied; then, as seen above, to that lie the judges at Nuremberg added their own lie in coldly attributing the statement to Eichmann himself.

On the morning after that interview R. M. and I were preparing to leave our hotel and go, as agreed, to the second meeting with Höttl when the telephone rang: it was Mrs. Höttl informing us that her husband was unwell and could not see us.

Today, R. M. is still alive and can attest to what I say here and which, in any case, is recorded in our correspondence. I must say that, thereafter, I maintained correspondence with Höttl. I suggested that he leave to posterity a piece of writing in which he might set the record straight. His response and the ensuing letters show a man decided on rejecting my suggestion but nonetheless troubled. In 1997 he published Einsatz für das Reich (In the Service of the Reich) (Koblenz, Verlag S. Buble). Curiously, in the section on “Eichmann and the Six Million” he showed himself discreet and evasive on the heart of the matter and even wrote: “The figure of 6 million seems, anyhow, to be magical” (Diese Zahl von 6 Millionen scheint irgendwie magisch zu sein) (p. 83). Some of his remarks were openly revisionist (pp. 82-85 and 420-423) but he took the precaution of ending with a profession of Holocaustic faith which I would describe as merely verbal. He died two years later at the age of 84. History will record his treachery. But Höttl may be granted consideration of mitigating circumstances: in the first place, on a personal level, had he refused to cooperate with the Americans he would have been consigned to the Hungarians, who would have hanged him; and he would have had to be a hero to defy the victors’ justice, the Jewish thought police and the religion of the “Holocaust,” which, in the 1980s, wrapped in an aura of sacred terror, was, little by little, to invade the entire Western world.

The Present State of Things

As of today, on the strictly historical and scientific plane, the assessment is disastrous for the proponents of the official truth. There remains not one stone upon another of the edifice built by the 1945-1946 Nuremberg Tribunal, the Jerusalem Tribunal of 1961, and by Léon Poliakov, Gerald Reitlinger, Raul Hilberg and a crowd mainly of Jewish authors. To confine ourselves to the three essential elements of the charge brought against Adolf Hitler and the Third Reich, no one, in the sixty-five years and more since the war, has been able to find a single order to kill the Jews, or a single proof that there existed a single homicidal gas chamber or gas van, or a single proof that six million European Jews were murdered or had simply died, of whatever cause, during the Second World War. When the American revisionist Bradley Smith, head of the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust (CODOH), asks his country’s academics to provide him, with supporting evidence, the name of one person who died in a gas chamber at Auschwitz, he is answered with insults or silence. Why?

For his part, E. Wiesel wrote in 1994: “Let the gas chambers remain closed to prying eyes, and to imagination” (All Rivers Run to the Sea / Memoirs, New York, Knopf, 1995, p. 74; original French version: Tous les fleuves vont à la mer / Mémoires, Paris, Seuil, 1994, p. 97); here he makes a confession: that of feeling a terrible embarrassment, which he shares with all his ilk, historians included. When he adds: “We will never know all that happened behind those doors of steel” he is indulging his “imagination,” for the only alleged “gas chamber” that one may visit at Auschwitz has two very ordinary wooden doors, one of which is partially glazed (and opens inwards, where dead bodies had supposedly piled up!); as for the third opening, it gives free access to the room containing furnaces, a coke repository and funerary urns: the ovens, at times heating up to 900° C, would have stood in direct proximity to the “gas chamber” full of a substance – the disinfectant Zyklon B – emitting hydrogen cyanide gas, known for its explosive nature! In the second volume of his memoirs Wiesel returns to this need to say nothing, tell nothing, imagine nothing about the alleged “gassings”: “I believe I know everything, can guess everything, about the victims’ final hours. I shall say nothing. To imagine would be indiscreet. To tell would be indecent,” and he adds that, on the spot, at Auschwitz-Birkenau, “As we get closer to the place where the killers built their gas chambers and their crematories [in reality, ruins of simple crematoria – RF], we clench our teeth and suppress the desire to scream.”

Yet with his fellow Jews he will first murmur, then “the murmur becomes a scream, the cry of a community gone mad, mad with grief and lucidity” (... And the Sea Is Never Full / Memoirs 1969-, New York, Knopf, 1999, p. 193; original French version: ... et la mer n’est pas remplie / Mémoires 2, Paris, Seuil, 1996, p. 291).<sup>[1]</sup> Further on he repeats: “I forbid myself to imagine what happened inside the gas chambers; my gaze follows the living people who enter them to die of suffocation only as far as the entrance” (p. 356). Here we are, immersed in pathos. In La Nuit there is no mention of the “gas chambers”; E. Wiesel tells us that at Auschwitz as at Buchenwald it was outdoors, in infernal flames, that the Germans exterminated the Jews. In the German translation of his book, the “gas chambers” burst onto the scene: in fifteen instances, the translator has put gas where the author had not (see “Un grand faux témoin (suite): Elie Wiesel”, either in my Ecrits révisionnistes (1974-1998), p. 1526-1529 or on my blog at <http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.com/1993/06/un-grand-faux-temoin-elie-wiesel-suite.html>).

It was the Catholic intellectual François Mauriac who, in his preface, spoke of “the gas chamber” and the “oven fuelled with living creatures” and, to start, evoked “those carriages stuffed with little boys” (p. 10; one will note the word “stuffed” – bourrés – and the absence of any little girls). “Anus Dei”, as Mauriac was dubbed with a quip attributed to Paul Léautaud, had been seduced by the young Wiesel and could refuse him nothing. The English translation of the book is not without interest (Night, New York, Bantam Books, paperback edition of 1982: “This edition contains the complete text of the original hardcover edition [1960]. NOT ONE WORD HAS BEEN OMITTED”, XIV, 111 p.). Mauriac’s preface is the object of some significant changes or attenuations: three times “Israélien” or “israélien” is translated as “Jew”; “l’œil bleu” of the young Elie Wiesel turns into “dark eyes,” “millions de morts” fades to “thousands of dead” and, above all, “ces wagons bourrés de petits garçons” become “those trainloads of little children.” At the beginning of Chapter II of La Nuit in the original French edition (1958) there were carriages filled with eighty people, in which “freed from all social censure, the youths openly gave themselves over to their instincts and, under cover of darkness, copulated in our midst, paying no mind to anyone, alone in the world. The others pretended not to see anything.” In more recent editions, for example that of 2007, “s’accouplaient” has become “s’attouchaient”. The translations into English have at times kept “to copulate” (The Night Trilogy, paperback edition, first published 1987, Canada, Harper Collins, fifteenth printing, 1997), with others choosing “to flirt.” With E. Wiesel, whether he talks or writes, transformations and cheating are to be found at every turn.

All throughout his public existence “the Pope of the Holocaust religion” has made up for the bankruptcy of the official historians. We have not a single proof, not a single document to prove the “Holocaust” but we indeed have the performances of the clown Elie Wiesel and his acolytes. Where a historical subject of great gravity called for sober historians, we have had only histrions; Elie Wiesel is the first among these: a clown, a histrion crowned with a Nobel Prize.

Good News for Poor Humanity

Thanks to the Internet, the achievements and victories of revisionism will finally be within the whole world's reach. For E. Wiesel and his associates, for Jewish organizations in general, for the Zionists and the State of Israel, the news is bad, but for common humanity it is good. Reputedly capable of all possible horrors, humanity has nonetheless still not committed the supreme horror that would have consisted in coldly seeking to exterminate an entire "race," particularly in veritable death factories. This "crime of crimes" was not committed: Germany has not committed the irreparable. She has been atrociously maligned. Has her very soul ended up being killed? The future will tell.

For 66 years, by virtue of the assumption that the unprecedented horror had unquestionably happened, we have been constantly subjected to the same chant: "How could the country of Goethe and Beethoven, land of so many great minds, scholars, benefactors of humanity have committed the crime of crimes?", or again "How could the world stay silent? How is it that Pope Pius XII, so hostile to Adolf Hitler, never mentioned the gas chambers either during or after the war?", or "How can it be explained that neither in their statements nor in their respective memoirs Churchill, Eisenhower, de Gaulle, although ruthless in denouncing the crimes of National Socialism, should never have mentioned those gas chambers that were the ultimate weapon of mass destruction of Jews?", or "How is it that so many Jews – derisively called 'Brown Jews' – should have agreed in the countries occupied by the German army, or in ghettos or camps, to cooperate with the Nazis?", or, finally, "What is behind the overall silence of nations and, in particular, that of Switzerland and the International Committee of the Red Cross, in the face of the Holocaust then underway?" These and other questions of like nature have an answer: the crime of crimes was not committed. The Jews were treated by National Socialist Germany as declared or potential enemies but they were never steered towards physical extermination; during a total war in which millions of civilians perished many Jewish civilians died but many survived. More than sixty-five years after the war we are still awaiting estimates that can be verified.

After the war, Jewish survivors or miraculous survivors were to be counted by the million, to the point that they could people a new State called Israel and disperse in some fifty countries in the great wide world.

Times Are Changing, Fast and Profoundly

The "Holocaust" will go down in history as one of the most fabulous impostures of all time. The State of Israel has so far owed its survival only to this imposture which, in its eyes, justifies the theft of a territory, a cruel apartheid and perpetual war: this state is headed towards its doom as well. The Jewish organizations in the diaspora have failed. Their arrogance, their pressure, their blackmailing methods, their constant calls for repression against those who open, one after another, the black boxes of the "Holocaust" have not prevented a development throughout the world of widespread skepticism and fatigue with regard to stories illustrating the purportedly exceptional character of an incomparable Jewish suffering. The Jews on the whole have had bad shepherds, who are leading them to the abyss. They would be well advised to listen to those among them, few for the moment, who, whether in a low voice or out loud, denounce the Great Imposture of the Holocaust, the Great Imposture of the State of Israel and the Great False Witnesses in the style of Elie Wiesel.

The revisionists have discovered the sinister black boxes of the "Holocaust," then opened them and decrypted the contents for us. They have been able to unmask the apostles or disciples of a secular religion grounded in conceited pride, lies, hatred and greed. To all people, without distinction, the revisionists can bring relief: they teach us that, despite a capacity for every kind of horror, humanity has, after all, never committed the unspeakable slaughter for which, over several generations, some have presumed to blame it at every hour of the day or night, demanding ever more financial compensation, ever more privileges. Today we are facing a secular religion, that of the “Holocaust” or “Shoah,” which is bound to go down in history as the dishonor of men. This religion originated in the Western world and has developed there at a dazzling pace, but is already falling into decay. The rest of the world does not want it, sometimes even expressly rejecting it. The “Judeo-Christian” West would be well advised to take note of this and follow the example given by the rest of the world.

---

Notes:

[1]	The English edition lacks the sentences presented above as “To imagine would be indiscreet. To tell would be indecent [...] the whisper becomes a scream, the cry of a community gone mad, mad with grief and lucidity.” The translation of And the Sea Is Never Full is the work of E. Wiesel’s wife Marion. According to an American researcher Mrs. Wiesel has in the past purposely mistranslated certain words so as to deceive the reader and, in several passages in Night , resorted to the practice in an attempt to right the account’s confused chronology. The researcher in question, who has a perfect command of French, informs us as well that, as is the case here, she has at times simply chosen not to include certain words or sentences if she believes a faithful translation might suggest to English readers that E. Wiesel is not, after all, a reliable witness.
-----	--

Will Angela Merkel Repeat a Terrible History?

by Jett Rucker

The ever-ascending rocket that is Angela Merkel's international image is powered by a precious, highly volatile fuel: the deep and wide—but finite—reservoir of good will and prosperity of Germany, the country of whose government she is head.

Merkel was educated in the public schools of Germany—the former East Germany, for what that is worth, and any realistic estimate of what she learned of Germany's history in that setting must be modest both as to its extent and its veracity. This lament is not at all peculiar to Germany's schools, not even those of the communistic German Democrat Republic of yore. The government schools of any country do a woeful job of informing its students of their country's history, such that if Student Merkel had failed to pay any attention to it at all, she might have come away better able to address the subject at such later time (as when she assumed leadership of the country's government) as knowledge of it would be important. But even that advantage would be lost if, after gaining the dubious benefit of ignorance, she then resolved it with any antidote resembling the official lies and distortions, or even failed to resolve it at all.

Merkel's policies regarding the waves of African and Middle Eastern refugees lapping the diaphanous shores of her blessed homeland lead me to think that either she is ignorant of Germany's recent history as it concerns refugees, or that she has willfully sacrificed the concerns it must engender to the immediate rewards of becoming Time Magazine's Person of the Year for 2015 (as was, of course, her predecessor Chancellor Adolf Hitler in 1938). Hitler had not invited hundreds of thousands of foreign refugees into his country, but by the year of his Personhood, he had undertaken the repatriation of some thousands of Polish Jews who had entered and established themselves in Germany over a period reaching back well before his 1933 ascent to power.

Hunger strike of refugees in Berlin. Photo taken 15 October 2013.

By Fraktion DIE LINKE. im Bundestag [CC BY 2.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/2.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Kristallnacht—the infamous “night of broken glass”—may be traced to Hitler’s “reverse-Merkel” project, through the agency of one Hershel Grynszpan, the son of a Polish-Jewish couple caught up in Hitler’s early ethnic-cleansing program. The German government had consigned Grynszpan’s parents in an order of the previous month to join their co-religionists at Poland’s border with Germany, where the Polish government had erected Europe’s first concentration camps for Jews, since it did not want to readmit its erstwhile citizens.

Hitler’s ascent to international prominence, then, might be said to have been fueled by the intolerance and indifference of Germans, the grandparents, give or take a generation, of the people upon whose good nature Chancellor Merkel so lavishly prevails as her own star rises in the global firmament. The ensuing war (World War II) decimated Germany and its territory and people. Perhaps, despite the randomness that governs the impact points of bombs and artillery shells, the bloody process only killed the kind of German that would have approved of Hitler’s initiatives against not only the (Jewish) immigrants from Eastern Europe, but against German Jews, who had by 1933 come to dominate professions in entertainment, the media, academia, the law, government and medicine to an extent that alarmed many Gentile Germans and aroused their resentment, or worse. Of such combustible elements was the fuel powering Hitler’s massive boosters, seemingly of an altogether opposite character from the fragrant essence currently lifting Angela Merkel’s reputation into orbit.

Is Chancellor Merkel aware of the motive force provided to Hitler and the horrible trajectory of the war for which he bears an altogether disproportionate share of the blame, by the presence in German society of numerous recent arrivals with an alien religion and language(s)? Might she really imagine that the bombs and guns of the war that ended ten years before her birth might have picked off all the “bad eggs” among her countrymen? Or might she just as fantastically suppose that seventy years of re-education have so excised the human instinct of self-preservation from the collective psyche of Germans that they now might be cajoled into sacrificing their culture, their language and yes, their territory, to invaders who, like the Goths seeking refuge in the Roman Empire from Huns invading from the east, warrant unlimited self-sacrifice and –abnegation such as the Romans ultimately rendered up to their pitied conquerors?

Angela Merkel with Vladimir Putin in Moscow. Photo taken 8 February 2002. Kremlin.ru [CC BY 3.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/3.0>), CC BY 4.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/4.0>) or CC BY 3.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by/3.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Whether she knows it or not, whether she cares or not, Merkel here is playing with fire that has been seen not long ago to consume the lives and fortunes of millions upon millions of innocents—of her own countrymen first and foremost, as she might have observed for herself had she been born as little as ten years before she was. Germans as a group today, no more cognizant of the history that so worries me than Merkel herself might be, might be inclined to play along with the new “Good German” brand that made Germany the world’s most-admired country in a BBC poll conducted in 2013. But altruism, like war, is a grievously wearisome thing, especially when your side is losing. Yes, Germans may be willing, consciously or not, to have Berlin sacked, either gradually or more-notedly as the Visigoths’ sacking of Rome in 410 was.

But by no means all Germans are willing to see this happen, nor, for that matter, do they wish a replay of events that followed 1938’s Kristallnacht on out well past Germany’s surrender in 1945. In order to prevent both of these execrable developments, it would seem necessary to slow the influx of people who speak no European language whatever, who adhere to a religion that is, if anything, even more-antithetical to Germany’s hitherto-dominant Christianity than was Judaism.

Doing any such thing would appear to be vanishingly remote from any agenda that Frau Bundeskanzlerin might be contemplating. That may be much worse than merely unfortunate.

Frau Merkel’s countrymen may yet retain more of that resilient vigor than may have been apparent to her among the communist slaves with whom she spent her formative years. If they do, they may react—after the point at which it might be convenient, or peaceful, to do so—to the infusion of so many aliens, deserving and otherwise, among their number that they are rendered unable to maintain the structure, the “regularities” as sociologists call them, upon which they discover that so much of their ability to enjoy peaceful, productive lives depends.

They might fight to regain what they have so painstakingly rebuilt from the ashes and rubble of that last conflagration.

And if they do, Angela Merkel will surely be off somewhere safe, perhaps in America with Ayaan Hirsi Ali, ex-Muslim ex-member of parliament of the Netherlands, or elsewhere. But there will, as before, be blood in the streets. There will be concentration camps. Innocents will die, in great numbers.

Perhaps yet another Person of the Year will emerge from the turmoil.

I only hope that it all can be kept from exploding into World War III.

A Revisionist Swashbuckler: | CODOH

by Theodore J. O'Keefe

My Memories of Bradley R. Smith

I first met Bradley Smith thirty-one years ago. It was early 1985, I had just moved to Southern California from Japan, and Bradley was waiting for me in front of the Los Angeles bus station. He was twenty years older than I, we had different backgrounds and aspirations, and we were friends from the beginning. That first encounter, in which we rambled through L.A.'s decaying downtown, set the tone for hundreds that followed—talk that flowed and rushed like a spring thaw, with scenery and watering hole (Philippe, as I recall) incidental to observation, reminiscence, point, counterpoint, argument, open discussion that reveled in disagreement and debate.

From the start we shared a commitment to Holocaust revisionism, and soon a camaraderie, as we worked together, first at the Institute of Historical Review, where I pressed Bradley to stress, rather than his occasional pratfalls, his on-air achievements in his accounts of his work for IHR's Radio Project. Later I advised and edited Bradley's efforts on behalf of his Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust, through which, more than any other revisionist, he was able to gain Holocaust revisionism notoriety at hundreds of American universities and in perturbed editorials in the national news media.

Our approaches to revisionism were different. I had absorbed much of the historiographical tradition of America First while growing up, and further saw revisionism as playing an active role in the defense of the West. For Bradley, Holocaust revisionism was first of all an issue of individual free expression. He was not so much interested in how the Holocaust did or didn't happen (I once called in during a local radio show Bradley was doing to lob him a batting-practice question about the Leuchter Report, but no, he couldn't recall any studies of missing cyanide residue in the "gas chambers"). Nor did Bradley trouble very much with the complexities of central European polity between the wars: to him, for invading Poland, Hitler was merely an "asshole."

Furthermore, my ideology was not very touchy-feely, whereas Bradley was not only rigorously libertarian, but also a long-time consumer of Southern California mysticism and admirer of its adepts, from Krishnamurti to Baba Ram Dass. What won my admiration of Bradley was that at its core Bradley's ethos was a soldierly one. Apart from one uncharacteristic episode in the bull ring, he lived a life of physical courage and personal responsibility, and his code of conduct—his simple but difficult struggle to be in "right relationship" with all others—impelled him relentlessly toward self-mastery.

Bradley R. Smith, swashbuckling, dangerous, honorable, and real.

Readers of Bradley's numerous writings will be aware of how he risked prison for refusing to stop selling the (allegedly obscene) writings of Henry Miller, how he was drawn to combat in Korea and South Vietnam, the varied physical and financial risks he ran throughout his pre-revisionist work career. But his willingness to face danger was neither mere thrill-seeking nor simply the dedication of a zealot to his cause. Several times in 1986 I accompanied Bradley to his office in a building at Hollywood and Vine (once the crossroads of the film industry, then a sagging neighborhood). Not long before, bombs planted by Jewish terrorists had burnt IHR's offices to the ground as well as killed two persons in Southern California. On each visit, Bradley, alert to the danger, would shoo me up the hall, so that he would take the brunt of any booby trap. During our friendship of three decades, I many times witnessed the same vigilance and readiness to act decisively in a crisis.

As Bradley reveals in Confessions of a Holocaust Revisionist, from adolescence his mission was to be a soldier. Unlike a myriad of youths from his generation, Bradley's exemplar was not the combat hero of Hollywood film, but a self-sacrificing champion from over a thousand years before, Roland, whose chanson roused his soul like his hero's belated horn. As did the lord of the Breton March in the epic version, Bradley came to strive to be not just a warrior, but a warrior of high ideals and irreproachable comportment. Clausewitz's assessment of war as a calculated act of policy was foreign to Bradley's soldierly creed. Good in a crisis as he could be, throughout his career Bradley often called to mind, more so than even Roland, the ever dauntless man of La Mancha.

This soldierly romanticism was central to his dedication to fighting for the revisionist cause, in fact as the most accessible and exposed spokesman for that cause in America, for over thirty years. It brought potential physical danger to him and his family, possibilities he either dismissed with characteristic good humor or left unmentioned.

Then there were the economic consequences: Bradley supported himself and his family not by tilting at windmills, but by attacking, in full public view, the Taboo of the Twentieth Century. He declared bankruptcy more than once, and he always seemed just an illness or an accident away from poverty.

Was Bradley's abhorrence of system, both in business and in writing, somehow connected to his soldierly ideals? In any case in his conduct of the business part of CODOH, it is not enough to say that he was undisciplined and unbusinesslike: Bradley's methods verged on chaos, and record keeping, planning, and the basics of fundraising—including contributions—periodically disappeared under the growing and multiplying ziggurats of paper on his and neighboring desks.

As a writer, Bradley disdained structure and literary artifice. He was an indifferent speller and ignored the rules of grammar even where he knew them. His sole instruction to me in my efforts to order his tangled prose for Smith's Report was: "Don't make me sound too smart." If he had a writing style, it was to let it all flow, let it all hang out. Nonetheless, reading Bradley's best revisionist writing, it isn't hard to see that it catches fire when touched by his moral and ethical concerns. In dry-as-dust matters such as historiographical details or his need for contributions his writing often clunks along (particularly in the first draft) as if it were on an iron long. But when he describes an individual, friend or foe, Bradley meticulously renders dialogue in all its nuances, and he homes in on his own and his disputant's obligations as citizen and as human with Socratic penetration and ethical fervor.

In his dealings with his adversaries—whether Exterminationist or revisionist—Bradley tried to be kind. His efforts were generally unrequited, which didn't seem to trouble him, for he held himself to a much stricter standard for taking offense than most of us. When reminded of certain of his persistent revisionist detractors, Bradley liked to tell me, "We've never had a problem," which was usually true—as far as he was concerned.

Various remembrances of Bradley have stressed the achievements made possible by the irenic side of this quixotic soldier. Yes, by not making the Jews as a collective the target of his revisionist efforts he was able to gain considerable purchase with the student editors who enabled him to place hundreds of his campus ads in their papers. And yes, his good nature and his eschewal of racial concerns enabled him to win the cooperation of able revisionists around the world in establishing the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust, and its spinoffs such as its powerful website, as well as the short-lived journal The Revisionist, which paved the way for Inconvenient History.

But Bradley had a combative side as well. It tended to emerge when he, or those he spoke for, had been backed into a corner. I first saw this in 1985, after the Institute for Historical Review had made a humiliating settlement with the boastful Auschwitz survivor Mel Mermelstein, giving him $90,000 and an apology after he had sought IHR's ill-conceived reward offer to the first to prove gassings at Auschwitz. Now largely forgotten, at the time the settlement seemed even to IHR supporters a craven surrender of the Institute's basic principles. It was Bradley Smith, as editor of IHR's newsletter, who sounded the revisionist counterattack, calling Mermelstein a "demonstrable fraud" and a "vainglorious prevaricator." Predictably, Bradley's words brought on a new lawsuit, but this time, after a long and costly struggle, the Institute was victorious, and, just as important, was able to regain the unwavering support of revisionists.

A few years later, when Ernst Zündel was tried a second time for violating Canada's foolish law against spreading "false news" about the Holocaust and other sacred cows, Bradley played a key role in raising the morale of Zündel and his supporters. The early stages of the trial had been adverse to Zündel, leaving him and his team downcast. I vividly recall Ernst's jubilation over the phone at Bradley's testimony, in which with his common sense and aplomb he shredded the Holocaust mystique by cutting the testimony of various of its most sainted "eyewitnesses" down to size. Most memorable was his demolition of Elie Wiesel, who, Bradley told the court, was "not wrapped too tight" for claiming that geysers of blood had spurting from Jewish bodies in Ukraine for months after they were dead and buried. It would be too much to say that Bradley's testimony outweighed that of Fred Leuchter, Robert Faurisson, David Irving, and the many other witnesses to come. Yet by violating the Holocaust taboos against common sense and liberating laughter, Bradley dominated the courtroom and reversed the momentum of the trial.

When it came to taking on Holocaust historiography, Bradley was at his most powerful, whether in court, on the air, or in writing, when assailing the testimony of the most-prominent survivors—Elie Wiesel; Abe Bomba, the barber of Treblinka; "crazy" Jankiel Wiernik, the carpenter of Treblinka; and many others. It's not hard to see that Bradley's fury at these slandering impostors was fueled, not by hatred of Jews, but precisely by his insistence that Jews be judged by the same standards as non-Jews. Not that his equity could ever mollify the Holocaust lobby and other groups that act, with none but trifling opposition, in the name of Jewry. Nor, alas, did that equity impress the non-Jews throughout the media and academe that Bradley worked tirelessly to draw into open debate on the Holocaust.

Bradley was attempting a dangerous thing: treating Jews, even Jews who despised him, respectfully (in conciliatory fashion), while relying on support from hard-core revisionists. He wrote and talked often of his sorrow at the loss of his Jewish friends in Los Angeles, and this was certainly no pose. Yet despite his oft-proclaimed tolerance and his public embrace of David Cole, he was unable to elicit more than the occasional furtive nod from Jews, while Jewish organizations such as the ADL, the Simon Wiesenthal Center, and (the on-campus) Hillel House fought, with ultimate success, to keep him off campus and off the air.

I spent many hours with Bradley over the past thirty years, and was frequently his guest in Hollywood; in Visalia, a pleasant farming town in the southern San Joaquin Valley; and finally at the house he designed in Rosarito, some ten miles south of Tijuana and the border. Mostly we talked, a lot about revisionism and ideas for CODOH. (I recall that after one day-long brainstorming session, the woman of the house remarked in Spanish: "You work like donkeys, but you never make any money.")

Just as often we talked about everything else (science and math pretty much excluded). We went out a lot—which was no sacrifice, because Bradley had a genius for finding the best places to eat and drink—and talked some more. Bradley was the most interesting conversationalist I've ever known. He was intellectually sophisticated, not in the manner of the Harvard common room (against which he could deploy his working man's Socrates persona to good effect), but well-read in modern literature (of which he had a sizeable library), knowledgeable about art, and far better informed than most about the world and its political workings.

Bradley could muster enthusiasm for nearly any topic, from boxing to Buddhism. More important, he withheld nothing of himself in conversation. At the same time, he conveyed his intense interest in you, and he had the knack of making you feel you'd known each other your whole lives. He had that rare virtue, the ability to listen; and even rarer, the willingness to differ with his friends. To be sure, he could occasionally try to get under your skin with razzing of the barracks or locker-room variety, but only when he was losing an argument. Even during our final face-to-face encounter last fall, although physically frail, in conversation Bradley was engaged, observant, and alive.

Bradley Smith was not a believer in the conventional sense. He was certainly not a Christian, and his interest in Eastern meditation and other disciplines was furthered by the godlessness of their purest forms. His aim was to be in right relationship with everyone he encountered. Now “right relationship” is a term that is patently elastic and which has been appropriated by numerous contending churches and sects. Bradley’s seat-of-the-pants interpretation included every charity of which he was capable, from giving to beggars to taking in the homeless, related or otherwise (one night on Hollywood Boulevard he took pity on a young Canadian down on his luck and brought him home to sleep over). It can be said, with no overtones of sanctity, that from his tolerant public stance to his conduct in private, Bradley was animated by a personal goodness that his critics, including the Methodist minister J. Franklin Littell, who compared Bradley to “the adversary who wanders to and fro in the earth and goes up and down in it,” i.e. Satan, would do well to try to emulate.

Humbleness and self-deprecation were part of Bradley’s public persona. He loved to stress his shortcomings and mistakes. I came to believe that these efforts masked a deep pride. And, in the end, as a revisionist Bradley had a great deal to be proud of. In an area where, as in so much of life, success is a team effort, ultimately everything came down to him. He took on the biggest and most-heavily defended bastions of the Holocaust industry and its most-sacrosanct oracles. Even the evident failure of his outreach projects was a measure of Bradley’s and revisionism’s success: the professors he was always seeking to bedevil had no answers for his arguments.

When all is said and done Bradley Smith lived the life the academics and his other detractors pretend they want to lead—swashbuckling, dangerous, honorable, and real. And his revisionist work marches on, its victory never more certain.

Arthur Ekirch on American Militarism

by Ralph Raico

In 1783 the treaty ending hostilities between Great Britain and its rebellious colonies along the eastern seaboard of North America was signed in Paris. For their part the English proclaimed that, “His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, viz., New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations ...” – there followed the rest of the thirteen colonies – “to be free sovereign and independent states,” with the British Crown relinquishing all claims to “the same and every part thereof.”

Amazingly, a collection of artisans, merchants, and mostly farmers had defied one of the great military machines of Europe, and the greatest empire, and won. It was a triumph that gladdened the hearts of lovers of liberty and republican government the world over.

Today, this United States, now definitively in the singular, is itself the world's greatest military machine and sole imperial power. How did this happen? In The Civilian and the Military: A History of the American Antimilitarist Tradition,<sup>1</sup> Arthur A. Ekirch traces this portentous transformation to 1972 (counting his preface).

Murray Rothbard called Ekirch's work “brilliant,” and praised it as “an example of a revisionist outlook on all three great wars of the twentieth century.” Robert Higgs, in his foreword to the Independent Institute's edition of Ekirch's The Decline of American Liberalism, provides a summary of the life and productive academic career of Arthur Ekirch. He notes that Ekirch registered as a conscientious objector in the Second World War but was nonetheless sentenced to work without pay as a logger and later in a school for the mentally retarded, experiences that did not endear the American state to the feisty scholar.

Militarism can be defined as the permeation of civil society by military institutions, influences, and values.

As Ekirch sketches it, the Anglo-American heritage of explicit antimilitarism began to be formed in 17th-century England, especially with the Levellers and resistance to a standing army.

This tradition continued among the British settlers of what became the United States. It is evident in the attitudes of the leaders of the American Revolution. James Madison, for instance, stated:

Of all the enemies to public liberty war is, perhaps, the most to be dreaded, because it comprises and develops the germ of every other. War is the parent of armies; from these proceed debts and taxes; and armies, and debts, and taxes are the known instruments for bringing the many under the domination of the few.

The connection between antimilitarism and nonintervention in the affairs of foreign nations – what its crafty opponents have succeeded in labeling “isolationism” – was often marked among the rebellious colonials. Ekirch points out that “an important argument for independence had been that it would free the American people from involvement in the wars of Europe and from the necessity of helping to support a British army.” The radical republican position was put boldly by Jefferson: “I am for free commerce with all nations; political connection with none; and little or no diplomatic establishment.”

But during their presidencies, Jefferson and especially Madison reneged on their noninterventionist and antiwar position. The war hawks in their party clamored for confrontation with England, hoping to acquire Canada. Though this proved impossible, Madison's War of 1812 was considered a success. A military spirit was awakened, shown in the popular adulation of war heroes and military displays at Fourth of July parades.

As war with Mexico drew near, Daniel Webster criticized the maneuvers of President James Polk. His words were to be the key to America's future wars, from the provisioning of Fort Sumter on: “What is the value of this constitutional provision [granting Congress the sole power to declare war] if the President on his own authority may make such military movements as must bring on war?” Easy victory over Mexico, however, further fueled the military spirit.

If the Jeffersonians can be accused of surrendering their principles, what are we to say of some of the celebrated antistatists of the 19th and early 20th centuries? Henry David Thoreau, whose conscience rebelled at the US war against Mexico, became an enthusiast for the “just war” against the slave states. He revered John Brown, referring to him as a Christ upon the cross when Brown tried to raise a servile rebellion among the millions of slaves of the South, a move “credited” with helping start the Civil War. That awful bloodletting cost 620,000 lives.

Charles Sumner, famous classical liberal and free trader, wrote in his 1845 work, The True Grandeur of Nations, “Can there be in our age any peace that is not honorable, any war that is not dishonorable?” But he also found an honorable war in the attack on the South.

Later, Benjamin Tucker, individualist anarchist, was a cheerleader for the Entente's war with Germany. For his part, the anarchist Peter Kropotkin urged Russia on to war with the Central Powers in 1914. Poor Kropotkin was bewildered by the way it turned out, a Bolshevik tyranny worse than anything ever experienced before. The war itself cost many millions of lives, the worst bloodbath in European history to that time.

The point is that these individualists were no Bastiats or Herbert Spencers. None could resist the pull of a just war. None understood the insight of Randolph Bourne – whom Ekirch calls one of the few who “stood firm” against the first crusade against Germany – that “war is the health of the state.”

During the Civil War the United States “was placed under what, for all practical purposes, amounted to a military dictatorship.” Lincoln suspended the writ of habeas corpus, shut down newspapers critical of his policies, and held thousands as political prisoners. His conscription law led to draft riots, particularly in New York City, but a precedent had been set.

“This is America - for this we fight” uses a photo of Mt. Rushmore for propaganda purposes. By the Office for Emergency Management, Office of War Information, Domestic Operations Branch, Bureau of Special Services (03/09/1943 - 09/15/1945). (U.S. National Archives and Records Administration) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Union veterans formed the Grand Army of the Republic, demanding pensions and preference in government jobs. The US Army continued to justify its jobs by its taxpayer-funded backing of the railroad barons in the West and the campaigns to exterminate the Plains Indians. Military training and “education” proliferated in schools and colleges.

In the 1880s and '90s, navalism surged ahead, with industries, steel above all, promoting their own vested interests. The tradition of a navy solely for the coastal defense of the country – as old as the republic – was abandoned.

There were critics of the new militarism, E.L. Godkin of The Nation and William Graham Sumner, whose essay, The Conquest of the United States by Spain (1898), against the war on the Philippines has inspired anti-imperialists ever since. (His great essay is now available online.)

But the few critics could not prevail against the powerful cabal of Admiral Alfred Thayer Mahan, Henry Cabot Lodge, and Theodore Roosevelt, which represented a turning point on the road to empire.

Mahan was not much of a naval commander (his ships tended to collide), but he was a superb propagandist for navalism. His work on The Influence of Sea Power upon History, 1660–1783 was seized upon by navalists in Germany, Japan, France, and elsewhere. It fueled the arms race that led to the First World War, proving to be no great blessing to mankind.

In the Senate, Lodge pushed for war with Spain and the takeover of the Philippines, later for war with Germany, and following that war, for a vindictive peace treaty that would keep the Germans down for the foreseeable future. Throughout, Lodge pressed for a navy second to none, demanded by America's new empire. The Navy League, funded by big business, helped the cause along.

Heaven only knows what Theodore Roosevelt is doing on that endlessly reproduced iconic monument on Mount Rushmore, right alongside Jefferson. Roosevelt despised Jefferson as a weakling, and Jefferson would have despised him as a warmonger. The great historian Charles Beard wrote truly of "Teddy" that he was probably the only major figure in American history "who thought that war in itself was a good thing."

Included in the cabal was Elihu Root, secretary of war and then of state under TR, who advocated "the creation of a military spirit among the youth of the country."

The acquisition of the Philippines cast the United States into the arena of contending imperialisms in the Far East, including especially Japan's. Antiwar congressmen exposed the links between the drive for a great ocean-going navy and the munitions industry, to no avail.

Ekirch is perhaps too lenient on Woodrow Wilson. Already, Wilson's note to Germany following the sinking of the Lusitania, in which he reiterated the US position, that Germany would be held to a "strict accountability" for the deaths of any Americans at sea from U-boats, even when traveling on armed belligerent merchant ships carrying military munitions through war zones, set the United States on a collision course for war. Here Walter Karp's The Politics of War presents a more reliable account.

During the war, the Espionage and Sedition Acts were used to curb dissent. The Creel Committee on Public Information propagandized for war to a hitherto unprecedented extent. The mass media incited public opinion against the demonized enemy as would become standard to our own day.

Historical revisionism flourished as the archives of major powers were opened up, forced by the Bolsheviks' unlocking of the Russian archives. True accounts of the machinations by which the European powers and then the United States entered the war led to the brief flourishing of antiwar sentiment after 1918.

The America First Committee was the greatest antiwar movement in history. Among its more notable members were Gerald Ford, Walt Disney, Gore Vidal, and of course, Charles Lindbergh. America First Committee poster circa 1940.

In 1933 Franklin Roosevelt was sworn in as president. This genial master of deception was not only a fanatic for naval expansion but also harbored grandiose plans for reordering the world. The geopolitical situation of the 1930s in Europe and the Far East gave Roosevelt ample opportunity for overseas meddling. The formally opposition party in 1940 nominated for president Wendell Willkie, as much of an interventionist as FDR. The greatest antiwar movement in history, the America First Committee, boasted 800,000 members, but it quickly folded when Roosevelt got the war he wanted, at Pearl Harbor.

In the Second World War America embraced militarism wholeheartedly. It has never looked back.

The worst violation of civil liberties was the rounding up and imprisonment of some 80,000 American citizens of Japanese descent and 40,000 resident Japanese aliens (not eligible for citizenship because born in Japan). Emblematic of the hysteria generated by this most-just of just wars, the US Supreme Court upheld their incarceration. Renowned liberals Hugo Black, Felix Frankfurter, and William Douglas joined the majority. California Attorney-General Earl Warren was a passionate advocate for incarceration.

Following the war, “the atmosphere of perpetual crisis and war hysteria” engendered by Washington never let up. Harry Truman initiated what Ekirch rightly calls “the aggressive American foreign policy of the Cold War.” Dozens of entangling alliances were formed, committing the nation to defending the existing international order against any who would challenge it. A new enemy intent on world-conquest was conjured up in the form of the Soviet Union and international communism. This conflict included two “hot wars” and entailed vast continuing military budgets, now to pay for ever-more-deadly nuclear weapons as well. It lasted over 40 years and cost civil society trillions of dollars.

As Ekirch presciently foresaw, even a peaceful resolution of the Cold War was not “sufficient to release the American people from the power of the Pentagon and its corporate allies.” Incursions of the armed forces occurred in Yugoslavia, the Philippines, Somalia, and elsewhere.

Now the United States is involved in wars in Iraq, Afghanistan, and Pakistan, soon perhaps also in Iran.

Today there is no conscription, which caused too many problems for the militarists in the Vietnam years. But the American empire bestrides the globe. The United States has over 700 military bases overseas, plus some dozen naval task forces patrolling the oceans, with a multitude of space satellites feeding information to the forces below. Every year its "defense" (i.e., military) budget is nearly equal to those of all other countries combined. Does anyone doubt that for America there are more wars, many more wars, in the offing?

As the great social scientist Joseph Schumpeter wrote of the military in imperialist states, “Created by the wars that required it, the machine now created the wars it required.”

---

Notes:

This article originally appeared in slightly different form on Mises.org

1	Ralph Myles, Colorado Springs, 1972.
---	--------------------------------------

Bradley R. Smith | CODOH

by Richard A. Widmann

Bradley R. Smith was born into a working-class family in South Central Los Angeles on February 18, 1930, where the family remained until 1970. He was a good student on occasion, but was more interested in horses than education. At 18 he joined the army and in 1951 served in the 7th Cavalry in Korea, where he was wounded twice. It was in the army hospital at Camp Cooke, California where he began to write.

In the 1950s he searched for something beyond writing that could hold his attention. He became a deputy sheriff for Los Angeles County, but that wasn't it. He left the department to travel to Mexico where he became involved with the bullfights, becoming a novillero—an apprentice bullfighter—in the central mountain states of Jalisco, Guerrero and Hidalgo. The bulls very much had his attention, but his liver gave out with hepatitis and he had to return to the States for hospitalization.

In 1958 Smith went to New York City, where he worked for The Bodley Gallery on East 60th Street. He discovered the intellectual and cultural life of Greenwich Village, a new world for him. In the Village he read a bootleg copy of Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer and was, literally, rocked by it. He returned to Los Angeles where he opened a bookstore on Hollywood Boulevard specializing in paperback books, which were at that time new and all the rage. When Tropic was published he dedicated himself to promoting the book in his store windows. He was arrested, jailed, and prosecuted for refusing to stop selling the book.

Bradley R. Smith (18 Feb 1930- 18 Feb 2016)

The ensuing trial lasted six weeks, the longest criminal trial ever to have taken place in Los Angeles at that time.<sup>1</sup> There was considerable press coverage. Smith was intrigued by the proceedings. For six weeks he watched and listened to academics and writers and community leaders argue under oath that Tropic should be censored and those selling it be punished because the book expressed sensibilities that did not meet, legally, "community standards." Leon Uris, author of Exodus, particularly caught Smith's attention by arguing that Miller, a writer obviously more important to American culture than he, should be censored. In 1962 Smith was convicted for selling a book that "endangered" the community standards of Greater Los Angeles.

In the 1960s Smith patrolled the streets of Hollywood as a deputy sheriff and worked as a seaman on merchant ships. He shipped to Japan, the Philippines, Korea, Vietnam, and Taiwan. In 1968 he jumped ship in Thailand and made his way to Saigon where he traveled the country as a correspondent with accreditation by the Vietnamese. Meanwhile, in Hollywood, he had met a Jewish woman; they had exchanged hearts, each with the other, in a relationship that lasted into the mid-1970s.

Then it happened.

In 1979, when Smith was 49 years old, his life changed forever when he read a leaflet by Robert Faurisson, “The Problem of the Gas Chambers.” The story of this life-changing moment is recounted in his autobiographical work, Confessions of a Holocaust Revisionist. Smith writes, “I felt stunned, as if Buck Rogers had somehow come down from the 21st century and zapped me with a beam from his ray gun.” It took him three months to digest the core of the revisionist argument. And then, like a toreador emerging from the callejón, he jumped into the struggle. He knew from the beginning that he was going to address the taboo against publishing revisionist arguments, not the arguments themselves. He would be the “Henry Miller” of the revisionists. Not as famous as Miller, not as original, but his job needed doing, desperately.

Through his efforts in the years that followed, millions of Americans learned for the first time about Holocaust revisionism and the scholarly debate on this chapter of history. In the mid-1980s, he published Prima Facie, a newsletter aimed at journalists and editors, quoting their own writings, that focused on cultism, suppression of free inquiry and censorship on the Holocaust issue.

Smith had a long association with the Institute for Historical Review—as a contributor to their publications, as a speaker at conferences, and, during the late 1980s, as its media projects director, a role that generated hundreds of radio and television interviews.

Starting in the late 1980s and on through to his death, he had been active as director of the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust (CODOH), a group dedicated to defending free speech and free inquiry on the Holocaust issue, to encouraging greater public access to revisionist scholarship, and to promoting awareness of the controversy regarding the Holocaust story and censorship measures deployed in its perpetuation.

Since 1990, Smith published a newsletter, Smith's Report, which reports on his own activities, those of CODOH, and various articles and news stories about revisionists and revisionism around the world.

Smith is perhaps best known for having published several essay-length advertisements calling for open debate on the Holocaust in student newspapers published at colleges and universities across the United States. In the 1991-92 school year, CODOH advertisements or statements appeared in 17 student newspapers, several at major universities. During the 1993-1994 academic year, his ad—headlined “A Revisionist Challenge to the US Holocaust Memorial Museum”—appeared in at least 35 college and university campus papers, as well as one major metropolitan daily. In 1999 and 2000, Smith created a new publication, The Revisionist, a 24-page pulp-stock publication that was distributed free on campus. The January 2000 issue, which featured a story on intellectual freedom and book-burning was itself burned on the campus of St. Cloud University. By the end of the 2000-01 academic year, his ads had appeared in more than 350 student papers.

Smith's campaign generated news reports and commentary in such prominent periodicals as The New York Times and Time magazine, and editorials in The Washington Post, The New York Times, the Philadelphia Inquirer, and the Los Angeles Times.

Deborah Lipstadt, a Jewish academic and a prominent figure in the Holocaust lobby, took aim at Bradley's efforts in her Denying the Holocaust. One chapter of her book, "The Battle for the Campus," focuses specifically on Smith's advertisements. She laments that after seeing the ads, many students might assume there is an "other side" [to the Holocaust story.]

Smith spoke on the subject of intellectual freedom with regard to the Holocaust on more than 400 radio talk shows and news broadcasts, as well as on nationwide television, including an appearance with Michael Shermer (Skeptic Magazine) and David Cole as a guest on the Phil Donahue Show.

Bradley Smith and CODOH were one of the first Holocaust revisionist groups to develop a website in the early '90s. Since that time he has hosted several sites, blogs, a MySpace page, a Facebook page, and participated in many discussion groups and forums on-line.

He wrote many articles, and several books. The first, Confessions of a Holocaust Revisionist, was praised by Canadian journalist Doug Collins as "fascinating" and as an "amusing walk through the valley of the shadow of doubt."

Smith's Break His Bones: The Private Life of a Holocaust Revisionist, is a witty and thoughtful 315-page memoir published in 2002 that looks back on the challenges, disappointments and triumphs of his years-long battle against taboo and censorship. Break His Bones details the organized campaign to suppress free speech and intellectual freedom on the Holocaust issue, showing how skeptics are blacklisted, and their works banned. Smith provided a human face for the much-maligned "Holocaust deniers." "It might be said," he wrote, that Break His Bones "is an exercise revealing the subjective life of a thought criminal."

In December 2006, Smith was invited to and delivered a talk to an international delegation at the Tehran Holocaust Conference, "The Irrational Vocabulary of the American Professorial Class with Regard to the Holocaust Question."

In 2008, Nine-Banded Books published his third book, The Man Who Saw His Own Liver. Liver was conceived and written as a one-act play. It was performed in Los Angeles in 1983, under the title The Man Who Stopped Paying. A review of the performance labeled Smith "an anarchist libertarian."

Six years later, in 2014, Smith published a collection of his writing from the 1950s to the 1980s entitled, A Personal History of Moral Decay. Tito Perdue commented on Bradley's final book calling it "a generous, lapidary, and much appreciated gift."

Bradley Smith passed away in California on February 18, 2016, his 86th birthday. The momentum of those he inspired, far from waning, waxes apace.

---

Notes:

How the Allies Launched the Holocaust at Casablanca in 1943

by Jett Rucker

Searching for “the moment the Holocaust began” is quite as pointless as the never-ending search for “the missing link” in the evolution of homo sapiens. Analyses of the event(s), however the events are constituted, often go back to ancient intergroup enmities and exploitations as far back as the Middle Ages. Others focus on misrepresented, but discrete, events such as the January 1942 Wannsee Conference.

Finding events and moments of significance to what in fact did happen and to the motivations in fact in play, however leads to a time still later, a place actually outside Europe, and actors including no National Socialists nor in fact Germans of any stripe whatsoever. The time, place and actors, I submit, were:

- January 1943
- Casablanca, Morocco
- Franklin D. Roosevelt (the proud author), Winston Churchill and (in absentia) Joseph Stalin

The occasion, of course, is the famous Casablanca Conference. The original idea, for the declaration and the subsequent attainment of its goals, seems to have come from the inexhaustibly evil mind of American President Franklin D. Roosevelt, possibly the greatest warmonger who ever lived. At least, the proposal came from him, and the other two leaders, one or more of them obviously bent on conquest, signed on to it, in the process condemning untold millions to death and privation and likely, depending on an extensive counterfactual analysis, at least doubling the death, destruction and cost of World War II, including its depredations upon the Jews of Europe.

The idea itself, easy to state, inspiring to hear—or terrifying, depending on which side you are hearing it from—is Unconditional Surrender. Unconditional Surrender means that your armed forces will continue to fight its opponents until said opponents yield admission to your armed forces to their own homelands—the places where they were born and grew up, where they married, where their wives and children still live. Foreign soldiers will freely roam the defeated’s streets, thereon free also to abuse, torture, molest, rob, and rape those they encounter on said streets and free, further, to knock on—or knock down—the door of any house or shop that might interest them, and therein to avail themselves of anything—or anyone—that (or who) might in any way mitigate the insufferable deprivations that plague every soldier in all places and all times of history.<sup>1</sup>

US President Franklin Roosevelt and British Prime Minister Sir Winston Churchill in January 1943 in Casablanca. Here the unconditional surrender of Germany was planned. Seated from left: Churchill and Roosevelt; Standing: Major General Hastings Ismay and Admiral Lord Louis Mountbatten

Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-S68745 / CC-BY-SA 3.0 [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

When your country's enemy credibly declares the aim of Unconditional Surrender, your enemy's threat penetrates viscera you may never previously have known you had. Patriotism, loyalty to this or that regime, however hateful or congenial, becomes utterly irrelevant; the wolf will not remain howling outside your door—he will enter your home, destroying it if necessary, and have his way with all he finds therein.

If, in your country, among your population, in your government, the professions, the media, and/or academia, there happen to be members of a group whose members outside your country seem to have inspired the savage battle cry of Unconditional Surrender by your country's enemies, then you might favor restriction, on suspicion, of every potential member of this group. Such, of course, was the position of the hapless Jews of Germany during World War II, despite many of them likely being loyal Germans, if not National Socialists. It was also the position of the hapless Japanese-Americans of the western United States at the same time.

The comparison between the Japanese in America and the Jews in Germany and the territories Germany occupied ends right there: with few setbacks of any moment, America won that war, and Germany, tragically, disastrously, lost it, along with massive proportions of its houses, buildings, bridges, factories, territory, and people.

The Holocaust, broadly defined, was displacement, dispossession, enslavement and frequently death of groups disfavored by Germany's National Socialist government, classically, if not mostly, Jews. It was no more a program of genocide than was the program of the conquering Allies in their blockading, bombing and eventual expulsion from their homelands of helpless Germans in their millions, leading to fates comparing most "favorably" in both severity and numbers with those alleged to have happened to Jews—and all this before the atrociously brutal occupations.

The beleaguered Germans placed millions of Jews and others in their infamous “concentration camps,” most of which were in fact labor camps not altogether unlike those in Oak Ridge, Tennessee and a thousand other places (including Los Alamos) in the US and elsewhere in the Allies’ territories. Unlike those Allies (except for a famous exception in Bengal, a colony controlled by Ally Great Britain),<sup>2</sup> the Germans eventually lost their ability to provision, and combat disease in, their densely populated industrial housing tracts.

The Allies’ disruption of the Germans’ industrial efforts to resist the former’s incursions were not at all limited to the killing and “dehousing” of Germans and their wives and children, nor to the destruction of their roads, factories, bridges and railroads. The Allies, knowingly or otherwise, killed thousands of concentration-camp inmates at Mittelbau-Nordhausen in an April 1945 bombing raid. Unfortunately, the only inmates above ground at this underground industrial complex were those in the camp hospital with tuberculosis and other diseases—it was mostly these patients who were killed, and whose deaths in famous propaganda photographs was laid to the Germans by Americans overrunning the site a week after the raid.

This same grotesquely “counter-productive” campaign assumed another guise in the sinking by the Royal Air Force of the German passenger liner Cap Arcona in the following month, killing at least 5,000 of the people the Allies’ savage “humanitarian intervention” was trumpeted as intending to save.

The Holocaust, then, perceived as chiefly the result of the Germans’ desperate, doomed effort to save their homeland, may be seen to have ensued, in its most-lethal and cruelest phases, from the position the government and people of Germany found themselves in as a consequence of Unconditional Surrender, and this takes no account of those many in countries to the east of Germany who clearly saw the Soviet behemoth descending on their own homelands as a wolf, as it were, in “liberators’” clothing.

But that is hardly half of the story, at least so far as the perspective of the modal “informed” German of the day is concerned. In 1944, as though to add fuel to this diabolical fire, Churchill, Roosevelt, and the latter’s Jewish advisor, Henry Morgenthau, gathered in Quebec for yet another of the demonic conferences at which the victorious Allies plotted the utter destruction of the society and people of Europe’s largest civilization.<sup>3</sup>

There, as a condition of a $6-billion “loan” to the United Kingdom, FDR (remember FDR? We last saw him in Casablanca) secured Churchill’s reluctant assent to a vicious scheme to indefinitely “pastoralize” Europe’s former industrial powerhouse, Germany. News of this plot, well seized-upon by Germany’s ever-vigilant propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels, was credited with the most-unwelcome (and surprising) ferocity of German troops opposing the eastward advance of the Allies from France in the Battle of the Bulge. A bitter joke became popular in Germany toward the end that went, “Enjoy the war. The peace will be even worse.” The conditions of the Unconditional Surrender were becoming apparent to the Germans, who in fact hardly imagined the privations and atrocities that would be visited upon them by the victorious Allies, to the everlasting shame of the latter.

As we search in the detritus of history for the causes, the “beginnings” of various developments apparent in the light of retrospection (and the unopposable declarations of the victors), it is obviously essential to carefully specify the nature and magnitude of the developments whose genesis is sought. Most “Holocaust” “history,” of course, fails miserably at this indispensable launching point.

If that failing be rigorously and honestly corrected, however, the ordinary analysis itself can, and will, undergo profound alteration from the one posited on the basis of allegations of phenomenal German racism and genocidal intent.

In fact, properly viewing the tragedies of the Holocaust as part of the paroxysms of death of a proud, vigorous, and terrified race shifts the bulk of the blame from them onto the heads of their vengeful, zealous malefactors.

Casablanca. 1943. The Big Three. They didn’t start the war, nor the Holocaust. But they brought on the greatest part of both.

---

Notes:

1	Mary Louise Roberts, What Soldiers Do (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2013).
2	The 1943 Bengal Famine, which killed 3 million British colonial subjects, was at least partly the consequence of decisions made by Great Britain to prosecute its wars of the time against the Axis.
3	John Dietrich, The Morgenthau Plan (New York: Algora Publishing, 2013).

Origins of the Japanese-American War

by Kerry R. Bolton

A Conflict of Free Trade vs. Autarchy

One important, but often overlooked element of the causes of the Second World War is economics. In fact, it may be said that World War II was a conflict between two systems of economy: free trade, or what is today called globalization, and autarchy, or the economic self-sufficiency of states or more commonly trading blocs, including empires.

As noted in my article “The Myth of the Big Business-Nazi Axis,” even Reich finance minister Schacht, a mole within the Third Reich in the service of the world banking cabal, commented that antagonism towards Germany was significantly prompted by Germany’s autarchic economic policy, with a trade policy based on barter. The Bank of International Settlements at the time was noting that this autarchic system of trade was becoming a world trend.<sup>1</sup>

Japan, Italy and Germany all followed similar banking, economic and trade policies. The Bank of Japan was reorganized as a state bank in 1932, although since its founding in 1882 the Imperial House had been the major shareholder. The Bank of Japan Law was modeled on the 1939 Reichsbank Act. Japan experienced extraordinary economic growth.<sup>2</sup>

These states, which became known as the Axis, formed an Anticomintern Pact aimed at Communism and the USSR. Far more historically significant, especially in terms of the reasons for the war against the Axis, however, was that these states and their allies represented much more than anti-Bolshevism; they were an Axis against usury.

While the democracies stagnated, and Roosevelt’s much-touted New Deal was unsuccessful until the stimulus of war production, the Axis states, and indeed a few democracies such as Sweden and New Zealand that had also utilized state credit at least to some extent prospered, while much of the rest of the world was stagnating at best. Underdeveloped states from Europe to South America, began entering into mutually beneficial bilateral trade agreements with Germany outside of the international banking system. Pretexts for war were required against the Axis states, like the pretexts that have been used in our own era against Milosevic’s Serbia, Saddam’s Iraq and others, that have similarly in some manner gotten in the way of the international economic system. With Germany the issue was a territorial dispute with Poland; with Japan, one with China.

Sino-Japanese Conflict since the 19th Century

The history of Sino-Japanese antagonism is of long duration, and historically the allegation of Japan’s sole war guilt is unjustified. Japan found herself in the same predicament from the 1930s as today’s states that obstruct what is now called “globalization.” The consequences were similar: first, demonization and moral outrage in world forums; second, economic embargoes; and third, war, culminating in the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

The First Sino-Japanese War goes back to 1894-95, over the position of Korea. This shows that the Japanese interest in Korea was by no means a simplistic, unjustified question of territorial expansionism. Japan’s interest was not so much to enslave Korea as to ensure, to the contrary, that Korea was not going to be annexed by China.

As a matter of geopolitical strategy, the foreign-policy adviser to the Imperial Japanese Army General Staff, Major Klemens Meckel, warned that Korea was “a dagger pointed at the heart of Japan.”<sup>3</sup> The Chinese emperor traditionally held the view that he was the center of the world and all others derived their power from him. China’s relations with neighboring states were based on their tribute to the Emperor. The incursion of British and other western powers from the mid-19th century undermined that outlook, as the Chinese emperor was obliged to accept a number of treaties opening China up to foreign trade. This resulted in the annexation by imperial powers of formerly Chinese tributaries such as Vietnam (France), Nepal and Upper Burma (Britain), and parts of Siberia (Russia). Japan was belatedly following a path in foreign policy that had already been taken by western powers and one that had for centuries previously been followed by China.

Korea was rich in coal and iron ore and had a good agricultural base. After conflicts with Korean isolationists, the Japan-Korea Treaty of 1876 was imposed, but this was part of a process that again involved the western powers, as they too sought to open Korea up to trade, after the accession of Queen Min, who abruptly closed Korea off from outside influences. There had during the 1860s already been conflict between Korea and France, which had occupied Ganghwa Island in 1866, and the USA in 1871. When a small boat launched from the Scottish-built Japanese gunboat Un'yō Maru,<sup>4</sup> was fired upon from the Korean fortress, the Un'yō Maru effectively responded.

In 1882 an uprising took place in which Japanese military instructors, diplomats, policemen and students were killed and the legation was attacked. Japan intervened. The Donghak Peasant Revolt took place in 1894, resulting in the Korean government asking for Chinese assistance. In response, Japan landed 6,000 troops in Incheon, Korea to confront Chinese troops, resulting in the first Sino-Japanese War. This obliged China to end its suzerainty over Korea under the Treaty of Shimonoseki. The Treaty also gave Japan control over the Penghu Islands, Taiwan, and part of Liaodong Peninsula, and opened up Shashih, Chungking, Soochow, and Hangchow in China to Japan. Japan stated in her declaration of war on China over the Korea issue:

Korea is an independent State. She was first introduced into the family of nations by the advice and guidance of Japan. It has, however, been China's habit to designate Korea as her dependency, and both openly and secretly to interfere with her domestic affairs. At the time of the recent insurrection in Korea, China dispatched troops thither, alleging that her purpose was to afford a succor to her dependent State. We, in virtue of the treaty concluded with Korea in 1882, and looking to possible emergencies, caused a military force to be sent to that country.

Wishing to procure for Korea freedom from the calamity of perpetual disturbance, and thereby to maintain the peace of the East in general, Japan invited China's co-operation for the accomplishment of the object. But China, advancing various pretexts, declined Japan's proposal. Thereupon Japan advised Korea to reform her administration so that order and tranquility might be preserved at home, and so that the country might be able to discharge the responsibilities and duties of an independent State abroad. Korea has already consented to undertake the task. But China has secretly and insidiously endeavored to circumvent and to thwart Japan's purpose. She has further procrastinated and endeavored to make warlike preparations both on land and at sea. When those preparations were completed she not only sent large reinforcements to Korea, with a view to the forcible attainment of her ambitious designs, but even carried her arbitrariness and insolence to the extent of opening fire upon our ships in Korean waters. China's plain object is to make it uncertain where the responsibility resides of preserving peace and order in Korea, and not only to weaken the position of that state in the family of nations—a position obtained for Korea through Japan's efforts—but also to obscure the significance of the treaties recognizing and confirming that position. Such conduct on the part of China is not only a direct injury to the rights and interests of this Empire, but also a menace to the permanent peace and tranquility of the Orient. Judging from her actions it must be concluded that China from the beginning has been bent upon sacrificing peace to the attainment of her sinister object. In this situation, ardent as our wish is to promote the prestige of the country abroad by strictly peaceful methods, we find it impossible to avoid a formal declaration of war against China. It is our earnest wish that, by the loyalty and valor of our faithful subjects, peace may soon be permanently restored and the glory of the Empire be augmented and completed.<sup>5</sup>

China, for its part, responded that Korea had for centuries been a tributary state of China, and China would undertake whatever action was necessary in putting down what it said were frequent insurrections.<sup>6</sup> As can be deduced, not much has changed in regard to China's high-handed attitude towards its neighbors; in particular its territorial demands on India, Vietnam, Japan, the Philippines and others.

Since the mid-19th century, Japan herself was also subjected to encroachments by the western powers, including the USA. Japan asserted her own self-determination by eliminating Chinese domination. The Korean Peninsula and Mainland China were Japan's means for self-determination at a time when the imperial interests of the western powers spread over the globe.

Japanese soldiers stand beside a loaded horse during the Russo-Japanese war in 1904 or 1905. Public domain, via Wikimedia Commons

Russia and the “Triple Intervention”

The western powers already saw Japan’s rise in the region as a threat and demanded that Japan withdraw its claim over Liaodong Peninsula because it included Lüshun Port (Port Arthur), where both Germany and Russia had ambitions. Japan duly withdrew its claim in November 1895. Russia soon moved in and started construction of a railway from Harbin to Port Arthur, despite the protests of China. Germany, France and Britain extended their interests in China. This was the so-called “Triple Intervention,” which had a major role in determining Japan’s future course, as the western powers had shown that military intervention was the primary means of securing their interests. In particular, Japan regarded the Russian presence in Manchuria as an incursion into her sphere of influence. In 1898 Russia had also acquired concessions in Korea in forestry and mining near the Yalu and Tumen rivers.

The Russo-Japanese War of 1904-1905 followed Russia’s refusal to recognize Japan’s sphere of interests over Korea in exchange for Japan’s recognition of Russia’s interests in Manchuria. Japan attacked Port Arthur as a consequence of failed negotiations. The Japanese victory resulted in Russia’s departure from Manchuria, the signing of its leasehold of Port Arthur over to Japan, and the ceding of the southern half of Sakhalin Island.<sup>7</sup> There was widespread discontent in Japan in the belief that the peace terms had not gained enough relative to the sacrifices; in particular, settling for half of Sakhalin Island, due to U.S. pressure.

In 1910, Japan annexed the Kingdom of Korea, which had been a Japanese protectorate since 1905, in accordance with international law, and supported by Britain, an ally of Japan’s through the Anglo-Japanese Alliance of 1902. Korea had been under Chinese control until the Japan-Korea Treaty of 1876 displaced China. The Second World War resulted in the Japanese drawing on Korea for labor. By 1939, nearly a million Koreans were already living in Japan. By 1945, there were about two million Koreans in Japan. Many chose to remain in Japan after the war.<sup>8</sup>

China and the USA

With the outbreak of the First World War, Japan attempted to consolidate her position in Manchuria. From this early period, the USA considered a Japanese influence in China to be detrimental to U.S. interests. Edward T. Williams, American chargé d’affaires in Peking, in a letter to the U.S. Secretary of State William Jennings Bryan, stated that since the USA was not, at that time, embroiled in the war in Europe, it was the only power able to resist Japanese influences in China, although Japan was fighting with the Allies against Germany, while the USA was not, and indeed had been asked by Britain to take action against German interests in China.<sup>9</sup>

The USA from the start wished to limit Japan’s actions against Germany in China<sup>10</sup> so as to curtail Japanese influence during the post-war era. That is to say, the USA aimed to keep Japan out of China, fearing for its own commercial interests. While U.S. Secretary of State Robert Lansing argued that the USA should recognize that Japan had special interests in China, President Wilson and Bryan were intransigent.<sup>11</sup> The primary objection to Japanese negotiations with China was the Japanese insistence that China accept Japanese advisers and buy Japanese munitions. The USA sought, like Britain during the negotiations between Germany and Poland in 1939, to interfere; and as in Europe in 1939 regarding negotiations between Poland and Germany, the interference of the USA led to a suddenly intransigent attitude by China towards Japan. For her part, Japan was suspicious that the USA would establish a naval presence at Fukien, near Formosa (Taiwan), citing a suggestion in 1900 by U.S. Secretary of State John Hays that the USA develop a harbor at Fukien, and again the more recent negotiations between China and the Bethlehem Steel Company for such a harbor.

There was indeed a close relationship between Bethlehem Steel and the U.S. Navy, and between the corporation and U.S. economic expansion. In 1911, China and Bethlehem Steel concluded a contract that involved U.S. Navy personnel and logistics for the expansion of the Chinese navy, which included the building of warships, the “neutralization” of the Manchurian railways, and the control of China’s finances and economy by U.S. banking interests and loans.<sup>12</sup> Clearly, from the early 20th century, the USA and major industrial and banking interests aimed to secure de facto control of China. The USA’s condemnation of Japan for asserting her interests in China was just rhetoric of the type that continues to be the basis of the USA’s justification for wars around the world.

With the entry of the USA into the European war in 1917, its demands on Japan became impotent; China accepted most of the conditions of the Japanese, and the USA recognized Japan’s “special interests” in China.

President Woodrow S. Wilson’s globalist manifesto, the “Fourteen Points” for the reorganization of the post-war world, was predicated, like the “Atlantic Charter” of Franklin D. Roosevelt during World War II, on international free trade; and free trade was, as the “Atlantic Charter” states, a major war aim against the Axis.

Woodrow Wilson's image on a $100,000 bill circa 1934. Public domain, via Wikimedia Commons

The world wars, from the U.S. viewpoint, were fought to make the world safe for free trade. Empires were passé. Free trade had functioned from the mid-19th century, between the Empires, on the concept of the “open door” policy, which was supposed to divide “fair shares” of commercial interests among the colonial powers (including the USA), over China, Japan, Korea and other Asian states. The latecomers in the 19th-century colonial scramble were Japan, Italy, and Germany.. Since being opened up to the world by the USA from the mid-19th century, Japan sought to look after her own interests in Asia.

The colonial powers, including the USA and in particular Britain, had been willing to accept a role for Japan, when she had participated in suppressing the 1899-1901 Boxer Rebellion against foreign interests in China. At that event, the colonial powers invaded China without compunction, to assert their commercial interests. The subsequent slandering of Japan, or any other Axis state, in regard to “wars of aggression,” is therefore nothing other than a moral façade in the pursuit of political objectives. Japan was a late entrant into the colonial scramble, and was confronting other imperial interests that attempted to keep her out.

Autarchy

What was different about the imperialism of Japan, and indeed of the other main Axis states, Germany and Italy, was that each developed a new conception of “empire.” They rejected the “free trade” policies that the USA and England sought to impose upon the world, then called the “open door” policy; today called “globalization.”<sup>13</sup> President Woodrow Wilson aimed to impose a new world order via the League of Nations, and the predicate was to be free trade;<sup>14</sup> that is, the same war aims of the USA and its allies today. Point 3 of the Wilsonian manifesto reads:

The removal, so far as possible, of all economic barriers and the establishment of an equality of trade conditions among all the nations consenting to the peace and associating themselves for its maintenance.<sup>15</sup>

Further, the former concept of “empire” would be eliminated:

A free, open-minded, and absolutely impartial adjustment of all colonial claims, based upon a strict observance of the principle that in determining all such questions of sovereignty the interests of the populations concerned must have equal weight with the equitable claims of the government whose title is to be determined.<sup>16</sup>

The rhetoric should be familiar today in regard to that used by the USA to impose its global hegemony in the name of “freedom.” The “Atlantic Charter” of 1941, laying down conditions for the post-war world at a time when the USA was not even one of the belligerent states, was much the same as the “Fourteen Points,” as will be seen.

The Axis states, including Japan, developed quite another view of empire, which was one of autarchy, or self-sufficient trading blocs, as distinct from the “open door” of the 19th century or the Wilsonian internationalism of the 20th. The self-sufficiency of these new blocs was based on state regulation and control of the economy, including trade, prices and banking.

The corporatist structure of the economy starting from the 1930s, subordinated private interests to national interests. Morck and Nakamura describe the corporate restructuring of the Japanese economy, stating that the Kikakuin, or Planning Agency, was established in 1937. This subjected business decisions to state approval, and subsequently set dividends and appointed managers.<sup>17</sup> It was hence similar to the system in Germany where dividends were limited to 6% after which they had to be reinvested, and where managers were subjected to state approval and regulation.<sup>18</sup> In 1940 the State Planning Ministry stated in its “Outline of the Establishment of a New Economic System,” that firms would be “set free from the control of shareholders,” and would produce according to state requirements conveyed through Industry Control Boards, or Toseikai. Banks were also brought under the control of the Toseikai.<sup>19</sup>

Following the decade of the 1920s, where there were serious problems with the Japanese banking sector, Japan left the gold standard in December 1937, and embarked on a vast public works program, which stimulated the economy. This was financed by state bonds sold to private banks through the Bank of Japan.<sup>20</sup> Again the system was similar to that of Germany and Italy. State banks, such as the Industrial Bank of Japan, also became the primary shareholders in many industries.

Bilateral trade was established within what became the Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere, wherein “Japan was dependent on its colonies for supplies of food and raw materials. In return Japan exported manufactured products to them.”<sup>21</sup> Such a system was operating successfully also under German leadership, from Europe to South America.

Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere

The Japanese concept of imperial autarchy was the “Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere.” There continues to be much nonsense written and spoken about this, such as the ongoing gratitude of Australians and New Zealanders towards the USA that “saved us” from working in rice paddies and speaking Japanese under Nippon slave-masters.

It is erroneous to assume that the Japanese wartime government spoke with one mind as to war aims. These aims also changed with the contingencies of war. However, several Japanese think tanks assumed the task of devising blueprints for the Asian bloc that Japan sought. The creation of this bloc included not only the exclusion of the USA and European colonial powers from Asia, but the granting of independence to Asian states within this bloc. In November 1943, Tokyo hosted the Greater East Asia Conference, where approximately fifty nationalist leaders from throughout Southeast Asia were invited to attend.

Among these were Subhas Chandra Bose, head of the Free Indian Provisional Government, who remains a hero of Indian independence; Dr. Ba Maw of the Sinyetha Party, Burma; Wang Ch'ing-wei, head of the administration in Nanking, China; and President José Laurel of the Philippines, expressing their appreciation for Japanese support.<sup>22</sup>

1943 also marked a determination by Japan to form national armies. The training of these, and in particular, the officer corps, provided the basis for the militaries of states throughout post-colonial Southeast Asia. The most significant of these armies were the Indian National Army, the Burma Independence Army, and Peta in Java.<sup>23</sup>

While there remains much moralizing about “collaborators,” one might also question the motives of those who “collaborated” with the Allies, such as the murderous partisans in France, Greece, Yugoslavia and elsewhere; Dr. Joyce Lebra, a specialist on the subject, writes:

The stigma to those who collaborated was in part engendered by returning Western colonial powers. The ambivalence of the position of those who opted to remain in their Japanese-occupied homelands was generally acknowledged with empathy both by those nationalists who left and those who remained. There was no universal stigma of collaboration in the eyes of most Southeast Asians. Many who held office under Japanese occupation have on the contrary been hailed as heroes by their compatriots. Subhas Chandra Bose, Aung San, Ne Win, Sukarno and Suharto have been acclaimed as real patriots and revolutionaries against Western rule.<sup>24</sup>

Limited Sphere

The extent of the projected Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere was limited. It did not include India, which was regarded as impossible to occupy and govern, despite the encouragement given to the independence movement. The Asian new order was only intended to reach as far as the Indo-Burma border, including only a portion of Burma,<sup>25</sup> although many policy analysts and military leaders assumed that Burma would be included. On July 26, 1940, a joint Army-Navy policy document was issued, “Outline of the Policy to Cope with the World Situation.” This envisaged “a self-sufficient economic structure based on a nucleus composed of Japan, Manchukuo [Manchuria] and China, with the incorporation of the Southern Area east of India, and north of Australia and New Zealand.”<sup>26</sup>

That Japan’s intentions for the “Co-Prosperity Sphere” were limited, and that there was a genuine intention of granting independence to states within the bloc is indicated by Japan’s policy towards Burma. There was a consensus among the high command that the occupation of Burma should be limited, and based on strategic considerations in regard to Britain and China, the latter in order to maintain a blockade. A War Ministry policy review in 1941 recommended “only limited occupation of part of southern Burma initially, and later capture of strategic positions as the war situation required.”<sup>27</sup> In February 1942, the month following the Japanese invasion of Burma, the Total War Research Institute issued a report entitled “Establishment of East Asia; Maneuvers for the First Period of Total War,” stating:

Strict military administration will be established in Burma as it is expected to be adjacent to the front for quite a long period. However, the existence of the Burmese’ own administrative organ will be recognized and this under our guidance will become the nucleus of an independent government in the future.<sup>28</sup>

The report indicates that the Japanese intention of granting independence to the colonies of the European empires in East Asia was more than propaganda rhetoric. The Japanese army was under orders to cultivate trust among the Burmese to avoid premature demands for independence while the war continued.<sup>29</sup>

The Japanese government-issued rupee in Burma, part of the Japanese invasion money of World War II, was issued between 1942 and 1945 by the occupying Japanese.

National Numismatic Collection, National Museum of American History [Public domain or CC BY-SA 4.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/4.0>)], via Wikimedia Commons

When Japan ousted the Dutch from Indonesia in 1942, there was considerable enthusiasm among the Indonesians, and the nationalist leaders Sukarno and Hatta were released from prison. Sukarno, Hatta, and other nationalists staffed the “Research Institute,” established to advise the Japanese administration in Indonesia. The intentions of the institute were largely to convey the views of Indonesians to the administration.<sup>30</sup> The contingencies of war, however, necessitated restrictions on independent political activity.

The policy pursued by General Imamura Hitoshi, commander of the 16th Army that occupied Java, adhered to the “Guidelines for Occupied Areas,” that required the customs and traditions of native inhabitants to be recognized. Imamura won the respect of the Javanese as a result, and that of other Japanese commanders, despite the resistance of some younger staff subordinates. Imamura’s policy was closely examined by Tokyo, and won approval. Imamura was later transferred to the 8th Area Army, which was a considerably larger area of jurisdiction. General Muto Akira, Chief of Military Affairs, when sent to Sumatra to assume control, stated that he would pursue the policy that had been enacted by Imamura in Java.<sup>31</sup>

If the policies pursued by the military were inconsistent it was due to the lack of unity of aims between the Army and Navy and among the service commanders, as well as to the vicissitudes of the war. What seems reasonable to conclude, however, is that the Japanese policy was far from being uniformly brutal and repressive, as wartime and post-war propaganda insists.

Pearl Harbor

Such was the isolationist sentiment among the American people<sup>32</sup> that the only way President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his pro-war cabal were able to bring the USA into the war against the Axis was to provoke Japan into attacking Pearl Harbor. He pursued a belligerent policy for years, culminating in an ultimatum. There have been several theories as to the Pearl Harbor attack and whether or not the Roosevelt Administration had advance warning. The theory that Roosevelt provoked the attack was maintained by many including the president’s son-in-law, Colonel Curtis B. Dall, who wrote as an inside observer on the events around his father-in-law:

The “pie” was in the sky, for sure, and the crusts of dereliction of duty manifestly in Washington. By dint of the devious maneuvering of some leading American and British politicians and others, the “pie” was rained down from the sky directly upon the unsuspecting heads of thousands of our loyal, unalerted American troops at Pearl Harbor one December morning. Over 3,800 of them died. What treason!

Fixed in my mind forever is the bizarre picture of General George Marshall reportedly riding his horse in the sunny Virginia countryside on that fateful Sunday morning. His slothful warning messages, sent over slow channels, were merely ghastly gesture, timed to arrive after the “surprise” attack, as a face-saving device.

I have often wondered if, as part of a long-range plan, FDR deliberately ignored the possibility and danger of an attack on Pearl Harbor by the approaching massive Japanese Task Force, an attack made on us almost by engraved invitation. He must have!<sup>33</sup>

The situation was later explained to Dall when in 1967 he visited Admiral Husband E. Kimmel, naval commander at Pearl Harbor at the time of the Japanese assault. Kimmel had been unscrupulously scapegoated for the unpreparedness of Pearl Harbor for the Japanese attack. Had the American forces been alerted to the Japanese attack, which was known well in advance in Washington due to the breaking of the Japanese naval code, the Japanese Task Force was under orders from Tokyo to abort the mission.<sup>34</sup> While General George C. Marshall later claimed to be horseriding in Virginia, he was in Washington with General Short, receiving messages of imminent attack. He rejected any suggestion from Short that Pearl Harbor should be notified, saying that he would “wire Kimmel later.” The wire that was sent was conveyed via Western Union commercial wire and did not indicate need for concern, arriving two hours after the attack.<sup>35</sup>

Franklin D. Roosevelt and smiling staff after signing the declaration of war with Japan on 8 December 1941. By National Park Service [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

U.S. Ultimatum and Japan’s Reply

What is of particular interest is that the ultimatum handed by U.S. Secretary of State Cordell Hull to the Japanese Ambassador to Washington, was, like the previous “Fourteen Points” of President Woodrow Wilson, and the 1941 “Atlantic Charter” of President Roosevelt, again based around the demand that international free trade must be the basis of the world economy. Nations should not have the right to impose trade restrictions or pursue an autarchic economic policy. The Hull memorandum demanded in this regard:

The Government of Japan and the Government of the United States have agreed that toward eliminating chronic political instability, preventing recurrent economic collapse, and providing a basis for peace, they will actively support and practically apply the following principles in their economic relations with each other and with other nations and peoples:

The principle of non-discrimination in international commercial relations.

The principle of international economic cooperation and abolition of extreme nationalism as expressed in excessive trade restrictions.

The principle of non-discriminatory access by all nations to raw material supplies.

The principle of full protection of the interests of consuming countries and populations as regards the operation of international commodity agreements.

The principle of establishment of such institutions and arrangements of international finance as may lend aid to the essential enterprises and the continuous development of all countries and may permit payments through processes of trade consonant with the welfare of all countries.<sup>36</sup>

The proposals were intended to impose an international economic and financial order that benefited the developed states (that is, “the consuming countries”), ensured the exploitation of raw materials by the “consuming countries” by imposing what is today called “globalization,” and ensuring that this economic globalization of the exploited states was funded via debt-finance. Doctrinally, the U.S. memorandum was the antithesis of the policies of Japan, Germany and Italy. It was intended to ensure the domination of oligarchic and plutocratic methods of banking and trade.

Section II of the Hull memorandum returns to the question of economic relations, vis-à-vis dealing with China, Japan and the European colonies; particularly French Indochina:

Such agreement would provide also that each of the Governments party to the agreement would not seek or accept preferential treatment in its trade or economic relations with Indochina and would use its influence to obtain for each of the signatories equality of treatment in trade and commerce with French Indochina.<sup>37</sup>

The preoccupation of the Hull memorandum is with free trade. To ensure that diplomatic negotiations would not continue and that the only option was for war, the Hull memorandum next demanded that Japan withdraw from Manchuria and acquiesce to the Kuomintang Government:

The Government of Japan will withdraw all military, naval, air and police forces from China and from Indochina.

The Government of the United States and the Government of Japan will not support—militarily, politically, economically—any government or regime in China other than the National Government of the Republic of China with capital temporarily at Chungking.<sup>38</sup>

In regard to the reference to Indochina by the Hull memorandum, Japan had been invited to share in the joint defense of Indochina by the French Government.<sup>39</sup> The USA was not then at war with the Axis, and it was high-handed for the USA to demand that Japan withdraw from Indochina. Japanese strategic interests in the war with China required a Japanese presence.

The Japanese reply to the Hull memorandum was handed to him by Japanese representatives in Washington on December 7, 1941. Referring to the freezing of Japanese assets by the USA, Britain, and The Netherlands, the Japanese described this “manifesting thus an obviously hostile attitude,” and that “these countries have strengthened their military preparations perfecting an encirclement of Japan, and have brought about a situation which endangers the very existence of the Empire.”<sup>40</sup>

The Japanese Government had in September made several recommendations at conciliation and compromise in regard to proposals and counterproposals, which were met by the USA with intransigence.<sup>41</sup> On November 20, the Japanese had submitted a five-point proposal whereby Japan would withdraw from Indochina once the situation in China had become peaceful, and in the interim was prepared to remove troops from southern Indochina. In return, the USA was asked to refrain from interfering in a peaceful settlement between China and Japan and to restore commercial relations; in particular the resumption of oil imports.<sup>42</sup> Japan was willing to accept an offer of the USA as intermediary between China and Japan, but had asked the USA to refrain from interfering once those negotiations were being undertaken. However:

The American Government not only rejected the above-mentioned new proposal, but made known its intention to continue its aid to Chiang Kai-shek; and in spite of its suggestion mentioned above, withdrew the offer of the President to act as so-called “introducer” of peace between Japan and China, pleading that time was not yet ripe for it. Finally on November 26th, in an attempt to impose upon the Japanese Government those principles it has persistently maintained, the American Government made a proposal totally ignoring Japanese claims, which is a source of profound regret to the Japanese Government.<sup>43</sup>

Despite Hull’s tantrum in the presence of the Japanese diplomats, and his claim that the Japanese response was replete with lies, enough is now known of U.S. diplomacy to conclude that the Roosevelt Administration was hell-bent on war, and Pearl Harbor provided the needed pretext.<sup>44</sup> British Prime Minister Winston Churchill commented to this effect in the House of Commons in 1942, stating that Roosevelt had promised to enter the war in the Far East even if the USA was not attacked.<sup>45</sup> Churchill had stated to his cabinet on August 19, 1942 that Roosevelt had told him, “he would wage war but not declare it, and that he would become more and more provocative.” Roosevelt stated to Churchill that he would look for a “naval incident” to bring the USA into the war.<sup>46</sup>

The “Japanese Note” in reply to the Hull memorandum aptly described the USA’s use of rhetoric and economic pressures to impose its will upon the world; something which is by now patently obvious to much of the world. Economic warfare had been launched on Japan by the USA.

Niall Ferguson writes that U.S. policy makers believed that such would be the economic pressure on Japan that war would be unnecessary. Approximately a third of Japan’s imports came from the USA, including cotton, scrap iron and oil. “Her dependence on American heavy machinery and machine tools was greater still. Even if the Americans did not intervene militarily, they had the option to choke the Japanese war machine to death, especially if they cut off oil exports.” “The path to war in the Pacific was paved with economic sanctions. The Japanese-American Commercial Treaty of 1911 was abrogated in July 1939.” The embargo on the export of aluminum, molybdenum, nickel, tungsten and vanadium in 1940 was intended to halt Japanese airplane production. The State Department pressured U.S. firms to stop exporting technology for the manufacture of aviation fuel. When the National Defense Act was passed in July 1940 the prohibition of the export of strategic commodities and manufactures was total. By the end of July a ban had been placed on the export of high-grade scrap iron and steel, aviation fuel, lubricating oil and the fuel blending agent tetraethyl lead. This ban was extended over the next few months to all scrap, iron and steel. In July 1941, all Japanese assets in the USA were frozen.<sup>47</sup>

The Japanese pointed to what will today be easily recognizable as the U.S. modus operandi in foreign relations:

Whereas the American Government, under the principles it rigidly upholds, objects to settle international issues through military pressure, it is exercising in conjunction with Great Britain and other nations pressure by economic power. Recourse to such pressure as a means of dealing with international relations should be condemned as it is at times more inhumane than military pressure.<sup>48</sup>

The “Japanese Note” next pointed out that the USA and other European colonial powers merely wanted to maintain their colonial position in the Far East, and opposed the Japanese-led initiative for an autarchic East Asian bloc. Such an entity would pose a threat not against peace and freedom per se, but against the freedom of plutocracy:

It is impossible not to reach the conclusion that the American Government desires to maintain and strengthen, in coalition with Great Britain and other Powers, its dominant position it has hitherto occupied not only in China but in other areas of East Asia. It is a fact of history that the countries of East Asia for the past two hundred years or more have been compelled to observe the status quo under the Anglo-American policy of imperialistic exploitation and to sacrifice themselves to the prosperity of the two nations. The Japanese Government cannot tolerate the perpetuation of such a situation since it directly runs counter to Japan’s fundamental policy to enable all nations to enjoy each its proper place in the world.49

...Obviously it is the intention of the American Government to conspire with Great Britain and other countries to obstruct Japan's effort toward the establishment of peace through the creation of a new order in East Asia, and especially to preserve Anglo-American rights and interests by keeping Japan and China at war. This intention has been revealed clearly during the course of the present negotiation.50

The "Japanese Note" concluded by stating that further negotiations with the USA would be futile insofar as the USA was uncompromising in demanding Japanese withdrawal from China and French Indochina.

Atlantic Charter

Just how factual the Japanese analysis of American intentions was can be gauged by the principles of the "Atlantic Charter," a statement of common objectives imposed by the USA on Britain to reorganize the post-war world before the USA had even entered the war. Point Four of the "Charter" states that Great Britain and the USA "will endeavor, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all States, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity." The Third Point states, "they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them."51

"The Atlantic Charter" amounts to a declaration of war against the Axis by the USA four months prior to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, and to a declaration of common war aims between the USA and Great Britain. The USA made it plain that the post-war world would be one of U.S. hegemony, and that empires, whether Japanese, British, Italian, Dutch, German or French, would be replaced by a global economic and financial system. President Roosevelt's son, Elliott, records that his father stated to Churchill:

Of course after the war, one of the preconditions of any lasting peace will have to be the greatest possible freedom of trade. No artificial barriers...52 Roosevelt stated that imperial trade agreements would have to go, and remarked that the Third Reich's incursion into European trade had been a major cause of the war. Churchill the impotent "war horse" spoke in despair, "Mr. President, I believe you are trying to do away with the British Empire. Every idea you entertain about the structure of the post-war world demonstrates it."53

Toshihiro Okubo states of the war aims that were finalized in the aftermath of the world war:

Before the end of World War II the Allied powers had sought to create a new world order. Consequently, the United Nations was founded and the Bretton Woods Agreements (1944) created along with the IMF and IBRD and GATT was signed by 23 countries in 1948 with the aim of preventing the creation of bloc economies and liberalising international trade.54

The indebted and war-worn European empires were in no condition to resist U.S. demands after 1945. European colonialism was largely replaced by U.S. based financial interests, especially in Africa. However, in Southeast Asia, where the Japanese had occupied, they had established the political and military nuclei for independence. Comecon was the response of the Soviet states to this "new world order" of globalization, aiming to create an autarchic bloc in which barter again assumed a role, and the blandishments of the Marshall Aid Program were resisted.

Conclusion

Lebra writes of the lasting Japanese impact upon Southeast Asia:

[T]he Japanese selected for special education and training especially in Burma and Indonesia segments of potential leadership which had been excluded by Western colonial regimes. In Burma, for example, political leaders imprisoned by the British, including Ne Win and Ba Maw, were released... By shunning groups which had served under the British and encouraging groups which had not, the Japanese occupation injected potent forces for social, change into the Burmese political and military scene. Similar policies in Java and Sumatra dictated choosing nationalist leaders who had been imprisoned or ignored by the Dutch. ...55

These armies became the basis for the armies of newly independent Southeast Asian states, and Japanese staff-officer training remained the basis of the military systems. Guerrilla warfare was an innovative tactic introduced by the Japanese, which served the anti-colonialists resistance movements.<sup>56</sup> After the war, up to 1,000 Japanese soldiers remained in Indonesia to help fight the Dutch. The fighting élan of the Japanese was also inculcated into the Southeast Asians, based on seishin, or a fighting spirit regardless of the odds, self-discipline and self-reliance.<sup>57</sup> This élan was looked for above all other traits when the Japanese were recruiting among the native populations.<sup>58</sup>

Japan's dream was for an autarchic East Asia bloc, and "Asia for the Asians." Her ambitions were limited to that extent, in contrast to the world-conquering ambitions of the USA and the unlimited horizons set across the world for the British Empire, or to the Communist aim of world conquest. Such trading blocs are now the norm of globalization, yet the crucial difference is that the Axis states aimed for autarchic blocs that also had cultural and even spiritual predicates. The economic blocs today are for the purpose of establishing "free-trade regions," as constituents of a global economic system. Hence, the "Pacific Rim" economic bloc that is sought by globalist interests and promoted by globalist think tanks such as The Asia Society and The Trilateral Commission must be based on free trade with the USA at the helm. The Trans-Pacific Partnership creates a bloc based on "free trade" and U.S. corporate dominance.

The globalists seek to incorporate Japan into this Asia-Pacific bloc by re-establishing the 19th-century free-trade policy of the "open door" that had been rejected after the Second World War throughout Southeast Asia and India. The economic norm has been the successful corporatist model that had been maintained by Japan both before and after the war, establishing the self-sufficient economic powerhouses of East Asia that had succeeded by rejecting free-market economics. The independent states of East Asia owe much of their post-war sovereignty, economic organization, prosperity, and political and military administrations to their Japanese experience. Even the CIA World Factbook acknowledged this, when referring to Korea's economic development:

In some respects, South Korean patterns of development after the early 1960s closely followed the methodology introduced by the Japanese fifty years earlier—industrialization from above using a strong bureaucracy that formulated and implemented economic policies. Many of the developments that took place in Chosen, the Japanese name for Korea during the period of colonization, had also occurred in pre-World War II Japan; they were implementation of a strong education system and the spread of literacy; the rise of a strong, authoritarian government that combined civilian and military administration to govern the state with strict discipline; the fostering and implementation of comprehensive economic programs by the state through its control of the huge national bureaucracy; the close collaboration between government and business leaders; and the development of industries by the major Japanese zaibatsu (commercial conglomerates).<sup>59</sup>

Japan played a role in laying the foundation for the economic prosperity of South-east Asia, Australia, New Zealand and other states that believed they were perilously close to Japanese enslavement. These states ultimately exchanged bonds with the British motherland for bonds with Wall Street. It is only in recent years, with the enactment of the free trade agreement across the region, that the plutocracies are seeing their war aims come to fruition. The hitherto prosperous nations of South-east Asia, built up through self-reliance, have been pushed into the world economic order at the behest of remote plutocratic interests.

Notes:

1	K. R. Bolton, "The Myth of the Big Business-Nazi Axis," Inconvenient History , http://www.inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2015/volume_7/number_3/the_myth_of_the_big_business_nazi_axis.php
2	K. R. Bolton, The Banking Swindle (London: Black House Publishing, 2013), p.116.
3	P. Duus, The Rise of Modern Japan (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1976), p. 125.
4	Also the name of a Japanese escort carrier during World War II.
5	"Imperial Proclamation of War, Given this first day of the eighth month of the 27th year of Meiji." See: The Russo-Japanese War Research Society, http://www.russojapanesewar.com/
6	"Chinese Proclamation of War," online: http://www.russojapanesewar.com/chin-proc-1894.htm
7	Article IX of the Treaty of Portsmouth, September 5, 1905.

8	Sonia Ryang, Koreans in Japan: Critical Voices from the Margin (London: Routledge, 2000).
9	Williams to Bryan, January 27, 1915, Arthur S. Link and Robert C. Hildebrand, eds., The Papers of Woodrow Wilson , (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1957), Vol. 32, pp. 136-137.
10	Lansing memorandum to Bryan, August 7, 1914, Papers Relating to the Foreign Policy of the United States: The Lansing Papers, 1914-1920 , (Washington: Government Printing Office, 1939-1940), Vol. 1, 2.
11	Lansing to Bryan, March 1, 1915, Lansing Papers , ibid. , Vol. 2, pp. 407-408.
12	William R. Braisted, "China, the United States Navy, and the Bethlehem Steel Company 1909-1929," The Business History Review , Harvard College, Vol. 42, No. 1, Spring 1968, p. 50.
13	While the imposition of "free trade" even by force of arms might seem a misnomer, what is referred to here is a doctrine based on the dismantling of a nation's currency, export and import controls, and other facets of a state's economy. A recent example of this is the Rambouillet Agreement, which the USA/NATO forced upon Serbia. Like the Fourteen Points and The Atlantic Charter, a demand of the "Agreement" states: Article (I) 1: "The economy of Kosovo shall function in accordance with free market principles."
14	Woodrow Wilson, "Fourteen Points," 1918, online: http://www.fordham.edu/halsall/mod/1918wilson.html
15	Ibid. , II.
16	Ibid. , V.
17	Professors Randall Morck of the University of Alberta School of Business, and Masao Nakamura of Sauder School of Business, University of British Columbia, in "Been There, Done That: The History of Corporate Ownership in Japan," 2nd draft, July, 2003, p. 2; http://cei.ier.hit-u.ac.jp/news/paper/Randall%20Morck.pdf
18	K. R. Bolton, "The Myth of the Big Business-Nazi Axis," op. cit.
19	Morck, op. cit. , p. 63.
20	Ibid. , p. 55.
21	Toshihiro Okubo, "Shake Hands, or Shake Apart? International Relationship of Japan with Global Blocs," Research Institute for Economics and Administration, Kobe University, January 2008, p. 7.
22	Joyce C. Lebra, Japanese-Trained Armies in Southeast Asia (Hong Kong: Heinemann Educational Books, 1977), p. 12.
23	Ibid. , p. 13.
24	Ibid. , p. 17.
25	Ibid. , p. 20.
26	Ibid. , p. 41.
27	Ibid.
28	Cited by Lebra, ibid. , p. 43.
29	Nobutaka Ike, Japan's Decision for War, Records of the 1941 Policy Conferences , p. 252; cited by Lebra, ibid. , p. 44.
30	Lebra, ibid. , p. 78.
31	Ibid. , pp. 80-82.
32	See the account of the America First movement and the campaign to keep the USA out of war by George T. Eggleston, Roosevelt, Churchill, and the World War II Opposition (Old Greenwich, Conn.: The Devin-Adair Co., 1979).
33	Curtis D. Dall, FDR: My Exploited Father-in-Law (Tulsa: Christian Crusade Publications, 1968), p. 133.

34	Kimmel to Dall, ibid. , p. 162.
35	Ibid. , p. 164.
36	“Outline of Proposed Basis for Agreement between the United States and Japan,” Section I, November 26, 1941.
37	Ibid. , Section II.
38	Ibid.
39	“Protocol Concerning Joint Defense and Joint Military Cooperation,” July 29, 1941.
40	“Japanese Note to the United States,” United States December 7, 1941, Point 2, U.S. Department of State Bulletin, Vol. V, No. 129, December 13, 1941.
41	Ibid. , Point 3.
42	Ibid.
43	Ibid.
44	See for example Harry Elmer Barnes, “Pearl Harbor after a Quarter of a Century” Left &amp; Right: A Journal of Libertarian Thought , Vol. IV, 1968; reprinted by Institute for Historical Review, Torrance, California, n.d., IHR Book No. 340.
45	Cited by John Charmley, Churchill’s Grand Alliance: The Anglo-American Special Relationship 1940-57 (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1995), p. 38.
46	Ibid. , pp. 38-39.
47	Niall Ferguson, The War of the World: Twentieth-Century Conflict and the Descent of the West (Penguin Books, 2006), pp. 487-488.
48	“Japanese Note to the United States,” op. cit. , Point 3.
49	Ibid. , Point 4.
50	Ibid. , Point 7.
51	Franklin D. Roosevelt, Winston S. Churchill, “The Atlantic Charter,” August 14, 1941.
52	Elliott Roosevelt, As He Saw It (New York: Duell, Sloan and Pearce, 1946), p. 35.
53	Ibid. , p. 31.
54	Toshihiro Okubo, op. cit. , p. 8.
55	Lebra, op. cit. , p. 168.
56	Ibid. , p. 169.
57	Ibid. , p. 170.
58	Ibid.
59	“Korea, South: The Japanese Role in Korea’s Economic Development,” The Library of Congress Country Studies; CIA World Factbook , June 1990.

Remembering Bradley R. Smith | CODOH

by Richard A. Widmann

On Thursday evening, 18 February 2016, I glanced at my email on my phone. The subject of a newly received message struck me like a lightning bolt. “Bradley RIP” was all it said. It wasn’t that it was entirely unexpected. Bradley had been ill for many years, fighting off heart ailments, cancer, and even a bullet to the head during the Korean War, but somehow it seemed that Bradley would always be among us.

I first became aware of Bradley in the late ‘80s. I had discovered him a couple of years after my introduction to Holocaust revisionism. I knew of him through his book, Confessions of a Holocaust Revisionist and the work that he did for the Institute for Historical Review.

It was in late 1993 that an editorial appeared in the college newspaper of the university that I was attending --denouncing Smith’s “Campus Project.” I decided to pick up a few copies, cut out the story, and mail one off to Bradley. It was the beginning of a friendship that lasted for more than 20 years.

We worked together (along with Greg Raven and David Thomas) to put up one of the earliest revisionist websites back in the mid-90s (we referred to it as CODOHWeb at the time). As unlikely as it seemed, Bradley was always very quick to embrace new technology. He was always looking for a new way to storm the “castle wall.”

Bradley R. Smith: A Simple Writer.

We would correspond back and forth nearly every day via email. And there were always those lively phone conversations. We could talk for hours it seemed. I remember asking Bradley questions about revisionism during those early years. He would tell me that he didn't read revisionism any more and would spout off the title of some esoteric topic that had captured his attention. This week I turned to a chapter in his A Personal History of Moral Decay and smiled when coming upon a reference to his reading a book about the Sumerian alphabet. That was Bradley!

It surprises me, even now, that I met Bradley "face-to-face" only on one occasion, when we shared a room at David Irving's first Real History Conference in Cincinnati back in 1999. It was a marvelous weekend with Bradley speaking on the subject of "Memory." While the supposed target of the talk were Holocaust "eyewitnesses," Bradley seemed challenged with his own memory. Was it an act? A writer's joke? I thought it all quite funny, but noticed that our host David Irving seemed not at all amused.

Bradley was always coming up with new ideas. There were new advertisements, new books, new designs for the website, new websites. Most of the ideas never settled before new ones sprang up. But still, work got done. More work was accomplished to establish intellectual freedom on the Holocaust story than most ever even imagine.

In late 2014, I attempted to interview Bradley. We didn't get very far.

Widmann: You've tried your hand at many things throughout your life. I know you were in the army during the Korean War, you were a bookseller, a bull-fighter, and of course an activist for intellectual freedom with regard to the Holocaust debate. How would you like to be remembered?

Smith: It's a matter that has never caught my attention. Memory itself, however—I'm very interested in memory. As a writer I am essentially a failed autobiographer. It's all about memory. My own. When my memory dies, along with the rest of me, you can imagine what will happen with regard to my attention to the memories of others.

Bradley was denounced by many. Several such derogatory quotes appeared on the back cover of his Confessions of a Holocaust Revisionist Second Enlarged Edition. Alan Dershowitz called him a "known anti-Semite and an anti-Black racist." Others called him even worse. Beneath these foul slurs Bradley placed a quote about himself "a swell guy. Loves everybody." Indeed, I never heard him utter a bad word about anyone, never mind their race or ethnicity.

Bradley liked to call himself "a simple writer" and had even used the phrase as a working title for one of his autobiographical collections that we published on-line.1

"A simple writer" demonstrates his modesty. Bradley Smith was an excellent writer, perhaps plagued by the subject that he discovered one day in 1979 and then dedicated his life to. He was a man of courage, honesty, and honor. Most of all, I will remember him as a friend.

I am thankful to Ted O'Keefe for contributing his memories of our old friend and colleague, "A Revisionist Swashbuckler: My Memories of Bradley R. Smith" to this issue of Inconvenient History. Jett Rucker provides our feature article this quarter with a consideration of the impact of the Casablanca Conference of 1943 on the Holocaust. I am also very pleased to present Professor Faurisson's New Year's Eve thoughts on the state of revisionism, "The Revisionists' Total Victory on the Historical and Scientific Level." This issue also includes a Ralph Raico classic, "Arthur Ekirch on American Militarism," in which he casts a revisionist eye on American militarism from our country's foundation down to the present day. K.R. Bolton returns this issue with an interesting look at World War II as a conflict largely fought between two systems of economy: globalization and autarchy in his “Origins of the Japanese-American War: A Conflict of Free Trade vs. Autarchy.” Our prolific reviewer of books and film Ezra MacVie provides an unusual look at the Oscar-winning film, Spotlight. I conclude this issue fittingly with a new installment in our “Profiles in History” series, outlining the career of Bradley Smith. This autobiographical sketch was written and revised and edited through the years — some of the edits provided by Bradley himself. While he was never directly involved with Inconvenient History, it is certain that without his guidance and friendship through the years, our journal would never have been. And that dear reader, is why this issue of Inconvenient History is dedicated to him. While it is not quite the Festschrift that he deserves, I suspect Bradley would be embarrassed by all the praise. He would likely suggest that we just get on with the work. And so we shall.

---

Notes:

1	A Simple Writer was the working title of what would eventually be published in 2002 as Break His Bones: The Private Life of a Holocaust Revisionist .
-------------------	---

The Revisionists' Total Victory on the Historical and Scientific Level

by Robert Faurisson

In France and in the rest of the world, historians and specialists of the “Holocaust” no longer know what to answer to the revisionists’ arguments. And to speak only of my own case, which has been going on since 1978 (that is, for some thirty-seven years), never has my country’s justice system, despite the tireless requests by self-righteous associations to rule against me on the substance of my writings or statements, been able to note therein the least trace of any rashness, negligence, deliberate ignorance, falsehood, falsification or lying. My adversaries, rich and powerful though they may be, have never succeeded in getting our judges to convict me on the merits of the conclusions reached through my research work which, for over half a century, has focused on what is commonly called “the genocide of the Jews,” “the Nazi gas chambers” and “the six million (or nearly)” Jewish victims of the Third Reich. At most, after countless cases I have lost suits (whether as plaintiff or defendant) or been found guilty mainly: 1) for a malevolence, supposed but not demonstrated, towards the Jews; 2) for breaking the gayssotine (the Fabius-Gayssot or Faurisson Act, legislation of convenience specifically targeting the findings of my research); or 3) by virtue of the “good faith” (sic) of individuals like Léon Poliakov or Robert Badinter, even though found to be at fault by the judges themselves.

For years Poliakov had well and truly manipulated the writings of SS officer Kurt Gerstein (who, having “repented” (?), then committed suicide (?)), when not fabricating outright fragments of text to attribute to him. But the judges granted the presumption of good faith to Poliakov. He had been, we were told, “animated by the passionate and legitimate desire to inform the public about a period and about facts of contemporary history that were particularly tragic.” It was therefore appropriate to forgive him for having “perhaps, on minor points [sic!!!], broken scientific standards of rigor without, however, it being permissible to state that he is a manipulator or fabricator of texts.” As for Badinter, in 2006 he claimed that in 1981, when he was still barrister for the LICRA and just before becoming Minister of Justice, he had got a court to rule against me “for being a falsifier of history.” A decision of 2007 restored the truth and held that Badinter had “failed in his evidence” to demonstrate my alleged dishonesty; but, the court hastened to add, he had been in good faith. For want of both money and a lawyer (Eric Delcroix having retired – and being denied the customary honorary membership of the bar), I did not appeal and was forced to pay the Socialist millionaire the sum of €5,000 (his “costs”). But at least since then I have had the satisfaction of being able to speak of “Robert Badinter, my liar, my slanderer... in good faith.”1

An astute observer will have noted that the more our opponents sense the game is getting away from them on the historical or scientific level, the more they feel the need to increase their propagandistic drum beating, and the repression as well. In France, at this very moment, they are putting all their hopes in having Parliament pass a supergayssotine. Good for them! A few weeks short of my 87th birthday, I have six cases pending, four against me and two others that I have had to instigate, albeit quite unwillingly. Will my judges finally decide, in 2016, to leave us, my wife and me, destitute? Or are they getting ready simply to throw me into a prison of the République? It is understood beforehand, is it not, that if they were to carry things to such extremes it would only be on the grounds of the noblest républicain principles and in the name of human rights.

Manuel Valls, Prime Minister of France, has launched warlike crusades in several foreign countries that have backfired horribly for the French.
By Pierre Slamich (Own work) [CC BY-SA 3.0 (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0>) or GFDL (<http://www.gnu.org/copyleft/fdl.html>)], via Wikimedia Commons

Let's consider our current Prime Minister. One day, Manuel Valls, in full pomposity, his mouth, heart and left hand clenched, let fly: "I am, by my wife, eternally linked to the Jewish community and Israel." He saw himself as "eternal": a vast program! But fervor was leading him astray. He ought to come back down to earth, reconnect with the ground, get treatment and stop deluding himself: the revisionists have, already as of now, won the match.

As early as 1983-1985, Raul Hilberg, surrendering to the arguments of "Faurisson and others..." had to drop the pretense of explaining, on the basis of valid arguments and documents of his own, that the Third Reich had, with proper Germanic efficiency, designed, prepared, developed, organized and financed the killing of millions of European Jews. The eminent Jewish-American historian ended up finding himself reduced to trying to have us believe that this gigantic massacre had come about by the operation of the Holy Spirit or, in his words, by "an incredible meeting of minds, a consensus-mind reading within a large bureaucracy”<sup>2</sup> that had, on its own, spontaneously decided, it seemed, gradually to abandon written communication in favor of verbal or indeed telepathic exchange to such an extent that no written or material evidence bespoke the six million Jews (or, in Hilberg’s estimation, a bit fewer) having been systematically killed either on the Eastern Front or in the gas chambers, mainly at Auschwitz.

A number of historians or researchers, such as Arno Mayer, Jean-Claude Pressac and Robert Jan van Pelt, have also capitulated, in a more frank and direct manner. The first has had to admit, among other bitter observations, that “Sources for the study of the gas chambers are at once rare and unreliable.”<sup>3</sup> The second, a protégé of the Klarsfeld couple, came to understand that the dossier of the official story of the Jews’ extermination, “rotten” with too many lies, was bound for “the rubbish bins of history.”<sup>4</sup> The third has concluded that “Ninety-nine per cent of what we know [about Auschwitz] we do not actually have the physical evidence to prove;”<sup>5</sup> despite this, millions of visitors there have been and continue to be shown a “gas chamber” said to be in its “original state,” as well as ruins of other alleged “gas chambers.” As for the figure of “six million,” never subjected to the least scientific verification, it is rooted in the most sordid of realities: an old American publicity slogan used already before 1900 and up to the end of the Second World War to collect a windfall of cash especially from the Jewish community.<sup>6</sup> The searing words amounted to the cry “Six million of our brothers are dying in Europe [by the acts, according to circumstance, of Poland, the Balkan countries, Tsarist Russia, National-Socialist Germany...]; we await your money for the victims of this holocaust [sic already in 1919]!”

Manuel Valls, our prime minister, and François Hollande, president of our Republic, devote themselves to launching, in several foreign countries, warlike crusades of the kind that have backfired horribly for us French this year. On top of their foreign wars, conducted in the most cowardly as well as the most comfortable conditions, they instill an atmosphere of internecine war at home. They call “cowards” certain enemies who, after all, are inspired on a grand scale by the example of our glorious Résistants: “Hey, killers with the bullet and the knife, kill quickly!”

If François Hollande has the stature of a pedalo [paddle-boat — Ed.] admiral, Mr. Valls resembles Picrochole, that character in Rabelais whose name in Greek means “bitter bile” and who regularly gets all excited at the prospect of going off to war. Mr. Valls began with a crusade against the Saracens of today and against the real or supposed enemies of Israel but he is also on a campaign against the revisionists, against “Dieudonné in peace,” against Marine Le Pen – even though she has thrown her own father under the bus – and even against his friends of the Socialist clan. A good suggestion for him would be to calm down, take care of himself, try to laugh with Dieudonné, reflect for a moment with the revisionists, allow historians or researchers to work as they wish and, at long last, spare us the flag-waving frenzy, the bugle-blowing, the verse and chorus of the Marseillaise on the “day of glory,” the “impure blood” and the “ferocious soldiers.” As we know, it is, unhappily, all too easy to take the French in with that sort of thing.

Such, today, are the modest New Year wishes for 2016 that I allow myself to make for that person, for his victims, for the French and for the rest of the world. But is it perhaps already asking too much?

For their part, the revisionists know what awaits them: the confirmation in the mainstream media, sooner or later, that they have already won a total victory on the historical and scientific level. The political and media powers will indeed have to resign themselves to the facts: persistence in gunboat policies abroad and in those of gagging and censorship at home will only dishonor them still more. For nothing.

The rising flood, particularly on the Internet, that is bringing to the world's knowledge the spectacular achievements of historical revisionism is not suddenly going to halt its advance or return towards its source.

The lies of the "Holocaust" are modeled on those of the First World War. All those "Nazi death-works," like the ones at Auschwitz, are but a reprise of the myth of German "corpse factories" of 1914-1918. They were merely modernized by the adding of gas (Jewish-American version of November 1944) and sometimes of electricity (Jewish-Soviet version of February 1945). The good people, already generally not well disposed towards the practice of cremating the dead, were led to believe that Germany, a nation considered modern and known for having an abundance of engineers and chemists, had built structures containing, in addition to a cremation space, others called "gas chambers" (in reality, the "depositories," Leichenhalle or Leichenkeller, technically designed to hold bodies awaiting cremation). Thus a certain propaganda has managed to persuade us that those German devils were dumb enough to house under the same roof, on one side, spaces full of a highly inflammable and explosive gas (the hydrocyanic acid or hydrogen cyanide contained in the pesticide Zyklon B, created in the 1920s) and, on the other side, crematory ovens that had to be laboriously brought to a temperature of 900° C.

In 1943 some of the men in charge of British war propaganda deplored "this gas chambers story." For his part, the revisionist Germar Rudolf sums up the subject rather well in his Lectures on the Holocaust (Chicago, Theses & Dissertations Press, 2005, 566 pp., pp. 82-85). Even Victor Cavendish-Bentinck, a senior official of the Intelligence Service in London ready to believe just about any nonsense said against the Germans, was to write: "I feel certain that we are making a mistake in publicly giving credence to this gas chambers story" (p. 83). The trouble was that the British, undisputed champions of lying propaganda during the two world wars, needed those fables. On February 29, 1944 their Ministry of Information sent the BBC and the Church of England a circular letter<sup>7</sup> of the greatest cynicism, requesting their respective cooperation for the spreading of propaganda on the basis of atrocity stories either already in circulation or currently being concocted. It was a matter of forestalling the disastrous effect that the Red Army, an ally, was inevitably to bring about in Central Europe by real atrocities (p. 84)!

On these inventions, these fabrications and the wide-scale dissemination of enormous tall tales, two books remain of great interest: Edward J. Rozek's Allied Wartime Diplomacy: A Pattern in Poland, New York, Wiley, 1958 and, especially, Walter Laqueur's (a Jew born in Breslau in 1921): The Terrible Secret, London, Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1980, 262 pp., wherein we see Cavendish-Bentinck, him again, "Chairman of the British Intelligence Committee," writing in July 1943 that "The Poles and, to a far greater extent the Jews, tend to exaggerate German atrocities in order to stoke us up" (p. 83).

Fifteen months ago, referring to the crisis that the historians of the "Holocaust" were experiencing, I wrote that there was "more and more water in their gas, and slack in their knotted rope."<sup>8</sup> Since January 2015 and the anniversary of the "liberation" of Auschwitz I have noted a sudden acceleration of the phenomenon. I have a whole file and a whole demonstration on the subject but the continuing judicial repression has not yet left me time to publish this information. In any case, for the historian, it has become captivating to observe the never-ending agony of the "magical gas chamber" (Céline in 1950). This agony is accompanied, as we have seen, by a redoubling of the repression of revisionism and a turning up of the volume of holocaustic propaganda. May our Picrochole refrain, then, from going on the stage and into a trance! He would have a stroke. He might even be cruelly snatched away from us. Who knows? He could precede in death a man who will be 87 years of age on 25 January 2016 and whom some have, thus far in vain, so often sought to kill, not for his ideas (he has hardly any) but for having wanted to publish the result of his research, which is summed up in a phrase of about sixty words. I repeat it here for the record, and to have done with it:

The alleged Hitlerite gas chambers and the alleged genocide of the Jews form one and the same historical lie, which has permitted a gigantic political and financial swindle whose main beneficiaries are the state of Israel and international Zionism and whose main victims are the German people – but not their leaders – and the Palestinian people in their entirety.

Note: For sources or references especially regarding certain points of this text one may consult the indices of the seven volumes of my Ecrits révisionnistes thus far published. On the Internet, for “The Victories of Revisionism” (11 December 2006), see http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2015/volume\_7/number\_4/victories\_of\_revisionism.php and for “The Victories of Revisionism (continued)” (September 11, 2011), see http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2016/volume\_8/number\_1/victories\_of\_revisionism\_cont.php Fans of court rulings by imbeciles are invited to refer to pages 152-155 of the first volume, where there are some tidbits from a decision handed down in 1979 by Her Honor Baluze-Frchet, judge of a Lyon police court. The good lady decreed back then that simply asking the question of the existence of the gas chambers was an affront not only to “good morals” but also to “the moral order.” The amusing bit of it is that by invoking “the moral order” she was advocating – although probably unawares – a value dear to Count MacMahon, Marshal of France, President of the French Republic and perennial model of reactionary conservatism. “The moral order” was to return seventy years later on with... Marshal Pétain. As for the fans of behavioral curiosities, there is fare for them in the following two videos featuring the current head of the French government: “The left hand of Manuel Valls” and “Rally of March 19, 2014 – speech by Manuel Valls, Minister of the Interior” [Both videos are in French; the second with English subtitles —Ed.].

31 December 2015

---

Notes:

1	Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.it/2007/10/robert-badinter-mon-diffamateur.html
2	Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.it/1988/09/raul-hilberg-now-explains-that-genocide.html
3	Arno J. Mayer, Why Did the Heavens Not Darken? (New York: Pantheon Books, 1990) p. 362. See also, Robert Faurisson, “Auschwitz: Technique & Operation of the Gas Chambers or, Improvised Gas Chambers & Casual Gassings at Auschwitz & Birkenau, according to J.-C. Pressac (1989) Parts 1 and 2” English translation by T. J. O’Keefe The Journal of Historical Review , Vol. 11, No. 1, Spring 1991, pp. 25-66 and Vol. 11, No. 2, Summer 1991, pp. 133-175. Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.it/1990/11/english-auschwitz-technique-operation.html
4	Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.it/2005/06/ten-years-ago-jean-claude-pressacs.html

5	“A case for letting nature take back Auschwitz,” The Toronto Star , December 27, 2009 Online: http://www.thestar.com/news/insight/2009/12/27/a_case_for_letting_nature_take_back_auschwitz.html
6	See Don Heddesheimer, The First Holocaust (Chicago: Theses and Dissertations Press, 2005). Also see Online: http://balder.org/judea/Six-Million-140-Occurrences-Of-The-Word-Holocaust-And-The-Number-6,000,000-Before-The-Nuremberg-Trials-Began.php
7	Online: http://justice4germans.com/2012/10/24/criminal-conspiracy-by-the-british-govt-bbc-and-the-church-exposed/
8	Online: http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.it/2014/09/paris-match-se-surpasse-dans-le-bobard.html

To Kill a Taboo | CODOH

by Ezra Macvie

Spotlight. Open Road Films, 2015, 129 mins.

The eternal enemy of truth—and history—is taboo. Taboo is the enveloping social process by which knowledge is contained by suppressing its expression. First among those subjected to taboo are the direct witnesses to the knowledge, and first among these are those who have suffered from it but survived in condition to render testimony. This winner of the 2016 Academy Award for Best Picture is about the breaking, initially in Boston, of a well-enforced taboo against publicly charging Catholic priests with molesting children of their parishioners, an offense whose commonplaceness vastly exceeded the assumptions of Catholics and non-Catholics alike. And this may have been the primary effect of the taboo: not the absolute concealment/denial of the offenses, but rather suppression of awareness of their pervasiveness.

Taboo disinforms history profoundly—always has and always will. This is why attack upon and defeat of taboo offers such enormous potential for the improvement of historical understanding and the dissemination thereof. George Orwell once wrote, “Journalism is printing what someone else does not want printed: everything else is public relations.” Analogously, revisionism is revealing what violates some taboo or other: everything else is ... what? Nattering?

LE INSIDIE DEL CONFESSIONALE.
(The Snares of the Confessional.)

Spotlight tells the story of the reporters who made it their mission to provide proof of a cover-up of sexual abuse within the Roman Catholic Church.

And taboos there are aplenty, but in the arena (yes, it is an arena) of history today, none looms larger than the bedrock of Jewish nationalism, the Holocaust. This review, then, will counterpose the destruction of the taboo against priestly pederasty in the first years of the present century with the efforts ever since World War II to overcome the global taboo against correcting the history underpinning the story everyone knows as the Holocaust. There are as many differences between these two as there are similarities; the differences can be quite as illuminating as the similarities.

The most-salient point of comparison is indeed a difference: the assault on clerical concupiscence begun by the Boston Globe in 2001 has been won, hands-down, by the attackers of the taboo. The decades-long assault on the towering edifice of the Holocaust, on the other hand, today faces counter-assaults, legal, financial, reputational, and physical stiffer not only than they ever have been in the past, but more-draconian by far than any brought to light against the heroes of the film here reviewed. Indeed, to find doctrinal enforcement comparable to that imposed on Holocaust revisionists today, one has to go back to the times of the Inquisition, a project, ironically, of that very Catholic Church that plays the loser in the drama depicted in the film.

A point of similarity between the two dramas is that in both cases, the champions of the taboo are palpably aligned with specific religions. In the one case, it is the standing institution of the Catholic Church that opposed publication of the sins of its agents, while in the other it is the ubiquitous agency of worldwide Jewry that harbors the often-invisible defenders of the ramparts of Holocaustology. The Catholic Church has surrendered in the present drama, and is doing penance for its institutional sin of deception as it, above all others, knows how to do. At such time as the Holocaust taboo is defeated, more-likely with a whimper than with a bang, there will be no surrender, ever. Rather, in keeping with the character of the counter-insurgency thus far mounted, there will be the usual assortment of would-be victims shrugging, looking about innocently and intoning, "Who, me?"

Compared with the offensive "defense" offered by the advocates of Jewish victimhood, the defense of the Catholic Church was utterly passive. In no case, at least as portrayed in the film, did the defenders of the Catholic taboo threaten anyone with loss of career, prestige, funding, much less life or limb, as martyrs of Holocaust revisionism have not only been threatened with, but in fact, time after time, have actually sustained. The pages of this journal report case after case of these. Likewise, no protagonist in the portrayal here reviewed even sustained accusations of "anti-Catholic" or "anti-clerical" motivations, in contrast to the "anti-Semitic" and even "Neo-Nazi" accusations faced now as in the past by inquirers into the facts of the Holocaust. No violence is anywhere to be seen in the film here reviewed, something of a phenomenon itself in today's cinema.

The saga was marked at a number of points by contact with the regnant legal system, that of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Contacts of this nature for Holocaust revisionists are almost without exception adverse, even when the defendant is not forced to admit the violation of some law, such as those against "Holocaust denial" now on the books of most of the countries of Europe. The heroes of Spotlight, on the other hand, had the law solidly on their side, and despite recalcitrance exhibited by the occasional clerk or other functionary in the court system, their motions (in cases in which they were not defendants, nor plaintiffs) were upheld and the decisions in their favor greatly aided their project.

It is no doubt critical to the course of events that the person in real life whose assumption of the editorship of the Globe, Martin Baron, was Jewish. The movie makes no bones about the fact of the character's Jewishness, as perhaps it could not in view of all the characters' bearing the name of the real person each portrays. Even the casting is frank: Baron is played well by Liev Schreiber, a Jew in real life who has often portrayed overtly Jewish characters in other films. But Baron's Jewishness in this situation never appears as any sort of enmity for the Catholic Church or Christianity; it always appears convincingly that Schreiber is at worst out to kill an ancient and pernicious taboo, which will elicit cheers from every revisionist. The real person, in any case, appears to be Jewish in the secular, heredity sense and has never engaged in unseemly advocacy in favor of his religion or its client state, and his portrayal in the film adheres to this description.

Although the film offers no hint of it, the sins covered up by the broken taboo are almost certainly ancient, and they are in no way confined to the Catholic or Christian religions nor even, ultimately, to religion itself. Sexual (not to say, reproductive) prerogatives have ever inhered in those whose position in the social power structure has enabled them to exploit them. Not only have kings, princes and priests forever enjoyed peccadillos, other males (primarily) have seized upon power opportunities all the way down to footsoldiers of victorious invading armies. Feudal lords availed themselves of the rights of seigniorage, while Mohammed Himself took a three-year-old to bride, so it is told. The traditions of the defeated taboo of Spotlight are far more ancient, and widespread, than the movie could possibly have hinted, even if it had tried. What changed was the social power structure, and the role of current, accurate information in the present age.

Who is to say that the pagan priests who offered up the burnt bodies of "virgins" to the gods did not pre-empt those very gods in consuming those purported virginities, as their anointed proxies, of course, in advance of the burnt offerings? The gods might or might not be gods, or even real, but the priests were unquestionably human.

Likewise, the Holocaust is no recent invention, nor is victimology, Jewish or otherwise. It has been abundantly demonstrated in these pages how both the mantra of the Holocaust and the magic number of Six Million preceded the conflict between Germany's National Socialists and Jewry by decades. The entire basis of Christianity is in fact a (single) martyrdom, since claimed by latter-day millions, and martyrdom maintains an especially prominent position in today's Islam where it is most embattled.

The incident of the defeat of a millennia-old taboo against priestly opportunism is stark, but it is also ephemeral. It constitutes a step on the part of the believing multitudes from mysticism toward an awareness of facts, not only in their qualities and contexts, but in their pervasiveness among their own vast numbers.

Such an awareness is being awakened among the masses as to those others who incessantly seek after their minds and hearts, be those governments, religions, insurgents, thieves or a whole host of other seductors. If and as such awareness grows, and becomes more-discerning as to the deceptions undertaken and the rewards sought thereby, the taboos of the Holocaust face but a straitened future.

They will die, possibly even in our own lifetimes, but we will be challenged to detect just when that was.

There may be no movie. Or if there is, it may win no Academy Award.

Opponents of taboos regarding present conditions or historical legends alike will find Spotlight a gratifying experience; the good guys not only win, but they live to reap laurels for their victory. The casting and acting are well above average and the script, which hews reasonably closely to actual events, seems quite credible.

Discrimination by Religion in Immigration to the US

by Jett Rucker

Presidential hopeful Donald Trump seems to have garnered a good deal of support from American voters with his offer to ban immigration to the US by Muslims. Immigration and religion have a history in the present territory of the United States that goes all the way back to the 16th Century.

The authorities in then-Spanish Florida discovered, around 1565, that a band of Protestants from France had settled on their (the Spaniards') side of the St. Johns River at Fort Caroline. The Spaniards duly attacked and captured Fort Caroline and then, except for the three or so Catholics they found in the party, they slaughtered over 300 of the Frenchmen, not because they were French, but because they weren't Catholic. They did not impose this policy on non-immigrants, the native indians. Whether Trump proposes to persecute Muslim American citizens, native-born and otherwise, is not clear at this moment, but if he did, such actions would not be without precedent in America.

Not much later, in 1636, the authorities in the Massachusetts Bay Colony found English immigrant Roger Williams guilty of spreading thoughts that threatened the colony's officially established religion, and they banished Williams—religious-immigration policy was already softening, at least by comparison with the Spaniards' standards of the century previous. Williams "fled" the colony to a place just outside the boundaries of its charter, present-day Providence, Rhode Island, and established his own settlement where he intended to practice "religious freedom," presumably extending to the immigration policies (if any) he practiced in his settlement. I have found no record of religious discrimination in the immigration practices of Providence Plantations, as Williams's new domain became known, nor have I noted challenges to it from outside the ambit of Protestant Christianity (though Catholics have since become numerous in the area).

An entity recognizable as the precursor of today's government of the United States came into being sometime between 1776 and 1783. Histories of this entity's immigration policies, and practices (which occasionally departed from the policies) abound, and are well documented, but include little that runs along the lines of religious discrimination embodied therein. Roger Williams's (and others') notions of "religious freedom" became enshrined in the constitution not only of the United States, but in the constitutions of many of the individual states. To this day, it appears that no state of the United States has, for example, any official religion, though the circumstances under which the Province of Maryland was established suggest that, like Israel for Jews, Maryland was at least to be a haven for English and perhaps other Catholics (Maryland's original and present laws, like Israel's, proclaim tolerance for all religions). If any US state were to proclaim an official religion (say, Mormonism in Utah), such an act would undoubtedly be struck down smartly as unconstitutional.

Immigrants lined up waiting for the medical examination. Date 1912

Source: Popular Science Monthly No. 80 [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

One reason religious discrimination in US immigration policy seems so fleeting in accounts of its history is that discrimination is interpreted only in its prohibitive meaning, rather than encompassing its converse, that is, preference for persons of some religion or other. Again, the operation of any such discrimination (broadly interpreted, as stated) must be explored in terms of effects and results, not merely in terms of the letters of published policies.

On this score, the immigration to the US of several million Jews of various nationalities over at least the century preceding 1989 invites scrutiny as to whether effective US immigration policy might have discriminated in favor of that religion (Judaism).

A famous case where that hypothesis might be falsified occurred in 1939, when the German ocean Liner City of Saint Louis was denied permission in Cuba, the United States and Canada to disembark some 908 German Jews seeking to leave Nazi Germany. US immigration policy, operating as it has (pre-Trump) only on nationalities rather than religion, is nothing if not patchy, depending not only on various points of official discretion but further on national (political) sentiment. The Saint Louis affair is one that has become a byword to those promoting a view of German official anti-Semitism as genocide, despite the survival of at least 75 percent of the passengers on the “voyage of the damned.”

But the Saint Louis may be seen to be the exception that proves the rule, at least subsequent to the 1924 enactment of the Immigration Act, which effectively throttled immigration from pretty much everywhere, particularly as a matter of popular sentiment. Sentiment of people then living in the US was rather broadly slanted in opposition to immigrants from everywhere, rather than specifically against the immigration of Jews.

Or not. Immigration in the fifty or so years before 1924 contained a notable (but not officially visible) percentage of people from numerous other countries who were, nonetheless ... Jews. In a later day, as will be shown, such people might have managed to get themselves classified (and admitted) as “refugees,” but in the times (say, 1874 to 1924), they were just immigrants from “Poland,” “Russia,” “Austria-Hungary” or whatever sovereign entities that then asserted credible claims to the territories they came from. The reason the percentage of these people who were Jews was “not visible” as such is elucidated by none other than Henry Ford, in his thoroughly reviled series of articles in the Dearborn Independent of 1920-1921. In this series, he details how, as he says, the US government was dissuaded, around 1900, from identifying the race or nationality of census respondents as “Jewish” by what Ford called the “Jewish lobby.”<sup>1</sup> The same interests succeeded in preventing any such official identification of persons then and thereafter entering the United States as immigrants. The religion of the statistical subjects was, of course, not collected by the government.

It is, of course, a daunting challenge to tease out the separate effects of immigration policy on the one hand, and the propensity, from time to time, of different religious groups to immigrate of their own accord. Much immigration from Europe to today’s United States was in fact inspired by religious persecution at home by, first, the martyred Huguenots of Fort Caroline, then the Puritans who expelled Roger Williams from Massachusetts, and then, perhaps, the Jews in numbers dwarfing the two groups mentioned previously added together. The redoubtable Henry Ford, perhaps here straining credulity, identifies the heavy influx of Jews into the US around the turn of the last century as a deliberate plot on the part of Jewish global overlords to move (most of) the Jews of Poland and Russia to the United States for the purpose of taking over the US in a manner he alleges as resembling their then-recent takeover of Russia.<sup>2</sup> Then again, subsequent (successful) agitation on the part of agents of Israel in countries of North Africa and the Middle East to motivate Jewish emigration to Israel over the past fifty years might provide support for such notions that was not available to Ford in 1920.

In more recent years, in fact, Israel and the US came into a glancing conflict over emigres from the Soviet Union, the (intended) result of the strident “Free Soviet Jewry” campaign of the 1970s-80s in the US and elsewhere. In response, presumably, to political pressure from American Jews, the US extended the coveted “refugee” status to Jews applying for admission to the US as immigrants from the Soviet Union. This conferring of refugee status (on the score, note, of religious persecution, or was it racial?) amounted to discrimination, of the favoritistic type, toward Jews from the Soviet Union.

By 1989, Israel, noting this growing tide of emigrants, decided it would prefer to have more Jews in Israel over having more Jews (hopefully advocating for Israel) in its great American milch cow, and arranged with said milch cow to have this preferment lifted from selected emigrants from the Soviet Union, leaving said emigrants with only one country to emigrate to, and that one a most-willing recipient of them, however otherwise-spare its attractions might be. Over time, Israel seems to have gained about a million (Russian-speaking) Jews, while the US gained at least a comparable number of the same sort.

So, the conferment and disconferment of refugee status lays a pattern of religious discrimination over the policies by which the US government decides who may immigrate and who may not.

So long as the voters of the United States relegate matters such as immigration policy to “their” government, Trump’s program of religious discrimination rests on a very firm basis.

---

Notes:

1	The Dearborn Independent , “How Jews in the US Conceal Their Strength,” October 9, 1920.
2	Ibid.

Foreword to the 2nd Edition of "Ecrits révisionnistes (1974-1998)"

by Robert Faurisson

The first edition of the present work dates from March 1999. For it I was indebted to two persons who had kindly agreed to compile for publication the articles and studies which, in addition to a few revisionist books or other pieces, I had written from 1974 to 1998. This new edition reproduces the contents of the first but not without abundant corrections of detail; I owe it to Jean Plantin and, especially, to Yvonne Schleiter. The index of names has been entirely redone. In the absence of an index of subjects there is a "reading guide" prepared by Jean-Marie Boisdefeu. This second edition ought to have appeared in 2001 but we have constantly had to postpone it up to today. I had promised, in addition to the present four volumes, a book of illustrations; I regret all the more my inability to keep that promise as my general undertaking, essentially evidence-based, would have benefited from being illustrated by documents and photographs of which, moreover, I possess a great many.

On February 2 of this year I devoted an article to my "Somber appraisal of historical revisionism." Since that date the situation has worsened. The conference that was set to take place on April 24 and 25, 2004 in Sacramento, California, bringing together more than two hundred supporters of the revisionist cause, was cancelled and, in Toronto, one may fear the worst for Ernst Zündel, who for fifteen months has been held without charge in a high-security prison.

Revisionist researchers or active disseminators of revisionist works are today but a handful. One may mention, principally, Germar Rudolf in the United States (with the help of his friend Jürgen Graf in Russia), Fredrick Töben in Australia, Carlo Mattogno in Italy, Jean Plantin in France, Vincent Reynouard in Belgium and, on the Internet, the "AAARGH" site, on the one hand, and that of Radio-Islam on the other hand.

Professor Robert Faurisson.
Source: codoh.com.

On the scientific level, revisionism has won a total victory. It no longer has any opponents. The Hilbergs, the Vidal-Naquets, the Klarsfelds, the Berenbaums, the Deborah Lipstadts, a Robert Jan van Pelt who, in essence, is content to take up the feeble arguments of a Jean-Claude Pressac for his own account, have been reduced to naught. The revisionists no longer see anything opposing them but Spielberg films, Yad Vashem ceremonies, museums inspired by Disneyland, pilgrimages to Auschwitz, media drumming, brainwashing in the schools and universities and, finally, State propaganda relying on police and judicial repression. Our opponents have laid down their arms but practically no one knows it since the defeated, thanks to the power they possess in the media and their consummate talent in bluffing, blow their trumpets—or shofars—as if they had carried the day.

Their historians used to claim that Hitler had conducted a policy of extermination against the Jews, involving, particularly, the use of weapons of mass destruction called homicidal gas chambers or gas vans. They would also assure us that, on the Eastern front, the Einsatzgruppen had engaged in gigantic slaughters of Jews. In the end, if one was to believe them, nearly all the Jews of Europe had thus been exterminated.

So vast a crime would have presupposed an order, a project, a plan, overall guidelines, detailed instructions, funding, a monitoring of operations and expenditures, numerous assessments whether particular or general, research into and successful development of such weapons as mankind had not yet known, along with the involvement of a great many soldiers, scientists, engineers, builders and other employees. Such an undertaking, especially if it had been carried out in the utmost secrecy, would have required a set of draconian measures. All of this would have left much irrefutable evidence, both material and documentary. At first, the official historians had the nerve to state that such evidence did indeed exist, and “in abundance.” When challenged to supply “one proof, one single proof” of their own choice, they pulled back and, following Pressac’s example, thenceforth invoked only the existence of “criminal traces” or “beginnings of proof.” Retreating still further, they invented the claim that the great slaughter had occurred without any order or directive but spontaneously (like “spontaneous generation,” in a way). The most prestigious among them, Raul Hilberg, going back on his former affirmation that there had been two orders from the Führer to kill the Jews, proceeded to assert that in fact everything had happened without an order, without a plan, all thanks to “an incredible meeting of minds” (sic) within the vast German bureaucracy and to “a consensus-mind reading” (sic) among Nazi bureaucrats!

No one has been able to find a single structure that could have been an authentic homicidal gas chamber. Not a single homicidal gas van, either. For the world’s greatest crime, the prosecution can produce no forensic examination of the weapon. Among the post-mortems not one attests to death by gassing. The alleged witnesses of “gassings” whom revisionists have been able to subject to a precise and public cross-examination in court have been unmasked. The execution gas chambers shown to tourists have been shown to be mere Potemkin-Village-like fakes. The massacres attributed to the Einsatzgruppen have left not one common grave approaching the dimensions of the mass graves in Katyn Forest (4,255 corpses counted) – a proven crime, that slaughter, and the culprits of which were our Soviet allies.

Conversely, facts that prove that the Third Reich never had a policy of physical extermination of the Jews are not wanting. Even on the Eastern Front, the killing of an innocent Jewish civilian was punishable by severe sanctions, including the death penalty. The German courts martial were capable of punishing those guilty of any sort of excess against Jews. Examples abound of measures taken, in the camps and elsewhere, to protect Jews against the excesses characteristic of all contexts of imprisonment, as well as against the ravages of disease. The Germans were haunted by a fear of disorder, of contagion and epidemics, of loss of manpower; even at Auschwitz there were training centers for Jewish youth in various manual trades. Millions of Jews, despite the great bloodshed that a Europe at war was experiencing and despite the apocalypse of a Germany pulverized by the systematic Allied bombing, survived the war. They call themselves “survivors,” owing their lives to “miracles,” and still today make up the membership of associations with a pronounced appetite for financial reparations. Even now, fifty-nine years after the war, their number is estimated at 687,900 (recent estimate by the demographer Jacob Ukeles of New York, according to an article by Amiram Barkat, “U.S. Court to discuss issue of who is a Holocaust survivor,” Haaretz, April 18, 2004). During the war, Jewish leaders made alarming statements about an on-going extermination of the Jews, but their conduct showed that they did not really believe their own words. The Allied chiefs saw that they were dealing at times with Jews seeking “to stoke us up.” And then, the “Brown Jews” of “the Jewish international of collaboration” were not absent from the scene. Zionists and National Socialists had, to a certain extent, the same worldview; whence, in 1941, the Stern Group’s offer to Germany of a military collaboration against the British. As late as April 21, 1945, a representative of the World Jewish Congress, Norbert Masur, was received by Himmler to discuss the matter of Jews to be handed over to the Allies.

The Germans sought to expel the Jews from Europe, if possible with the rest of the world’s cooperation. They had in mind a “territorial final solution of the Jewish question” (“eine territoriale Endlösung der Judenfrage,” according to the internal memorandum of August 21, 1942 signed by one Martin Luther (sic), director at the German Foreign Office).

On March 6 of this year, in France, on Thierry Ardisson’s television program Tout le monde en parle, Admiral Philippe de Gaulle was heard saying of the Jews: “The Germans wanted, not to exterminate them, but only to drive them out [of Europe].” That reflection was so accurate and dangerous that it was greeted with a concerted silence.

Also kept hidden from the general public is the fact that during the war neither Churchill, Eden, Roosevelt, Truman, Eisenhower, Charles de Gaulle nor Stalin cared to mention the “gas chambers” or “gas vans” in any statement or writing. Those among them who, years after the end of the conflict, wrote their war memoirs also kept quiet on the subject. Pope Pius XII, although even more hostile towards Hitler than towards Stalin, did likewise (cf. Robert Faurisson, Pope Pius XII's Revisionism, Historical Review Press, Uckfield, England, 2006; preface at <http://robertfaurisson.blogspot.it/2006/05/preface-to-pope-pius-xiis-revisionism.html>).

The “weapons of mass destruction” of Adolf Hitler – his alleged homicidal gas chambers and gas vans – existed no more than did the “weapons of mass destruction” of Saddam Hussein. The lie and the liars behind the stories of 1944 under the aegis of Franklin Roosevelt – with the War Refugee Board, set up by Henry Morgenthau, Jr. – were identical in kind to those materializing under George Bush, Jr. and his Office of Special Plans, set up in 2002 by Paul Wolfowitz.

Unhappily, today, poisoned by “Holocaust” propaganda, the minds of too many people are not inclined to call their beliefs into question. The “Shoah” has become a religious superstition inspiring reverence or fear. Conscious of its own fragility and of the precarious position of the State of Israel, of which it is the sword and the shield, this religion has erected formidable defensive walls and severely punishes those who try to stand up against it. In the past, in order to be a truly active revisionist it took courage and sacrifices; in future, it will take the heroism of Antigone and singular self-abnegation to remain a revisionist.

May 30, 2004

Free-Riding on the Juggernaut of Conscience

by N. Joseph Potts

Riders of the Juggernaut are exalted by right of their berths aboard it—they claim, and receive, whether graciously or haughtily, the adulation of the masses among whom the Juggernaut passes. The more-fervent among the throng find victims among their number to throw in its path by way of sacrifice that it might find pleasing. These, along with delirious others persuaded that their own death beneath it is the surest passage to Heaven, are crushed to oblivion by the Juggernaut's massive wheels, presenting not the slightest impediment, neither to the Juggernaut nor to any of its godlike passengers.

The memory of the Nazi-instigated ethnic cleansings known as the Holocaust became the Juggernaut of Conscience chiefly because Germany lost World War II to countries whose governments were strongly influenced by groups that identified with its victims. And, of course, it did not lose in the sense of negotiating a peace and continuing on under its own government—it catastrophically lost control of all its own territory and, knowing that such would be its lot in surrendering, fought a long and desperate struggle to a point that was literally death for millions of its citizens and metaphorically for its infrastructure and economy. Ineluctably, those inside the concentration camps partook of the suffering and devastation under-gone by those outside them.

Adding to this self-reinforcing cycle of horror and destruction was the fact that, like the war itself, the German racial enterprise was the most highly mechanized program of involuntary population movement ever undertaken. The long, doom-bound train of locked boxcars or cattle cars filled with hopeless deportees remains perhaps the central image of the Holocaust despite the extensive use of just such conveyances in exactly the same ways not only for the Gulag of Soviet Russia, but for the ethnic counter-cleansings mounted on a virtually equal scale against Germans immediately after the war.

The Holocaust occurred in one of the most densely populated, developed regions in the world, and so rapidly attained the rank of history's largest project of its kind as well, not only in terms of numbers deported and the apparent death toll among them, but even in terms of the distances traveled by its victims in the course of their incarceration. Combined with the ravages of disease, exposure, starvation, overwork and the deliberate killing of huge numbers under the impetus of various motivations, the carnage attained a scale comparable to the decimation sustained by untargeted civilian populations from the war through many of the same proximate causes, as well as others, such as aerial bombardment.

And, again like many German survivors who found their ancestral homes and hence themselves, their families, and all their possessions outside the foreshortened limits of postwar rump Germany, survivors of the Holocaust, many virtually bereft of family and even health, found that recovering their pre-war lands or dwellings would entail a lethal struggle against entrenched opponents already long in possession of their sundered homesteads.

The legacy of this unparalleled saga of cruelty, misfortune, and destruction has been a tidal wave of recrimination that even the hard-working, conscience-smitten millions of surviving Germans have been unable to absorb by themselves, even through decades of blame-taking, perpetrator-hunting, reparation-paying, child-indoctrinating and even prosecution of those few among their number with the temerity to suggest that these processes may finally have been carried far enough.

No, blame for the Holocaust has seeped out not only to nearby neutrals such as Switzerland for not providing as much refuge as hindsight suggests might have been wanted, but beyond to conquered countries such as Poland and France, and on to even those countries that spilled vast amounts of their blood and treasure to stop and kill the Nazi monster such as the United States and Great Britain.

And so well-served by its beneficiaries is the specter of the Holocaust that it grows with the passage of time, attracting ever more adulation from the masses stricken with the guilt of having been spared it themselves and being the offspring of parents similarly so spared. It is this process that has led to the vast proportions of the Juggernaut of Conscience as it rumbles over the fields of today's humanity, increasing in weight and speed as it cuts an ever-wider swath among the unworthy fortunate.

But despite the Juggernaut's rude health and limitless capacity for expansion, a cancer is metastasizing aboard it that will one day break its axles, shatter its crossbeams, and bring it to a sudden, catastrophic halt in the center of a mob that has suddenly realized that they have been its dupes for many years and have heaped onto it far too great a portion of what would today remain their own treasure but for the inertial deception practiced upon them by the Juggernaut and its now-dismounted riders.

That cancer is "free riders." Free riders are the frauds and counterfeits—those basking in the sympathy and deference, not to mention in many cases the money, of the masses—who never sustained so much as a scratch or a bump from the Holocaust. These include not only those who falsely claim to have been its victims directly or in prospect by being subject to capture and deportation, but those who falsely claim to be the children of victims and those who falsely claim to have lost typically large numbers of family members to it.

Not all free riders are equally cancerous. Most malignant of all are those, typically misrepresenters of their own selves, who knowingly spread, or encourage the belief of, false tales of their past desolations. They are often able to avoid exposure to inconvenient questionings of their stories' particulars by feigning intense sensitivity to the pain of memory, and only once or twice privately "confiding"; a story that its hearer then thoughtfully spreads about among friends and acquaintances with the caveat that it cannot ever be discussed with the sufferer himself, as it is "too painful."

The proportion of free riders to genuine victims gazing down at the worshipful mob from the Juggernaut has been rising ever since the Juggernaut was set in motion during the postwar war-crimes trials. Genuine victims undoubtedly attained a minority status among the passenger list by 1950, no matter how trivial a misfortune be allowed as entitling one to the true status of victim. Sixty years later, the proportion of deserving within the jostling throng that overloads the Juggernaut is minuscule, even as the skill and dedication of the actors who make up the majority grows.

Slightly less malignant, but cancerous nonetheless, are those who gained their places aboard the Juggernaut through giving themselves "the benefit of the doubt." This group is made up primarily of those claiming to have lost family members "in the Holocaust"; when in fact they have no explicit information of even deportation, much less death, of relatives they knew about in places and at times when they could have been affected by the Holocaust. These are, in the milder cases, people with whom they have lost touch, and might have lost touch even without the upheavals and disruptions that affected virtually all of Europe during and after World War II. They are people who themselves may lead lives of a style that could be described as disrupted who themselves would be hard for their relatives to maintain contact with if they did try. Haven't heard anything in a long time? They died in the Holocaust. Finally heard from someone? Probably an imposter, looking for money or a way to get to the States. What language is that, anyway? Can you read it? They died in the Holocaust.

Finally, there are the conveniently gullible, people of little curiosity and even less doubt. These frequently start out as the dupes of either of the two more-malignant classes of free riders, but then smoothly segue over to the predatory side of the equation. They are told that Great-Aunt Sylvie or Grandpa Morris was caught in one of the infamous Aktions and was gassed at <any of the 1500 concentration camps that existed.> Probably Great-Grandmother Emma, too, assuming she hadn't already died by the time she would have been forced onto the train. Just as often, there are numbers in the place of names, such as "31 members of my family," or "all but the three who made it here," or anonymous groups such as that. Anyone inconsiderate enough to ask a name or relationship is certain to receive a pained stare instead of an answer.

The proportion of free riders to genuine victims gazing down at the worshipful mob from the Juggernaut has been rising ever since the Juggernaut was set in motion during the postwar war-crimes trials. Genuine victims undoubtedly attained a minority status among the passenger list by 1950, no matter how trivial a misfortune be allowed as entitling one to the true status of victim. Sixty years later, the proportion of deserving within the jostling throng that overloads the Juggernaut is minuscule, even as the skill and dedication of the actors who make up the majority grows.

And when the breakdown finally occurs, and the free riders are spilled out onto the road among their erstwhile worshippers, those feeling vengeful urges against any of them will have the comfort of the enormous odds that any given one of them never paid in any way for their high and mighty ride aboard the Juggernaut of Conscience.

Intellectual Freedom and the Holocaust Controversy

by Bradley R. Smith

In 1999 I partnered with Bradley Smith to launch a new revisionist journal, entitled The Revisionist. The Revisionist went through several incarnations through the years. Ultimately it became the prototype for Inconvenient History, which was launched ten years later in 2009. This short opinion piece ran in that first issue of The Revisionist. Here Bradley Smith argued for the subject that was his focus for the second half of his life – intellectual freedom with regard to the Holocaust. Bradley Smith passed away on 18 February 2016. This article is reprinted his memory. A slightly different version of this article also ran in the 6 June 94 issue of The Statesman at State University of New York at Stony Brook— Ed.

All my life I watched Jews lead the struggle to maintain a free press and intellectual freedom in America. In the 1960s, when I was a book dealer on Hollywood Boulevard in Los Angeles, I was arrested, jailed, tried and convicted for selling a book then banned by the U.S. Government—Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer. Jews from every walk of life supported my stand against Government censorship.

A.L. Wiren, then head of the Los Angeles chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, offered his offices for my defense at no cost. After my conviction, when the case went to appeal, Stanley Fleishman offered his services to me pro bono! Fleishman didn't take my case because he admired me personally, or because he considered Henry Miller to be the greatest writer who ever lived. He took it because he was committed heart and soul—and mind—to the ideals of intellectual freedom and the spirit of the First Amendment. Today, Miller's Tropic is shelved in every library of note in America.

The cover of the first edition of Henry Miller's Tropic of Cancer warns “Not to be imported into Great Britain or U.S.A.” This did not deter Bradley Smith. At the time he dedicated himself to promoting Tropic of Cancer in his book store windows. He was arrested, jailed, and prosecuted for his stand for intellectual freedom.

Shockingly, in the 1990s, some mainline Jewish organizations have reversed direction and committed themselves to undermining intellectual freedom with respect to a single historical controversy—whether the Germans did or did not employ homicidal gassing chambers to kill millions of European Jews in a state-sponsored program of genocide. In practice, what this often adds up to, particularly on college campuses, is the perception of an organized Jewish onslaught against intellectual freedom.

On every campus where Hillel and other Jewish organizations have a presence, they lead the attack against free inquiry and open debate on the gas-chamber controversy. I am astounded that Jewish intellectuals and scholars stand idly by while the reputation of Jews as free thinkers is diminished and burlesqued by a handful of mainline Jewish extremists and censors.

Student journalists who are Jewish are under special pressure from the Holocaust Lobby to betray, not only their ideals as journalists, but the long tradition of intellectual liberty for which Jews have worked throughout the Western world. On campus, Jewish editors are attacked by well-meaning but unsophisticated Jewish students who are egged on by Hillel rabbis functioning as semi-professional censors.

Student editors who are not Jewish, while they experience all the above, must face the additional burden of being slandered as “anti-Semites” and “haters.” I understand why many are unwilling or even afraid to shoulder the burden that the ideal of a free press places on journalists with regard to the gas-chamber controversy. Yet without a free press there are no universities worthy of the name, no government that is not tyrannical, and no society that is not a burden on the lives of its citizens.

The issue here is not ethnicity or religious identity. The issue is intellectual freedom. Weighing evidence is not a hate crime, no matter what Hillel or the ADL says about it. Critiquing a government-sponsored “Holocaust” museum is not a thought crime! And charging that it is hateful to doubt what others sincerely believe is juvenile, particularly on a university campus. What are the real motives of those who would try to convince us otherwise?

The university was created as a place to exchange thought—freely. Students should not be required to ask permission from special interest groups, no matter what their ethnicity, to think for themselves. Even about the “Holocaust.” Whatever else the Holocaust was, it was an historical event. That event, as well as the controversy surrounding it, should be investigated using routine historical methods.

Thirty-odd years have passed since I was a bookseller on Hollywood Boulevard, but my conviction about the importance of intellectual freedom remains today what it was then. In the 1960s I went to court to uphold the right of students to read radical literary works. I am no less convinced today that students have the right to read every research paper that interests them, on any historical controversy whatever, including every single word ever written about the gas-chamber controversy!

Why should they not?

Reconsidering Hitler's Gestapo | CODOH

by Kerry R. Bolton

The Gestapo: The Myth and Reality of Hitler's Secret Police. Frank McDonough. (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 2015).

Dr. Frank McDonough, professor of international history at Liverpool John Moores University, has written a book that will be of much interest to “historical revisionists.” Like Robert N. Proctor’s Nazi War on Cancer<sup>1</sup> it is a revisionist work, and McDonough describes it as such. McDonough is by no means an apologist for any aspect of the Hitler regime. However, McDonough concludes with the obligatory moral outrage; after having questioned the primary assumptions on Gestapo villainy, he ends with a lamentation on how the Gestapo got off so lightly after the war.

McDonough shows mainly through an examination of primary documents that the Gestapo was an efficient police force, small in number, not the omnipresent terror arm of a terror state; scrupulous at all levels with facts and the accuracy of records, focusing on the recruitment of university graduates, particularly to doctoral standard, while retaining the services of mostly non-Nazi, Weimar-regime, career policemen; quick to arrive at conclusions based on objective investigation, and promptly dismissing most accusations brought to their attention without undue delay.

The book opens with an account of the “first Protestant Evangelical preacher killed for defying the Nazi regime on religious grounds,” Paul Schneider, at Buchenwald in 1939. He had been incarcerated there in 1937 after being warned many times about his criticism of the regime, including his ridicule of the stormtrooper martyr Horst Wessel. He had been freed from custody due to the lobbying of his parishioners. Two hundred local ministers, and a crowd of local parishioners attended his funeral.<sup>2</sup> Hence one already might ask questions: Why hadn’t this monstrous terror state quietly eliminated Schneider in 1933, when he had already started critiquing the new regime? Why was he given so many warnings? Why did such a supposedly totalitarian state heed the lobbying for his release by parishioners? Why did he receive a widely attended public funeral, when he might have been quietly executed, and some pretext offered?

Despite the popular, and the academic, image of the Nazi state as all-embracing and Hitler as all-powerful, the German people as brainwashed, and the Gestapo as “a huge organization with agents everywhere,” “in reality any person who accepted and supported the Nazi regime enjoyed enormous individual freedom. Hitler’s regime was hugely popular. Once you appreciate this essential fact you begin to understand the reality of life inside Nazi Germany.”<sup>3</sup>

In 1969 Martin Broszat in The Hitler State questioned the image of the Nazi state and called Hitler a “weak dictator” who presided over many factions.<sup>4</sup> The six-volume study under his direction, Bavaria in the National Socialist Era, examining resistance to Nazi rule, concluded that the regime was not as totalitarian as assumed, and that there had been “much greater latitude to criticize.”<sup>5</sup> German historian Reinhardt Mann examined the Düsseldorf files of the Gestapo and found that the police apparatus was not pervasive, that the organization was much too small. The Gestapo were not “brutal, ideologically committed Nazis,” but mostly veteran career detectives. Mann’s study, states McDonough, was the basis for what has become “the revisionist interpretation” of the Gestapo.<sup>6</sup> The American historian Robert Gellately showed in his 1990 book The Gestapo and German Society, that they relied on public support, and that the “Gestapo posed no real threat to law-abiding citizens in Nazi Germany.” American historian Eric Johnson in his 1999 book The Nazi Terror, based on court files from Cologne and Krefeld and from interviews, showed that loyal Germans were treated with “kid gloves,” and that “most Germans did not fear [the Gestapo] at all.” He did differ from Gellately in considering Gestapo officers as more proactive and brutal. While these studies were limited as to localities, McDonough sought a broader study of Gestapo files.7

Thorough-going professionals

The Gestapo relied on the public for information on state enemies. The assumption that denunciation to the Gestapo meant torture and concentration camps is wrong. The Gestapo spent “an exhaustive amount of time” on cases; “most ended up being dismissed, with no charge, or a surprisingly lenient punishment.” The maximum duration allowed for protective custody was 21 days, but the Gestapo tried to resolve matters before that time. Releases from custody were “the norm, not the exception.” McDonough states that the Gestapo followed “very strict legal guidelines.” The Gestapo had a great deal of autonomy within its own structure. Some cases that carried the death penalty “were often dismissed, without charge,” while some that seem trivial might receive harsh punishment. All cases were investigated with thoroughness.8

In tracing the origins of the Gestapo McDonough alludes to Germany having a long tradition of “political espionage.” He mentions the actions of Ludwig of Bavaria in having subversives spied on in beer halls in 1848, and the creation of political police in Prussia in 1871.9 However, this was no specifically German or Prussian mania. Adam Zamoyski shows that spying on subversives, with a particular suspicion about Freemasons and the Carbonari, reached obsessive heights in the aftermath of the wars with Jacobin and Napoleonic France, prompted in particular by Austria’s Metternich.10 The political police and surveillance in National Socialist Germany seems mild in comparison to the network of informers, spies and letter-opening operatives at post offices throughout Austro-Hungary, Germany, Russia, and England during the 19th century.

The Gestapo arose from what the National Socialists inherited from Prussia, a police apparatus that had before 1933 extensively monitored the Nazi party and secured 40,000 prosecutions against Nazis in that state.11

Rudolf Diels, first Commander of the Gestapo; 1933–1934
Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-K0108-0501-003 / CC-BY-SA 3.0 [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

The omnipresent Gestapo is a myth. In 1933 it started with 1,000 employees. Near the end of the war it had 32,000, including administrators. The localities were “severely understaffed.” For example Cologne in 1942 had 69 officers.<sup>12</sup> Gestapo director Heinrich Müller was a career policeman during the Wilhelmine and Weimar eras. He did not join the Nazi party until 1939. All the section heads in Berlin were likewise career policemen, and most were university graduates. Only one had been a Nazi party member before 1933. The methods used were the same as the regular criminal detective police.<sup>13</sup> However, “enhanced interrogation techniques” were also developed. There was also the SD, which McDonough identifies with the mobile killings in the East.<sup>14</sup> The other regional chiefs were likewise mostly career policemen, usually university-educated, many to doctorate level.<sup>15</sup> “The high ranks of the Gestapo resembled an academic university senior common room more than a police department.” By the late 1930s a university degree, especially in law, was regarded as more important than a police background. The rank-and-file officers were regular police, who even at Nuremberg and under denazification, were mostly exonerated of “crimes against humanity.” They were able to show that they had conducted themselves in a professional and efficient manner.<sup>16</sup>

The Weimar police who became Gestapo officers had already undergone tough experiences. During Weimar they had dealt with murderers, rapists and serious gangsters. They were skilled in “the art of detailed questioning.”<sup>17</sup> However, the Gestapo were not inordinately inhumane according to the police methods and laws of those times, not only in Germany but in comparison to the democracies. Gestapo officers were given detailed instructions on investigating a case in every detail. A state lawyer and an investigating judge were appointed at the outset.

A particularly cogent description by McDonough is that,

The assumption that Gestapo officers arrested individuals, interrogated them brutally, then sent them to a concentration camp, is a myth. Each case was dealt with exhaustively before any decision on punishment was decided upon. Most of those arrested ended up within the traditional justice system, and were charged with a specific crime that was dealt with by the courts. Sending individuals to a concentration camp was always a last resort, especially for an ordinary German citizen who was not linked to the selected target opposition groups. Many of those arrested were released without any charge.<sup>18</sup>

Communists called to account by SA

While the National Socialist Wilhelm Frick became Minister of the Interior, Nazification of the police did not follow a rigorous process. McDonough states that Nazi party membership was not a requirement for recruitment to the political police and subsequent Gestapo, but rather, police experience. Only 7.3 per cent of the police officers were purged when the Nazis assumed government.<sup>19</sup>

A harsh calling to account of opponents in the first few months of Nazi rule was unleashed on the Communists with the sanction of Göring, not by the Gestapo or the SS but by the SA, and it proved “difficult to contain.”<sup>20</sup> However given that the National Socialist assumption to government was a social revolution, it was one of the more bloodless in history in comparison to the revolutions that ushered the modern democratic era, such as the Jacobins with their extermination of the Vendee, and the Bolshevik revolution with its tens of millions of victims.

While Gestapo chief Rudolf Diels, an opportunist, claimed at Nuremberg that up to 7,000 political opponents were killed by the SA during in the first year of Nazi rule, McDonough lowers the figure to 1,000.<sup>21</sup> He also points out that most of the Gestapo were veteran civil servants who tried to restrain the SA.<sup>22</sup>

There are several issues here: (1) This autonomous action by the SA, in conflict with other sections of the party and state, is an indication of the manner in which the Hitler regime was not as totalitarian as supposed and was plagued by factionalism with the personality of Hitler holding disparate elements together even throughout the war. (2) Diels’s testimony at Nuremberg as to the number of SA victims, disputed by McDonough, is an example of the flawed testimony of the proceedings. Why then believe any of it without subjecting the whole lot to scrutiny and doubt?

The Communist Party had its own stormtroopers, the Red Front Fighters League. The fighting between the Nazis and the Reds was a bloody affair. Even the police casualties (1928-1932) from Communist violence resulted in 11 dead and 1,121 injured. Over the same period the Nazi casualties from Red violence were 128 Nazis killed and 19,769 injured.<sup>23</sup> That SA vengeance resulting in perhaps 1,000 dead Communists seems remarkably restrained given the years of conflict.

Punishments

In August 1933 Göring had curtailed the SA and disbanded the “auxiliary police,” strict regulations were enforced, and the Gestapo, supported by the police, were the only agencies empowered with “protective custody.” Hans Frank, the Minister of Justice at Munich, was among the most vocal against SA maltreatment of opponents. The SS took control of the concentration camps. There was a strict code for the treatment of internees. A case of two opponents being maltreated and sent to the Oranienburg concentration camp by the Gestapo in Berlin resulted in an investigation that found against the Gestapo.<sup>24</sup> One might wonder what this epitome of the terror state was doing investigating maltreatment of two opponents by the state political police? Such a procedure must have been unusual for any state in 1933, or today for that matter.

Hermann Göring appoints Heinrich Himmler as head of the Gestapo. Photo April 1934. Bundesarchiv, Bild 183-R96954 / CC-BY-SA 3.0 [CC BY-SA 3.0 de (<http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-sa/3.0/de/deed.en>)], via Wikimedia Commons

With scrutiny from Frick, amidst allegations of mistreatment in the concentration camps, Himmler lectured the Gestapo in October 1934 that with their powers of protective custody they should ensure that all cases are handled speedily and efficiently, with courtesy, and that no loyal citizen should fear arrest.<sup>25</sup> In 1935 the Gestapo was given jurisdiction over the concentration camps, although they continued to be run by the SS.

Opposition groups were investigated as to their threat to the national community. McDonough states that concentration camp numbers until the outbreak of the war did not expand greatly. By the time of the declaration of war, 21,400 prisoners were held in six camps.<sup>26</sup> Those put under protective custody were rarely subjected to torture. The justice ministry frequently reminded the Gestapo that there were severe punishments for the ill-treatment of prisoners.<sup>27</sup>

The most commonly used sanctioned punishment was up to 25 strokes to the buttocks with a bamboo cane, in the presence of a doctor. McDonough alludes to allegations that unofficial punishment included plunging a person into a bath of cold water until nearly asphyxiated, exhaustion exercises and sleep deprivation, crushing testicles, electrical currents through the hands, penis and anus, hanging up prisoners.<sup>28</sup> Whatever the accuracy of the allegations such torture was neither unique to the Gestapo nor widespread.

How then did the Gestapo and broader Nazi official attitudes towards punishment compare to the democracies? Not only was corporal punishment being used by the legal systems of the democracies during the Nazi era but has continued. It might be kept in mind also that this includes times of peace where the punishments are inflicted often on adolescents for minor offenses; not on Communist thugs or wartime spies and saboteurs. In Britain corporal punishment was abolished in 1948 but, with permission of the Home Secretary, could be meted out as punishment for assaulting prison staff until that was abolished in 1967.<sup>29</sup> In Australia individual states could administer corporal punishment, including the “cat,” which was still being used on adult offenders in South Australia up to the 1950s.<sup>30</sup> In Canada corporal punishment on prisoners was abolished in 1972. In 1929 there were 78 floggings by order of the courts, and 72 strappings for breaches of prison discipline. In 1935 the figures were 40 and 50 respectively. In New Zealand judicial whipping for boys under 16 was last used in 1935, and was abolished in 1941.<sup>31</sup> In Delaware, USA, a public mass whipping in 1932 was watched by thousands. The law was abolished in 1972. In Baltimore whippings in jail were carried out “privately” before an invited audience. In Maryland a flogging in 1940 was carried out in public with a cat-o’-nine-tails.<sup>32</sup> In 1936 in Chicago three youths convicted of a $10 robbery “were given five lashes with a double five foot length of three-quarter inch rubber hose in the Chamber of the Boys’ Court.”<sup>33</sup>

“Advanced interrogation” techniques have been a feature of democratic states to the present time, although it is the Third Reich, and specifically the Gestapo, that have become synonymous with torture. Torture was used on a wide scale after the war by the Allies to extract confessions from German prisoners. The trial of the defendants of the “Malmedy massacre” was notable for the interrogation techniques. The defendants had been accused of shooting American soldiers who had surrendered during the Battle of the Bulge in Belgium. Secretary of the Army Kenneth C. Royall established a tribunal to investigate allegations of torture that had been brought to the attention of Senator Joseph McCarthy. The tribunal was headed by Gordon Simpson of the Texas Supreme Court, with Leroy van Roden, Pennsylvania judge, and Lieutenant Colonel Charles W. Lawrence of the U.S. Army.<sup>34</sup> The Simpson Commission recommended the commutation of all death sentences of the Malmedy defendants.<sup>35</sup> While the Simpson Commission report was “bland,” van Roden returned to the USA fully endorsing the allegations that interrogators had subjected the defendants to beatings, including “blows to the genitals,” threats of hanging during interrogations, and refusal of water.<sup>36</sup> Willis M. Everett, appointed by the U.S. Army as chief defense counsel, was uneasy about the number of Jews who were involved in the war crimes process.<sup>37</sup>

A “secret torture prison” was operated at Bad Nenndorf in northwest Germany by the Combined Services Detailed Interrogation Centre (CSDIC), a division of the British War

Office. The center of the township was emptied of people and surrounded with barbed wire. At night the villagers could hear the screams of the prisoners. Most of the interrogators were “German-Jewish refugees.”<sup>38</sup>

Another “secret center” was operated in London where German POW’s could be held and tortured without the knowledge of the Red Cross. In 2005, at the request of The Guardian newspaper, documents were declassified showing the extent of the torture against Germans after the war. The documents refer to “living skeletons,” tortured, beaten and exposed to extreme cold. The prisoners expanded from being members of the Nazi party and the SS to anyone who had succeeded under the Third Reich. They even included Germans who had escaped from the Russian zone and offered to spy for the British. They were tortured – one dying – to determine whether they were sincere. A former diplomat incarcerated at Bad Nenndorf was there because he knew too much about the interrogation techniques, while another was there for eight months due to a clerical error. Apart from physical brutalities, threats to kill a prisoner’s wife and children were accepted techniques of interrogation. An anti-Nazi who had spent two years in Gestapo custody stated he had never experienced such brutality as he had at Bad Nenndorf.<sup>39</sup>

Church and State

McDonough states that the Nazi regime was determined to limit the influence of Christianity. Himmler and Heydrich were both inimical towards Christianity. However, Steigmann-Gall states in The Holy Reich that Hitler sought a unified state church, akin to Britain’s Anglican Church where the Monarch is at the head. He became disillusioned by the lack of unity among the denominations. <sup>40</sup> Despite the indirect measures by Himmler to dissuade the SS from church attendance and the efforts to create an alternative pagan SS religion, Germans remained overwhelmingly Christian, a matter alluded to by McDonough.<sup>41</sup>

There was strain between the State and the Catholic Church, as there had been since the Kulturkampf of Bismarck, and there was the antagonism towards the regime among Protestants centered in the Confessing Church. Given Germany as the home of the Reformation, and the Kulturkampf of the late 19th century against Catholicism, the conflict between the Church and the Nazi regime could be seen as a German rather than as a specifically National Socialist issue.

In 1933, 40 percent of the ministers of the Evangelical Church representing Lutherans and Calvinists, were NSDAP members.<sup>42</sup> A Nazified Christianity organized as the Evangelical Reich Church had majority support among Protestants. They were opposed by a minority headed by the celebrated Martin Niemöller who, far from being anti-Nazi, welcomed Hitler’s assumption to power, but opposed the Nazification of theology. In 1937, to deal with opposition among the religious, section IV-B was created within the Gestapo. McDonough notes that the Gestapo were slow to act against clergymen regardless of their anti-government sermons. When they did act it was often due to complaints from the public. It was “extremely rare” for cases to reach trial. The Gestapo acted with “great caution” on complaints against clergy. A “fair trial was the norm, not the exception.” Niemöller was held in protective custody in 1937 after four years of anti-Nazi polemics. In 1938 a special court found Niemöller not guilty, but Hitler personally intervened, regarding him as the focus of anti-Nazi activity. He survived the war in Sachsenhausen and Dachau.<sup>43</sup> Nonetheless the Confessing Church was not banned, and continued even during the war to submit criticism of the State.<sup>44</sup>

In 1936, 200 Franciscan monks were accused of sexually abusing children, and 1000 priests and monks were allegedly awaiting trial in 1937.<sup>45</sup> Given the widespread allegations across the world of child sexual abuse among priests and brothers within the Church over the past few decades, one might look on these accusations in Nazi in Germany with mixed feelings. The mass media of today's democracies seem keen to sensationalize alleged abuse among the Catholic clergy, while there is scant reporting of alleged abuse among other religions. The most underreported of all seems to be that taking place within Judaism.46 Is the Church today being targeted as it was by Nazi Germany, but for aims and by interests quite different?47

At any rate, church attendance actually increased under the Nazis. Hess pointed out "a religion that has influence, indeed dominated, the life of the people for two thousand years cannot be overcome by external measures and certainly not by superficial ridicule." In September 1939 church leaders declared their total commitment to German victory,48 but those such as Heydrich maintained their anti-church position. In 1939 the biggest confrontation between the regime and the church involved euthanasia, and it was an issue that saw the regime backing off. In 1941 actions against the church were officially discontinued, but suspicion remained as to loyalties. The aim was to keep the church from exercising its prior political influence.49

An easier target was the Jehovah's Witnesses, whose pacifism and refusal to bend to any earthly authority was seen as subversive to morale. The attitude of the Nazis towards the JW's was no different from that of the democratic authorities. In 1935 the JW organization was banned.50 They seem to have been the most troublesome and stubborn of inmates in the internment camps, refusing to stand to attention during roll call or work.51 However JW's were not herded up en masse and sent to camps. Their cases were individually reviewed, and they had the option of signing a statement of loyalty to the State. Sentences were of limited duration, but there was a shortsighted determination to try and force the JW's to renounce their faith, and some brutal consequences in the camps.

In the democracies the JW's were the first to be banned during the war. Being a member was sufficient to get one interned or jailed. They were sent to internment camps along with other Christians opposed to conscription. The New Zealand Marxist writer Murray Horton states that up to 12 detention camps were established in the North Island of New Zealand for pacifists.52 Up to 800 conscientious objectors were interned or jailed for the duration of the war, according to Horton. Seventy-eight were JW's. JW's were banned in Australia in 1941, as was the Communist Party.53 In Canada hundreds of Jehovah's Witnesses were arrested. John Diefenbaker, Canadian civil-liberties lawyer, politician and post-war prime minister, stated that about 500 JW's had been prosecuted for their membership.54

Communists

There were 360,000 KPD members. The first year of the regime 60,000 were arrested and 2000 died.55 The Nazi and Communist parties had been in a state of war since the start, and as alluded to previously, many Nazis had been killed and injured by the Communists. The SA had fought a tough battle with the Red Front. In the aftermath of World War I, prior to the formation of the Nazi party, and during its embryonic stages, the Communists had engaged in bloody uprisings and fought the State authorities.

McDonough mentions that on the day Hitler assumed the chancellorship, the Communist Party issued a call for mass strikes. Ernst Thälmann, head of the Communist Party, continued to call for revolution. In July 1933, half a year after Hitler's chancellorship, Communists killed two SA men in a street fight in Cologne.56 The Communist Party was not immediately outlawed, even in the aftermath of the Reichstag Fire. The Gestapo started the suppression of Communist literature in earnest in 1934.

The previous year Thälmann had already been taken into “protective custody,” and wound up in Buchenwald. McDonough repeats the usual claim that Thälmann was executed there in August 1944, having been kept in solitary confinement.<sup>57</sup> At the time the Allies were bombing Buchenwald and hundreds of internees died. The official claim was that Thälmann had died in a bombing raid. While Thälmann was lauded as a martyr in post-war Soviet Germany there are several inconsistencies in the official version of his martyrdom and even as to the camp at which he died. What is curious is a passing allusion to Thälmann by Paul Rassinier, French pacifist leader, interned at Buchenwald and Dora. He mentions that he briefly encountered Thälmann at Buchenwald when he “felt a terrible blow,” having been distracted by a conversation and straying a little from a line of internees. Someone explained: “You could have been more careful; that’s Thälmann.”<sup>58</sup> From this bare mention it seems that Thälmann was a Kapo.

Rassinier states that the internment camps quickly became self-governing and there was rivalry for control among the “greens” or common criminals” and the “reds” or political prisoners. Lt. Col. Donald B. Robinson, chief historian for the U.S. Military Government in Germany, wrote of a U.S. Army report on Buchenwald:

The U. S. Army probe uncovered detailed evidence that a band of three hundred German Communist prisoners had seized control of a self-government system set up by the Nazis among the inmates of Buchenwald, and had then employed it to command and terrorize the camp population. The Communists’ victims were numbered in the thousands... It appeared that prisoners who agreed with the Communists ate; those who didn’t starved to death. Those who openly opposed the Communists were beaten, tortured or killed. It was stated categorically by the Army report that: “The Communist trustees were directly responsible for a large part of the brutalities committed at Buchenwald .... Not all the beatings and killings were done by the SS guards.” A list of German Communist trustees who committed such acts was compiled by the Army. At the head of it was a man named Hauptmann, who was the Assistant Camp Chief (Kontrollleur). Of him, the report asserted: <sup>59</sup>

Eye-witness testifies that Hauptmann kicked prisoners in the testicles and beat them but always stopped when under observation of certain individuals known to have connections outside the camp. Hauptmann speaks English well. He talks like a sadist, his eyes gleaming with pleasure as he tells how ‘we disciplined this camp.’ Like many of the Communist leaders, ‘discipline’ is his favorite word.<sup>60</sup>

An interesting aside is the mention that in 1943 Polish inmates who had run Auschwitz were transferred to Buchenwald. They tried to assume the same position, and were killed by the Communist faction.<sup>61</sup>

The hospital staff at Buchenwald was composed “almost 100 percent” of German Communists. The camp elder and his deputy were Communists. Most of the drugs and food went to Communist Party patients. The Labour Office, Food Supply and Property Room were also under Communist control. Communists controlled the distribution of Red Cross food parcels. When the U.S. Army entered the camp they found the 300 remaining German Communists “dressed like prosperous businessmen.” <sup>62</sup> An unseen directorate of the Communist Party gave instructions to the Communist Buchenwald trustees. These directives were received from the Communist Party which retained an underground network throughout Germany. A courier travelled out of Buchenwald to receive party directives. It was discovered in September 1944 that the Buchenwald Communists were part of a plot to overthrow Hitler.<sup>63</sup> If Thälmann was executed several weeks previously, perhaps the time frame is sufficient to consider that he was found to be one of the plot leaders.

The German Communists were despised even by the Soviet POWs and other Communists. When the camp was taken by the Americans, these comrades sought a measure of revenge through beatings. Further retaliation was prevented by the Communists, who had stolen guns and grenades, which they used to drive out the SS guards and dominate the other internees until the Americans arrived.<sup>64</sup>

One might imagine what Germany would have been like had Thälmann and his party defeated Hitler. Stalin did not think much of the prospect either. While five members of the party Politburo were executed by the Nazis, in the “refuge” of the USSR seven were liquidated; and 41 of the 68 party leaders.<sup>65</sup> McDonough adds “70 percent of the German Communist exiles were killed in Stalin’s brutal political purges.” McDonough also states the “irony” of Stalin having killed more Communist leaders than Hitler. He saw them as internationalists and Trotskyites.<sup>66</sup>

In Germany, however, with Communists as with those accused of other anti-state activities, the Gestapo investigations sought to arrive quickly and efficiently at the truth, mindful that informants might be motivated by personal vendettas. McDonough’s book largely contains personal accounts among whom were those accused of Communist sympathies, who were quickly exonerated or were given short custodial sentences.<sup>67</sup> The example of Peter Penk, a petty troublemaker, thief, vandal, smuggler, and drunk-driver causing bodily harm, given to making pro-Communist, anti-Hitler remarks when drunk, is one which McDonough describes as being treated with “remarkable leniency by the Gestapo over a long period.” He was drafted into the army.<sup>68</sup> McDonough also refers to the lenient treatment given to a Communist group attempting to disrupt defense work in 1938 by bullying other workers, resulting in short prison sentences.<sup>69</sup> Another case of youthful delinquency at a factory, seeming to point to Communist activism, wasted “an enormous amount of time” for the Gestapo, but resulted in their release from jail within a few days and all charges dropped.<sup>70</sup> The Gestapo found that the parents were decent working-class folk living on unemployment benefits. Even during the war there were those who continued repeatedly to make pro-Communist and defeatist statements in public who were treated leniently because they did not pose any serious threat to the “national community.”

Illicit relations

The Gestapo spent a great deal of time investigating alleged forbidden sexual liaisons between Germans and foreign workers during the war. It might be contended that this was at least partly to prevent abuse of foreign workers in a vulnerable situation by Germans. McDonough states that while public humiliation might involve being put in a town pillory, “far more typical” was a private warning.<sup>71</sup>

McDonough refers to a Jewish man being paraded through the streets in Würzburg for having sexual relations with a German woman, after complaints from residents. The man had to wear a sign reading “I have lived out of wedlock with a German woman.” He was placed in “protective custody for two weeks.<sup>72</sup>

Such situations hardly compare in the aftermath of the war, with the thousands of women who had their heads shaved, were stripped, some carrying babies, paraded through the streets, assaulted and sometimes killed as “collaborators.” The then-famous author and journalist Sisley Huddleston, who lived in Vichy France for the duration of the war, observed that the “liberation” period of 1944-1946 was the bloodiest in France’s history, far exceeding that of the Jacobin era. Huddleston estimates a minimal figure of 100,000 French men, women, and “even children” murdered during the “liberation” by fellow Frenchmen.<sup>73</sup> American service figures put the number of murdered at 80,000 “during the first months” of “Liberation”. Adrian Tixier, minister of the interior, put the number at 105,000 during August 1944 to March 1945. <sup>74</sup> Communists of various nationalities in France cut with razors and burned with cigarettes their victims, beat them with cowhide whips, and scalded their feet. “There were many cases of rape.” Those who died from torture were tossed from windows, and called suicides.<sup>75</sup>

Wartime policing

Another role of the Gestapo was the investigation of sabotage and subversion among foreign workers. German Communists were active among them. McDonough states that “all the Gestapo cases we’ve looked at involving alleged communists were investigated thoroughly and exhaustively. Numerous witnesses were brought in for questioning. Each case was treated with professional diligence and efficiency.”<sup>76</sup> The seriousness of each case was based on its individual character, and the most-severe were placed in “protective custody.” The picture that emerges, even during war, was that people were not routinely herded en masse and sent to concentration camps on flimsy pretexts. If someone was held in custody he or she could expect to be released within a few days if an efficient investigation found them innocent or the matter trivial.

McDonough estimates that 26 per cent of all Gestapo cases started with denunciation from a member of the public, and 15 per cent as a result of Gestapo surveillance. Most denouncers were working-class, 20 per cent were women, and a lot of the latter involved domestic issues, many resulting from a personal conflict with a neighbor, relative or husband. The Gestapo became “adept” at discovering the motive. The denouncer was seldom prosecuted for making false accusations.<sup>77</sup> So far from meaning a sentence of death, McDonough states that sentences for anti-Nazi slurs were one to six months’ imprisonment.<sup>78</sup> “Contrary to the popular assumption, there was not a flood of denunciations.”<sup>79</sup> The Gestapo handled accusations against normally law-abiding individuals “with professional diligence and often surprising compassion.” “It was not even unusual” for individuals to formally complain if they regarded Gestapo actions as “high handed.” <sup>80</sup> Civil complaints could be heard in court.

Conditions became stricter with the advent of war. Although one might be jailed for up to two years for listening to a foreign broadcast, one might instead be named and shamed in the local press. Again cases came usually from public information, not Gestapo surveillance.<sup>81</sup> McDonough refers to a case where the Gestapo officer acted with “understanding and compassion” in persuading an informant to drop a complaint prompted by someone’s drunken bravado.<sup>82</sup>

One of the most bizarre cases was that of an unemployed alcoholic laborer, Adam Lipper, who in 1940 walked into a Gestapo office and asked to be interned for six months, to cure his alcoholism. He wanted to be a valuable member of the national community. He was released after seven weeks, having assessed himself cured.<sup>83</sup>

As the war entered the phase of German defeat, the situation became harsher, with some rather trivial cases of “looting” bombed-out houses resulting in death sentences, yet only a minority of cases went to court, and of those only a minority succeeded in conviction. “Gestapo brutality is almost entirely absent” in cases of denunciation of ordinary citizens. The Gestapo was an organization “that the law-abiding public felt it could trust.”<sup>84</sup>

“Social outsiders”

The Gestapo was obliged to become increasingly active in the containment of “social outsiders,” who were defined mainly on their sociopathic character traits and inability to contribute to the “national community.” McDonough refers to the “eugenic” character of Nazi attitudes in this regard. However, he points out that at the time eugenics was a scientifically reputable and widespread movement, with eugenic laws in Switzerland, Denmark, Norway, Sweden (until 1975) and the USA, that focused on sterilizing “asocial” elements.<sup>85</sup> Again, this was not a matter of wildly condemning individuals en masse. Each case was individually investigated through Hereditary Health Courts, and on the recommendation of two physicians and a lawyer. There were also eighteen appeal courts, although most appeals were unsuccessful.<sup>86</sup>

Castration for repeat sex offenders, rapists and pedophiles was common, resulting in large decreases in those crimes. For habitual criminals after more than two convictions, the third was a life sentence. Although strict treatment for petty crime was not successful,<sup>87</sup> there were large reductions for repeat offending and the overall crime rate.<sup>88</sup>

The “asocial” element of habitual criminals in 1942 began to be worked to death in what McDonough calls “yet another example of the broad genocide policy being carried out by the Nazi regime.”<sup>89</sup> The “work-shy,” those who had, being fit for work, quit two jobs without reason, and refused employment, started to be interned in 1938 as forced labor. McDonough claims that they could be the subjects of medical experiments.<sup>90</sup>

In the USA medical experiments were conducted on a large scale before, during and after the Nazi era. The most well-known is that of the U.S. Public Health Service study of untreated syphilis among 400 Negroes in Tuskegee, Alabama, for forty years (1932-1972). They were deceived into thinking they were receiving treatment, but the aim was to let syphilis take its fatal course. Allan M. Brandt states:

The subjects of the study were never told they were participating in an “experiment.” Treatment that could have cured them was deliberately withheld, and many of the men were prevented from seeing physicians who could have helped them. As a result, scores of people died painful deaths, others became permanently blind or insane, and the children of several were born with congenital syphilis.<sup>91</sup>

Another study on syphilis was undertaken by the U.S. in Guatemala among 696 unwitting prison inmates, mental patients and residents of an army barracks, infected for the purpose, during 1946-1948:

The doctors used prostitutes with the disease to pass it to the prisoners (since sexual visits were allowed by law in Guatemalan prisons) and then did direct inoculations made from syphilis bacteria poured onto the men’s penises or on forearms and faces that were slightly abraded when the “normal exposure” produced little disease, or in a few cases through spinal punctures. Unlike in Alabama, the subjects were then given penicillin after they contracted the illness. However, whether everyone was then cured is not clear and not everyone received what was even then considered adequate treatment.<sup>92</sup>

As for being worked to death as part of a genocidal program, after the war the use of German POWs as slave labor became wide-scale in the Allied states. German internees were not classified as POWs since the war ended with unconditional surrender. A notable feature was their use to clear minefields. In France where 740,000 prisoners had been transferred by the USA, French authorities estimated that 2,000 a month were being maimed or killed.<sup>93</sup> In Norway, according to Professor Anders Gokstad, by the end of August 1945 275 German prisoners had been killed clearing mines, and 392 maimed. Initially victims did not receive hospital attention.94

American military historian Dr. S. P. MacKenzie writes that “callous self-interest and a desire for retribution” motivated the use of forced labor of German prisoners who were sick and malnourished.95 The French journal Figaro wrote that “In certain camps... living skeletons may be seen, almost like those in German concentration camps, and deaths of undernourishment are numerous. We learn that prisoners have been savagely and systematically beaten and that some have been employed in removing mines without protection equipment...”96 Louis Clair wrote of an Orleans camp where the commander received 16 francs per head for food, but spent nine francs for himself, so prisoners were kept starving. A young French soldier wrote of prisoners dying of hunger, sleeping on cold cement floors, without shelter. At a camp in Langres a witness wrote of seeing prisoners beaten with rifle butts and kicked when they broke down through overwork.97 As Bacque has shown, Eisenhower’s idea of an internment camp was nothing so lavish as to include concrete floors. The U.S. camps were fields surrounded by fences, where shelter was whatever internees could dig out of the mud with their hands. Bacque estimates that 167,000 to 314,241 German soldiers died under French internment,98 and at least 800,000 under U.S. internment.99

Gypsies

Unsurprisingly, Gypsies were affected by Germany’s actions against vagabonds and other “asocial” elements. However, Gypsies were not treated in an undifferentiated manner, despite the references McDonough cites on the “Gypsy plague” etc. “Pure Gypsies” and travellers were exempted from internment at Auschwitz, which began in 1943. Those who agreed to sterilization were also exempted. They were in large part regarded as having descended from Aryans. Bormann opposed Himmler’s exemption policy and appealed to Hitler, who backed Himmler.100 Carlo Mattogno gives a wider view of the Gypsy policies. He shows that there were wide criteria for exemptions from deportation, including Gypsies of pure race, good racial crossings, those who had fixed employment and accommodation, servicemen and ex-servicemen. Families who were deported were kept together. They were not forced to work and could keep their own clothes, valuables and money. There were efforts to maintain rations on the same level as those of German citizens. At the request of Dr. Mengele a nursery was established at Auschwitz and other facilities for children and mothers. 101

The categorization of Gypsies based on “blood purity” seems to have been a usual practice at the time, not limited to Nazi racial theory. A present-day commentator observes:

Crucially, for these stereotypes to find resonance in modern Britain, gypsiologists constructed a theory around the decline in the racial purity of Gypsies as they increasingly mixed and married with ‘degenerate’ members of the settled population. They developed a racial hierarchy which placed ‘pure-blooded’ Gypsies, who were believed to speak the best Romany, at the top; followed by ‘didikais’, half-breeds, or ‘pikies’ – groups with varying proportions of Gypsy blood depending on which source one reads; and ‘mumpers’, who were vagrants with no Romany ancestry, at the bottom.102

Jewish issues

McDonough states that German Jews were so assimilated into Germany that 44 per cent were married to Gentiles. He mentions the high proportion of Jews who fought in World War I and the amazing proportion of those who received valor awards.<sup>103</sup> As I have documented elsewhere, most German Jews rejected Zionism as much as they rejected Communism. Many were avid German nationalists.<sup>104</sup> There could have been an accord between German Jews and the Third Reich based on a genuine symbiosis. Zionists did their utmost to prevent this, and worked with the Nazis in opposing assimilation. Between Nazi race doctrine and Jewish race doctrine there was a commonality of aims.<sup>105</sup>

McDonough alludes to the influence Jews had within Germany as something more tangible than Nazi “scapegoating.” Among the statistics he cites is that in 1928 80 percent of the leading members of Berlin’s stock exchange were Jewish.<sup>106</sup> Arguably of more significance than the proportion of Jewish physicians, businessmen, and bankers, were the Jews conspicuous as leaders of not only Marxism, but of the filth and decay of the Weimar era, the promoters of what the Nazis called “cultural degeneracy” in the arts and theatre, and new social experiments that offended traditional morality. Nahum Goldmann, a leader of World Zionism stated, “in literature they were represented by illustrious names. The theatre was largely in their hands. The daily press.... was owned or controlled by them.”<sup>107</sup>

Heydrich is quoted as saying that younger generations of Jews must be induced to leave. Normal life became increasingly restrictive.<sup>108</sup> “The first concrete measure against Jews” was a one-day boycott on Jewish shops on April 1, 1933.<sup>109</sup> Apart from some menacing behavior in the streets by the SA, McDonough does not state much happening of a serious nature. The boycott was organized, according to Dr. Goebbels, to dissuade world Jewry from its propaganda campaign against Germany, in the hope that if they saw their brethren in Germany being economically pinched they would desist.<sup>110</sup> At this time, Goebbels refers to the “horror propaganda” against Germany. The references are confirmed by Samuel Untermyer’s allegations of “starvation,” “torture” and “annihilation” in his August boycott speech cited below. The “atrocities propaganda” had been directed against Germany as soon as Hitler assumed the chancellorship. Goebbels on the eve of the boycott refers to “many” among the National Socialists being “downhearted and apprehensive,” believing that the boycott would lead to war. He writes that the boycott will stop after a day in the hope that “the stories of horrors cease abroad.”<sup>111</sup> Driving around the streets, he observed “perfect discipline” among the public and the SA.<sup>112</sup> Within several days Goebbels referred to the “horrors propaganda” abroad being “perceptibly lessened.” The cabinet therefore decided not to resume the boycott.<sup>113</sup>

In comparison to the one-day boycott, the leaders of world Jewry had in August 1933 not only organized an international boycott of Germany, but declared themselves “at war.” Samuel Untermyer, after returning to the USA from a tour of Europe during which he attended the World Economic Conference at Amsterdam, which was organizing the international boycott, stated on Station WABC, carried by the press around the world, that this was a “holy war.” He referred to Jews in Germany being slaughtered, starved and annihilated, and “of terrors worse than death.” An “economic boycott against all German goods, shipping and services.” Untermyer claimed that there was an ongoing boycott of Jewish shops in Germany, that “hundreds” of Jewish shopkeepers were being paraded through the streets and jailed, “starving and torturing them in vile concentration camps.” Untermyer alluded for comparison to the phony atrocities in Belgium of which Germany had been accused during World War I. He aimed to revive the allegations. Aspects of his talk in 1933 read like a script for the atrocity stories that have continued unremittingly against Germany ever since. It seems as though the “atrocities propaganda” of World War I was being resurrected within the first year of Hitler’s chancellorship to instigate a “holy war.” Not only should German products be boycotted, but “you must refuse to deal with any merchant or shopkeeper who sells any German-made goods or who patronizes German ships or shipping.” Those Jews who continued to patronize German shops should have “their names heralded far and wide [as] .... traitors to their race.”<sup>114</sup>

However, the boycott campaign had started prior to the Untermyer announcement. The Zionist Association of Germany had on March 26 1933 telegraphed leading American Jews protesting against “the anti-German propaganda, “the mendacious atrocity reports and reckless sensational news,” being used for political purposes by “other states and groups.”<sup>115</sup> Two days earlier the American Jewish Congress convened to organize “a national program of highly visible protests, parades, and demonstrations, culminating in a “giant anti-Nazi rally” at Madison Square Garden on March 27,<sup>116</sup> with others through the USA.<sup>117</sup> The Jewish War Veterans, with the backing of the American Jewish Congress staged a boycott march on March 23. They were backed by the American Federation of Labor, the British Labor Party and trades unions.<sup>118</sup> In London placards proclaiming “Boycott German Goods” “spread infectiously,” and were in the windows of most exclusive West End shops. Automobiles adorned with banners cruised through the retail areas. “Everywhere store signs warned German salesmen not to enter.” British Catholics were urged to join the protest by the Archbishop of Liverpool.<sup>119</sup> Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, the most eminent Jewish leader in the USA, told Germany’s Jewish leaders that despite their pleas, the agitation would continue, regardless of conditions in Germany.<sup>120</sup> Simultaneous with the U.S. rallies, mass boycott meetings were held throughout Poland. In London teenagers patrolled the streets to enforce the boycott, and in the USA East Coast stores were picketed. “And a steady publicity program was being well received by the U.S. media.”<sup>121</sup> Such was the embargo that the prestigious Dresdner Bank, writing to France’s Societe General Bank of the false stories about Germany, was rudely rebuffed.<sup>122</sup> That month the Reichsbank could not so much as raise a RM 40 million loan from London banks; the Investor’s Review of 5 August confidently predicted the end of the Hitler regime before the New Year.<sup>123</sup>

The comments by Goebbels about “horror propaganda” were apparently no exaggeration. What he seems to have misstated is that after Germany’s response of a one-day boycott, the Germanophobia perceptibly decreased. Rather, when Reichsbank President Schacht went to the USA in May 1933, there was an anti-Nazi tumult. He realized that the anti-German propaganda and boycott would not only continue but would spread.<sup>124</sup> Edwin Black, a Jewish academic, a son of “survivors,” writes that the boycott movement encouraged Polish militarists who wanted to invade Germany. No amount of threats or conciliation by Germany was working. The boycott movement was spread from Argentina to Australia. Germany faced a replay of the starvation of Winter 1919, when there had been an economic blockade. The boycott slogan was “Germany will crack this winter.”<sup>125</sup>

While Untermyer et al were conducting a “horrors propaganda” campaign throughout the world from the start of the Hitler regime claiming Jews were being tortured, starved and annihilated, McDonough states that “contrary to popular myth, the Gestapo did not place a high priority on persecuting law-abiding Jews in the first two years of Hitler’s rule.” In Krefeld City, eight Jews were arrested during 1933, and seven of those were communist activists.

Matters escalated in 1935 with increasing restrictions on Jews. That year the Nuremberg Laws were enacted.<sup>126</sup> Jews were divided by the Nuremberg Laws into full-Jews (Volljuden) and half-Jews (Mischlinge). Oddly for a regime based on race purity as an ideal, and moreover one supposedly intent on exterminating the Jewish race, the part-Jews were not interned; nor were Jewish partners in mixed marriages.<sup>127</sup> However, the Nuremberg Laws did make sexual relations between Jews and “Aryans” illegal, and the Gestapo was responsible for investigating “race defilement” allegations.<sup>128</sup> The usual sentence was an 18-month prison term. Three people were required to corroborate a charge for it to proceed, keeping the number of cases proceeding low.<sup>129</sup> However, in 1938 Jews who had been arrested for breaching the Nuremberg Laws were ordered rearrested. The assassination of a German diplomat in Paris by Herschel Grynszpan in November 1938 unleashed anti-Semitic reactions throughout Germany, the so-called Kristallnacht. Although ten thousand Jews were sent to concentration camps, most were released within six weeks.<sup>130</sup> While the extent of Kristallnacht has been disputed by revisionists, it seems reasonable to expect that measures would become increasingly strident to encourage Jews to leave, and McDonough states that after this regulations increased as did the “exodus” of Jews departing.<sup>131</sup> McDonough states that it was Heydrich who insisted that Jews be deported from the Old Reich, as ghettos in Germany would breed disease and crime. The Gestapo organized the deportations with the assistance of the local Jewish community leaders.<sup>132</sup> In February 1943, when 1700 Jewish men married to German women were going to be deported from Berlin and their wives protested, they were released on the order of Goebbels, as gauleiter of the city.<sup>133</sup>

Lamentations

McDonough, having disposed of most of the primary assumptions, concludes by lamenting that, despite being classified as a “criminal organization” along with the SS and SD, the Gestapo largely avoided the victor’s vengeance. However, McDonough alludes to the testimony of Dr. Werner Best, head of Gestapo administration and personnel in Berlin during 1936 to 1940. “It was Werner Best who originally shattered the myths surrounding the Gestapo, many years before historians ever dealt with the subject in detail.” In what McDonough calls a “revisionist interpretation” of the Gestapo, he states that Best’s testimony was clearly laid out. He stated that the Gestapo were the most poorly paid of the police, that they were understaffed, and half of those were in administration, that the impression of the Gestapo as a vast organization spying on the mass of Germans is incorrect. Gestapo agents were continually in contact with the families of inmates, who were kept informed about release dates. Gestapo officers advised families on welfare benefit entitlements while relatives were in custody. “Advanced interrogation techniques” were only used in serious cases of treason, under strict guidelines, and confessions were not extorted under questioning.<sup>134</sup>

Karl-Heinz Hoffmann, a senior manager of the Gestapo, stated that protective custody was kept brief, internment to a concentration camp was recommended only for the most incorrigible, dangerous cases. Brutal treatment and torture were strictly prohibited. Cases of brutality went to criminal court. Hoffmann cited cases of two Gestapo officers in Düsseldorf who were sent to prison by a criminal court for mistreating prisoners. In Denmark, where Hoffmann later served with Werner Best, who was governor, Hoffmann stated that “enhanced interrogations” were used more frequently against the resistance, but even here were not extensive.<sup>135</sup> The defense counsel was “very ably handled by Dr. Rudolf Merkel.”<sup>136</sup> Nonetheless the Nuremberg judgment maintained that the Gestapo was a criminal organization, and that Gestapo employees other than those in minor roles, were complicit. However, no collective, follow-up trial of the Gestapo was held. Most Gestapo officers were exonerated.

McDonough seems to regard the Allied occupation regime, the era of the Morgenthau Plan, as lenient. Many Gestapo officers were intent on clearing their names, but faced the testimony of their victims. That these victims might simply lie does not seem to be entertained by McDonough. However, even those who were prosecuted received a few years’ prison and were exonerated when released. The West German courts during 1945-1950 “only” convicted 5,228 defendants.<sup>137</sup> Also lamentable for McDonough is that insufficient numbers of denouncers have been convicted.<sup>138</sup>

With the advent of the Cold War era the democratic Allies sought Germans as frontline cannon fodder against the USSR, and stopped pursuing the Morgenthau vision of a vanishing Germany through de-industrialization and starvation.<sup>139</sup> McDonough accepts the DDR as having more vigorously pursued Nazis, the Soviets making much of themselves as a bulwark against a revival of Nazism in Germany. Matters changed in 1960 when Eichmann was brought to trial in Israel, and this gave an impetus for the reinvigoration of war-crimes investigations.

McDonough concludes with the lamentation that Werner Best avoided trial after previously having served time in jail and being fined 70,000 RM. Since he was ill, the West German authorities adjourned his case in 1972. He died in 1989 “having never paid for his extensive crimes against humanity during the Nazi era. Nor did the Gestapo.”<sup>140</sup> After reading McDonough’s book, however, one might be left with the question: what “extensive crimes”?

In writing the book it was not McDonough’s brief to examine the Gestapo and the Nazi era in the context of the times. Few, if any, books have done this. The aim of this article has been to show that what was inhumane about Nazism was not unique to it. Race laws, eugenics, sterilization of criminals and homosexuals, forced labor, corporal punishment, internment of enemy aliens, jailing of the political opposition, medical experiments, etc., have been common in democracies across the world before, during and after the Nazi era. More unique to the Third Reich were the innovations in social welfare, animal welfare, ecology, organic food and public health, banking, and public housing that have been left largely unknown due to the inordinate fetish with alleged Nazi sadism. While the USA and others profited after the war from the appropriation of German weapons technology, no similar interest was shown in research undertaken on cancer during the Nazi era, for example. The smokescreen of atrocity propaganda, which has not abated since 1933, has enabled such one-sided treatment. The image of the Gestapo has been a primary factor in this obfuscation. McDonough’s book joins a growing number of scholarly works from mainstream historians and publishers that throws “revisionist” light on some aspects of the subject.

---

Notes:

1	Robert N. Proctor, The Nazi War on Cancer (Oxfordshire: Princeton University Press, 1999).
2	McDonough, pp. 1-2.
3	Ibid, p. 4.
4	Ibid.
5	Ibid, p. 5.
6	Ibid.
7	Ibid, p. 7.
8	Ibid, p. 9.
9	Ibid, p. 11.
10	Adam Zamoyski, Phantom Terror: The Threat of Revolution and the Suppression of Liberty 1789-1848 (London: William Collins, 2014).

11	McDonough, p. 12.
12	Ibid, p. 43.
13	Ibid, p. 45.
14	Ibid, p. 48.
15	Ibid, p. 49.
16	Ibid, p. 51.
17	Ibid, p. 52.
18	Ibid, p. 54.
19	Ibid, p. 20.
20	Ibid.
21	Ibid, p. 21.
22	Ibid, p. 20.
23	Major Francis Yeats-Brown, European Jungle (London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1939), p. 146.
24	Ibid, p. 22.
25	Ibid, p. 39.
26	Ibid, p. 54.
27	Ibid, p. 57.
28	Ibid, p. 58.
29	World Corporal Punishment Research., http://www.corpun.com/counukj.htm
30	Online: http://www.corpun.com/counauj.htm
31	Online: http://www.corpun.com/rules2.htm
32	Online: http://www.corpun.com/13archive/usj01307.htm#24577
33	“Use rubber hose to whip youth for $10 robbery,” Chicago Daily Tribune , July 24, 1936.
34	James J. Weingartner, Crossroads of Death: the Story of the Malmedy Massacre and Trial , (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979), p. 190.
35	Ibid, p. 193.
36	Ibid, p. 194.
37	Ibid, p. 169.
38	Ian Cobain, “Britain’s Secret Torture Chamber: The Interrogation Centre that Turned Prisoners into Living Skeletons,” The Guardian , December 17, 2005, http://www.theguardian.com/uk/2005/dec/17/secondworldwar.topstories3?guni=Article:in%20body%20link
39	Ibid.

40	Richard Steigmann-Gall, The Holy Reich: Nazi Conceptions of Christianity 1919-1945 (Cambridge University press, 2003).
41	McDonough, p. 92.
42	Ibid, p. 63.
43	Ibid, pp. 66-67.
44	Ibid, p. 68.
45	Ibid, p. 75.
46	Sharon Otterman, "Ultra-Orthodox Shun Their Own for Reporting Child Sexual Abuse," New York Times , May 9, 2012, http://www.nytimes.com/2012/05/10/nyregion/ultra-orthodox-jews-shun-their-own-for-reporting-child-sexual-abuse.html
47	See for example the comments by Monsignor Giacomo Babini in 2010: http://www.salon.com/2010/04/12/bishop_blames_pedophilia_jews_open2010/
48	McDonough, p. 79.
49	Ibid, p. 84.
50	Ibid, p. 85.
51	Ibid, p. 86.
52	Murray Horton, Red Line , July 20, 2011, https://rdln.wordpress.com/2011/07/20/the-secret-history-of-ww2/
53	R. Douglas, "Law War and Liberty: The World War II Subversion Prosecutions," Melbourne University Law Review , Vol. 27, 2003, p. 79.
54	Ibid, p. 107.
55	McDonough, p. 93.
56	Ibid, p. 97.
57	Ibid, p. 96.
58	Paul Rassinier, Debunking the Genocide Myth (Torrance, Cal.: Noontide Press, 1978), p. 32.
59	Donald B. Robinson, "The Communist Atrocities at Buchenwald," American Mercury , October 1946, pp. 397-404.
60	Ibid, citing U.S. Army report, p. 400.; http://www.unz.org/Pub/AmMercury-1946oct-00397
61	Ibid.
62	Ibid, p. 401.
63	Ibid, p. 402.
64	Ibid, p. 403.
65	Richard Overy: The Dictators: Hitler's Germany and Stalin's Russia (London: Allen Lane, 2004), p. 201.

66	McDonough, p. 99.
67	Ibid, p. 107.
68	Ibid, pp. 107-110.
69	Ibid, p. 113.
70	Ibid, p. 116.
71	Ibid, p. 125.
72	Ibid, p. 196.
73	Sisley Huddleston, France The Tragic Years 1939-1947: An Eye-Witness Account on War, Occupation and Liberation (New York: Devin-Adair, 1955), p. 297; https://archive.org/stream/francethetragic006833mbp#page/n15/mode/1up
74	Ibid, p. 299.
75	Ibid, p. 318.
76	McDonough, p. 128.
77	Ibid, p. 130.
78	Ibid, p. 131.
79	Ibid, p. 132.
80	Ibid, p. 134.
81	Ibid, p. 144.
82	Ibid, p. 152.
83	Ibid, p. 155.
84	Ibid, p. 158.
85	Ibid, p. 162.
86	Ibid, p. 163.
87	Ibid, p. 169.
88	Ibid, p. 170.
89	Ibid, p. 171.
90	Ibid, p. 173.
91	Allan M. Brandt, "Racism and Research: The Case of the Tuskegee Syphilis Study," Hastings Center Magazine , December 1978, The Hastings Center, Institute of Society, Ethics and the Life Sciences, New York; http://www.med.navy.mil/bumed/Documents/Healthcare%20Ethics/Racism-And-Research.pdf

92	Susan M. Reverby, "Normal Exposure' and Inoculation Syphilis: A PHS 'Tuskegee' Doctor in Guatemala, 1946-48," Journal of Policy History , Special Issue on Human Subjects January 2010; http://academics.wellesley.edu/WomenSt/Synopsis%20Reverby%20%27Normal%20Exposure%27.pdf
93	S. P. MacKenzie "The Treatment of Prisoners of War in World War II," The Journal of Modern History , Vol. 66, No. 3. (Sep., 1994), pp. 487–520.
94	Jonas Tjersland, "Tyske soldater brukt som mineryddere," April 9 2006, VG Nyheter, http://www.vg.no/nyheter/innenriks/bevegelser/tyske-soldater-brukt-som-mineryddere/a/166207/
95	S. P. MacKenzie, op cit.
96	Quoted by Louis Clair in The Progressive , January 14 1946, p. 4; cited by Ralph Keeling, Gruesome Harvest ([1947] Reedy, W. Va.: Liberty Bell Publications, 1978), p. 21.
97	Louis Clair, cited by Keeling, pp. 21-22.
98	James Bacque, Other Losses (Toronto: Stoddard Publishing, 1989), p. 131
99	Ibid, p. 2.
100	McDonough, p. 187.
101	Carlo Mattogno, "Gypsy Holocaust? The Gypsies under the National Socialist Regime," Inconvenient History Vol. VI, 2014, pp. 14-15. Online: http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2014/volume_6/number_1/gypsy_holocaust.php
102	Gypsies: (England) http://www.historytoday.com/becky-taylor/britains-gypsy-travellers-people-outside
103	McDonough, p. 192.
104	Bolton, "German Nationalist Jews during the Weimar and Early Third Reich Eras," Inconvenient History Vol. V, 2013, pp. 333-351. Online: http://www.inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2013/volume_5/number_3/german_nationalist_jews.php
105	Lenni Brenner, Zionism in the Age of the Dictators (Connecticut: Lawrence Hill, 1983).
106	McDonough, p. 193.
107	Nahum Goldman, My Life as a German Jew , p. 120; cited by Walendy, p. 7.
108	McDonough, pp. 194-95.
109	Ibid, p. 195.
110	Joseph Goebbels, My Part in Germany's Fight (London: the Paternoster Library, 1938), diary entry for March 26, 1933.
111	Joseph Goebbels, March 31, 1933.
112	Joseph Goebbels, April 1, 1933.
113	Joseph Goebbels, April 4, 1933.

114	“World Jewry’s declaration of war on Germany,” New York Times , August 7, 1933.
115	Zionist Association of Germany via Jewish Telegraphic Union, March 26, 1933, cited by Udo Walendy, The Transfer Agreement and the Boycott Fever 1933 , (Essen, 1987), p. 6.
116	Edwin Black, The Transfer Agreement – The Untold Story of the Secret Pact between the Third Reich and Jewish Palestine (New York, 1984), cited by Walendy, p. 10.
117	Ibid, p. 42, cited by Walendy, p. 11.
118	Ibid, p. 20, cited by Walendy, p. 10.
119	Ibid, p. 34, cited by Walendy, p. 11.
120	Ibid, p. 42, cited by Walendy, p. 11.
121	Ibid, p. 47, cited by Walendy, p. 11.
122	Dresdner Bank to Societe General, July 1933, Black, 266, cited by Walendy, p. 16.
123	Black, pp. 266-267, cited by Walendy, p. 16.
124	Ibid, p. 119, cited by Walendy, p. 13.
125	Ibid, p. 188, cited by Walendy, p. 14.
126	McDonough, p. 198.
127	Ibid, p. 199.
128	Ibid, p. 201.
129	Ibid, p. 202.
130	Ibid, p. 207.
131	Ibid, p. 209.
132	Ibid, p. 213.
133	Ibid, p. 217.
134	Ibid, p. 227.
135	Ibid, pp. 228-229.
136	Ibid, p. 229.
137	Ibid, p. 237.
138	Ibid, p. 238.
139	See for example Bacque and Keeling.
140	McDonough, p. 252.

The Conquest of the US by Spain

by Ralph Raico

The year 1898 was a landmark in American history. It was the year America went to war with Spain – our first engagement with a foreign enemy in the dawning age of modern warfare. Aside from a few scant periods of retrenchment, we have been embroiled in foreign politics ever since.

Starting in the 1880s, a group of Cubans agitated for independence from Spain. Like many revolutionaries before and after, they had little real support among the mass of the population. Thus they resorted to terrorist tactics – devastating the countryside, dynamiting railroads, and killing those who stood in their way. The Spanish authorities responded with harsh countermeasures.

Some American investors in Cuba grew restive, but the real forces pushing America toward intervention were not a handful of sugarcane planters. The slogans the rebels used – "freedom" and "independence" – resonated with many Americans, who knew nothing of the real circumstances in Cuba. Also playing a part was the "black legend" – the stereotype of the Spaniards as bloodthirsty despots that Americans had inherited from their English forebears. It was easy for Americans to believe the stories peddled by the insurgents, especially when the "yellow" press discovered that whipping up hysteria over largely concocted Spanish "atrocities" – while keeping quiet about those committed by the rebels – sold papers.

Politicians on the lookout for publicity and popular favor saw a gold mine in the Cuban issue. Soon the American government was directing notes to Spain expressing its "concern" over "events" in Cuba. In fact, the "events" were merely the tactics colonial powers typically used in fighting a guerrilla war. As bad or worse was being done by Britain, France, Germany, and others all over the globe in that age of imperialism. Spain, aware of the immense superiority of American forces, responded to the interference from Washington by attempts at appeasement, while trying to preserve the shreds of its dignity as an ancient imperial power.

William Graham Sumner questioned US policy when he lectured a crowd, "We have beaten Spain in a military conflict, but we are submitting to be conquered by her on the field of ideas and policies." Photo 1895
[Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

When William McKinley became president in 1897, he was already planning to expand America's role in the world. Spain's Cuban troubles provided the perfect opportunity. Publicly, McKinley declared, "We want no wars of conquest; we must avoid the temptation of territorial aggression." But within the US government, the influential cabal that was seeking war and expansion knew they had found their man. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge wrote to Theodore Roosevelt, now at the Navy Department, "Unless I am profoundly mistaken, the Administration is now committed to the large policy we both desire." This "large policy," also supported by Secretary of State John Hay and other key figures, aimed at breaking decisively with our tradition of nonintervention and neutrality in foreign affairs. The United States would at last assume its "global responsibilities," and join the other great powers in the scramble for territory around the world.

The leaders of the war party camouflaged their plans by speaking of the need to procure markets for American industry, and were even able to convince a few business leaders to parrot their line. But in reality none of this clique of haughty patricians – "old money," for the most part – had any strong interest in business, or even much respect for it, except as the source of national strength. Like similar cliques in Britain, Germany, Russia, and elsewhere at the time, their aim was the enhancement of the power and glory of their state.

In order to escalate the pressure on Spain, the battleship USS Maine was dispatched to Havana's harbor. On the night of February 15, the Maine exploded, killing 252 men. Suspicion immediately focused on the Spaniards – although they had the least to gain from the destruction of the Maine. It was much more likely that the boilers had blown up – or even that the rebels themselves had mined the ship, to draw America into a war the rebels could not win on their own. The press screamed for vengeance against perfidious Spain, and interventionist politicians believed their hour had come.

$50,000 REWARD.—WHO DESTROYED THE MAINE?—$50,000 REWARD.

EDITION FOR GREATER NEW YORK

NEW YORK JOURNAL

AND ADVERTISER.

NO. 3,472.      PUBLISHED DAILY AT 10 N. 3RD ST.—NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1898.—10 PAGES.      PRICE ONE CENT

---

$50,000!

$50,000 REWARD!

For the Detection of the Perpetrator of the Maine Outrage!

The New York Journal offers a reward of $50,000 CASH for information, furnished to it satisfactorily, that will identify the person or persons who sank the Maine.

Assistant Secretary Roosevelt Convinced the Explosion of the War Ship Was Not an Accident.

The Journal Offers $50,000 Reward for the Conviction of the Criminals Who Sent 258 American Sailors to Their Death. Naval Officers Unanimous That the Ship Was Destroyed on Purpose.

$50,000!

$50,000 REWARD!

For the Detection of the Perpetrator of the Maine Outrage!

The New York Journal offers a reward of $50,000 CASH for information, furnished to it satisfactorily, that will identify the person or persons who sank the Maine.

---

---

NAVAL OFFICERS THINK THE MAINE WAS DESTROYED BY A SPANISH MINE.

Lange Lander Brown, the Journal's special correspondent at Havana, cables that it is the army opinion at that Spanish port that the Maine was destroyed and 258 of her crew killed by means of a submarine mine, or sunken torpedo. This is the opinion of several American naval authorities. The Spaniards, it is believed, arranged to land the Maine without one of the harbor mines. It was considered the mine with a regular magazine, and it is thought the explosion was caused by sending an electric current through the mine. If this can be proven, the honor of the Spaniards will be shown by the fact that they refused to accept the mine and were glad to accept the blame. The Spaniards once in the present shows where the mine may have been.

Hidden Mine or a Sunken Torpedo Believed to Have Been the Weapon Used Against the American Man-of-War—Officers and Men Tell Thrilling Stories of Being Blown Into the Air Amid a Mass of Shattered Steel and Exploding Shells—Survivors Brought to Key West Scout the Idea of Accident—Spanish Officials Protest Too Much—Our Cabinet Orders a Searching Inquiry—Journal Sends Divers to Havana to Report Upon the Condition of the Wreck.

The New York Journal, 17 February 1898 announces $50,000 reward for the "detection of the perpetrator of the Maine Outrage"

By New York Journal (New York Journal) [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

McKinley, anxious to preserve his image as a cautious statesman, bided his time. He pressed Spain to stop fighting the rebels and start negotiating with them for Cuban independence, hinting broadly that the alternative was war. The Spaniards, averse to simply handing the island over to a terrorist junta, were willing to grant autonomy. Finally, desperate to avoid war with America, Madrid did proclaim an armistice – a stunning concession for one sovereign state to make at the bidding of another.

But this was not enough for McKinley, who had his eyes set on bagging a few of Spain's remaining possessions. On April 11, he delivered his war message to Congress, carefully omitting to mention the concession of an armistice. A week later, Congress passed the war resolution McKinley wanted.

In the Far East, Commodore George Dewey was given the go-ahead to carry out a prearranged plan: proceed to the Philippines and secure control of Manila's harbor. This he did, bringing along Emilio Aguinaldo and his Filipino independence fighters. In the Caribbean, American forces quickly subdued the Spaniards in Cuba, and then, after Spain sued for peace, went on to take over Puerto Rico as well. In three months, the fighting was over. It had been, as Secretary of State John Hay famously put it, "a splendid little war."

The quick US trouncing of decrepit Spain filled the American public with euphoria. It was a victory, people believed, for American ideals and the American way of life against an Old World tyranny. Our triumphant arms would guarantee Cuba a free and democratic future.

Against this tidal wave of public elation, one man spoke out. He was William Graham Sumner – Yale professor, famed social scientist, and tireless fighter for private enterprise, free trade, and the gold standard. Now he was about to enter his hardest fight of all.

On January 16, 1899, Sumner addressed an overflow crowd of the Yale chapter of Phi Beta Kappa. He knew that the assembled Yalies and the rest of the audience were brimming with patriotic pride. With studied irony, Sumner titled his talk "The Conquest of the United States by Spain."

Sumner threw down the gauntlet:

We have beaten Spain in a military conflict, but we are submitting to be conquered by her on the field of ideas and policies. Expansionism and imperialism are nothing but the old philosophies of national prosperity which have brought Spain to where she is now.

Sumner proceeded to outline the original vision of America cherished by the Founding Fathers, radically different from what prevailed among the nations of Europe:

They would have no court and no pomp; nor orders, or ribbons, or decorations, or titles. They would have no public debt. There was to be no grand diplomacy, because they intended to mind their own business, and not be involved in any of the intrigues to which European statesmen were accustomed. There was to be no balance of power and no "reason of state" to cost the life and happiness of citizens.

This had been the American idea, our signature as a nation: "It is by virtue of this conception of a commonwealth that the United States has stood for something unique and grand in the history of mankind, and that its people have been happy."

The system the Founders bequeathed to us, Sumner held, was a delicate one, providing for the division and balance of powers and aimed at keeping government small and local. It was no accident that Washington, Jefferson, and the others who created the republic issued clear warnings against "foreign entanglements." A policy of foreign adventurism would, in the nature of things, bend and twist and ultimately shatter our original system.

As foreign affairs became more important, power would shift from communities and states to the federal government, and, within that, from Congress to the president. An ever-busy foreign policy could only be carried out by the president, often without the knowledge of the people. Thus, the American system, based on local government, states' rights, and Congress as the voice of the people on the national level, would more and more give way to a bloated bureaucracy headed by an imperial presidency.

But now, with the war against Spain and the philosophy behind it, we were letting ourselves in for the old European way, Sumner declared – "war, debt, taxation, diplomacy, a grand governmental system, pomp, glory, a big army and navy, lavish expenditures, political jobbery – in a word, imperialism."

Already, it seems, the global meddlers had come up with what was to be their favorite smear word: "isolationist." And already Sumner had the appropriate retort. The imperialists "warn us against the terrors of 'isolation,'" he said, but "our ancestors all came here to isolate themselves" from the burdens of the Old World. "When the others are all struggling under debt and taxes, who would not be isolated in the enjoyment of his own earnings for the benefit of his own family?"

In abandoning our own system, there would be, Sumner freely admitted, compensations. Immortal glory is not nothing, as the Spaniards well knew. To be a part, even a pawn, in a mighty enterprise of armies and navies, to identify with great imperial power projected around the world, to see the flag raised on victorious battlefields – many peoples in history thought that game well worth the candle.

Only – only, it was not the American way. That way had been more modest, more prosaic, parochial, and, yes, middle class. It was based on the idea that we were here to live out our lives, minding our own business, enjoying our liberty, and pursuing our happiness in our work, families, churches, and communities. It had been the "small policy."

There is a logic in human affairs, Sumner the social scientist cautioned – once you make a certain decision, some paths that were open to you before are closed, and you are led, step-by-step, in a certain direction. America was choosing the path of world power, and Sumner had little hope that his words could change that. Why was he speaking out then? Simply because "this scheme of a republic which our fathers formed was a glorious dream which demands more than a word of respect and affection before it passes away."

---

First published by the Future of Freedom Foundation (1995).

Reprinted from Mises.org.

The Ideal of Intellectual Freedom

by Richard A. Widmann

The recent passing of my friend Bradley Smith this past February stirred many memories of the work that we did together.<sup>1</sup> While we met face-to-face only once, we shared many hundreds (thousands?) of emails and countless phone calls. One project that we enthusiastically worked on together led ultimately to the creation of Inconvenient History in the summer of 2009. The ideas that led to the publication of this journal resulted from work and experiences from more than ten years prior.

The original idea was for a print journal entitled The Revisionist and the year was 1998. It was an exciting time for revisionism, but there was also a sense that something was missing. While the major revisionist websites had all been in full operation for a few years (CODOHWeb, VHO, Zündelsite, and the Institute for Historical Review), printed publications still seemed to be an important ingredient in the serious documentation of the case for revisionism.

At the time and for about 17 years prior, this space was filled by The Journal of Historical Review (JHR) published by the Institute for Historical Review. The JHR would continue publication until 2002, but already in 1998 it was clear that the Journal was not what it used to be. Perhaps the fracture with Willis Carto and Liberty Lobby contributed to the declining quality, perhaps it was other reasons altogether.<sup>2</sup> Nonetheless, in 1998 new revisionist voices were being heard throughout Europe and on the Internet, but rarely were they published in the JHR. Even big names like Germar Rudolf and Carlo Mattogno rarely found their way into the pages of the JHR. New names like Samuel Crowell would have to wait years before being picked up by the JHR.<sup>3</sup> I myself had submissions rejected. In the place of the cutting edge, the JHR's pages were often filled with reprints by Revilo P. Oliver, Joe Sobran, and on one occasion even Mark Twain. My intent here is not to disparage the JHR or the editors and writers who contributed to its publication, but only to provide insight into my thinking at the time.

THE REVISIONIST

$10.00

Edited by Bradley R. Smith and Stephen Gallant

GOD BLESS THE HILLEL RABBIS (An excerpt from A Simple Writer) by Bradley R. Smith

TECHNIQUE AND OPERATION OF GERMAN ANTI-GAS SHELTERS IN WORLD WAR II (Part I)
by Samuel Crowell

THE DETAIL by Robert Faurisson

HOLOCAUST: DIESEL EXHAUST GASES KILL SLOWLY
by Friedrich Berg and Gernar Rudolf

BOOKS: Death Dealer: The Memoirs of the SS
Kommandant at Auschwitz
Reviewed by Richard Widmann

VOLUME 1 • NUMBER 1 SEPTEMBER 1998

Bradley - idea is for a COCOH journal. I based the layout on the old Ayn Rand journal,
The Objectivist. I would like it to be the same size and quality as your "Confessions" Part One of the Second Enlarged edition. Glossy cover, book-like inside. I figure that we could print 1,000 copies. Maybe we could publish it 3 or 4 times per year. I would love to do this.

-RAW-

First prototype cover for The Revisionist No. 1 circa 1998 with typed note to Bradley Smith.

Source: The Widmann Collection.

The most significant competition to the JHR at the time was the new publication of Willis Carto, The Barnes Review (TBR). While TBR always looked nice and was published on time, the articles covered a very wide array of subjects, from antiquity to the modern day. Again, cutting-edge Holocaust revisionism rarely was featured in its pages. In fact, TBR did not publish an issue entirely dedicated to the Holocaust until 2001. The articles were generally written by a small cadre of Carto loyalists who were far from the cutting edge of what was happening in revisionist research at the time. Since the split with the IHR in 1994, most key figures in the revisionist movement sided (at least initially) with the IHR and were rarely if ever mentioned, never mind published, in the pages of TBR.

The one shining star on the scene of published revisionist scholarship was the new German language journal of Gernar Rudolf, Vierteljahreshefte für freie Geschichtsforschung (VffG), which appeared on the scene in March of 1997. Indeed, VffG was everything I was looking for in a revisionist journal; interesting well-referenced articles, cutting-edge scholarship; high quality publishing. The one obvious issue was that VffG was available only in the German language.

$9.00

THE REVISIONIST

TECHNIQUE AND OPERATION OF GERMAN ANTI-GAS SHELTERS IN WORLD WAR II: A REFUTATION OF J.C. PRESSAC'S "CRIMINAL TRACES"(Part I)
by Samuel Crowell

THE SELF-ASSISTED HOLOCAUST HOAX
By Friedrich Paul Berg

SMITH INTERVIEWS ROBERT FAURISSON
by Bradley R. Smith

BOOKS: Death Dealer: The Memoirs of the SS Kommandant at Auschwitz
Reviewed by Richard Widmann

VOLUME 1 • NUMBER 1 SEPTEMBER 1998

Second prototype cover for The Revisionist No. 1 circa 1998.

Source: The Widmann Collection.

While it was clear that a publication of the size and quality of VffG in English was beyond our means, a publication of fewer pages could indeed be produced featuring similar cutting-edge works in English by those voices that were rarely heard outside of the Internet. In February of 1998 I created a sample cover and faxed it with a brief note to Bradley Smith:

Bradley – Idea is for a CODOH [Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust] journal. I based the layout on the old Ayn Rand journal, The Objectivist. I would like it to be the same size and quality as your Confessions Part One of the Second Enlarged edition. Glossy cover, book-like inside. I figure that we could print 1,000 copies. Maybe we could publish it 3 or 4 times per year. I would love to do this.

Bradley responded, “The Revisionist. First reaction. I LOVE IT.”

BRADLEY R. SMITH'S SPECIAL REPORT ON THE HOLOCAUST CONTROVERSY

The Revisionist

Number 1

www.codoh.com

Spring 1999

CODOH EXPOSES FAKE EXHIBITS IN THE UNITED STATES HOLOCAUST MEMORIAL MUSEUM

page 13

THE MUSEUM'S EVIDENCE FOR GAS CHAMBERS

INTELLECTUAL FREEDOM: MY PROBLEM WITH THE ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE OF B'NAI B'RITH (ADL)

By Bradley R. Smith 11

AN "EYEWITNESS" TO MASS-MURDER AT BELZEC

HOW 'FAHRENHEIT 451' TRENDS THREATEN INTELLECTUAL FREEDOM

By Richard A. Widmann 16

BEHIND THE MAJDANEK GAS CHAMBER DOOR

20

Third prototype cover for The Revisionist No. 1 circa 1999 with handwritten page numbers.

Source: The Widmann Collection.

Over the next few months the idea evolved. Bradley was more interested in what he had dubbed "The Campus Project" and his efforts to get the word about the Holocaust controversy out to students, who he believed were more intellectually honest and open to new ideas than most others including their professors. Rather than creating a publication for the revisionist community as I had originally envisioned, The Revisionist would become a vehicle to support the Campus Project. In addition, Bradley decided that he would give away 90% of every issue for free. In "A Note from the Publisher" in the first issue Bradley explained:

My idea – we'll see how it works – is to print The Revisionist in the least expensive way – in this instance on newsprint – print as many copies as I can raise funds to pay for, and distribute them at no cost to those people who I believe have the most open minds and who are most willing to defend and even promote the ideals of intellectual freedom and a free press—students.

I will send TR to editors at college and commercial newspapers, to journalists on and off campus, academics, particularly in communications and history, and university presidents and others in administration. But it is students as a class who are the key to this project. It is among students where intellectual freedom is taken most seriously. It's clear that we cannot depend on the professorial class to protect the ideal of intellectual freedom...4

Bradley continued explaining his plan to disseminate revisionism on campus,

The simplest, and least expensive, way of reaching students with TR is to distribute it free as an insert in college newspapers on college campuses. To distribute 5,000 copies of The Revisionist in The Princetonian, say, might cost about $500.

The first university to accept The Revisionist was Hofstra, where 5,000 copies were to be included in their newspaper the Chronicle. Needless to say, there was quite an uproar when university officials became aware of what had happened.

The Revisionist No. 1, November 1999.
Source: The Widmann Collection.

By January of 2000 a second issue was assembled by a small band of volunteers supporting Smith and me including Editor George Brewer and columnists Bill Halvorsen, Ted O’Keefe, Fritz Berg, and Ernest Sommers. As more and more schools accepted the magazine as an insert, the furor on campus escalated. Teachers and students set fire to The Revisionist No. 2 at St. Cloud University. A professor was quoted in the St. Cloud Chronicle cursing us, "May their myths burn in the fires of Hell!" Ironically, that issue featured my article, "How Fahrenheit 451 Trends Threaten Intellectual Freedom," a widely distributed article arguing against censorship and the stifling of scholarship.<sup>5</sup> Such was the success of Issue No. 2 that a second printing was created and labeled "The Campus Edition."

In March of 2000 the final issue No. 3 was published and distributed. Thousands of copies of each issue of The Revisionist were distributed on college campuses. The impact of the magazine insert was that hits on the CODOH website skyrocketed. Bradley announced to readers of Smith’s Report that documents were being accessed at a rate of 15,000 to 20,000 times daily.<sup>6</sup> By the end of the 1999-2000 academic year Bradley had distributed 42,000 copies of The Revisionist on campus.<sup>7</sup>

ADVERTISEMENT

The Revisionist

Encouraging an Open Debate on the Holocaust Controversy

Campus Edition

< www.codoh.com >

---

Deborah Lipstadt & the Ruling Discourse on Holocaust Studies
Bradley R. Smith

For ten years and more I suppose I have been the most visible Holocaust revisionist activist in America. I'm very far from being the right person for the job. The most visible revisionist activist in America should be a scholar and someone who is passionately interested in the literature.

I'm very far from being a scholar and I find the literature to be a real yawner. In the beginning of course it was awfully shocking but fascinating too to discover how questionable the gas chambers stories are. Not to mention some of those other yarns! What I couldn't get out of my mind however was not the apparent fact that there had been no program for the mass gassing of Jews (thank God for that as they say) but how urgently intellectuals argue against intellectual freedom on this one issue.

Even in the beginning, in the early 1980s, I had only a casual interest in the historical record. What held my attention was what I perceived to be the challenge of finding a way to convince the intellectuals, and the media intellectuals, that revisionist

(Continued on page 16)

Going After Pat Buchanan: Americanism and Anti-Semitism

How "Fahrenheit 451" Trends Threaten Intellectual Freedom

USHMM Promotes Fake Eyewitness to "Gas Chambers"

Germany Seeks Extradition of Exiled Scientist

Reviews, Comment, Letters

$4.00

With basically the same content as The Revisionist No. 2, January 2000, the format of the Campus Edition was narrower allowing it to better serve as an insert for student newspapers.

Source: The Widmann Collection.

Through all the ruckus and success of The Revisionist, No. 3 would be the last to be physically printed. The costs were too high, financial backers were too few; there was no way to continue publishing a free magazine. Bradley would change tactics and revert to small ads to be published in college newspapers. The success of his ever-changing tactics is the story for another day and another article.

While the “project” on campus had run its course, The Revisionist had sufficient life in it to keep going for quite some time. Editors and writers had been assembled and they still believed in what we were doing. There was still a sense that a quality revisionist journal in the English language was lacking. Today it might seem obvious, and yet at the time it was quite innovative, that The Revisionist could be published in an on-line format. The cost would be negligible. In addition, students could be directed to the main URL of The Revisionist in low-cost ads.

The final print issue of CODOH's The Revisionist No. 3, March 2000.

Source: The Widmann Collection.

Beginning with No. 4 in Spring of 2000 and running until No. 13 in 2002, The Revisionist would continue to publish cutting-edge revisionism, reviews, and commentary by a variety of revisionist authors. Another 87 articles would be written and published before The Revisionist published its final on-line issue. By late 2001 chief editor George Brewer had departed along with many key columnists. I picked up the chief editor role for the final three issues. With fewer and fewer writers, The Revisionist appeared to have finally run its course.

The vacancy in revisionism that The Revisionist was attempting to fill was still there however. By early 2003, the gap in published English-language revisionist scholarship was even larger than it had been five years earlier. The JHR was now defunct and even new on-line scholarship in English seemed to be waning.

In February 2003, like a phoenix, The Revisionist rose up again. Now under the editorship of Germar Rudolf, a new journal was born. In its latest evolution, The Revisionist featured 120 pages of scholarship much in the style of the German-language VffG.

Germar Rudolf's The Revisionist would continue through September 2005 when it was forced to cease due to ongoing prosecution and persecution of Germar Rudolf.<sup>8</sup> During this dark time of increased legal action and imprisonment of revisionists and censorship of their ideas and publications, it was clear that yet another reincarnation was needed.

The Revisionist

Journal for Critical Historical Inquiry

Volume 1 • Number 1 • February 2003

Space and Rocket Museum in Huntsville, Alabama: in the background a real, complete Saturn V rocket disassembled in its stages. In the foreground: a mockup of the Apollo moon lander on an area of re-created moon landscape.

Mockup of a German WWII V1 Rocket in Huntsville, Alabama.

Open Air Incinerations in Auschwitz:
Rumor or Reality?, pp. 3-17

The Dwindling Death Toll:
Less Auschwitz Victims, pp. 18-37

Werner Heisenberg:
An Attempt at Murder, p. 47

The Hole in the Door:
How a Girl Fooled the Academic World, p. 52

World War Two:
Whose war was it?, p. 56

Freedom fighter Andreij Vlassov:
New Aspects of a Hero, p. 63

India's Unknown Hunger Holocaust:
Britains Politics of Famine, p. 71

Apollo Moon Landings:
History or Hoax?, p. 75

From the Court Files:
Start of the Auschwitz Trial, p. 115

Germar Rudolf's first issue of The Revisionist February 2003.
Source: The Widmann Collection.

Modeled on the short-lived on-line journal The Revisionist, the first ideas for Inconvenient History were developed. Having learned from the experience, and with a new primary focus on countering the increasing battle against intellectual freedom, Inconvenient History was launched in the summer of 2009.

Taking our name from James J. Martin's book, The Saga of Hog Island and Other Essays in Inconvenient History, we sought, and continue to seek, to revive the true spirit of the historical revisionist movement. Today, as I write these words seven years later, it is clear that my words from my first editorial published in the first issue of Inconvenient History still ring true.

Cutting through the exaggerations, lies and propaganda of the Holocaust story has to be the starting ground for any contemporary revisionist. The territory is plagued with the minefield of charges of "Holocaust denial," "racism," "anti-Semitism," and "neo-Nazism." Despite the persecution and insults, revisionists understand that the myths of the Holocaust have smothered out a proper and accurate understanding of the Second World

While the fight for intellectual freedom is without a doubt a noble cause, it does at times feel like a lonely tilt at windmills. In fact, the image of Don Quixote was so striking that webmaster David Thomas used Pablo Picasso’s famous rendering as an image throughout the old CODOH website. It was always amusing to imagine Bradley tilting at windmills with several Sancho Panzas by his side. That image is no longer featured on the CODOH website because officials representing Pablo Picasso demanded that it be removed or significant penalties and legal action would be taken.<sup>10</sup>

There are days when I am doubtful that Inconvenient History will last another year, or even another issue.<sup>11</sup> But I am strengthened by the knowledge that great causes and great ideas must always find a way. They will evolve, they will sometimes even die and rise from their own ashes, but they will always live on. I recall a line from the graphic novel turned action movie, V for Vendetta:

Did you think to kill me? There's no flesh or blood within this cloak to kill.
There's only an idea. Ideas are bulletproof.

Not only are ideas bulletproof, but they are fireproof and flame retardant as well. Let this be a lesson to all would-be apprentice book burners and censors and especially the misguided professors and students of St. Cloud University who attempted to prevent the free exchange of inconvenient ideas by burning The Revisionist so many years ago. It is to their disgrace and futility that I dedicate this issue of Inconvenient History.

Notes:

1	See my article, “Remembering Bradley R. Smith,” in Inconvenient History Vol. 8, No. 2, Summer 2016. Online: http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2016/volume_8/number_2/remembering_bradley_r_smith.php
2	See George Michael, Willis Carto and the American Far Right (Gainesville, Fla: University Press of Florida, 2008) especially Chapter 16 “Interneccine Battles: The Struggle with the IHR.”
3	Crowell first appeared in the JHR Vol. 18, No. 4, July / August 1999 with his article, “Wartime Germany’s Anti-Gas Air Raid Shelters: A Refutation of Pressac’s ‘Criminal Traces.’” The article was available on-line through CODOHWeb as of 23 March 1997. The article even appeared in German translation in the December 1997 issue of VffG nearly 18 months earlier than the JHR ’s version.
4	Bradley R. Smith, “A Note from the Publisher,” The Revisionist No. 1, November 1999, p.26.
5	For more on the burning of The Revisionist on the campus of St. Cloud State University, see Smith's Report No. 68, April 2000. My anti-censorship article featured in that issue was published by several different sources. Most importantly it was included in Readings on Ray Bradbury Fahrenheit 451 as part of the Greenhaven Press Literary Companion to American Literature series. Online: http://codoh.com/library/document/995/
6	Smith's Report No. 66, December 1999, p. 1.
7	Smith's Report No. 69, June 2000, p. 2.

8	In 2005 Germar Rudolf was separated from his wife and child by US Immigration authorities and deported to Germany where he was imprisoned on account of his book Lectures on the Holocaust that he had published that summer. For a full account see Germar Rudolf, Resistance is Obligatory (Uckfield UK: Castle Hill Publishers, 2012).
9	Richard Widmann, "The Challenge to Revisionism," Inconvenient History Vol. 1, No. 1, Summer 2009. Online: http://inconvenienthistory.com/archive/2009/volume_1/number_1/the_challenge_to_revisionism.php
10	The Don Quixote image is now broadly available on the Internet. For example, see Wikipedia at: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Don_Quixote_(Picasso)
11	When we first announced our publication, friend and editorial advisor Arthur Butz said he doubted that we would last a year. We are pleased to have made him wrong on this occasion (perhaps he is, too).

Tickling the Dragon | CODOH

by Ezra Macvie

Look Who's Back! Constantin Film. 116 minutes

He/it is the most-delicate subject in Germany, perhaps even the world, at least since the time he was alive (1889-1945). This is more-so in Germany, the country whose government he controlled in the last 12 years of his life, than anywhere else. In Germany, many (dozens?) are in jail or have paid fines for saying he was great, or even for saying he was just like the rest of us. It is, of course, a crime in law-laden Germany to say just about anything nice about der Führer of the German People/Empire.

Look Who's Back doesn't say anything especially nice about <the subject>, but it says nothing worse about him than that he would shoot a little dog tugging at his pants leg—on-camera at that. And his shooting of that dog, in fact, was his character's undoing, at least until ... I'm going to stop right here, to avoid spoiling it for readers who haven't seen it yet. The original, "real" Hitler is credited with having killed far more than just a little dog, and in that he conducted wars, the charge is undeniable, and ironic in the case of this film, in which the poor dog is his only victim.

The film is, in fact, not about Hitler. It is about societal stresses, perhaps the kind, broadly speaking, that gave the man with the narrow mustache his opportunity to wield what might have been the world's most-formidable military machine for a time that seems brief in retrospect. Germany today, more-so even than at the time (2014) the book was written, is beset by immigrants who scoff at (or otherwise overcome) such immigration controls as happen today to be held very dear by a large class of voters in the United States. Germany's government, then as now, welcomes these immigrants and even showers them with benefits whose cost is borne by German taxpayers, not all of whom necessarily wish to see these extractions from their products so expended.

Heinrich Knirr - "Führerbildnis" (1937)
By Heinrich Knirr (1862-1944) (<http://www.dittatori.it/fotohitler2.htm>)
[Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

The portrayal, and the dramatic situation, are nimbly arranged, as is obligatory under a regime (still that of the Allies whose conquest was completed in 1945) that makes it a crime to say anything good about National Socialism or any of its central figures. That this book (there was a book, by Timur Veres) can have eluded the censors' knives is a tribute to the author's deftness in treatment of his ostensible subject, and that the movie derived therefrom can have reached such peaks of popularity as it has reached is a tribute to ... what? Nostalgia for National Socialism? For Adolf Himself? For some sense of security within national borders such as presidential candidates today promise to American voters?

No matter. The desire for cultural continuity, for semblance of today to yesterday, for security, is present in every people, in every place, in every time. But what may be done, to whom, where, and why, to assuage this universal hankering that every one of us can feel in our "broader" (or narrower) moments, that is the question pointed at by this otherwise light-hearted narrative.

It is not a comedic subject, yet the film here reviewed so dances about the artifacts of an episode not-so-long past that it makes its point very visible to anyone who might engage both his mind and his heart in the contemplation that ... it gives pause.

After this pause, there remains the question, what would, or should "we" do to "preserve" "our" heritage, whom should we do it to, and how should we do it? Maybe none of us should do anything. Maybe anything "we" might try to do, by certain means (government, violence) will end up hurting "us" more than it helps "us." And then there is what all this might do to "them." And finally, exactly why? Because of nostalgia? The fear of change? A fear of disempowerment, of becoming subject to an alien regime, in some profound way different (more oppressive?) than the one(s) we have known, whether happily or otherwise? Such matters rarely attract sober contemplation, to say nothing of penetrating self-examination.

The movie offers no answers to these questions, but it might arouse the questions at least in the thoughtful. It could even, in those accustomed to noting the corrosive influence of empowered elites (such as governments everywhere ineluctably engender) on societies that might at least prefer to let matters take their own course, rather than encouraging them in one disruptive direction or another by the taxation of the value produced by workers and subsequent disbursal of said value on projects that attract immigration by outsiders, such as welfare, aid to "refugees," free medical care, even promotion of "diversity" racial, religious, or even sexual-orientation in society.

This is the reaction of a libertarian reviewer, who intrudes his (my) values upon what otherwise might be a straightforward description of a very entertaining movie with special appeal to viewers with some historical sensibilities. But that is exactly what this "review" is: my reaction. If you, dear reader, are in sympathy with the values I here espouse, read on and accept what I write. If you, in this particular or that, are not, then discount or reject what I write that offends your sympathies and glean what you can (if only by inverting) from what I write and decide to see (if you haven't already) or not see the movie; the fulminations of one with whom you violently disagree can be quite as informative, can they not, as those of someone with whom you agree.

Hitler happened, and continues to happen today, if not in Germany, then elsewhere in a thousand manifestations and historico-cultural contexts. Hitler was no more than a manifestation not of leadership, but of followership, something rather as much afoot in today's world as in yesterday's, and day-before-yesterday's.

We each, all and every one of us, seek salvation, if not from the government, then from religion, or some other group movement. Maybe we should. But perhaps it would end up better for each of us, if not all of us, if we sought salvation from within ourselves. Our own thoughts. Our own beliefs. And our own prescriptions for improving things—these, one might hope against hope—to be freely communicated among ourselves, one to the other, and from the other to another, one by one.

Would chaos result from this? Possibly. But chaos might indeed be better than what we've endured until now. It's not hard to imagine.

David v. Goliath: Irving v. Lipstadt (London, 2000)

by Jett Rucker

Acknowledgment: I wish to thank David Irving for a prompt and thorough response to my request that he review a draft of this article for accuracy. He pointed out several areas of misstatement or neglected points, and this permitted considerable improvement to the article. An identical request made at the same time to Dr. Lipstadt remains unanswered at press time.

A movie (Denial) came out September 30 that represents a 2000 trial in London in which not-Holocaust-revisionist David Irving sued author and subsidized “professor” Deborah Lipstadt for writing in her 1993 book Denying History that David Irving was a “Holocaust denier.” The book, having been published in the United Kingdom, became subject to British libel law, which imposes upon the author and publisher of the book the duty of proving the truth of their statements as regards any person suing them for libel—that is, the promulgation of false information concerning the libeled party.

If Irving could in any way be called a mercenary, then he was a mercenary to the reading public: his writings to 2001 had gained him great fame and following on matters having to do with World War II and Britain’s role in it as it pertained to Germany, a country in which the young (British) Irving had spent a good deal of his time, the while learning the language of the people who lived there.

Lipstadt, on the other hand, had earned masters and Ph.D. degrees in religion at Brandeis<sup>1</sup> University and subsequently, at the University of California at Los Angeles, had been denied tenure. So she (or the Dorot Foundation that funds her chair) moved her situs to Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia, whose eminent domicile she has ever-since claimed, and which has ever-since cloaked her partisan agenda under the mantle of “professor.” That she is on the faculty of the Religion Department rather than of the History Department has evidently not impaired her image as a historian in the slightest.

All this may or may not be seen as having influenced the Queen’s Court in the adjudication of this case. But of course, Britain’s own governmental apparatus might be seen, by the jaundiced among us, as decisively influenced by Jewish interests, then as now.

Regardless, the matter continued apace. Irving gathered his recollections and papers together. Lipstadt and her publisher gathered theirs. And what recollections and papers they had, or produced for the occasion!

David Irving arrives at court

Photographs from Focal Point Publications [<http://www.fpp.co.uk/Irving/photos/index.html>]

The defense hired phalanxes of eminent and would-be-eminent scholars onto its team, which ultimately encompassed dozens of ambitious “scholars” eager to get on the bandwagon heading toward victory. By the end, they ran up a bill of some $13 million in (no-doubt-generous) payments to this mercenary army.

Why, and how, would the defense have done such a thing? Did they really think the matter at hand was worth such an expenditure? Were they indeed willing to devote such sums to the Defense of History? Well, it certainly made Penguin look good, at least to a certain lobby, and ... it subjected Irving (remember David Irving, the plaintiff?) to an enormous risk: the risk that under English law, if the verdict should go against him, Irving, the plaintiff, must pay the costs that Penguin and Lipstadt (remember Lipstadt, the defendant?) incurred in the course of their defense.

Irving, Brit that he is, had sought to exploit peculiarities of English law against his defamer that weren't available to libellees in the United States, where Lipstadt's book had first been published. But it had, indeed, been published in the UK as well, and that gave him his opportunity. Under English law, an accused defamer must prove the truth of his defamation in order to defend against a libel suit. English law, ironically, turned out to be Irving's undoing. It was another characteristic of this body of law, known worldwide as “the English Rule,” that enabled the defense side to turn a shield into a devastating sword. This, precisely, was the rule that the loser in the action (Irving) had to reimburse the winner's (Lipstadt's) costs in defending the action.

The (financial) damages Irving sought were paltry indeed compared to the financial holocaust that ensued from his juridical initiative: a mere £500, to be donated to a fund in memory of his late daughter, Josephine. This was tempting for the co-defendant, Penguin Books, who was, after all, running a business rather than pursuing a cause, and they wanted to settle with Irving. But Lipstadt, Holocaust Warrior that she is, would have none of this, and threatened to sue Penguin if they entered into any such settlement of the suit. Maybe Penguin didn't quite appreciate the influence Lipstadt and her tribe exerted over the English judiciary. That is, after all, a Top Secret. Either way, it worked out well so far as the verdict was concerned, and the liability for the costs, too, but it would appear Penguin was left holding the bag for five digits of US dollars, all for Dr. Lipstadt's cause. Maybe her Dorot bankrollers picked up some of this tab—strange and wonderful are the flows of money that fund Zionist causes, and we hoi poloi shall never uncover the mysteries thereof.

The English Rule, of course, is meant to discourage frivolous, or vindictive, actions at equity. But the Lipstadt/Penguin team, somehow (“the fix is in”?) figured that their expenditures on “defense,” even if not ultimately collectible, could so financially cripple Irving that neither he nor any other soldier who might take his place in the ranks of Holocaust dissenters would dare to complain, in any forum of “justice,” about anything said of him or her by the other side. Penguin, of course, faced this very same stacked System of justice in the action threatened against them by Lipstadt.

It worked. The Court ruled against Irving and assigned to him the burden of paying Lipstadt/Penguin (or should it be, Penguin/Lipstadt?) the $13 million they had expended on defending their case. Suffice it to say, no title of Deborah Lipstadt's today in print bears the imprint of Penguin Books; they've lost quite enough already in their forays with Dr. Lipstadt. Perhaps they wish to return to publishing, leaving aggressive lawfare to other entrepreneurs.

The message is clear for all to behold: don't tangle with those (and we all know who they are) who command the heights of the System. Not only will you be thoroughly smacked down, you will be eternally ruined in your professional and financial life. David Irving joins the ranks of martyrs that today encompass many names known to those who have plumbed the mendacious depths of what passes for Holocaust Knowledge, including Norman Finkelstein<sup>2</sup> (author of the magisterial The Holocaust Industry), Nicholas Kollerstrom (historian of science who dared to interpret the findings of chemist Germar Rudolf regarding cyanide traces in the walls of concentration camps), Jean Plantin, Robert Faurisson, Joel Hayward, Ernst Zündel, Horst Mahler, Sylvia Stolz, Ursula Haverbeck, Eric Hunt, Siegfried Verbeke, Germar Rudolf himself, Roger Garaudy, Paul Rassinier, Wilhelm Stäglich—the names go on and on, my own (real) name down around the bottom of the list.

David Irving knows well who rules us, through the System that rules us. The rest of us might take the lesson he learned so hard, to heart. It will cost us far less than it has cost him—unless, of course, in an unguarded moment of resisting it, we might expose ourselves to a fate such as he has suffered.

And if we any of us does, we shall have whatever consolation is to be had from joining the list above of true martyrs to justice and truth. May our blood melt their swords to rust.

---

Notes:

1	Named after Louis D. Brandeis, first Jewish member of the Supreme Court of the United States.
---	---

2 Finkelstein is not a Holocaust revisionist in the strict sense—his crime was to expose the financial machinations that power the Holocaust industry, and he has been amply punished for this crime.

Deborah Lipstadt and the Ruling Discourse on Holocaust Studies

by Bradley R. Smith

With the renewed interest in Deborah Lipstadt due to the release of the film Denial, we have chosen to include this article by the late Bradley R. Smith. Smith comments extensively about Lipstadt's anti-revisionist book, Denying the Holocaust and especially the vitriol that Lipstadt unleashed on him for his work to introduce college students to revisionism. Smith included this article in The Revisionist Campus Edition in 2000. The article later served as Chapter One of his book, Break His Bones: The Private Life of a Holocaust Revisionist.

For ten years and more I suppose I have been the most visible Holocaust revisionist activist in America. I'm very far from being the right person for the job. The most visible revisionist activist in America should be a scholar and someone who is passionately interested in the literature.

I'm very far from being a scholar and I find the literature to be a real yawner. At the beginning of course it was awfully shocking to discover that it has not been demonstrated that the gas chamber stories are true. What I couldn't get out of my mind however was not the apparent fact that there had been no program for the mass gassing of Jews, thank God for that as they say, but how urgently intellectuals argue against intellectual freedom on this one issue.

Even in the early 1980s I had only a casual interest in the historical record. What held my attention was what I perceived to be the challenge of finding a way to convince the intellectuals, and the media intellectuals, that revisionist research should be judged on its merits, as I presumed they judged all other historical research. I see now I presumed much too much. These days, as students display a growing interest in an open debate about the Holocaust controversy, the intellectuals increasingly display signs of bad temper and even hysteria.

Bradley R. Smith (18 Feb 1930- 18 Feb 2016)

Professor Deborah Lipstadt, the leading voice representing the Holocaust industry in academia, has chosen to single out the work I do on college campuses for special attention in her much-praised book, Denying the Holocaust, The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory. There she devotes a 26-page chapter to what she sees as "The Battle for the Campus," writing plaintively that: "Colleagues have related that their students' questions are increasingly informed by Holocaust denial:"

How do we know that there really were gas chambers? What proof do we have that the survivors are telling the truth? Are we going to hear the German side?

Now there's a real scandal for you! Some students are no longer willing to accept on faith what their professors assure them is true about the gassing chambers, but want to learn what the evidence demonstrates. They suspect that while most survivors speak truthfully about their wartime experiences in the camps, some do not. Where do students get such ideas? There are even students who want to hear the "German" side to the Holocaust story. Unbelievable!

The Deborah Lipstadts of the world must be asking themselves what in hell is going on? They've run the Holocaust show on campus and in the media for so many years they see these signs of student curiosity and principle as the outbreak of some dreadful intellectual pox. I see them as the cure to one. The Lipstadts write about the "terrible harm" such questions can do. I ask why such questioning does not measure the good health of the culture?

Professor Lipstadt is no shrinking violet when it comes to arguing against intellectual freedom. She even has the brass to argue against "light of day," the concept that false statements and even false ideas can be exposed as such by flooding them with the light of free inquiry and open debate. She writes:

[I]t is naive to believe that the 'light of day' can dispel lies, especially when they play on familiar stereotypes. Victims of racism, sexism, antisemitism, and a host of other prejudices know of light's limited ability to discredit falsehood.

What does Lipstadt believe will dispel lies and discredit falsehood? Night? How many victims of racism, sexism and antisemitism speak against light in favor of suppression and censorship? I wonder how Jews felt about "light" in pre-war Nazi Germany? Early on the Nazis moved against Jews in the arts, against Jews in publishing, against Jews in the universities—all places where traditionally light is so highly valued. The Nazis had views about light in the 1930s that are similar to those of some professors today. Light for the Nazi-minded, darkness for everyone else. In the long run, light might not have made any difference for German Jews, but when you look at the record you find that when Hitler began to deny light to Jews, the Jews began to leave Germany. Those Jews understood the necessity of "light." Those who didn't soon found out what it meant to live in darkness. Without tyranny, human life is full of light.

The problem for the Lipstadts is that light is there for all of us without fear or favor. It is no respecter of persons. Just as the sun shines on the good and the bad alike, light refuses to choose sides. Historians who ask it to, betray their professional ideals and the ideal of light itself. It's Lipstadt's need for guarantees from light that causes her to argue against this great ideal of Western culture. We all have to be willing to accept what light illuminates. I admit on principle I might be wrong about the gas chambers, to say nothing about a lot of other stuff. Nevertheless, here I am, looking for ways to encourage intellectuals to encourage intellectual freedom with regard to the Holocaust controversy. I don't care anymore who's right or wrong about the gas chamber stories. I'm fishing a bigger lake.

My friend William called from Chicago to ask how the video project on Auschwitz is going. William is one of my volunteer advisors. I told him there had been too many production problems and I'd had to lay it aside. I said I was going to concentrate on finishing the book manuscript.

"Is that the manuscript you've been talking about the last two or three years?"

"Has it been that long?"

"This is bad news. This is really bad news."

"What are you suggesting?" I said. William is one of those very sincere men who wears his thoughts on his sleeve. You always know what he's suggesting.

"What I'm suggesting is you're very mistaken if you think people are interested in reading about your inner life as a Holocaust revisionist. Nobody wants to read about you, Bradley. Are you listening to me? Your personal life is a bore. People are interested in their own lives. The only interesting thing you've ever done is revisionism and you don't want to write about that. You want to write about your feelings. Can't you understand how childish that is? I have that first little book you published, what's it called? It's unreadable. Do you understand what I'm saying? It's a miracle you've been able to accomplish anything at all for revisionism."

"I understand what you're saying. But some people like the way I write. A writer can only have his own audience."

"I don't know who the hell you've been talking to. Listen to me. Let me tell you what your problem as a writer is. I'm telling you this as a friend. As someone who's interested in the work you're doing. Your problem is that you write like a sixty-year-old teenager."

"Sixty-four."

"What?"

"Sixty-four, William. I'm sixty-four now."

"Oh."

After a moment William said: "Is that a joke? I know how old you are. What the hell are we talking about here? Are we talking about something serious? I'm worried, Bradley. It's no joke that revisionism's got you for its point man."

When I found out that something was wrong with the gas chamber stories I was fifty years old. By the time you're fifty you've been around the block a few times. You've come to believe you're finished with fear, for example, yet here it was again. In a certain way, it was the fear that held my attention. I quickly lost interest in "survivor" yarns about gassing and torture and how good and innocent Jews are compared with Christians and everybody else.

Instead, I was intrigued and maybe a little obsessed with how afraid I was of admitting—of confessing I might even say—that I no longer believed. I had lived most of my adult life among Jews and with Jews, and some of us were terribly devoted to one another. When I realized I was going to go against the gas chamber stories, a terrible tumult entered my life because I understood many of my friends would feel I was going against them too. It was in that place that fear grasped me and held on.

I could have dropped the story and gone on my way, but when you write the way I write, the stories you dread most are the stories you are most obligated to pursue. My sense of things was that I had to risk friendships, even risk my family. I had to risk the contempt of my peers and the ostracism of a community and society, which would judge my doubting to be despicable. Nietzsche writes some place that we all work out of our weaknesses and I suppose that's what I did. In my anxiety and fear I decided to take on, not the gas-chamber story itself, but those who run the story as if it were their private franchise, who condemn those who question it. Those who have the power to destroy many of those they condemn.

The ruling discourse in America, and indeed the West, demands that the Holocaust story remain closed to authentic debate. The Holocaust happened. Revisionists say it didn't. For that reason all worthy persons and particularly intellectuals—who are all worthy persons by definition—favor the suppression and even censorship of revisionist theory. Meanwhile, because over the last half century the story has been revised so much, it becomes increasingly difficult to say exactly what the Holocaust was. That's where I saw my role. I fell into it like a blind man falling down a well. All I could see was the taboo that protected the story from real examination. How could anyone put his finger on what the thing itself had been if it was taboo to talk about it freely—really freely? I would be the one then, the blind man said, to help start the discussion going.

I didn't know how to get it going. Not knowing what to do, I did everything. One-on-one discussion, newsletters, radio talk shows, newspaper articles, television interviews, books, public speaking, print interviews, video tapes. You name it, I tried it. I became a one-man band. Dr. Franklin Littell, professor of religion at Temple University in Philadelphia and a Holocaust scholar himself, refers to me as a "malicious burst of energy" and compares me to "the adversary who wanders to and fro in the earth and goes up and down in it."

Friends tell me this is an insult. I think maybe it's something more subtle. I'm being compared to one of the great innovators in the Judeo-Christian tradition. Wanders to and fro in the earth and goes up and down in it? All right. Maybe I see what he's getting at. There's a whole world down there I didn't know existed. Dr. Littell's thoughtful observations on my character and movements illuminate the learning gap that exists between highly educated, professional Holocaust scholars on the one hand and ex-concrete contractors on the other.

When you express doubts which others believe are evil, and which in fact may cause many individuals to suffer and to feel diminished and perhaps even humiliated, you have an obligation to act out of a good conscience and to value what can be called right relationship. Which means I must be a good man or the mischief and grief I cause by saying I doubt what I doubt will be gratuitous. What does it mean to be a good man? I have only the foggiest notion. It would seem to me as a writer, however, that it would include being willing to say publicly I do not believe what I do not believe, particularly when what I no longer believe relieves another people, in this instance Germans, of the moral burden of a specifically horrendous crime I no longer believe they committed.

When my first essay advertisement, "The Holocaust Story: How Much Is False? The Case for Open Debate," appeared as a full-page ad in the Daily Northwestern, an article responding to it appeared in the Daily written by Peter Hayes, an associate professor of history and German with a special interest in Nazi Germany. Titled "Some Plain Talk about the Holocaust and Revisionism," Hayes's article is a paint-by-the-numbers example of how your typical Holocaust historian reacts when faced with even the simplest text challenging what he wants his students to believe.

I note his response here, not because it proved to be unique in any way, but because it was the first to reply directly to one of my ads, and because it proved to be a textbook guide to the subjective life of those academics who are willing to betray light.

When this newspaper printed Bradley Smith's advertisement last Thursday it fanned not one, but two, gathering controversies on campus. The first concerns our knowledge about the Nazi massacre of the Jews of Europe. The second centers on the policies of the Daily itself.

Surprisingly perhaps, the first issue is far easier to clarify than the second. Of course, there's been no suppression of free inquiry into the Holocaust. It is precisely because of extensive and vigorous research by bona fide scholars over the past three decades that we know not only several of the facts that Smith manipulates in his ad, but also a good many that he does not want you to believe.

There's no point in writing more here about the factual deceptions and distortions in Smith's ad.

[...]

No point in writing more about the factual deceptions in my ad? Which factual deceptions? For a moment I felt I must be blind to something your average Northwestern professor could see at a glance. Was there a misstatement of fact in my text or wasn't there? We all have our own way of looking at things, but this thing was not clear to me. How do you describe an intellectual environment in which an historian can write there is no point in writing more about factual deceptions in a specific text when, as a matter of fact, he hasn't written anything about them at all? However you do describe it, you should include the word vulgar.

Professor Hayes's article on my article continued for another seventeen paragraphs.

He avoided the temptation of attempting to reveal an error of fact in what I had written but charged me with "deception," "manipulation," "distortion," "ignorance," "nastiness," "dishonesty," "duplicity," "maliciousness," "tastelessness," "conspiracy mongering," "promoting implausibilities," "promoting anti-Semitism," "spreading disinformation" and the one I still like best, "brow beating academics." I would not have thought, considering the bold language the professor used, that he would have mentioned that last one.

Revisionist theory isn't wrong about everything, and there's the rub. Revisionism is simply a criticism of published academic writings on the Holocaust story. I take it as a given that revisionist research is wrong about a lot of things. The problem the professors face is that if they point out where revisionists are wrong, the professors are left with what's left over—with what revisionists are right about. This is a conceptual tragedy for your average academic. In each case where the revisionist is right, a bunch of academics are wrong and would have to fess up to being wrong, to having been wrong for a long time—and to having been stonewalling about being wrong. It would then become clear that while the good guys are right most of the time with what they publish on the story, the bad guys are right some of the time.

After the ad ran in the Daily Targum at Rutgers University, the New York Times ran an editorial on the controversy, as well as several news stories, letters to the editor, and a dumb opinion piece by two Rutgers professors. It also assigned a reporter from its San Francisco bureau to drive down to Visalia with a cameraman to do a profile on me. I expected the worst but I liked the reporter, Catherine Bowen. She's a big hearty woman with a big hearty laugh. A photo ran with her story showing me gesticulating dramatically, giving the impression I actually believed what I was saying. Bowen informed me she is a specialist on the White separatist movement in the Northwest. She said she'd interviewed all those guys, in prison and out. She said every racist and anti-Semite in the Northwest knows who I am and all about the work I do.

"Is that right?" I said.

"Do you keep up with the people in the movement?"

I understand she's fishing, but then, I'm here to be caught. I tell her a lot of those people contacted me when I first started doing revisionism but over the years they'd all dropped me. "I'm not anti-Jewish, so that was a big strike against me. My family is Mexican, so the racialists see me as a race traitor, and I don't have any guns so the militias and the anti-ZOG forces are convinced I have no sense of honor."

"Three strikes and you're out," Bowen says laughing:

"I suppose so. I think the movement people think I'm a pantywaist."

"That's exactly what they think," Bowen says laughing heartily. "They think you're a pantywaist."

Her photographer thinks my being a pantywaist is funny too but it's Bowen's laugh that rings in my ears. Maybe it's because she's a lady. You can laugh at being called a pantywaist when a man says it because you have a choice what to do about it, but when a lady laughs about something like that you're kind of helpless. So I remain quiet. I'm a good sport about it. When the movement people read this they'll say, "Of course Smith's a good sport. Smith has no sense of honor."

When William Blake writes that Jesus acted on impulse, not from thought, he means that Jesus's actions did not depend on his being obsequious before the ruling discourse of his day. Of course in Blake's view Jesus was good all the way through so his impulses were good so his acts were good. It pleases me to think that Jesus acted on impulse and not by the rules, because I think when push comes to shove that's what I do and that throws me in with good company. How good I am is another question. It's not one I can pass judgment on. Actually I think I'm a pretty swell guy. One irony here about impulse is that the professors can be seen to be acting on it too. They dismiss revisionist theory with a wave of the hand, holding that there can be no debate about the gas chambers because there can be no "other side" to the story. Only their side. Maybe it was something like this 200 years ago that drove Blake to conclude that education is the work of Satan.

It's simply a core belief among our intellectual classes that the Germans killed millions of Jews and others in gassing installations. Entire classes of intellectuals have become True Believers. I understand it can be argued that I'm a true believer too—in intellectual freedom. I can't prove that intellectual freedom is better than tyranny. It's something I want. That's the long and short of it. I doubt many things that others believe. No one can keep me from doubting, but I crave the freedom to be allowed to express my doubts to others.

This isn't an argument over natural rights. I don't want to make intellectual freedom a plank in a party line. Intellectual freedom is not primarily a political issue or even an intellectual one. It's a spiritual issue. You either desire it or you don't. You either want it for others as well as for yourself or you don't really want it. They say Buddha said that desire is at the root of all pain. I'm willing to go with the pain. My desire is the foundation of whatever arguments I make to convince others that intellectual freedom is better than tyranny. First the wanting, then the argument. The other way around and it's mere thinking.

One day I ran across an article about mad poets in the New York Review of Books. Not poets who are annoyed. Crazy ones. I have some interest in poetry, and an intermittent interest in madness. Professor Charles Rosen of the University of Chicago wrote the article. Early this year I submitted a second full-page advertisement to a student newspaper on that campus, The Chicago Maroon. You can see the coincidences gathering themselves together here. This ad was titled "The Holocaust Controversy: The Case for Open Debate." In the end it was suppressed so Chicago students didn't get to read it, but the word had gotten out on campus about the text of the ad and there was a big stink about it.

So one afternoon I was in the mall here drinking a diet Pepsi and reading Professor Rosen's discussion of madness in English and Continental poets from about 1750 to 1850. It looked as if half my favorite poets from the period were goofy. At the same time, Rosen noted that madness is oftentimes a matter of social convention and that social pressure oftentimes determines whether or not you will be certified as a lunatic. It is not clear, he writes, that those men with their visions were any more insane than the people today "who believe that no one was gassed at Auschwitz."

What was this? Was Professor Rosen talking about me? It's come to the place where professors can't make mention of Mayan cenotes, bureaucracy during the Sung dynasty or a lunatic English poet without introducing some fatuous reference to Auschwitz. I read someplace fifteen years ago that there were already 200,000 bibliographical references to Auschwitz, and that was before the professors really got cooking. I suppose Auschwitz will start popping up in new editions of Grimm's collected tales for first readers.

Despite the obstacles and the longing for night so prevalent in the universities with regard to Holocaust studies, I've been able to create a tremendous free-press scandal throughout the academic community. My ads call attention to revisionist theory on one campus after another across the nation. My second article, "The Holocaust Controversy: The Case for Open Debate," has run as a full-page ad at Michigan, Duke, Cornell, Rutgers, Ohio State, Georgia, Vanderbilt, Louisiana State, Howard, Arizona, Montana and at half a dozen others. Howard is the largest Black university in the country. When the ad ran at the University of San Diego, the president of that Catholic institution ordered special agents to fan out over the campus and confiscate every copy of the paper still available and destroy it. Prospective entries for a new Catholic Index perhaps?

When the New York Times ran its snooty editorial on my ad, asserting it was trashy and barren of ideas, it nevertheless affirmed, "When there is free expression, even the ugliest ideas enrich democracy." How do ugly ideas enrich democracy? Professor Lipstadt found the answer at The Harvard Crimson and took the trouble to repeat it in her Denying the Holocaust.

In one of the most unequivocal evaluations of [Smith's] ad, The Crimson declared it ". . . utter bullshit that has been discredited time and time again."

So there we have it—light on the one hand and bullshit on the other. The yin and yang of intellectual freedom. What browbeaten professors and far-too-elegant editorial writers at The New York Times find ugly is actually part of the process of fertilization when open debate is allowed. Of course, everything new and daring looks bullshit-ugly to those who have something to lose from the new and the daring. When you live in a farming community like ours, you learn to appreciate the necessity for light and fertilizer both.

Together they're what make the grapes grow. They make the white blossoms appear on the fruit trees.

Yousof, another of my volunteer advisors, says serious people don't take me seriously because my writing reveals my lack of a university education.

"You missed something by not going to school," he says. "It shows in everything you write. Your thinking is disorderly and incomplete. How can anyone who is well-read take you seriously? You don't understand the logic of language. You have no formal intellectual training. Educated people understand that when they read you. When you write about the Holocaust from an intellectual perspective they know you're in over your head."

It's obvious to me Yousof has his finger on something. There's plenty missing here. More than he suspects maybe. But this is the hand I was dealt. We can't all be scholars. Most of us aren't. Many of us never went to school at all. When my father-in-law finished the first grade in a Mexico City grammar school, that was it for him. He had to get a job. Nevertheless, ordinary people everywhere feel committed, in the context of their own lives, to right action and right relationship. These are no more and no less than the first responsibilities intellectuals bear, in the context of their lives. I have found everywhere that ordinary people sense it is good to be truthful, generous and open-minded and that it's base to be deceitful, uncharitable and bigoted. With respect to the Holocaust controversy, I don't know of a single intellectual elite that has not betrayed those simple standards.

Occasionally one of my revisionist colleagues will speak to me of honor and urge me not to allow my enemies to insult and ridicule me without striking back. Honorable men feel it's degrading to be ridiculed and insulted. I've come to see something of the comic in it. That's how low I've sunk. When I was a kid it made me angry to be insulted or treated contemptuously, but the older I grow the more difficult it is for me to feel offended by anything said by anyone. One of my problems is that I don't have enemies. Many people think of me as their enemy but I see those persons as potential friends with whom I disagree on a few matters. Maybe if I had been to university I'd be able to relate to them in a more mature way.

Ramana Maharshi advises going at this matter very differently, but he's a Hindu so you have to cut him some slack. He says he doesn't care why an insult hurts, he wants to know who it is who believes he is being hurt. It doesn't do to tell the Maharshi it's you because the Maharshi will ask you who you are and you won't be able to tell him—not to his satisfaction anyhow—and after a while not to yours either. That's the theory. I think there's something to it.

I can still see (who am I?) the television images of the monks in Saigon sitting on the sidewalk setting fire to themselves. They weren't laughing or cracking jokes but they weren't complaining either. They were protesting what they held to be unacceptable behavior by those who had chosen to rule them. I detest complaint but I admire protest. One of the many reasons Adolf puts me off so is that he was a truly chronic complainer (many "survivors" resemble him in that way). I don't think he ever would have been a happy camper, but if he'd chatted up the Maharshi every now and then (their lives spanned the same decades) maybe his own life and the lives of everyone in Europe would have taken a different turn.

Debbie M. Price, a good-looking syndicated columnist writing for the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, begins one of her columns:

From California it came, a voice of pure evil, whispering gently, persuasively into the phone . . . . on the very day President Clinton dedicated the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, here was this voice, this man, Bradley Smith. . . .

Now that's a terrific lead. Her prose goes downhill after that opening paragraph, but I have a soft spot in my heart for anyone who'll kick off a column the way Debbie kicked that one off. I've gotten clippings of it from newspapers all over the country. A voice of pure evil. That's something. Secular journalists are joining Christian scholars to elevate me to extravagant heights of influence. Still, it makes sense. When you find yourself identified with the One who wanders to and fro inside the earth and goes up and down in it, a voice of pure evil comes with the territory. What I need to know is, when I come up to the surface to chat with Texas journalists, where is my point of entry? If the time ever comes when I have to make a run for it, I'd like to know where the devil the hole is.

It's six o'clock in the afternoon on the last Sunday in May. A surprise storm has covered the valley with dark heavy clouds. I'm in the patio behind the house checking the air in the tires on Marisol's bicycle. The front one is low. I hear thunder, a sudden wind blows through the plum trees, then the first drops of rain fall heavily on the patio roof. Fat water drops splatter the concrete walk that leads around the side of the house. I sit on the saddle of the metallic-red girl's bike and watch the rain shake the plumtree leaves and listen to it fall on the corrugated plastic above me. When it stops I pedal over to Mooney Boulevard to the gas station where I use the air.

I wait out another squall beside the pumps, then start pedaling toward downtown-toward the Main Street Diner and Bar. I might make it before it rains again, I might not. Since coming to Visalia I've been drinking Bass Ale but the last time out after I drank a few Bases and left the Diner and was pedaling back along Locust—I don't know how it happened—I fell off the bike into the gutter in front of the Tulare County Escrow Office. From now on when I'm riding the bicycle, no more Bass Ale. Today I'll drink something lighter. Maybe a few Becks Clear. Nearing downtown I cut across Noble and coast over the Locust street bridge across the sunken freeway. I look east up the freeway past where the concrete goes out of sight and beyond to the mountains and there, where the clouds have blown apart, I can see the first ranges of the Sierra Nevada beneath a pure blue sky and how their crests are covered with a fresh white snowfall. And then out of the blue as they say, I hear a voice speak.

"The time is come for you to live a life of intellectual freedom, not argue for one."

I don't understand very well what the voice is getting at. But I'll think about it.

Holocaust Howlers | CODOH

by Ken Meyercord

Recently, the heartrending tales of a 95-year-old Pennsylvanian named Joseph Hirt were revealed to be a hoax. Hirt claimed to have been kidnapped by the Nazis and confined in Auschwitz. He illustrated his talks to high school audiences with a photo of an emaciated concentration camp inmate he claimed to be himself. A knowledgeable teacher recognized the photo as one of an inmate of the Dachau concentration camp and exposed other holes in Hirt's story. When confronted with his lies, Hirt said "I'm sick and I'm tired and I'm old and I don't need this crap." In a comical unintended evocation of the slanderous Holocaust-denier charge, Hirt's nephew said of his uncle, "He's in complete denial."<sup>1</sup> The blurring of memory with delusion is not uncommon amongst Holocaust survivors, and not just nonagenarians.

Many of the outlandish tales embellishing the Holocaust story are roll-on-the-floor, side-splitting howlers. It may seem in extremely poor taste to poke fun at aspects of the Holocaust story, as I'm about to do, but if you find it so, don't blame me. Blame those who have appended farcical chapters to what is, at heart, a truly tragic story.

We begin with the Holocaust-denial laws so popular in Europe, which make it illegal to question the orthodox storyline. Leading the inquisition is, not surprisingly, Germany, which has fined and/or imprisoned dozens, if not hundreds, of heretics. As one wag put it, "Today's leaders of Germany want to prove they're not the sort of Germans who lock people up for writing books by locking people up for writing books." And what do the German authorities do with the books written by convicted Holocaust deniers? They burn them (Welcome to the Dark Ages!).<sup>2</sup>

But the Oscar for Best Comedy in Heresy Suppression goes to France, whose Holocaust denial law makes it a crime to contradict the findings of the Nuremberg tribunal. At Nuremberg it was claimed that soap was made from the fat of Jewish corpses, but Peter Black, senior historian at the United States Holocaust Memorial and Museum, says "It didn't happen.... even experimentally."<sup>3</sup> He'd better not say that in Gay Paree or he could be accused of contradicting what Supreme Court Chief Justice Harlan Fiske Stone called a "high-grade lynching party"<sup>4</sup> and end up in jail.

Many people find the jailhouse confessions of German prisoners proof of the veracity of the Holocaust story. But consider the confession of a German soldier, Arno Düre, who told Soviet prosecutors he had helped bury thousands of Poles executed in the Katyn Forest Massacre. After the fall of the Soviet Union, the Russians, who blamed the massacre on the Germans at Nuremberg, admitted they were the guilty party. No German, including Herr Düre, was anywhere near.<sup>5</sup> Many similar confessions by higher-ranking Nazis have proven equally counterfactual.<sup>6</sup>

Not content with only coerced confessions to justify hanging Nazis, the liberators of the Dachau concentration camp decided to create some physical evidence: they built a gas chamber of their own. Presented as a real gas chamber to tourists for years (and introduced into evidence as such at Nuremberg), the Dachau Museum later informed visitors no one was ever gassed there.<sup>7</sup> Less truthfully, they didn't go on to explain why it's impossible for anyone to have been gassed in the showcase gas chamber.

The Dachau "gas chamber" is a room with a seven-foot-high ceiling in which are embedded fake, sheet metal showerheads. Here's a photo of it:8

Dachau Photo 1945: [Public domain]

Unfortunately for the fabricators, a congressional delegation visited Dachau just two days after its liberation and they reported the room as having a ceiling ten-feet high protruding from which were real brass showerheads.9 In other words, a room like this one (which is, in fact, the shower room at Dachau at liberation):10

Dachau Shower room following American capture of the camp

Looks like somebody built themselves a gas chamber, doesn't it, only it wasn't the Germans!

But what about the testimony of those who claim to have witnessed gassings, you ask? Well, consider that for years a man named Martin Zaidenstadt, who claimed to be a survivor of Dachau, regaled gullible tourists with tales of his having witnessed gassings at the camp.11 Keep Mr. Zaidenstadt in mind whenever you hear eyewitness accounts, such as the one about children being thrown on top once all the floor space in the gas chamber had been filled by adults (featured on the website of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum),12 or the one about the condemned being given a "nice haircut" just prior to being led into the gas chamber (featured in the acclaimed 1985 movie Shoah),13 or the one about a young girl repeatedly swallowing the family jewels hidden in the hem of her skirt whenever she feared she was about to be searched, then digging them out of her poop and sewing them back in (in the video archives of Steven Spielberg's Shoah Foundation ["Shoah" is another term for the Holocaust]).<sup>14</sup>

Then there's Misha Defonseca, who claimed to have run into the woods to escape the Nazis and been raised by wolves. Who would believe such nonsense? Answer: lots of people. The Romulus and Remus-inspired tale, recounted in her book Misha, received wide acclaim (including an encomium from Elie Wiesel), was translated into 18 languages, and earned her millions ("There's no business like Shoah business") before it was exposed as a fraud.<sup>15</sup> The capper: Ms. Defonseca isn't even Jewish!

Other frauds perpetrated on an unsuspecting public include Jerzy Kosinski's The Painted Bird, a bestseller of the 1960s also lauded by Wiesel;<sup>16</sup> Fragments, by Binjamin Wilkomirski, which won the Jewish National Book Award (not bad for a Gentile!);<sup>17</sup> and Angel at the Fence by Herman Rosenblat, which was hailed by Oprah Winfrey as "the single greatest love story in 22 years of doing this show."<sup>18</sup> It all goes to show how uncritically Holocaust stories are accepted out of respect for the real victims, except by callous souls who find humor in human credulity (moi?).

Then there's the testimony which is inexplicably absent. When Winston Churchill heard during the war that the Germans had killed 1.7 million people in gas chambers, he labelled it "the greatest and most horrible crime ever committed in the whole history of the world."<sup>19</sup> But in his voluminous memoir of the war years he fails to mention any gas chambers. Did "the greatest and most horrible crime" in human history slip his mind, even when the final tally was said to be four times greater than what he had heard? Or, with the liberation of the camps, did he realize the story was a myth, which he assumed would someday be exposed (silly boy!), and he didn't want to be seen by history as having been duped. Nor does Eisenhower or De Gaulle mention gas chambers in their memoirs of the war. Even Elie Wiesel, the P.T. Barnum of Holocaust huckstering, makes no mention of gas chambers in his tone-setting Night, which chronicles his time spent in Auschwitz.

Not far from Steven Spielberg's video trove of black comedy in Los Angeles is the Museum of Tolerance, founded by Simon Wiesenthal. Several years back a well-versed revisionist, David Cole, heard that amongst the museum's displays was a film purportedly showing Jewish kids being herded into a gassing van by grim-faced, rifle-toting Nazis. Cole contends that no such homicidal vans existed (and, in fact, none has ever been found), so he was curious where Wiesenthal had found the contradicting footage. Through some diligent research, he found the obscure, fictional movie made in Poland from which the scene was purloined. Further research led to the Polish producer, who was incensed to learn the museum was showing his work without paying him a cent in royalties.<sup>20</sup> I suspect the museum is no longer showing that bit of "documentary" evidence.

Some attempts at finding physical evidence to back up the Holocaust story have proven equally farcical. For instance, there's the case of the Operation Reinhardt camps – Treblinka, Sobibor, and Belzec. Supposedly, hundreds of thousands of Jews were gassed and buried in mass graves, later disinterred and cremated in these camps (of which nothing remained but empty fields at war's end). Revisionists say "no way." They contend these "death" camps were actually transit camps, in which Jews being deported to areas occupied by the Germans in eastern Europe were processed. Who's right could be proven quite simply by taking core samples to determine if the subsoil has been disturbed, i.e., pits were dug for burying the bodies. If pits, then death camps; no pits, then transit camps. But the Jewish authorities won't allow this simple test to resolve one of history's great mysteries to be performed.<sup>21</sup> They did, however, allow an archeologist to do some digging at Treblinka. She dug a pit about four feet by six feet using the best archeological methods, expecting to find bones, teeth, ashes, and the like. She got down a couple of feet without finding anything; then "Eureka!", she struck pay dirt: a tooth!... a SHARK'S tooth.<sup>22</sup> So much for the archeological evidence!

One consequence of the history of the Second World War being reduced to little more than a carnival House of Horrors is that even true believers get duped. An Israeli group called “March of the Living,” which takes young Jews on tours of Auschwitz - traumatizing them for life with the grimmest of fairy tales - includes in their promotional material this photo of a pile of smoldering corpses:23

Dresden following the February 1945 Allied bombings

The tour organizers must have assumed any pile of dead bodies from the war era must be Jews. In fact, the photo is of Germans killed in the Allied firebombing of Dresden in April 1945.24

Similarly, when Phil Donahue had two prominent revisionists on his popular talk show in 1994 (if only such could happen today on network television!), he used photos of the fake gas chamber at Dachau to counter the revisionists’ claim that there were no gas chambers. Donahue became so flustered when this was pointed out to him by one of the revisionists, he revealed he didn’t even know if the photos were of Dachau.25

I’m sick of laughing at the farcical version of the Holocaust story. It’s time that tragic event was given the honest, factual remembrance it deserves and to stop imprisoning those who seek to tell the true story. It’s time to turn this tragicomedy into a bona fide history lesson.

---

Notes:

1	http://www.readingeagle.com/news/article/lancaster-county-mans-story-of-surviving-holocaust-called-into-question .
---	---

2	Ernst Gauss (Ed.), Dissecting the Holocaust (Capshaw, Ala.: Theses and Dissertations Press, 2000) p. 564. See the last paragraph online: http://www.vho.org/GB/Books/dth/fndHoffmann.html .
3	http://www.thejewishweek.com/news/new_york/holocaust_era_soap_find_raises_new_questions .
4	Alpheus T. Mason, Harlan Fiske Stone: Pillar of the Law (New York: Viking, 1956), p. 716.
5	https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Katyn_massacre#At_the_Nuremberg_trials .
6	Samuel Crowell, "Holocaust Narrative as a Species of Imaginative Literature" Smith's Report , No. 49, Dec. 1997. Online: http://codoh.com/library/document/3686/ .
7	https://furtherglory.wordpress.com/2012/04/25/sign-at-dachau-memorial-site-tells-visitors-that-the-gas-chamber-there-was-used/ .
8	https://furtherglory.wordpress.com/2010/11/19/proof-of-the-nazi-gas-chambers-given-at-the-nuremberg-imt-on-nov-29-1945/ .
9	Atrocities and Other Conditions in Concentration Camps in Germany , Document No. 47, 79th Congress, 1st Session, p 11.
10	http://www.kz-gedenkstaette-dachau.de/stop06.html .
11	http://www.scrapbookpages.com/DachauScrapbook/GasChamber/DachauSurvivor.html .
12	https://www.ushmm.org/wlc/en/media_oi.php?ModuleId=10005145&amp;MediaId=1217 .
13	https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=mCkRDQpTg2c#t=38 at the 5:50 mark.
14	https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2wAbjUqHTNA#t=48 .
15	Blake Eskin, "Crying Wolf" Online: http://www.slate.com/articles/arts/culturebox/2008/02/crying_wolf.html .
16	http://www.leaderu.com/ftissues/ft9610/myers.html .
17	https://books.google.com/books/about/The_Wilkomirski_Affair.html?id=FdtAAAAMAAJ .
18	"As Another Memoir Is Faked, Trust Suffers," New York Times , December 30, 2008. Online: http://www.nytimes.com/2008/12/31/books/31opra.html .
19	Martin Gilbert, Winston S. Churchill, Vol. 7: Road to Victory, 1941-1945 , 1986, p. 847.
20	https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2PuNPTx8Ki0 .
21	https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YuAAjrbbBiM at the 41:05 mark.
22	https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YuAAjrbbBiM at the 44:10 mark.
23	https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2R6mTTrOlzE at the 1:10:58 mark.
24	http://historicphotographs.blogspot.com/2013/04/a-pile-of-bodies-awaits-cremation-after.html .

25 | <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=WInpMKHbJUM> at the 19:00 mark.

Hugh S. Gibson, the First Holocaust Revisionist

by Jett Rucker

The Holocaust Hugh Gibson revised is not the National Socialist expulsion of Jews from German society that began as early as 1933. The object of his revision began around 1919, upon the resurrection of a sovereign Poland in Central Europe in the aftermath of World War I.

Although lacking the scope and magnitude of the vaunted German project that figured so intimately in World War II, Gibson's Holocaust was otherwise of striking similarity to the later events that won the sobriquet, except for omitting then-just-defeated Germany from the roster of villains.

Like Holocaust revisionists ever since, Gibson underwent threats of professional destruction from highly placed Zionist agents very shortly after his first forays into correcting the record on the subject of persecution and massacre of Jews in Central Europe. He did not instigate his inquiry of his own accord. President Woodrow Wilson appointed him America's first ambassador to the fledgling Polish state in 1919 and sent him off to Warsaw so precipitously that his appointment had not been ratified in the US Senate, as is required for every ambassadorial appointment. Gibson at the time was a respected, seasoned diplomat in the twelfth year of what turned out to be a long and distinguished career in the Foreign Service.

Portrait of Hugh S. Gibson, date no later than 1922 [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons.

Poland itself was in great tumult, the underpinnings of government and order (suzerainty by Germany in the west and Russia in the east) having suddenly been swept away. When Gibson arrived and undertook the establishment of the legation from scratch, the situation of the Jews of both halves of Poland caught his attention early on, not least because he read atrocity stories in the American press from back home that manifestly did not jibe with what he observed on the scene. This disparity so engaged him that he personally undertook an assiduous campaign to investigate the matter further together with Dr. Boris Bogen, general director of relief operations of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and other members of the legation staff. This he carried out not only by traveling to places in Poland where atrocities had been reported, but also by delving deeply into the historical context of the situation.

In the latter inquiry, he discovered ancient tensions between Jews and the Gentiles of Poland and further concluded that the policies of the just-deposed suzerains effectively aggravated these tensions, whether intentionally or otherwise. And he further found the policies and practices of the Russian side of the equation considerably more condemnable in this regard than those of the German side. The best description of the situation then prevailing, and Hugh Gibson's role in discovering and describing it at the time, is Andrzej Kapiszewski's 2004 Conflicts across the Atlantic: Essays on Polish-

Jewish Relations in the United States during World War I and the Interwar Years. A 2004 article in the semi-annual Studia Judaica by Kapiszewski presented Gibson's entire report under the title "Controversial Reports on the Situation of Jews in Poland in the Aftermath of World War I" was once available to all on the periodical's Web site, but has since been taken down, along with that and previous years' issues. My efforts to learn the explanation for this have been met with polite dissembling.

Kapiszewski also describes at length a concerted campaign on the part of powerful American Jews (Louis A. Marshall, Louis Brandeis, Felix Frankfurter) to suppress and stop Gibson's authoritative reports on the situation that he rendered through customary diplomatic channels to his superiors in the US State Department. These reports, of course, extensively debunked the atrocity reports carried in the New York Times and other outlets as grossly exaggerated or even fabricated, even while they did not at any point deny that minor offenses, some including deaths on the part of Jews, indeed had occurred and might occur in the future. Gibson's extensive and detailed correspondence on the subject is reproduced amply in Kapiszewski's book.

Gibson seems at a number of points to have discovered, much to his surprise, that Zionists such as Brandeis and Frankfurter were little if at all concerned with the welfare of Jews in Poland and in fact favored adverse conditions such as might stimulate the emigration of Jews from Poland to the United States, a goal of theirs that continued in the policies and practices of Zionists in the later context of the German National Socialist anti-Jewish policies of the 1930s and 1940s with a shift in destination from America to Palestine.

All this so exercised the powerful American Jews mentioned that, in a meeting in Paris of Gibson with Brandeis, Frankfurter and others, he was threatened with non-confirmation in his appointment in the Senate hearing ahead. At that meeting or shortly after it, it appears he arrived at some sort of accommodation with the king-un-makers, and his confirmation was allowed to proceed without incident. Certain other influential American Jews presumably opposed to Zionism such as Jacob Schiff and Boris Bogen registered approval both of Gibson and of his reports on the situation in Poland.

The anti-Zionist Jew Henry Morgenthau headed up a commission first suggested by Gibson to look into the situation over a period of two months in Poland in 1919, and its findings<sup>1</sup> were similar to Gibson's. Whether any of these inquiries led to any sort of corrective publicity in the New York Times and other media, I have not investigated, but it would appear they did not, at least not in any substantial way.

Barbara Tuchman (who, unlike her co-religionist Lipstadt, was a true historian) once wrote<sup>2</sup> a passage that became known as Tuchman's Law that bears on the reporting of events such as anti-Semitic activity in far-off Poland. It goes,

The fact of being reported multiplies the apparent extent of any deplorable development by five- to tenfold.

The pattern of the "Holocaust" that ended in 1945 was set as early as 1919, complete with intervention at the highest levels of America's government to punish persons whose objective inquiry yielded information that disserved Zionist aims. Fortunately for Gibson, it was not at that early juncture illegal to do as he so admirably did, as it is today in nineteen countries. None of his extensive works since that time made any mention of Jews, neither as a group nor as to any individual member of that group.

Especially in Poland, more and more of the related subject of the Holocaust becomes illegal to discuss in any meaningful way every day. The criminalization of the present subject would appear to be next on the docket if current trends continue. The other countries (France, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Israel, etc.) may be expected to fall in line in due course. Perhaps it might be effected by simply moving the beginning of the Holocaust from sometime after 1933 back to 1919. Or even further.

---

I would like to acknowledge the kind assistance of Artur Markowski of Studia Judaica in providing me a copy of Andrzej Kapiszewski's 2004 article in his periodical, referred to above.

---

Notes:

Lipstadt's Motivations and "ad Hominem" Attacks

by Germar Rudolf

This article originally appeared as Chapter 3 of Germar Rudolf's recent book, Fail "Denying the Holocaust" How Deborah Lipstadt Botched Her Attempt to Demonstrate the Growing Assault on Truth and Memory. The book may be purchased through <https://shop.codoh.com/book/427/439>.

Revisionist Motives According to Lipstadt

I will here discuss some sweeping claims Lipstadt makes in her book about Holocaust revisionists and their research in general. Such sweeping claims have to be wrong from the outset, because there is no way every revisionist and every revisionist research finding of the past, present and future can possibly fit her bill. Looking at the limited scope of her book, which explores only a subset of revisionists and their research, any sweeping claims are also disingenuous, because if it is unjust and prejudiced, for instance, to conclude from the fact that some Jews are evil that all Jews are evil (or otherwise lacking), the same is true for revisionists. So even if all the revisionists she investigated and all of their works deserved her judgment, she could not possibly extrapolate from this that all the individuals and all the research she ignored or wasn't even aware of fall into the same categories, though she obviously is eager to convey the impression of total coverage on her part.

This is not to say that Lipstadt's assessments are always wrong. That has to be assessed on a case-by-case basis. Some of the specific charges made against individual revisionists will therefore be discussed in the next chapter, case by case.

According to Lipstadt, Holocaust revisionism constitutes a "clear and present danger" and a "serious threat" (p. xi, also p. 29) that can cause "terrible harm" (p. xix). At that early point in her book, she does not specify what revisionism is a danger or threat to, nor what harm it can do, as she does not support her claim. But she knows that revisionists "must be taken seriously," because "Far more than the history of the Holocaust is at stake" (p. 17). The reader is again left to speculate what is at stake, as Lipstadt does not elaborate. Later in her book, however, she gives us some clues, and I will therefore return to this farther below.

In her introduction she writes on page xvii:

In the 1930s Nazi rats spread a virulent form of antisemitism that resulted in the destruction of millions. Today the [anti-Semitism] bacillus carried by these [revisionist neo-Nazi] rats threatens to 'kill' those who already died at the hands of the Nazis for a second time by destroying the world's memory of them.

As emerges from several instances in her book, Lipstadt equates Holocaust revisionists with "Nazis" and "fascists":

[The deniers] are a group motivated by a strange conglomeration of conspiracy theories, delusions, and neo-Nazi tendencies. (p. 24)

...at their core [the revisionists] are no different from these neo-fascist groups. (p. 217)

Hence, in her introduction, Lipstadt equates revisionists with rats. Once the “Nazis” equated Jews with vermin like rats, lice or bacilli. Lipstadt uses the same terms to indiscriminately disparage all persons holding certain opinions she disagrees with. A worse attack on the humanity of her fellow humans can hardly be conceived. This sentence alone destroys her reputation as a scholar.

It goes without saying that for Lipstadt the opposite is true, for she claims that it is the deniers who engage in ad hominem attacks on their opponents. To support her claim, she relates the following fanciful story: (p. 27):

The deniers understand how to gain respectability for outrageous and absolutely false ideas. The anthropologist Marshall Sahlins has described how this process operates in the academic arena. Professor X publishes a theory despite the fact that reams of documented information contradict his conclusions. In the ‘highest moral tones’ he expresses his disregard for all evidence that sheds doubt on his findings. He engages in ad hominem attacks on those who have authored the critical works in this field and on the people silly enough to believe them. The scholars who have come under attack by this professor are provoked to respond. Before long he has become ‘the controversial Prof. X’ and his theory is discussed seriously by nonprofessionals, that is, journalists. He soon becomes a familiar figure on television and radio, where he ‘explains’ his ideas to interviewers who cannot challenge him or demonstrate the fallaciousness of his argument.

Now, I have no doubt that some controversial professor in some field may have done just that, but where is the evidence that any revisionist professor (or any other revisionist scholar) has ever engaged in attention-seeking ad hominem attacks on those who oppose him, leading those thusly attacked to respond? Again, no example is given, and no source quoted. You just have to believe Dr. Deborah! I’m not saying she is necessarily wrong. All I’m saying is that:

- a) those living in glass houses should not throw stones; and
- b) making sweeping accusations without proving them is profoundly unscholarly.

On page 1 Lipstadt opines that “Holocaust denial is” an “antisemitic ideology” rather than “responsible historiography.” It is a “purely ideological exercise,” and the revisionists merely appear to be “engaged in a genuine scholarly debate when, of course, they are not” (p. 2). Of course.

Arguing along the same line, she then states that the revisionists merely “camouflage their hateful ideology” “under the guise of scholarship” (p. 3). Again, these claims are not backed up with anything, just like the following accusation:

One of the tactics deniers use to achieve their ends is to camouflage their goals. In an attempt to hide the fact that they are fascists and antisemites [sic] with a specific ideological and political agenda—they state that their objective is to uncover historical falsehoods, all historical falsehoods. (p. 4)

And it is only Dr. Lipstadt who can reveal the revisionists’ real agenda, because she can read their minds, their hearts, their very souls, if any! But even if some revisionists have the agenda she imputes to them, where is the contradiction to their claimed goal to uncover historical falsehoods? Both can be true (and in some cases probably are).

More sweepingly still, Lipstadt claims on p. 18, presented again without any proof that Holocaust denial is “a movement with no scholarly, intellectual, or rational validity.”

She characterizes revisionists as proponents of “pseudoreasoned ideologies” and opines (p. 26):

They use the language of scientific inquiry, but theirs is a purely ideological enterprise. [...] the deniers’ contentions are a composite of claims founded on racism, extremism, and virulent antisemitism.

Ok, let’s take a deep breath and look at this more closely: racism, extremism, antisemitism. Later she even opines that revisionists “oppose” (p. 142) or even “hate” democracy, which they want to weaken (p. 217), so we add democracy to the mix as well. Don’t expect her to prove any of these sweeping claims, though, because she doesn’t. Although it certainly is true that some individuals harboring revisionist views adhere to some or all of these beliefs, Lipstadt assigns them to all revisionists without distinction, and that’s simply a flawed, illegitimate, unscholarly way of arguing.

In addition, she once more abstains from defining the terms she is using, relying instead on the negative associations people have with them. So before discussing her accusation, allow me to specify how the terms should be defined, and, in contrast to that, how Lipstadt uses them.

1. Extremism

The terms “radical” and “extreme” are frequently used interchangeably, although they mean things quite different. Being radical means going to the root of something (from Latin radix = root). In the political context it usually denotes someone who is unwilling to compromise in pursuit of his goals, whatever those goals are. On the other hand, extreme (from the superlative form of the Latin adjective exter = outside) denotes ideas that are at a far end of a spectrum. In the political context it commonly refers to individuals who are ready to violate laws in pursuit of their ideas.

In a certain way, scholars need to be radicals, because they ought to go to the root of an issue, unwilling to make compromises in their attempt to uncover the truth. However, they are not supposed to be extremists, willing to violate laws in pursuit of their goal. The only permissible exception in this context is when the authorities illegitimately obstruct the pursuit of the truth with censorship laws. In that case it is the authorities who are going to illegal extremes by impeding freedom of inquiry, of information, and of speech. Scholars violating such illegal laws in the honorable tradition of civil disobedience are merely claiming what is rightly theirs. Even Dr. Lipstadt thinks that outlawing historical dissent, as has been done by many European countries, is not a good approach (pp. 219ff.).

Now, do revisionists violate laws (other than censorship laws)? Or do they advocate that people do this? I know of not a single case. Does Dr. Lipstadt suggest they do? She does not say so explicitly, but by claiming that revisionists plan on resurrecting fascism or National Socialism, she implies just that, for those political ideologies have an undeniable track record of violating their own countries’ laws in pursuit of their agendas.

Dr. Lipstadt does admit that the Institute for Historical Review (IHR), which once was the flagship of Holocaust revisionism, “protested that it was not interested in resurrecting any regime” (p. 142), but that won’t help, because Lipstadt knows it all better: “the reality is quite different” (p. 143). I’ll return to her treatment of the IHR in Section 4.5.

How liberally Dr. Lipstadt uses the term “extremist” can be seen when she discusses U.S. writer Freda Utley. She introduces her by saying “Utley was an extremist.” No proof given. You just have to believe it.

The politically correct online encyclopedia Wikipedia has the following to say about Utley:<sup>1</sup>

Winifred Utley (London, England, January 23, 1898 – Washington, D.C., United States, January 21, 1978), commonly known as Freda Utley, was an English scholar, political activist and best-selling author. After visiting the Soviet Union in 1927 as a trade union activist, she joined the Communist Party of Great Britain in 1928. Later, married and living in Moscow, she quickly became disillusioned with communism. When her Russian husband, Arcadi Berdichevsky, was arrested in 1936, she escaped to England with her young son. (He [her husband] would die in 1938.)

In 1939, the rest of her family moved to the United States, where she became a leading anticommunist author and activist.

Freda Utley

Read her entire biography on Wikipedia and you realize that she was anything but an extremist. Just because Lipstadt doesn’t like that Utley revealed the crimes against humanity committed by the Allied occupational forces in Germany during the first three years after the war,<sup>2</sup> she stigmatizes her. This is an utterly unwarranted ad hominem attack.

2. Anti-Semitism

I hesitated to address this issue in the first place, because most people don't want to hear or read about it. But Dr. Lipstadt uses the terms "antisemitism," "antisemite" and "antisemitic" 182 times in her book, so on average almost on every single page of it. Lipstadt's book is even copyrighted by "The Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Anti-Semitism, The Hebrew University of Jerusalem," according to the imprint. Hence battling anti-Semitism is what the book is mainly about.

And where is the link? Well, on page 218 she is adamantly clear:

Holocaust denial is nothing but antisemitism.

Pretty much everybody she discusses, and every sincere dissent ever expressed about the mainstream Holocaust narrative, gets hit with the accusation of being anti-Semitic. There is therefore no way of dodging it, short of total acquiescence.

The accusation of anti-Semitism is one of the worst ad hominem attacks possible. It is meant to disparage opponents by giving others the impression that they are morally so depraved that even listening to them is beyond acceptable behavior. It's the best strategy Dr. Lipstadt can possibly come up with to immunize her pet theory from any critical scrutiny. And she's making ample use of it.

An anti-Semite is someone who dislikes or even hates people simply because they are Jews. But that's not the way it is frequently used. Criticizing aspects of the Jewish religion, which is just as legitimate as criticizing Islam or Christianity, is also frequently lumped into that category. The same happens to those who criticize Jewish power and influence, although it is just as legitimate as criticizing Catholic, Muslim or White Anglo-Saxon Protestant power and influence. The same is true for criticizing Zionism as Jewish nationalism with at-times-racist excesses, which is just as legitimate as criticizing any other form of nationalism resulting in unacceptable excesses. Yet anyone who engages in these kinds of criticism of Jewish affairs has to inevitably expect to be wrongly stigmatized as an anti-Semite. It's a catch-all defamation designed to protect Jewish and Zionist activities from any kind of scrutiny and criticism.

Although I have no doubt that there are revisionists who harbor anti-Semitic views (see Chapter 4), that does not mean that all revisionists are anti-Semites. That would be like saying that, because all squares are rectangles, all rectangles are squares. But that's exactly what Dr. Lipstadt is doing. Logic isn't her strength, or else it's a nuisance and an obstacle for her agenda, so she discards it.

When I got involved in revisionism in 1989, first passively by reading some of their works, then in 1990 also actively by doing some private research in an attempt to verify some aspects of the Leuchter Report,<sup>3</sup> Jews were merely the ancient Chosen People of the Old Testament to me as a practicing Catholic, and also the heroes of the 1973 war of the Arab nations against Israel. I remember reenacting that war as a boy with my brother with our toy tanks. We beat the crap out of those evil Arabs! Other than that, I had no opinion about them at all.

Then, as other revisionists learned about my research activities, one of them started sending me "information" about the Jews. I was rather disgusted by what I thought was anti-Semitic propaganda material, and I eventually threw it all away. It was only sometime in 1992 that I started connecting the dots. I had seen the importance of revisionism for German history all along, but only then did it dawn on me that it must have an equally intense, although opposite effect on Jewish history.

It took the decision of a German court of law, however, to make me look into that issue more thoroughly. It happened in 1995, when I was sentenced to 14 months' imprisonment for my forensic research activities.<sup>4</sup> In the verdict, the court called me an anti-Semite, although I was utterly unaware of what that meant, apart from the obvious. So I started to do some research into the history of and reasons for anti-Jewish sentiments. That hasn't made me an expert on this, but I know enough to be able to alert the reader to two pertinent studies by an Israeli scholar and Holocaust veteran which I can recommend, if the reader is interested in this issue.<sup>5</sup>

When reading these books, the reader will find out, probably to his surprise, that there are actually plenty of rational reasons for opposing certain aspects of certain emanations of the Jewish religion. Of course that does not justify hating people merely because they are Jews, but if anyone wants to understand anti-Semitism which ultimately led to Auschwitz, there is no way around addressing these issues.

All those who are not interested in learning about the history of and reasons for anti-Jewish sentiments have the right to remain ignorant, of course. Such deliberate ignorance, however, can hardly be the basis upon which to judge other people and their views.

Obfuscating the rational aspects for anti-Semitism is one of the things Dr. Lipstadt is engaged in as well. In the introduction to her book she states that there is absolutely no rational aspect to anti-Semitism (pp. xvii):

More important, we must remember that we are dealing with an irrational phenomenon that is rooted in one of the oldest hatreds, antisemitism.

Although a sweeping statement like that is wrong, let me stress right away that the actually existing rational aspects of anti-Semitism in no way justify what happened under Hitler, whatever that was in detail. Depriving individuals of their civil rights has to be based on their individual and proven guilt, not because their parents signed them up for a belief system without their consent.

Finally, a remark is due about the so-called Protocols of the Elders of Zion. On page 24 Dr. Lipstadt writes:

The deniers' worldview is no more bizarre than that enshrined in the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a report purporting to be the text of a secret plan to establish Jewish world supremacy. The deniers draw inspiration from the Protocols, which has enjoyed a sustained and vibrant life despite the fact it has long been proved a forgery.

And on p. 164:

In fact, when it was originally published in France in the mid-nineteenth century, Jews did not appear in the book at all. Only at the beginning of [the twentieth] century was it rewritten with Jews as the primary culprits.

She brings up the Protocols six times in her book, proving her own obsession with it (pp. 24, 37, 136, 152, 164, 206). Now, I've been at the center of revisionist publishing efforts since the mid-1990s, and not a single time did the Protocols show up in any context whatsoever that I can remember. It's simply not a topic discussed in revisionist publications. Not even in discussions among revisionists, public or private, has it ever come up that I am aware of.

In 1989, I accidentally ran into a German translation of the Protocols' "original" novel version of the mid-nineteenth century, as Dr. Lipstadt puts it, in which Jews are indeed not mentioned at all. The book upset me, but since it was clearly fictitious with no indication that any of its outrageous claims were true, I eventually simply threw it away. Only later did I learn that a different version of this novel exists which claims to be a real protocol by Jewish elders. I never read that, though, and I'm not considering ever wasting my time on it either.

Carlo Mattogno's booklet on the Protocols of the Elders of Zion.

I must admit, however, that the most-prolific revisionist author of the past 25 years, the Italian Carlo Mattogno, wrote a paper about the Protocols in Italian in 2010, which was reformatted into a book and republished in 2014.<sup>6</sup> If you read Italian and want to spend time on this, be my guest.

There is a concise definition of how the meaning of the term “anti-Semite” has changed over the past century which I like very much:<sup>7</sup>

*An anti-Semite used to mean a man who hated Jews.
Now it means a man who is hated by Jews.*

That may not be true in all cases, but it sure hits the nail on the head when it comes to Dr. Lipstadt's attitude.

3. Democracy

Even though there are many intelligent critiques of democracy as a governmental system,<sup>8</sup> I have never seen any of them mentioned in Holocaust-revisionist publications. Those deal with aspects of history, not political theory. There may be some individuals among Holocaust revisionists who prefer authoritarian systems, yet at the same time these individuals complain when their civil rights get curtailed by governments hostile to their views. Well, you can't have your cake and eat it too.

Essentially, what is important is not that a country's system is democratic, but that people are safe from arbitrary and unjust government actions. To give an example, Hitler was elected democratically, and all the civil rights restrictions implemented in Germany during the first four years of his administration were done perfectly democratically. Had Hitler decided to let the German people vote again in early 1937, he most certainly would have been re-elected, maybe with as much as 80% of the vote, as popular as he was back then. The same would probably have happened in early 1941. So what does that tell us about democracy?

To give another example, after the French revolution, France was formally a democracy for a number of years. Yet it had no rule of law. At the same time, on the other side of the River Rhine, there existed an absolute monarchy in Prussia which, however, was governed by the rule of law where even the king had to submit to ordinary court decisions. Hence people were much safer and better treated in monarchical Prussia during those years than they were in democratic France.

Democracy is therefore not the issue. If a democratic majority decides to terrorize a minority, that is still democracy, but it is not justifiable. What is needed is the rule of law, the guarantee of basic civil rights, and the right of self-determination as one of the most important aspects of international law (to prevent aggressions against domestic and foreign population groups). How these legal frameworks are implemented is secondary. Democracy may be the most reliable way of going about it, but as history shows, that is not always true.

4. Racism

When I got into the internet dating scene in the early 2000s, I was struck by the dating pattern most people exhibit. Match.com, probably the biggest dating website in the world, allows you to state which ethnic group you would like to date, and your choice can be seen by everyone. A survey showed that the vast majority of people prefer dating within their own ethnic group. I observed the same pattern regarding people's preferences as to where they like to live. As I moved from one region to another during my first six-year stay in the U.S., it became rather clear that people voted not only with their dating patterns, but also with their feet. They want to be amongst their own kind.

Is that racism? If so, most of us are racists. But I daresay that this is not so. In fact, it is normal to give preference to those you feel similar to. We feel closest, and prefer to be surrounded by, our loved ones – family and friends. From there we have concentric, growing circles of groups of people whom we feel closer to than to others, be they our religious congregation, our neighborhood, our community, the town, county, state, country we live in, our society, our culture, and so on. Ethnicity and race are just two more of these circles, which aren't always concentric but often intersect. It is therefore normal for us to feel closer to people who are similar to us than to those that are more different, whatever that difference is.

Having said this, feeling closer to one group of humans than to others does not imply and most certainly does not justify that we denigrate, disparage or even mistreat members of other groups. But that is what the term "racist" implies.

Now, being proud of your family and making sure it stays safe, giving it more of your efforts and concern than you give to other families, is perfectly acceptable. Shouldn't it then also be acceptable to be proud of your own ethnicity or race, to make sure it stays safe, to give it more of your efforts and concern than you give to other ethnicities and races? I'm not saying it is anyone's obligation to feel that way, but I find it perfectly normal if people do feel that way and act accordingly. That's not racism. That's just our nature. As long as we don't abuse other ethnicities or races, or advocate or promote such behavior, this should be within the realm of acceptability. This kind of attitude has been called "racialism" to set it apart from racism, just like patriotism is set apart from nationalism. Needless to say, some racists try to hide their attitudes by merely pretending to be racialists, but I daresay that by sheer behavioral patterns, most of us are effectively racialist without having a racist fiber in our bodies.

Lipstadt doesn't bother defining the term "racism" as I have done here, setting it apart from perfectly normal "racialist" behaviors. For her, this term is merely another way of staging personal attacks on historical dissidents she disagrees with. It is nothing but yet another tactical move to immunize her pet theory from public scrutiny. Her message is clear: "Don't you dare espouse revisionist views, or you end up as a social pariah by being called an extremist, a racist and anti-Semite!"

Unfortunately, it works.

5. Conspiracy

Calling someone a conspiracy theorist is like saying that he's kind of nuts and shouldn't be taken seriously. It's an ad hominem attack, pure and simple. Lipstadt uses the term conspiracy(ies) in her book 47 times.

Fact is that, whenever two or more people get together to hatch out a plan and to implement it, they conspire. It happens all the time. It's a standard feature of the human existence.

The conspiracy theory that rivets thousands of engineers and architects: Was 9/11 a false-flag operation?

Were the events of 9/11 a conspiracy of several Muslim terrorists with whoever supported them, or of several government agents with whoever supported them? Both are conspiracy theories. The difference is that the one is supported by the government and the mass media, while the other is supported by thousands of independent engineers, architects and scholars (see www.911truth.org). Only one of them gets stigmatized as a nutty conspiracy theory, and that's always the one the government and the mass media disagree with.

That's all there is to it. Just ignore it. Evidence matters, not name calling.

Revisionist Methods According to Lipstadt

Let's move on to what Dr. Lipstadt thinks about the methods used by revisionists. On pp. 19f. she states that at its core [Holocaust denial] poses a threat to all who believe that knowledge and memory are among the keystones of our civilization.

On p. 217 she even claims that the revisionists' objective is "the destruction of truth and memory." How is that? Knowledge of the truth and memory don't always work in tandem, because memory is notoriously fallible. But Lipstadt evidently wants her readers to believe in the identity of “truth” with “memory,” for she frequently uses both terms together, not just in the subtitle of her book (pp. xvii, 209, 216f.). She herself acknowledges, however, that memory can be fallible, although she gives it her own twist to make it fit into her agenda:

It is axiomatic among attorneys, prosecutors, and judges that human memory is notoriously bad on issues of dimensions and precise numbers but very reliable on the central event. (p. 134)

And guess how Lipstadt backs up this alleged axiom of the legal profession: not at all. It is not only unsubstantiated but also wrong, as Elizabeth Loftus has demonstrated with her vast research: human memory can be utterly corrupted in just about any regard. You merely have to apply sufficiently suggestive techniques to achieve it.<sup>9</sup> All this apart from the fact that what people remember and what they tell isn't always the same thing, either.

Under these circumstances, source criticism of testimony is a very important hallmark of scholarly works, particularly when the Holocaust is discussed. This is so because most witnesses to this event are emotionally and frequently also politically heavily involved, making it more likely than usual that they will “shade the truth.” In addition, ever since the end of World War II the entire world has been exposed to a publicity and increasingly also an educational campaign which inundates all of us with the tenets of the orthodox Holocaust narrative. It therefore needs to be expected that survivors tend to incorporate into their memory as their own recollection what we all “know” about this event due to these campaigns. In fact, survivors find themselves under massive public pressure to “remember” what everyone knows already anyway.

It is therefore true when Lipstadt writes on page 6 that attacks on the credibility of survivors' testimony are standard elements of Holocaust denial.

Note the use of the polemical word “attack,” insinuating an aggression where there is none, because critically analyzing the credibility of testimony belongs to the standard repertoire of any serious scholar. That is exactly why revisionist works are more scholarly – not to say, credible – in nature in this regard than their mainstream counterparts which almost without exception take anecdotal evidence uncritically at face value. In fact, Lipstadt admits that the mainstream narrative of the Holocaust relies heavily on testimony (pp. 23f.):

Given the preponderance of evidence from victims, bystanders, and perpetrators, and given the fact that the deniers' arguments lie so far beyond the pale of scholarly arguments [...].

In her eyes, this reliance on testimony is so great that, once these witnesses will have died, revisionism will be even more dangerous (p. 24):

[The revisionists'] objective is to plant seeds of doubt that will bear fruit in coming years, when there are no more survivors or eyewitnesses alive to attest to the truth.

This is a peculiar notion. If our knowledge of historical events depended on living-witness testimony, anything longer ago than some 90+ years would become increasingly blurred and uncertain. This is obviously not the case. In fact, the opposite can be posited, as it will be easier for researchers to critically assess recorded witness statements once it is no longer necessary to make allowances for the feelings of the witness generation. And that is obviously what Dr. Lipstadt fears: that the revered witness generation will lose its status as virtually untouchable saints. Like it or not, Dr. Lipstadt, the sooner this happens, the better for historiography.

In the same vein, Lipstadt criticizes U.S. revisionist Dr. Arthur Butz for trying to “shed doubt on the credibility of witnesses in general by declaring all testimony inferior to documents” (p. 129). If we keep in mind the general hierarchy of probative value as explained in Section 2.1., Point 5, that’s exactly what Butz, nay, what any serious historian has to do if he wants to stick to scholarly criteria. Unless a document is nothing more than a witness statement put on paper, in which case it has as much probative value as any other witness statement, a genuine document is superior to testimony. Had Lipstadt correctly portrayed the claimed “axiomatic” knowledge “among attorneys, prosecutors, and judges” in this regard, she would have disclosed that this hierarchy is (or should be) observed by all courts of law – and also by all historians.

What she does realize is that revisionist scholars approach the evidence differently than what she and her colleagues from the mainstream do (p. 27):

Normal and accepted standards of scholarship, including the proper use of evidence, are discarded [by revisionists].

I agree that everyone should use evidence properly. But what is “the proper use of evidence”? She doesn’t say. Neither does she define what evidence is and how to use it properly, nor does she make any reference to anyone else who does. Doing so would be the proper, scholarly way. But then again, scholarship? Scientific method? What is that? Ever heard of them, Dr. Lipstadt?

Holocaust revisionists follow what can be called the precedence of the archives, and in keeping with the hierarchy of probative value as discussed in Section 2.1., Point 5, they give an even higher precedence to material, physical, forensic evidence with all the technology it involves. That is “normal and accepted standards of scholarship” everywhere – except when it comes to mainstream Holocaust researchers, who turn this pyramid on its head, giving witness statements priority over documents, and documents priority over forensic evidence and technical arguments. Hence, the proper way of putting it is:

Normal and accepted standards of scholarship, including the proper use of evidence, are discarded by mainstream Holocaust researchers.

Jacques Baynac

In 1996, the French mainstream historian Jacques Baynac said the following about this:10

For the scientific historian, an assertion by a witness does not really represent history. It is an object of history [=requiring source criticism]. And an assertion of one witness does not weigh heavily; assertions by many witnesses do not weigh much more heavily, if they are not shored up with solid documentation. The postulate of scientific historiography, one could say without great exaggeration, reads: no paper/s, no facts proven [...].

Either one gives up the priority of the archives, and in this case one disqualifies history as a science, immediately reclassifying it as fiction; or one retains the priority of the archive, and in this case one must concede that the lack of traces brings with it the incapability of directly proving the existence of homicidal gas chambers.

Oh dear, Dr. Deborah is in trouble!

Having noted all this, it should be clear whose attitude is a real threat to “the keystones of our civilization,” which are critical, reasoned thinking, not dogmatic belief in what someone claims to be “memory.” Yet Lipstadt manages to turn it all upside down, because after she has declared her fundamental opposition toward a critical, reasoned scrutiny of what she claims to be “memory,” she claims that denial of the Holocaust is not a threat just to Jewish history but a threat to all who believe in the ultimate power of reason. It repudiates reasoned discussion the way the Holocaust repudiated civilized values. It is undeniably a form of antisemitism, and as such it constitutes an attack on the most basic values of a reasoned society. Like any form of prejudice, it is an irrational animus that cannot be countered with the normal forces of investigation, argument, and debate. The deniers’ arguments are at their roots not only antisemitic and anti-intellectual but, in the words of historian Charles Maier, ‘blatantly racist anthropology.’ Holocaust denial is the apotheosis of irrationalism. (p. 20)

Wow! So let me get that straight: Because we revisionists insist on an intellectual, rational, evidence-based, reasoned investigation of the reliability of witness testimony, we turn irrationalism into our god – because that’s what apotheosis means! And I thought I was agnostic, but if Dr. Lipstadt says so, I must be wrong – of course! Who needs any other proof!

Having proclaimed apodictically that revisionists are the paragons of irrationalism, she again emphasizes that revisionism is “neither scholarship nor historiography” (p. 20), which is why she chose to eschew the term revisionism whenever possible and instead to use the term denial to describe it. The deniers’ selection of the name revisionist to describe themselves is indicative of their basic strategy of deceit and distortion and of their attempt to portray themselves as legitimate historians engaged in the traditional practice of illuminating the past.

Or maybe it’s the other way around: her choice of the term “denier” is her way of calling the revisionists names in order to disparage them from the outset. It all depends on whether Holocaust revisionism aka denial has any scholarly merit or not. In Lipstadt’s eyes, though, this can’t be, because if it were, she would have to take their arguments seriously and maybe even debate them, and that she categorically refuses to do:

Whenever the plans include inviting a denier I categorically decline to appear [on TV talk shows]. As I make clear in these pages the deniers want to be thought of as the ‘other side.’ Simply appearing with them on the same stage accords them that status. [...] Refusal to debate the deniers thwarts their desire to enter the conversation as a legitimate point of view. (pp. xiii)

I explained repeatedly that I would not participate in a debate with a Holocaust denier. The existence of the Holocaust was not a matter of debate. (p. 1)

Toward the end of her book, she repeats her refusal to debate “deniers” and explains again why (p. 221):

Not ignoring the deniers does not mean engaging them in discussion or debate. In fact, it means not doing that. We cannot debate them for two reasons, one strategic and the other tactical. As we have repeatedly seen, the deniers long to be considered the ‘other’ side. Engaging them in discussion makes them exactly that. Second, they are contemptuous of the very tools that shape any honest debate: truth and reason. Debating them would be like trying to nail a glob of jelly to the wall.

She said this attitude has resulted in revisionists accusing her of having a “lack of tolerance for the First Amendment” and of opposing “free intellectual inquiry.” She does not back up that claim, and I agree with her that this charge is unfounded. It’s her perfect right not to talk to people she dislikes. She even has the right not to address arguments she detests, which is exactly her approach (p. 28):

Time need not be wasted in answering each and every one of the deniers’ contentions. It would be a never-ending effort to respond to arguments posed by those who falsify findings, quote out of context, and dismiss reams of testimony because it counters their arguments. It is the speciousness of their arguments, not the arguments themselves, that demands a response.

Again, she does not substantiate her various accusations at this point, but when discussing certain revisionists later in her book, she brings up several examples, which we will discuss later. For now, let’s assume for the sake of argument that some revisionists have indeed “falsified findings” and/or “quoted out of context.” Would that justify dismissing any and all revisionist arguments?

Putting the shoe on the other foot makes the answer to that question obvious: If I were able to show that Dr. Lipstadt or any of several other of her mainstream colleagues has committed the same unethical offenses, would that allow me to dismiss all the arguments which mainstream Holocaust research has produced since the end of World War II? Of course not.

As I pointed out in Section 2.1., Point 3, refusing to expose one’s own theory to serious attempts of refutation is a hallmark of a pseudo-scholarly attitude. Refusing to take opposing arguments into serious consideration sheds a bad light on those who do this – not on the arguments they reject out of hand.

In addition, claiming that certain things are simply not up for debate is also a clear and present sign of an unscholarly attitude, not to say sheer bigotry. Although Dr. Lipstadt admits that there are many aspects of the Holocaust that are debated among mainstream historians, she insists that

There is a categorical difference between debating these types of [mainstream] questions [about the Holocaust] and debating the very fact of the Holocaust.

Well, I hate to tell you, Dr. Deborah, but the freedom of hypothesis is a fundamental principle of science. Just because you don't like it doesn't mean you can ignore its existence and still claim to be a scholar. You have to make up your mind.

Apart from all this, Lipstadt's warning that debating revisionists would improve their public reputation is not at all self-evident. Revisionist writer Paul Grubach has explained this in detail, which he has allowed me to reproduce here:11

---

Despite what Lipstadt writes, if hard evidence for the Holocaust is overwhelming and the claims of revisionists ridiculous, to engage the latter in debate would not lend them credibility and respect. Quite the contrary. Crossing swords with these "cranks" would be a golden opportunity for Lipstadt to expose their alleged quackery and stupidity. Only if revisionism has intrinsic validity will it gain stature by a public hearing. The Emory University professor's refusal to debate carries with it the implicit recognition that revisionism has more legitimacy than she cares to admit.

Even if revisionism were pure balderdash, the public interest would still be served if it were given serious attention in the mainstream media. The truth of the traditional version of the Holocaust could be re-verified. Lipstadt has been quoted as saying that she is "only interested in getting at the truth."12 If this be so, then a more complete perception of the truth would be gained in a public debate where her "Holocaust facts" clashed with "revisionist fiction."

Mark Weber

To put it bluntly, Lipstadt's "justification" for refusing to debate is nothing more than a conscience-salving self-deception designed to cover up her fear and insecurity.

The reader might now ask – what is the real reason behind her refusal to debate?

This question was answered in part on July 22, 1995, the day that revisionist historian Mark Weber squared off against anti-revisionist historian Dr. Michael Shermer in an oral debate on the Holocaust. Both sides were given a fair and equal opportunity to present their case, as the audience had the opportunity to hear defenses of both the Holocaust revisionist and the traditional view of the Holocaust.13

The debate was a disaster for the traditional view of the Holocaust. Weber made Holocaust revisionism look too good and Lipstadt's Holocaust ideology severely deficient. Evidence that this is the case is suggested by the fact that some years after the debate Shermer wrote:14

It is one thing to analyze the literature of deniers or to interview them face to face; it is quite another process to confront them in a public forum, where their skills at rhetoric and debate can trip up even seasoned scholars and historians.

Indeed, to this day Shermer refuses to advertise the videotape of the debate in his Skeptic magazine, and he never referred to it in his long analysis of Holocaust revisionism that appeared in his bestseller, Why People Believe Weird Things.15 Although the force of circumstance compelled Shermer to mention the videotape in brief passing in his Denying History (p. 73), the reader is given no information on how to acquire it, which suggests he and his colleagues don't want people to see the video.

Dr. Michael Shermer

It is safe to assume that, if Dr. Shermer had scored a victory over Holocaust revisionism, he and the Deborah Lipstadts of this world would be aggressively promoting the Weber-Shermer debate videotape.

The upshot of my argument is this. It is actually a potent testimonial in favor of Holocaust revisionism that some of the major promoters of the traditional view of the Holocaust like Deborah Lipstadt refuse to debate. It seems to be a tacit admission by its most bitter opponents that Holocaust revisionism has more credibility than they care to publicly admit.

---

Thank you, Paul! There is, by the way, a devastating revisionist critique of Shermer's book Denying History, which I can highly recommend.16 I'll hand over the pen to Paul Grubach again in a short while, but let's conclude this section first before moving on.

In wrapping up her case against the revisionists, Dr. Lipstadt writes on page 217:

They attempt to project the appearance of being committed to the very values that they in truth adamantly oppose: reason, critical rules of evidence, and historical distinction.

Now, after all that I have explained so far, can you tell who exactly “They” are?

Deborah Lipstadt’s Motives and Agenda

On page 23 Dr. Lipstadt discloses the reason why she won’t take revisionist arguments seriously by revealing why she considers revisionism a clear and present danger:

Before fascism can be resurrected, this blot [the Holocaust] must be removed. At first [the deniers] attempted to justify it; now they deny it. This is the means by which those who still advocate the principles of fascism attempt to reintroduce it as a viable political system (see chapter 6).

Denial aims to reshape history in order to rehabilitate the persecutors and demonize the victims. (p. 216)

So if you stop believing in homicidal gas chambers, you’re not only automatically a racist, anti-Semite, extremist and neo-fascist who hates democracy, you are also a clear and present danger to your country’s government, because you obviously plan to overthrow it and replace it with a renewed Hitlerite dictatorship.

If that were true, I’d take up the fight on Dr. Lipstadt’s side!

But give me a break! Does she really believe this?

While there might be some who really think that’s the way the world could possibly work, I don’t think any person who has not been conditioned to manifest Pavlovian reflexes when certain terms are thrown into the debate should be able to realize that this is a whole load of utter ... Well, fill in the blanks yourself.

What Dr. Lipstadt does reveal here, however, are her own deep-seated political motives. Most will consider them benevolent, but they remain political in nature, not scholarly, and this should raise a red flag for all those who expect from scholars to do their job sine ira et studio – without political anger and zeal. Dr. Lipstadt very obviously has written her book while being full of anger and zeal.

The reader may wonder why Dr. Lipstadt inundates her opponents with pejoratives to disparage them, and why she steadfastly refuses to enter into a scholarly debate with them. Paul Grubach has given that question some thought and has allowed me to reproduce the major part of his pertinent essay here:17

---

1. Hypocrisy on Zionist Politics

In order to understand the agenda and emotional driving force behind Lipstadt’s behavior and public pronouncements, one has to know something about her intense political sympathies.

Lipstadt points out that she is an “openly identifying Jew,” and owns up to an early perception that her Jewish ethnic group is different from the surrounding non-Jewish society.18

As a young child,” she reminisces, “I remember sensing that these Central European Jewish homes, with their heavy, dark furniture and steaming cups of tea accompanied by delicate homemade strudel and other distinctly European pastries, were different from those of my American schoolmates.19

She expresses pride in the fact that, early in life, she marched in solidarity with those who wanted to implement Black-White integration policies in the United States:20

My mother and I marched in Harlem in solidarity with the Birmingham-Selma civil rights protestors. We took a vicarious pride in the fact that Andy Goodman, one of the civil rights workers murdered in Mississippi, had lived down the block from us, and we always pointed out this building to visitors.

Early in life, she did not have a passionate attachment to Israel and political Zionism:21

In 1966, anxious to experience travel abroad, I made a relatively impetuous decision to attend Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Though my family were supporters of Israel, I was not driven by a Zionist commitment.

Yet, when she visited Israel for the first time, it was akin to a religious experience:

Going to Israel was not a purposeful choice but was to have a life-changing impact.

In Lipstadt's own words:

It was time to go 'home' [Israel]. Never before had I thought of Israel with such emotion.22

The politics of Deborah Lipstadt are pervaded by a hypocritical double standard. She actively worked to create a racially integrated, multicultural society in the United States. And all throughout her books she pays lip service to "racial equality," and ardently condemns non-Jews who reject ethnically integrated, multiracial societies outside of Israel. Yet, she most passionately identifies with Israel – an ethnically segregated society whose government actively works to ensure Jewish supremacy and to destroy any chance of an egalitarian, multiracial society from developing between Jews and Arabs.

Far from working for an integrated society in which Jews and Arabs function as social and political equals, the Jews who founded Israel created a society in which Israeli Jews dominate "Israeli" Arabs, a separate and unequal society in which discrimination against non-Jews and Jewish supremacy are an integral part of the established social order.23

The late George W. Ball, a diplomat, international lawyer and statesman (a former undersecretary of state in the Kennedy and Johnson administrations), described in stark terms the racist foundations of the Jewish state that Lipstadt so ardently identifies with:24

The Jewish plan for an exclusively Jewish state, free of the inconvenient presence of native peoples, was scarcely new. Theodor Herzl [founding father of modern Zionism] had laid out the framework for such a system in 1898, when he sought a charter from the Ottoman Sultan... One of the provisions of that abortive charter gave the [Jewish Colonial] Society the power to deport the natives, and Herzl sought such powers whether the new Jewish homeland was to be in Argentina, Kenya, Cyprus or Palestine. The Jewish Land Trust incorporated this doctrine in its rules, which designated all of its properties exclusively for Jewish use and even prohibited the employment by the Jewish tenants of non-Jews, thereby forcing such persons to seek employment abroad.

Predictably, the Zionists ended up producing an Athenian democracy for Jews and second-class citizenship or feudal servitude for non-Jews.25

Just recently, an important Israeli official made it perfectly clear that it was a goal of Zionist policy that Israeli Jews in Jerusalem are to be segregated from Palestinian Arabs in order to make certain that Jews remain the dominant element in that city, and that the ethnic/racial character of the city remain predominantly Jewish. In the article's own words:26

Israel's separation barrier in Jerusalem is meant to ensure a Jewish majority in the city and not just serve as a buffer against bombers, an Israeli Cabinet minister acknowledged Monday.

Dr. Kevin MacDonald

This clearly contradicts Lipstadt's publicly stated policy of favoring ethnically integrated, multiracial societies where all ethnic and racial groups function as social and political equals.

Why the contradiction? That is to say, why does Deborah Lipstadt favor creating ethnically integrated, multiracial societies in the United States and Europe, yet she most passionately identifies with Israel – an ethnically segregated state where Jewish dominance and racialism are the order of the day?

Enter California State University Professor Kevin MacDonald, an evolutionary psychologist whom Lipstadt bitterly attacks. MacDonald pointed out that certain powerful Jewish groups favor ethnically integrated, multiracial societies outside Israel because societies such as these foster and accommodate the long-term Jewish policy of non-assimilation and group solidarity.27

MacDonald and African-American intellectual Harold Cruise observe that Jewish organizations view white nationalism as their greatest potential threat, and they have tended to support Black-white integration policies presumably because such policies dilute Euro-American power and lessen the possibility of a cohesive, nationalist Euro-American majority that stands in opposition to the Jewish community.28

In a racially integrated, multicultural society with numerous different and competing ethnic groups with divergent interests, it is very unlikely the surrounding gentiles can ever develop a united and cohesive majority to oppose the very cohesive Jewish community. "Tolerant" gentile populations that have only a weak and feeble sense of their own racial/cultural identity are less likely to identify certain powerful groups of Jews as alien elements against which they must defend themselves. Gentile populations that have a strong racial/cultural identity are more likely to identify certain groups, such as Jews, as alien outsiders, against which they must compete. Thus, a racially integrated, multicultural society (outside of Israel) is what most Jewish-Zionist groups prefer, because in such a cultural milieu they can gain tremendous power and influence.<sup>29</sup>

Lipstadt bitterly condemns the person and theories of Professor MacDonald.<sup>30</sup> Yet her hypocritical behavior actually vindicates MacDonald's theories. If the creation of racially integrated, multicultural societies were truly her ultimate goal, we should expect that she would insist on such a society in Israel just as earnestly as she insists on such a society in the U.S. and Europe. But this is not the case. She is proud of the fact that she marched in solidarity with those who worked to force an integrated society in the U.S., yet she most passionately identifies with an ethnically segregated, apartheid state in the Middle East. This suggests that she is indeed using "racial brotherhood" ideologies in the service of her own Jewish-Zionist nationalism.

2. The "Holocaust," European and Jewish Identity

In Denying the Holocaust, Lipstadt condemns the Holocaust-revisionist Institute for Historical Review (IHR) for bringing to light some of the damaging effects of the lies and exaggerations in the Holocaust story. In a tone of self-righteous hypocrisy, Lipstadt claims (p. 144):

[The former Director of the IHR] revealed another of the IHR's true agenda items with his warning that acceptance of the Holocaust myth resulted in a radical degeneration of acceptable standards of human behavior and lowering the self-image of White people. These racist tendencies, which the IHR has increasingly kept away from the public spotlight, are part of the extremist tradition to which it is heir.

In other words, it is "racist and extremist" for non-Jewish Europeans to be the least bit concerned about any adverse effects that the Holocaust ideology might have on the European identity.

Dr. Robert J. van Pelt

Enter Dr. Robert Jan van Pelt, an important member of Lipstadt's defense team who authored the very important anti-Holocaust-revisionist tome, The Case for Auschwitz: Evidence from the Irving Trial. He claimed that Holocaust revisionism is an evil assault upon the Jewish self-image and identity. In a frank and honest discussion, he admitted that, when he read Holocaust-revisionist literature, he "had come face to face with a dangerous personal abyss." His implicit conclusion is that this is one of the main reasons why Holocaust revisionism should be attacked and destroyed.<sup>31</sup>

Professor van Pelt then quotes Jewish writer Erika Apfelbaum as to why Holocaust revisionism is “so evil” and why it should be attacked and refuted. She stated:

Current Jewish history is deeply rooted in Auschwitz as the general symbol of the destruction of the Jewish people during the Holocaust. For someone whose past is rooted in Auschwitz, the experience of reading through the revisionists’ tortured logic and documentation is similar to the psychologically disorienting experience of sensory deprivation experiments or solitary confinement in prison, where one loses touch with reality. The insidious effect of reading this [Holocaust revisionist] literature is to lose one’s identity as a survivor and, more generally, as a Jew. Therefore, the revisionist allegations serve to dispossess the Jews from their history and in doing so, in seeking to destroy a people’s history, a symbolic genocide replaces a physical one.

Consider the overall “moral” judgments in this whole scenario. According to Lipstadt, van Pelt and the Holocaust Lobby in general, it is “evil, racist and extremist” for white gentiles to be the least bit concerned about the damage that certain Holocaust lies and exaggerations are doing to the European collective identity. Indeed, Europeans and Euro-Americans are supposed to just meekly accept what the Jewish power elite says about the Holocaust, no matter how damaging it is to the European collective self-identity. Yet, it is positively demanded that Jews fight against Holocaust revisionism, so as to protect and vindicate the Jewish self-identity.

At the beginning of his tome, van Pelt quotes Jewish-Zionist theologian and “moral beacon” Elie Wiesel. He says that the alleged mass murder of Jews at Auschwitz “signifies... the failure of two thousand years of Christian civilization...”<sup>32</sup> He is clearly referring to all European Christendom.

Further evidence showing that Lipstadt’s traditional view of the Holocaust is indeed a psychological assault upon the entire European world, and not just upon the Germans and those who were allied with them during WWII, was demonstrated by the remarks of Israel’s Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a special Knesset session marking the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz-Birkenau. According to The International Jerusalem Post, “Sharon blamed the Western allies for knowing about the annihilation of Jews in the Holocaust, but doing nothing to prevent it.” He said the “sad and horrible conclusion is that no one cared that Jews were being murdered.”<sup>33</sup>

According to the “morality” of Lipstadt, van Pelt, Wiesel, Sharon and the Jewish-Zionist power elite that they represent, European Christians are supposed to meekly accept the aforementioned statements as “the truth,” and any attempt to debunk certain Holocaust lies and exaggerations and their ensuing moral implications is of course “racist, evil and extremist.”

Using language very similar to that of Apfelbaum, the European Christian could say:

The insidious effect of reading the lies and exaggerations in the Holocaust literature is to lose one’s identity as a European Christian. Therefore, the ‘gas chamber’ tale and some other false Holocaust allegations serve to dispossess European Christians from their history, and in doing so, in seeking to destroy a people’s history, a symbolic genocide replaces a physical one.

The problem is of course, the predominant “morality” in the Western world doesn’t allow the European Christian to think this way.

Just as Jews have the right to maintain a good collective self-image, so too with non-Jews of European descent. They too have the right to fight against those historical lies and distortions that damage their collective self-identity.

3. Lipstadt's Hypocritical Talk on Ethnic Inter-marriage

Since Lipstadt's pronouncements on racial/ethnic inter-marriage accurately reflect the duplicity, deception and hypocrisy that characterize so much of what Jewish and non-Jewish mainstream media outlets promote, a thorough discussion is called for.

When asked by Lipstadt's attorney Rampton about his views on interracial marriage, historian Irving stated:34

I have precisely the same attitude about this as [Lipstadt]... I believe in God keeping the races the way he built them.

In response, Lipstadt writes:

As soon as Irving said this, I began to pulsate with anger. This was not my view. I was deeply troubled by inter-marriage between Jews and non-Jews because it threatened Jewish continuity. Color or ethnicity were entirely irrelevant to me.

She goes on to say that she was very disappointed that nothing was done to clarify her position on racial inter-marriage at the trial, and that false ideas were floating around about her position on racial inter-marriage.

If ethnicity is truly entirely irrelevant to her, and Jewish continuity was her only concern, then we should expect that she would have adopted the following policy. It is acceptable for Jews to marry non-Jews of any color or ethnic group, as long as the non-Jewish partner adopts the Jewish religion and Jewish cultural customs. But she did not adopt this policy; she is flatly opposed to inter-marriage – period. As the Jewish journalist Don Guttenplan pointed out:35

*[I]*t was hard not to feel queasy listening to Rampton quiz Irving about his attitude to “inter-marriage between the races”—on behalf of [Lipstadt] who has written, “We [Lipstadt and her fellow Jews] know what we fight against: anti-Semitism and assimilation [of Jews and non-Jews], inter-marriage [between Jews and non-Jews] and Israel-bashing.”

Furthermore, she may not be revealing how she really feels about inter-marriage between Jews and non-Jews. As Jewish author Ellen Jaffe-Gill pointed out, Lipstadt is simply flatly opposed to inter-marriage between Jews and non-Jews:36

Although people like Deborah Lipstadt, the Emory University professor who has written and lectured widely on Holocaust denial, have exhorted Jewish parents to just say no to inter-marriage, much the way they expect their children not to take drugs, a large majority of parents (and more than a few rabbis) are unable to lay down opposition to inter-marriage [between Jews and non-Jews] as a strict operating principle.

According to this, she is not just “deeply troubled” by inter-marriage between Jews and non-Jews – she loathes it.

There is even evidence within History on Trial itself that suggests Lipstadt may be engaging in deceit when she claims that “ethnicity is entirely irrelevant to her.” On pp.

12f., she implicitly condemns the policy of the former Soviet Union on the issue of the Holocaust, because of the USSR's refusal to validate the concept of a "Jewish ethnicity" by identifying the victims of the Holocaust as Jews. In her own words:

To have identified the victims [of the Holocaust] as Jews would have validated the notion of ethnicity, a concept contrary to Marxist ideology.

So let's get things straight. She implicitly condemns the Soviets for refusing to validate the concept of "Jewish ethnicity." (The reader is encouraged to read pages 12 and 13 to see for himself that this is correct.) Yet, when it suits her ideological purposes to condemn David Irving and weasel her way out of her dilemma, on page 182 she claims that "ethnicity is entirely irrelevant to her."

There is more evidence that she is possibly being duplicitous when she claims that "color and ethnicity are entirely irrelevant to her." Dr. Oren Yiftachel, an Israeli professor at Ben-Gurion University, pointed out that Israel is not a democracy in the sense in which it is currently understood in the West. Rather, it is an "ethnocracy" – a land controlled and allocated by ethnicity. In his own words:37

The Israeli regime is ruled by and for one ethnic group in a multi-ethnic reality. Factors that make Israel an 'ethnocracy' include the facts that 1) immigration to the Jewish state is restricted to Jews only. Some 2.5 million displaced Palestinians who would like to return are not allowed to migrate to Israel; 2) military service is according to ethnicity; 3) economic control is based on race, religion, and ethnicity; 4) The country's land regime entails transfer of land ownership in one direction, from Arab to Jewish control, but never back again.

If ethnicity is entirely irrelevant to her, then why does she passionately identify with apartheid Israel – a state that is based on the principle that the Jewish ethnic group is to be preserved for all time, and is to remain separate from and dominant over non-Jews within the state?

Lipstadt may have made this statement – "color and ethnicity are entirely irrelevant to me" – to meet the propaganda needs of the moment. That is, to "refute" the allegation of David Irving and hide her strong feelings of Jewish racialism. Said claim does not appear to reflect her real feelings.

One of Lipstadt's defense-team experts during David Irving's libel suit against her, Dr. Richard Evans, was quoted as saying:38

Irving is essentially an ideologue who uses history... in order to further his own political purposes.

Should we take out the name of David Irving from the sentence and put in Deborah Lipstadt's?

She admits that Evans may have "thought me a hyperbolic, American, Jewish woman who was more an ideologue than an open-minded historian."39 An "ideologue" is one that promotes a body of ideas, distorted and untrue in the main, that serves the political, social and psychological needs of a power elite. Based upon what has been revealed in this essay, could Deborah Lipstadt be described as a Zionist ideologue?

Dr. Richard Evans

Prominent British historian John Keegan made this most cogent comment:40

Prof. Lipstadt... seems as dull as only the self-righteously politically correct can be. Few other historians had ever heard of her before this case. Most will not want to hear from her again.

Is Deborah Lipstadt a self-righteous Zionist ideologue that operates with hypocritical double standards? I will let the reader be the judge.

At the dawn of a new age of reason, Lipstadt's books will, I believe, stand as a testament to the political, moral and ideological corruption that currently pervades Western Society.

---

So much for Paul Grubach.

I may add that for Lipstadt, being opposed to Zionism and criticizing acts and attitudes of the State of Israel has no merit at all and is just another manifestation of this odious antisemitism. For instance, she is outraged that Jewish-American scholar Noam Chomsky dares suggest that anti-Zionism isn't identical with anti-Semitism (p. 16).

4. Germanophobia

Last but not least I want to draw the reader's attention to the fact that for Dr. Lipstadt, having positive feelings for Germany or the German people is just as odious as being anti-Semitic or racist, because she lists a pro-German attitude repeatedly together with the other invectives she hurls at her revisionist opponents:

The roots of Barnes's views about the Holocaust and his attitudes toward Israel go beyond his deep-seated Germanophilia and revisionist approach to history: They can be found in his antisemitism. (p. 80)

Butz's book is replete with the same expressions of traditional antisemitism, philo-Germanism and conspiracy theory as the Holocaust denial pamphlets printed by the most scurrilous neo-Nazi groups. (p. 126)

Most people who were aware of [the IHR's] existence dismissed it as a conglomeration of Holocaust deniers, neo-Nazis, philo-Germans, right-wing extremists, antisemites, racists, and conspiracy theorists. (p. 137)

Lipstadt is particularly offended by Prof. Austin App's pro-German stance, which she deals with at length in the chapter she devotes to him. Here is just one example:

With the zeal of a convert, [Austin App] moved to the isolationist, pro-German end of the political spectrum and stayed there for the rest of his life. (p. 67)

Why is being pro-German at the "end" of the political spectrum, that is to say, at one extreme of it?

Lipstadt therefore castigates the revisionists, more of whom are non-Germans than are Germans, for being German-friendly. In doing so, she clearly suggests that being pro-German is a bad thing, so bad indeed that she lumps this attitude together with all her other invectives of anti-Semitism, racism, and extremism. Now, I am not saying that one has to have a pro-German attitude, just as much as one does not have to have a pro-Jewish attitude, for instance. In fact, everyone is entitled to choose whom they like and love – groups quite as well as individuals. It's nobody's business to interfere with that.

If you do not think Lipstadt's anti-German attitude is strange at least, although it is the perfect equivalent to an anti-Jewish/ anti-Semitic attitude, then maybe you should ask yourself what kind of attitude you have, and what sort of socialization you went through to find nothing wrong with that.

Lipstadt's anti-German attitude also shines through toward the end of her book, where she writes:

If Germany was also a victim of a 'downfall,' and if the Holocaust was no different from a mélange of other tragedies, Germany's moral obligation to welcome all who seek refuge within its borders is lessened. (p. 215)

There are currently around a billion people on this planet who, due to war, famine, poverty and civil unrest, are inclined to seek refuge elsewhere.<sup>41</sup> One favorite destination of those migrants is Germany. Is Dr. Lipstadt seriously saying that Germany has the moral obligation to welcome not only the millions of migrants who have flooded Germany already in the past three decades, but, if push comes to shove, even more of the one billion migrants that are still waiting outside its gates? Is she out of her mind? Not that she's alone with that attitude. Most leading German politicians and its mass media seem to share that view. But just because almost everybody runs full speed toward the cliff doesn't mean it's the best way to go.

And why exactly do today's Germans, almost all of whom were either children at the end of World War II or were born afterwards, have a moral obligation to accommodate millions upon millions upon millions of migrants, while today's Israelis, the vast majority of whom are not survivors of anything, have no such obligation? (Or any other country, for that matter.)

Finally, on page 222 of her book, Lipstadt declares openly what she thinks of the Germans minding their own business, defining their own identity, being masters of their own history and historiography:

We [historians] did not train in our respective fields in order to stand like watchmen and women on the Rhine. Yet this is what we must do.

"Watching on the Rhine" is also the headline of her respective chapter where she discusses tendencies by scholars in Germany to develop some self-confidence by regaining control over writing and interpreting their own history. Needless to say, Dr.

Lipstadt doesn't like that.

“Watching on the Rhine” traditionally refers to Germany’s attempt to keep herself independent of foreign rule. But for Lipstadt, that is unacceptable. She and her like-minded colleagues want to remain in control – in order to keep Germany on her knees. Why else would she be offended by a patriotic German politician suggesting that Germans should “get off their knees and once again learn to ‘walk upright’” (p. 210). I’ve replaced here Lipstadt’s mistranslated term “walk tall” with “walk upright,” because the German term used by said politician – aufrecht gehen – simply means that Germans ought to stop groveling and walk normally.

Interestingly, Dr. Lipstadt’s father was German, hence her last name, and her mother, nee Peiman, was a Canadian of unknown ethnicity.<sup>42</sup> We may therefore assume that the majority of Dr. Lipstadt’s ethnic makeup is indeed German. That adds an interesting twist to the affair.

After World War II, a self-denigrating and even self-hating attitude has become very fashionable and widespread among German intellectuals as a reaction to feeling guilty about the Holocaust. This phenomenon has become worse as time progressed, although today’s generations of Germans have nothing to feel guilty about, objectively speaking.

Dr. Lipstadt shows the same symptoms to the point where she has not only detached herself completely from her German background, emotionally speaking, but has even developed a distinct disdain for that aspect of her identity. She may even deny being mainly of German ethnicity, claiming to be Jewish instead. Well, if that were so, she would declare Judaism to be not a religion but rather an ethnic group, just as the State of Israel does and as the National Socialists did.

---

Notes:

1	https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Freda_Utley (version of July. 26, 2016; oldid=731630172).
2	Freda Utley, The High Cost of Vengeance , (Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1948).
3	See Section 4.6. for details; for the current edition of that study, see Fred Leuchter, Robert Faurisson, Germar Rudolf, The Leuchter Report: Critical Edition , 4th ed., (Uckfield: Castle Hill Publishers, 2015).
4	On that see the appendix to my forensic study The Rudolf Report: Expert Report on Chemical and Technical Aspects of the “Gas Chambers” of Auschwitz , 2nd ed., (Washington, D.C.: The Barnes Review, 2011). ( holocausthandbooks.com/dl/02-trr.pdf ; Sept. 1, 2016), as well as my book Resistance Is Obligatory, op. cit (note 13).
5	Israel Shahak, Jewish History, Jewish Religion: The Weight of Three Thousand Years , 2nd ed., (London: Pluto Press, 2008); idem , Norton Mezvinsky, Jewish Fundamentalism in Israel , Pluto Press, London 1999.
6	Carlo Mattogno, “I falsi “Falsi Protocolli”: Scopo e significato dei “Protocolli dei Savi Anziani di Sion”, May 27, 2010, olodogma.com/wordpress/2014/03/26/0631 (Aug. 31, 2016); idem , Il Mistero Dei Protocolli Di Sion , (Raleigh, N.C.: Lulu, 2014); amazon.com/dp/1291884904 .

7	Joseph Sobran, in: William F. Buckley, In Search of Anti-Semitism , Continuum, New York, 1992; acc. to Joseph Sobran, “For Fear of the Jews,” The Journal of Historical Review , Vol. 21, No. 3 (May/August 2002), pp. 12-16, here page 13; codoh.com/library/document/3027 (Sept. 5, 2016).
8	Hans-Hermann Hoppe, Democracy—The God That Failed: The Economics and Politics of Monarchy, Democracy, and Natural Order , Transaction Publishers, 2001; Frank Karsten, Karel Beckman, Beyond Democracy: Why Democracy Does Not Lead to Solidarity, Prosperity and Liberty but to Social Conflict, Runaway Spending and a Tyrannical Government , (North Charleston, S.C.: CreateSpace, 2012).
9	Elizabeth Loftus, The Myth of Repressed Memory , (New York, St. Martin’s Press, 1994); idem , “Creating False Memories,” Scientific American , Vol. 277, No. 3, 1997, pp. 70-75; idem , and James Doyle, Eyewitness Testimony: Civil and Criminal , 3rd ed., (Charlottesville, Va.: Lexis Law Pub., 1997).
10	Jacques Baynac, “Faute de documents probants sur les chambres à gaz, les historiens esquivent le débat,” Le Nouveau Quotidien , Sept. 3, 1996, p. 14.
11	Paul Grubach, “Why Won’t Deborah Lipstadt Debate the Holocaust Revisionists?,” The Revisionist , No. 8, Nov. 2001, CODOH series; codoh.com/library/document/375 (Aug. 31, 2016); Lipstadt does not use the term “cranks.”
12	Vanity Fair , December 1993, p. 117.
13	Mark Weber, “Debating the Undebatable: The Weber-Shermer Clash,” The Journal of Historical Review , Vol. 16, No. 1 (January/February 1996), pp. 23-34; online at codoh.com/library/document/2653 , including a video recording of the debate; also available at youtu.be/7xB73Pg4_08 (all Aug. 29, 2016).
14	Michael Shermer, Alex Grobman, Denying History: Who Says the Holocaust Never Happened and Why Do They Say It? , (Berkeley, Cal.: University of California Press, 2000), p. 109.
15	Freeman & Co., New York 1997.
16	Carlo Mattogno, Fail: “Denying History.” How Michael Shermer and Alex Grobman Botched Their Attempt to Refute Those Who Say the Holocaust Never Happened , (Uckfield: Castle Hill Publishers, 2016).
17	Paul Grubach, “A Holocaust Revisionist Critique of the Thinking of Deborah Lipstadt,” January 2006, slightly abridged; codoh.com/library/document/165/ (Aug 29, 2016)
18	Deborah Lipstadt, History on Trial: My Day in Court with David Irving , (New York: Ecco, 2005), p. 283.
19	Ibid. , p. 3.
20	Ibid. , p. 5.
21	Ibid. , p. 6.
22	Ibid. , p. 9.
23	See the study by Israeli academic Dr. Uri Davis, Israel: An Apartheid State , (London: Zed Books, 1987).

24	George W. Ball, Douglas B. Ball, The Passionate Attachment: America's Involvement with Israel, 1947 to the Present , (New York, W. W. Norton & Company, 1992), p. 29.
25	Ibid., p. 65.
26	Mark Lavie, "Barrier Meant to Ensure Jewish Majority," Associated Press Release, July 11, 2005. www.miftah.org/Display.cfm?DocId=7908&amp;CategoryId=5 (Aug. 29, 2016)
27	Kevin MacDonald, The Culture of Critique: An Evolutionary Analysis of Jewish Involvement in Twentieth-Century Intellectual and Political Movements , (Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1998).
28	Ibid., pp. 255-257.
29	Ibid., passim.
30	Lipstadt, History on Trial , op. cit. (note 32), pp. 151-159.
31	Robert J. van Pelt, The Case for Auschwitz: Evidence from the Irving Trial , (Indiana University Press, 2002), p. 70.
32	Ibid., p. 6.
33	Liat Collins, "From the Ashes," The International Jerusalem Post , February 4, 2005, p. 3.
34	Lipstadt, History on Trial , op. cit. (note 32), p. 182.
35	Lipstadt as quoted in Don D. Guttenplan, The Holocaust on Trial: History, Justice and the David Irving Libel Case , (New York: Granta Books, W. W. Norton & Company, 2001), p. 209.
36	Ellen Jaffe-Gill, Embracing the Stranger: Inter-marriage and the Future of the American Jewish Community , (New York: Basic Books, 1995), p. 18.
37	Washington Report on Middle East Affairs , July/August 1999, p. 120. The online version of that issue has the pages 118-120 excised: www.wrmea.org/1999-july-august/1999-july-august-table-of-contents.html (Sept. 9, 2016); GR.
38	Lipstadt, History on Trial , op. cit. (note 32), p. 53.
39	Ibid., p. 67.
40	Ibid., p. 282.
41	The numbers vary from poll to poll; one extreme calculates almost two billion: Gerver Torres, Brett Pelham, "One-Quarter of World's Population May Wish to Migrate," Gallup poll, June 24, 2008, www.gallup.com/poll/108325/onequarter-worlds-population-may-wish-migrate.aspx (Aug 30, 2016); another saw it at around 700 million adults, which, children added to the mix, would probably get close to one billion: Neli Esipova, Julie Ray, "700 Million Worldwide Desire to Migrate Permanently," Gallup poll, November 2, 2009, www.gallup.com/poll/108325/onequarter-worlds-population-may-wish-migrate.aspx (Aug 30, 2016). With Germany's announcement in 2015 that "all are welcome," resulting in a deluge of migrants pouring into Germany, that number has probably gone up again. Most prospective migrants come from the Middle East, North and sub-Saharan Africa, whose primary destinations for reasons of geography are European countries, mainly Germany (for economic reasons) and the UK and France (for linguistic reasons).

42	https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Deborah_Lipstadt (version of Aug. 21, 2016; oldid=735552072); http://forebears.co.uk/surnames/peiman gives Iran as the most likely origin of her mother's paternal line (both Aug. 30, 2016).

The Anti-Revisionist Hollywood Movie Attacking Historian David Irving Is a Flop

by Michael A. Hoffman

Denial. BBC Films. 109 minutes.

This reviewer was expecting that it would be a tedious ordeal to sit through Denial, Hollywood's attempted canonization of the obnoxious thought cop Deborah Lipstadt, which was supposed to also serve as the final confirmation of the libel trial in London in 2000 that saw historian David Irving's reputation supposedly shredded (cf. Revisionist History no. 86).

Actually, the imps of contrariness have seen to it that Denial rehabilitates Irving. While the film's production values are high and the cast is A-list, the director, Mick Jackson, is no Steven Spielberg and his movie backfires. Denial gives new impetus to World War II revisionism, which heretofore was assumed by many to consist of a coterie of drooling crackpots. Even in a movie that detests Irving, he nonetheless comes off as a formidable advocate.

There are two challenging questions for any Hollywood director seeking to lens Prof. Lipstadt's courtroom battle and maintain minimal credibility at the same time: why she never took the stand, and why no "Holocaust survivor" was brought to testify by her defense team. According to Denial, Lipstadt (played by Rachel Weisz), was forbidden to testify by her lawyers, who wanted to keep the focus on putting Irving (Timothy Spall) on the defensive, and not her. It makes sense, but whether it is true or not we can't determine. After all, Lipstadt refused to speak to the news media during the long trial (a fact the movie omits). The latter refusal would seem to indicate a fear of exposure of her ignorance of World War II history. Meanwhile, Mr. Irving was extensively cross-examined in court and spoke volubly to the press on nearly every occasion.

The second daunting question turns on an even more-perilous and potentially highly damaging issue: why were there no "Holocaust survivors" on the witness stand? Here David Hare, the film's scriptwriter, really goofs and apparently no one on the production team caught his blunder, though many in the audience will spot it. In the movie, Lipstadt is outraged that her lawyers will not call on "survivors" to testify. The head of her defense team, Anthony Julius, has a response. (Julius is rendered as an expressionless, one-dimensional, and in many respects unsympathetic character, played deadpan by actor Andrew Scott, known for roles as the villainous Moriarty in the BBC Sherlock TV series, and the traitorous head of the British Secret Service in the 007 film, Spectre). We first meet Julius while he is holding a copy of the book he authored which, we see from the cover, traduces the reputation of the esteemed Christian poet T.S. Eliot. Julius informs Prof. Lipstadt that he will not call the "survivors" because he wants to spare them the disrespect which Irving (who acted as his own attorney), would demonstrate toward them in cross-examination.

It's a weak alibi. The honchos of Holocaustianity are painfully aware that putative "homicidal Auschwitz gas-chamber eyewitnesses" were eviscerated under cross-examination by lawyer Doug Christie during the 1985 trial in Canada of Ernst Zündel, for spreading "false news." This was the actual reason there was no appearance by them at Lipstadt's trial. At this point in the film, as I sat in the theater I jotted in my review notes, “Movie omits to mention Zündel trial’s discrediting cross-examinations of Judaic witnesses.”

Later in the movie however, Lipstadt demands once again that “Holocaust survivors” testify, and this time a more-candid Julius, albeit in rapid-fire dialogue, tells her that he can’t call on them because, “The survivors were torn apart at the Zündel trial.”

David Irving at the 1988 trial of Ernst Zündel. Photo from codoh.com

Exactly correct! When so-called “eyewitness Holocaust survivors” were cross-examined in the Zündel case, as detailed in this writer’s The Great Holocaust Trial, not one departed the witness stand with his credibility intact—and it is Hollywood’s Denial movie that reminds the world of this shocking and embarrassing fact, which shatters the main pillar upon which Auschwitz execution-gas-chamber mythology depends: the “undeniable” testimony of “eyewitnesses.” (The statement about the Zündel trial is made in a stream of verbiage from the Anthony Julius character. It is not said slowly or with emphasis. One has to be alert to catch it in the film).

The movie is haunted by the specter of Zündel, whose two trials (1985 and 1988) are landmarks in revisionism. The film’s opening scene has Prof. Lipstadt in a classroom writing on a chalkboard the four main points of “Holocaust denial.” The last two are borrowed from Prof. Robert Faurisson, the Zündel defense team’s research head, as he stated them in an explosive essay in 1978 in France’s leading newspaper, Le Monde. Lipstadt’s point four is straight from Faurisson and rings true: The gas-chamber myth was concocted to “extort money from the Germans and gain sympathy for the state of Israel.” Bingo!

In another of Lipstadt’s classroom points she asserts that any allegation that Judaic casualty figures are exaggerated constitutes “denial.” But unknown to the movie audience, she is herself on record saying that the high casualty figure for German victims of the Allied firebombing of the city of Dresden is exaggerated. The Talmudic double standard makes it perfectly respectable for her to lay a charge of exaggeration against the history of the Dresden bombing. Ordinary mortals do so with regard to Auschwitz at the risk of forfeiting their employment and reputation.

Early in the movie the viewer is taken on an actual tour of Auschwitz-Birkenau in Poland, where Lipstadt and her defense team stumble around among the sacred relics.

She admonishes her barrister Richard Rampton (Tom Wilkinson) over his insufficient awe and reverence (he makes tearful amends later). The familiar propaganda about the camp is retailed, until the movie gets to a nearly intact old building. Before entering, it is unambiguously stated that to defeat the deniers' position on Auschwitz homicidal gassings, one must defeat the Leuchter Report. By now I was wondering if my hearing was faulty, so welcome was this acknowledgement of that momentous study, which is usually demonized by media hacks and academics as a worthless trifle.

The Leuchter Report was commissioned by Zündel in the course of his 1988 trial. It reported a forensic, chemical analysis of physical material taken from the walls of buildings in Auschwitz. Revised by former Max Planck Institute chemist and historian Germar Rudolf, the Leuchter Report remains one of the most-devastating exposes of the hoax ever published, and here in a Hollywood movie its formidable potency is acknowledged—and never satisfactorily refuted in the course of the film! Although he is not mentioned, when the movie arrives at the courtroom proceedings themselves, the first day concludes with Dr. Faurisson's signature aphorism concerning, "No Holes—No Holocaust."

On another day of the trial, Rampton holds aloft two different editions of Irving's classic history, Hitler's War, and points out that the 1977 first edition upholds the genocide of Jews, while the reissued and revised 1991 edition does not. True, but the movie omits what made the difference. Between 1977 and 1991 the two Zündel trials took place with the demolition of "survivor" testimony in the first, and the Leuchter Report issued at the second, which impressed Irving so much that he revised his Hitler book to reflect the Leuchter revelations which Zündel had made possible.

On occasions after Irving has spoken in court, the camera turns to Lipstadt's character, showing her in paroxysms of frustration and agony. Conversely, when her own lawyer scores a legal or historical point she casts a venomous glance at Irving, suffused with undisguised hatred. The filmmakers have done her image no favors with this less-than-noble—but quite possibly accurate—depiction of her person and reactions.

Another fatal error in the movie's goal of vindicating Lipstadt is that it fails to dispel the David vs. Goliath impression of a stacked legal battle. Irving is shown as a lone warrior up against a legal team that fills a room with solicitors, researchers, historians, archivists and the barrister. The audience watching the mustering of this throng must feel that they've been cheated: after having it shoved down their throats for decades that doubting homicidal gas chambers is the easiest thing in the world to discredit, it takes a host of lawyers, clerks and historians years of research and more than a month in court to refute one Doubting Thomas?

The unintended consequences become more obvious near the end of the movie, when, in a news conference, Lipstadt makes an analogy between revisionist historians and those who doubt that Elvis Presley is dead. Among the theater audience with whom I saw the film, her parallel went nowhere. It is too palpably jejune to gain traction in the face of the battle the viewer has just observed her multi-million-dollar team having undertaken, with several close shaves for them in the courtroom, and the verdict far from a foregone conclusion.

Denial is pompously self-righteous and foolishly bereft of the tedium-relieving humorous moments which clever directors use to leaven even the most serious cinema. Lipstadt is at first presented melodramatically as Destiny's Heroine of the Jewish People From The Beginning of Time. After that gas bag is floated, the movie attempts to deflate it slightly with a few attempts at levity, which are aimed at showing her to be a good sport in spite of her carved-in-marble stature; but these fail. She comes off not as one of the guys but as a yenta with a foul mouth: “What the f**k just happened?” she demands to know when the judge states that anti-Semitism can be an honest belief; not necessarily a result of a desire to deceive. Meanwhile, in devastating contrast, Irving is depicted as always in form as an English gentleman, even if at times sarcastic and wounding.

Vile execration of Irving is on ample display: “Irving’s words are like s**t on your shoes,” says Anthony Julius. In a meeting in her hotel room between Lipstadt and her barrister Rampton, it is made clear that Irving is to be hated, “Look the devil in the eye and tell him what you feel,” Rampton advises. God help anyone who would dare to advise us to look upon Deborah Lipstadt as a devil.

The foul-mouthed banter and palpable hate are supposed to, on one hand endear us to the humanity of Lipstadt and her team, and on the other, to make sure we get the message that a doubter like Irving is to be hated, given the sacred subject which he has dared to question. But Timothy Spall, who plays Irving, despite the phony Etonian accent he adopts and perpetually high-pitched, straining voice (which little resembles Irving in real life), comes across as somewhat sympathetic. After the verdict is read we see Irving gallantly approach the barrister Rampton, congratulating him and offering to shake hands. Irving is rebuffed. There is a fundamental decency that permeates his underdog status and it is part of his appeal in Denial.

Lipstadt thinks it’s outrageous that Irving believes there are actually two points of view on World War II history. There is only one point of view, she hectors. But don’t the best parents and teachers convey to their youthful charges the truism that there at least two sides to every issue? Yet in Lipstadt’s inquisitorial, claustrophobic “Holocaust” world, there can only be one.

Yet another unintentionally exculpatory factor for Mr. Irving is the realization that a regiment of Lipstadt’s researchers pored over every extant speech he ever gave, and the several million words he wrote, in search of an error (about dozen or so were found). If any one of us had every word we wrote or spoke through most of our lives examined, there would be plenty of grist for any detractor’s mill. Only two Irving errors are submitted: a questionable interpretation of a morgue at Auschwitz, and misattributed words in a note by Heinrich Himmler; these are not exactly earth-shaking derogations of his historiography.

Meanwhile, the original grounds for Irving’s libel suit against Lipstadt and her publisher, Penguin Books—that they lied about his having stolen from the Moscow archives in Russia, and by claiming that he was associated with Hamas and other Arab terror organizations—are indeed found to be lies, just as David said. He was indeed libeled by Penguin and Lipstadt. Few who watch Denial will know that fact, or know of the intimidation tactic aimed at presiding Justice Charles Gray (Alex Jennings), when the Israeli ambassador with a full retinue of gun-toting guards, seated himself prominently in the courtroom during the trial. The message conveyed could not have been lost on the judge, nor the audience: a sovereign state, armed to the teeth, had a vested interest in an outcome of the trial favorable to their heroine, Dvora. (Lipstadt refers to herself by that Hebrew variant of her name when recalling her mother’s prophecy about her).

Other revelations from the makers of this movie:

- Denial informs us there were never any photographs of any of the millions of “Jews” in any of the gas chambers because (wait for it): the Germans would not allow it; which doesn’t explain why no German personnel took photos surreptitiously, or were not bribed to do so, or why photos of an event that is said to have happened tens of thousands of times, were not otherwise leaked.
- Denial informs us that Auschwitz was never designed as an extermination camp.

From the beginning it was a labor camp and it only later changed its function.

- During the trial, Irving's "no holes no holocaust" challenge to Auschwitz "expert" Robert Jan van Pelt (Mark Gatiss) is never answered, even though an answer is promised in the next court session.
- If we are listening carefully, we hear a reporter state, albeit as an audio voiceover on a scene of jostling media, that Justice Gray praised Irving's skill as a military historian.
- In London, a grim-faced woman with a cinematic aura of sanctity identifies herself privately to Lipstadt as a "Holocaust survivor." Lipstadt informs her defense team that this woman is indeed a "Holocaust survivor" who is qualified to testify. What is the basis of "renowned historian" Lipstadt's corroboration of the woman's identity and credentials as a witness? She showed Lipstadt some faded numbers tattooed on her arm. This is proof? What a joke.

If you're already a true believer, the film may further cement your belief, but for thinking individuals who are paying attention, Denial alerts curious minds to the existence of a substantial body of dissent, going so far as to feature Mr. Irving's website on-camera, as well as the covers of his books. Viewers of the film who follow up with an Internet search for the Leuchter Report or the "Zündel trial" (few though these may be) are going to encounter a world of revisionist discovery and intellectual challenge.

As we often remind our readers, our enemies are not invincible, any more than they are infallible. Their victory is not inevitable. They make big mistakes and Denial is one of them: a 109-minute commercial of sorts for a valiant writer whose reputation is still very much intact.

We seldom have the occasion to write the following words, but it is delightful to do so now: Thank you, Hollywood!

This article originally appeared in Revisionist History No. 87, November 2016.
Copyright© 2016 Michael Hoffman

The Battle for Discussion | CODOH

by Richard A. Widmann

Deborah Lipstadt has recently become newsworthy again as a result of the release of the movie Denial that tells the tale of David Irving's defamation lawsuit against her and Penguin books. The movie, which flopped at the box office, purports to tell how David Irving charged Lipstadt with libel for calling him a "Holocaust denier" in her book Denying the Holocaust. There is little doubt who Hollywood intends to be the hero and who the villain in their version of the events.

The release of Denial provides an opportunity to reconsider the events leading up to Irving's libel lawsuit in 2000. To understand why Irving sought restitution in the courts, one must go back to 1993 and the release of Lipstadt's anti-revisionist screed, Denying the Holocaust. While hailed by the mainstream media,<sup>1</sup> Denying the Holocaust was actually a vicious and often inaccurate and misleading attack against those whom Lipstadt would tar with the label "deniers."

In a review that I wrote at the time I commented that Lipstadt's style was "reminiscent of the most vile Nazi rhetoric"<sup>2</sup> and indeed it was. Lipstadt wrote for example,

In the 1930s Nazi rats spread a virulent form of antisemitism [sic] that resulted in the destruction of millions. Today the bacillus carried by these rats threatens to 'kill' those who already died at the hands of the Nazis for a second time by destroying the world's memory of them.<sup>3</sup>

Such dehumanizing language should have sounded alarm bells for readers and reviewers alike. When a writer compares human beings to rodents in such terms, so the argument goes, the next step may be violation of that group's civil and human rights and perhaps even their extermination. The irony was lost however on the media hacks who piled praise on this awful book.

In the years that followed the book's release, writers, researchers, and activists were physically assaulted, arrested, incarcerated and fined for questioning the "official" story of the Second World War in general and the Holocaust in particular. To a great extent, the escalation of such persecution seems to have its origin with the widespread acceptance and general usage of the inaccurate and offensive term "Holocaust denier" which certainly enjoyed increased use following the release of Denying the Holocaust.

To better understand why someone might claim libel after being targeted with Lipstadt's label, one must define the terms in question.

"Deny" may be defined in part as "to declare not to be true." Webster's Dictionary includes the definition, "to refuse to accept as true or right; to reject as unfounded, unreal, etc." The Encarta Dictionary for North America identifies "denial" as a transitive verb that means "to withhold" or to "bar access to or use of" something to somebody.

Today however, the terms "deny" and "denial" are frequently super-charged with psychological meaning. From this perspective according to urbandictionary.com "denial consists of the refusal to accept a past or present reality." The American Heritage Medical Dictionary defines "denial" as "an unconscious defense mechanism characterized by refusal to acknowledge painful realities." Wikipedia defines "denial" as

“a defense mechanism postulated by Sigmund Freud, in which a person is faced with a fact that is too uncomfortable to accept and rejects it instead, insisting that it is not true despite what may be overwhelming evidence.”

For Deborah Lipstadt, the term “denial” has an even stronger and more sinister meaning. It does not simply mean, “to declare not to be true” nor is it a psychological defense mechanism. Lipstadt charges that “denial” involves camouflaging true goals. For Lipstadt “Holocaust deniers” are those who use the Holocaust story to advance some ideological or political agenda while hiding the fact that they are secretly fascists and anti-Semites.

For Lipstadt, Holocaust deniers are “antisemites [sic] who have... managed, under the guise of scholarship, to camouflage their hateful ideology.”<sup>4</sup> She wrote,

The attempt to deny the Holocaust enlists a basic strategy of distortion. Truth is mixed with absolute lies, confusing readers who are unfamiliar with the tactics of the deniers. Half-truths and story segments, which conveniently avoid critical information, leave the listener with a distorted impression of what really happened. <sup>5</sup>

On many pages in Denying the Holocaust Lipstadt repeats her theme (as if repetition will prove its veracity):

- ...antisemitic [sic] ideology ... is what Holocaust denial is. (p. 1)
- ... deniers... shroud their true objectives. (p. 2)
- When I turned to the topic of Holocaust denial, I knew that I was dealing with extremist antisemites [sic] who have increasingly managed, under the guise of scholarship, to camouflage their hateful ideology. (p. 3)
- ...intimately connected to a neofascist political agenda. (p. 3)
- ... camouflage their goals. (p. 4)
- ...deniers' objective of delegitimizing Israel. (p. 14)
- ...most had no trouble identifying Holocaust denial as disingenuous. (p. 18)
- ...[Holocaust denial] is undeniably a form of antisemitism. [sic] (p. 20)
- Some have a distinct political objective: If there was no Holocaust, what is so wrong with national socialism? For many falsifiers this, not antisemitism, [sic] is their primary agenda. (p. 23)
- ..the deniers' contentions are a composite of claims founded on racism, extremism, and virulent antisemitism [sic]. (p. 26)

For Lipstadt, “deniers” are not those who express doubts about some element of the Holocaust story, but those who actually believe the orthodox story in all its gruesome details! The “deniers” according to Lipstadt purposefully distort materials and even “lie” in order to support their ideology. Lipstadt defined that ideology in varying terms but the net result was always the same, “they are fascists and antisemites [sic].”<sup>6</sup>

British historian, David Irving. Photo taken July 2003.
[Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

That Lipstadt named best-selling British historian David Irving in her screed and called him “one of the most dangerous spokespersons for Holocaust denial” was a charge that would need to be backed up, especially since David Irving had never written a book on the subject of the Holocaust and unlike many of Lipstadt’s other targets, Irving was neither dead nor without the means to launch a counter-attack.

In addition, during the years following Lipstadt’s attack, Irving’s good fortune took a serious turn. Throughout the ‘70s and ‘80s Irving’s best-selling books on various aspects of the Second World War could be found easily in any mall bookstore. By 1996, this suddenly changed. St. Martin’s Press had contracted to publish Irving’s forthcoming biography of Hitler’s propaganda minister, Joseph Goebbels. This volume would likely sell well as had Irving’s earlier biographies of Hermann Göring, Adolf Hitler, Erwin Rommel, and others. As news of the pending release got out, St. Martin’s Press was inundated with hate mail. Complaints and pressure increased - including even death threats. Finally, Thomas McCormack, chief executive officer of St. Martins, gave in and reversed the company’s earlier declared intention of resisting the onslaught.<sup>7</sup> St. Martin’s canceled its contract to publish Irving’s volume. Facing the harsh reality of cancelled book deals and a growing vocal minority that sought to silence him, Irving sought restitution.

There was little doubt in revisionist circles in the late '90s that Lipstadt's assertion that David Irving was a "denier" could be shown to be injurious in terms of book sales, contracts and otherwise. The defense would need to demonstrate that Lipstadt had appropriately applied her term. As such, the defense would be in the unenviable position of having to prove that Irving did not actually believe his own writings and interpretation of history.

It seemed to revisionists at the time that any attempt on the part of the defense to prove a systematic extermination of Europe's Jews would be irrelevant. Should the court happen to accept the orthodox Holocaust story, this would not in and of itself support the contention that Irving (or for that matter any other Holocaust revisionist) had disingenuous motives. It would be up to the defense to prove that that Irving had knowingly misrepresented facts or lied about matters related to the Holocaust in order to spread anti-Semitism or to otherwise bolster fascism. Without proving that Irving's motives were disingenuous, the defense would lose their case. Or so it seemed.

The contrast between Irving and Lipstadt throughout the trial could not have been more stark. Irving served as his own attorney and spoke at length about a plethora of subjects. His closing speech alone runs to 39 pages.<sup>8</sup> Lipstadt did not speak during the trial. She never took the stand. While many argued that she feared being decimated on the details and facts of the Holocaust by Irving, her behavior should not have been a surprise.

From her entry into the spotlight of the Holocaust controversy with the publication of her Denying the Holocaust, she refused to debate or discuss with those she branded "deniers." In the preface to her book she commented:

Since the book's appearance I have received numerous invitations to appear on television talk shows aired nationally in the United States. Whenever the plans include inviting a denier I categorically decline to appear.<sup>9</sup>

Lipstadt claims to support open discussion, "The intellectual process is rooted in the constant reevaluation of previous findings based on new information."<sup>10</sup> She notes however that she is not open to "debating the very fact of the Holocaust."<sup>11</sup> Without defining her terms, where discussion is acceptable to her and where not is seemingly unclear. It is critical to understand that Lipstadt's book was never meant to stimulate discussion of Holocaust revisionism. In fact, it was meant to shut it down. The language used throughout is a "moral" language; a language of "good" and "evil." By accusing the revisionists of anti-Semitism and fascism, Lipstadt painted an entire group of people and their writings as evil. This tactic was meant to shut down any consideration of the arguments of revisionists and essentially to paint them (in 2016 terms) as "deplorable."

Lipstadt wrote, "we will debate much about it but not whether it happened."<sup>12</sup> For Lipstadt "it" cannot and should not be discussed. But history is about inquiry. In fact the word, derived from the Greek historia means "inquiry, knowledge acquired by investigation." David Irving never wrote or claimed "the Holocaust did not happen." In several articles and books Irving comments on the millions of Jews who perished and has even accepted that certain concentration camps utilized gas chambers to carry out mass exterminations.

At some point, it must have dawned on the defense that the trial itself could be used to shut down David Irving. Not only would the tag "Holocaust denier" be a shameful scarlet letter, but also the legal requirement that should he lose that he be responsible to pay the entire cost for the defense would potentially bankrupt him. Court and defense costs would amount to approximately $13 million.

In the end the Court ruled against Irving. The media would forever sully his name with “Holocaust denier” when reporting news about him. The label, now made “official,” would deny him access to major publishing houses. Who in the wake of the St. Martin’s debacle and the Lipstadt trial would work with a man such as this?

Today one may wonder if Irving’s lawsuit was a good strategy. It is of course easy to second guess with clear hindsight. It is important however to remember the context of the lawsuit. Following Lipstadt’s book, intellectual freedom with regard to the Holocaust was being shut down all around the world. In 1996 a German judge had ordered that Germar Rudolf be arrested for publishing a ground-breaking revisionist analysis of various aspects of the Holocaust, Grundlagen zur Zeitsgeschichte. Later that year, a judge ordered that all copies of the book be burned. Also that same year, Tony Blair during his candidacy for prime minister of Great Britain repeatedly promised to ban revisionist writings about the Holocaust.<sup>13</sup> It was in this environment of declining freedom of expression and out-and-out persecution of revisionists that David Irving launched his lawsuit. His objective, as he stated in the closing speech of the trial was simple:

This trial is about my reputation as a human being, as an historian of integrity, and ... as a father. [...] A judgment in my favor does not mean that the Holocaust never happened; it means only that in England today discussion is still permitted.<sup>14</sup>

At the time, no one else had the means to challenge the clampdown on intellectual freedom. No one else had even the remotest chance to counter the growing forces of censorship. As the trial proceeded it appeared as a boxing match, not over the Holocaust itself, but over whether dissenting viewpoints on this one tragic time in history could be spoken or even considered. In one corner we had Deborah Lipstadt and all the power of the mainstream seeking to deny discussion of historical events that had been elevated to mythical and nearly religious proportions. In the other corner was a lone historian, a champion for freedom fighting for the permission for whole generations present and future to discuss the Holocaust in the years ahead.

It is no surprise that Irving was cast as the villain in Denial. It should also be of little surprise that audiences shunned a film in which all of the powers of an empire squelched a lone rebel. In these days however of Brexit and the Trump presidency, I can only wonder whether, had Hollywood altered the screenplay (so to speak, “flipped the script”), what the reception might have been. Had Irving been portrayed as a champion of free speech fighting for his honor in a time of increasing political correctness and censorship of dissident perspectives, they just might have had a surprise box-office sensation.

---

Notes:

1	The New York Times Book Review called Denying the Holocaust an “important and impassioned work.” This is just one of many such examples.
2	Richard Widmann, “Denying the Revisionists: The Errors and Falsifications of Deborah Lipstadt,” The Revisionist , No. 5, Summer 2000. Online: http://codoh.com/library/document/384/
3	Deborah Lipstadt, Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory (New York: Plume, 1994) (hereafter referred to as Denying ), p. xvii.

4	Ibid., p. 3.
5	Ibid., p. 2.
6	Ibid., p. 4.
7	"St. Martin's Cancels Book on Goebbels," The New York Times , April 5, 1996, p. D4.
8	David Irving, Closing Speech against Penguin Books Ltd and Deborah Lipstadt , (Focal Point Publications, 2000). Online: http://www.fpp.co.uk/trial/closing/Lipstadt_closing.pdf
9	Lipstadt, Op Cit., p. xiii.
10	Ibid., p. xiv.
11	Ibid.
12	Ibid..
13	Samuel Crowell, The Gas Chamber of Sherlock Holmes , (Charleston, W. Va.: Nine-Banded Books, 2011), p.6
14	David Irving, Op. Cit. p.3.

The Taboo against Truth | CODOH

by Ralph Raico

"Speaking truth to power" is not easy when you support that power. Perhaps this is the reason why so few Western historians are willing to tell the whole truth about state crimes during this century.

Last fall [1988 —Ed.] the Moscow News reported the discovery by two archaeologist-historians of mass graves at Kuropaty, near Minsk, in the Soviet republic of Byelorussia.<sup>1</sup> The scholars at first estimated that the victims numbered around 102,000, a figure that was later revised to 250–300,000.<sup>2</sup> Interviews with older inhabitants of the village revealed that, from 1937 until June 1941, when the Germans invaded, the killings never stopped. "For five years, we couldn't sleep at night because of all the shooting," one witness said.

Then in March, a Soviet commission finally conceded that the mass graves at Bykovnia, outside of Kiev, were the result not of the Nazis' work, as formerly was maintained, but of the industry of Stalin's secret police. Some 200–300,000 persons were killed at Bykovnia, according to unofficial estimates.<sup>3</sup>

These graves represent a small fraction of the human sacrifice that an elite of revolutionary Marxists offered up to their ideological fetish. How many died under Stalin alone, from the shootings, the terror famine, and the forced-labor camps, is uncertain. Writing in a Moscow journal, Roy Medvedev, the dissident Soviet Marxist, put the number at around 20 million, a figure the sovietologist Stephen F. Cohen views as conservative.<sup>4</sup> Robert Conquest's estimate is between 20 million and 30 million or more,<sup>5</sup> while Anton Antonov-Ovseyenko suggests 41 million deaths between 1930 and 1941.<sup>6</sup>

By everyone's account, most of the victims were killed before the United States and Britain welcomed the Soviet Union as their ally in June 1941. Yet by then, the evidence concerning at least very widespread Communist killings was available to anyone willing to listen.

If glasnost proceeds and if the whole truth about the Lenin and Stalin eras comes to light, educated opinion in the West will be forced to reassess some of its most deeply cherished views. On a minor note, Stalinist sympathizers like Lillian Hellman, Frieda Kirchwey, and Owen Lattimore will perhaps not be lionized quite as much as before. More important, there will have to be a reevaluation of what it meant for the British and American governments to have befriended Soviet Russia in the Second World War and heaped fulsome praise on its leader. That war will inevitably lose some of its glory as the pristinely pure crusade led by the larger-than-life heroes Winston Churchill and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Inevitably, too, comparisons with what is commonly known as the Holocaust will emerge.

The "Dispute of Historians"

Such comparisons have been at the center of the raging controversy in the Federal Republic of Germany that has been labeled the Historikerstreit, or dispute of historians, and has now become an international cause célèbre. It erupted primarily because of the work of Ernst Nolte, of the Free University of Berlin, author of the highly acclaimed Three Faces of Fascism, published in the United States in 1966. In several important essays, in a large book published in 1987, The European Civil War, 1917-1945, and in a volume of responses to his critics,<sup>7</sup> Nolte declined to treat the Nazi massacre of the Jews in the conventional fashion.

These graves represent a small fraction of the human sacrifice that an elite of revolutionary Marxists offered up to their ideological fetish.

He refused, that is, to deal with it metaphysically, as a unique object of evil, existing there in a small segment of history, in a nearly perfect vacuum, with at most merely ideological links to racist and Social Darwinist thought of the preceding century. Instead, without denying the importance of ideology, he attempted to set the Holocaust in the context of the history of Europe in the first decades of the 20th century. His aim was in no way to excuse the mass murder of the Jews, or to diminish the guilt of the Nazis for this crime dreadful beyond words. But he insisted that this mass murder must not lead us to forget others, particularly those that might stand in a causal relationship to it.

Briefly, Nolte's thesis is that it was the Communists who introduced into modern Europe the awful fact and terrifying threat of the killing of civilians on a vast scale, implying the extermination of whole categories of persons. (One Old Bolshevik, Zinoviev, spoke openly as early as 1918 of the need to eliminate 10,000,000 of the people of Russia.) In the years and decades following the Russian Revolution, middle-class, upper-class, Catholic, and other Europeans were well aware of this fact, and for them especially the threat was a very real one. This helps to account for the violent hatred shown to their own domestic Communists in the various European countries by Catholics, conservatives, fascists, and even Social Democrats.

Nolte's thesis continues: those who became the Nazi elite were well-informed regarding events in Russia, via White Russian and Baltic German émigrés (who even exaggerated the extent of the first, Leninist atrocities). In their minds, as in those of right-wingers generally, the Bolshevik acts were transformed, irrationally, into Jewish acts, a transformation helped along by the existence of a high proportion of Jews among the early Bolshevik leaders. (Inclined to anti-Semitism from the start, the rightists ignored the fact that, as Nolte points out, the proportion among the Mensheviks was higher, and, of course, the great majority of the European Jews were never Communists.) A similar, ideologically mandated displacement, however, occurred among the Communists themselves: after the assassination of Uritsky and the attempted assassination of Lenin by Social Revolutionaries, for instance, hundreds of "bourgeois" hostages were executed.

The Communists never ceased proclaiming that all of their enemies were tools of a single conspiracy of the "world bourgeoisie."

The facts regarding the Ukrainian terror famine of the early 1930s and the Stalinist gulag were also known in broad outline in European right-wing circles. When all is said and done, Nolte concludes, "the Gulag came before Auschwitz." If it had not been for what happened in Soviet Russia, European fascism, especially Nazism and the Nazi massacre of the Jews,<sup>8</sup> would most probably not have been what they were.

The Onslaught on Nolte

Nolte's previous work on the history of socialism could hardly have made him persona grata with leftist intellectuals in his own country. Among other things, he had emphasized the archaic, reactionary character of Marxism and the anti-Semitism of many of the early socialists, and had referred to "liberal capitalism" or "economic freedom," rather than socialism, as "the real and modernizing revolution."

The attack on Nolte was launched by the leftist philosopher Jürgen Habermas, who took issue not with Nolte's historiography — his essays showed that Habermas was in no position to judge this — but with what he viewed as its ideological implications. Habermas also targeted a couple of other German historians, and added other points, like the plan to establish museums of German history in West Berlin and in Bonn, to the indictment. But Nolte and his thesis have continued to be at the center of the Historikerstreit. He was accused of "historicizing" and "relativizing" the Holocaust and chided for questioning its "uniqueness."

Several of the biggest names among academic historians in the Federal Republic, and then in Britain and America as well, joined in the hunt, gleefully seizing upon some of Nolte's less felicitous expressions and weaker minor points. In Berlin, radicals set fire to his car; at Oxford, Wolfson College withdrew an invitation to deliver a lecture, after pressure was applied, just as a major German organization dispensing research grants rescinded a commitment to Nolte under Israeli pressure. In the American press, ignorant editors, who couldn't care less anyway, now routinely permit Nolte to be represented as an apologist for Nazism.

It cannot be said that Nolte has demonstrated the truth of his thesis — his achievement is rather to have pointed out important themes that call for further research — and his presentation is in some respects flawed. Still, one might well wonder what there is in his basic account to justify such a frenzy. The comparison between Nazi and Soviet atrocities has often been drawn by respected scholars. Robert Conquest, for instance, states,

For Russians — and it is surely right that this should become true for the world as a whole — Kolyma [one part of the Gulag] is a word of horror wholly comparable to Auschwitz ... it did indeed kill some three million people, a figure well in the range of that of the victims of the Final Solution.9

Others have gone on to assert a causal connection. Paul Johnson maintains that important elements of the Soviet forced-labor camps system were copied by the Nazis, and posits a link between the Ukrainian famine and the Holocaust:

The camps system was imported by the Nazis from Russia.... Just as the Roehm atrocities goaded Stalin into imitation, so in turn the scale of his mass atrocities encouraged Hitler in his wartime schemes to change the entire demography of Eastern Europe ... Hitler's "final solution" for the Jews had its origins not only in his own fevered mind but in the collectivization of the Soviet peasantry.10

Nick Eberstadt, an expert on Soviet demography, concludes that "the Soviet Union is not only the original killer state, but the model one."11 As for the tendency among European rightists after 1917 to identify the Bolshevik regime with the Jews, there is no end of evidence.12 Indeed, it was an immensely tragic error to which even many outside of right-wing circles were liable. In 1920, after a visit to Russia, Bertrand Russell wrote to Lady Ottoline Morell:

Bolshevism is a closed tyrannical bureaucracy, with a spy system more elaborate and terrible than the Tsar's, and an aristocracy as insolent and unfeeling, composed of Americanised Jews.13

But, despite the existence of a supporting scholarly context for Nolte's position, he remains beleaguered in his native land, with only isolated individuals, like Joachim Fest, coming to his defense. If recent English-language publications are a reliable indication, his situation will not improve as the controversy spreads to other countries.

Why Did the Heavens Not Darken?

The recent work by Arno J. Mayer, of Princeton, Why Did the Heavens Not Darken?14 is in some respects informative;15 above all, however, it is a perfect illustration of why Nolte's work was so badly needed.

The great crime that is today virtually forgotten was the expulsion of the Germans from their centuries-old homelands in East Prussia, Pomerania, and elsewhere. About 16 million persons were displaced, with about 2 million of them dying in the process.

We can leave aside Mayer's approach to the origins of the "Judeocide" (as he calls it), which is "functionalist" rather than "intentionalist," in the current jargon, and which provoked a savage review.<sup>16</sup> What is pertinent here is his presentation of the killing of the European Jews as an outgrowth of the fierce hatred of "Judeobolshevism" that allegedly permeated all of German and European "bourgeois" society after 1917, reaching its culmination in the Nazi movement and government. This approach lends support to Nolte's thesis.

The problem, however, is that Mayer offers no real grounds for the bitter hatred that so many harbored for Bolshevism, aside from the threat that Bolshevism abstractly posed to their narrow and retrograde "class interests." Virtually the only major Soviet atrocity even alluded to in the 449 pages of text (there are, oddly and inexcusably, no notes)<sup>17</sup> is the deportation of some 400,000 Jews from the territories annexed after the Hitler-Stalin pact. Even here, however, Mayer hastens to reassure us that the policy was "not specifically anti-Semitic and did not preclude assimilated and secularized Jews from continuing to secure important positions in civil and political society ... a disproportionate number of Jews came to hold posts in the secret police and to serve as political commissars in the armed service." Well, Mazel Tov.

The fear and loathing of Communism that Poles, Hungarians, and Romanians, for instance, felt in the interwar period, strongly endorsed by their national churches, is qualified by Mayer as an "obsession." With Mayer, fear of Communism is always "obsessional" and limited to the "ruling classes," prey to an anti-Bolshevik "demonology." But the recourse to clinical and theological terms is no substitute for historical understanding, and Mayer's account — Soviet Communism with the murders left out — precludes such understanding.

Consider the case of Clemens August Count von Galen, Archbishop of Münster.

As Mayer notes, Galen led the Catholic bishops of Germany in 1941 in publicly protesting the Nazi policy of murdering mental patients. The protest was shrewdly crafted and proved successful: Hitler suspended the killings. Yet, as Mayer further notes, Archbishop Galen (deplorably) "consecrated" the war against Soviet Russia. Why?

To cite another example: Admiral Horthy, the Regent of Hungary, was an opponent of murdering the Jews and attempted, within his limited means, to save the Jews of Budapest. Yet he continued to have his troops fight against the Soviets and alongside the Germans long after the coming defeat was obvious. Why? Could it possibly be that, in both cases, the previous bloody history of Soviet Communism had something to do with their attitude? In Mayer's retelling, Crusader murders in Jerusalem in the year 1096 are an important part of the story, but not Bolshevik murders in the 1920s and '30s.

Allegations of Soviet crimes do appear in Mayer's book. But they are put in the mouths of Hitler and Goebbels, with no comment from Mayer, thereby signaling their "fanatical" and "obsessional" character, e.g., "the führer ranted about bolshevism wading deeper in blood than tsarism" (actually, Hitler's claim here is hardly controversial).

In fact, it seems likely that Mayer simply does not believe that there were anything approaching tens of millions of victims of the Soviet regime. He writes, for instance, of "an iron nexus between absolute war and large-scale political murder in eastern Europe." But most of the large-scale Stalinist political murders occurred when the Soviet Union was at peace. The massive upheavals, with their accompanying terror and mass killings, that characterized Soviet history in the 1920s and 30s, Mayer refers to in almost unbelievably anodyne terms as "the general transformation of political and civil society." In other words, Mayer gives every evidence of being a Ukrainian-famine, Great-Terror, and gulag "revisionist." This is an aspect of Mayer's book that the reviewers in the mainstream press had an obligation to point out but omitted to do so.

Mayer has no patience with any suggestion that great crimes may have been committed against Germans in the Second World War and its aftermath. Here he joins the vast majority of his contemporaries, professional and lay alike, as well as the Nuremberg Tribunal itself.

Hamburg following the 1943 Allied fire-bombing. Photo circa 1944. [Public domain], via Wikimedia Commons

Taboo War Crimes — the Allies'

If Soviet mass atrocities provide a historical context for Nazi crimes, so does a set of crimes that few, inside or outside the Federal Republic, seem willing to bring into the debate: the ones perpetrated, planned, or conspired in by the Western Allies.

All mass murderers — all of the state terrorists on a grand scale, whatever their ethnicity or that of their victims — must be arraigned before the court of history.

There was, first of all, the policy of terror bombing of the cities of Germany, begun by the British in 1942. The Principal Assistant Secretary of the Air Ministry later boasted of the British initiative in the wholesale massacring of civilians from the air.<sup>18</sup> Altogether, the RAF and US Army Air Force killed around 600,000 German civilians,<sup>19</sup> whose deaths were aptly characterized by the British military historian and Major-General J.F.C. Fuller as "appalling slaughterings, which would have disgraced Attila."<sup>20</sup> A recent British military historian has concluded: "The cost of the bomber offensive in life, treasure, and moral superiority over the enemy tragically outstripped the results that it achieved."<sup>21</sup>

The planned, but aborted, Allied atrocity was the Morgenthau Plan, concocted by the US Secretary of the Treasury, Henry Morgenthau, and initialed by Roosevelt and Churchill at the Second Quebec Conference, in September 1944. The Plan aimed to transform postwar Germany into an agricultural and pastoral country, incapable of waging war because it would have no industry. Even the coal mines of the Ruhr were to be flooded. Of course, in the process tens of millions of Germans would have died. The inherent insanity of the plan very quickly led Roosevelt's other advisors to press him into abandoning it, but not before it had become public (as its abandonment did not).

Following upon the policy of "unconditional surrender" announced in early 1943, the Morgenthau Plan stoked the Nazi rage. "Goebbels and the controlled Nazi press had a field day ... 'Roosevelt and Churchill agree at Quebec to the Jewish Murder Plan,' and 'Details of the Devilish Plan of Destruction: Morgenthau the Spokesman of World Judaism.'<sup>22</sup>

There are two further massive crimes involving the Allied governments that deserve mention (limiting ourselves to the European theater). Today it is fairly well-known that, when the war was over, British and American political and military leaders directed the forced repatriation of hundreds of thousands of Soviet subjects (and the surrender of some, like the Cossacks, who had never been subjects of the Soviet state). Many were executed, most were channeled into the gulag. Solzhenitsyn had bitter words for the Western leaders who handed over to Stalin the remnants of Vlasov's Russian Army of Liberation:

In their own country, Roosevelt and Churchill are honored as embodiments of statesmanlike wisdom. To us, in our Russian prison conversations, their consistent shortsightedness and stupidity stood out as astonishingly obvious ... what was the military or political sense in their surrendering to destruction at Stalin's hands hundreds of thousands of armed Soviet citizens determined not to surrender.23

Of Winston Churchill, Alexander Solzhenitsyn wrote:

He turned over to the Soviet command the Cossack corps of 90,000 men. Along with them he also handed over many wagonloads of old people, women, and children.... This great hero, monuments to whom will in time cover all England, ordered that they, too, be surrendered to their deaths.24

The great crime that is today virtually forgotten was the expulsion starting in 1945 of the Germans from their centuries-old homelands in East Prussia, Pomerania, Silesia, Sudetenland, and elsewhere. About 16 million persons were displaced, with about 2 million of them dying in the process.25 This is a fact, which, as the American legal scholar Alfred de Zayas dryly notes, "has somehow escaped the attention it deserves."26 While those directly guilty were principally the Soviets, Poles, and Czechs (the last led by the celebrated democrat and humanist, Eduard Benes), British and American leaders early on authorized the principle of expulsion of the Germans and thus set the stage for what occurred at the war's end. Anne O'Hare McCormick, the New York Times correspondent who witnessed the exodus of the Germans, reported in 1946:

The scale of this resettlement and the conditions in which it takes place are without precedent in history. No one seeing its horrors firsthand can doubt that it is a crime against humanity for which history will exact a terrible retribution.

McCormick added: "We share responsibility for horrors only comparable to Nazi cruelties."27

Bringing All State Terrorists to Account

In the Federal Republic today, to mention any of these Allied — or even Soviet — crimes in the same breath with the Nazis is to invite the devastating charge of attempting an Aufrechnen — an offsetting, or balancing against. The implication is that one is somehow seeking to diminish the Nazis' undying guilt for the Holocaust by pointing to the guilt of other governments for other crimes. This seems to me to be a thoroughly warped perspective.

In fact, all great states in the 20th century have been killer states, to a greater or lesser degree.

All mass murderers — all of the state terrorists on a grand scale, whatever their ethnicity or that of their victims — must be arraigned before the court of history. It is impermissible to let some of them off the hook, even if the acts of others may be characterized as unique in their brazen embrace of evil and their sickening horror. As Lord Acton said, the historian should be a hanging judge, for the muse of history is not Clio, but Rhadamanthus, the avenger of innocent blood.

There was a time in America when well-known writers felt an obligation to remind their fellow citizens of the criminal misdeeds of their government, even against Germans. Thus, the courageous radical Dwight MacDonal indicted the air war against German civilians during the war itself.28 On the other side of the spectrum, the respected conservative journalist William Henry Chamberlin, in a book published by Henry Regnery, assailed the genocidal Morgenthau Plan and labeled the expulsion of the eastern Germans "one of the most barbarous actions in European history."29

Nowadays the only publication that seems to care about these old wrongs is the Spectator (the real one, of course), which happens also to be the best-edited political magazine in English. The Spectator has published articles by British writers honorably admitting the shame they felt upon viewing what remains of the great cities of Germany, once famed in the annals of science and art. Other contributors have pointed out the meaning of the loss of the old German populations of the area that is today again being fashionably referred to as Mitteleuropa. A Hungarian writer, G.M. Tamas, recently wrote,

The Jews were murdered and mourned.... But who has mourned the Germans? Who feels any guilt for the millions expelled from Silesia and Moravia and the Volga region, slaughtered during their long trek, starved, put into camps, raped, frightened, humiliated?... Who dares to remember that the expulsion of the Germans made the communist parties quite popular in the 1940s? Who is revolted because the few Germans left behind, whose ancestors built our cathedrals, monasteries, universities, and railway stations, today cannot have a primary school in their own language? The world expects Germany and Austria to "come to terms" with their past. But no one will admonish us, Poles, Czechs, and Hungarians, to do the same. Eastern Europe's dark secret remains a secret. A universe of culture was destroyed.30

More remarkably still, Auberon Waugh drew attention to the fervid support given by British leaders to the Nigerian generals during the Civil War (1967-70), at a time "when the International Red Cross assured us that 10,000 Biafrans a day were dying of starvation," victims of a conscious, calculated policy.31 His observation was a propos of the massacre in Tiananmen Square and the nearly universal execration of the Chinese leaders; it was a telling one.

In fact, both the Soviet and Nazi mass murders must be placed in a wider context. Just as it is unlikely that Nazi racist ideology of itself can account for the murder of the Jews — and so many others — so Leninist amorality is probably not enough to account for Bolshevik crimes. The crucial intervening historical fact may well be the mass killings of the First World War — of millions of soldiers, but also of thousands of civilians on the high seas by German submarines and of hundreds of thousands of civilians in central Europe by the British hunger blockade.32 Arno Mayer makes the important point in regard to World War I that "this immense bloodletting ... contributed to inuring Europe to the mass killings of the future." He means this in connection with the Nazis, but it probably also holds for the Communists themselves, witnesses to the results of a war brought about by "capitalist imperialism." None of this, of course, excuses any of the subsequent state criminals.

In fact, all great states in this century have been killer states, to a greater or lesser degree. Naturally, the "degree" matters — sometimes very much. But it makes no sense to isolate one mass atrocity, historically and morally, and then to concentrate on it to the virtual exclusion of all others. The result of such a perverted moralism can only be to elevate to the status of hero leaders who badly wanted hanging, and to bolster the sham rectitude of states that will be all the more prone to murder since history "proves" that they are the "good" states.

Notes:

First published in Liberty, September 1989.

1	Washington Post , Oct. 23, 1988.
2	Robert Conquest in The Independent (London), Dec. 5, 1988.
3	New York Times , March 25, 1989.
4	New York Times , Feb. 4, 1989. Stephen F. Cohen, "The Survivor as Historian: Introduction," in Anton Antonov-Ovseyenko, The Time of Stalin: A Portrait in Tyranny , trans. George Saunders (New York: Harper and Row, 1980), p. vii.
5	Robert Conquest, The Great Terror: Stalin's Purge of the Thirties (Macmillan: London, 1968), p. 533. See also note 2.
6	Ibid. , p. 213.
7	Nolte's first essay to draw fire appeared originally in English: "Between Myth and Revisionism? The Third Reich in the Perspective of the 1980s," in an important volume edited by H.W. Koch, Aspects of the Third Reich (London: Macmillan, 1985), pp. 17-39. Some of Nolte's contributions to the debate, as well as those of many other writers, appear in the useful collection, "Historikerstreit": Die Dokumentation der Kontroverse um die Einzigartigkeit der nationalsozialistischen Judenvernichtung (Munich: Piper, 1987). Nolte's Der europäische Bürgerkrieg, 1917-1945. Nationalsozialismus und Bolschewismus (Frankfurt/Main: Propylen, 1987) has not yet been translated. His rebuttals to some of the attacks are contained in his Das Vergehen der Vergangenheit. Antwort an meine Kritiker im sogenannten Historikerstreit (2nd. ed., Ullstein: Berlin, 1988).
8	The Nazis were responsible, of course, for the deaths of millions of non-Jews, especially Poles and Soviet prisoners of war. The Jewish genocide, however, has been the focus of discussion.

9	Robert Conquest, Kolyma: The Arctic Death Camps (New York: Viking, 1978), pp. 15-16.
10	Paul Johnson, Modern Times (New York: Harper and Row, 1983), pp. 304-305. Johnson does not, however, provide any relevant sources for this claim.
11	Nick Eberstadt, Introduction to Iosif G. Dyadkin, Unnatural Deaths in the U.S.S.R., 1928-1954 (New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Books, 1983), 4.
12	See Arno J. Mayer, Why Did the Heavens Not Darken? The "Final Solution" in History (New York: Pantheon, 1988), passim.
13	Bertrand Russell, The Autobiography of Bertrand Russell, II, 1914-1944 (Boston: Utle, Brown, 1968), p. 172.
14	See note 12.
15	Mayer concludes that Hitler's attack on the Soviet Union was not intended as a step toward "world domination," but was the culmination of his plans to provide Germany with the Lebensraum , or living-space, which he, in his archaic way, believed was a prerequisite for German survival and prosperity.
16	Daniel Jonah Goldhagen, "False Witness," The New Republic , April 17, 1989, pp. 39-44. A fair statement of the differences between intentionalist and functionalists can be found in Saul Friedlander's introduction to Gerald Fleming's Hitler and the Final Solution (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982).
17	Notes would, presumably, have added to the book's length, but the author could have compensated by omitting his rehashings of well-known political and military history in the period.
18	J. M. Spaight, cited in J.F.C. Fuller, The Second World War, 1939-45. A Strategical and Tactical History (London: Eyre and Spottiswoode, 1954), p. 222.
19	Max Hastings, Bomber Command (New York: Dial, 1979), p. 352.
20	Fuller, The Second World War , p. 228.
21	Hastings, Bomber Command . The best short introduction to the subject is the review of Hastings's book by the gifted London journalist Geoffrey Wheatcroft, The Spectator , Sept. 29, 1979, reprinted in Inquiry , Dec. 24, 1979. It was the only review Inquiry ever reprinted.
22	Anne Armstrong, Unconditional Surrender. The Impact of the Casablanca Policy upon World War II (1961; repro. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1974), p. 76. On the Morgenthau Plan, see ibid. , pp. 68-77. For the text of the plan, see Alfred de Zayas, Nemesis at Potsdam. The Anglo-Americans and the Expulsion of the Germans. Background, Execution, and Consequences

	(London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1977), pp. 229-232.
23	Aleksandr I. Solzhenitsyn, The Gulag Archipelago, 1918-1956. An Experiment in Literary Investigation, I-II , trans. Thomas P. Whitney (New York: Harper and Row, 1973), p. 259n.
24	Ibid., pp. 259-260.
25	Alfred de Zayas, Nemesis at Potsdam , p. xix.
26	Ibid.
27	Ibid., p. 123.
28	Many of Dwight MacDonal'd's essays critical of the Allies' conduct of the war were collected in his Memoirs of a Revolutionist (New York: Farrar, Straus, and Cudahy, 1957).
29	William Henry Chamberlin, America's Second Crusade (Chicago: Henry Regnery, 1950), pp. 304, 310, 312.
30	G.M. Tamas, "The Vanishing Germans," The Spectator , May 6, 1989.
31	The Spectator , June 10, 1989.
32	On the British hunger blockade and its likely effect in helping shape Nazi brutality, see my contribution, "The Politics of Hunger: A Review," The Review of Austrian Economics , III (1988), pp. 253-259.

A Brief Overview of Revisionist Critiques of Yad Vashem's Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names

by Germar Rudolf

Abstract

This paper introduces a series of revisionist papers scrutinizing the flawed approach with which the Israeli Holocaust Remembrance Museum Yad Vashem is collecting the names (and so, numbers) of Jews who are said to have died in “the Holocaust.” In addition, it gives a brief overview of what Yad Vashem is saying about it, in fact is admitting, about it on their own website.

For decades, the Israeli Holocaust Remembrance Museum Yad Vashem has been collecting names of those who allegedly died in the Jewish Holocaust of World War II. One of the earliest critics of that enterprise has been the U.S. revisionist Arthur R. Butz, who wrote in his 1976 book The Hoax of the Twentieth Century:[\[1\]](#)

“It is said that the Yad Vashem archives in Jerusalem now have the names of between 2.5 and 3 million Jewish ‘dead from the Nazi holocaust.’ The data have supposedly been ‘collected on one-page testimony sheets filled in by relatives or witnesses or friends.’ [...] There is no doubt that many Jews died during the war, so we should expect that a part of the Yad Vashem claim is valid, but it is also the case that there is no possible way to distinguish, in this data, between Jews who actually died during the war and Jews with whom the signers of the ‘testimony sheets’ have merely lost contact. The data is particularly meaningless when it is a ‘friend’ who has contributed a declaration; I have lost contact with a great many former friends and acquaintances, but I assume that nearly all are still alive. Indeed, the use of the testimony of ‘friends’ for the purpose of gathering the Yad Vashem data shows that the data is mostly meaningless; such ‘friends’ have no more basis for declaring their missing acquaintances dead than I do.”

With the advent of the internet, Yad Vashem eventually moved its database containing the data of those claimed to have fallen victim to the Holocaust online as well, making it easy to both browse the data and to add new data. This, too, led to some criticism. In the 2005 edition of my Lectures on the Holocaust, the German edition of which appeared in March of that year, I wrote (Castle Hill Publishers, Hastings, pp. 38f.):

“R: The Yad Vashem Research Center in Israel has compiled such a list [of victims]. As of today, it contains about three million names, with one million stemming from published sources, the great majority of the remainder coming from written reports made by relatives, friends, or locals.[\[2\]](#) Yad Vashem’s promotion brochure states in this regard:[\[3\]](#)

‘This is a race against time – search the site today, submit unrecorded names and pictures, and help ensure that every Holocaust victim has a place in our collective memory. [...] Gather information – talk to your family: As you may not know about relatives who might have perished in the Holocaust, we recommend that you first contact your family: parents, grandparents, aunts or uncles to collect as much information as possible about all of those persons that might [sic] have been murdered. [...] If you have family members who were murdered in the Holocaust, [...] you may either submit names and details online via the site, or use the attached Page of Testimony'

L: In other words, anyone can register victims with Yad Vashem.

R: Precisely. For example, Yad Vashem mentions a case where a local inhabitant simply reported all the Jews living in the area before the war as having perished, for the simple reason that:[\[4\]](#)

