'After the war, he realized that no Jew returned to his home region [...]

L: Does anyone check whether the indications are correct? After all, it could be that those missing persons are now living somewhere in the U.S., in Israel, or elsewhere.

R: As far as I know, nothing is checked. You can order such forms from Yad Vashem, fill them out and send them back. The address is Hall of Names, Yad Vashem, P.O.B 3477, 91034 Jerusalem, Israel; Telephone: 00972-02-6443582; via Email: names.research@yadvashem.org.il.

L: Couldn't I just as well send them data on my dog?

R: Now listen. I don't think that this kind of thing is going on, but it would seem to me that there is no way to avoid errors, double entries, or reports on survivors. In any case, this Hall of Names is a rather insignificant source, from a scientific point of view."

At the same time as these lines were published, the French revisionist Jean-Marie Boisdefeu published a critical review of a few of this database's entries, revealing that it even contains survivors, and that some individuals have at least two entries.[\[5\]](#) A year later he followed that up with a paper demonstrating that entire sets of Jewish deportees have been entered multiple times, and also that some of the data stored in the database shows that Jews sent to Treblinka were reported dead further to the east, in other words, for them Treblinka served indeed as a transit camp. We have reproduced both papers in this issue of Inconvenient History, and we hope that we will soon be able to offer an English translation of them as well.

The next three entries in our mini-series on Yad Vashem's victim database come from the Italian website olodogma.com, which was temporarily banned in mid-2016 after Italy passed an anti-"denial" law. These articles give you an insight not only into how the Yad Vashem database works, but also about the background on Italy's anti-"denial" law, and why it was enacted in the first place.

It all started with several participants of a Stormfront blog picking up on Yad Vashem's fraudulent way of maximizing the number of names of alleged Holocaust victims stored in their database. One of the individuals in that discussion was Dr. Mirko Viola, who, together with three others, ended up being arrested, among other things for allegedly mocking the victims of the Holocaust. I will not dwell here on his case, which involves many political hot-button topics outside of the ambit of what CODOH and IH usually address.

Although the civil-rights aspects of this case are of interest, they will be ignored here as well, for they could and should be the object of a separate paper focusing on civil rights in Italy. We will here focus entirely on one of the main charges Dr. Viola faced during his criminal proceedings: that of “spreading negationist ideology,” i.e., Holocaust revisionism, which, as Dr. Viola correctly observed, “it is not an ideology, but a rigorous research method of historiography.” His offense? He invented imaginary Jews gassed in the Polish death camps by entering made-up data into the Yad Vashem database, thus exposing that there is no quality control and that anyone can enter anything, turning the whole enterprise into a big joke. Of course, making a joke about the Shoah victims is socially unacceptable at best, and considered a crime in many countries.

Dr. Viola’s iconoclastic act triggered a series of blog posts on olodogma documenting how easy it is indeed to submit invented information to Yad Vashem and have it included in their database of Shoah victims.

The first paper included here, “Come aumentare il numero dei morti nell'olocausto/How to Increase the Number of Holocaust Deaths,” is a merger of two olodogma blog posts, and starts with Dr. Viola’s case and briefly verifies his claim about how easy it is to submit any data, true or false, to Yad Vashem.

The second is a brief analysis of some entries in the Yad Vashem database by Italian scholar Carlo Mattogno – “Breve nota su ‘The Central Database of Shoah Victims’ Names’ e il numero dei morti ivi riportati/Brief Note on ‘The Central Database of Shoah Victims’ Names’ and the Number of Deaths Reported therein,” arguing along the same lines as Boisdefeu’s 2005 paper.

The third paper – “Magda Goebbels'... nel database dello Yad Vashem/Magda Goebbels'... in the Yad Vashem Database” – probably represents the pinnacle of mockery: the inclusion of Adolf Hitler and Magda Goebbels, wife of Hitler’s chief of propaganda, in Yad Vashem’s database, a prank which was reported by CODOH earlier.<sup>[6]</sup> That latter paper also includes a number of reactions to that prank which were originally part of other olodogma posts.

While some of the material written by olodogma is at times somewhat polemical in tone, which we don’t normally approve, we still think that the events reported in them are highly instructive and contain important information to gauge the reliability and trustworthiness of the data constituting Yad Vashem’s database.

After these deeply embarrassing revisionist revelations about the fraudulent methods of Yad Vashem, the institution changed the way they described their data.

As of late 2016, their database contained about 4½ million names,<sup>[7]</sup> but they no longer claim that all of them are unique or even victims of the Holocaust. In fact, their website now has a list of frequently asked questions (FAQ) which sheds some light onto the significance of their data.<sup>[8]</sup> For instance, next to the obvious victims of the Holocaust, they admit there that their database also includes as victims those who died as a result of armed resistance, who died up to six months after the liberation (until the end of October 1945) as well as Jews who died during flight, evacuation and deportation from the advancing German army. (Answer to the question “How do you define a Shoah victim?”) On the origin of the names, Yad Vashem gives three main sources: a large part stems from submissions “primarily by survivors, remaining family members or friends; another part comes from local projects aiming at determining the identities of Jews who lived at certain places before the war. The last part originates from official, mainly German wartime documents.

The question whether every name in the database relates to a victim murdered beyond any doubt, was answered as follows:

“No. The Database is based on thousands of different sources. Yad Vashem experts have analyzed each source and have distinguished between sources that attest to murder, sources that point to a very high probability of murder (presumably murdered) and sources that lack a direct reference to murder.

It is probable that part of the individuals whose names appear only in sources of the third category, that is, lacking a direct reference to murder, were murdered at a later stage, but this cannot be determined on the basis of the documentation available as of now.”

So they admit indirectly that their data isn’t just about murder. Their generous definition of Holocaust victims encompasses evidently also those who surely died but not by way of outright murder. More still, just because a relative or friend claims that someone was murdered doesn’t make that murder a certainty. The questionable method used by Yad Vashem results from the answer to a question about the Lodz Ghetto:

“The list prepared by the Organization of Former Residents of Lodz in Israel contains some 240,000 personal records. It is known that the vast majority of the Jews imprisoned in the Lodz ghetto were ultimately murdered [not true!], but the editors of the list did not make a distinction between those who were murdered and those who survived. Due to the limitations of the list itself, there is no way of knowing with any measure of exactitude which of the individuals on the list was not murdered, and therefore we stated next to each name on the list ‘presumably murdered.’ The names of those for whom we have documentation attesting that they did indeed survive do not appear at this stage on the Database.

If you find the name of a ghetto prisoner and you know that she or he survived, please fill out a Shoah Survivor Registration form. In this way you can help us distinguish between the names of the murdered and the survivors on the list.”

Hence, their method can be summarized as follows: Initially they assume that all Jews within Hitler’s reach were “presumably murdered.” Then they collect all the names they can somehow get, and delete from that list those for whom they receive documentary or anecdotal evidence of their survival.

Needless to say, that amounts to a reversal of the burden of proof.

Abstract

Inspired by another paper, this paper briefly probes the Yad Vashem database of Holocaust victims. It turns out that the database contains many names of survivors, and that individuals are listed in it twice or even numerous times.

L’articolo “Come aumentare il numero dei-morti nell’olocausto”[\[1\]](#) espone senza dubbio problemi reali e seri, ma non sono i soli, e neppure i più importanti.

Degno di nota è anche il commento di un lettore circa il “database” di Yad Vashem (che registrerebbe «i nomi e i dati biografici di due terzi dei sei milioni di Ebrei assassinati dai nazisti e dai loro complici. Due milioni restano ancora da identificare»,[\[2\]](#) ossia, in totale, circa 4 milioni), ma più per i problemi da lui (indirettamente) posti, che per quelli che crede di risolvere:

Che cosa significa, in concreto, «nomi documentati dettagliatamente»?

La domanda, in termini più espliciti, va espressa così: quali sono le fonti che permettono di individuare i nomi delle vittime olocaustiche?

Se si tratta di «Ebrei assassinati dai nazisti e dai loro complici», premesso che non esiste documentariamente alcun nome di presunti gasati (in quanto non esiste alcuna prova documentaria di “camere a gas” e “gasazioni”), né esistono liste nominative di Ebrei fucilati stilate dagli Einsatzgruppen a da unità della Polizia, restano soltanto gli elenchi degli Ebrei uccisi per rappresaglia, per ordine di tribunali SS, in tentativi di fuga ecc., categoria, dal punto di vista numerico, estremamente esigua.

Se invece si parla di Ebrei morti, esistono due gruppi principali di fonti documentarie:

1. gli elenchi dei decessi nei campi di concentramento (soprattutto Sterbebücher, registri dei decessi, Totenbücher, registri dei morti)
2. gli elenchi dei decessi nei ghetti.

Questi decessi rientrano in quella che le SS chiamavano “mortalità naturale”.

È difficile valutare numericamente questi decessi nominativi. Si sa con certezza, da una lettera del Sonderstandesamt di Arolsen dell'11 maggio 1979 che, fino al 1978, il numero di questi decessi accertati in tutti i campi di concentramento tedeschi era di 271.304.

Questa cifra comprende ovviamente detenuti ebrei e non ebrei.

La successiva consegna da parte delle autorità russe dei registri dei morti al Museo di Auschwitz ha portato la cifra dei decessi nominativi per questo campo da 52.389 a 68.864, il che non muta nulla al quadro generale. Sui ghetti, non ci sono informazioni generali. Tra quelli più grandi, per Varsavia sono documentati circa 10.000 decessi nominativi, per Lodz forse tutti i circa 47.000 e per Theresienstadt forse tutti i circa 34.000. Aggiungendo eventuali liste nominative dei decessi di altri ghetti, ben difficilmente si arriverebbe a 350.000.

Allora da dove saltano fuori i presunti quattro milioni di nomi?

In parte, dagli elenchi dei deportati in campi di concentramento e in presunti campi di sterminio; nel “database” di Yad Vashem le persone deportate di cui non si hanno ulteriori notizie vengono ipso facto considerate uccise (“gasate”) alla data di arrivo del trasporto.

Tuttavia è oltremodo dubbio che gli elenchi nominativi dei trasporti che si sono conservati contengano almeno [4.000.000 – 350.000 =] 3.650.000 nomi. I repertori nominativi più importanti (Germania, Francia, Belgio, Theresienstadt, Olanda) includono complessivamente circa 280.000 nomi. Va precisato che le liste di deportazione a Theresienstadt si riferiscono al “Protettorato di Boemia e Moravia”, all'incirca l'attuale Repubblica Ceca, ma vi sono compresi anche deportati dalla Germania; inoltre tutti i deportati morti documentariamente attestati sono già inclusi nei libri dei decessi dei campi o dei ghetti. In particolare, la maggior parte degli Ebrei deportati dai paesi summenzionati furono inviati ad Auschwitz e i deceduti figurano nei relativi registri dei decessi. Per i campi orientali esistono liste di deportazione nominative di circa 34.000 Ebrei olandesi a Sobibór (già inclusi nella cifra summenzionata di 280.000). Mettendo insieme tutte le altre liste dei trasporti, si potrà arrivare a 300.000, forse a 350.000 nomi, ma mancherebbero comunque 3.300.000 nomi: da dove risultano?

La questione ormai acclarata delle molteplici ripetizioni dello stesso nominativo (ad esempio in base documenti diversi o/e segnalazioni diverse di “testimoni” o a semplice duplicazione dello stesso documento) non può spiegare questo enorme ammanco, perciò bisogna chiedere a Yad Vashem: storici, tirate fuori i vostri documenti, se esistono!

Ma la faccenda ha tutta l'aria di una colossale impostura.

Una cosa ancor meno nota è che il “database” in questione registra perfino nomi di superstiti!

Sotto riporto, a titolo d’esempio, i risultati di una brevissima ricerca condotta nel “database” sulla scorta della lista dei superstiti accertati del trasporto da Praga al ghetto di Lodz del 16 ottobre 1941. Molti di questi superstiti vi sono registrati come morti, alcuni addirittura due volte! La fonte è: Terezínská pamětní kniha. Terezínská Iniciativa. Melantrich, 1995, vol. I, p. 90 (vi sono riportati i nomi di 24 superstiti):

Con un nome foneticamente simile vi sono inoltre due nominativi identici:

- Adlerová Doris, registrata nel “database” come Aadler, Doris, 17/01/1929, liberata a Birnbämel
- Beck Max, registrato come Bek Max, 02/06/1895, liberato a (non indicato)
- Berg, Evžen, registrato come Berg, Eugen, 06/01/1897, liberato a Friedland
- Daschová, Hana, registrata due volte, come
  1. Dasch, Chana, 20/12/1921,
  2. Dasch Hanna, 20/12/1921, liberata a Wittenberg
- Dub, Alfréd, registrato due volte, come
  1. Dub Alfred, 03/05/1923
  2. Dub Alfred, 03/05/1923, liberato a Bergen-Belsen
- Ebenová Lotte, registrata come Eben Lotte, 1921, liberata a Ravensbrück
- Eisnerová Irená, registrata due volte, come
  1. Eisner, Irene, 02/02/1910,
  2. Eisner, Irene, 02/02/1910, liberata a Ravenbrück
- Ajzner, Irene, 16/10/1910,
  2. Ajzner, Irene, 16/10/1910,
- Flaumenhaft, Ervín, registrato come Flaumenhaft, Erwin, 07/10/1904, liberato a Althammer
- Glaser, Leo, registrato due volte, come
  1. Glazer Leo, 07/07/1911,
  2. Glazer Leo, 07/07/1911, liberato a Königswusterhausen
- Reiser Egon, 01.01.1895, registrato come Reiser Egon, 1895, liberato a Sachsenhausen (si tratta dell’unico Reiser Egon che appare nelle liste di deportazione)
- Rosenfeld Moses, registrato come Rosenfeld Moses, 11/08/1911, trasportato a Lodz il 16.10.1941, liberato a Sonnenberg.

Sempre a titolo di esempio, da una ricerca molto sommaria, a campione, nel “database” figurano come morte le seguenti Ebrei trasferite il 19 luglio 1944 da Riga a Stutthof e ivi regolarmente immatricolate:

- Goldbaum Getrude, 03/05/1900, ceca, registrata come Goldbaumova Getruda: n. dell’elenco 684, n. di matricola 48577; il “database” dice: “trasporto H da Praga, Praga Hlavni Mesto, Boemia, Cecoslovacchia a Theresienstadt, ghetto, Cecoslovacchia il 30/11/1941”. Il “tipo di materiale” è “una lista dei detenuti del campo di Theresienstdt” e lo status della persona è “assassinata/perita”. Nel registro summenzionato degli Ebrei cechi deportati a Theresienstadt, la signora Goldbaum risulta deportata a Riga il 9 gennaio 1942 (p. 160) ma non figura tra i superstiti.
- Todtenkopf Lina, 30/11/1901, tedesca, registrata con lo stesso nome: n.e. 826, n. m. 48729.

Il “database” adduce la fonte “Gedenkbuch – Opfer der Verfolgung der Juden unter der nationalsozialistischen Gewaltherrschaft in Deutschland 1933-1945, Bundesarchiv (German National Archives), Koblenz 1986” [Libro della memoria – Vittime della persecuzione degli Ebrei sotto la sovranità violenta in Germania 1933-1945, Archivio Federale, Coblenza (Archivio Nazionale Tedesco), Coblenza. 1986]; il suo status è: mancante. Il tipo di materiale: “Lista di Ebrei della Germania uccisi”.

Todtenkopf Lina, 30/11/1901, tedesca, è registrata una seconda volta; il tipo di materiale è “Lista di deportazione da Berlino”, la fonte è un’altra edizione del Gedenkbuch (Gedenkbuch Berlins der juedischen Opfer des Nationalsozialismus, Freie Universitaet Berlin, Zentralinstitut fuer sozialwissenschaftliche Forschung, Edition Hentrich, Berlin 1995); il luogo della presunta morte è “Riga, Rigas, Vidzeme, Lettonia”.

- Weil Mariane, 14/02/1909 è registrata come Weil Marianne; n.e. 706, n.m. 48599.
- Levitan Leiba, 25.2.1932, n.d.l. 292, n.d.m. 48195 risulta in “una lista di Ebrei uccisi al campo di Klooga, 1941-1944”, ma il massacro di Klooga avvenne il 19 settembre 1944, dopo che la detenuta era stata trasferita a Stutthof.
- Schick, Teresia, 12.08.1897, n.e. 1921, n. m. 48924, figura in “una lista di Ebrei dell’Austria uccisi”, ma il suo status è “assassinata/perita”.

Che queste ebreo siano morte, o siano state addirittura assassinate, non risulta da alcun documento.

Ecco un saggio piccolo, ma significativo, della serietà e del “rigore scientifico” del suddetto “database” e di coloro che lo hanno compilato.

Brief Note on “The Central Database of Shoah Victims’ Names” and the Number of Dead Reported therein

by Carlo Mattogno

Published: 2013-11-20

Abstract

Inspired by another paper, this paper briefly probes the Yad Vashem database of Holocaust victims. It turns out that the database contains many names of survivors, and that individuals are listed in it twice or even numerous times.

The article “How to increase the number of Holocaust deaths”<sup>[1]</sup> incontrovertibly exposes real and serious problems, but those are neither the only ones, nor the most important.

The comment of a reader about the Yad Vashem “database” (which has supposedly recorded “the names and biographical details of two thirds of the six million Jews murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices. Two million more still remain unidentified,”<sup>[2]</sup> i. e., approximately 4 million in total) is noteworthy, too, but rather for the problems he (indirectly) presents than for the solutions he believes to offer:

“Even if a million names have been made up out of thin air, there are still the other millions of names which are documented in detail”.

What does that mean, in concrete terms, “names which are documented in detail”?

The question, in more explicit terms, that should be asked: which are the sources that allow us to identify the names of Holocaust victims?

In the case of “Jews murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices”, given that there is not a single documented name of a supposedly gassed victim (since there is neither documentary evidence of “gas chambers” nor of “gassings”), there is no list of names of Jews executed by the Einsatzgruppen in conjunction with the Police. There remain only the lists of Jews killed in retaliation by order of SS courts, while attempting to escape etc. which are extremely small categories from a numerical point of view.

If we talk about dead Jews, there are two main groups of documentary sources:

1. The lists of those deceased in concentration camps (especially the Sterbebücher, Death Books, Totenbücher, Books of Deceased Prisoners)
2. The lists of deaths in the ghettos.

These deaths fall into the category of what the SS called “natural mortality.”

It is difficult to evaluate these fatalities by name. From a letter of the Standesamt Arolsen of May 11, 1979, we know with certainty that the number of certified deaths until the end of 1978 in all German concentration camps was 271.304.

This figure naturally includes both Jewish and non-Jewish prisoners.

The subsequent delivery of death lists by the Russian authorities to the Auschwitz Museum has brought the number of deaths for this camp up from 52,389 to 68,864, which doesn't change anything in the big picture. There's no general data about the ghettos. For Warsaw, among the larger ones, there are about 10,000 documented names of deceased persons, for Lodz perhaps about 47,000 in total and for Theresienstadt about 34,000 in total. Adding any possible death lists from other ghettos, one would hardly arrive at 350,000.

Where, then, do the alleged four million names suddenly appear from?

In part from the lists of deportees to concentration camps and alleged extermination camps; in the "database" of Yad Vashem, the deported persons of whom there are no further news are ipso facto considered as murdered ("gassed") on the date of arrival of the transport.

However, it is highly doubtful that the name lists of transports that have been preserved contain more than (4,000,000 - 350,000 =) 3,650,000 names. The most important name registries (Germany, France, Belgium, Theresienstadt, Netherlands) contain a total amount of about 280,000 names. It should be noted that the deportation lists to Theresienstadt refer to the "Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia", roughly the present Czech Republic, but include deportees from Germany, as well; furthermore, all the deceased deportees confirmed by documents are already included in the death books of the camps or ghettos. In particular, most of the Jews deported from the abovementioned countries were sent to Auschwitz and the deceased are contained in the respective death registers. For the eastern camps there is a deportation list with about 34,000 names of Dutch Jews to Sobibór (already included in the above figure of 280,000). Putting together all the other transport lists, it's possible to get 300,000, up to 350,000 names, yet there would still remain 3,300,000 missing names: where do they come from?

Settling the question of repeated entries with the same name (for example, because of different documents and/or various reports from "witnesses" or simply duplication of the same document) can not explain this huge difference, so we have to ask Yad Vashem: historians, pull out your documents, if they exist!

But the matter has all the appearances of a giant sham.

One thing even less known is that the "database" in question also records the names of survivors!

The reports below, as an example, are the result of a brief survey conducted in the "database" on the basis of a list of certified survivors of a transport from Prague to the Lodz ghetto on 16 October, 1941. Many of these survivors are registered as dead, some even twice! Source: Terezínská pamětní kniha. Terezínská Iniciativa. Melantrich, 1995, vol. I, p. 90 (the names of 24 survivors are listed in there).

Furthermore, there are two identical names which are phonetically similar:

For further illustration, a random sample from a very cursory research. In the “database” the following Jews transferred from Riga to Stutthof on July 19, 1944, are listed as dead and are regularly registered there:

- Goldbaum Ge[r]trude, 03/05/1900, Czech, registered as Goldbaumova Ge[r]truda: list number 684, registration number 48577; the “database” says: “Transport H from Praha, Praha Hlavni Mesto, Bohemia, Czechoslovakia to Theresienstadt, Ghetto, Czechoslovakia on 30/11/1941”. The “type of material” is a “List of Theresienstadt camp inmates” and the status is “murdered/perished” [now the status is only “murdered” <http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4851724>].

In the aforementioned register of Czech Jews deported to Theresienstadt, Ms. Goldbaum is deported to Riga on January 9, 1942 (p. 160), but isn't listed among the survivors.

- Todtenkopf Lina, 30/11/1901, Germany, registered under the same name: list number 826, registration number 48729.

The “database” cites the source “Gedenkbuch – Opfer der Verfolgung der Juden unter der nationalsozialistischen Gewaltherrschaft in Deutschland 1933–1945, Bundesarchiv (German National Archives), Koblenz 1986” (Memorial Book of the Victims of Persecution of Jews under National Socialist Tyranny in Germany 1933–1945, Federal Archive, Koblenz (German National Archives), Koblenz. 1986). Her status is: missing. The material type is: “List of murdered Jews from Germany”. [This entry has the status “murdered” <http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=11646746>.]

Todtenkopf Lina, 30/11/1901, Germany, recorded a second time; the type of material is “List of deportations from Berlin”, the source is another edition of Gedenkbuch (Gedenkbuch Berlins der jüdischen Opfer des Nationalsozialismus [sic], Freie Universität Berlin, Zentralinstitut für sozialwissenschaftliche Forschung, Edition Hentrich, Berlin 1995); the place of presumed death is “Riga,Rigas,Vidzeme,Latvia”. [This entry has status “missing” <http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4137320>.]

- Weil Mariane, 14/02/1909 is registered as Marianne Weil; list number 706, registration number 48599. [<http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=11651708>.]
- Levitan Leiba, 25.02.1932, n.d.l 292, registration number 48195, appears in “a list of Jews murdered in Klooga camp, 1941–1944”, but the Klooga massacre took place on September 19, 1944, after the prisoner had been transferred to Stutthof. [There’s no date of birth in this entry <http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=5853081>.]
- Schick, T[h]eresia, 12.08.1897, list number 1921, registration number 48924, appears in a “List of murdered Jews from Austria”, but her status is “murdered/perished”. [This entry has no birth date, the status has changed to “murdered” <http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4972967>.]

Whether these Jews have died, or have rather been executed, doesn't follow from any document.

This is a small but significant sample of the seriousness and “scientific rigor” of this “database” and of those who filled it.

Which results would a systematic and thorough study bring?

Abstract

In 2013, Italian police forces raided the homes of numerous participants of the U.S. Stormfront blog. The background of this raid was a discussion about the veracity and reliability of entries in the victims' database of the Israeli Yad Vashem Holocaust Remembrance Center, among other things. To verify these claims, Italian blogger Olodogma looked into the matter. This brief paper documents the results. They show that it is indeed ridiculously easy to submit false, invented information to the Yad Vashem database, and that there seems to be no quality control at all.

Oggi 17.03.13, 122° giorno di carcere preventivo per 4 cittadini italiani, incensurati, riportiamo il testo di una lettera dal carcere del Dr. Mirko Viola, uno dei quattro. In isolamento dal 20 Gennaio 2013! Sotto il testo della lettera.

Caro (omesso)

come le avevo già scritto l'accusa più grave che mi è stata rivolta è la seguente: “diffusione di ideologie negazioniste”, in Italia non è un reato, ma a quanto pare vengo accusato di ...leso olocausto sorvolo sulla crassa ignoranza del P.M. Tescaroli che dimostra di sapere nulla di revisionismo olocaustico (non è un'ideologia, ma un rigorosissimo metodo di ricerca storiografica), vorrei però soffermarmi sulla palese malafede di alcuni scribacchini di regime che, seguendo le orme di Marco Pasqua (il visionario nazi-buster costituitosi parte civile al processo), scrivono senza la minima vergogna tante di quelle “puttanate” da strapparmi il sorriso anche in cella.

Durante l'ultimo colloquio in carcere, mia madre – evidentemente sconvolta dalle ignobili flatulenze sul sottoscritto lette in giro per la rete – mi accusava di aver offeso gli esponenti del “popolo che piange”... ohibò...e cosa avrei mai fatto di così vergognoso da suscitare l'ira funesta dei circoncisii?? Semplice... ho inventato degli immaginari parenti gasati nei campi di sterminio polacchi...che vergogna!!!

Che scandalo!!!

Che mancanza di rispetto!!!

Come mi sono permesso di scherzare su una cosa tanto grave??

Che motivo avrei avuto per inventarmi dei morti?

Perchè mi sono permesso di prendere in giro uomini come shlomo venezia,<sup>[1]</sup> gli ebrei e tanti altri???

Evidentemente ai solerti scribacchini shammashim ( se non conoscono il significato del termine, lo chiedano ai loro padroni) sfugge il vero e solo motivo di tutto questo: sbugiardare i falsari!!! Chiunque, in pochi “step”, può costruirsi il suo “personale gasato” che entrerà nel conteggio ufficiale dei morti della shoah... basta entrare nel sito ufficiale del museo dell'olocausto Yad Vashem di Gerusalemme, compilare un modulo inventando nome, luoghi, date, dati e persino la causa della morte del nonno, dello zio o del conoscente, inviare tutto e “per magia”, dopo pochissimo tempo, arriverà nella mail indicata un bel certificato da stampare e incorniciare... ovviamente il nome del “gasato”, inventato di sana pianta, entrerà nell'elenco ufficiale dei morti... nessun “stato di famiglia” è richiesto e nessuna indagine per appurare la veridicità dei dati inseriti viene effettuata... si compila un modulo e il numero si gonfia... ecco la serietà dei ricercatori olocaustici.

Quale sarebbe la “vergogna”?

Inventare nomi per smascherare la truffa oppure inserire nell'elenco ufficiale qualsiasi dato senza alcuna verifica???

Chi prende per il culo chi?

Riguardo a Shlomo Venezia, che io avrei “offeso” durante le celebrazioni della sua morte (ovvero della sua “santificazione”), vorrei dire con molta semplicità che un bugiardo resta tale anche da morto...i ricercatori revisionisti hanno dimostrato che la “testimonianza” del Venezia è una ridicola panzana: quando la chimica, la fisica e i dati oggettivi si scontrano inesorabilmente con la “testimonianza”, sono i primi che devono prevalere e non la seconda—la patetica glorificazione mediatica di un bugiardo non rende vere le sue menzogne, se ne facciano una ragione “lorsignori”, con le cateratte del pianto costantemente aperte: non è con gli urletti isterici e con la repressione giudiziaria che le balle assumeranno i contorni della verità...e Shlomo Venezia di balle ne ha raccontate talmente tante da riempire un libro.

Gli scribacchini di regime dovrebbero rendersi conto che puntare il dito contro i revisionisti (chiamati sprezzantemente “negazionisti”) non rende giustizia a chi ha sofferto o è morto durante le deportazioni: la verità non dovrebbe temere alcuna censura o demonizzazione del pensiero differente, se i revisionisti mentono...lo si dimostri!!!

Mirko Viola

Da ciò si evince, per banale deduzione logica, che il nome "Edith Lang, nata a Roma", in data 23 luglio 2012 non fosse presente nell'elenco ufficiale, diversamente, si sarebbero poi avute, in caso di positivo inserimento, 2 o più "Edith Lang, nata a Roma" inserite. Articolo Corriere della Sera, con la "promessa" dello yad vashem

In sintesi: la "prova di inserimento" del blogger Faggot 79 di "Edith Lang, nata a Roma" è andata "a buon fine". "Edith Lang, nata a Roma" è un nuovo numero, in più, nell'elenco delle vittime nella Shoah! Una "prova" in più dei "milioni documentati dettagliatamente" come dice "Faggot79"!

Quindi l'affermazione del Dr. Viola trova conferma.

Chiunque può scaricare il modulo in quantità illimitata, compilare con dati inventati e spedire, o compilare tramite Email, NESSUNO potrà MAI verificare l'attendibilità delle informazioni.

Oggettivamente ne consegue che con questo semplice metodo si può far lievitare il numero dei morti nel cosiddetto olocausto ebraico all'infinito! In pratica, per affermazioni sterminazioniste, in 6 anni (2004 → 2010) sono stati aggiunti 1.000.000 di nomi di "vittime"! Semplice...come dire sei milioni! La Storia, quella vera, non ha bisogno di "falsi" e "falsari" improvvisati o di mestiere!

E' questo il buon motivo per lo scatenamento della violenta repressione del sistema sterminazionista contro il WEB, l'unico mezzo ancora libero dal condizionamento della israel-lobby e suoi Shabbat goyim ? Molto, molto probabilmente si!

Abstract

As shown before, the Yad Vashem database of Holocaust victims contains many double entries as well as entries of survivors. This paper shows that entire sets of victims were entered multiple times, in the present case the 52,000 Jews deported from Berlin. The data contained in the database also reveals that many Jews deported through the infamous Treblinka camp, which is said to have been a wholesale extermination camp with almost no survivors, are reported to have died "downstream" (further east). Hence, for them Treblinka merely served as a transit camp.

- We know that Yad Vashem embarked on listing the names of 6 million Jews exterminated by the Germans; currently there are 3 million names, but, as we have seen in Dubitando, n° 3, the database is a hotchpotch: you can certainly find the names of Jews who unquestionably died in the course and because of their tragic deportation, but you can also find a large number of names of Jews who died in combat, died of old age or a natural death, or even Jews who survived the deportation (such as Henri Krasucki<sup>[1]</sup>); finally, there is an incredible number of duplicates.<sup>[2]</sup> In this way, Yad Vashem has probably increased the number of Jews who died because of their deportation by a factor of 2 or 3.

- Since our last visit, Yad Vashem has uncovered and registered the names of the Berlin Jews (more than 52,000 names); however, they had previously entered the names of the German Jews which already included the names of the Berlin Jews; therefore, these 52,000 Jews have been counted at least twice in the database; those who had been deported from the Netherlands or from France (several thousands, including 500 who were from Palatinate [Pfalz] and the Land of Baden, when the evacuation of the Jews from these areas to Gurs was organized) have thus been counted up to three times and those deported to Lodz might have been counted four times; there are also (and this detail speaks volumes about the Jewish casualness with statistics) 157 Norwegian Jews who have simply been transited through Berlin; some 1250 unfortunates who chose to commit suicide rather than abandon their homes have not been forgotten, but that is understandable. Those who were deported to Theresienstadt and to destinies which we will examine later in this article, are also counted at least three times, because Yad Vashem had already registered the nearly 15,000 entries relating to this camp; nevertheless, some of them might be counted a fourth time if they were transferred through Auschwitz and died there, since Yad Vashem has additionally registered the names in the camp's Death Books once more, of which, contrary to what has been feared, they only entered the names that sound Jewish. An example other than Berlin: In Dubitando, no. 4,<sup>[3]</sup> we have seen that the father of the Paris historian Henri Minczeles, who died at Auschwitz, was listed four times in the database; he is now included a fifth time.

Of course, Yad Vashem has also entered the testimonies of the relatives of the dead, which only inflates the numbers. Thus, we have to say that the 52,000 Berlin Jews were included three times on average.

- Apropos testimonies: Yad Vashem is launching an urgent appeal because they seem to have difficulties getting beyond the 3 million “exterminated” Jews. It appears the appeal was heard by some: an Israeli woman testified in this way for 246 Dutch Jews with the designation “friend”, “close friend”, “family friend” or simply “acquaintance”; however, all of them were already included at least once in the database. This appeal to witnesses (who are the source of more than 50 % of the database entries, according to a survey) will only aggravate this inflation of numbers.

● Le Comité Français pour Yad Vashem vous rappelle par notre canal l'urgence et la nécessité, par celles et ceux qui ne l'auraient pas encore fait, de remplir les documents de témoignage concernant leur(s) famille(s) exterminée(s), ainsi que toute personne, amie(s), ami(s), voisine(s), voisin(s), dont vous vous souvenez. Les réclamer à notre siège, 39 bd Beaumarchais 75003 Paris.

The French Committee for Yad Vashem reminds you through our channel of the urgency and the need, for those of you who haven't already done so, to fill in the testimonial documents concerning your exterminated family(ies), as well as any person, girl- or boyfriend(s), neighbour(s), that you remember. Submit your claims to our headquarters. 39 Boulevard Beaumarchais, 75003 Paris.

- We can also find the names of Hungarian Jews who died in the ranks of the labor battalions of the Hungarian army among the new database entries and one may wonder if it is normal to count them as “exterminated.”

- We have also seen it was a myth that the database contained evidence of gassings at Auschwitz. Thus, the children of the ghetto Lodz who were allegedly gassed at Auschwitz were found alive after the war: they were only transported through Auschwitz.

But we can also find evidence that the gassing of Jews at Treblinka is another myth.

Historians claim that almost all Jews deported to Treblinka were gassed, because there was no selection between those able to work and the unfit as at Auschwitz; the SS spared only the lives of a few to help them with their sinister work and then killed them at the end of the operation of the camp.

Among the transports that were processed in this way, there were the transports from Theresienstadt; in this Czech village the Germans had ghettoized a large number of old Jews from various origins (German, Austrian, etc.); the provisional Jewish policy of the Germans was then to move the Jews “farther east” until they were able to relocate them permanently outside Europe (to Madagascar, for example) and they had deported a large number of them to the Ukraine, Belarus and the Baltic countries via Auschwitz, Sobibor, Belzec and Treblinka. Thus, 10 convoys finally left Theresienstadt for Treblinka in 1942. In one of them was Siegmund Rothstein from Berlin, whose name is found in the Yad Vashem database.

- First, let me say that the name of this deportee from Berlin is entered three times in the database, for the reasons explained above.
- But still more interesting is the journey taken by this deportee that is described in the database. Rothstein, born in 1867, was 75 years of age when he was deported from Berlin to Theresienstadt in August 1942, which means that he could only be deemed unfit for work and therefore, according to official historiography, had to be sent to the gas chamber; in this case, why was he sent to Theresienstadt? This is one of the many mysteries of the Holocaust religion, but let's move on. From there, he was deported again to Treblinka on September 26, 1942 (transport Br), where, according to the historians, he was gassed at arrival. The editors of the Czech entry consequently go no further: for them, Rothstein died at Treblinka,

<http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4911011>

However, when the German entry mentions the death of Rothstein, it places it much further east, in Belarus—to be precise, in Minsk!

<http://yvng.yadvashem.org/nameDetails.html?itemId=4129032>

As already mentioned, S. Rothstein is in fact no special case: many Berliners (in addition to elderly Jews from other parts of Germany) were deported to Theresienstadt and then from there to Treblinka, but for the German authorities none of those unable to work died at Treblinka and all of those who didn't return died in Minsk or elsewhere.

The deportation of S. Rothstein (and many others); in dashed lines, the segment hidden by historians.

It is impossible not to see the evidence that those unable to work who were sent to Treblinka weren't gassed but sent further east to Belarus (where, incidentally, many transports of Jews arrived directly from Germany and Austria, even from Theresienstadt).

The work carried out at great expense at Yad Vashem and celebrated by some media organizations to the sound of the shofar is therefore surprisingly counterproductive because the consultation of this database allows any man of common sense to conclude that:

- the number of 6 million dead Jews due to deportations is a myth and even an outright lie;[\[4\]](#)
- the gassing of Jews at Auschwitz and Treblinka is another myth. Hence the need for liberticidal laws.

Notes

[1]	Or Henri Bulawko or Simone Veil, who have told us the same, but their names (and that of Madeleine, sister of Simone, also a survivor) have just been withdrawn from the database. However, the names of the majority of the survivors from France are still there.
[2]	Dead deportees are often listed several times, like the unfortunate parents and the brother of Simone Veil (included twice), the father of Robert Badinter (included twice), the father of Serge Klarsfeld (included three times), the father of Henri Minczeles (included five times), etc.
[3]	Jean-Marie Boisdefeu, Dubitando: Textes révisionnistes (2004–2008) , La Sfinge, Rome, 2009, chapter XV, pp. 79–80, notes: Note that Szepel Minczles is included 4 times in the Yad Vashem database of the dead (based on the following sources: Mémorial by S. Klarsfeld / testimony of his son Roger in 1978 / testimony of his son Henri in 1978 / second testimony of the same Henri in 1999).
[4]	Note that the average number now held by historians is 5 millions; hence, it would be necessary to stop quoting the 6 million figure.

- On sait que le Yad Vashem a entrepris de répertorier les noms de 6 millions de Juifs exterminés par les Allemands; il en est actuellement à 3 millions mais, comme nous l'avons vu dans Dubitando, n° 3, sa banque de données est un fourre-tout: certes, on y trouve les noms de Juifs incontestablement morts au cours et du fait de cette tragique déportation mais on y trouve aussi un grand nombre de noms de Juifs morts au combat, morts de vieillesse ou de mort naturelle, voire de Juifs ayant survécu à la déportation (comme Henri Krasucki[1]) ; enfin, on y trouve un nombre incroyable de doublons.[2] De la sorte, le Yad Vashem a probablement multiplié par 2 voire 3 le nombre de Juifs morts du fait de la déportation.

- Depuis notre dernière visite, le Yad Vashem a dépouillé et encodé le mémorial des Juifs berlinois (plus de 52000 noms); or, il avait déjà encodé le mémorial des Juifs allemands, lequel reprenait déjà les noms des Juifs berlinois; dès lors, ces 52000 Juifs viennent d'être comptés une nouvelle fois dans la banque; ceux qui, parmi eux, ont été déportés par la Hollande ou la France (plusieurs milliers dont 500 qui se trouvaient dans le Palatinat et le Pays de Bade quand fut organisée l'évacuation des Juifs de ces régions à Gurs) sont donc comptés au moins trois fois et ceux qui ont été déportés à Lodz peuvent même être comptés quatre fois; y figurent aussi (et ce détail en dit long sur la désinvolture juive en matière de statistiques) 157 Juifs norvégiens ayant simplement transité par Berlin; les quelque 1250 malheureux qui ont choisi de se suicider plutôt que d'abandonner leur foyer n'ont pas été oubliés mais cela peut se comprendre. Ceux qui ont été déportés à Theresienstadt et au destin desquels nous allons nous intéresser dans la suite de cet article sont eux aussi comptés au moins trois fois puisque le Yad Vashem avait déjà encodé le mémorial de ce camp: ils sont près de 15000; toutefois, certains d'entre eux peuvent être comptés une quatrième fois s'ils ont été transférés à Auschwitz et y sont morts car le Yad Vashem vient également d'encoder les noms trouvés dans les registres mortuaires de ce camp encore que, contrairement à ce qui était à craindre, il n'ait encodé que les noms ayant une consonance juive. Un exemple en dehors des Berlinoises: dans Dubitando, no. 4,[3] nous avons vu que le père de l'historien parisien Henri Minczeles, mort à Auschwitz, était repris quatre fois dans la banque; il est désormais repris une cinquième fois.

Bien entendu, le Yad Vashem a parallèlement encodé les témoignages de proches des disparus, ce qui ne fait que gonfler la statistique. Dès lors, on doit pouvoir affirmer que les 52000 Juifs berlinois sont en moyenne repris trois fois.

- À propos de témoignages, le Yad Vashem lance un appel urgent car il semble avoir du mal à dépasser les 3 millions d' « exterminés » ; l'appel semble entendu par certains: ainsi une israélienne vient-elle de témoigner pour 246 Juifs hollandais au titre de « friend », « close friend », « family friend » ou simple « acquaintance » ; toutefois, tous étaient déjà repris au moins une fois dans la banque. Cet appel à témoins (lesquels, selon un sondage, sont à l'origine de plus de 50 % des entrées de la banque) ne pourra qu'aggraver cette inflation.

Le Comité Français pour Yad Vashem vous rappelle par notre canal l'urgence de la nécessité, par celles et ceux qui ne l'auraient pas encore fait, de remplir les documents de témoignage concernant leur(s) famille(s) exterminée(s), ainsi que toute personne, amie(s), ami(s), voisine(s), voisin(s), dont vous vous souvenez. Les réclamer à notre siège. 39 bd Beaumarchais 75003 Paris.

- On trouve également parmi les nouveaux encodages dans la banque les noms de Juifs hongrois morts dans les rangs des bataillons du travail de l'armée hongroise et on peut se demander s'il est normal de les compter comme « exterminés ».

- Nous avons vu aussi que la banque contenait la preuve de ce que le gazage des Juifs à Auschwitz était un mythe. Ainsi, des enfants du ghetto de Lodz prétendument gazés à Auschwitz ont été retrouvés vivants après la guerre: ils n'avaient fait que transiter par Auschwitz.

Mais on y trouve aussi la preuve de ce que le gazage des Juifs à Treblinka est un autre mythe.

Les historiens affirment que les Juifs déportés à Treblinka étaient gazés dans leur quasi-totalité car on n'y pratiquait pas la sélection comme à Auschwitz entre les aptes au travail et les inaptes; les SS en épargnaient juste l'un ou l'autre pour les aider dans leur sinistre travail puis ils les éliminaient en fin d'opération.

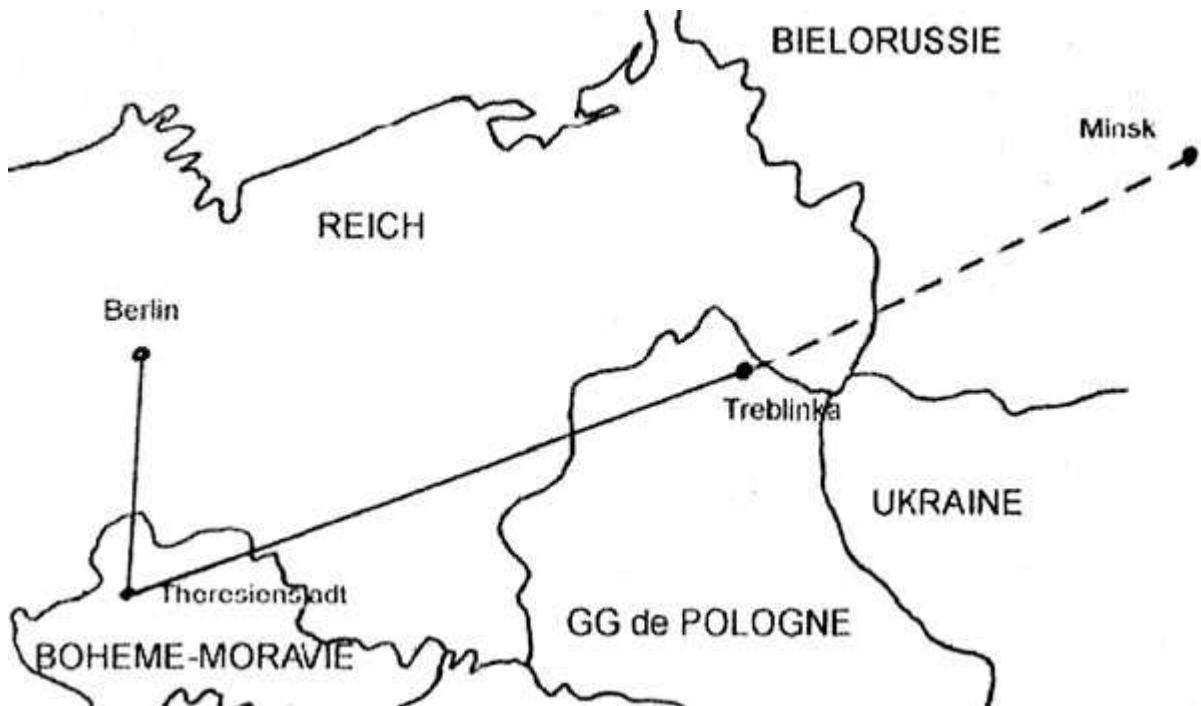

Parmi les convois traités de la sorte, les convois venus de Theresienstadt; les Allemands avaient ghettoisé dans cette ville tchèque un grand nombre de Juifs âgés d'origines diverses (Allemagne, Autriche, etc.) ; puis, la politique juive provisoire des Allemands étant d'éloigner les Juifs « plus loin dans l'Est » en attendant de pouvoir les réimplanter définitivement hors d'Europe (par exemple à Madagascar), ils en avaient redéporté un grand nombre en Ukraine, en Biélorussie et dans les pays baltes via Auschwitz, Sobibor, Belzec et Treblinka. C'est ainsi qu'enfin 1942 10 convois sont partis de Theresienstadt pour Treblinka. Dans l'un d'eux, le Berlinois Siegmund Rothstein dont on retrouve le nom dans la banque du Yad Vashem.

- Pour commencer, disons que, pour les raisons exposées plus haut, le nom de ce déporté berlinois est repris trois fois dans la banque.
- Mais plus intéressant encore est le parcours effectué par ce déporté et décrit par la banque. Rothstein, né en 1867, avait 75 ans quand il fut déporté de Berlin à Theresienstadt en août 1942, ce qui signifie qu'il ne pouvait qu'être jugé inapte au travail et donc, selon l'histoire officielle, envoyé à la chambre à gaz; dans ce cas, pourquoi l'avoir envoyé à Theresienstadt? C'est là un des nombreux mystères de la religion de la Shoah mais passons. De là, il fut redéporté le 26 septembre 1942 à Treblinka (convoi Br) où, selon les historiens, il fut gazé dès son arrivée. Les rédacteurs du mémorial tchèque ne vont donc pas plus loin: pour eux, aussi, Rothstein est mort à Treblinka.

Or, si le mémorial allemand fait également état de la mort de Rothstein, il la situe beaucoup plus à l'est de Treblinka, en Biélorussie, très précisément à Minsk!

En fait et ainsi que nous l'avons dit, S. Rothstein n'est pas un cas à part: de nombreux Berlinois (en plus de Juifs âgés venus d'autres coins d'Allemagne) furent déportés à Theresienstadt puis, de là, à Treblinka mais, pour les autorités allemandes, aucun de ces inaptés n'est mort à Treblinka et tous ceux qui ne sont pas revenus sont morts à Minsk ou ailleurs.

La déportation de S. Rothstein (et de beaucoup d'autres) ; en pointillés, le tronçon escamoté par les historiens.

Comment ne pas y voir la preuve de ce que les inaptés envoyés à Treblinka n'y étaient pas gazés mais ne faisaient qu'y transiter pour être envoyés plus loin à l'est en Biélorussie (où, d'ailleurs, de nombreux convois de Juifs arrivèrent directement d'Allemagne et d'Autriche, voire de Theresienstadt).

Le travail effectué à grands frais par le Yad Vashem et célébré au son du shofar par certains médias est donc étonnamment contreproductif car la consultation de sa banque permet à tout homme de bon sens de conclure que:

- le chiffre de 6 millions de morts juifs du fait de la déportation est un mythe et même un mensonge grossier ;[\[4\]](#)
- le gazage des Juifs à Auschwitz et à Treblinka est un autre mythe. D'où la nécessité de lois liberticides.

How to Increase the Number of Deaths in the Holocaust

by Olodogma

Abstract

In 2013, Italian police forces raided the homes of numerous participants of the U.S. Stormfront blog. The background of this raid was a discussion about the veracity and reliability of entries in the victims' database of the Israeli Yad Vashem Holocaust Remembrance Center, among other things. To verify these claims, Italian blogger Olodogma looked into the matter. This brief paper documents the results. They show that it is indeed ridiculously easy to submit false, invented information to the Yad Vashem database, and that there seems to be no quality control at all.

Today, 17.03.13, was the 122nd day of preventive incarceration for 4 Italian citizens, first offenders. The following is the text of a letter from the prison by Dr. Mirko Viola, one of the four. In solitary confinement since 20 January 2013! This is the text of the letter.

Dear (omitted)

As I told you before, the most serious accusation against me is the following: "Dissemination of negationist ideologies"; this isn't a crime in Italy, but as far as anyone can tell, I stand accused of... "lèse Holocaust". I'll gloss over P.M. Tescaroli's crass ignorance; he seems to know nothing about Holocaust revisionism (it's not an ideology, but an extremely strict method of historical research), I would, however, like to dwell on the obvious bad faith of a few system hacks who, following in the footprints of Marco Pasqua (the Nazi-busting visionary who joined a civil action as part of the trial), write so many totally stupid things without the slightest shame, that they make me smile, even in my cell.

During our last talk during a prison visit, my mother – obviously upset by the vile hallucinations written about Yours Truly -- things that I've read here and there or "heard through the grapevine" – accused me of offending the members of the "crybaby nation" ...tsk! tsk!... and what sort of things could I ever have done that were so shameful as to arouse the sinister wrath of the circumcised??

Easy... I invented imaginary relatives gassed in the extermination camps in Poland... what a disgrace!!!

What a scandal!!!

What a lack of respect!!!

How can I have permitted myself to joke about something so serious??

What reason could I have had to invent dead people?

Why did I permit myself to poke fun at men like Shlomo Venezia,<sup>[1]</sup> the Jews and so many others???

Obviously, the ever-so-clever hacks and shammashim (I don't know what that word means, ask them) have not twigged to the true and sole reason for all this: exposing the fakers!!! The fact is, that anyone can build himself his own "personal gassing victim" in just a few steps! This "victim" will then be included in the "official count" of "Shoah victims"... all you need to do is access the official site of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem, fill out a form, invent the names, dates, data and even cause of death of some [imaginary] grandfather, uncle or acquaintance, send it in, and – presto! – after a very short while, you'll receive a beautiful certificate by post, to be printed out and framed... and, obviously, the name of the "gassing victim" (which you've just invented out of whole cloth, from A to Z, will be included in the official list of victims... no marital/family status is required, and there is no inquiry as to the veracity of the data you supply... you fill out a form and – presto! – the number swells like a balloon... this is the level of seriousness of the Holocaust researchers.

What's so shameful about all this?

Which is more shameful? Inventing names to unmask a fraud, or inserting data in an "official list" without any verification???

Who's screwing whom?

I look at Shlomo Venezia, whom I am supposed to have "offended" during the celebration of his death (or, rather, his "beatification"), and I'd like to say, very simply: a liar is still a liar, even if he's dead... revisionist researchers have shown that Venezia's "testimony" is a ridiculous heap of falsehoods: when chemistry, physics, and objective data inexorably collide with the "testimony", it's the first that should prevail, not the second – the pathetic media glorification of a liar does not make his lies true – not even his lies, unless one believes in a "slave mentality truth", with its round-the-clock cataract of mourning: hysterical howls and legal repression won't make obvious yarns and fibs assume the outlines of the truth... and Shlomo Venezia has told enough yarns to fill a book.

System hacks should take time to think that pointing the finger at the revisionists (contemptuously referred to as "Negationists") does not do justice to those who suffered or died during the deportations: the truth should never fear censorship or demonization as dissentient thought. If the revisionists are lying... prove it!!!

Faithfully yours,

Mirko Viola

Today, Nov. 16, 2013, the second half of the match is still being played out: 35 Italian citizens have been house-searched – the persons "processed" in this first "Sonderaktion" were 21. These actions of the repression [i.e., police] against 56 Italian citizens were taken merely because they made use of their freedom of expression on an American forum. The following is an article which reveals what is – to us – the real reason why the Jewish lobby decided to push the panic button and try to terrify these citizens into silence. They screwed up the mechanism which served the settlers of the Palestine Ghetto and its subsidiaries to inflate the number of "Jews" allegedly gassed/shot according to the S.H.F. (Standard Holocaust Fabulation). Author is Dr. Mirko Viola, who is still detained on his 299th day in prison! Dr. Viola speaks of an "upsurge" in death statistics used by the Jews from the Zionist entity of Palestine, let's take a more detailed look at what's involved:

The article, first published in Italy, did not appear to have aroused any interest or created any problems. The text was then posted on the American Internet site Stormfront, in the Italian section. This time, it did not pass unnoticed by the "Chosen", who seem to think they are "God & Co."...

Dr. Mirko Viola wrote as follows from the prison where he had to be imprisoned for the crime of "damaging Holocaust & Memory Inc."...

“Obviously, the ever-so-smart shammashim hacks (if you don't know what that means, ask your boss) are unable to perceive the real reason for all this: exposing the liars and fakers!!! Anyone can construct his own personal 'gassing victim', which will then be duly included in the official figure of 'deaths during the Shoah'... all you have to do is access the official site of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem, fill out a form, invent the names, places, dates and even the cause of death, of your grandfather, uncle or an acquaintance, ad libitum, and send it off; after a very little while, as if by magic, you'll get a lovely certificate by post which you can print out and have framed... obviously, the name of the 'gassing victim' – which is completely made up – will be included in the official list of Holocaust victims... no family/marital status is required and no inquiry will be made to verify the veracity of the data you supply...if you fill out the form, the number gets blown up like a balloon...this is the seriousness of Holocaust researchers.”...

On 17 July 2012, Dr. Viola wrote the following, which was posted on pontilex.org, in which he announced, in the spirit of one who feels he has been taken for a fool, the existence of the famous form:

 Dichiarazione blogger

Declaration of Dr. Viola, in his persona as "The Blogger"

At this point, on 23 July 2012, another blogger, a regular contributor to the site, known as "Faggot79", posted the following truly traumatic statement:

Declaration of blogger Faggot79

Faggot79, a rational person, but clearly suffering from the pangs of doubt – oh, ye of little faith – attempted to verify Dr. Viola's staggering claim: he therefore took the initiative and inserted a new post "justifying" Dr. Viola's actions::

Subsequent post by Faggot79

This shows, by a process of commonplace logical deduction, that the name “Edith Lang, born in Rome”, dated 23 July 2012 was not included in the official list; otherwise, if she were really included in the list, but if there were 2 or more “Edith Lang(s), born in Rome”, and they would both be included. For additional proof, we reproduce a screenshot of the Yad Vashem website page:

 Lo screenshot dell'elenco attuale, è presente una sola Edith Lang.

Screenshot of the current list, showing not one single Edith Lang.

A check performed in October 2012 shows that “Edith Lang, born in Rome” resulted in the following: not present.

A check performed on 18-04-2013, searching for “Edith Lang, born in Rome” resulted in the following: present!

At this point, there is a need to file an additional bit of "official" information taken from the Corriere della sera dated 22-11-2004 where it says it has... "a promise that the data will be checked and entered into the database"...

Article, Corriere della Sera, with “promise” from the Yad Vashem

To sum up: Blogger Faggot79's "proof" that “Edith Lang, born in Rome” was “included” has been "successful". “Edith Lang, born in Rome” is a new number, added to the list of "Shoah victims"! One more “proof” of the “millions of victims documented in detail”, according to “Faggot79”!

Ergo, Dr. Viola's quid est probandum stands confirmed.

Anyone can download limited numbers of the same form, fill it out with invented data and send it off by post – or e-mail, if you prefer; NO ONE will EVER verify the reliability of your information!

Objectively, it follows that with this simple method one can levitate the numbers of Holocaust victims to infinity! In practice, for the purposes of Hoaxoco$t propaganda, they've added 1,000,000 "victims' names" in 6 years (2004 → 2010)! Easy-peasy... why not Six Million? History, real history, has no need of "fakes" and "forgeries", whether improvised or professional!

Is this the real reason for the unleashing of the "dogs of violent repression" by the Exterminationist system against the web, the sole means still free from "Jewish-Lobby" mind-control and conditioning and that of their Shabbat goyim? Very, very probably, yes!

Kula's Columns Revisited | CODOH

by Germar Rudolf

Abstract

Since 2000 at the latest, the former Polish Auschwitz inmate Michał Kula has been quoted by mainstream Holocaust historians as the key witness describing how exactly Zyklon B was introduced in the homicidal gas chambers claimed to have existed in Crematoria II and III located in the Auschwitz-Birkenau Camp. This paper analyzes several of Kula's postwar statements in this regard in order to accurately recreate what Kula described, to assess whether his claims are even technically feasible, and whether Kula's statements about other aspects are historically accurate. It is demonstrated that Kula's claims are untrue in many regards, that he has changed his story repeatedly, and that his claims are technically nonsensical.

In 2002, during David Irving's "Real History" Conference in Cincinnati, the late Dr. Robert Countess presented a physical representation of "Kula's Kolumns," as he called them.<sup>[1]</sup> Since the year 2000, these columns have been at the center of a controversy about how exactly the insecticide Zyklon B is supposed to have been introduced into the Morgues #1 of Crematoria II and III at Auschwitz, where, the orthodox Auschwitz narrative has it, up to 400,000 human beings are said to have been poisoned to death. These morgues are sometimes referred to as "the absolute center of human suffering," so when preparing the upcoming new edition of my expert report, I considered it important to shed some more light onto these devices.

Illustration 1: Dr. Countess unloads his "Kula Kolumn" at the Cincinnati conference building in summer of 2002, with Charles Provan inspecting it.

The Auschwitz orthodoxy claims that four holes had been chiseled through the roof of the morgues in question. While some witnesses have claimed that the Zyklon B was simply dumped through those holes, others have claimed that some more-or-less-sophisticated devices were installed beneath those holes.

The most-prominent proponent of this hypothesis is Dutch historian of architecture Dr. Robert van Pelt, who in his book about Auschwitz published several construction drawings of these devices he himself had prepared.<sup>[2]</sup> Inspired by this, Dr. Countess built a model which he presented at the above-mentioned conference, see Illustrations 1f.

Illustration 2: Dr. Countess sets up his “Kula Kolumn” in the conference room in Cincinnati, summer 2002.

The issue was rekindled last year when a life-size model of the “Kula Kolumn,” built following van Pelt’s drawings, was exhibited at the Venice Biennale, an international exhibition on architecture. It featured prominently in an article in the New York Times about that exhibition,<sup>[3]</sup> including a photo of the device, see Illustration 3.

Illustration 3: A Kula column freely interpreted by Robert van Pelt, exhibited at the Venice Architecture Biennale in 2016 (photo by Gianni Cipriano).

Van Pelt wasn't the first to prepare construction drawings of these columns. That honor goes to the late French historian Jean-Claude Pressac, who had published his own drawings in his 1989 opus magnum.<sup>[4]</sup> Both authors have based their drawings on a postwar testimony by Michał Kula – hence the name of the columns. Kula was a Polish Auschwitz inmate who testified shortly after the war a number of times about what he claimed to have experienced at Auschwitz.

In addition to Kula's statements, there are, to my knowledge, seven other witnesses claiming such columns: M. Nyszli, C.S. Bendel, F. Müller and J. Erber, as well as W. Lutecki, W. Girska and K. Gracz.<sup>[5]</sup> Müller's and Erber's descriptions stem from the late 1970s/early 1980s, while Bendel's, Nyszli's, Lutecki's and Girska's descriptions are very superficial. Gracz's description is a little more-detailed and resembles Kula's first description. Kula, however, is the one witness who described the columns early and in great detail, so I will focus on him here.

As far as I know, Kula testified at least three times after the war, first during the pre-trial investigations leading up to the show trial against former Auschwitz commandant Rudolf Höss, then during the trial itself, and finally during the trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison. Pressac and van Pelt merely considered Kula's first testimony. However, in order to assess the accuracy of his testimony and his trustworthiness as a truthful witness, all of his testimonies need to be considered.

During his first deposition, Kula gave a very detailed description of these columns, so detailed, in fact, that he must have been involved in the columns' manufacture, if they existed in the first place. Here is Kula's statement from his deposition made prior to the trial against the former Auschwitz commandant Rudolf Höss:[6]

“Among other things, the fake showers intended for the gas chambers and the wire-mesh columns to pour the contents of the Zyklon cans into the gas chambers were manufactured in the metal workshop. This column was about 3 meters high, with a square section of about 70 cm [wide]. This column was composed of three mesh works inserted one inside the other. The outer screen was made from wire three millimeters thick, fastened to angle irons of 50 by 10 millimeters. Such corner posts were on each corner of the column and were connected at the top and the bottom by an angle iron of the same type. The openings of the wire mesh were 45 millimeters in square. The second screen was made in the same manner, and constructed within the first column [screen] at a distance of 150 millimeters from the first. The openings of this wire mesh were some 25 millimeters in square. In the corners these screens were connected to each other by iron struts. The third part of this column could be moved. It was an empty column of thin galvanized sheet metal with a square cross-section of about 150 mm, which ended in the upper part with a cone and below with a flat square base. At a distance of some 25 millimeters, thin sheet metal corners were welded to the corners of this column supported by sheet-metal brackets. On these corners was mounted a thin mesh with openings of about one millimeter in square. This mesh ended at the bottom of the cone, and from there, extending the meshwork, ran a sheet-metal casing for the entire height up to the top of the cone. The content of a Zyklon can was poured from above in the distributor cone, which allowed for an equal distribution of the Zyklon to all four sides of the column. After the evaporation of the gas, the entire central column was extracted and the evaporated [depleted] silica [carrier] removed.”

It doesn't cast a favorable light on Kula's credibility that the showers were actually real, as Mattogno has demonstrated abundantly.[7]

Kula was working in the inmate metalworking shop at Auschwitz, about whose activities a vast number of documents survived the war. No document about the creation of columns as described by Kula is among them, though. In fact, there is neither any material nor documentary evidence that these columns ever existed.[8] Kula himself must have anticipated this objection, because in the same testimony he claimed that work done for the crematoria were not registered presumably due to their alleged secret, criminal auspices. This, too, is untrue, as there is an abundance of work orders for items needed for the crematoria.[9]

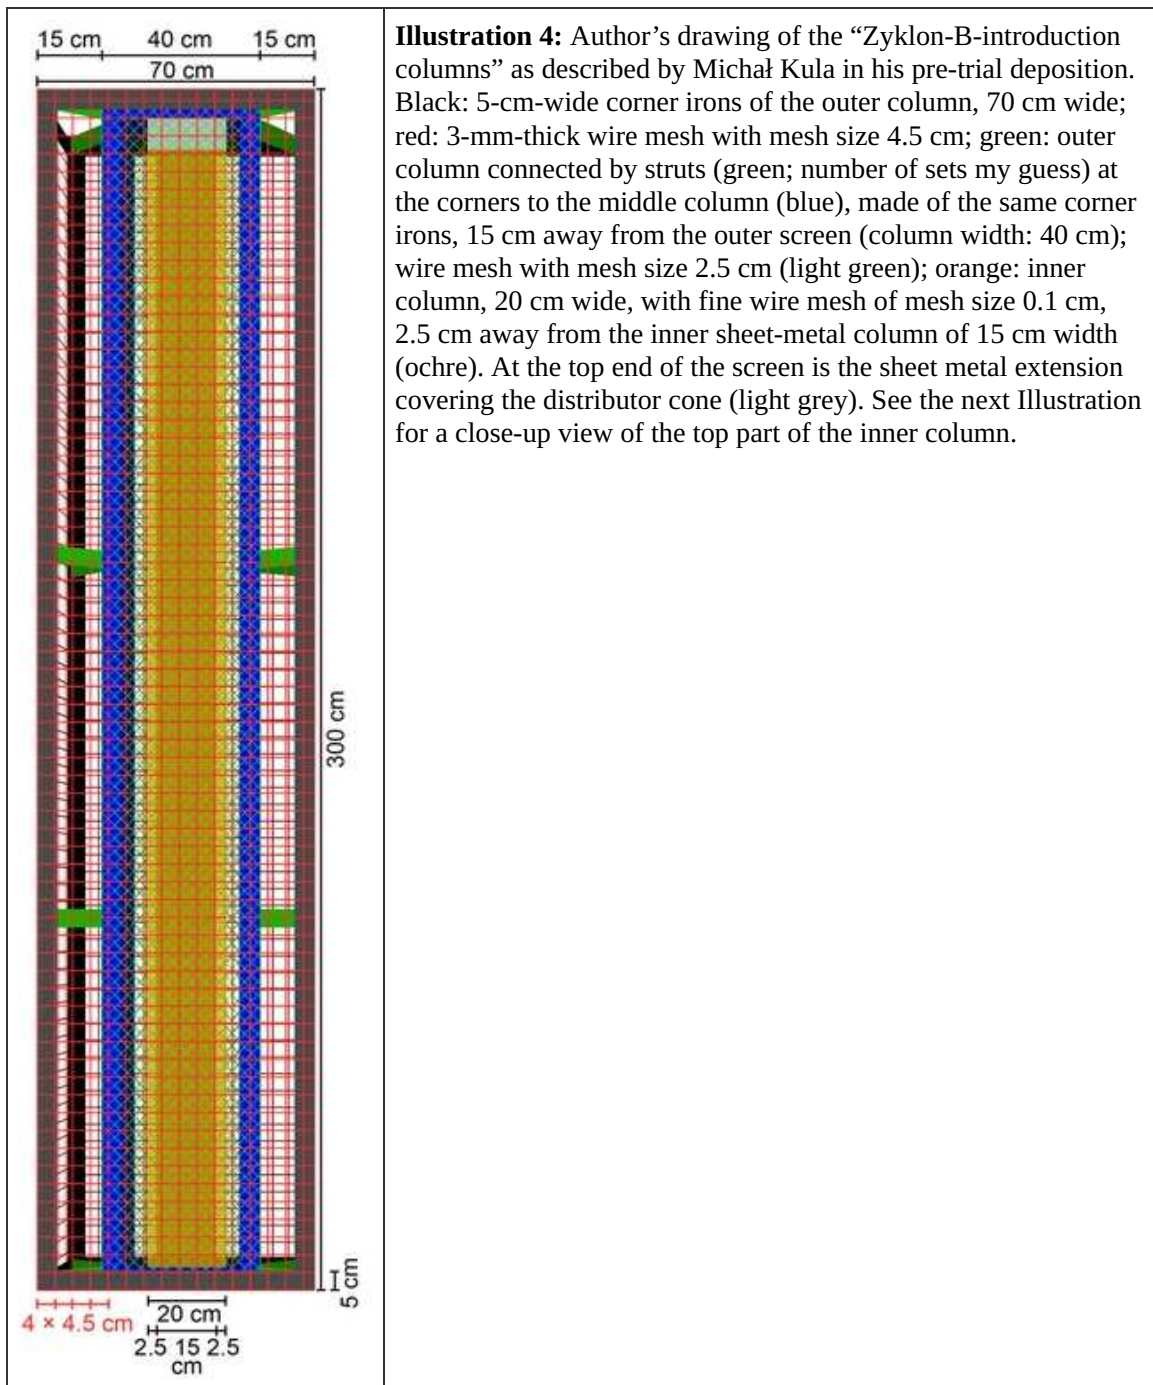

Now to Kula's next testimony. During the Höss Trial itself, he testified on the 5th day of that trial, where he stated the following:[10]

“On Höss's order, the gassing columns that were used for the gassing were made by the metalworking shop. The columns were 2 meters and a half high, the inner space 150 square mm in diameter, the following [layer[11]] at a distance of 30 mm, the third 15 mm away. The wire mesh used was like those used for windows, green in color; between the wire mesh and the sheet metal there was a distance of 15 mm. All this was about 1 meter and a half tall. At the mouth of this network was a so-called distribution cone. 7 pieces of these columns were made. The columns were installed in the gas chamber right next to the opening through which the can of gas was thrown in. This column was installed beneath this opening, the gas was poured directly onto the distribution cone. The cone was to uniformly distribute the gas into these four slots of 15 mm between the sheet metal and the netting, since that increased the gas-evaporation surface. That way the victims could be killed more rapidly. [Question:] What did such a gas chamber look like? In one crematorium, it was calculated for 2,500 men, in the other, smaller one [gas chamber] in the same crematorium for 1,500. The workers of the metalworking shop, inmates, had built this chamber. The chamber was higher than 2 meters, at the top were closed rectangular channels; these were the air-extraction openings through which fans expelled the gas. Zyklon is lighter than air; hence it dissipates quickly after the gassing. Makeshift [fake] showers were made so that the whole thing looked like a bath. Lamps were lit, the concrete floor was always wet. After a homicidal gassing, inmates of the Sonderkommando cleaned the concrete [floor]. These were Jewish inmates who were assigned to doing that work. Every three months, the Sonderkommando was exterminated, gassed, yet not at Auschwitz, but somewhere in the vicinity of Gleiwitz instead. The leader of this unit was Hauptscharführer Moll, [...]”

This passage is riddled with untrue statements.

1. As just mentioned, the showers and thus the bathing facilities were real.
2. The claimed capacity of 2,500 men for the alleged homicidal gas chamber, which has a surface area of some 200 m<sup>2</sup>, is physically impossible (see Paragraph 7.3.2.1.1. in my expert report for details).
3. There were not two gas chambers of different sizes in that crematorium, but allegedly only one (Morgue #1).
4. The inmates of the metalworking shop had nothing to do with the construction of the crematoria, of which the gas chambers are said to have been integral parts. These inmates merely provided numerous iron fittings.
5. Even according to the orthodox narrative, nobody was ever gassed “in the vicinity of Gleiwitz.”

Since Kula was not a member of the Sonderkommando, one wonders what the source of his “knowledge” about the gas chambers and their operation is anyway. It probably is mere hearsay or rumor “knowledge,” which indicates that Kula’s testimony has been “cross-pollinated” by other witnesses.

Most important is, however, that he completely changed the dimensions of the Zyklon-B-introduction columns. That should be the first-hand, reliable and thus immutable aspect of his testimony. According to his first, pre-trial deposition, the column was 3 meters high, which he changed to 2.50 meters during the trial. While the inner core measures 150 mm wide in both testimonies, the column described in his testimony during the trial was only (15+30+150+30+15=) 240 mm wide in total, compared to the 700 mm of his pre-trial statement. These are obviously two entirely different objects he is describing. While one can confuse 3 m with 2.5 m, confusing 70 cm with 24 cm is not likely. Hence Kula has adjusted his statement. I’ll get to the probable reason for this later.

Illustration 5: Schematic drawing of the top part of the innermost column of the introduction device initially described by Kula. The width of the sheet-metal corners (green) and the height of the “distributor cone” and hence also of the sheet-metal extensions reaching to the height of the cone’s top are my assumptions.

To fully assess the reliability of Kula as a witness, it is worthwhile to also consider his last testimony known to me, which he gave during the trial against the Auschwitz camp garrison a few months after the Höss Trial. During that testimony, he did not mention the columns at all. But among other things, he stated the following:[\[12\]](#)

“Then they began to build gigantic crematoria. They were set up so that the victims could not understand where they were taken. Each crematorium had two gas chambers, one for 1,500 and one for 2,000 people. There was a special concrete ski-jump [skocznie, meaning chute] on which the people were thrown from the truck, [whose loadbed] tipped automatically, and in this way the people were falling into the gas chambers.”

This is a unique testimony, indeed. Although I do have words to characterize it, I will refrain from using them here. Evidently, with each opportunity to tell his tales, Kula’s claims became increasingly erratic.

Since his first description of the introduction column is more-detailed and was made earlier, orthodox scholars have relied on it. As mentioned before, both Pressac and van Pelt have prepared drawings of these columns based on Kula’s initial description. Neither of them is without flaws. For instance, Pressac got the dimensions of the inner column wrong and changed its design, while van Pelt’s translation of Kula’s testimony is erroneous, and though the data supplied in Kula’s testimony is rather meager, van Pelt uses it to make five different, very-detailed drawings – some of it necessarily based on his own conjecture. In order to get a more-realistic depiction of what Kula described in his first testimony, I created my own drawings, see Illustrations 4f. I have added only those features in them that Kula specifically mentioned. For instance, Kula did not say anything about any cross-bracing of the column, which would have been indispensable to make the device sturdy enough to withstand a panicking crowd.

Van Pelt recognized this deficiency; hence the model created based upon his drawing as exhibited during the 2016 Venice Biennale (see Illustration 3) shows tacit “corrections” to Kula’s claims: van Pelt's column has cross braces dividing the column into three sections of roughly equal height. To reinforce the device further, van Pelt's model also has much thicker wires on the outer layer – some 8 mm rather than the meager 3 mm claimed by Kula. In addition, van Pelt has reduced the width of the center column from the 40 cm claimed by Kula to some 30 cm. In fact, he should have reduced it even further than that, for the innermost, removable column with a claimed width of 20 cm needed a guide so it would not get accidentally stuck with one of its corners in the wire mesh of the middle column when accidentally lowered slightly tilted. The angle irons forming the corners of the middle column actually could have had no other purpose than to function as guide rails for the inner column when moving in and out. The middle column's wire mesh was utterly superfluous and a waste. However, Kula claimed that the middle column was 40 cm wide, while the innermost was 20 cm wide. Hence it was a total mismatch. The situation is different for Kula's second description, which has an equal clearance between each layer of just 15 mm.

Van Pelt also reduced the height of the outer column to considerably less than 3 meters as initially claimed by Kula. The reason for that is probably because there are no holes in the roof of the morgue in question measuring 70 cm × 70 cm into which Kula's columns could have fit. The largest hole in that roof was only 50 cm wide in 1991, to which I will get further below. Hence van Pelt simply let the outer layer of his column end at the morgue's ceiling and let only the smaller middle column protrude through the roof. This lack of holes of the required size proves categorically that Kula's initially described columns cannot have been installed. That may also be the reason why Kula reduced the height down to 2.50 m in his testimony during the trial (although the ceiling in that room was only 2.40 m high).

Illustration 6 illustrates the issues involved. The green rectangle depicts Kula's column, first design, with a huge, gaping hole needed to install it. The red, tilted rectangle shows a column of 2.40 m in height and 70 cm wide, as posited by van Pelt. Since it would have been impossible to carry it in one piece into that room and install it, it would have been necessary to assemble it from its components right on the spot. The yellow rectangle depicts Kula's middle column, 40 cm wide, which could have been inserted through a hole of that size.

Illustration 6: Cross section through Morgue #1 of Crematories II and III (Pressac 1989, p. 329). Green: column according to Kula – theoretically installable from the top only, but too short and too wide; yellow: middle column according to van Pelt – installable from the top, but also too short; red: outer column according to van Pelt, which had to be assembled on-site from its components.

At 3 m high, these columns were therefore either too tall or not tall enough, because the combined height of the room, the roof's thickness and the layer of soil on top of this roof was 3.10 m.<sup>[13]</sup> Hence, in order to let an introduction column protrude sufficiently from the soil, it had to be considerably longer than that (3.50 m and more).

In other words: Kula's columns, first design, would have been way too long to fit into the room, too short to stick out of the soil, and too wide to fit through any hole in that roof. Someone must have figured that out, because when testifying in court several months later, Kula's column had shrunk to almost a fitting height and to a slender width of almost a third of Kula's first design.

It goes without saying that these columns, if they existed, had to be securely anchored into the concrete of the ceiling and floor with a hoop iron in order to prevent the panicking crowd inside from trampling them down. This can be illustrated for the hole shown in Illustration 8. Van Pelt and Keren et al.<sup>[14]</sup> posit that this was the northern-most introduction hole into which Kula's columns were mounted. In his version of Kula's column, van Pelt even added the bolts with which the outer part of the column would have been anchored into the ceiling, see Illustration 7.

Illustration 7: Anchoring bolts in Kula's column according to van Pelt. Section enlargement of Illustration 3.

Illustration 8 shows a top view of this hole as it looked in 2007 when Dr. Fredrick Töben visited the camp. Its maximum width is indicated by the red arrows (50 cm). Kula's column, first design, is said to have had a square side length of 70 cm (yellow arrows). The semi-transparent yellow rectangles indicate the area where van Pelt's bolts required to anchor the columns in the ceiling would have been located. It should therefore be possible to find remnants of some of these anchoring points in the concrete still today, but as I said before, there is no trace of them.

Illustration 8: Top view of the hole in the roof of Morgue #1 of Crematorium II, entry to the still-accessible part of the morgue. Maximum width: 50 cm (red); Kula's introduction columns allegedly had a square side length of 70 cm (yellow arrows). These would have had to be bolted to the ceiling somewhere along the semi-transparent yellow rectangles. Some of the anchoring points should still be visible today, but there aren't any. © photo: 1997 Fredrick Töben.

On top of that, I also posit that Kula's column could not have worked as he claimed. Kula initially stated that the Zyklon-B gypsum granules were poured into the narrow space of 2.5 cm between the inner column's sheet-metal core and its outer screen. Already pouring the pellets into that narrow space could have led to clogging anywhere along the height of the column. Even if that did not happen, it is safe to say that the gypsum pellets would have gotten very wet. There are two reasons for this.

First because the room it was inserted into is said to have been filled with people. They would have produced an atmosphere saturated with water. This humidity would have condensed on anything colder than the air those people exhaled. In addition to this, in the case under investigation here, hydrogen cyanide would have evaporated vigorously from the carrier, withdrawing considerable amounts of energy from it, hence cooling it down. This would have led to the condensation of large quantities of air humidity onto the pellets.

Wet gypsum tends to stick and clump together. Getting this wet gypsum, which would have stuck to the screen while still releasing poisonous hydrogen cyanide, out of the inner column would have been rather difficult, and dangerous. Pounding the screen to get the pellets out would quickly have ruined that flimsy inner column. In brief, it would have been a mess.

The situation gets even worse when we consider Kula's second description, where this space has shrunk to a mere 15 mm. It wouldn't even have been possible to get the Zyklon-B granules to fall down such a narrow gap without getting stuck and clogging the whole thing, let alone cleaning it out afterwards with moist, clumped-together gypsum sticking to the screen.

There is more to this story, but I will refrain from discussing it here. The interested reader can consult my expert report about that. At the end of it all, it boils down to the simple fact that Michał Kula, having made numerous false claims and having changed his testimony repeatedly, is an untrustworthy witness. In addition, the solution he suggested as to how Zyklon B was introduced into those morgues is simply impracticable and an insult to any engineer's or architect's intelligence – naturally bearing in mind the fact that the ruins of Crematorium II clearly prove that no such columns were ever installed anyway, if they ever existed in the first place.

La banque(route) du Yad Vashem ou comment arriver à 6000000

by Jean-Marie Boisdefeu

Abstract

In early 2005, Yad Vashem, the official Israeli institute charged with managing the memory of the extermination of the Jews by the Germans, made publicly accessible a database of victims of the Shoah. At that point, it contained approximately three million names of "Jews who perished in the Shoah." The long-term goal is to find the names of "the six million Jewish victims." This paper reports about the results of a first critical look into the contents of this database. A random sampling reveals that the database not only contains the names of survivors, but it also has double or even multiple entries for single individuals. The total number of entries in that database therefore says little if anything about the number of individuals who died in the "Shoah."

On sait que le Yad Vashem est un institut officiel israélien chargé de la gestion de la mémoire de l'extermination des Juifs par les Allemands; il est un peu l'équivalent de la Congrégation pour la doctrine de la foi romaine. La presse, en pleurs, nous annonce que ce Yad Vashem vient de publier une banque de données sur les victimes de la Shoah.<sup>[1]</sup> Comme le précise le Yad Vashem, les quelque trois millions de noms actuellement répertoriés sont ceux de « Juifs qui ont péri dans la Shoah », l'objectif étant de retrouver si possible les noms des six millions de morts juifs. En fait, l'affaire se solde par une banqueroute, qui est néanmoins riche d'enseignements.

Banqueroute par manque de méthode et de rigueur

Ce qui frappe l'esprit de celui qui étudie l'histoire de la déportation des Juifs, c'est l'absence de méthode et de rigueur chez ceux qui se sont chargés de l'écrire. Face à une multiplicité de sources documentaires et testimoniales, tout historien sérieux ferait un tri; le Yad Vashem, lui, n'en a cure, d'où de nombreux doublons. Toutefois, comme on le verra, ce n'est pas le seul reproche qu'on peut adresser aux concepteurs de la banque. Mais trêve de commentaires; prenons des exemples.

- Prenons comme premier exemple le cas des Juifs déportés de France; le Yad Vashem s'est fondé sur le mémorial de Serge Klarsfeld;<sup>[2]</sup> certes, il n'est pas douteux que la plupart des Juifs qui y figurent sont morts en déportation; un certain nombre en sont tout de même revenus et Klarsfeld l'a précisé mais le Yad Vashem n'en a pas tenu compte et a repris tous les déportés dans sa banque, y compris les rescapés; le comble est qu'il signale que ces déportés sont revenus.

Ainsi y trouve-t-on avec la mention « SURVIVED » Simone Veil, Henri Krasucki et Simone Lagrange (Simy Kadosche, qui n'était qu'une enfant que les Allemands auraient oublié de gazer) ; on y trouve aussi, mais sans qu'on puisse le reprocher au Yad Vashem, de nombreux Juifs rescapés que Klarsfeld a déclaré morts; on citera par exemple Raphaël Esrail, secrétaire d'une association de déportés, ou encore Marie Reille, une catholique déportée par erreur que les Allemands renvoyèrent d'Auschwitz en France. On en a parlé lors du procès Papon.

De plus, nous verrons plus loin que le Yad Vashem ne s'est pas contenté de se référer au seul mémorial mais a aussi retenu des témoignages, de sorte que de nombreux Juifs de France sont comptés plusieurs fois.

- Prenons un autre exemple, celui de 2 enfants (Michael et Josef Salomonowicz, Il et 6 ans à leur arrivée à Auschwitz) et de leur mère; nous avons vu dans « La liquidation du ghetto de Lodz »[\[3\]](#) que tous trois avaient été déportés de Lodz à Auschwitz où, selon la vulgate exterminationniste, ils furent gazés et incinérés; en réalité, le lecteur a pu se convaincre de ce qu'ils avaient été réinstallés à Danzig et qu'ils avaient survécu à la guerre. Et que lit-on dans la banque à leur sujet?

- La mère y est reprise 3 fois sous des graphies différentes dont une fois avec la mention « survived ».
- L'aîné des fils, Michael, est repris deux fois sous des graphies différentes; il est également déclaré « survived » à une reprise.
- Le cadet, Josef, est également repris deux fois; il est lui aussi déclaré « survived » à une reprise. Dans ce cas précis, 3 survivants = 7 morts.

- Un autre doublé: celui d'Ester Skora (11 ans) sur la base de 2 listes du ghetto de Lodz; un autre triplé: celui d'Elchanan Reingold (7 ans) sur la base de 3 listes du même ghetto.

- Les comptages précédents sont fondés sur des documents mal utilisés, il est vrai, mais (souvent) irréfutables. Malheureusement, l'histoire de la Shoah s'appuie surtout sur des témoignages, c'est-à-dire sur des éléments fragiles. Une grande partie de la banque de données du Yad Vashem sont de cette mouture; non seulement ces témoignages ne sont guère fiables mais, comme manifestement aucun tri n'a été opéré, cette façon de procéder ne peut que conduire à de multiples doublons. Pire, parfois, la source documentaire s'ajoute à la source testimoniale. Quelques exemples:

- Le Hollandais Samuel Aathan est comptée 2 fois. Une première fois sur la base d'un témoignage et une seconde fois sur la base du mémorial hollandais.[\[4\]](#)

- C'est aussi le cas de la Française Charlotte Rotsztein reprise 2 fois (sous des noms différents) sur la base du mémorial de Klarsfeld et du témoignage de son père (1992). Toujours chez les Juifs de France, Frida Raichman est comptée 2 fois sur - une fois sur la base du mémorial et une fois avec le témoignage d'une cousine (1994). Toujours en France, les 51 personnes (dont 44 enfants) de l'orphelinat d'Izieu sont comptées 2 ou 3 fois, voire 4 fois comme un certain Hans Ament, compté sur les bases suivantes:

- le mémorial français de Klarsfeld;
- le mémorial autrichien de la DÖW (H. Ament était né en Autriche[\[5\]](#)) ;
- le témoignage de son frère (1987), lequel, bien que n'ayant pas été déporté, figure tout de même dans la banque de données américaine des « Survivors » ;

- le témoignage (1999) d'une parente de trois des enfants d'Izieu; elle non plus n'a pas été déportée mais cela ne l'a pas empêchée de « témoigner » à propos des 50 déportés d'Izieu.

On voit bien ici que l'hystérie de l'holocauste mène à la perte de tout sens commun: on n'a rien vu, et d'ailleurs on n'était même pas né à l'époque des faits mais on témoigne quand même et cette manière de procéder est acceptée par les historiens.

- La Polonaise Genia Wagman est enregistrée 3 fois sur la base des témoignages de son fils, lequel a témoigné 2 fois (1955 et 1997) et de son oncle (1957) ; elle était née et a vécu toute sa vie au même endroit jusqu'à sa mort (en 1941 ou 1942), l'on n'est même pas sûr qu'elle ait été exterminée. Une Belge portant les mêmes prénoms et noms est reprise 2 fois, dont une fois sur la base des témoignages de son frère (1978) et une fois de sa petite-fille (1999) ; on peut prédire qu'elle sera reprise une 3<sup>e</sup> fois quand le Yad Vashem encodera son nom appartenant aux Juifs de Belgique.

- Citons encore l'Allemande Helga Wolf, reprise 3 fois sur la base d'une liste du ghetto de Lodz et de 2 témoignages (celui d'une nièce en 1978 et celui d'un « chercheur » en 1999).

- À ce compte là, nous pensions qu'une déportée connue comme Anne Frank allait être reprise cent fois. Eh bien non! Il se pourrait bien que, dans ce cas précis, le Yad Vashem ait exceptionnellement fait le tri car Anne n'est reprise que deux fois (sur la base du mémorial hollandais et sur celui du témoignage de la deuxième femme de son père mais avec des variantes dans le prénom et la date de naissance, ce qui a dû tromper le Yad Vashem) ; sa sœur Margot, en revanche, est reprise 3 fois; sa mère, Edith Frank, est reprise 2 fois; le père, Otto Frank, bien que revenu de déportation, est repris une fois sur la base du mémorial allemand.<sup>[6]</sup> Dans ce cas précis, pour le Yad Vashem: 1 rescapé + 3 morts = 8 morts.

- On finit par s'interroger: s'il n'y a pas dans cette banque de données des morts déclarés morts sur la base du témoignage d'un autre mort? Nous n'en avons pas trouvé, mais allez savoir... cette banque de données nous réserve encore bien des surprises.

- Relevons aussi que les Juifs veulent nous faire croire que tout Juif mort pendant la guerre est obligatoirement mort exterminé par les Allemands fut-il octogénaire; Un seul exemple: on trouve dans la banque Chan na Wagman, née en 1854 et morte en 1942 à l'âge de 88 ans dans son village natal de Galicie (témoignage de sa sœur en 1956). Cette façon de faire accroît le nombre de supposés exterminés de plusieurs centaines de mille.

En conclusion, demanderez-vous, par combien faut-il diviser le chiffre de trois millions de noms déjà encodés par le Yad Vashem ? C'est difficile à dire car l'imprécision est une caractéristique bien connue de l'État Civil Juif. On peut néanmoins approfondir quelques exemples et tenter une extrapolation prudente.

- Si, par exemple, on interroge la banque de données à propos de Simone Veil, on obtient 38 noms de personnes se rapprochant de celui de l'ancienne ministre. De ces 38 noms, huit sont à coup sûr des doublons, un est celui d'une rescapé (Simone Veil) et un autre celui d'un Juif mort au combat dans les rangs de la 1<sup>re</sup> armée française; une dizaine d'autres sont plus que douteux; encore n'a-t-on pas toutes les garanties pour tous les autres.

Parmi ces supposés exterminés figure un homme de près de 90 ans.

Il semble bien qu'en généralisant le résultat de cette recherche sur S. Veil, il faille diviser les 3000000 par 2.

- Prenons un autre exemple et interrogeons la banque de données à propos d'Arno Klarsfeld (le père de Serge) : la banque de données donne trois noms, et tous les trois se rapportent à notre homme. Le Yad Vashem a d'abord repris le témoignage de Serge en 1974; puis il a encodé le même Serge dans le mémorial de 1978 ; enfin, il a repris le témoignage de 1992 d'une « amie » ; cette amie a par ailleurs témoigné 38 fois pour des déportés français qui, de ce fait, sont donc eux aussi comptés au moins deux fois dans la banque de données. Les choses sont claires dans ce cas, car il suffit de diviser les 3.000.000 par 3.

- Bref, à partir de ces exemples l'on retire l'impression qu'il faut diviser les 3 millions par 2 voire 3.

Une banqueroute riche d'enseignements

L'opération entreprise par le Yad Vashem se solde donc par une banqueroute dont on peut néanmoins tirer un premier enseignement: le chiffre de six millions de Juifs exterminés est un mythe dont n'importe qui peut facilement se convaincre. Mais un examen plus fouillé de cette banque des données est encore plus enrichissant. Ainsi, dans l'article sur la liquidation du ghetto de Lodz à propos duquel nous nous sommes référés plus haut, le chercheur révisionniste Carlo Mattogno donne les noms d'enfants arrivés en août 1944 à Auschwitz où ils furent gazés, selon l'histoire officielle, mais qui, en réalité, furent envoyés quelques jours plus tard dans le camp de Stutthof-Danzig à 600 km au nord d'Auschwitz; parmi eux, nous avons déjà vu, Michael et Josef Salomonowicz (11 et 6 ans) mais on y trouve aussi :

- Adam Szyper (4 ans, compté 2 fois), Tolla Richer (12 ans) et Christine Wolman (14 ans). Le Yad Vashem les reprend en affirmant qu'ils ont été internés à Lodz puis au camp de Stutthof (il n'a pas jugé bon de mentionner Auschwitz !) et enfin Theresienstadt où ils furent tous trois libérés.

- Kazimierz Lachman (7 ans). Le Yad Vashem le compte comme mort sur la base du témoignage d'une tante qui a affirmé en 1988 que son neveu était mort à Stutthof-Danzig, ce qui est bien désolant mais confirme ce qu'a découvert C. Mattogno: les 11 500 inaptes de Lodz n'ont pas été gazés mais ont bien été redirigés à Stutthof. On a donc ici de la part d'un organisme officiel israélien l'aveu implicite que le gazage des juifs est un autre mythe.

Nouvelles de la banque de données du Yad Vashem

On sait que le Yad Vashem a entrepris de répertorier les noms des prétendus 6 millions de Juifs morts dans la Shoah. L'entreprise ne peut qu'apparaître téméraire aux yeux des plus bienveillants, même aux yeux des historiens, étant donné que ces derniers dénombrent déjà un million de victimes de moins.<sup>[7]</sup> En fait, à ce jour, le Yad Vashem n'est arrivé qu'à 3 millions mais en multipliant les doublons. On peut ainsi estimer qu'il a multiplié par 2 à 3 le nombre de victimes répertoriées. Dans une ultime tentative de débloquer la situation, il vient de lancer une grande collecte de témoignages sur les Juifs de l'ancienne URSS.<sup>[8]</sup> Son raisonnement est simple (et mensonger à la fois) : Il affirme que plus des 2 tiers des 6 millions de morts y résidaient (soit plus de 4 millions) mais seulement un quart d'entre eux figurent dans la banque (soit 1000000) ; il en résulte que plus de 3 millions d'entre eux sont encore à répertorier, ce qui permettrait d'atteindre (enfin) le chiffre (mythique) des 6 millions.

Or, pour R. Hilberg, qui est l'historien sur l'holocauste le plus respecté au monde (du moins ceux qui y croient), il n'y a pas eu plus de 2 millions de victimes en URSS (y compris l'Ukraine, la Biélorussie, la Pologne annexée, la Moldavie et les Pays baltes), soit 2 fois moins que n'en compte le Yad Vashem ; il ne resterait donc qu'un seul million de noms à répertorier. On n'en arriverait toutefois qu'à un total de 4 millions. Total tout à fait invraisemblable d'ailleurs dans lequel nous avons vu on retrouverait (pour ne prendre que quelques exemples) :

- 2 fois le père de Robert Badinter et les parents de Simone Veil,
- 3 fois le père de Serge Klarsfeld,
- 5 fois le père d'Henri Minczelès,
- 3 fois les 52000 Juifs berlinois, etc., sans compter les rescapés comme Henri Krasucki, Henri Bulawko ou Madeleine Veil ou bien tous ceux qui sont morts de vieillesse dans leur lit. Tout cela est hystérique mais, il est vrai, peut rapporter gros.

“Magda Goebbels”... nel database dello Yad Vashem

by Olodogma

Abstract

This paper demonstrates with an example that the number of Holocaust victims claimed to be in the victims' database of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem cannot be trusted, because anyone can place any number of false entries into that database! In this case, the fictitious person with data related to famous National-Socialist personalities (Joseph Goebbels's wife Magda, Adolf Hitler), was placed in that database, and it passed the obviously non-existing "quality control."

Oggi dimostriamo (nuovamente) che il numero dei morti olocaustici vantati dal museo dell'olocausto di Gerusalemme, yad-vashem, non è attendibile in quanto chiunque con pochi clicks può inserire un qualunque nome falso in quel database! ... da 1 fino all'infinito, è solo una questione di tempo e voglia... o necessità!

Magda Goebbels allo Yad Vashem! Click...

Crediamo di commettere un errore per difetto quando, trattando di cose olocaustiche, affermiamo che il 99,99% degli “esseri umani” ha un approccio di

1. sudditanza estrema verso le fonti olocaustiche,
2. timore reverenziale verso gli olo-evangelisti, i suoi preti, i suoi dogma
3. sacro terrore del solo immaginare di poter aver dubbi nel credo olonarrato-testimoniato.

Queste nostre conclusioni sono il frutto di anni di chats-forum-scambi di mails-discussioni dal vivo.

Eccezionalmente si trovano persone nè sudditi nè terrorizzati nè con timori reverenziali, in questa rara eccezione l'esplosione del “caso” è inevitabile: il “sistema olo-sterminazionista” si attiva violentemente per arrestare il percorso di questo temerario.

Avevamo già provato che tali fonti non sono indubitabili

1. "Come aumentare il numero dei morti nell'olocausto" (vedere qui)
2. Il Dr. Mirko Viola e la fabbrica dei morti. Come “lievitare/certificare” il numero dei morti ebrei: l'olo-espedito (vedere qui)
3. Breve nota di Carlo Mattogno su “The Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names”(ידי ושמות, yad vashem) e il numero dei morti ivi riportati (vedere qui)

Ciò è la prova più evidente che il Vaticano dell'olocaustianesimo, il museo dell'olocausto di Gerusalemme, lo yad-vashem [...]”questo mausoleo di Yad Vashem sia stato costruito sulle terre e le rovine del villaggio martire di Ein Kerem... e di fronte a quello che era Deir Yassin”...”ce mémorial Yad Vashem a été construit sur les terres et les ruines du village martyr de Ein Kerem... et en face de ce qui fut Deir Yassin” ,Ziyad Clot “Il n’y aura pas d’Etat palestinien“ (Max Milo Editions) (http://www.michelcollon.info/Memento-1-Le-genocide-n-est-pas.html?lang=fr#\_ednref24), ha nel suo database di morti più errori e falsi! Quanti non è dato, ancora, di sapere, ma determinante è sapere che contiene dei falsi, e di varia natura come documentato, anche, dal ricercatore Carlo Mattocono (vedere qui).

Ad ulteriore riprova riportiamo che nel 2012 il dr. Mirko Viola aveva testato la credibilità di tale “museo” inserendo, tramite mail, il nome di una inesistente vittima dei “nazzi” gasatori!

Ecco: Dova Cohen, una dentista, nata in Ungheria il 28 gennaio 1903, ma residente in Ucraina... deportata ad Auschwitz e gasata il 28 giugno 1943.

A conferma della ricezione della mail con le fasulle informazioni, la mail di risposta:

Processing the digital data will take time before the Page is integrated into the Names Database. We kindly request your patience.

Thank you for helping to preserve the memory of a Holocaust victim.

Oggi tutti possono verificare che quel falso olocaustianizzato è inserito in pianta stabile nel numero dei morti olocaustici conservato nel frigorifero della “memoria” sionista!

Le sorprese non si esauriscono qui, infatti era stato inserito un altro “nome” nel database del “museo” di Gerusalemme, fornendo tale “vittima” di alcune caratteristiche che avrebbero insospettito qualunque goy “subumano”! Vediamole:

1. Il nome Edith Frolla (che è l’anagramma di Adolf Hitler)
2. data di nascita il 20 aprile 1889 (come Adolf Hitler)
3. professione pittrice (come Adolf Hitler)
4. vissuta a Roma in via della Lungara, 29 (indirizzo del carcere di Regina Coeli)
5. la foto a corredo è quella universalmente conosciuta di... Magda Goebbels

La “Frolla” sarebbe stata gasata nel lager di Majdanek con monossido di carbonio.

... Eppure “in un articolo pubblicato sul Corriere della Sera... i ricercatori dello Yad Vashem avevano promesso che tutti i nomi inseriti nel database sarebbero stati verificati prima della pubblicazione, cito:

Fonte: Corriere della Sera – Olocausto, in rete il database delle vittime

Gli screenshots allegati dimostrano che il test di inserimento della falsa gasata è andato a buon fine! In sintesi: nessuno ha verificato alcunchè! Nessun controllo! Nemmeno sulla foto! Quando ci viene citato il Vaticano-olocaustico-yad_vashem come massimo “istituto” che contiene la “prova” dei milioni di vittime del cosiddetto olocausto, si può, tranquillamente, mettersi a ridere, oppure passare l’indirizzo di questo post!

Reazioni

Il giorno 20 Marzo 2015 è stato un giorno strano. Olodogma ha pubblicato questo post, “Marinetti probabilmente avrebbe apprezzato la trovata“, in cui si evidenzia l’involontaria possibilità, casualmente offerta, di uno sfruttamento del sistema di raccolta dati del “museo dell’olocausto” yad vashem di Gerusalemme, da parte di malintenzionati, per gonfiare a piacimento il numero dei morti-olocaustianizzati. La notizia ha fatto un pò di giri ed il contatore di ingressi del sito è impazzito, e non solo!... il post è stato tradotto in francese e rilanciato da altri siti. Una valanga di accessi da stati francofoni (e non solo!).

Riportiamo una breve galleria di screenshots qui: <http://olodogma.com/wordpress/?s=1002>

Dopo la valanga di accessi “importanti” al sito, più che altro la “qualità” di questi accessi, comprendiamo appieno perchè Olodogma sia perennemente monitorato-controllato e la pagina Facebook, non ufficiale, perennemente segnalata come offensiva; citiamo...

“Ad esempio, il profilo Facebook del sito negazionista italiano Olodogma viene spesso segnalato tramite il programma “segnala una pagina” di Facebook poiché “contiene discorsi o simboli che incitano all’odio”, malgrado le numerose e periodiche segnalazioni, la direzione della piattaforma continua a non rimuovere la pagina “Questa pagina non è stata rimossa” ...

In data 19.03.2015 avevamo inserito il questo post dove si riportava la notizia dell’inserimento nel database del museo dell’olocausto Yad Vashem di Gerusalemme del nome fittizio “Edith Frolla”. Venivano riportati altri due nomi fittizi inseriti nello stesso database. Il giorno 22.03.2015 si riscontra il fatto nuovo che “Edith Frolla” NON è più presente tra i “morti” olocaustianizzati con inalazioni di “ossido di carbonio” nel Konzentrationslager di Lublino-Majdanek!

L’attuale situazione dei tre inserimenti tests, alle ore 14.00 del 22.03.15, è la seguente;

Dal momento dell'inserimento de questo post alle ore 09,19 del 19.03.15, si erano, immediatamente, notate frenetiche "elette" presenze, sul sito Olodogma, proveniente dal tempio maggiore dell'olocaustianesimo del ghetto auto-murocintato di Palestina, e non solo... Il "caso frolla-spizzichino edith" è ora risolto, nessuna traccia è rimasta!

I fumi virtuali della carta virtuale sono usciti dal camino del "museo"!

...ma non erano i nazziisti che "tentarono di cancellare le prove" delle loro... malefatte?

Quale insegnamento scaturisce dal comportamento del museo dell'olocausto di Gerusalemme? Domandiamoci...

1. Chiunque potrà ipotizzare il non rispetto delle promesse, del museo, di VERIFICA sui dati arrivati tramite posta o email?
2. Chiunque potrà rilevare la figuraccia da cioccolatai per la cancellazione del nome fasullo "Frolla Edith" indizio, incontrovertibilmente, della "leggerezza"(e siamo benevoli) nella gestione delle informazioni? (cancellazione avvenuta dopo la pubblicazione in lingua francese del "post 1.000" e divulgata in tutta Europa e mondo francofono)
3. Chiunque potrà rilevare una atmosfera funerea di inattendibilità che "infetterà", se non inficierà, l'aura di olo-sacralità dell'istituto?
4. Chiunque potrà rilevare che è stata regalata a tutti un'arma mortale per la sopravvivenza della missione sacra di simile carrozzone olocaustico?
5. Chiunque potrà rilevare che la leggerezza (e siamo ri-benevoli) di esercizio di tale carrozzone ha offeso in modo irreversibile la memoria dei veri morti? (qui escludiamo TUTTI i pretesi gasati, di cui non c'è la minima prova della gasazione) di quel periodo!
6. Chiunque potrà rilevare che OGNI riferimento, in discussioni o interventi a TUTTI i livelli, a tale carrozzone quale centro di "educazione alla shoah" sarà reso controproducente per il proponente?

Chiunque, infatti, potrà chiedere-ribattere: ciò che dici è stato verificato da tale museo? ...oppure lo è stato come nei casi di Edith Lang, Dova Cohen, Edith Frolla?

... e “bisognerà stare zitti” perchè tre precedenti non sono un caso! Assomiglia molto ad altro!

Domanda: abbiamo sbagliato queste 6 ipotesi?

L'United States Holocaust Memorial Museum vuole duplicare la olo-Dunkerque di Edith Frola (Adolf Hitler)?

Apre un nuovo inventario del pretesi morti olocaustianizzati! La notizia è fresca!

Il museo dell'olocausto di Washington, United States Holocaust Memorial Museum o ushmm, vuole replicare i fasti del museo dell'olocausto yad vashem di Gerusalemme... comprese le figure di mera. Attenzione!

Abstract

In 1983, Sanning's trail-blazing demographic study on the dissolution of Eastern European Jewry appeared, showing that Jewish "Holocaust" losses cannot have amounted to more than several hundred thousand victims. This report gives an update on further research since then. In particular, newly available data about the emigration of Jews from the Soviet Union and its successor states are of interest in this regard. They indicate that Sanning was correct in assuming that Soviet post-war census data about the number of Jews who survived World War Two were unreliable. The number of Jews who have emigrated since the 1970s, plus the demographic collapse Jewry experienced after the war due to an extremely low birth rate, compels the conclusion that many more Jews survived the war in the USSR than previously assumed.

1,5 Millionen jüdische Auswanderer nach Übersee aus dem "Gebiet des jüdischen Elends in Europa" (1925-1939)

Vor mehr als dreißig Jahren wurde meine Auflösung in Deutschland und in den Vereinigten Staaten veröffentlicht. Zwischenzeitlich sind neue Quellen aufgetaucht und unvorhersehbare Ereignisse eingetreten, die meine Darstellung bestätigen. Zur besseren Orientierung in dieser Aktualisierung geben die Tabellen die jüdischen Bevölkerungen wieder, die in der Auflösung aufgeführt sind.

Polen, Deutschland, Rumänien und das Baltikum – wo zu Anfang der 30er Jahre fast fünf Millionen Juden wohnten – verfolgten eine ausgesprochen judenfeindliche Politik, insbesondere die beiden ersten; dazu kam noch die wirtschaftliche Depression. Die Folge war eine wirtschaftliche Verelendung der jüdischen Bevölkerung, besonders in Polen.

Als Lösung kam nur die Auswanderung in Frage: aus Polen kamen in den Jahren 1931 bis 1939 über 500.000, wahrscheinlich 600.000, aus Großdeutschland (1933/1934-1939) (inklusive das Protektorat) über 400.000, aus Rumänien 100.000 und aus dem Baltikum rund 25.000 Juden; aber auch aus Ungarn (und vermutlich aus der Slowakei) gab es eine jüdische Auswanderung. Dafür bürgt uns seit 1958 das zionistenfreundliche Institut für Zeitgeschichte, München.<sup>[1]</sup> Ende 1939 hatten Polen bzw. das General-Gouvernement, Deutschland (inklusive das Protektorat), Rumänien, das Baltikum, Ungarn und die Slowakei durch Auswanderungen, Grenzänderungen, Flucht und Geburtendefizite drei Millionen Juden eingebüßt (s. Tabelle 1).

Zur Einwanderung erklärte der Stellvertretende Außenminister der USA (Assistant Secretary of State) Breckinridge Long im November 1943, die USA hätten in den letzten zehn Jahren 580.000 "Opfer der Verfolgung" aufgenommen; die meisten davon waren Juden (nur 100.000 waren deutsche Juden). Palästina hatte fast 300.000 jüdische Einwanderer. Auch andere Länder (z.B. Lateinamerika; Westeuropa) verzeichneten eine starke jüdische Einwanderung. Soweit die Auflösung.

Doch schon 16 Jahre vor 1958 – 1942 – berichtete die Universal Jewish Encyclopedia dasselbe: eine große jüdische Auswanderung hatte aus Ost- und Mitteleuropa nach Übersee von Mitte der 20er Jahre bis Ende

der 30er Jahre stattgefunden; übersetzt heißt es da:[2]

"Mit dem Inkrafttreten des [US.] Quoten-Einwanderungsgesetzes von 1924 und der Notwendigkeit nach Einwanderungs-Möglichkeiten in anderen Ländern zu suchen, ... 1927 vereinbarte HIAS ... mit der Jewish Colonization Association (ICA), Paris, Frankreich, die HICEM (i.e. HIAS-ICA Emigration Association) zu gründen ... [mit] Filialen in 32 Aus- und Einwanderungs- sowie Transitländern. Von 1925 und 1939 emigrierten im Schnitt jährlich 100.000 jüdische Männer, Frauen und Kinder aus dem Gebiet des jüdischen Elends in Europa. Dank dieser Bemühungen wurden hunderttausende Juden nicht nur in den Vereinigten Staaten, aber in Ländern des Britischen Empire, im Fernen Osten, in Mittel-und Südamerika und in Palästina angesiedelt."

In all den Jahren ist m.W. diese Aussage der Universal Jewish Encyclopedia von den Zionisten noch nie bestritten worden. ["Gebiet des jüdischen Elends in Europa": Mittel-und Osteuropa, besonders Polen, aber auch das nationalsozialistische Deutschland einschl. das Protektorat, Rumänien, das Baltikum, Ungarn und die Slowakei; genau so sieht es sicherlich auch das Institut für Zeitgeschichte. Die westeuropäischen Einwanderungs- und Transitländer und die Sowjetunion (offiziell judenfreundlich) scheiden aus.]

Also, die ostjüdische Auswanderung von 1,5 Millionen aus Mittel-und Osteuropa von 1925 bis 1939 vollzog sich im Rahmen einer organisierten Emigration in Polen, Deutschland, Rumänien, in den baltischen Staaten, usw. Damit sind die jüdischen Bevölkerungszahlen Anfang der 30er Jahre in den Auswanderungsländern in Mittel-/Osteuropa [ohne die UdSSR] und in den Einwanderungsländern wie den USA, Südamerika, Palästina, usw. nur noch von historischem Interesse; sie haben keinen Bezug zur Realität von 1939, geschweige denn 1940/41 oder 1945! Die polnische Volkszählung von 1931 lässt schon seit 1925 einen plötzlichen ostjüdischen Geburtenrückgang erkennen; mit einer Lockerung der Familienbande oder mit einem Wechsel religiöser Vorstellungen sind die großen Einbußen allein nicht zu erklären: die Zahl der Geburten ging einfach zu schnell und zu stark zurück. Kein Wunder, dass die Universal Jewish Encyclopedia wehklagte:

"[...] in Osteuropa fiel die jüdische Geburtenrate und näherte sich der in Westeuropa" [3]

und diese war schon geringer als die Sterberate. Die enorm hohe Auswanderung verursachte einen jüdischen Bevölkerungsverlust in Polen von 20% von 1931 bis 1939 und muss eine geradezu verheerende Wirkung auf die Anzahl der Geburten gehabt haben, denn immer verlassen die jüngeren, fruchtbaren Bevölkerungsschichten am ehesten die Heimat.

Ein weiteres Indiz für eine Fertilitätskrise ist das "Kind/Frau-Verhältnis".<sup>[4]</sup> 1931 war dieses ostjüdische "Verhältnis" in Polen 455(!); für einen Bevölkerungsbestand notwendig ist aber 500. Angesichts der gewaltigen ostjüdische Auswanderungswelle in den 30er Jahren, verursacht durch die immer weiter fortschreitende wirtschaftliche Verelendung und eine jüdenfeindliche Regierung, muss man davon ausgehen, dass dieses "Kind/Frau-Verhältnis" für 1939 weit unter 455 gelegen haben muss (vielleicht 200-300) und dass es in den 1930er Jahren im Schnitt ein Geburtendefizit bei der ostjüdischen Bevölkerung Polens gegeben hat.<sup>[5]</sup>

Die Schilderung der Universal Jewish Encyclopedia ist mit der vor 30 Jahren erschienenen Auflösung vollkommen deckungsgleich; die jüdische Bevölkerung war in dem später deutsch-bzw. sowjetisch-besetzten Europa von über neun Millionen in den 30er Jahren auf etwa acht Millionen im Jahre 1939 gesunken (s. Tabelle I unter A.).

Die jüdischen Vermissten im 2. Weltkrieg

Kurz nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg hielten sich über eine halbe Million Juden auf deutschem Boden auf,<sup>[6]</sup> hauptsächlich in der amerikanischen Besatzungszone. Was aber war ihre Nationalität? Niemand weiß es. Woher kamen sie? Bis zum heutigen Tag weiß man darüber so gut wie nichts.

Der britische General Sir Frederick E. Morgan, Leiter der UNRRA-Operationen in Deutschland, sagte am 2.1.1946 in einer Pressekonferenz in Frankfurt/Main, dass eine unbekannte jüdische Organisation große Massen von Juden aus dem Osten nach Deutschland einschleuse. Auch der Publizist Dr. Raul Hilberg erklärte:<sup>[7]</sup>

"In Polen, der Tschechoslowakei und in Ungarn haben viele Juden gar nicht erst abgewartet; sie machten sich sofort auf die Reise... Von Polen ergoss sich die Flut... in die amerikanische Zone Deutschlands. ... Im November 1945 verstärkte sich diese Flut ..."

Doch die Auflösung hat 400.000 jüdische DPs (Displaced Persons) im Jahre 1947 genannt; diese Zahl stammt von der New York Times.<sup>[8]</sup> Soweit die Auflösung.

Wie groß war diese Flut von 1945 bis 1947 wirklich? Neue Zahlen von bekannten jüdischen Persönlichkeiten und Organisationen über die Flut gehen weit über diese Angaben hinaus. Dr. Nahum Goldmann, langjähriger Präsident des Jüdischen Weltkongresses, sollte sich mit dem jüdischen Drama wohl

auskennen; er schrieb in seinem Buch Das Jüdische Paradox im Jahre 1978(!), dass es[9]

"... 1945 an die sechshunderttausend jüdische KZ-Überlebende [gab], die kein Land aufnehmen wollte; dies ist eine historische Tatsache."

Aber schon vorher hat das American Jewish Year Book (AJYB) 1946-1947 berichtet,

"Gegen Ende Januar [1946] erreichte der [jüdische] Flüchtlingsstrom in die amerikanische Zone Deutschlands ein solches Ausmaß, dass bis März schätzungsweise mehr als 600.000 Personen in DP-Lagern interniert sein werden. "[10] [DP=Displaced Persons]

Dazu kamen noch die jüdischen DPs in der britischen und russischen Zone (Zahlen unbekannt), 35.000 in Österreich und 30.000 in Italien.[11] Das sind schon 700.000 jüdische DPs.

Jon und David Kimche berichteten in ihrem Buch The Secret Roads (1954) von

"[...] ungefähr 800.000 heimatlosen [jüdischen] Flüchtlingen verrotten in den grauen Elendslagern von Europa, [...]"[12] [1945/46], deren einziger Wunsch war: "raus aus Europa".[13] Die Differenz zwischen 600.000 (Goldmann 1945) und 800.000 (Kimche 1945/46) sind anscheinend die Heimkehrer aus der Sowjetunion (157.000).

David Kimche ist nicht irgendjemand; dieser israelische Geheimagent war ein führender Mossad-Mitarbeiter. Da Mossad führend am Herausbringen der Juden aus dem deutschen Einflussbereich tätig war, ist er auch mit dem jüdischen Flüchtlingsdrama vertraut.

Der israelischer Geheimdienst Mossad war u.a. zuständig für die jüdische Emigration nach Israel aus Ländern, in denen offizielle Aliyah-Agenturen verboten waren, und allgemein für den Schutz von jüdischen Gemeinden weltweit. Der Mossad wurde am 13.12.1949 gegründet, aber schon vorher wurde er inoffiziell 1937 als Mossad le Aliyah Bet, Komitee für illegale Immigration, in Tel Aviv von Gewerkschaftsführern und Haganah (Widerstandskämpfer im Untergrund) ins Leben gerufen.

Die Agenten von Mossad waren überall in Europa und im Mittleren Osten, und es gelang ihnen, gut 100.000 Juden illegal nach Palästina zu transportieren. Die jüdischen Flüchtlinge kamen aus Holland, Schweden, Frankreich, Jugoslawien, usw., aber besonders aus Rumänien: regelmäßig liefen Schiffe nach dem Levant aus. Die Schiffe Amiram, Assipa, Astir, Atlantic, Bulbul, Dalin, Dora, Enzo Sereni, Exodus, Fede, Fenice, Haim Arlosoroff, Hannah Senes, Hatikva, Henrietta Szold, Hilda, Josiah Wedgwood, Karbeh, Katriel Yaffe, Maria, Maritza, Max Nordau, Mefkure (gesunken), Melavim, Meret Hagettaot, Milka, Milos, Pacific, Pan Crescent, Pan York, Patria (gesunken), Petro, Salvador (gesunken), Shaar Yishuv, Shabbtai Lujinski, Struma (gesunken), Tel Hai, Tiger Hili, Torus, Yagur, und viele andere mehr transportierten während des Krieges und kurz danach zehntausende Juden von Europa nach Palästina.[14]

Außerdem berichtete das Institute of Jewish Affairs (IJA) (1943), dass 180.000 Juden von Kriegsanfang bis Mitte 1943 aus dem deutschen Einflussbereich entkamen.[15] Auf das volle Jahr 1943 hochgerechnet müsste man davon ausgehen, dass dann ein paar zehntausend Juden mehr entkamen. Sagen wir 225.000 von 1941-1943.

Das vom amerikanischen Präsidenten Franklin D. Roosevelt im Januar 1944 ins Leben gerufene War Refugee Board (WRB) hat bis 1945 200.000 Juden außerhalb des deutschen Einflussbereichs in Sicherheit gebracht.[16] Sicher waren darunter einige der nach Russland transportierten westeuropäischen Juden und/oder die zurückgebliebenen Sowjetbürger. Entsprechend haben ja auch Jon und David Kimche berichtet, dass während der Kriegszeit 300.000 Juden Europa verlassen haben, trotz des energischen [deutschen] Widerstandes.[17] Daneben gab es noch die HICEM (1927-1940 Paris; 1940 Lissabon). Mit ihrer Hilfe verließen 90.000 Juden Lissabon auf neutralen portugiesischen Schiffen bis 1945.[18] Ein gewisser Teil davon sind Doppelzählungen, nehme ich an.

Wie dem auch sei, etwa eine halbe Million Juden (IJA, WRB, HICEM) entkamen durch eine organisierte Flucht aus dem deutschen Einflussbereich; zusammen mit den 600.000 jüdischen "Holocaust-Überlebende" der "grauen Elendslager von Europa" ergibt das 1 Million vormals vermisste Juden (s. Tabelle 2 unter B.). Neben den hunderttausenden jüdischen Toten dürfte auch die Frage nach den zusätzlichen Überlebenden, insbesondere den polnischen, deutschen und westeuropäischen Juden größtenteils gelöst sein.

Man weiß nicht, aus welchen Ländern die über eine Million jüdischen DPs "in den grauen Elendslagern von Europa" und die aus dem deutschen Einflussbereich geflohenen Juden stammen, wie viele es genau waren, von welchen Konzentrationslagern oder Ghettos usw. sie kamen, von denen das Institute of Jewish Affairs (1943), das War Refugee Board (1945), das AJYB (1948), David Kimche (1954), HICEM und Nahum Goldmann (1978) berichten: aus Polen, Deutschland, Frankreich, Belgien, Niederlande oder gar aus dem von deutschen Truppen in den Jahren 1941-1944 besetzten Teil der Sowjetunion... !? Davon redet heute kein Mensch; und doch, nach dem Krieg sind die meisten hier gewesen, zum größten Teil in der amerikanischen Zone Deutschlands (Kimche, Morgan, Hilberg, Goldmann, American Jewish Year Book) oder während des Krieges in andere Länder geflohen (Kimche, Institute of Jewish Affairs, War Refugee Board, HICEM). Die allermeisten sind in keiner Überlebendenstatistik aufgeführt!

Die jüdischen Überlebenden in der Sowjetunion

Im 2. Weltkrieg deportierten die Sowjets schätzungsweise mehr als 30 Millionen Menschen ihrer eigenen Bevölkerung nach Sibirien und Ural, inklusive der überwiegenden Mehrzahl der Juden – die Rede ist von über 80%; ich vermute, dass es mehr sind. Der Sekretär des sowjetischen Jüdischen Antifaschistischen Komitees, Shachne Epstein, stellte noch im Herbst 1944(!) fest, dass die Sowjets 3,5 Millionen Juden aus den besetzten Gebieten deportiert hatten;[19] eine Million Ostjuden waren sowieso außerhalb des deutschen Machtbereichs.

Nach dem Krieg haben westliche jüdische Historiker und andere Autoren wiederholt von Deportationen nach Sibirien und Ural berichtet. Der Historiker Dr. Alexander Dallin (Stanford Universität) schrieb 1957,[20] dass die zurückgebliebenen Zivilpersonen nur ca. 65 Millionen betragen haben; also, sind etwa 35 Millionen Menschen von den Sowjets deportiert worden.

Gerald Reitlinger berichtete seinem Buch Die Endlösung 1961:[21]

"Die Russen evakuierten grundsätzlich die arbeitende Bevölkerung, .... "

und

"In den meisten eingenommenen Städten blieb weniger als die Hälfte der Bevölkerung zurück"

90% der Juden wohnten in den Städten. Der Historiker Joshua Rothenberg (Brandeis Universität) erwähnte im Jahre 1970:[22]

"Die Masse der jüdischen Bevölkerung entzog sich ... durch Flucht vor den erobernden [deutschen] Armeen"

Zudem deportierten die Sowjets zu allererst die Juden als den technisch und akademisch gebildetsten Teil der Bevölkerung. Das Institute of Jewish Affairs schreibt:[23]

"In vielen Städten und Städtchen, ganz besonders in der Ukraine und Weißrussland, waren die Juden unter den ersten, die evakuiert wurden."

und

" ... es blieb genug Zeit, die Zivilbevölkerung zu evakuieren."

Aus Städten wie Charkow, Cherson, Dneprpetrowsk, Mariupol, Melitopol, Minsk, Nikolajew, Nowograd-Volynsk, Poltawa, Schitomir, Smolensk, Taganrog und Tschernigow – mit Sicherheit auch Kalinin – waren so gut wie alle Juden deportiert/evakuiert (75-100%); und von den übrigen, von denen wir eine Nachricht haben (Berditschew, Kiew, Kirowograd, Odessa, Uman, Winniza, Witebsk), vielleicht ein bisschen weniger. Soweit die Auflösung.

Reinhard Gehlen, erster Präsident des Bundesnachrichtendienstes unter Bundeskanzler Konrad Adenauer, schrieb 1972, dass rund ein Drittel der Bevölkerung von den Sowjets deportiert oder rekrutiert worden sei.[24] Im Krieg war er Leiter der Wehrmachtsteilung Fremde Heere Ost (FHO); seine Dienststelle war für die genaue Feindeinschätzung verantwortlich. Wenn nicht er, wer sonst müsste es wissen!

Also sind über 30 Millionen Menschen von den Sowjets deportiert worden, wie auch Dallin (jüdisch-amerikanischer Historiker) und Carter (Russian War Relief) bestätigen. Die Deportierten setzten sich hauptsächlich aus rekrutierbaren Männern, Spezialisten jeglicher Couleur, Ostjuden und Russen (jeweils ein Viertel der Stadtbevölkerung) sowie Arbeitern zusammen; sieht man von den rekrutierbaren Männern einmal ab, war es klar, dass die russische und ostjüdische Stadtbevölkerung besonders von den Deportationsmaßnahmen betroffen war und dass die weißrussische und ukrainische (Land-)Bevölkerung bedeutend weniger berührt war.

Wenn u.a. von jüdisch-sowjetischen (Herbst 1944), jüdisch-amerikanischen, jüdisch-englischen und selbst bundesdeutschen Stellen immer wieder von dem ungeheuren Ausmaß der sowjetischen Deportationsmaßnahmen an der Zivilbevölkerung, besonders der Russen oder Ostjuden, gesprochen wird, dann ist es unverständlich, wenn dies immer noch abgestritten bzw. über die Tatsache, dass es so war, ganz einfach hinweg gegangen wird. Die Auflösung schätzte anhand von unzähligen Belegen die Zahl der überlebenden sowjetischen Ostjuden (1945) auf 4,3 Millionen (s. Tabelle 3, unter C.);[25] seither haben gewaltige Umwälzungen das Riesenreich erschüttert: die Sowjetunion zerfiel.

Die zionistische Meinung – nicht einmal eine Schätzung – es hätten nur 2 Millionen Juden 1945 in der UdSSR überlebt,[26] setzte sich durch, obwohl die Sowjets bzw. Zionisten keinerlei Belege dafür vorgelegt haben (s. Tabelle 3, unter C.). Wer hat recht?

Professor Frank Lorimer (Princeton Universität) untersuchte 1946 im Auftrag des Völkerbundes die natürliche Fruchtbarkeit der Sowjetvölker und kam dabei zu dem Ergebnis, dass die Juden im Jahr 1926 die niedrigste Fertilität hatten; sie war gerade groß genug, um den Bestand zu sichern. Die Fertilität für die Jahre 1959 und 1989 auf derselben Basis durchgerechnet ergibt (für den Bevölkerungsbestand notwendig Die sowjetisch-jüdischen Bevölkerungszahlen der Nachkriegs-Generationen betragen nicht einmal die Hälfte der ihrer Elterngeneration. Dieser drastische Geburtenrückgang und die Assimilation in der lokalen Bevölkerung hatte dazu geführt, dass das osteuropäischen Judentum sich nicht behaupten konnte.

Die erste sowjetische Volkszählung nach dem 2. Weltkrieg (1959) zählte 2.268.000 selbst-identifizierte Juden; die letzte war 1989 mit nur 1.451.000 Juden. Die Abnahme um 817.000 spiegelt ein Geburtendefizit bzw. eine Sterbebilanz von 518.000 sowie eine Auswanderung von 299.000 Juden wider.

Doch durch den Zerfall der Sowjetunion geschah etwas Unerwartetes: Die Ostjuden konnten in den Nachfolgerstaaten der Sowjetunion en masse auswandern. Zwischen 1989-2007 emigrierten 1.630.000 Juden,[29] meist junge Leute; die Zahl der Geburten purzelte. Ein Geburtendefizit von (sagen wir) 400.000 war die Folge.

Zusammengezählt zogen in den Jahren 1959-2007 knapp 2 Millionen (9+174+116+1.630) ostjüdische Auswanderer, hauptsächlich nach Israel und USA, weniger nach Deutschland, Kanada und anderswo!<sup>[30]</sup> Das wäre mehr als das absolute "Aus" für die Juden in den Nachfolgerstaaten der Sowjet-Union gewesen – wenn die sowjetischen Angaben stimmten (s. Tabelle 4 -links).

Doch weit gefehlt! Trotz der anfänglich um 82.000 größeren Anfangszahl (1945) und der Minus-Endzahl von 600.000 (2007) wurde die Zahl der Juden in den NSU (Nachfolgerstaaten der Sowjet-Union) immer noch auf "selbst-identifizierte" 357.000 berechnet.<sup>[31]</sup> Zugleich behauptet Putins Freund, Russlands Oberrabbi Berel Lazar,<sup>[32]</sup> die Zahl der Juden in Russland betrage immer noch 1 bis 2 Millionen (meint er vielleicht in den NSU?) und die National Conference on Soviet Jewry (NCSJ),<sup>[33]</sup> ein in den USA beheimatetes Organ für russisch-sprechende Juden, spricht von 400.000 bis 700.000 Juden in Russland, und die in den NSU im Ganzen auf 1 bis 1,5 Millionen. Die von Lazar und NCSJ genannten Zahlen sind wahrscheinlich übertrieben (ich vermute es wenigstens).

Die Eigenheiten der sowjetischen Volkszählungen lassen es aber nicht zu, die zahlenmäßige Stärke des jüdischen Volkes in der damaligen Sowjetunion verlässlich zu bestimmen: Ein Teil der Juden war nicht mehr gewillt, die Anfeindungen, die ein offenes Geständnis zu ihrem Volkstum mit sich brachten, hinzunehmen und ließ sich unter einer anderen Nationalität eintragen. Ich sehe keinen Grund, warum sich die demografische Struktur der beiden Gruppen – diejenigen, die sich zu ihrem Volk bekannten, und diejenigen, die pro forma eine andere Nationalität angegeben hatten – irgendwie unterscheiden sollten.

Also, ich habe die gleiche demografische Struktur auf die überlebenden sowjetischen Ostjuden (1945) von 4,3 Millionen zwischen den "selbstidentifizierten" und "untergetauchten" Juden angenommen, also prozentuale Geburtenreduzierungen und absolute Auswanderungen (s. Tabelle 4).

Verbrannte Erde: Der sowjetische Aufmarsch

Zum sowjetischem Aufmarsch nahm Viktor Suvorov (Pseudonym) Stellung: Er arbeitete im Generalstab der Streitkräfte der UdSSR. Als hochrangiger Offizier des sowjetischen militärischen Geheimdienstes GRU war er als sowjetischer Diplomat in Westeuropa tätig. 1978 erbat er politisches Asyl in England. Er nannte Hitler einen tollwütigen Hund, Kannibalen und Verbrecher. (Ich füge das nur an, um zu zeigen, wes Geistes Kind er ist.)

Trotzdem ist er der Autor des Artikels "Who was Planning to Attack Whom in June 1941, Hitler or Stalin? ("Wer plante wen im Juni 1941 anzugreifen, Hitler oder Stalin?"), Journal of the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies (RUSI), London, June 1985, S. 50-55<sup>[36]</sup> und des Buches Der Eisbrecher. Die Geschichte des sogenannten «großen vaterländischen Krieges». Kurzer Lehrgang. Stuttgart 1989, (russ: LEDOKOI: Istorija tak nazывaemoj «velikoj otečestvennoj vojny» Kratij kurs.)

Auszüge aus "Wer plante wen im Juni 1941 anzugreifen, Hitler oder Stalin" (Hervorhebungen durch den Verfasser)

"Tatsächlich bildeten 170 Divisionen die Erste Strategische Staffel. Von diesen waren bereits 56 unmittelbar an der Grenze aufgestellt,<sup>[37]</sup> 114 weiter rückwärts im Grenzgebiet. Jedoch ,Um den 12.-15. Juni erhielten die westlichen Militärbezirke die Weisung: Alle im Inneren (dieser Militärbezirke) stationierten Truppen seien näher an die Staatsgrenze zu verlegen.'<sup>[38]</sup> Die ganze Erste Strategische Staffel begann sich nun unmittelbar im Grenzraum zu konzentrieren. Zu den genannten 114 müssen die 69 Divisionen der Zweiten Strategischen Staffel hinzugezählt werden, die entweder bereits verlegt waren oder sich darauf vorbereiteten. Es handelt sich um die größte Truppenbewegung eines Einzelstaates in der Geschichte der Zivilisation, die unmittelbar an der Grenze und unter äußerster Geheimhaltung und

"Truppen, die sich auf Verteidigung vorbereiten, graben sich ein, heben Gräben für sich und als Panzerfallen aus, errichten Deckungen und Stacheldraht Hindernisse. In erster Linie geschieht dies auf den wahrscheinlichen Einfallsschneisen des Gegners, an Straßenkreuzungen und hinter Flusslinien. Aber die Rote Armee tat nichts dergleichen. Wie bereits berichtet, wurden die Divisionen in den Wäldern nahe der Grenze versteckt, genau wie die deutschen Divisionen, bevor sie zum Angriff antraten. 'Die Schützentruppen hätten Verteidigungsanlagen besetzen und ausbauen können, aber das geschah nicht.' [39]

"Dass keine Verteidigungsanlagen errichtet wurden, ist umso merkwürdiger, als mit der Unterzeichnung des deutsch-sowjetischen Nichtangriffspakts und der darauf folgenden Aufteilung Polens zwischen den beiden Staaten, sowjetische und deutsche Truppen sich nun unmittelbar, ohne einen schützenden 'Pufferstaat', gegenüberlagen. Überdies, während normale Vorsicht geboten hätte, die Verteidigungsbastionen der ehemaligen Stalinlinie längs der alten Grenze zu verstärken oder mindestens aufrecht zu erhalten, geschah das Gegenteil davon. Dieser mächtige Schutzwall wurde aufgegeben, an vielen Stellen in die Luft gejagt oder eingeebnet. Minenfelder wurden entschärft, und über Entfernungen von Tausenden von Kilometer wurde der Stacheldraht entfernt. [40] Partisanengruppen, die man für den Fall einer feindlichen Besetzung des Landes aufgestellt hatte, wurden aufgelöst; [41] aus Tausenden von Brücken, Bahnhöfen, Industrieanlagen wurden die Zündanlagen für den Fall einer feindlichen Invasion entfernt. Kurzum, ungeheure Anstrengungen wurden unternommen, um alles, was der Verteidigung dienen mochte, zu zerstören. [42] Außerdem, während es vor der Unterzeichnung des sowjetisch-deutschen Pakts in den sowjetischen Grenzbezirken nur Divisionen und Korps gegeben hatte, begannen sich nun förmlichen Armeen in der neuerlich erweiterten Grenzzone zu sammeln. Zwischen August 1939 und April 1941 wuchs die Zahl der Armeen in der sowjetischen Grenzzone von null auf 11 an. Drei weitere kamen im Mai hinzu, zusammen mit fünf Luftlandekorps. Hätte Hitler nicht als erster angegriffen, hätte Stalin ihm 23 Armeen und mehr als unabhängige Korps gegenübergestellt, und dies noch vor einer allgemeinen Mobilisierung."

"Die Erste Strategische Staffel, die sich im Juni 1941 längs der sowjetischen Grenze in Aufstellung befand, war nach Organisationsstruktur, Aufstellung und militärischer Vorbereitung eindeutig offensiver Natur. Das gleiche gilt für die Zweite Strategische Staffel, die ihren geheimen Vormarsch in Richtung auf die deutsche Grenze am 13. Juni 1941 aufnahm. Viele Sowjetmarschälle und -generäle geben diese Tatsachen nicht direkt zu, und natürlich wurden beide Staffeln durch den Überraschungsangriff der Deutschen überwältigt und mussten infolgedessen defensiv operieren."

"Es scheint sicher, dass die sowjetische Konzentration an der Grenze am 10. Juli abgeschlossen sein sollte. [43] So fand der deutsche Schlag, der 19 Tage früher erfolgte, die Rote Armee in einer äußerst ungünstigen Position --auf dem Bahntransport [und...] hilflos auf offener Strecke."

"Je genauer man Stalins Verhalten während dieser kritischen Periode untersucht, umso augenscheinlicher wird es, dass es keine Reaktion auf Hitlers Vorgehen darstellt. [44] Stalin handelte gemäß seinen eigenen Planungen, und diese sahen die volle Konzentration der sowjetischen Truppen an der Grenze für den 10. Juli vor."

"Gewisse Folgerungen sind unumstößlich. Erstens: Die mobilisierten Divisionen wären nicht imstande gewesen, in die Fernen Bezirke, aus denen sie kamen, zurückzukehren. Eine derartige Verlegung hätte die gesamten Verkehrsreserven für viele Monate in Anspruch genommen und in einem wirtschaftlichen Zusammenbruch geendet. Zweitens: Diese gigantischen Kräfteansammlungen hätten den Winter nicht in ihren neuen Geheimquartieren verbringen können. Im Grenzgürtel waren so viele neue Divisionen aufgestellt und untergebracht worden, dass viele von ihnen schon den Winter von 1940 auf 1941 in Unterständen hatten verbringen müssen. [45] Schon 1940 reichten die Übungsplätze, Artillerie- und Schützenschießstände im neuerworbenen westlichen Grenzgebiet für die vorhandenen Divisionen nicht aus. [46] Truppen aber, die nicht üben können, verlieren rasch ihre Kampffähigkeit."

"In jedem bedeutenden schwierigen menschlichen Vorhaben gibt es einen kritischen Moment, an welchem die Ereignisse einen Punkt erreichen, von dem aus eine Umkehr nicht mehr möglich ist. Die Sowjetunion hatte diesen Punkt am 13. Juni 1941 erreicht. Von diesem Tage an bewegten sich die Massen von Sowjettruppen heimlich, jedoch unaufhaltsam der deutschen Grenze entgegen. Damit wurde der Krieg für die Sowjetunion unvermeidlich, unabhängig davon, wie Hitler sich verhalten mochte. Schließlich zeigte die Zusammensetzung und Aufstellung der Truppen im Grenzgebiet an, dass sie nicht dazu bestimmt waren, dort zu bleiben. Details wie die Luftlandekorps am Rand der ersten 'Verteidigungslinie', die Artillerieeinheiten in den vorderen Stellungen, die Demontage der Stalin-Linie und das Fehlen jeder Verteidigungstiefengliederung oder der Bemühung, solche anzulegen, weisen nicht auf die Absicht, längs der Grenze eine ständige Verteidigungsposition einzunehmen. Würdigt man dies alles im Lichte der oben skizzierten Zhukow-Doktrin, so wird offenbar, dass die einzig glaubwürdige militärische Absicht, die Stalin haben konnte, darin bestand, selber im Sommer 1941 in den Krieg einzutreten."

S. 41: "Das Ergebnis der Kollektivierung und des darauffolgenden Hungers waren 10 bis 16 Millionen Ermordeter, in den Lagern Umgekommener, Verhungertes, Angaben über eine noch höhere Zahl haben in jüngster Zeit die sowjetische Zensur passiert. („Fragen der Geschichte“ 1988, Nr. 6, S. 32)"

S. 103: "Hitler wußte, dass der Krieg mit Russland nicht zu umgehen war. Weshalb hat er nicht Waffen und Kampfmittel in Auftrag gegeben, die auch in Russland eingesetzt werden konnten? Wenn die deutsche Industrie nur Waffen produzierte, die allein in Westeuropa und Afrika zu verwenden waren, jedoch nicht in Russland, wie kann man dann annehmen, Deutschland sei für diesen Krieg vorbereitet gewesen?"

S. 117: "Durch den Molotow-Ribbentrop-Pakt war die sowjetische Grenze in Richtung Westen vorgeschoben worden, folglich war auch die Linie, von der aus die ‚Befreiung‘ erfolgen sollte, nach Westen vorgerückt, und die Stalin-Linie nützte niemandem mehr bei einem Angriffskrieg. Sie hätte auch in Verteidigungskrieg Verwendung finden können."

S. 129: "Auf Angriffskriege bereitete sich Hitler vor, und 1936 schuf er die Luftlandtruppe. Die Anzahl der Fallschirmjäger in dieser Truppe betrug zu Beginn des Zweiten Weltkrieges 4.000 Mann. [...] Stalin [...] schuf die Luftlandtruppe im Jahre 1930. Zu Beginn des Zweiten Weltkrieges besaß die Sowjetunion über eine Million ausgebildeter Fallschirmspringer."

S. 130: "Im Verteidigungskrieg werden Fallschirmspringer NICHT gebraucht."

S. 150-153: "Im Juli 1940 spricht Hitler den Gedanken aus, dass die Sowjetunion sehr gefährlich werden könnte, besonders wenn die deutschen Truppen vom europäischen Festland auf die Britischen Inseln und nach Afrika übersetzten. Am 12. November [1940] weist Hitler in einer Unterredung mit Molotow auf die Notwendigkeit hin, ein großes Kontingent deutscher Truppen in Rumänien zu unterhalten – eine deutliche Anspielung auf die sowjetische militärische Bedrohung des rumänischen Erdöls."

"Hitler hatte den sowjetischen Regierungschef aufgefordert, die sowjetische Bedrohung von der Quelle des deutschen Erdöls abzuwenden. Stalin und Molotow haben dies nicht getan. Wer also ist schuld am Ausbruch des Krieges? Wer hat wen bedroht? Wer hat wen zu Gegenmaßnahmen provoziert?"

"Um Rumänien im Falle einer sowjetischen Offensive zu verteidigen, muss ein deutscher Schlag an einer anderen Stelle erfolgen, um dadurch die Aufmerksamkeit der Roten Armee von den Erdölfeldern abzulenken. [...] man [kam] überein, dass ein Ablenkungsangriff nur dann Erfolg haben [kann], wenn es sich dabei um eine machtvolle und zugleich überraschende Operation handelte. Das [deutsche] Truppenkontingent für diesen Einsatz wurde nach und nach so weit erhöht, bis schließlich [...] an dieser Operation praktisch sämtliche [deutsche] Landstreitkräfte und ein Großteil der Luftwaffe beteiligt waren."

"Hitlers Rechnung ging auf: Der deutsche Angriff [im Juni] 1941 an einer anderen Stelle zwang die sowjetischen Truppen, sich an der gesamten Front zurückzuziehen."

"Hitlers Schlag war gewaltig, aber nicht tödlich gewesen."

"In Stalins Karriere hat es nur wenige Irrtümer gegeben. Einer dieser wenigen – allerdings der entscheidendste – war die Besetzung Bessarabiens 1940. [...]"

"Die Annexion Bessarabiens durch die Sowjetunion [Juni 1940] und die Konzentrierung eines starken Angriffspotentials in diesem Raum einschließlich eines Luftlandekorps und der Donau-Flottille ließ Hitler die strategische Situation in einem völlig neuen Licht erscheinen und veranlaßte ihn, entsprechende Vorkehrungen zu treffen."

S. 162: "1939 begann die Sowjetunion mit der Aufstellung von Armeen im europäischen Teil ihres Landes."

S. 168: "Deutsche Truppen sind an den sowjetischen Grenzen so gut wie nicht verblieben [6 Divisionen!]. Und in eben diesem Augenblick beginnt Stalin mit der getarnten Aufstellung einer großen Anzahl von Armeen. [...] Je weiter sich die deutschen Divisionen in Richtung Westen, Norden, Süden entfernen, um so mehr sowjetische Armeen werden gegen Deutschland aufgestellt [16 sowjetische Stoßarmeen, von denen jede einzelne über mehr als 2000 Panzer verfügt; von 4 deutschen Panzertruppen verfügt jede über 600-1000 Panzer]."

S. 176: "[...] die 9. [sowjetische] Armee [von den 3 extrem starken Stoßarmeen, die stärkste Armee der Ersten Strategischen Staffel, hatte] 20 Divisionen [...], darunter 6 Panzerdivisionen [...und] 3.341 Panzer. [...] Quantitativ entspricht das dem, was die ganze Wehrmacht besitzt, und qualitativ noch einiges besser."

S. 177: "In der ersten Junihälfte des Jahres 1941 wird in der Sowjetunion die mächtigste Armee der Welt aufgestellt, aber nicht an der deutschen Grenze [...sondern] an der rumänischen Grenze [Bessarabien]."

S. 178: "Wofür? Zur Verteidigung? Ich bitte Sie, auf rumänischer Seite stehen nur geringe Streitkräfte, [...]. Ein Vorstoß [der 9. Armee] nach Rumänien würde für Deutschland den Zusammenbruch bedeuten, würde den Stillstand aller Panzer und Flugzeuge, sämtlicher Maschinen, Schiffe, der ganzen Industrie und des Transportwesens zur Folge haben. Das Erdöl ist der Lebenssaft des Krieges, und das Herz Deutschlands schlug [...] in Rumänien. Ein Angriff auf Rumänien war ein unmittelbarer Angriff auf den Herzschlag Deutschlands."

Karten: "Die 19. [sowjetische] Armee – stärkste der Zweiten Strategischen Staffel – wurde [...] an die rumänische Grenze herangeführt. Beginn des getarnten Aufschließens der Zweiten Strategischen Staffel an die Westgrenze ist der 13. Juni 1941. [Sie hatte 30 Divisionen.]"

9. Armee – stärkste Armee der Ersten Strategischen Staffel – und 19. Armee der Zweiten Strategischen Staffel hatten die Aufgabe, sofort die rumänischen Ölfelder im Raum Ploieşti zu besetzen, um damit die ungeschützte primäre Erdölquelle Deutschlands in ihre Hand zu bekommen.

S. 314: "Marschall der Sowjetunion A.A. Gretschko kann es bezeugen: 'Elf Tage nachdem Hitler den endgültigen Kriegsplan gegen die Sowjetunion akzeptiert hatte (18. Dezember 1940), war diese Tatsache und die wesentlichen Daten dieser Entscheidung der deutschen Führung unseren Aufklärungsorganen bekannt.'" (Militärhistorische Zeitschrift 1966, Nr. 6, S. 8.)

S. 315: "Am 21. Juni 1941 fand eine Sitzung des Politbüros statt. [Der Chef des militärischen Geheimdiensts, Generalleutnant F.I.] Golikow meldete [...], dass die unmittelbare Vorbereitung zur Invasion [der Sowjetunion] noch nicht begonnen habe, ohne diese Vorbereitung aber könne man den Krieg nicht beginnen."

"Zehn bis zwölf Stunden später begann das 'Unternehmen Barbarossa'."

S. 337f.: "Das Problem [der Sowjetsoldaten vor Kriegsausbruch] besteht darin, dass es an den Westgrenzen [...] keine Schießplätze gibt, keine Truppenübungsplätze, keine Panzerparcours, keine Ausbildungszentren, dass die Voraussetzungen für eine Gefechtsausbildung fehlen."

"Der Krieg begann nicht so, wie Stalin es gewollt hatte, und deshalb endete er auch nicht so: Stalin bekam nur die Hälfte von Europa."

S. 406: "Generalfeldmarschall W Keitel: 'Ich betone, dass alle von uns bis zum Frühjahr 1941 durchgeführten vorbereitenden Maßnahmen den Charakter reiner Verteidigungsvorkehrungen für den Fall eines Angriffs durch die Rote Armee trugen. Insofern kann man den ganzen Krieg im Osten gewissermaßen einen Präventivkrieg nennen. [...] Wir beschlossen [...], einem Angriff Sowjetrußlands zuvorkommen und durch einen Überraschungsangriff dessen Streitkräfte zu zerschlagen. Gegen Frühjahr 1941 kam ich zu der festen Überzeugung, dass uns die starke Konzentration der russischen Truppen und deren nachfolgenden Angriff auf Deutschland in strategischer und wirtschaftlicher Hinsicht in eine außerordentlich kritische Lage bringen könnten. [...] In den ersten Wochen hätte ein Angriff von seiten Russlands Deutschland in eine extrem ungünstige Situation versetzt. Unser Angriff war eine unmittelbare Folge dieser Bedrohung. [...]"

"Generaloberst A. Jodl, der Chefkonstrukteur der deutschen Kriegspläne, behauptete dasselbe [...] Keitel und Jodl änderten ihren Standpunkt nicht und wurden aufgrund des Urteils des sogenannten 'Internationalen Gerichtshofs' in Nürnberg zusammen mit den anderen 'Hauptkriegsverbrechern' gehängt. Eine der Hauptanklagen gegen sie lautete auf 'Entfesselung eines nichtprovozierten Angriffskrieges' gegen die Sowjetunion."

S. 420: "Die sowjetischen Stäbe hatten demnach vor dem Krieg KEINE Pläne für eine Verteidigung und auch keine für Pläne für Gegenoffensive ausgearbeitet? ... O nein, sie haben bekanntlich intensiv gearbeitet. Sie haben Pläne für den [Angriffs-]Krieg ausgearbeitet."

S. 424: "Am 26. Juni 1941 nahm das 4. Fliegerkorps die Bombardierung der Erdölfelder von Ploieşti in Rumänien auf. In diesen wenigen Tagen der Bombardierung war die Erdölförderung in Rumänien fast um die Hälfte gesunken. Selbst in einer Situation, bei der praktisch die gesamten sowjetischen Fliegerkräfte auf ihren Flugplätzen niedergehalten waren, fand sie noch genügend Kraft, der Erdölproduktion einen beachtlichen Schaden zuzufügen. In jeder anderen Lage wären die sowjetischen Luftstreitkräfte noch viel gefährlicher gewesen und hätten mit ihren Einsätzen gegen die Erdölgebiete die gesamte deutsche militärische, industrielle und Transportkapazität lahmgelegt können. Hitler hatte nur zu gut diese Bedrohung verstanden und eine Invasion in die UdSSR für die einzig mögliche Verteidigung gehalten. Aber auch das rettete ihn nicht."

S. 429f.: "Hitler hielt die sowjetische Invasion für unvermeidlich, aber er hatte sie nicht in der allernächsten Zeit erwartet. Die deutschen Truppen wurden für Operationen auf Nebenschauplätzen eingesetzt [Niederschlagung des kommunistischen Aufstandes gegen das prodeutsche serbische Regime; Besetzung Norwegens, um eine britische Besetzung Norwegens zuvorkommen (wegen der Eisenerzgrube in Kiruna/Schweden), usw.] und der Beginn des 'Unternehmens Barbarossa' verschoben. Am 22. Juni 1941 lief es schließlich an. Hitler war sich ganz offensichtlich nicht bewußt, wie sehr ihm das Glück hold gewesen war. Wäre das 'Unternehmens Barbarossa' erneut verschoben worden, [...] dann hätte Hitler nicht erst 1945 Hand an sich legen müssen, sondern schon sehr viel früher."

"Es gibt mehrere Hinweise, dass der Termin für die sowjetische Operation 'Gewitter' auf den 6. Juli 1941 festgesetzt war. Die Memoiren sowjetischer Marschälle, Generäle und Admirale, Archivdokumente, eine mathematische Analyse der vorliegenden Daten zu der Bewegung Tausender sowjetischer Militärtransportzüge – das alles deutet auf den 10. Juli 1941 als Zeitpunkt hin, an dem der Aufmarsch der Zweiten Strategischen Staffel der Roten Armee in der Nähe der Westgrenzen abzuschließen war. Aber die sowjetische Militärtheorie sah den Übergang zum zügigen Angriff nicht nach der abgeschlossenen Truppenkonzentration vor, sondern vor diesem Abschluß. In diesem Fall, konnte ein Teil der Zweiten Strategischen Staffel bereits auf gegnerischem Territorium ausgeladen und in den Kampf geführt werden."

"Schukow (und auch Stalin) hatten eine Vorliebe dafür, ihre Überraschungsschläge an einem Sonntagmorgen zu führen. Der 6. Juli 1941 war der letzte Sonntag vor dem vollständigen Aufmarsch der sowjetischen Truppen."

"Armeegeneral S.P. Iwanow gibt [...] einen direkten Hinweis auf dieses Datum. Den deutschen Truppen war es gelungen, uns 'buchstäblich um zwei Wochen zuvorkommen.' – Wäre das das nicht passiert, hätte die Geschichte einen anderen Verlauf genommen. Die Rote Armee hätte das Ziel Berlin sehr bald erreicht und auch noch andere Ziele weiter im Westen Europas [Frankreich?]."

This association with headquarters in Paris, and branch offices in thirty-two countries of emigration, transit and immigration became the European arm for a world-wide immigrant and refugee service. In the period between 1925 and 1939, an average of 100,000 Jewish men, women and children emigrated from the area of Jewish misery in Europe each year. In consequence of this effort, hundreds of thousands of Jews had been helped to settle not only in the United States, but in the dominions of the British Empire, in the Far East, in South and Central America, and in Palestine."

Of these 56 were already deployed directly on the frontier, 114 were deployed further back in the frontier zone, but: 'On 12-15 June the order was given to the western military districts: all divisions stationed in the interior [of those military districts] are to be moved nearer to the state frontier'. The entire 1st Strategic Echelon now began its concentration directly in the border belt. To these 114 must be added the 69 divisions of 2nd Strategic Echelon which had either moved already or were preparing to do so. Thus, on the day of the famous TASS communique, the movement of 183 divisions was in train; the biggest troop movement by a single state in the history of civilisation; a movement right to the frontier itself and conducted with maximum secrecy and concealment." S. 53: "But this explanation is not borne out by the facts. Troops preparing for defence bury themselves in the ground, dig trenches and anti-tank ditches, construct cover and barbed wire barricades. In the first instance this is done in the most likely avenues of enemy advance, across roads and behind river lines. But the Red Army did nothing of the kind. As has been recorded earlier, divisions were hidden in woods near the frontier in exactly the same way as were the German divisions before they made their surprise attack. 'The rifle troops could have occupied and completed defensive installations, but this was not done'." "This failure to erect defensive works is all the more curious since, with the signing of the Soviet-German Non-Aggression Treaty and the subsequent "partition" of Poland between the two states, Soviet and German forces now confronted each other across a common frontier with no "buffer state" between them. Moreover, while common prudence might have dictated the strengthening or at least the retention of the Stalin Line fortification along the old frontier, the opposite was happening. This powerful protective system was dismantled and, in many places blown up or earthed over; minefields were disarmed and over a distance of thousands of kilometres 'the barbed wire had been removed'. Partisan detachments which had been created in case these lands were occupied by the enemy, were disbanded; explosive charges were removed from thousands of bridges, railway stations and industrial complexes which had been prepared for destruction in case of invasion. In short, colossal efforts were made to destroy everything connected with defence. At the same time, while prior to the treaty's signature only divisions and corps had existed in the Soviet frontier districts, formed armies now began to assemble in the newly-extended border zone. Between August 1939 and April 1941, the number of armies on the Soviet Western border increased from zero to 11. Three more joined them during May together with five airborne corps. If Hitler had not attacked first, Stalin would have had 23 armies and more than 20 independent corps, facing him. This took place before general mobilisation." S. 54: "The 1st Strategic Echelon which was forming up on the Soviet border in June 1941 was, by virtue of its organisational structure, deployment and military preparedness, clearly offensive in nature. So too was the 2nd Strategic Echelon which began its secret movement towards the German frontier on 13 June 1941."

Many Soviet marshals and generals do not acknowledge these facts directly and, of course, both echelons were overwhelmed in the German surprise attack and had to perform to fight defensively."

"It seems certain that the Soviet concentration on the frontier was due to be completed by 10 July. Thus, the German blow which fell just 19 days earlier found the Red Army in a most unfavourable situation – in railway wagons [...and] stuck helpless in open fields."

"The more closely one studies Stalin's actions during this critical period the more apparent it becomes that they were not a reaction to Hitler's moves. Stalin acted according to his own plans, and these foresaw a full concentration of Soviet troops on the frontier by 10 July."

"Certain conclusions are incontrovertible. First, the mobilised divisions could not have returned to the distant districts from whence they came. Such a move again would have absorbed the entire resources of the rail network for many months and would have resulted in economic catastrophe. Secondly, these gigantic forces could not have been left to spend the winter where they were hidden. So many new divisions had been created and assembled in the frontal belt that many of them had already had to spend the winter of 1940-41 in dugouts. As early as 1940 there had been insufficient training centres and artillery and rifle ranges in the newly-acquired western frontier zone even for the existing divisions. Troops who cannot train rapidly lose the capacity to fight."

"In every major human complex endeavour there exist a critical moment at which events reach a point of no return. This moment for the Soviet Union fell 13 June 1941. After that day, masses of Soviet troops were secretly but inexorably moving towards the German border. Once 13 June had passed the Soviet leadership could no longer turn these troops back nor even halt them, for economic and military reasons. War became inevitable for the Soviet Union, irrespective of how Hitler might have acted. Finally, the composition and disposition of the forces in the frontier zone did not indicate that they were intended to remain there. Such features as the airborne corps in the first crust of the 'defences,' artillery units in the forward locations, the dismantling of the Stalin Line and the absence of any defence in depth or effort to construct one, do not point to the intention of maintaining any permanent defensive position along the border. If all this is viewed in the context of the Zhukov doctrinal framework outlined earlier, then it becomes clear that the only credible military intention which Stalin could have had was to begin the war himself in the summer of 1941."

Abstract

In 1983, Sanning's trail-blazing demographic study on the dissolution of Eastern European Jewry appeared, showing that Jewish "Holocaust" losses cannot have amounted to more than several hundred thousand victims. This report gives an update on further research since then. In particular, newly available data about the emigration of Jews from the Soviet Union and its successor states are of interest in this regard. They indicate that Sanning was correct in assuming that Soviet post-war census data about the number of Jews who survived World War Two were unreliable. The number of Jews who have emigrated since the 1970s, plus the demographic collapse Jewry experienced after the war due to an extremely low birth rate, compels the conclusion that many more Jews survived the war in the USSR than previously assumed.

1.5 Million Jewish Emigrants to Overseas from the "Area of Jewish Misery in Europe" (1925-1939)

More than thirty years ago my Dissolution was published in Germany and the United States. In the meantime, new sources have come to light and unforeseeable developments have occurred that confirm my thesis. To aid in understanding of this update, the tables are shown in the same categories that were used in Dissolution.

Poland, Germany Rumania and the Baltics - where almost five million Jews lived at the outset of the 1930s - pursued explicitly anti-Semitic policies, particularly the first two; on top of that came the Great Depression. The result was an economic immiseration of the Jewish population, particularly in Poland.

Emigration seemed the only solution: between 1931 and 1939 over 500,000, possibly 600,000 left Poland, over 400,000 left Greater Germany (including the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia), 100,000 left Rumania and about 25,000 Jews left the Baltics; but there was also Jewish emigration from Hungary (and presumably also Slovakia). The Zionist-leaning Institute of Contemporary History of Munich has confirmed this since 1958<sup>[1]</sup> By the end of 1939 Poland as well as the General Gouvernement, Germany (including the Protectorate) Rumania, the Baltics, Hungary and Slovakia had lost three million Jews to emigration, border changes, flight and declining birth rates. (see Table 1).

US Assistant Secretary of State Breckinridge Long in November 1943 stated that the US had admitted 580,000 immigrating "victims of oppression) in the past ten years; most of these were Jews (only 100,000 were German Jews). Palestine had almost 300,000 Jewish immigrants. Other countries too (e.g. Latin America; Western Europe) reported a heavy immigration of Jews. This according to the Dissolution.

Indeed, 16 years before 1958 - 1942 - the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia reported the same: a large Jewish emigration from East and Central Europe overseas had taken place from the mid-1920s to the end of the '30s, as follows:<sup>[2]</sup>

"With the passage of the 1924 Immigration Quota Law by Congress and the necessity of exploring the possibilities for immigration to other of the world, HIAS sought to strengthen and enlarge its activities abroad. In 1927, it entered into an agreement with the Jewish Colonization Association (ICA) of Paris, France, for the purpose of forming what has since become known as HICEM, the abbreviated name for the HIASICA Emigration Association. This association with headquarters in Paris, and branch offices in thirty-two countries of emigration, transit and immigration became the European arm for a world-wide immigrant and refugee service. In the period between 1925 and 1939, an average of 100,000 Jewish men, women and children emigrated from the area of Jewish misery in Europe each year. In consequence of this effort, hundreds of thousands of Jews had been helped to settle not only in the United States, but in the dominions of the British Empire, in the Far East, in South and Central America, and in Palestine."

In all the time since then this statement of the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia has never been challenged by the Zionists. ["Area of Jewish Misery in Europe": Central and Eastern Europe, particularly Poland, but also National-Socialist Germany including the Protectorate, Rumania, the Baltics, Hungary and Slovakia; the Institute for Contemporary History sees it exactly this way! The Western European immigration and transit countries and the Soviet Union (officially Jewish-friendly) were exceptions.] So, the emigration of 1.5 million eastern Jews from Central and Eastern Europe from 1925 to 1939 took place in the shape of an organized emigration in Poland, Germany, Rumania, in the Baltic countries, etc. Therefore the Jewish population numbers of the early 1930s in the emigration countries in Central and Eastern Europe [not including the USSR] and in the immigration countries such as the USA, South America, Palestine, etc. are only of historical interest; they bear no resemblance to the realities of 1939, let alone 1940/1941 or 1945! The Polish census of 1931 already revealed a sudden decline in the birth rate among eastern Jews; the declines were too large to be explained by reduced family formation or a switch in claimed religious affiliation: the number of births simply fell too fast and too far. No wonder that the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia lamented:

"[...]even in Eastern Europe the birth rate was falling, and began to approach that of Western Europe."<sup>[3]</sup> and this was already below the death rate. The massive emigration entailed a Jewish population decline in Poland of 20% from 1931 to 1939 and must have had a directly overwhelming effect on the number of births, because the young, fertile segments of the population are always the first to leave home.

A further indication of a fertility crisis is the "Child/Woman ratio."[\[4\]](#) This ratio in 1931 was 455(!) for eastern Jews in Poland; the minimum ratio required for population replacement is 500. In view of the huge wave of emigration of eastern Jews in the 1930s, driven by the ever-mounting economic immiseration and an anti-Semitic government, one must infer that this "Child/Woman ratio" must have been far below 455 (perhaps 200-300) and that there must have been a birth-rate deficit throughout the 1930s among the eastern-Jewish population of Poland.[\[5\]](#)

The content of the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia is entirely consonant with the Dissolution that was published 30 years ago; the Jewish population in the parts of Europe occupied first by Germany and later by the Soviet Union fell from over nine million in the 1930s to about eight million by 1939 (see Table 1 under A.).

Jews Missing in the Second World War

Shortly after the Second World War over half a million Jews entered German territory,[\[6\]](#) chiefly in the American zone of occupation. But what was their nationality? No one knows. Where did they come from? To this very day what is known is as good as nothing. British General Sir Frederick E. Morgan, head of the UNRRA Operations in Germany, said in a press conference in Frankfurt am Main on January 2, 1946 that an unknown Jewish organization must be funneling great masses of Jews from the east into Germany. The journalist Dr. Raul Hilberg also said:[\[7\]](#)

"In Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary many Jews chose to not wait; they decided to embark upon their journey [...] From Poland the exodus began through Czechoslovakia to the American zone in Germany. From Hungary and even Roumania, the Jews began to arrive in Austria. By November 1945, the flow was beginning to thicken, and thousands of refugees were spilling over into Italy."

Indeed, Dissolution indicated 400,000 Jewish DPs (Displaced Persons) in 1947; this number comes from the New York Times.[\[8\]](#) This according to the Dissolution.

How large was this flood from 1945 to 1947 really? New numbers from eminent Jewish personalities and organizations on the flood go far beyond these numbers. Dr. Nahum Goldmann, longtime president of the Jewish World Congress, should know the facts of the Jewish drama very well; he wrote in his book Das Jüdische Paradox (The Jewish Paradox) in 1978(!), that[\[9\]](#)

"... 1945 on [were] the six-hundred thousand Jewish concentration-camp survivors, whom no country would take in; this is a historical fact"

But even before that the American Jewish Year Book (AJYB) 1946-1947 reported,

"By the end of January, the flow of refugees into the American zone reached such proportions that it was estimated more than 600,000 persons would be interned in displaced-person camps by March."[\[10\]](#)

Further to these were the Jewish DPs in the British and Russian zones (numbers unknown), 35,000 in Austria and 30,000 in Italy.[\[11\]](#) That amounts to 700,000 Jewish DPs.

Jon und David Kimche reported in their book The Secret Roads (1954) on

"[...], some 800,000 homeless [Jewish] refugees rotting in the grey slum-camps of Europe, [...]" [12] [1945/46], whose only wish was: "Get us out of Europe!" [13] The difference between 600,000 (Goldmann 1945) and 800,000 (Kimche 1945/46) would appear to be the returnees from the Soviet Union (157,000).

David Kimche isn't just anybody; this Israeli secret agent was a leading member of the Mossad. Since the Mossad was a major factor in bringing Jews out of the German sphere of influence, he is certainly informed as to the details of the Jewish refugee saga.

The Israeli Mossad secret service was responsible among other things for the emigration of Jews to Israel from countries in which official Aliyah agencies were illegal, and in general for the protection of Jewish communities all over the world. The Mossad was founded on December 13, 1949, but it had been created unofficially long before in 1937 in Tel Aviv as Mossad le Aliyah Bet, Committee for Illegal Immigration, by labor leaders and the Haganah (underground resistance fighters).

Mossad agents were everywhere in Europe and the Middle East, and they succeeded in illegally transporting fully 100,000 Jews to Palestine. The Jewish refugees came from Holland, Sweden, France, Yugoslavia and so on, but especially from Rumania: ships left there regularly for the Levant. The ships Amiram, Assipa, Astir, Atlantic, Bulbul, Dalin, Dora, Enzo Sereni, Exodus, Fede, Fenice, Haim Arlosoroff, Hannah Senes, Hatikva, Henrietta Szold, Hilda, Josiah Wedgwood, Karbeh, Katriel Yaffe, Maria, Maritza, Max Nordau, Mefkure (sunk), Melavim, Meret Hagettaot, Milka, Milos, Pacific, Pan Crescent, Pan York, Patria (gesunken), Petro, Salvador (sunk), Shaar Yishuv, Shabbtai Lujinski, Struma (sunk), Tel Hai, Tiger Hili, Torus, Yagur, and many others besides transported tens of thousands of Jews from Europe to Palestine. [14] Besides that, the Institute of Jewish Affairs (IJA) (1943) reported that 180,000 Jews escaped the German sphere of influence between the beginning of the war to mid-1943. [15] Extrapolating for the entire year 1943 one must therefore conclude that another 20,000 Jews escaped. Let's say 225,000 from 1941-1943.

The War Refugee Board (WRB) established by US President Franklin D. Roosevelt brought 200,000 Jews out of the German sphere of influence by 1945. [16] Among these would certainly have been some of the western European Jews and/or Soviet citizens not evacuated before German occupation. Likewise Jon and David Kimche indeed reported that 300,000 Jews left Europe during the war despite vigorous efforts on the part of Germans to prevent it. [17] Further still there was the HICEM (1927-1940 Paris; 1940 Lisbon). With their help 90,000 Jews left aboard neutral Portuguese ships by 1945. [18] I assume some portion of these are double-counted. Regardless, around half a million Jews (IJA, WRB, HICEM) escaped by means of an organized flight from the German sphere of influence; together with the 600,000 "Holocaust survivors" of the "gray camps of misery" this yields 1 million previously missing Jews (see Table 2 under B). Beside the hundreds of thousands of Jewish dead the question of the extra survivors, particularly the Polish, German and western European Jews might be answered for the most part. It is not known from what countries the over one million Jewish DPs "in the gray camps of misery of Europe" and the Jews escaped from the German sphere of influence come, exactly how many there were, from which concentration camps or ghettos, etc. they came, of whom the Institute of Jewish Affairs (1943), the War Refugee Board (1945), the AJYB (1948), David Kimche (1954), HICEM and Nahum Goldmann (1978) report: from Poland, Germany, France, Belgium, the Netherlands or even from the part of the Soviet Union occupied by German troops from 1941 to 1944... !? Today no one speaks of the matter; but after the war most were here, for the most part in the American zone of occupation in Germany (Kimche, Morgan, Hilberg, Goldmann, American Jewish Year Book) or fled to other countries during the war (Kimche, Institute of Jewish Affairs, War Refugee Board, HICEM). They are for the most part uncounted in the survivor statistics!

Jewish Survivors in the Soviet Union

In World War II the Soviets deported an estimated over 30 million people from their own population to Siberia and the Urals, including the overwhelming majority of the Jews - one hears of over 80%; I suspect it is more. The secretary of the Soviet Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee, Shachne Epstein, confirmed in autumn 1944(!) that the Soviets had deported 3.5 million Jews from the occupied areas;[\[19\]](#) one million eastern Jews were therefore outside the control of German forces. After the war western Jewish historians and other authors reported about deportations to Siberia and the Urals. The historian Dr. Alexander Dallin (Stanford University) wrote in 1957[\[20\]](#) that the number of civilians left behind amounted to only 65 million persons; therefore about 35 million persons were deported by the Soviets.

Gerald Reitlinger reported in his book The Final Solution 1961:[\[21\]](#)

"The Russians evacuated essentially the working-age population, [...]"

and

"In most of the cities involved, less than half the population remained behind."

90% of the Jews lived in the cities. Historian Joshua Rothenberg (Brandeis University) noted in 1970:[\[22\]](#)

"The bulk of the Jewish population left [...] in flight from the defeated [German] armies"

Above all, the Soviets deported first the Jews who had technical and academic credentials. The Institute of Jewish Affairs wrote: tereibt:[\[23\]](#)

"In many cities and towns, especially in the Ukraine and Byelorussia, the Jews were among the first who were evacuated."

and

" [...] there was enough time to evacuate the civilian population."

Effectively all (75-100%) Jews were deported/evacuated from cities such as Kharkiv, Kherson, Dnipropetrovsk, Mariupol, Melitopol, Minsk, Nikolayevsk, Novohrad-Volynskiy, Poltava, Zhytomyr, Smolensk, Taganrog and Chernigov - with certainty also Kalinin - and from the rest that we have information about (Berdychiv, Kiev, Kropyvnytskyi, Odessa, Uman, Vinnytsia, Vitebsk), perhaps somewhat fewer. This according to the Dissolution.

Reinhard Gehlen, first president of the Federal News Service under Chancellor Konrad Adenauer, wrote in 1972 that about one third of the population was deported or recruited by the Soviets.[24] During the war he was head of the Wehrmacht Department of Foreign Armies East (FHO); his brief was precisely to evaluate enemy capabilities. Who could have known these things better than he?

Thus over 30 million persons were deported by the Soviets, as also Dallin (Jewish-American historian) and Carter (Russian War Relief) confirm. The deported consisted primarily of recruitable men, specialists of every stripe, eastern Jews and Russians (at the time a quarter of the population) as well as workers in general; one look at the recruitable men makes it clear that Russian and eastern Jewish city dwellers were especially affected by the deportation measures and that the Belorussian and Ukrainian (indigenous) population was significantly less disturbed.

When the horrific effects, particularly on the Russians or eastern Jews, of the Soviet deportations are discussed by Jewish-Soviet (autumn 1944), Jewish-American, Jewish-English and even federal German authorities among others, it is incomprehensible that this is forever disputed, as well as the fact that it was so, simply dismissed out of hand. The Dissolution reckoned on the strength of innumerable proofs the number of surviving Soviet eastern Jews at 4.3 million (see Table 3, under C.);[25] since then tremendous forces have convulsed the vast empire: the Soviet Union collapsed. The Zionist assertion - not an analysis of any sort - that only 2 million Jews lived in the USSR past 1945[26] remained in force, although neither the Soviets nor the Zionists offered any proofs of it whatsoever (see Table 3, under C.). Who is right? Professor Frank Lorimer (Princeton University) examined the natural fertility of the Soviet peoples in 1946 for the League of Nations and thereby came to the conclusion that the Jews had the lowest fertility in 1926; it was just sufficient to maintain the population. Fertility for the years 1959 and 1989 calculated on the same basis is (500 is required for a constant population level):

The Soviet-Jewish censuses of the postwar generation disclose not even half of the counts of their parents' generation. This drastic fall-off in the birth rate and assimilation in the local population had led to the inability of the Jewry of eastern Europe to assert itself.

The first Soviet census after World War II (1959) counted 2,268,000 self-identified Jews; the last was in 1989 with only 1,451,000 Jews. The decline of 817,000 reflects a shortfall of births leading to a natural decrease of 518,000 as well as the emigration of 299,000 Jews.

But the collapse of the Soviet Union caused something unexpected: the eastern Jews in the successor states of the Soviet Union could emigrate en masse. Between 1989 and 2007 1,630,000 Jews emigrated, [29] mostly young people; the number of births plummeted. A birth deficit of (let's say) 400,000 was the result. Altogether fully 2 million (9+174+116+1.630) eastern Jewish emigrants moved mostly to Israel and the USA, fewer to Germany, Canada and elsewhere in the years from 1959 to 2007! [30] That is more than would have figured into the total expulsion of all Jews from the successor states of the Soviet Union - if the Soviet figures were consistent (see Table 4 - left side).

But something's wrong! Despite the initially larger by 82,000 starting number (1945) and the negative final number of 600,000 (2007) the number of Jews in the successor states are still based on the "self-identified" number of 357,000. [31] At the same time, Putin's friend, Chief Rabbi of Russia Berel Lazar, [32] asserts that the number of Jews in Russia still comes to 1 or 2 million (might he mean in the successor states?) and the National Conference on Soviet Jewry (NCSJ), [33] an association for Russian-speaking Jews based in the USA, speaks of 400,000 to 700,000 in Russia, and those in the successor states altogether of 1 to 1.5 million. The numbers given by Lazar and the NCSJ are probably exaggerated (at least I think so).

The particulars of the Soviet censuses do not admit of reliably arriving at the numerical strength of the Jewish people in the former Soviet Union: a portion of the Jews was no longer willing to face the alienation that open statement of their ethnicity brought with it and claimed other nationalities. I see no reason why the demographic characteristics of the two groups - those who identified themselves with their people, and those that gave out some other nationality - should have been distinguished in any way.

Therefore, I have assumed the same demographic characteristics for the surviving Soviet eastern Jews (1945) of 4.3 million between the "self-identified" Jews and the "underground" Jews, therefore proportional declines in birth rate and absolute emigration numbers (see Table 4).

And note: after the emigration wave in the 1970s and '80s and especially in the '90s of 2 million Jews (as above) and the calculated birth shortfalls of over 1.5 million (150+199+304+468+550) in the postwar period there still remain in 2007 700,000 Jews in the successor states of the Soviet Union: 357,000 'self-identified' and, theoretically, 343,000 'underground' Jews.

I have no idea how many there really are (50,000, 500,000 or 750,000). The numbers however make it clear: the figure of 2 million Jews (1945) in the Soviet Union lacks any semblance of reality; in other words: it is risibly low, simply impossible; there must in reality have been at least double the number. It appears as though the estimated number of Soviet Jews of 4.3 million in the Dissolution comes closer to the truth.

Russia still owes the world an explanation of what happened during World War II to the roughly thirty million deported soldiers/recruits and civilians - among these over 3.5 million Jews - in the parts of the USSR not conquered by the Germans (non-occupied Russia, Siberia and the Urals).

Conclusion

There is no longer any doubt that the eastern Jewish population in the subsequently former German- and then Soviet-occupied Europe fell during the 1930s from over nine million to about eight million by 1939. (Institute for Contemporary History, Universal Jewish Encyclopedia). How otherwise can the hundreds of thousands of Jewish immigrants to North and South America, western Europe, Palestine, etc. before the war (US Assistant Secretary of State Breckinridge Long, Dr. Markus Wischnitzer, American Jewish Year Book)?

Just as undeniable are - next to the hundreds of thousands of Jewish dead - the rediscovered, roughly one million concentration-camp inmates and escapees in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, etc., that is, the apparently missing. The world continues to wait for an answer from the Zionists, what countries they come from, how many there were and from which concentration camps or ghettos they come (the head of the UNRRA of Germany Sir Frederick Morgan, the Israeli Mossad agent David Kimche, the year-long president of the Jewish World Congress Dr. Nahum Goldmann, the American Jewish Year Book, also the U.S. War Refugee Board, the Institute of Jewish Affairs, as well as the HICEM-Jewish Colonization Association). Instead, a stubborn silence!

In any case the Zionists' purported number of eastern Jewish survivors in the Soviet Union (2,032,000) must be corrected upward by a couple of million. The Soviet evacuations of people and material attested to by countless Zionist and German witness testimonies can no longer be denied (i.a., Dallin, Epstein, Gehlen, Reitlinger, Rothenberg).[\[34\]](#) And finally, all indications point to an overwhelming natural population drop of eastern Jews since 1945 in the Soviet Union. [35] - presaged by much-too-low birth rates and assimilation and not least by the emigration surge from the successor states of the Soviet Union. These have brought about a tragic end to the Jews of eastern Europe. Sadly, I have not been able to come up with new numbers for the Polish, Belorussian, Ukrainian, Russian, Baltic and Rumanian Jews deported by the Soviets. The horrific losses of eastern Jews on the front, in the Urals and in Siberia (military and civilian) simply must have taken great numbers - I estimate very roughly a million on the basis of Zionist information. The Soviets employed every measure to deny survival and took no notice of the lives of a million persons as described in the Dissolution! But concealment is not erasure!

Scorched Earth: The Soviet Concentration of Troops

Viktor Suvorov (pseudonym) elaborated on the 1939 Soviet concentration of troops at the border with Germany: He used to work for the Joint Staff of the Soviet Armed Forces. As a high-ranking officer of the Soviet military secret service GRU, he was active as a Soviet diplomat in Western Europe. In 1978, he asked for political asylum in Great Britain. He called Hitler a rabid dog, a cannibal and a criminal. (I mention this only to show what his sympathies in fact are.)

Still, he is the author of the article "Who Was Planning to Attack Whom in June 1941, Hitler or Stalin?," Journal of the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies (RUSI), London, June 1985, pp. 50-55[36] and the book Ice-Breaker: Who Started the Second World War?. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1990 (Russian: LEDOKOI: Istorija tak nazyvaemoj «velikoj otečestvennoj vojny» Kratij kurs.)

Excerpts from "Who Was Planning to Attack Whom in June 1941, Hitler or Stalin?":

p. 52: "There were in fact 170 divisions in the 1st Strategic Echelon. Of these, 56 were already deployed directly on the frontier,[37] 114 were deployed further back in the frontier zone, but: 'On 12-15 June the order was given to the western military districts: all divisions stationed in the interior [of those military districts] are to be moved nearer to the state frontier'.<sup>[38]</sup> The entire 1st Strategic Echelon now began its concentration directly in the border belt. To these 114 must be added the 69 divisions of 2nd Strategic Echelon which had either moved already or were preparing to do so. Thus, on the day of the famous TASS communique, the movement of 183 divisions was in train; the biggest troop movement by a single state in the history of civilisation; a movement right to the frontier itself and conducted with maximum secrecy and concealment."

p. 53: "But this explanation is not borne out by the facts. Troops preparing for defence bury themselves in the ground, dig trenches and anti-tank ditches, construct cover and barbed wire barricades. In the first instance this is done in the most likely avenues of enemy advance, across roads and behind river lines. But the Red Army did nothing of the kind. As has been recorded earlier, divisions were hidden in woods near the frontier in exactly the same way as were the German divisions before they made their surprise attack. 'The rifle troops could have occupied and completed defensive installations, but this was not done'.<sup>[39]</sup>

"This failure to erect defensive works is all the more curious since, with the signing of the Soviet-German Non-Aggression Treaty and the subsequent "partition" of Poland between the two states, Soviet and German forces now confronted each other across a common frontier with no "buffer state" between them. Moreover, while common prudence might have dictated the strengthening or at least the retention of the Stalin Line fortification along the old frontier, the opposite was happening. This powerful protective system was dismantled and, in many places blown up or earthed over; minefields were disarmed and over a distance of thousands of kilometres 'the barbed wire had been removed'.<sup>[40]</sup> Partisan detachments which had been created in case these lands were occupied by the enemy, were disbanded;<sup>[41]</sup> explosive charges were removed from thousands of bridges, railway stations and industrial complexes which had been prepared for destruction in case of invasion. In short, colossal efforts were made to destroy everything connected with defence.<sup>[42]</sup> At the same time, while prior to the treaty's signature only divisions and corps had existed in the Soviet frontier districts, formed armies now began to assemble in the newly extended border zone. Between August 1939 and April 1941, the number of armies on the Soviet Western border increased from zero to 11. Three more joined them during May together with five airborne corps. If Hitler had not attacked first, Stalin would have had 23 armies and more than 20 independent corps facing him. This took place before general mobilisation."

p. 54: "The 1st Strategic Echelon which was forming up on the Soviet border in June 1941 was, by virtue of its organisational structure, deployment and military preparedness, clearly offensive in nature. So too was the 2nd Strategic Echelon which began its secret movement towards the German frontier on 13 June 1941. Many Soviet marshals and generals do not acknowledge these facts directly and, of course, both echelons were overwhelmed in the German surprise attack and had perforce to fight defensively."

"It seems certain that the Soviet concentration on the frontier was due to be completed by 10 July.<sup>[43]</sup> Thus, the German blow which fell just 19 days earlier found the Red Army in a most unfavourable situation - in railway wagons [...and] stuck helpless in open fields."

"The more closely one studies Stalin's actions during this critical period the more apparent it becomes that they were not a reaction to Hitler's moves.<sup>[44]</sup> Stalin acted according to his own plans, and these foresaw a full concentration of Soviet troops on the frontier by 10 July."

"Certain conclusions are incontrovertible. First, the mobilised divisions could not have returned to the distant districts from whence they came. Such a move again would have absorbed the entire resources of the rail network for many months and would have resulted in economic catastrophe. Secondly, these gigantic forces could not have been left to spend the winter where they were hidden. So many new divisions had been created and assembled in the frontal belt that many of them had already had to spend the winter of 1940-41 in dugouts.<sup>[45]</sup> As early as 1940 there had been insufficient training centres and artillery and rifle ranges in the newly-acquired western frontier zone even for the existing divisions.<sup>[46]</sup> Troops who cannot train rapidly lose the capacity to fight."

"In every major human complex endeavour there exists a critical moment at which events reach a point of no return. This moment for the Soviet Union fell 13 June 1941. After that day, masses of Soviet troops were secretly but inexorably moving towards the German border. Once 13 June had passed the Soviet leadership could no longer turn these troops back nor even halt them, for economic and military reasons. War became inevitable for the Soviet Union, irrespective of how Hitler might have acted. Finally, the composition and disposition of the forces in the frontier zone did not indicate that they were intended to remain there. Such features as the airborne corps in the first crust of the 'defences,' artillery units in the forward locations, the dismantling of the Stalin Line and the absence of any defence in depth or effort to construct one, do not point to the intention of maintaining any permanent defensive position along the border. If all this is viewed in the context of the Zhukov doctrinal framework outlined earlier, then it becomes clear that the only credible military intention which Stalin could have had was to begin the war himself in the summer of 1941."

In the years after 1933 about 100,000 Jews a year left Poland, as much because of the growing anti-Semitic disposition of the Polish government as because of the ever-worsening economic immiseration of the Polish Jews. Similar factors arose in Latvia, Lithuania, Rumania and to a lesser extent in Hungary."

[5]	In my opinion the Jewish population of Poland in 1939 must have been less than 2.5 Million on the basis of newer numbers (1931: 3.1 million). The growing anti-Semitic disposition of the Polish government and the ever-worsening economic immiseration of the Polish Jewish masses led to the enormous emigration (1931-1939) (the proceedings of the Institute for Contemporaneous History erroneously only of "the years after 1933"); concurrently came the birth-rate decline (1931-1939), which soon took hold and the war losses (1939) atop that. This is why a correction of the Dissolution is essential.

“Saint Joseph”: Was Stalin a Defender of the Church?

by Kerry R. Bolton

The upsurge of nostalgia for Joseph Stalin in Russia is a remembrance of the greatness that Russia achieved during that era, and one which many Russians hope to see renewed. A notable seeming paradox is that this revival of Stalinism is related more to Russian messianic Slavophilism, which sees Russia as having a unique world-mission, than to Communism. The reconstituted Communist Party under Zyuganov is also notably of Stalinist orientation, and part of a patriotic resurgence that is inconsistent with the anti-national basis of Marxist dogma. The Russian Orthodox Church is the spiritual foundation of renewed Russian nationalism, although “nationalism” in the Western sense is here a misnomer, since the Russian outlook is universal, regardless of the ideological label. Orthodoxy and patriotism towards Holy Mother Russia are inseparable. There is a convergence of forces, and among this is the phenomenon of the Orthodox faithful embracing Stalin to the point of his being portrayed as a “Saint.” How is it possible that the person known to be the most-avid persecutor of the Church, could be portrayed in such a manner?

Stalin Revival

In 2008 the Communist Party petitioned the Orthodox Church to canonise Stalin. That the Communist Party should approach the Church in this manner is itself significant.<sup>[1]</sup> Not surprisingly attitudes among the faithful towards this idealization of Stalin are mixed. Controversially, in 2008 a priest displayed a painting, “Matrona and Stalin” in his church in Saint Petersburg. The painting, by noted icon-artist Ilya Pivnik, depicts the alleged meeting of Stalin with “the Blessed Eldress of Moscow,”<sup>[2]</sup> a canonized saint of the 20th century. Stalin is said to have spoken with the holy woman before the Battle of Moscow.

In 2015 a monk priest prayed for Stalin and other World War II heroes as part of a military celebration that included an icon-style painting entitled “Sovereign Holy Mother.” This included Stalin and his generals, looked over from heaven by Mary, Christ and the saints.<sup>[3]</sup>

A calendar published in 2014, depicting Stalin throughout his life, including his time as a seminary student, was published by the Trinity Lavra of St. Sergius Monastery in Moscow. This is significant because the monastery is the center of Russian Orthodoxy, and was the seat of the Russian patriarch until 1983. The Monastery had been closed by the Bolsheviks but reopened by Stalin in 1945, and services resumed in 1946.

Mikhail Babkin, a noted Russian historian specializing in Russian Orthodox Church studies, commented that “The link between the Moscow Patriarchy of the Russian Orthodox Church and Stalin remains close to sacred.”<sup>[4]</sup>

Revolution Betrayed

Stalin is surely one of the most enigmatic of historical figures. Did any “anti-communist,” from Hitler to Ronald Reagan, pursue an anti-Marxist policy so thoroughly as the man who is both heralded and damned as a leader of the first Communist state and of the “world revolution”? Under Stalin, much Marxist doctrine was progressively purged from the USSR. For those on the “Right” whose ideology is a variation of economic reductionism (as is Marxism) any state that pursues a policy antithetical to the free market is anathema. For those looking beyond economics, there is much to be seen.

Trotsky lamented that Stalin was a “Bonapartist” who “betrayed the revolution.” The hatred of Stalin by Trotskyites and other Marxists was such that many became prominent Cold Warriors in the service of the USA, because they, like Trotsky’s widow Sedova, saw Stalin’s Russia as a bigger threat to world socialism than the USA.<sup>[5]</sup> Already in 1936 Trotsky had written The Revolution Betrayed in which he described how Stalinism had reversed many of the primary Marxist doctrines that had been implemented during the early years of Bolshevism. Stalin had also done a more thorough job of liquidating Bolsheviks than Hitler. This included the elimination of the Old Bolsheviks Association, the dismantling of the Comintern which he regarded as a nest of traitors, and the elimination of most of the leading Communist exiles who had sought refuge in the USSR from Hitlerism.<sup>[6]</sup> Trotskyites and other Marxists flocked to the CIA front, the Congress for Cultural Freedom, and they came to the fore in the fight against the USSR after World War II.<sup>[7]</sup> Their legacy is today’s “neo-con” movement, and even without Stalin their bitterness towards Russia endures.

What incensed Trotsky most of all was Stalin’s rehabilitation of family and of religion. One might regard Trotsky’s primary motive in embracing Marxism as the destruction of those two institutions. The destruction of family and religion seems to be the raison d’être of Marxism for many revolutionaries. It was their psychological rationalization often arising from a deep personal hatred, projected onto Western civilization. Among those with such pathologies who embraced Marxism were Marx himself and Trotsky. In China Mao vented his hatred of the family on the Confucian heritage that honored parents.<sup>[8]</sup> Chapter 7 of The Revolution Betrayed is devoted to condemning Stalin’s revival of family and religion.<sup>[9]</sup>

Why did Stalin “betray the revolution”? There are several hypotheses: (1) Stalin was being dialectical, and hence what he undertook was in accord with Marxist dialectics in both theory and practice. (2) Stalin was forced by pragmatism to reverse the Marxian doctrines of the early Bolshevik years as unworkable and self-destructive. If this is so, then one might ask whether Stalin would have seen Marxism as intrinsically flawed and not worthy of pursuing on any basis, whether pragmatically or dialectically? (3) Stalin was an agent of the Okhrana, Czarist secret police. If so, perhaps he was never committed to Marxism, but was swept along by history and obliged to work within the Bolshevik framework?<sup>[10]</sup>

Stalin the Christian?

Much has been written about Stalin’s days at the Tiflis seminary school where he studied for the priesthood. It is said that he soon became a rebellious, avid Marxist who rejected Christianity after reading Darwin. The most-widely held account is that he was expelled from seminary along with other students because of their revolutionary beliefs. This is questionable. The reason for his expulsion from the seminary seems to have been, rather, the result of a feud with a priest nicknamed “Black Spot.” Montefiore provides the background, stating that “Soso” was not expelled for being a revolutionist, and remained in friendly contact with the seminary. The seminary regarded Soso as an excellent student, however Father Abashidze, “Black Spot,” was determined to be rid of him. It was tuition fees that troubled Soso, and he appealed to the Rector:<sup>[11]</sup>

“To Archimandrite Serafim, Very Reverend Rector of the Tiflis Orthodox Seminary from 2nd Grade student Josef Djugashvili: Your Reverence knows all about the pitiful circumstances of my mother who takes care of me. My father has not provided for me in three years. This is his way of punishing me for continuing my studies against his wishes... It is for this reason I am applying to Your Reverence for the second time. I beg you on my knees to help me and accept me on full public expense. Josef Djugashvili 25 August 1895.”

In 1899 “Black Spot” raised the school fees, “Soso” was unexpectedly invoiced 25 rubles for his tuition and left (he was not expelled). The seminary urged him to pursue a career in teaching, which he declined. There is also a question as to whether he was an informant in regard to the radical beliefs of other students.[\[12\]](#)

There are several anecdotes that attest to Stalin’s personal views on Christ. Stalin’s daughter, Svetlana Alliluyeva, according to her biographer Rosemary Sullivan, found The Life of Christ in her father’s library when she was an adolescent. As an indoctrinated atheist she asked her father about the myth of Jesus. He replied that Jesus was no myth, but a real person and spent the day telling her about Christ from what he had learned at seminary.[\[13\]](#) Dr. Erik van Ree of Amsterdam University, an expert on Stalin, quotes him as stating in 1952 in regard to the suffering of soldiers: “Jesus Christ also suffered, and even carried his cross, and then he rose up to heaven. You, then, have to suffer too, in order to rise up to heaven.”[\[14\]](#)

Ilizarov, drawing on hitherto-closed Russian archives, quotes Stalin as refusing to accept atheist literature into his personal library, calling it “anti-religious waste-paper.” He addressed friends and comrades with Godly salutations, such as “May God give you New Year every day.”[\[15\]](#) To American envoy W. Averill Harriman he remarked:[\[16\]](#)

“‘Only God can forgive.’ He maintained his friendship with old seminarian friends who became priests, such as Peter Kapanadze. When he sent a gift of fish to Alexei Kosygin after the Second World War he included a handwritten note: ‘Comrade Kosygin, here are some presents for you from God! (I am an executor of His will).’”

Failure of Godless Crusade

Even in the mid-1930s when Trotsky wrote The Revolution Betrayed, in condemning the restoration of family life by Stalin, he claimed that already the state was withdrawing from the campaign against religion:[\[17\]](#)

Concern for the authority of the older generation, by the way, has already led to a change of policy in the matter of religion. The denial of God, his assistance and his miracles, was the sharpest wedge of all those which the revolutionary power drove between children and parents. Outstripping the development of culture, serious propaganda and scientific education, the struggle with the churches, under the leadership of people of the type of Yaroslavsky,[\[18\]](#) often degenerated into buffoonery and mischief. The storming of heaven, like the storming of the family, is now brought to a stop. The bureaucracy, concerned about their reputation for respectability, have ordered the young “godless” to surrender their fighting armor and sit down to their books. In relation to religion, there is gradually being established a regime of ironical neutrality. But that is only the first stage. It would not be difficult to predict the second and third, if the course of events depended only upon those in authority.

The League of Militant Godless had been established in 1925 as an organization theoretically independent of the Communist Party. Trotsky alluded to this under the leadership of Yaroslavskii as being largely a manifestation of “buffoonery,” and it is generally regarded as having had the opposite of its intended aims. Yaroslavskii commented that “when entire districts are declared Godless, in a region where there is nothing, no culture, no [antireligious] work--this is a joke.” In 1928 Anatolii Lunacharskii, minister of education, commented that “religion is like a nail; the harder you hit it, the deeper it goes into the wood.” That seems to have been the result of the Militant Godless’s campaigns. Daniel Peris shows from Soviet archives that entire districts of supposed organizational networks of the League of Militant Godless only existed on paper.[19] Peris calls the League “largely a house of cards,”[20] despite its claim of over 5,000,000 members, many of whom were simply trade unionists and members of party organs dragooned into the League en masse.

According to a January 1937 census, despite the totalitarian character of the USSR, and a decade of atheist crusading, only 42.9% of respondents claimed to be “nonbelievers.” Peris suggests that where atheism was increasing this was not the result of Militant Godless campaigns, but a natural process of secularization caused by social and economic transformations.[21] The process of secularization has been just as widespread in Western liberal societies under the impress of the social and economic developments of capitalism.

The Bolshevik terror against the Church started in 1918. Already there had been a series of murders against the faithful, prompting Patriarch Tikhon to proclaim his anathema on the Bolsheviks on January 19, 1918. The 1918 law separating church and state enabled nationalized church property to be turned over to registered communes of believers; hence it became a widespread practice to use Soviet laws to regain church property for the faithful.[22] The resistance of believers to Bolshevik efforts at the eradication of religion was not passive; years after the Civil War, into the early 1930s, thousands of believers could be readily mobilized to confront local anti-religious efforts. Atheist agitators were faced with violence and even death. Atheist clubs were attacked and ransacked. Clergy and believers even took over leadership of anti-religious clubs. [23]

In 1922 anti-Church actions intensified. A “Resolution of the All-Union Central Executive Committee” (ACEC) ordered the removal of church valuables.[24] All valuables under 200 years old, such as bells, gold icon frames, and silver plates, had to be melted down. The Alexander Nevsky Lavra in St. Petersburg was plundered. These actions were undertaken on the pretext of funding famine relief. In 1922 Trotsky complained that Pravda and Izvestiya were not giving sufficient attention to the anti-religious struggle in their columns.[25] Had Trotsky triumphed in the leadership struggle against Stalin it is certain that he would have pursued the anti-Christian offensive to its completion.

Interestingly, believers often appealed to higher authorities, and in particular to Mikhail Kalinin, confidant of Stalin until Kalinin’s death in 1946, and head of state as chairman of the Supreme Soviet, to get decisions overturned, to the frustration of atheists.[26] In 1930 Kalinin ordered an investigation into reports of arbitrary methods being used against the faithful.[27] William Husband states: “At no time before 1932 did the Bolsheviks feel they controlled the situation... During the second half of the 1920s, organs in Nizhnii Novgorod continued to encounter no shortage of religious groups that effectively circulated anti-Soviet political materials, and similar reports that legal organizations served as fronts for oppositional activity reached party leaders from other locales as well”[28] William Husband concludes in regard to the conflict between believers and Bolsheviks:[29]

“This battle of competing visions of truth and reality produced lessons of experience for all involved, but no definitive victor. Bolshevism proved to be no single-minded monolith determined to eradicate religion as an end in itself and at all cost. Despite the countless antireligious resolutions routinely passed at all levels of party and state work, the promotion of atheism was chronically underfunded, neglected by the very organs designated to carry it out, and left to amateurs and the least talented cadres. High officials made a sustained effort to maintain Soviet law and restrain crude attacks at the regional and local levels, but in the process they created avenues through and around Soviet policy [...]”

The dichotomy between the Soviet State and the Church is not as simple as “Godless Bolshevism versus the Faith.” The Church, an integral part of the Czarist state, was a counter-revolutionary force. The Orthodox Church was also a mainstay of “patriotism” and of the notion of “Holy Mother Russia” with a world messianic mission. This mission is to remold a new humanity according to Christian brotherhood, and sees Russia as the Katechon, the means by which the unleashing of the Antichrist is being delayed. The German-Latvian scholar Walter Schubart wrote a once-influential book, Russia and Western Man, wherein he described this world mission, and noted even then (1938) that the world-revolutionary mission of the USSR was a very Russian application of Marxism, and that the Bolshevik dogma would become increasingly reshaped into something far removed from the imported Marxist dogma.<sup>[30]</sup> Trotsky and the Bolshevik and other Marxist opposition against Stalin saw this already happening at the same time.

Corley comments that “had it really had the desire, as Albania later did, the Soviet state could have extinguished all open expressions of religious faith. ... Issuing decrees and writing long reports was often a substitute for action which probably would have been only barely effective. Only in certain cases did the state resort to repression.” Corley comments that these reports could even be impartial and scholarly.<sup>[31]</sup>

Revival of the Orthodox Church

In June 1941, with the attack of Germany on Russia, Stalin is said to have had a nervous breakdown and to have secluded himself in his dacha for three days. Another theory is that he was testing the loyalty of his confidants to see whether they would accept his resignation.<sup>[32]</sup> Others claim that he retired to meditate and pray. At the same time Metropolitan Elias Karam of Lebanon was also praying for three days on the fate of Russia. He sent a telegram to Stalin asking that for Russia to be saved the Kremlin churches must be opened, and that a procession of the cross should carry the Kazan Icon of the Mother of God, the holiest icon of the Russian Orthodox Church. The icon was carried around Leningrad and Moscow, was with the Russian troops at Stalingrad, and a prayer service was held prior to the battle. The icon was taken to all the crucial points of the frontline. The priests carrying the icon led the troops under intense fire. The presence of the icon had an intense impact on the troops; even the skeptics. <sup>[33]</sup>

On September 4 1943, the exiled Metropolitan Sergei and two other metropolitans were summoned to the Kremlin to meet with Stalin. He told them he had decided to restore the patriarchate, reopen churches and seminaries, and resume the publication of The Journal of the Moscow Patriarchate. Stalin reminisced at length about his time at seminary. As for his intentions to restore the patriarchate and churches, he said to Sergei, “Your Grace, that’s all I can do for you now.”<sup>[34]</sup> Daniela Kalkandijeva opines that, with the setting up of Moscow as the center of world Orthodoxy at Stalin’s suggestion, it would nonetheless “be wrong to think that the church was just a pawn on Stalin's chessboard.”[35]

The churches were already being reopened in 1941. This was not merely a strategy caused by the German invasion, to mobilize the Russian masses. In 1938 the Communist party declared that the faithful were also loyal Soviet subjects. Further, in a reversal of Bolshevik dogma, the party and the Soviet Academy of Sciences stated that the Church had provided a “progressive role” in Russian history. In 1941 even Yaroslavskii, head of the Militant Godless, criticized those who still regarded the millions of faithful as superstitious fools.[36]

The 1943 meeting with Sergei formalized the process. He was elected patriarch by the synod that year. The Council of the Russian Orthodox Church, headed by NKVD Colonel G.G. Karpov was established. Karpov, who had been responsible for the repression of religion during the 1930s, now worked for state support for the church.

In November 1943, the Council of People's Commissars adopted Decree No. 1325, “On the Procedure for Opening Churches.” In 1944, 206 churches were opened; in 1945, 510. The Orthodox Church flourished. On Easter night 1944 the thirty churches in Moscow were attended by 120,000 worshippers. Attendance throughout Russia was overflowing. Worshippers included many Soviet officers. Even Communist party functionaries and NKVD agents had their children baptized. By April 1946 the number of functioning Orthodox churches in the USSR had tripled to 10,437. By early 1949 there were 14,477 in the USSR. By January 1948, 85 monasteries and convents, institutions hitherto all closed, had been opened. In 1945 Kalinin replied to a question from Komsomol skaia pravda that the State was “not at war” with the Church, while alluding to atheist education. Balzer comments that “postwar atheism was to a greater degree a nod to the tradition that had arisen in the first years of Soviet power, rather than a policy objective.”[37]

Had Stalin been pursuing a dialectical measure with the ultimate goal remaining the liquidation of Christianity, he certainly made matters very difficult by overseeing the baptisms of so many Soviet subjects.

In 1947, the Metropolitan Elias (Karam) of Lebanon made a triumphal visit to the Soviet Union. He was presented with an especially crafted cross from the state.

In 1946, the department of external relations of the Church, headed by Metropolitan Nicholas Yarushevich, was established. In July 1948, an international meeting of Orthodox churches was held in Moscow. The historian of the Russian Church, Johann Chrysostomus, commented:[38]

“The Moscow Conference of the Orthodox Churches was to demonstrate the leading role of Moscow in world Orthodoxy. On this question the wishes of the Patriarchate and the Soviet government coincided, and both sides attached exceptional importance to the holding of this conference. Although the conference addressed a letter to Christians throughout the world, the attention of the conference organizers was centered on world Orthodoxy. It was to show itself as the moral force on which the Eastern bloc rested, contrary to other churches in the countries of the free world.”

Requiem Masses for Stalin

Requiem masses were said for Stalin on his death in 1953. Patriarch Alexy stated in the patriarchal cathedral on the day of Stalin's funeral:[39]

“We, who gathered to pray for him, cannot pass in silence on his always benevolent, sympathizing attitude to our church needs. Any question which we addressed to him, was not rejected by him; he satisfied all our requests. And a lot that is good and useful, thanks to his high authority, has been done for our Church by our Government. The memory of him for us is unforgettable, and our Russian Orthodox Church, mourning over his leaving us, escorting him to his last journey.

In these sad days for us, from different directions of our Fatherland from bishops, clergy and believers, and from heads and representatives of Churches, as orthodox and heterodox, from abroad, I receive a mass of telegrams telling of prayers for him and consoling us on the occasion of this sad loss. We prayed for him when the message about his serious illness had come. And now, when he is no more, we pray for his immortal soul. Yesterday our special delegation [...] placed a wreath on his coffin and bowed on behalf of the Russian Orthodox Church to his dear body. The prayer, fulfilled with Christian love, reaches God. [...] And to our loved and unforgettable Joseph Vissarionovich we devoutly, with deep, passionate love proclaim his eternal memory.”

Stalin’s family held a requiem, arranged by Vasily Stalin, in the Church of the Resurrection of Sloveshchy. A State requiem was held at the Elohovskiy Cathedral, led by patriarch Alexy. This was the first time requiems had been held for a Soviet leader.[\[40\]](#) The honor guard at the coffin during Stalin’s funeral included Metropolitan Nicholas, Archbishop Nikon, and archpriest Nikolai Kolchitsky.[\[41\]](#)

With de-Stalinization, the atheistic campaign resumed under Khrushchev, and those “soft on religion” were regarded as “Stalinists.”

In 1958, with Khrushchev’s position consolidated, the monasteries started to be closed, and those that remained were heavily taxed to raise the cost of religious accoutrements. The objections of Patriarch Alexy I were ignored. Karpov was removed from his position in 1960. That year the Communist Party Central Committee issued a declaration that “The struggle against religion must not only be continued, but it must be enhanced by all possible means.”[\[42\]](#)

The original Bolshevik formulae of Trotsky and Lenin of storming heaven had been re-established. Again, churches were blown up, priests arrested, seminaries closed. Believers were registered, and subjected to dismissal from jobs and denied university entrance and careers. Priests were attacked. Atheist displays toured the USSR.

During the 1960s, thousands of churches that had been opened during the war were destroyed. In 1959 there had been 13,372 functioning churches; by 1963, 8,314, and 18 monasteries and convents remained. An active atheist campaign was resumed. However, in 1967 60,000,000 Soviet citizens still stated they were believers, and many more retained icons in their households.[\[43\]](#)

On October 7, 1964, the USSR gave Israel land in Jerusalem that had been owned by the Russian State and the Orthodox Church since the 19th century in exchange for several tons of rotting oranges.[\[44\]](#) Precisely a week later, on the Day of the Virgin, Khrushchev was deposed. A moderated policy was assumed.

Archbishop Anthony (Marchenko), returning after the war from emigration, wrote of the world-mission of Russian Orthodoxy in the journal of the Moscow patriarchate:[\[45\]](#) concerning the religious-moral education of our people, but also, which is most important, reveals its world-historical vocation, uniting the whole Orthodox world and all Slavonic peoples under the single common church-national slogan of Cyril and Methodius' great and undying idea. 'Moscow – the Third Rome' remains as before the symbol of the universal collective idea, contraposed to the Papacy with its striving for spiritual autocracy, its episcopal aristocratism and its maniacal dreams of ruling the earth. The visit to Moscow by the Eastern Patriarchs, the visit to the Holy Land by His Holiness Patriarch Alexis, the coming to Moscow of a delegation from the Orthodox Czech Church and, as a result, the appointing of a Russian Orthodox Exarch there testify to an exceptional revival in the Orthodox Ecumenical Catholic Church under the actual leadership of Russian Orthodoxy: 'Moscow is the third Rome, and a fourth there will not be' as our forefather said in the days of Ivan III [...]"

This centuries-old world messianic mission of “Moscow the Third Rome,” or the Katechon resisting the Antichrist, has become again the state outlook under Putin.[\[46\]](#)

Bolshevism took messianic forms, as an integral part of the Russian character, and was united with Orthodoxy by Stalin. Contemporary conservative scholars such as Oswald Spengler and Walter Schubart foresaw this reassertion of Russian character even under Bolshevism. Spengler foresaw that Bolshevism would clear the way for Russia to “some day awaken between ‘Europe’ and East Asia. It is more a beginning than an end.” Beyond the superficiality of Marxist dogma lives the Russian peasantry, which will “become conscious of its own will, which points in a wholly different direction.”[\[47\]](#) Schubart saw that “even the Bolsheviks” are imbued with the Russian messianic idea, and that their world revolution “unconsciously continues to maintain an old tradition – a fact which proves that the pull of the Russian soil is stronger than any cleverly devised artificial program.”[\[48\]](#) This perhaps provides the explanation as to why Stalin reversed the Marxist doctrines and policies that had been inaugurated under Lenin; and that explanation is deeper than Stalinist pragmatism. Had Trotsky assumed leadership rather than Stalin the result would have been a messianism of an entirely different, and perhaps irremediable, type.

Conclusion

Did Stalin consider Russia to be “The Third Rome” rather than the center of world proletarian revolution? Was his revival of Orthodoxy during the war something more than war strategy? He had dissolved the Comintern, and seen Moscow as the world center of Orthodoxy. He released priests and liquidated “Old Bolsheviks.” The revival of the family, outlawing abortion, and honoring motherhood complemented the revival of the Church. After the war the Orthodox revival did not abate; to the contrary. Why was it that Stalin did not revert, at least in stages, to the atheist campaign? Khrushchev undertook the task within several years of Stalin’s death. Anecdotally there are suggestions that Stalin had a religious epiphany. Another possibility is that Stalin never rejected Christianity. The widely stated stories of his being expelled from seminary for revolutionary activities after having been converted to atheism by reading Darwin, are uncertain. Stalin as a supposedly feared dictator personally intervened to moderate and eventually reverse the atheist campaign. The German invasion gave him the justification to accelerate this to the point where the Church resumed its traditional role as the moral and spiritual foundation of the Russian State.

The Bankruptcy of Yad Vashem or How to Reach 6,000,000

by Jean-Marie Boisdefeu

Abstract

In early 2005, Yad Vashem, the official Israeli institute charged with managing the memory of the extermination of the Jews by the Germans, made publicly accessible a database of victims of the Shoah. At that point, it contained approximately three million names of "Jews who perished in the Shoah." The long-term goal is to find the names of "the six million Jewish victims." This paper reports about the results of a first critical look into the contents of this database. A random sampling reveals that the database not only contains the names of survivors, but it also has double or even multiple entries for single individuals. The total number of entries in that database therefore says little if anything about the number of individuals who died in the "Shoah."

On sait que le Yad Vashem est un institut officiel israélien chargé de la gestion de la mémoire de l'extermination des Juifs par les Allemands; il est un peu l'équivalent de la Congrégation pour la doctrine de la foi romaine. La presse, en pleurs, nous annonce que ce Yad Vashem vient de publier une banque de données sur les victimes de la Shoah.<sup>[1]</sup> Comme le précise le Yad Vashem, les quelque trois millions de noms actuellement répertoriés sont ceux de « Juifs qui ont péri dans la Shoah », l'objectif étant de retrouver si possible les noms des six millions de morts juifs. En fait, l'affaire se solde par une banqueroute, qui est néanmoins riche d'enseignements.

Banqueroute par manque de méthode et de rigueur

Ce qui frappe l'esprit de celui qui étudie l'histoire de la déportation des Juifs, c'est l'absence de méthode et de rigueur chez ceux qui se sont chargés de l'écrire. Face à une multiplicité de sources documentaires et testimoniales, tout historien sérieux ferait un tri; le Yad Vashem, lui, n'en a cure, d'où de nombreux doublons. Toutefois, comme on le verra, ce n'est pas le seul reproche qu'on peut adresser aux concepteurs de la banque. Mais trêve de commentaires; prenons des exemples.

- Prenons comme premier exemple le cas des Juifs déportés de France; le Yad Vashem s'est fondé sur le mémorial de Serge Klarsfeld;<sup>[2]</sup> certes, il n'est pas douteux que la plupart des Juifs qui y figurent sont morts en déportation; un certain nombre en sont tout de même revenus et Klarsfeld l'a précisé mais le Yad Vashem n'en a pas tenu compte et a repris tous les déportés dans sa banque, y compris les rescapés; le comble est qu'il signale que ces déportés sont revenus.

Ainsi y trouve-t-on avec la mention « SURVIVED » Simone Veil, Henri Krasucki et Simone Lagrange (Simy Kadosche, qui n'était qu'une enfant que les Allemands auraient oublié de gazer) ; on y trouve aussi, mais sans qu'on puisse le reprocher au Yad Vashem, de nombreux Juifs rescapés que Klarsfeld a déclaré morts; on citera par exemple Raphaël Esrail, secrétaire d'une association de déportés, ou encore Marie Reille, une catholique déportée par erreur que les Allemands renvoyèrent d'Auschwitz en France. On en a parlé lors du procès Papon.

De plus, nous verrons plus loin que le Yad Vashem ne s'est pas contenté de se référer au seul mémorial mais a aussi retenu des témoignages, de sorte que de nombreux Juifs de France sont comptés plusieurs fois.

- Prenons un autre exemple, celui de 2 enfants (Michael et Josef Salomonowicz, 11 et 6 ans à leur arrivée à Auschwitz) et de leur mère; nous avons vu dans « La liquidation du ghetto de Lodz »<sup>[3]</sup> que tous trois avaient été déportés de Lodz à Auschwitz où, selon la vulgate exterminionniste, ils furent gazés et incinérés; en réalité, le lecteur a pu se convaincre de ce qu'ils avaient été réinstallés à Danzig et qu'ils avaient survécu à la guerre. Et que lit-on dans la banque à leur sujet?

- La mère y est reprise 3 fois sous des graphies différentes dont une fois avec la mention « survived ».
- L'aîné des fils, Michael, est repris deux fois sous des graphies différentes; il est également déclaré « survived » à une reprise.
- Le cadet, Josef, est également repris deux fois; il est lui aussi déclaré « survived » à une reprise. Dans ce cas précis, 3 survivants = 7 morts.

- Un autre doublé: celui d'Ester Skora (11 ans) sur la base de 2 listes du ghetto de Lodz; un autre triplé: celui d'Elchanan Reingold (7 ans) sur la base de 3 listes du même ghetto.

- Les comptages précédents sont fondés sur des documents mal utilisés, il est vrai, mais (souvent) irréfutables. Malheureusement, l'histoire de la Shoah s'appuie surtout sur des témoignages, c'est-à-dire sur des éléments fragiles. Une grande partie de la banque de données du Yad Vashem sont de cette mouture; non seulement ces témoignages ne sont guère fiables mais, comme manifestement aucun tri n'a été opéré, cette façon de procéder ne peut que conduire à de multiples doublons. Pire, parfois, la source documentaire s'ajoute à la source testimoniale. Quelques exemples:

– Le Hollandais Samuel Acathan est comptée 2 fois. Une première fois sur la base d'un témoignage et une seconde fois sur la base du mémorial hollandais.[\[4\]](#)

– C'est aussi le cas de la Française Charlotte Rotsztein reprise 2 fois (sous des noms différents) sur la base du mémorial de Klarsfeld et du témoignage de son père (1992). Toujours chez les Juifs de France, Frida Raichman est comptée 2 fois sur – une fois sur la base du mémorial et une fois avec le témoignage d'une cousine (1994). Toujours en France, les 51 personnes (dont 44 enfants) de l'orphelinat d'Izieu sont comptées 2 ou 3 fois, voire 4 fois comme un certain Hans Ament, compté sur les bases suivantes:

- le mémorial français de Klarsfeld;
- le mémorial autrichien de la DÖW (H. Ament était né en Autriche[\[5\]](#)) ;
- le témoignage de son frère (1987), lequel, bien que n'ayant pas été déporté, figure tout de même dans la banque de données américaine des « Survivors » ;
- le témoignage (1999) d'une parente de trois des enfants d'Izieu; elle non plus n'a pas été déportée mais cela ne l'a pas empêchée de « témoigner » à propos des 50 déportés d'Izieu.

On voit bien ici que l'hystérie de l'holocauste mène à la perte de tout sens commun: on n'a rien vu, et d'ailleurs on n'était même pas né à l'époque des faits mais on témoigne quand même et cette manière de procéder est acceptée par les historiens.

– La Polonaise Genia Wagman est enregistrée 3 fois sur la base des témoignages de son fils, lequel a témoigné 2 fois (1955 et 1997) et de son oncle (1957) ; elle était née et a vécu toute sa vie au même endroit jusqu'à sa mort (en 1941 ou 1942), l'on n'est même pas sûr qu'elle ait été exterminée. Une Belge portant les mêmes prénoms et noms est reprise 2 fois, dont une fois sur la base des témoignages de son frère (1978) et une fois de sa petite-fille (1999) ; on peut prédire qu'elle sera reprise une 3<sup>e</sup> fois quand le Yad Vashem encodera son nom appartenant aux Juifs de Belgique.

– Citons encore l'Allemande Helga Wolf, reprise 3 fois sur la base d'une liste du ghetto de Lodz et de 2 témoignages (celui d'une nièce en 1978 et celui d'un « chercheur » en 1999).

– À ce compte là, nous pensions qu'une déportée connue comme Anne Frank allait être reprise cent fois. Eh bien non! Il se pourrait bien que, dans ce cas précis, le Yad Vashem ait exceptionnellement fait le tri car Anne n'est reprise que deux fois (sur la base du mémorial hollandais et sur celui du témoignage de la deuxième femme de son père mais avec des variantes dans le prénom et la date de naissance, ce qui a dû tromper le Yad Vashem) ; sa sœur Margot, en revanche, est reprise 3 fois; sa mère, Edith Frank, est reprise 2 fois; le père, Otto Frank, bien que revenu de déportation, est repris une fois sur la base du mémorial allemand.[\[6\]](#) Dans ce cas précis, pour le Yad Vashem: 1 rescapé + 3 morts = 8 morts.

– On finit par s'interroger: s'il n'y a pas dans cette banque de données des morts déclarés morts sur la base du témoignage d'un autre mort? Nous n'en avons pas trouvé, mais allez savoir... cette banque de données nous réserve encore bien des surprises.

exemple: on trouve dans la banque Chan na Wagman, née en 1854 et morte en 1942 à l'âge de 88 ans dans son village natal de Galicie (témoignage de sa sœur en 1956). Cette façon de faire accroît le nombre de supposés exterminés de plusieurs centaines de mille.

En conclusion, demanderez-vous, par combien faut-il diviser le chiffre de trois millions de noms déjà encodés par le Yad Vashem ? C'est difficile à dire car l'imprécision est une caractéristique bien connue de l'État Civil Juif. On peut néanmoins approfondir quelques exemples et tenter une extrapolation prudente.

- Si, par exemple, on interroge la banque de données à propos de Simone Veil, on obtient 38 noms de personnes se rapprochant de celui de l'ancienne ministre. De ces 38 noms, huit sont à coup sûr des doublons, un est celui d'une rescapée (Simone Veil) et un autre celui d'un Juif mort au combat dans les rangs de la 1<sup>re</sup> armée française; une dizaine d'autres sont plus que douteux; encore n'a-t-on pas toutes les garanties pour tous les autres.

Parmi ces supposés exterminés figure un homme de près de 90 ans.

Il semble bien qu'en généralisant le résultat de cette recherche sur S. Veil, il faille diviser les 3000000 par 2.

- Prenons un autre exemple et interrogeons la banque de données à propos d'Arno Klarsfeld (le père de Serge) : la banque de données donne trois noms, et tous les trois se rapportent à notre homme. Le Yad Vashem a d'abord repris le témoignage de Serge en 1974; puis il a encodé le même Serge dans le mémorial de 1978 ; enfin, il a repris le témoignage de 1992 d'une « amie » ; cette amie a par ailleurs témoigné 38 fois pour des déportés français qui, de ce fait, sont donc eux aussi comptés au moins deux fois dans la banque de données. Les choses sont claires dans ce cas, car il suffit de diviser les 3.000.000 par 3.

- Bref, à partir de ces exemples l'on retire l'impression qu'il faut diviser les 3 millions par 2 voire 3.

Une banqueroute riche d'enseignements

L'opération entreprise par le Yad Vashem se solde donc par une banqueroute dont on peut néanmoins tirer un premier enseignement: le chiffre de six millions de Juifs exterminés est un mythe dont n'importe qui peut facilement se convaincre. Mais un examen plus fouillé de cette banque des données est encore plus enrichissant. Ainsi, dans l'article sur la liquidation du ghetto de Lodz à propos duquel nous nous sommes référés plus haut, le chercheur révisionniste Carlo Mattogno donne les noms d'enfants arrivés en août 1944 à Auschwitz où ils furent gazés, selon l'histoire officielle, mais qui, en réalité, furent envoyés quelques jours plus tard dans le camp de Stutthof-Danzig à 600 km au nord d'Auschwitz; parmi eux, nous avons déjà vu, Michael et Josef Salomonowicz (11 et 6 ans) mais on y trouve aussi :

- Adam Szyper (4 ans, compté 2 fois), Tolla Richer (12 ans) et Christine Wolman (14 ans). Le Yad Vashem les reprend en affirmant qu'ils ont été internés à Lodz puis au camp de Stutthof (il n'a pas jugé bon de mentionner Auschwitz !) et enfin Theresienstadt où ils furent tous trois libérés.

• Kazimierz Lachman (7 ans). Le Yad Vashem le compte comme mort sur la base du témoignage d'une tante qui a affirmé en 1988 que son neveu était mort à Stutthof-Danzig, ce qui est bien désolant mais confirme ce qu'a découvert C. Mattogno: les 11 500 inaptes de Lodz n'ont pas été gazés mais ont bien été redirigés à Stutthof. On a donc ici de la part d'un organisme officiel israélien l'aveu implicite que le gazage des juifs est un autre mythe.

Nouvelles de la banque de données du Yad Vashem

On sait que le Yad Vashem a entrepris de répertorier les noms des prétendus 6 millions de Juifs morts dans la Shoah. L'entreprise ne peut qu'apparaître téméraire aux yeux des plus bienveillants, même aux yeux des historiens, étant donné que ces derniers dénombrement déjà un million de victimes de moins.[7] En fait, à ce jour, le Yad Vashem n'est arrivé qu'à 3 millions mais en multipliant les doublons. On peut ainsi estimer qu'il a multiplié par 2 à 3 le nombre de victimes répertoriées. Dans une ultime tentative de débloquer la situation, il vient de lancer une grande collecte de témoignages sur les Juifs de l'ancienne URSS.[8] Son raisonnement est simple (et mensonger à la fois) : Il affirme que plus des 2 tiers des 6 millions de morts y résidaient (soit plus de 4 millions) mais seulement un quart d'entre eux figurent dans la banque (soit 1000000) ; il en résulte que plus de 3 millions d'entre eux sont encore à répertorier, ce qui permettrait d'atteindre (enfin) le chiffre (mythique) des 6 millions.

Or, pour R. Hilberg, qui est l'historien sur l'holocauste le plus respecté au monde (du moins ceux qui y croient), il n'y a pas eu plus de 2 millions de victimes en URSS (y compris l'Ukraine, la Biélorussie, la Pologne annexée, la Moldavie et les Pays baltes), soit 2 fois moins que n'en compte le Yad Vashem ; il ne resterait donc qu'un seul million de noms à répertorier. On n'en arriverait toutefois qu'à un total de 4 millions. Total tout à fait invraisemblable d'ailleurs dans lequel nous avons vu on retrouverait (pour ne prendre que quelques exemples) :

- 2 fois le père de Robert Badinter et les parents de Simone Veil,
- 3 fois le père de Serge Klarsfeld,
- 5 fois le père d'Henri Minczelès,
- 3 fois les 52000 Juifs berlinois, etc., sans compter les rescapés comme Henri Krasucki, Henri Bulawko ou Madeleine Veil ou bien tous ceux qui sont morts de vieillesse dans leur lit. Tout cela est hystérique mais, il est vrai, peut rapporter gros.

The New Inconvenient History: Expanding Horizons

by Germar Rudolf

Abstract

Inconvenient History now carries material in a number of foreign languages, and we ask our readers to help us get non-English contributions translated into English for parallel carriage. Inconvenient History also allows video and audio files to be submitted alongside a transcript of their verbal contents. Unchanged is the type and style of content Inconvenient History covers.

For years, I have sensed that there is a gap between what Inconvenient History is and what it could be. Being multilingual myself, I knew there is so much more material out there than ever makes it onto the pages of our fine revisionist online periodical. To begin with, there is a wide range of Italian, French and German contributions that deserve a broader audience, but since Inconvenient History was limited to English-language material only, hardly anything of it has ever made it beyond the narrow confines of its original language. The reason for this is that Inconvenient History has not had a pool of volunteers to ask for translations. Being a free online journal with basically no income at all, we cannot pay anyone for anything. But then again, from my past experience I know that there are plenty of talented, knowledgeable people who want to help, and who can do translations without asking to be paid. Yet in the past they got frustrated, too, because there was no organizational infrastructure that they could turn to in order to offer their assistance.

How do we connect these two loose ends?

We had to start somewhere. And here is what we have decided to do: First, we open up Inconvenient History to foreign-language contributions. Since we have a number of individuals on our advisory board with language skills, we will make use of them to review and edit incoming non-English contributions to make sure they meet our requirements. For now, our new roster of languages we accept includes: Czech, English, French, German, Italian, Polish, Romanian, Russian, Slovakian, Spanish.

The result of it you can see from this first issue of 2017: It has five contributions in English (six, if you count this editorial), three in Italian, two in French and one in German. Now, who the heck is supposed to be able to read all those? Well, I can. But that's no help to most of you, I understand. Our plan is, of course, to have all non-English submissions translated into English, and, once that is accomplished, to post them alongside the original paper. As long as that is not done, though, we decided that from now on every submitted paper has to come with an abstract of no more than 1,000 characters succinctly and accurately summarizing the item's contents. These abstracts should be in English, but if they are not, we can translate such short pieces on the fly, so to speak. This gives those who do not read any of the non-English papers at least a rough idea what they are all about.

Now we hope to find benefactors who will help us get all non-English papers translated into English. The first step of accomplishing this is actually to have put these papers out there in the first place. This way everyone can see that there is valuable material, some of it rather short, which is in need of tender loving care from volunteers with bilingual or multilingual skills.

Next, we need to tap into that unused reservoir of potential volunteers who will help us get these papers translated. To accomplish this, we have revamped CODOH's approach to finding, assigning and catering to our volunteers. That's been a bumpy road, though, because in order to make this work, we decided to include a volunteer section in our database which includes all relevant data about them, which keeps track of all the projects we define for them, and which records which volunteer is assigned to which project, and what progress each assignment is making. Because, truth be told: once you get beyond a few listed volunteers, if you're not organized, you lose track of things, and chaos and frustration will result for all involved. We've had that happen repeatedly in the past.

Hence, we've employed some of our programmers' brainpower to get this all set up. Admittedly, we've had a few glitches. For instance, in early February an app that was supposed to delete spam submissions deleted not the spam entries but those of our new volunteers. Bad. We're still recovering from that, and I hope that those who fell victim to this bug won't get demotivated by this mishap. To check whether your volunteer account was affected, please go to <http://codoh.com/login/> and check whether your account is still active and working. If it is not, then please get in touch with CODOH so we can fix it. We truly apologize for this inconvenience!

For all of you who haven't signed up as volunteers yet but who have any translation skills from any of the above languages into English, please be so kind as to consider signing up as a volunteer with CODOH here. It goes without saying that CODOH can use many more energetic individuals with skills other than just translating. If you have any other skills, like programming, data entry, editing & proofing, or you want to help us with marketing and outreach, with video production, and, and, and, please don't hesitate to get in touch with CODOH's volunteer manager, so that we can discuss where your talents and skills could be put to good use.

Another option to help us out with translations is to ask for sponsors. For instance, if we had sufficient funds to pay for translations, that would open up the option of hiring someone to do a professional job: fast, high-quality, and reliable. We have a few language geniuses with revisionist inclinations at hand, but none of them is willing or able to take on that workload without remuneration. Hence, if you are willing to chip in financially, please get in touch so we can discuss how to organize this.

There is another change to Inconvenient History which hasn't made it into this issue but might do so in the near future: we have expanded the kind of media we carry from just text to also include video and audio files. It's a big step into a new world for us, but in the age of gadgets and multi-media content, we think that including other media formats is important. More than ever, revisionism needs to use visual media to get its message out. We want to encourage this by accepting documentaries and other video and audio material which gets that message out to the new generation of screen aficionados. All submissions of video and audio files need to come with a transcript of what is said, because it is important to offer the spoken content as text, also so that we can easily have it translated and turned into subtitles in all kinds of languages, and maybe even to dub video and audio files in other languages.

The one thing that hasn't changed is the kind of contents we accept. The topics we cover are history, especially modern history, civil rights and their violation, with a focus on freedom of speech and of scientific inquiry, reporting on persons and institutions involved in historiography, or involved in censorship or the struggle against it. Although we prefer new and hitherto unpublished reports, reviews and research papers and documentaries, we will also consider republishing material of special merit. The style of papers, video or audio files submitted ought to be systematic in structure and objective in the approach to the topic covered. Factual statements ought to be supported with references to sources backing up the claims. Although that rule is somewhat relaxed for audio and video submissions, even they must refer to some sources where more information can be found. Opinions ought to be distinguishable from factual statements. Last but not least, please be aware that we do not accept any ad-hominem attacks, and absolutely no advocating for, and justification or condoning of, the violation of anyone's civil rights.

US Presidential Elections Stolen by Foreign Powers

by Jett Rucker

Two US presidential elections are documented as having been stolen by foreign powers. In fact, both elections were stolen by the same power: Great Britain—the very regime, independence from which the American Revolution supposedly was fought. And its agenda was the same both times: to draw the US into a conflict with Germany on its own side, in what thereby became World Wars I and II. The second time, the conflict also with Japan was but more-helpful, in respect of Britain’s colonies in Singapore, Malaya, Burma and Hong Kong. America’s own colonies in the Philippines and Hawaii, of course, dovetailed nicely with the colonies of other imperial powers besides Britain such as France (Indochina) and the Netherlands (Indonesia). They all had had things quite nicely divided up until upstart Japan butted in with its own imperial ambitions.

Today, we hear Russia has manipulated the recent US presidential contest. If so, would Russia’s agenda include drawing the US into some war in an alliance with Russia? Despite “hot spots” in Syria, Russia does not seem to be involved in any wars against enemies so formidable as Germany was to Britain in the Twentieth-Century conflicts. So, IF Russia manipulated the election (effectively, rather than just having a preference as to its outcome), any war involved must lie in the future. Or, NOT in the future. It’s at least imaginable that the future war on the minds of today’s leaders of Russia might involve the US. And perhaps that is a/the war those leaders might wish to avoid. Perhaps they mean to pursue World Domination while the US abstains from war against Russia. Or, perhaps they might want peace with a United States that itself abjures its own plans for World Dominations.

All this is any voter’s guess, to weigh against alternatives (hijacked, not hijacked, foreign or domestic) according to his own lights. The present essay is to make it clear that hijacking of US presidential elections is anything but unprecedented. In fact, the two British enterprises here discussed are most unlikely to have been the only ones, nor Britain by any means the only hijacker.

My emphasis will fall on the later example, that of World War II, but the one of 1916, the re-election of Woodrow “He Kept Us out of War” Wilson, bears mention if only because the hijacker was the same one as in 1940, and its main adversary, Germany, was the same. The earlier example seems to have been exerted on the US with the greatest assistance of Zionism. Thomas Dalton, writing in Inconvenient History, [\[1\]](#) is one of many who have amply documented the agencies through which American Zionists such as Felix Frankfurter exerted pressure on President Wilson to condemn Germany and, ultimately, to win the declaration of war on Germany in 1917 that Britain’s Lord Balfour bought with his infamous Balfour Declaration of Britain’s willingness to impose a Jewish homeland on Palestine. With his arrangement to have the Lusitania torpedoed by a German submarine in 1915, of course, Winston Churchill wins a solid Supporting Actor award in this conspiracy to slaughter untold millions of Americans, Germans, and other hapless innocents.

Also re-elected on a slogan of “No American Boys ...” was Franklin D. Roosevelt, in 1940, also by dispositive foreign influence exerted by (the same) European power in a desperate struggle of its own making against Germany. Ironically in view of the explicitly anti-Jewish agenda of Germany’s National Socialist regime at the time, Jewish agency seems to be less obvious in this instance of British treachery than it was in the 1916 example of Woodrow Wilson. But the toll on the blood and treasure of the United States was every bit as awful. Perhaps the agency of Jews was better-concealed. It is of no concern in this analysis.

The clearest description of Britain's hijacking of the 1940 election (hardly a year before the US became a belligerent in World War II on December 7, 1941) appears in Thomas E. Mahl's 1998 book Desperate Deception, in which the entire British effort to enlist the active support of the US in its contest with Germany is documented.<sup>[2]</sup>

The British hijacking occurred not in the general election, as the allegations concerning the 2016 election seem to run, but in the process before the primary elections, in which the candidate of the Republican Party to oppose incumbent Franklin Roosevelt (a very "safe" friend of Britain) in the general election. The leading contender for this nomination was Robert A. Taft, who not only was "soft" on prosecuting the war then underway, to the point of annihilating (a process now called "regime change") Germany and Japan, but just as bad, was an opponent of Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal. Such a Republican candidate would not only offer American voters a choice, but it would offer them a choice that British agents correctly judged inimical to their own country's war aims.

His Majesty's men managed things most-effectively. They torpedoed Taft's bid, and arranged for a previously unknown Democrat-just-Turned-Republican named Wendell Willkie to capture the nomination. Not only was Willkie a most-dubious sort of candidate to attract the votes of Republicans, he further was foursquare in favor of continued vigorous prosecution of what some Americans still felt was a war for the benefit of, and instigated by, Perfidious Albion. It was, in every way, a "can't lose" proposition for the British agents provocateurs.

How did they do such a thing, without attracting the penetrating attentions of the CIA, as Trump's recent coup has (not) done? For one thing, of course, there was no CIA in 1940; there was only the FBI, and for whatever reason, it seemed not, as in 2016, to involve itself in electoral matters, or at least not visibly so. But Britain's own CIA, the vaunted MI6, was evidently at the time most active, and most effective, rather like the latter-day British agent James Bond.

The start was a conspiracy involving the incumbent (Democrat) president of the US. One (J. P. Morgan banker) Thomas W. Lamont, the Jewish pundit Walter Lippmann and the British ambassador to the US Philip Kerr (Lord Lothian) conspired to catapult the renegade Willkie, himself utterly innocent of prior political experience, to the candidacy. Willkie, who had joined the Republican Party less than a year before his candidacy, was a strong proponent of the policy of all possible military and economic aid to Britain and France in their war with Germany. Strange and wonderful indeed are those processes that some are pleased to call "democracy" from which emerge those personalities who ultimately wield such enormous powers over the minds and hearts of those who imagine that they live, and die, under the edicts of the gods who reign under the divine mantle bearing the name of "the will of the people."

But how, then, was this divine mantle so purloined? It involved, among other things, what might be called electronic hacking, decades before the advent of computers for tallying votes. At the convention, former President Herbert Hoover gave a speech strongly advocating the disfavored "isolationist" line of thought, but a "mole" of the Willkie candidacy named Sam Pryor arranged for Hoover's microphone to malfunction, such that very few could even hear his speech. A subsequent speech by Hoover in the lobby of the convention hotel in Philadelphia was drowned out by the happenstance arrival of a drum and bugle corps at just the minute when he took the floor.

Pryor, having displaced the original coordinator of the convention, one Ralph E. Williams, who favored the leading candidate, Robert Taft, had a duplicate set of passes to the convention's gallery printed up and distributed these to hand-picked shills who at appropriate moments set up a deafening chant of "We want Willkie." Senator Arthur Vandenberg, a candidate commanding at one point over seven percent of the delegates, resigned after five votes had been taken and threw his delegates' votes to Willkie, who won on the sixth vote. Vandenberg's bed (and marriage) had been penetrated by a female British agent named Mitzi Sims, who was the wife of a staffer at the British Embassy in Washington. Willkie's upset nomination left American voters who opposed US involvement in World War II with no more of a choice than American voters who oppose military aid to Israel had in 2016 between Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump.

Zyklon-B Deliveries to Auschwitz | CODOH

Abstract

Already during the Nuremberg postwar trials, the huge amount of Zyklon-B deliveries to the infamous Auschwitz Camp were seen as evidence for homicidal activities on a large scale in that camp. Revisionists, on the other hand, have maintained that this insecticide was used only to combat vermin in the struggle against epidemics. In a 2011 article, Piotr Setkiewicz, currently the research director of the Auschwitz Museum, tried to dismiss this revisionist claim as a myth by attempting to prove that the amount of Zyklon B delivered cannot be explained merely by its use for fumigations. The following paper, which is an excerpt from an upcoming book, analyzes the Auschwitz Museum's hypothesis and juxtaposes it with the documented facts. It shows not only that Setkiewicz grossly miscalculated the amount of Zyklon B delivered, but also misrepresented the amount of Zyklon B the camp would have needed to suppress the typhus epidemic raging inside the Auschwitz camp for some two years.

Introduction

In 2011, an important article was published by Piotr Setkiewicz, director of the Research Center at the Auschwitz Museum, which bears the title "The Supply of Materials to the Crematoria and Gas Chambers at Auschwitz: Coke, Wood, Zyklon." His exposition far surpasses all previous discussions on the topic by orthodox Holocaust historians (especially the rather frivolous one by van Pelt 2002), and also raises what appear to be certain not-insignificant problems. It therefore deserves to be examined more carefully.

Setkiewicz highlights the lack of documentary evidence in relation to the alleged mass extermination at Auschwitz, noting:

"The extensive research carried out in recent years on this important documentation has contributed to the sum of knowledge on the subject of the gas chambers and crematoria at Auschwitz, but it has not helped to resolve all contentious issues," so that, regardless of the testimonies, the confessions, and the few documents,

"our direct knowledge of the full extent of the Extermination is derived mainly from the obvious conclusion that if on any given day many more prisoners were brought into the camp than were registered, then the remaining number were undoubtedly killed."

This is, however, only the same dubious method used by Danuta Czech in the composition of her Auschwitz Chronicle (Czech 1989). Yet Setkiewicz wants to go beyond this by analyzing documents previously ignored by the Auschwitz Museum which should provide new evidence.

In fact, his article is an indirect response to the revisionist arguments, especially with regard to supplies of coke to the crematoria of Auschwitz-Birkenau; it is an indirect response to such an extent that the revisionist arguments are never explicitly mentioned.

In response I have written a study is a direct response to Setkiewicz's arguments, objections and explanations, each of which I have analyzed individually and then as a whole. This book is currently being translated into English and is slated to appear under the title Auschwitz: Deliveries of Coke, Wood and Zyklon B—Neither Proof Nor Trace for the Holocaust later this year as Volume 40 of the prestigious series Holocaust Handbooks. Below is Chapter III of my response dealing directly with the issue of Zyklon B deliveries to the Auschwitz Camp.

The Deliveries and What They Mean

In his section about Zyklon-B deliveries of his above-mentioned article, Setkiewicz summarizes the origin of the use of Zyklon B at Auschwitz for the purpose of disinfection. I quote his remarks and complete them where appropriate.

“Zyklon B [Setkiewicz always writes “Cyklon”] was used for the first time at Auschwitz for the fumigation of the SS guard building between July 5 and 11, 1940.”

The document mentioned by him states in this regard:[\[1\]](#)

“Building No. 54, designated for accommodating the guard detail, was fumigated against pests and diseases.”

Setkiewicz continues:

“Subsequently, other buildings in the area of the camp were disinfected[\[2\]](#) that way, including inmate dwelling barracks as well as the offices and barracks of the SS.

It results from the deposition of the former inmate Zdzisław Michalak that the Entwesungskammer [fumigation chamber] commando was established at the end of August 1941. It consisted of about 20 prisoners, who were initially employed to disinfest Blocks No. 1-9. These were designated for camp section for Soviet prisoners of war. That section was established more than a month later. The members of the commando later disinfested other blocks, but in mid-November they were permanently assigned a new job – at the disinfection [sic] chambers located at the so-called ‘Kanada I’ area.

We have a fairly accurate description of the disinfection of residential premises and the offices in the ‘staff building’ (Stabsgebäude) carried out at the end of January 1942. As results from the content of the instructions issued by Commander Höss, extraordinary prudence was maintained during its implementation: On the morning of January 22, the cracks in the windows had already been sealed with strips of paper (to seal them), and the inhabitants of the building had been transferred to other blocks for the night. The SS were ordered to leave any dirty clothes in their rooms. After taking a bath, they would get some clean underwear. They were forbidden to bring along ‘clothes, luggage, bags of documents etc.’ in order to avoid the danger of reintroducing the epidemic. The actual ‘gassing’ (Vergasung) of the buildings lasted three days, until Tuesday January 27. Detailed instructions for disinfecting the prisoners’ barracks (at Birkenau) have also been preserved in two other orders by the camp commander issued in 1943: one took place on July 24 and 25 the Camp Sector Bla (Women’s Camp), the other on July 31 and August 1 in Sector BIId (Men’s Camp).”

Setkiewicz then mentions the fumigation of the Main Camp on August 12, 1942, and adds:

“Probably due to a gas poisoning accident that took place during this event, the camp commander issued an order on that same day that, for five hours after the opening of fumigated premises, the SS men were not allowed to approach them by less than 15 meters without wearing a gas mask.” (pp. 68f.)

He refers to the “special order” (Sonderbefehl) of 12 August 1942, with which the commandant of Auschwitz imparted the following directive:[\[3\]](#)

“A case of indisposition with slight symptoms of poisoning by hydrocyanic gas which occurred today makes it necessary to warn all those participating in gassings and all other SS members that in particular on opening fumigated rooms, SS members without mask must keep a distance of 15 meters from the chamber for at least five hours. In addition, particular attention should be paid to the wind direction.”

The fumigation carried out at the end of January 1942 is mentioned in the commandant's order headlined "Fumigation of staff building" (Vergasung des Stabsgebäudes).<sup>[4]</sup>

It is important to emphasize that, in the vast documentation on Auschwitz, the term "gassing" (Vergasung) in each and every single case solely and exclusively refers to pest control, yet never to any murderous activities.

Setkiewicz then moves to the more general problem of the supply of Zyklon B to Auschwitz. He finds that there are no documents that enable determination of the precise number of fumigations that were performed and the relative Zyklon consumption. There is a register of orders for consumables (Verbrauchsmittel) placed by the camp, but it has been preserved only in part, for the months of August 1940, for January, February, and one week in April and June 1941, plus for the time period from August 1941 to November 1942.

The first entry is for a delivery of 3,000 kg of hydrogen cyanide ("Blausäure," meaning Zyklon B) from Dessau in November 1941 (see Document 7 in the appendix of my upcoming book). Setkiewicz then lists the subsequent deliveries, which refer to 1942:

- 2.200 kg in February from Dessau,
- 2.365 kg in March from Dessau,
- crates in June from Dessau,
- 33 crates in July from the Dessauerwerke für Zucker und Chemische Industrie A.G. – Dessau,
- 3.465 kg in September, of which 1,260 kg from the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Schädlingsbekämpfung (Degesch) of Frankfurt/Main, and 2,205 kg from the Dessauerwerke für Zucker und Chemische Industrie A.G. Dessau (p. 69).<sup>[5]</sup>

Setkiewicz informs us that the cans of Zyklon B delivered in February 1942 were packed in 40 crates, so each crate contained (2,200 kg ÷ 40 crates =) 55 kg of Zyklon. The number of crates delivered in March is unknown, but when using the mass per crate established above, this results in (2,365 kg ÷ 55 kg/crate =) 43 crates. However, in September, 3,465 kg of Zyklon were packed in 55 crates, so each of them contained (3,465 kg ÷ 55 kg/crate =) 63 kilograms. From this, Setkiewicz concludes that the five crates delivered in June contained (5 crates × 55 kg/crate or 63 kg/crate =) either 275 or 315 kg of Zyklon B. In the same way, the 33 crates of July corresponded to either 1,815 or 2,079 kg of Zyklon B, so that the total supply of 1942 would range from a minimum of 10,120 to a maximum of 10,424 kg (pp. 69f).

The crates of Zyklon B had different weights depending on the size of the cans. In addition, the weight of the can was generally referring to its net content of hydrogen cyanide, not to its gross weight, which was obviously higher, as results also from the labels on the cans (see Document 8 in the appendix of my upcoming book). From five shipping advices for Zyklon B by the Dessauer Werke to Degesch of April and May 1944 (see Document 9; NI-9913A) results that the 500 g can of hydrogen cyanide had a gross weight of 1.425 kg, hence the combined weight of the inert carrier (gypsum pellets called "Ercowürfel") and the empty can was 0.925 kg. A crate weighed 64 kg and contained 30 cans, which contained (0.5 kg/can × 30 cans =) 15 kg of hydrogen cyanide.

Document 9: Invoice for the delivery of 195 kg HCN as Zyklon B without irritant to the disinfestation department of the Auschwitz Camp of April 30, 1944; NI-9913A

A shipping advice of 16 May 1944 refers to 8 crates with 1,000 cans of Zyklon B, each containing 100 g of HCN. One such can had a gross weight of 350 g; while a crate containing 125 cans weighed 69 kg, it had a total HCN content of (125 cans × 0.1 kg/can =) 12.5 kg (NI-9913 B, p. 2).

Finally, the shipping advice of 29 December 1944 relates to 35 crates of Zyklon B with 420 cans of 1.2 kg. A can weighed 3.2 kg; a crate, which weighed 55 kg, had 12 cans with total hydrogen-cyanide content of (12 cans × 1.2 kg/can =) 14.4 kg (ibid., p. 3).

From another shipment advice of the Dessauer Werke dating back to 10 August 1937 we glean that a crate of Zyklon B containing 16 cans with 1 kg hydrogen cyanide each weighed 61 kg (TNA, WO-309-1603).

I summarize the data in the table below.

Table 1: Weight of Zyklon B cans of various sizes can size (HCN weight)	weight of can	weight of crate	no. of cans/crate	total weight of HCN in crate

100 g	0.350 kg	69 kg	125	12.5 kg
500 g	1.425 kg	64 kg	30	15.0 kg
1,000 g	2.650 kg	61 kg	16	16.0 kg
1,200 g	3.200 kg	55 kg	12	14.4 kg

It follows that the 40 crates of Zyklon B delivered to Auschwitz in February 1942, each weighing 55 kg, contained a total of (40 crates × 12 cans/crate =) 480 cans of 1.2 kg. Hence, the actual weight of Zyklon B (hydrogen cyanide) was (480 cans × 1.2 kg/can =) or (40 crates × 14.4 kg/crate =) 576 kg.

The 2,365 kg of Zyklon B delivered to Auschwitz in March corresponded to (2,365 kg ÷ 55 kg/crate =) 43 crates, equivalent to (43 crates × 12 cans/crate =) 516 cans with 1.2 kg HCN each, with a net weight of (43 crates × 14.4 kg/crate =) 618.2 kg of HCN.

The five crates of 500-gram cans delivered in June contained (5 crates × 30 cans/crate =) 150 cans, with a total weight of (5 crates × 15 kg/crate =) 45 kg of hydrogen cyanide.

If the July deliveries consisted of the cans size 1.2 kg, then the 33 crates contained (33 crates × 12 cans/crate =) 396 cans and (33 crates × 14.4 kg/crate =) 475.2 kg of HCN.

The average weight per crate of the 3,465 kg of Zyklon B delivered in September in 55 crates – 63 kg – does not correspond to any of the can sizes listed above, so it either was a mixture of various can sizes, the number in the document is incorrect, or Setkiewicz made a transcription error. If the average weight had been 64 kg per crate, each crate would have contained 30 cans of 500 g HCN each, in which case the gross weight would have been (64 kg/crate × 55 crates =) 3,520 kg, and the HCN content (55 crates × 15 kg/crate =) 825 kg.

In conclusion, the data for the Zyklon B deliveries in 1942 is as follows:

Table 2: Documented Zyklon-B deliveries to the Auschwitz Camp in 1942

Month	Gross Weight	no. of crates	total contents of HCN
February	2,200 kg	40	576 kg
March	2,365 kg	43	618.2 kg
June	[320 kg]	5	[45 kg]
July	[1,815 kg]	33	[475.2 kg]
September	3,465 kg	55	[825 kg]
Total:			2,539.4 kg

The maximum documented quantity of Zyklon B delivered to Auschwitz therefore did not even reach 2,540 kg, barely a quarter of Setkiewicz's estimate ranging from 10,120 to 10,424 kg!

Deliveries of Zyklon B in November 1941 and in February 1942 arrived via railroad (wagons "Münch. 19931" and "Karlsru. 51113"), whereas subsequent deliveries were picked up by truck.

It is unknown whether the 3,000 kg of Zyklon B delivered in November 1941 refers to the gross weight or the HCN content. According to Rudolf Höss, fumigations were initially carried out at Auschwitz by the firm Tesch & Stabenow; a special fumigation detail was formed only later (staffed with SDG – Sanitätsdienstgrade, SS medical personnel, called "Desinfektoren," desinfectors; see Broszat 1981, p. 159).

This was confirmed in 1945 by two employees of the Tesch Company: August Marcinkowski said that in March 1940 he carried out a fumigation at Auschwitz using 120 kg of Zyklon B.<sup>[6]</sup> Hans Willy Max Rieck stated that another fumigation was carried out in early summer 1941.<sup>[7]</sup> The delivery of November 1941 was therefore probably one of the first deliveries.

For 1942, Setkiewicz mentions two travel permits for a 5-ton truck from Auschwitz to Dessau in order to pick up Zyklon B. The first travel permit of 22 July was about “gas for the gassing of the camp for the fight against the epidemic that has occurred” (“Gas zur Vergasung des Lagers, zur Bekämpfung der aufgetretenen Seuche”) (p. 70). This confirms the use of the term “Vergasung” (gassing) in the context of pest control, as I pointed out earlier.

The second order is a radio message of 29 July 1942 containing a number of typos. It granted “the travel permit by truck from Auschwitz to Dessau to pick up gas which is urgently needed to disinfect the camp” (“die Fahrtgenehmigung mit dem LKW von Auschwitz nach Dessau zur Abholung von Gas, daß [sic] zur Desinfizierung [sic] des Lagers dringendst erforderlich ist”).<sup>[8]</sup>

Setkiewicz notes that not even two tons of Zyklon B picked up in Dessau were entered in the previously mentioned register of orders for consumables, which would mean that the two Zyklon B deliveries of July 1942 hauled by truck contained not quite a metric ton of cargo each. It is possible, he hypothesizes, that such small cargos, when seen in relation to the distance between Auschwitz and Dessau, were due to an emergency situation (Setkiewicz says “interwencyjnych,” literally “of intervention”) resulting in those orders not having been entered in the aforementioned register.

Setkiewicz then states that two more travel permits exist for 1942. The first, issued on 26 August, was “for picking up material for special treatment” (“von zur Abholung Materialien für Sonderbeh. [andlung]”; see Document 11 in the appendix of my upcoming book). The other of 2 October refers to a 5-ton truck with trailer “for picking up materials for the resettlement of the Jews” (“zwecks Abholung von Materialien für die Judenumsiedlung”; see Document 12 in the appendix of my upcoming book). Strangely enough, he does not comment on these alleged “criminal traces,” so that I refer to what I have set out elsewhere in this respect (Mattogno 2015a, pp. 214-228). Here I note only that the orthodox interpretation of these two documents would require a double accounting for the purchase of Zyklon B, one for disinfestation and the other for homicidal purposes. This not only makes little sense, it is also inconsistent with the alleged intention of the SS to “camouflage” discussion of their activities, which was supposedly done by using some sort of “code language.” Seen from that point of view, it evidently would have been much easier to order all the Zyklon B for the purpose of disinfestation and then allocate the required amount to the claimed homicidal gassings.

Setkiewicz merely notes that the above supplies are not listed in the register of orders for consumables, and he concludes that in 1942 a quantity of Zyklon B was delivered to the camp which significantly surpassed the 10,120 to 10,425 kg calculated by him (pp. 70f.), but as I demonstrated above, his figures are erroneous to begin with.

For the year 1943, Setkiewicz cites two documents. A travel permit for a five-ton truck with trailer from Auschwitz to Dessau and back to pick up material for disinfestation (“zwecks Abholung von Materialien zur Desinfektion”) dated 7 January 1943 (see Document 13 in the appendix of my upcoming book), and a travel permit for a five-ton truck from Auschwitz to Dessau to pick up Zyklon (“zwecks Abholung von Zyklon”) of 30 July (see Document 14 in the appendix of my upcoming book). These cargo trips are confirmed by two other documents, therefore we may assume that they did indeed take place. Setkiewicz writes (p. 71):

“Both trucks had a freight capacity of five tons, the trailers two tons,<sup>[9]</sup> so in total they theoretically could carry 14 tons of cargo, ie – after deducting the weight of packaging – an amount almost equal to or even exceeding the gas deliveries during 1942. But there is no reason to believe that these were the only such trips; it is most likely that subsequent travel permits simply did not survive.”

Here he commits the same mistake that I explained above. If a crate with 30 cans of Zyklon B of 0.5 kg HCN each weighed 64 kg and contained 15 kg of HCN, then 14 tons of freight (14,080 kg, to adopt round numbers) correspond to 220 crates, with a HCN content of (15 kg/crate × 220 crates =) 3,300 kg.

As for the rest, it is all too obvious that one can never categorically exclude the possibility of additional deliveries whose documentation has not been preserved.

Setkiewicz then notes that

“based on a list of Zyklon B deliveries to German concentration camps that has been preserved, it was assumed that the Auschwitz Camp received 7,478.6 kg of gas in 1942, and 12,174.09 kg in 1943. [10] This list, however, only covers deliveries made by the Testa Company, yet does not include purchases made directly from the Dessau factory or other dealers. As has been shown above, these quantities, at least as regards 1942, are decidedly low.” (p. 72)

It should be noted that the document cited by Setkiewicz – NI-11397 – is an affidavit of 18 October 1945 by Alfred Zaun, accountant of the Testa Company, in which he details the Zyklon B deliveries to concentration camps during 1942 and 1943 (see Document 15 in the appendix of my upcoming book).

As for the quantities, Zaun refers to the actual content of hydrogen cyanide, so the 7,478.6 kg delivered in 1942 corresponds to a gross weight of the cans of 21,367 kg (excluding packaging), a figure almost twice that calculated by Setkiewicz.

It is also incorrect that deliveries picked up directly at the Dessau factory are not included in these 7,478.6 kg. In fact, Zaun declared (NI-11937):

“For the purchase and delivery of Zyklon the firm [Testa] depended directly on the Deutsche Gesellschaft für Schädlingsbekämpfung Frankfurt upon Main (DEGESCH), which, as the sole proprietor of the patent and the production license, had Zyklon produced by the Dessauer Werke für Zucker und Chemische Industrie A.G. and the Kaliwerke Kolin A.G. All orders that the firm Tesch & Stabenow (Testa) received from the concentration camps and the SS organizations had to pass to DEGESCH; from time to time, Testa submitted the orders for the quantities of Zyklon ordered, informing DEGESCH about the can sizes requested and the delivery details. DEGESCH in turn took the merchandise from the factory in Dessau or Kolin. The merchandise was then shipped directly from factories in Dessau or Kolin to the end customer, and DEGESCH was sent a shipping advice with a copy to Testa.”

This is confirmed by the series of documents headed “Versandanzeige über Zyklon B Gift” (shipping advice for Zyklon B poison), which I mentioned earlier (Documents NI-9913A-B).

The DEGESCH had two major distributors, the Heerdt und Lingler GmbH of Frankfurt (“Heli”) and the Tesch und Stabenow. Internationale Gesellschaft für Schädlingsbekämpfung (“Testa”) of Hamburg, who had divided the market: Heli was operating in the territories west of the Elbe River, while Testa supplied customers in the territories to the east of the Elbe, including the Sudetengau, the General Government (occupied Poland), the Reichskommissariat Ostland (occupied territories of the USSR), as well as Denmark, Finland and Norway. Due to the Auschwitz Camp’s location, it fell within the commercial jurisdiction of Testa. Hence, all Zyklon B deliveries which the camp administration of Auschwitz had picked up directly from Dessau fell in the accounts of the Testa Company. Even the document quoted by Setkiewicz speaks explicitly of “DEGESCH delivery of Zyklon to concentration camps by the Testa Company.” However, at least for one camp the data contained in it are incomplete, because it is established that Testa supplied the Lublin-Majdanek Camp with 2,211 kg of Zyklon B in 1942, and with 4,500 kg in 1943 (Graf/Mattogno 2012, pp. 200-203.), while the list in Document NI-11937 contains no deliveries at all for 1942, and only 1,627.5 kg for 1943.

For 1944, Setkiewicz writes with reference to Franciszek Piper’s deliberations about “Zyklon B as a means of extermination” (in Długoborski/Piper 1995, Vol. III, pp. 165-170):

“We don’t know much about the Zyklon deliveries during the year 1944; according to research by F. Piper, the camp received 2,263 kg of gas in four deliveries during that year; independent of these, the company ‘Azot’ of Jaworzno delivered 1,155 kg of Zyklon between August 1943 and April 1944 to Auschwitz Concentration Camp.” (p. 72)

Piper refers to the invoices of 14 February, 13 March, 30 April (in three delivery batches) and 31 May 1944, which I summarize below along with the delivery dates, noting that shipments involved a gross weight of 832 kg (net 555 kg), for larger shipments respectively of 896 kg (net 598 kg), for a total of 3,392 (net 2,263 kg) (ibid., Note 620, p. 167).

He makes the same mistake here as well, as explained earlier, by confounding the weight of the cans with their HCN content, which was actually only 1,185 kg, as shown in the following table:

Table 3: Documented Zyklon-B deliveries to the Auschwitz Camp in 1944

Delivery Date	Invoice Date	No. of Cans	HCN [kg]
14 February 1944	14 February 1944	390	195
8 March 1944	13 March 1944	420	210
20 March 1944	30 April 1944	390	195

27 April 1944	30 April 1944	390	195
31 May 1944	31 May 1944	390	195
	Total	2,370	1,185
* see Document 16 in the appendix of my upcoming book

The shipments were made by DEGESCH through the Dessau factory to the attention of SS-Obersturmführer Kurt Gerstein. The recipient was the Department for Disinfestation and Pest Control Auschwitz (Abt. Entwesung und Entseuchung). The bills were attached by Gerstein to his famous report of April 26, 1945 (PS-1553).

Little is known about the supply of 1,155 kg of Zyklon B by the company “Azot” of Jaworzno. Piper merely repeats what the investigating judge Jan Sehn wrote, who in turn evidently quoted the indictment against Höss. In a footnote, Sehn stated that the chemical plants at Jaworzno “delivered a total of 1,155 kg of Zyklon to Auschwitz between 3 August 1943 and 24 April 1944” (Sehn 1956, Note 2, p. 109). Further details of these supplies are unknown. It is unlikely, however, that they had not passed through the Tesch company.

In a footnote Setkiewicz explains:

“In 1944, another modern disinfectant was already being used for the disinfection of barracks, which was the German equivalent of the American DDT, the ‘Lauseto.’ During that year, the Auschwitz Camp’s department in charge of pest control (‘Referat für Schädlingsbekämpfung der Waffen SS und Polizei Auschwitz O/S’) received 9 tons of this chemical on 18 April 1944, 15 tons on 21 August 1944 – and 2 tons on 3 October 1944 for the camp’s pharmacy. Archive of Bayer in Leverkusen, letter by Paulsen [a company executive?] to the lawyer Dr. Nele of 24 November 1947 with a brief list of the deliveries.” (Note 105, p. 72)

At least one document exists mentioning the use of this substance. It is from 26 July 1944, and headlined “Inmate Infirmary BII/a. Auschwitz II. Monthly report on the H[ungarian]. Jews temporarily accommodated in the camp.” (“HKB Ambulanz BII/a. Auschwitz II. Monatsbericht über vorübergehend im Lager untergebrachte u[ngarische]. Juden”), which reads (some of the text is illegible; GARF, 7021-108-32, p. 76):

“During the period under review, /26 June to 26 July 1944/ of ..... on average 2,500 Hungar. Jews ready for transport in the camp in 3 blocks, remaining 3 - 10 days in the camp. They are subjected to a thorough medical examination and are monitored for lice both on admission and on dismissal. Daily monitoring for fever and lice; lice bearers are deloused in the camp’s own delousing facility, clothes and underwear are disinfected in steam vessels and impregnated wth Lauseto.”

In 1944, other pesticides were used in Auschwitz as well, such as Areginal, which is based on ethylformiate. In the letter by Tesch & Stabenow to the Auschwitz Central Construction Office of June 13, 1944 we read about this:[\[11\]](#)

“We have noted that the gassing chambers are to be arranged also for AREGINAL gassing. Your garrison surgeon has not yet approached us in this matter, but on the 9th of this month we received instructions from the Surgeon General SS and Police, the Top Hygienist, to include the additional AREGINAL devices. No modifications of the gassing chambers are necessary; only the AREGINAL gassing unit has to be installed. You will receive an appropriate installation drawing when the AREGINAL units have been supplied by the manufacturer. For the sake of completeness, we inform you here that the price of the AREGINAL unit amounts to RM 27.-, and the steel requirements are 12 kilograms.”

In 1944, a shortwave delousing device was also introduced at Auschwitz (Kurzwellen-Entlausung; see Nowak 1998). These innovations undoubtedly reduced the need for Zyklon B.

Setkiewicz informs us that at Auschwitz, Zyklon B was stored on the ground floor of the so-called old theater building (Theatergebäude), or in the storage area of the SS hospital's basement (SS-Revier). The camp pharmacist Dr. Viktor Capesius was in charge of it.

On the alleged homicidal use of Zyklon B, the author mentions a testimony that borders on comedy:

“Initially, Zyklon was introduced into the gas chambers by the simplest methods: the former detainee Antoni Sz wajnoch, in 1942 assigned to the ‘Kanada I’ commando, testified that, after the beginning of the extermination activities in the ‘Red House’ and in the ‘White House’ [Bunkers I & II], he received the order from time to time to withdraw a few cans of Zyklon from the stock at the theater building, after which he had to run with them on the road to Brzezinka (Birkenau), while an SS guard watched him riding a bicycle at his side.” (p. 72)

Subsequently, however, Zyklon B was delivered to the alleged gas chambers using ambulances bearing Red Cross symbols, which at the camp were colloquially called “sankas” (Sanitätskraftwagen). The inmates of the disinfection commando took four or five crates from the theater building and brought them in a wheelbarrow to the ‘Kanada I’ area, where they were loaded into an ambulance car. Setkiewicz informs us:

“In those parts of the register of the camp’s motor pool [Fahrbereitschaft] which have been preserved (for the period of 30 May to 17 August 1943) 591 trips of this type of vehicle [presumably ambulances] are logged. It is likely that the majority of them was for purposes unrelated to the delivery of Zyklon to the gas chambers: [trips to] subcamps for the supply of medicines for dispensaries located there, for the transport of prisoners’ corpses (Totentransport) to Katowice or other neighboring cities. The majority of records (324), however, concern trips within the camp area (Lagerbereich), made mostly on behalf of the SS hospital. Unfortunately, it does not contain any information on the transport of Zyklon.

However, this should not surprise us, particularly because the clerk assigned to the register had been instructed to avoid creating any record that attests to the operation of an extermination center at Birkenau.” (pp. 72f.)

This explanation is rather naive, because hydrogen-cyanide-disinfection gas chambers existed at Birkenau (in Buildings BW 5a and 5b), to which Zyklon B was supplied in a normal fashion. Therefore, if there had been a need to “camouflage” Zyklon-B deliveries, they could have been easily record as deliveries to these delousing installations instead of to the alleged homicidal gas chambers. The fact is that among the extant records “there are no clear references to selections or the operation of [homicidal] gas chambers” (p. 73).

Setkiewicz then writes that “former detainees assigned to work at the gas chambers or at the disinfection chambers recalled that the Zyklon granules, after their use, were collected in containers, transported to the theater building warehouse, and shipped back to the manufacturer. However, we have been unable to find traces of these transports in the camp's documents." (p. 73)

This was standard procedure; the granules were sent to the manufacturer at Dessau as "spent Zyklon" ("verbrauchtes Zyklon"; see Document 17). This recycling procedure, however, is not mentioned by any of the main witnesses of the so-called Sonderkommando of Auschwitz allegedly involved in the claimed homicidal gassings.

Document 17: German Army waybill for the return of spent Zyklon B from the Majdanek Camp to the manufacturer, February 2, 1943

As in the case of firewood supplies for cremation, the total deliveries of Zyklon B do not enable inference of anything and do not provide the slightest clue about the alleged homicidal gassings. To make this clear, I give a simple example.

According to the cost estimate for the extension of the PoW camp of the Waffen SS at Auschwitz (Kostenvoranschlag zum Ausbau des Kriegsgefangenenlagers der Waffen-SS in Auschwitz) of 1 October 1943, the following barracks existed at the Birkenau Camp:

Table 4: Volume of buildings at the Auschwitz-Birkenau Camp

Building	Number and Type of Building	Volume per Building	Total Volume
BW 3a BA I	30 dwelling barracks	1,034.00 m <sup>3</sup>	31,020.0 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 4a	3 storage barracks	2,106.20 m <sup>3</sup>	6,318.6 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 6a	5 wash barracks	582.00 m <sup>3</sup>	2,910.0 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 7a	5 toilet barracks	582.00 m <sup>3</sup>	2,910.0 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 3b	25 dwelling barracks	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	25,815.0 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 4a	2 Wirtschaftsbaracken	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	2,065.2 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 4b	2 storage barracks	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	2,065.2 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 8a	1 morgue barracks	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	1,032.6 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 12c	4 infirmary barracks	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	4,130.4 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 12c	2 infirmary barracks	405.00 m <sup>3</sup>	810.0 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 12e	2 quarantine barracks	1,593.75 m <sup>3</sup>	3,187.5 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 12f	2 block leader barracks	406.00 m <sup>3</sup>	812.0 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 3d BA II	135 dwelling barracks	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	139,40 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 4c	9 barracks of domestic economy	1,381.50 m <sup>3</sup>	12,433.5 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 6b	14 wash barracks	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	14,546.4 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 7b	14 toilet barracks	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	14,546.4 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 12a	11 infirmary barracks	470.40 m <sup>3</sup>	5,174.4 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 12d	12 block leader barracks	406.00 m <sup>3</sup>	4,872.0 m <sup>3</sup>
BW 34a	4 effects barracks	1,032.60 m <sup>3</sup>	4,130.4 m <sup>3</sup>
Total:			278,180.6 m <sup>3</sup>

To this we must add about 30 barracks of the camp's SS garrison, hence  $1,032.60 \text{ m}^3 \times 30 \approx 31,000 \text{ m}^3$ .

The Main Camp consisted of 28 masonry blocks of two floors each with basement. They measured  $45.10 \text{ m} \times 13.84 \text{ m}$  externally, hence had a total area of  $624.18 \text{ m}^2$ . For the height of the rooms we can assume 3 m, so that the total volume of each floor was  $624.18 \text{ m}^2 \times 3 \text{ m} = 1872.54 \text{ m}^3$ ; for 28 blocks of three floors each this yields  $1872.54 \text{ m}^3 \times 3 \times 28 = 157,293.36 \text{ m}^3$ , which we can round down to  $150,000 \text{ m}^3$  when considering the presence of partitions.<sup>[12]</sup> At Monowitz there were 67 barracks plus a few other buildings, so we can assume a total volume of approximately  $1032.60 \times 67 = 69,200 \text{ m}^3$ .

In practice, therefore, the camps of Auschwitz, Birkenau and Monowitz alone already had buildings with a total volume of at least approximately  $500,000 \text{ m}^3$ . One complete disinfection of these camps with the standard amount of  $8 \text{ g HCN per m}^3$  would therefore have required almost 4 metric tons of Zyklon B (net HCN content).

In another study, I demonstrated that the Zyklon-B disinfestation chambers in existence at Auschwitz on 9 January 1943 would have required more than 11 metric tons of Zyklon B per year when used once a day. The known deliveries of Zyklon B are thus not at all out of proportion to the camp's innocuous disinfestation needs, quite to the contrary. This story was put into circulation already in the second half of 1945 by the Americans during their investigations in preparation of the trial against Bruno Tesch et al. The interrogations of Joachim Drosihn, chief chemist of the Tesch company, and of Bruno Tesch by U.S. investigators clearly show the nature of the Holocaust myth of that era, for we find there the claims that

- 5 (five) million people were allegedly gassed at Auschwitz;
- therefore, the Zyklon-B supplies to this camp served mostly for those gassings;
- those gassings allegedly took place in “shower rooms”; during an interrogation of 17 October 1945, U.S. Captain A.W. Freud asked Drosihn how many “shower rooms” (Duschräume) he personally had converted into gas chambers!<sup>[13]</sup>

Conclusion

Setkiewicz's summary at the end of his article is not exactly flattering to the Holocaust historiography:

“Although many years have passed since the war ended, the researchers [of the Auschwitz Museum] have failed to find any major body of documents in the archives on the basis of which the entire extermination process at the Auschwitz Concentration Camp can be described accurately. In view of the many gaps in the archival materials that are crucial to our understanding of this issue, we are left with hundreds and thousands of witness reports, first of all by former inmates, or the testimonies by members of the SS, who were either in marginal or in permanent contact with the crematoria and the gas chambers. These reports, however, although most are credible and complement each other, contain – by their very nature – a number of inaccuracies and errors (especially with regard to the chronology), so in the end they cannot be considered as absolutely sufficient historiographical sources.”

As a small consolation, the author says that

“the testimonies referred to above, however, can be supported – as demonstrated above – by references [wzmiankami] contained in the documents of the various groups of the camp's files which, although certainly rare, are at once immensely important. Only together, when analyzed in conjunction, these documents and the testimonies of the former detainees permit to reconstruct the course of events and to understand the magnitude of the crimes committed at Auschwitz.” (pp. 73f.)

Thus, everything is reduced to testimonies which are completely inadequate as historical sources, and to scattered “references” in documents (Pressac's “criminal traces”?).

The end of Setkiewicz's article clearly shows his actual intent: to respond to revisionism without mentioning it:

“To those who still doubt, the following question can be asked: if Auschwitz was merely a simple ‘labor camp,’ then what were those ‘field furnaces,’ the ‘gassing rooms,’ the ‘mortuary chambers’ and the ‘bathing installations’; what purposes did the ‘material for special treatment’ or ‘material for the resettlement of the Jews’ really serve, which was ordered from the Cyklon factory at Dessau in thousands of kilograms; why were considerable quantities of firewood transported by truck to the Sonderkommando, while at the same time thousands of tons of coke were delivered to the cremation furnaces?”

If the SS had nothing to hide at Auschwitz, Setkiewicz concludes, they would not have invented “complicated euphemisms,” but since they invented them, they tried to “hide the traces of unprecedented crimes” (p. 74), which means that the “proof” par excellence for the alleged gassings at Auschwitz is reduced to those alleged “euphemisms”!

If Setkiewicz, in addition to asking questions, were also willing to listen to the answers, he would know that all the issues he raised were dealt with and explained in depth in their historical and documentary manifestations by those same unnamed revisionists.

As for me, here are the references:

- “Field furnaces” (Feldöfen): in addition to what I pointed out earlier, see Mattogno 2015b, esp. pp. 100f.; Mattogno 2015a, pp. 363f.; Mattogno 2008, pp. 31-49.
- “Gassing rooms” (Vergasungsräume): as I explained elsewhere (Mattogno 2015b, pp. 24f.), Setkiewicz pretends to be ignorant of the fact that this term was used for the disinfestation gas chambers of Buildings BW 5a and 5b at Birkenau.
- “Mortuary chambers” (Leichenhallen, Leichenkeller): insisting that these terms were “euphemisms,” following Jean-Claude Pressac’s studies, can only be an indication of bad faith.
- “Bathing installations” (Badeanstalten für Sonderaktionen): see Mattogno 2015b, Section 7.3., pp. 190-194; Mattogno 2015a, same chapter, pp. 206-212.
- “Material for special treatment” (Material für Sonderbehandlung): see Mattogno 2015b, Section 7.5, “Material für Sonderbehandlung,” pp. 198-202; Mattogno 2015a, same section, pp. 214-219.
- “Material for the resettlement of the Jews” (Materialien für Judenumsiedlung): see Chapter IV in my upcoming book.
- Finally, with regard to the supply of Zyklon B, firewood and coke, I refer to what I have stated in the total of my upcoming book.

The best mainstream treatment on the issue of coke, firewood and Zyklon B deliveries to Auschwitz is thus totally inconsistent and utterly unable even to scratch the surface of revisionist critiques.

American Famine and the Failure of the New Deal

by Kerry R. Bolton

Two of the great myths of recent history are that:

1. Germany achieved economic recovery through rearmament;
2. Roosevelt overcame the Depression through his New Deal social reforms.

These assumptions are in inverse proportion to actuality. Germany achieved economic recovery in a similar way the Labour Government in New Zealand did at about the same time: state credit for public works without recourse to debt. This system in Germany has been explained in some detail in a prior article at Inconvenient History.<sup>[1]</sup>

The public works that were funded through several different types of non-usurious credit in Germany were not of the character of military preparation. For example concomitant with the myth of economic recovery through war production, it is generally believed that the autobahns were constructed to promptly allow for the transport of tanks and other heavy military equipment for a long planned war. Dr. Frederick Spotts who, like other mainstream historians shedding new light on such subjects feels obliged to interpolate his scholarship with pointless quips and clichéd opinions lest he be damned as a Nazi apologist, debunks such assumptions about war expenditure in regard to the autobahns. He points out that the features of the autobahns were designed for aesthetic and ecological reasons, not to quickly move tanks and cannon about Germany to a projected war front:

“The autobahns were therefore intended not so much to facilitate cars going from one place to another as to show off the natural and architectural beauty of the country. Routes were chosen to go through attractive areas without disturbing the harmony of hills, valleys and forests. Lay-bys were created for travellers to stop and admire the panorama. In some cases the roadway itself made a detour, despite additional cost, to offer a particularly impressive view. Great effort went into construction so as to minimize the damage to the environment. Landscape architects vetted the plans, directional signs were discrete and service stations were made as inconspicuous as possible. Bridges and overpasses were built not only to fit in with the landscape but also to be architectural achievements in themselves...”<sup>[2]</sup>

Dr. Spotts points out that the autobahn routes “did not run to likely front lines.” The surfaces were too thin to support tanks and other heavy vehicles. During the war the roads, having shiny, white surfaces, had to be camouflaged with paint to prevent their use as routes for enemy aircraft.<sup>[3]</sup>

A promotional video produced by the US government to highlight the projects and programs of the Roosevelt's New Deal during the Great Depression (https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=wF80co\_Y\_Bc)

The major problems of food imports that plagued both Italy and Germany were addressed by “internal colonization.” While allegedly up to 7,000,000 kulaks were being collectivised to death in the USSR, Germany and Italy sought to build up a prosperous and expanding peasantry by improved methods of cultivation, and by vast land reclamation schemes. Under Sovietization, the peasantry was being eliminated as a reactionary class; under Fascism the peasantry was being upheld as the foundation of a healthy folk. The “idiocy of rural life,” as Karl Marx had termed it, despite attempts at rationalisation by Marxist revisionists, was regarded as the ideal under Fascism, and this rural idealism pertained not only to states such as Italy, Germany, Petain’s France, Franquist Spain, Dollfuss’ Austria, Salazar’s Portugal, Peron’s Argentina and Vargas’ Brazil; but Mosley’s Fascism, Romania’s Iron Guard, Norway’s Nasjonal Samling, and other such movements that regarded agriculture as of primary significance both in terms of national survival, and the physical and moral health of the people. Therefore where Fascist or at least corporatist states emerged, they enacted charters for those who worked the land. The reforms inaugurated by Petain, Vargas and Peron remain the basis of modern France, Brazil and Argentina respectively.

Under Italy’s Integral Land Reclamation, started in 1929, ex-servicemen were settled on reclaimed land with grants, and communities were built with full amenities. Most famous of the projects was the malaria ridden Pontine Marshes. The first model township built there was Littoria, “a reasonably flourishing township of ex-servicemen and their families drawn from all parts of Italy.” It stood amidst a network of roads and irrigation canals, “overlooking cultivated fields in a region which less than seven years ago was a pestiferous, malarial swamp, haunted by fever-stricken wraiths of neglected humanity...”[4]

After World War II, in an effort to efface Fascism, Littoria was renamed Latina, and is today a thriving city of over 115,000 inhabitants, and remains an important centre for agriculture. The city’s motto is “Latina olim palus;” “Latina, once a swamp.”

Of the “Battle of the Grain,” Munro stated that this initiative started in mid-1925. In 1922, the year of the Fascist assumption to government, Italy produced 44 million quintals of grain, but needed to import 33 million, to make up the required 75 million. By 1925 this had escalated to over 65 million. In 1932 Italy had achieved the goal of self-sufficiency with 75,151,000 quintals. Henceforth, Italy embarked on “The Integral Battle for Agriculture.”[5]

Of Germany Dr. Anna Bramwell in her seminal book Blood and Soil: Walther Darré & Hitler’s Green Party, writes that Germany

“...proceeded to introduce laws establishing hereditary farm tenure for small and medium sized farms. The wholesale food industry was virtually abolished, and a marketing system established which set prices and controlled quality. ... A back-to-the-land programme was introduced, which established viable peasant settlements, and poured money into the rural infrastructure where the settlements were located. A drive to increase peasant productivity was introduced, which was remarkably successful in coaxing more productivity per hectare from the land, and in increasing intensive agriculture...”[6]

Marketing in Italy and Germany was efficiently undertaken through corporatist organs involving all sectors of agricultural production and distribution. Of Germany Dr. Arthur Laurie wrote in 1939:

“On the 13th September, 1933, the German Government enacted as the basic law for agriculture, the National Food Corporation Act which decided the provisional constitution of this organisation. Thus the Corporation was lifted from the level of a voluntary organisation to the position of a public body. The National Food Corporation became a compulsory institution for the persons affected, and is subject to official supervision. Therefore the National Food Corporation includes not only the productive group - that is agriculture itself - but also all those groups which are in any way concerned with providing the German nation with food. They comprise the groups engaged in the manufacture of various commodities out of these products as well as those concerned with the distribution to the consumer. By reason of this co-operation, the National Food Corporation forms a body consisting of producers, manufacturers and distributors all of whom are of equal importance within this organisation.”[7]

In the Fascist and corporatist states farmers were secured from foreclosure. Regarding the German legislation,

“...in order to put agricultural estates on a sound economic basis it was necessary to regulate indebtedness. The Act of June 1, 1933, makes it possible to reduce debts to a level in accordance with safety and to ensure their repayment from the yield without endangering the farmer’s livelihood. There are two ways of doing this. On the one hand there is a procedure for reducing debts by which the creditor voluntarily grants a remission, making it possible to draw up a plan for paying off what is owed. On the other hand if a reduction of debts is necessary and the creditors are not willing to grant remissions, there is a procedure for compulsory adjustment. The debt regulation aims at freeing the owners of farms, woods and market gardens, who need relief from their debts to such an extent that, after paying for the upkeep of their families, they may pay off their debts according to the adjustment plan from the yield of their land. The plan for the abolition of debt is supplemented by protection from distraint for agriculture, so as to prevent property being confiscated and things being auctioned which are necessary for the running of the farm.”[8]

In the pluto-democracies at the same time matters were much different. The problem that the USA and Britain sought to resolve was what to do with farmers and farm workers driven off the land through lack of markets while masses went hungry. It was the unresolvable paradox – for the plutocracies – of “poverty amidst plenty.” John Hargrave, the British Social Credit crusader, chronicled in his Depression-era book Social Credit Explained, the manner by which states throughout the world were paying farmers to destroy their crops, some examples being:

- The destruction of 100,000 pigs in the Netherland, 1932.
- 2,000,000 and 4,000,000 little pigs destroyed in USA, 1933.
- 225,000 sheep slaughtered in Britain, 1933.
- 25,000 cattle incinerated, Denmark, 1933.
- 5,0000 lambs driven into sea, New Zealand, 1933.
- France fines farmers for increasing acreage, 1933.
- USA ploughs in 25% of cotton crop, 1933.
- Potato growers fined £15,000 for exceeding acreage allowed by the Potato Marketing Board, Britain, 1935.[9]

In 1933, while Fascist Italy was engaged in the “Battle for Wheat,” The Daily Express in Britain carried the headline: “Innumerable schemes for the restriction of wheat acreage.” While Italy was reclaiming malarial marshlands for cultivation and settlement, The Daily Express reported in 1932 that between 1919 and 1930 2,5000,000 acres of English arable land were to go out of cultivation, which the newspaper described as an “enormous sabotage of food supplies.”[10]

British historian Piers Brendon states of Depression-era USA:

“In Iowa a bushel of corn was worth less than a packet of chewing gum. Apples and peaches rotted in the orchards of Oregon and California, just as cotton did in the fields of Texas and Oklahoma. Western ranchers killed their cattle and sheep because they could not pay to feed them. Yet there was hunger amidst abundance. Broad lines stretched under choking grain elevators. Malnutrition and associated diseases like rickets and pellagra were commonplace...”[\[11\]](#)

Miners in Kentucky and Pennsylvania ate weeds. Others scavenged from restaurant bins. In Kansas farmers burnt wheat, now worthless, to keep warm. Corn, being cheaper than coal, was used on fires.[\[12\]](#)

The one place in the USA that was an exception had adopted what is often sneeringly regarded as “fascist” type methods. Huey Long, Governor of Louisiana; was “quite impervious to the constraints of economic orthodoxy.”[\[13\]](#) He built huge public works schemes: hospitals, schools, highways; and obliged the banks to co-operate. As a Senator he condemned the Federal Reserve Bank system as responsible for the Great Depression and as being controlled by international finance. However, Long, whose “Share-the-Wealth” movement threatened Roosevelt’s re-election to the presidency in 1936, was shot in 1935. Long hoped to unite with the “radio priest” Father Charles Coughlin,[\[14\]](#) whose own mass movement, the National Union for Social Justice, was also regarded as a major threat by Roosevelt. Father Coughlin was silenced through a deal reached between Roosevelt and The Vatican, and dutifully returned to being a humble parish priest on orders from his superiors.[\[15\]](#)

American Famine

The “dust bowl” devastation of American farmers and their departure from the land was made famous by John Steinbeck in his 1939 novel The Grapes of Wrath. While we might have read it as school students, we were too young to draw lessons from it, and now the older generation is too ignorant to draw lessons from it. The Joad family, like thousands of others, pack up and leave their farm, and travel to California, where the prospect of picking oranges makes this seem to be the Promised Land. Families are split, and the young and the elderly die. Steinbeck got to know the situation intimately when he was writing a series of articles on American migrant workers for the San Francisco Chronicle.

Any picking of oranges undertaken by migrant workers in California under the New Deal would have been for the purposes of dumping. Father Coughlin, who started out as a supporter of Roosevelt and advocate for the New Deal which he had called “Christ’s Deal,” became, with Huey Long, the most effective critic of the New Deal and the Roosevelt Administration. His magazine, Social Justice, obtained a circulation of 200,000 and was denied postal access in an effort to silence him. Coughlin’s primary aim was to establish a state credit system, and allow the starving the purchasing power to purchase what was being produced instead of it being dumped for lack of buyers. His inspiration was traditional Catholic social doctrine, which related a great deal to opposition to usury and to establishing a just price. In Coughlin’s Social Justice, there was a column called “Ham and Eggs,” written by Marek Martin. The column started: “Millions of tons of good fruit are destroyed to keep prices high while nearby poor suffer rickets for want of orange juice.”[\[16\]](#)

Anecdotally Martin wrote of a local “ragpicker” and himself standing on a pile of organs 15 feet high and a mile and a quarter long. The ragpicker remarked: “They’ve been dumpin’ every day for the last three months – generally around twenty of these big six-ton trucks a day. Oranges are better this year than last, but there's lots more dumping. Can't figure it out..." Someone at a local diner commented to Martin, questioning why the price of oranges could be so high? "Why, they're dumping them in the river bed... and spraying crankcase oil on them so they aren't usable. Prices shouldn't be high. People just don't have anything to use for money, that's all." Of the stacks of oranges, "tons and tons" were rotting in the sun, observed Martin. Oranges, "as far as the eye could see." The packing firm for Orange County paid someone $75 per month to spray the dumped oranges every night so nobody could come and eat them. Everywhere Martin was surrounded by oranges, "a thousand trees to grow a million oranges, to go into the dump."

"I thought of the hovels I had seen in Los Angeles... the miserable shacks where forgotten American families live like animals and never buy a piece of fresh meat from one year's end to the next. I thought there ought to be some way to get oranges to those people. I thought that was about the most important thing in the world – to get the things there are into the hands of the people who need them."[\[17\]](#)

The ragpicker remarked: "We just got frozen out, that's all. The oranges did and I did. I ain't complainin', I get along, and I still got my wife – married thirty-seven years now, and that's a lot. But I sure wish the people who wants them oranges, and me, had somethin' to use for money."[\[18\]](#)

That was 1938. The New Deal had been going since 1933, the year Hitler assumed Government. The New Deal answer after five years of ad hoc legislation was still to dump and destroy produce while people starved, and while farmers were dispossessed.

Huey Long's Condemnation

The early New Deal architects had looked at Fascist Italy and attempted to apply some corporatist half-measures. What was offered was what is now called "corporate liberalism." [\[19\]](#) Long saw the New Deal as no better than that of the previous administration. He condemned the destruction of food while the people went hungry:

"...Why, do you think this Roosevelt's plan for plowing up cotton, corn, and wheat; and for pouring milk in the river, and for destroying and burying hogs and cattle by the millions, all while people starve and go naked - do you think those plans were the original ideas of this Roosevelt administration? If you do, you are wrong. The whole idea of that kind of thing first came from Hoover's administration. Don't you remember when Mr. Hoover proposed to plow up every fourth row of cotton? We laughed him into scorn. President Roosevelt flayed him for proposing such a thing in the speech which he made from the steps of the capitol in Topeka, Kans.

And so we beat Mr. Hoover on his plan. But when Mr. Roosevelt started on his plan, it was not to plow up every fourth row of cotton as Hoover tried to do. Roosevelt's plan was to plow up every third row of cotton, just one-twelfth more cotton to be plowed up than Hoover proposed. Roosevelt succeeded in his plan.

So it has been that while millions have starved and gone naked; so it has been that while babies have cried and died for milk; so it has been that while people have begged for meat and bread, Mr. Roosevelt's administration has sailed merrily along, plowing under and destroying the things to eat and to wear, with tear-dimmed eyes and hungry souls made to chant for this new deal so that even their starvation dole is not taken away, and meanwhile the food and clothes craved by their bodies and souls go for destruction and ruin. What is it? Is it government? Maybe so. It looks more like St. Vitus dance...”[20]

Long got shot; Coughlin got censured by his Church superiors in a new deal they made with Roosevelt. Long’s aide Gerald L. K. Smith tried to keep the Long “Share the Wealth” movement going, and held joint rallies with Coughlin but, despite the dynamism of both Smith and Coughlin, the movement was destroyed by self-seeking from within and Rooseveltian prosecution from without, until finally finished by Pearl Harbor.

Lend Lease and War Spending

It was not a demo-liberal half-measure at trying to ape Fascist corporatism that eventually dragged the USA out of crisis, along with the other democratic-plutocracies but, on the contrary, the war machine of the military-industrial complex, which Roosevelt had cranked up with the “Lend Lease” law in 1941. $50 billion was appropriated by Congress for Lend-Lease for 38 countries of which $31 billion went to Britain.

Robert M. Hutchins, president of the University of Chicago, and a leading opponent of Lend-Lease at a time when 80% of the American people opposed U.S. intervention in overseas quarrels, lambasted the Roosevelt administration, decrying the lack of funds for rebuilding the USA, that suddenly became available for rearming other states against Germany, and pointing out the failure of the New Deal:

“We have it on the highest authority that one-third of the nation is ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed. The latest figures of the National Resources Board show that almost 55 percent of our people are living on family incomes of less than $1,250 a year. This sum, says Fortune magazine, will not support a family of four. On this basis more than half our people are living below the minimum level of subsistence. More than half the army which will defend democracy will be drawn from those who have had this experience of the economic benefits of ‘the American way of life’.

We know that we have had till lately 9 million unemployed and that we should have them still if it were not for our military preparations. When our military preparations cease, we shall, for all we know, have 9 million unemployed again. In his speech on December 29, Mr. Roosevelt said, 'After the present needs of our defence are past, a proper handling of the country’s peacetime needs will require all of the new productive capacity - if not still more.' For ten years we have not known how to use the productive capacity we had. Now suddenly we are to believe that by some miracle, after the war is over, we shall know what to do with our old productive capacity and what to do in addition with the tremendous increases which are now being made. We have want and fear today. We shall have want and fear ‘when the present needs of our defence are past.’”[21]

Hutchins was speaking in 1941 when still “one-third of the nation is ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed.” The New Deal had failed, while the Fascist states prospered. Hutchins alluded to even Roosevelt stating in his Lend-Lease speech that there had been no “proper handling of the country’s peacetime needs.”

Indeed, Roosevelt in his press conference announcing Lend-Lease, in regard to concerns as to lack of finance for war production, stated that no war in history was ever lost due to insufficient money. He related how in 1914 stockbrokers were telling him that the war in Europe would be over in a few weeks due to lack of finances; he wagered with them that it would proceed. Roosevelt told the pressmen clearly that war production would stoke up the American economy. He stated of the situation:

“Now we have been getting stories, speeches, et cetera, in regard to this particular war that is going on, which go back a little bit to that attitude. It isn’t merely a question of doing things the traditional way; there are lots of other ways of doing them. I am just talking background, informally; I haven’t prepared any of this – I go back to the idea that the one thing necessary for American national defense is additional productive facilities; and the more we increase those facilities—factories, shipbuilding ways, munition plants, et cetera, and so on – the stronger American national defense is’.[22]

Selling the Lend-Lease step to war to the American people as being in America’s interests, Roosevelt explained:

“...Orders from Great Britain are therefore a tremendous asset to American national defense; because they automatically create additional facilities. I am talking selfishly, from the American point of view—nothing else.”[23]

To the question as to whether Lend-Lease brought the USA closer to war, Roosevelt replied: “No, of course not.” He had to sell his Lend-Lease programme as an American patriot; although many Americans knew he was obsessed with defeating Hitler regardless of American interests. He stated to the pressmen that it was “a great deal of nonsense” in thinking only of “traditional terms about finances.”

Here then is the lie exposed: It was the democracies that achieved economic recovery only through war production. Hitler had seven years previously rejected “traditional thinking about finance” by having the state issue bonds, script and credit of various types, without recourse to private finance; somewhat similar to the New Zealand Labour Government in 1935.[24] The autobahn, housing, land reclamation, and much else of a peaceful nature went ahead, as it did in Italy, well before there was a war economy. Conversely, the USA was stuck in a quagmire until Lend-Lease; then miraculously “money” was found for war production. While the pluto-democracies could not find the “money” for public works and to maintain consumer purchasing power, necessitating factory closures and farm foreclosures; Roosevelt was suddenly able to find the “money” for Lend-Lease, which had the spin-off affects in manufacturing clothing, boots, etc. He was able to do this beyond the “tradition terms of economic thinking” for war production, yet this could not be done during the Great Depression for peaceful reconstruction.

Anti-Gentiles Deny the 5 Million!

by Hadding Scott

Holocaustian Establishment and Organized Jewry Wound Themselves by Attacking Trump

Leading Jewish Holocaustians recently attacked President Donald Trump for issuing a statement on International Holocaust Remembrance Day that did not specify that the victims were Jews. The result is that the public has been informed by Deborah Lipstadt that the Holocaust is by definition an exclusively Jewish matter, and by Yehuda Bauer that the old war propaganda alleging millions of non-Jewish victims was false—which certainly will be cited in the future as a justification for questioning the Jewish claim of 6 million. This was a self-destructive assault by members of the Holocaustian establishment against President Trump.

There are two fundamental versions of the Holocaust, one that was created for war propaganda, which is not primarily about Jews, and a very different version that was created for Zionist propaganda, which is all about Jews.

The Trump Administration issued a statement on International Holocaust Remembrance Day that did not mention any particular ethnic group as the victims of the Holocaust. Representatives of Jewish organizations immediately demanded that the presumed oversight be corrected, but the Trump Administration refused to do this, stating that they did not wish to commemorate Jewish deaths to the exclusion of the many non-Jewish deaths in the Holocaust.

Deborah Lipstadt and others stated that the Holocaust was by definition about Jews exclusively, because that is how they define it.

Yehuda Bauer of Israel's Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum even repudiated the proposition that there were several million non-Jewish deaths in German concentration camps, pinning the blame for the legend of the “5 million” on Simon Wiesenthal.

In fact the claim of millions of non-Jewish victims dates from the war itself. In early propaganda about concentration camps, Jews sometimes were not mentioned at all. What has happened is that the original story of German atrocities, which emphasized a diversity of victims in order to convince non-Jews that the war was necessary, has gradually been overshadowed by Zionist propaganda that essentially has no use for non-Jewish victimhood.

The conflict between Trump and the Defenders of the Holocaust Faith is based on the fact that Trump has adhered to something more or less resembling the original war propaganda (which continues to exert influence because it was never authoritatively repudiated) instead of embracing the currently prevalent Zionist propaganda.

By attacking Trump over this, they have called attention to an enormous change in the Holocaust, which provides obvious justification for questioning other elements of the story.

Jewish Criticism of Trump's Holocaust Statement

On 27 January 2017, International Holocaust Remembrance Day, the website of the White House carried a statement in the name of President Donald Trump lamenting the “depravity and horror inflicted on innocent people by Nazi terror” and expressing gratitude to “those who risked their lives to save the innocent.”

Immediately there was complaining about Trump's statement, on the grounds that it did not include the word Jews. He mentioned “innocent people” and “the perished,” but not Jews.

Fifteen minutes after noon on the day when this statement was issued, Jonathan Greenblatt, the CEO of the ADL (and a former aide to Barack Obama), tweeted:

“@WhiteHouse statement on #HolocaustMemorialDay, misses that it was six million Jews who perished, not just 'innocent people'”

Greenblatt also tweeted that this was a break from what other U.S. presidents had done, and called it “puzzling and troubling.”

Greenblatt did not mention that “International Holocaust Remembrance Day” was declared only in 2005, which means that just two U.S. Presidents, Obama and the younger Bush, ever issued any statement on the matter. This was not a venerable old tradition that Trump violated.

Steven Goldstein, executive director of the Anne Frank Center for Mutual Tolerance, seconded Greenblatt's criticism:

“How can you forget, Mr President, that six million Jews were murdered because they were Jews? You chose the vague phrase ‘innocent people.’ They were Jews, Mr President.” (Guardian, 28 January 2017)

On Sunday, 29 January, John Podhoretz, editor of the American Jewish Committee's organ Commentary, continued to kvetch about Trump's failure to mention Jews. (An interesting detail here is that Podhoretz defines the Holocaust as “the effort by Nazi Germany to eradicate Jews from the face of the earth.” Not from Europe, but from the Earth, which presupposes the contention of quaint old war propaganda that Hitler intended to conquer the entire planet. Podhoretz is not living in the real world.)

Trump Doubles Down

On Saturday, 28 January, the President's representative Hope Hicks told CNN that Jews were not specifically mentioned because Jews were not the only victims of the Holocaust. She supported that position by citing a 2015 article from the Huffington Post (no friends of Trump) that referred to “5 million non-Jewish” victims.

On Sunday, Trump's chief of staff, Reince Priebus, appeared on Meet the Press where he expressed sadness for “everyone’s suffering in the Holocaust including obviously, all of the Jewish people.” Interviewer Chuck Todd prodded Priebus to say that there was regret about how the statement had been worded, but he would not say that.

On Monday, Press Secretary Sean Spicer reacted angrily to the continuing criticism, declaring:

“The statement was written with the help of an individual who is both Jewish and the descendant of Holocaust survivors.”

The nitpicking of the statement, Spicer said, was pathetic and ridiculous.

On Monday, 6 February, a deputy assistant to the president, Sebastian Gorka, responded angrily to the suggestion from Jewish talkshow host Michael Medved that Trump had made a mistake:

“No, I’m not going to admit it,” Gorka said. “Because it’s asinine. It’s absurd.... It’s only reasonable to twist it if your objective is to attack the president.” (JTA, 7 February 2017)

On Tuesday, 7 February, Republicans in the House of Representatives also did not cave in to Jewish pressure but supported President Trump when Democrats offered a resolution that would state that the Holocaust was about Jews, and would call on the White House to state the same.

A few leading Jews also criticized the Jewish critics.

Ronald Lauder, president of the World Jewish Congress and a personal acquaintance of Trump's, defended the president against the criticism from ADL's Greenblatt:

"It does no honor to the millions of Jews murdered in the Holocaust to play politics with their memory. Any fair reading of the White House statement on International Holocaust Remembrance Day will see it appropriately commemorates the suffering and the heroism that mark that dark chapter in modern history." (World Jewish Congress, 28 January 2017)

Fred Brown, a spokesman for the Republican Jewish Coalition, likewise accused Trump's Jewish critics of subordinating Holocaust Remembrance to partisan politics:

“It’s outrageous that people are using Holocaust Remembrance Day for partisan reasons or to try and settle scores.” (A. Phillip, Washington Post, 27 February 2017)

It seems entirely likely, as Lauder, Brown, and Gorka said, that the criticisms are in large part politically motivated. Donald Trump's agenda of civic nationalism is one that Jews in general do not appreciate.

* * *

It happened to be also on Holocaust Remembrance Day that Trump issued an executive order halting visas from certain mostly Muslim countries, called a “refugee ban,” which the mass media and several Jewish organizations attacked. Rachel Maddow on MSNBC declared that Trump's executive order ignored a moral obligation to accept refugees because of the Holocaust. Jewish Senator Charles Schumer gave a press conference wherein he shed tears while complaining about this executive order, provoking Trump to dub him Fake Tears Chuck. Of course Schumer eventually also chimed in with criticisms of Trump's statement on the Holocaust.

Denying the Non-Jewish Holocaust

The first round of complaining seemed to be an attempt to pressure Trump into backing down and giving to Jews the kind of obeisance to which they are accustomed. The second round, after Trump's representatives indicated a refusal to submit, was more vicious and more blatantly unreasonable. What is really important, however, is that the conflict with Trump about the Holocaust has driven Jewish authorities to clarify their own position. In general, lack of clarity and definition has been the friend of those who promote the Holocaust, while clarity and definition make the story vulnerable to criticism.

Deborah Lipstadt writes in The Atlantic \(30 January 2017\) :

“Holocaust denial is alive and well in the highest offices of the United States. It is being spread by those in President Trump's innermost circle.”

Lipstadt complains that the Huffington Post's article about the forgotten “other” victims of the Holocaust was basically anti-Semitic, because, she said, it implied that the Jews were stealing the Holocaust for themselves.

Lipstadt explains that her definition of the Holocaust includes only Jews, because Jews and only Jews, she says, were killed categorically and without provocation:

“There were indeed millions of innocent people whom the Nazis killed in many horrific ways, some in the course of the war and some because the Germans perceived them—however deluded their perception—to pose a threat to their rule. They suffered terribly. But that was not the Holocaust.

“The Holocaust was... an organized program with the goal of wiping out a specific people. Jews did not have to do anything to be perceived as worthy of being murdered... The point was not, as in occupied countries, to get rid of people because they might mount a resistance to Nazism, but to get rid of Jews because they were Jews.”

Lipstadt denies that the Gypsies suffered a Holocaust, and even accuses them of collaboration:

“Roma (Gypsies) were also targeted. Many were murdered. But the Nazi anti-Roma policy was inconsistent. Some could live in peace and even serve in the German army.”

She says that the Trump Administration had committed “softcore Holocaust denial” with its “de-Judaization of the Holocaust.” (Note that “de-Judaization of the Holocaust” is “denial,” but de-Gypsyization and de-Polonization are not.) She then gives a paradoxical definition of “softcore denial”:

“It does not deny the facts, but it minimizes them, arguing that Jews use the Holocaust to draw attention away from criticism of Israel. Softcore denial also makes all sorts of false comparisons to the Holocaust.”

So, Lipstadt calls it “denial” but then says that it “does not deny.” She obviously uses words very recklessly, with more concern for a word's emotional impact than for what it means. She also likens criticism or minimalization of the Holocaust to “pornography,” again obviously just for the emotional impact of that word.

Lipstadt then piles up one guilt-by-association on top of another, attacking Trump for Steve Bannon's tenuous association with the words “Alt Right.” Then Lipstadt says that Richard Spencer, the putative leader of the Alt Right, “has invited overt Holocaust deniers to alt-right conferences.” This compounded guilt-by-association is supposed to reflect on Spencer, and in turn on Bannon, and finally on Trump. (D. Lipstadt, The Atlantic, 30 January 2017)

The reasoning is worthy of a paranoid. Even the claim that “overt Holocaust deniers” were invited to Spencer's NPI conference seems to be false. As evidence, Lipstadt links to Adam Gabbatt's report on the conference for the Guardian. Gabbatt does not really claim that anybody, much less a speaker at the conference, actually denied the Holocaust. All that Gabbatt says is that he encountered several obscure members of the audience who expressed “doubts” about the Holocaust when questioned. Sorry to say, these were not “overt Holocaust Deniers,” much less had they been invited to the conference as overt Holocaust Deniers: these were people who anonymously admitted having doubts about the Holocaust when questioned. The one that Gabbatt quotes, called Mack, even opines that the Holocaust might be true because it seems logical, given Jewish behavior. (A. Gabbatt, *Guardian*, 21 November 2016)

Now, if Lipstadt had wanted to associate Trump with a Holocaust Denier, she didn't have to take the long way around the barn, through Bannon and Spencer (who may have never met) to some anonymous doubters at the NPI conference. If she had really been aware, she could have mentioned Joseph Schmitz \(under consideration to be Secretary of the Navy), whose father John Schmitz was a major supporter of the IHR. That would be much less tenuous and doubtful than the argument that she used.

Despite the meagerness of her argument, representative Jerrold Nadler (D, NY) echoed Lipstadt's position, declaring that the Trump Administration was “in the camp of Holocaust denial” and that statements from the administration contained “anti-Semitic themes.” (A. Tibon, *Ha'aretz*, 6 February 2017)

Senator Tim Kaine (Hillary Clinton's running mate) had made statements anticipating Lipstadt's article the day before it appeared, most likely not by coincidence. It seems that Kaine was supplied with talking points, since he anticipated Lipstadt's accusation of Holocaust Denial that was published the next day. The obvious purpose of using Kaine as an errand boy was to reduce the appearance that the criticism was coming entirely from Jews.

On Wednesday, 8 February, Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D, NY), who claims to have lost many relatives in the Holocaust, said to Ha'aretz:

“It is troubling and unfortunate that the administration did not acknowledge and honor the six million Jews murdered by the Nazi regime in the Shoah.” (JTA, 9 February 2017)

On 31 January, Ron Kampeas, writing for the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, went beyond defining the Holocaust as an exclusively Jewish event. He declared that the figure of 5 million non-Jewish victims was “a number without any scholarly basis.” Kampeas cites Yehuda Bauer for the claim that Simon Wiesenthal invented the figure in the 1970s:

“Yehuda Bauer ... said he warned his friend Wiesenthal, who died in 2005, about spreading the false notion that the Holocaust claimed 11 million victims – 6 million Jews and 5 million non-Jews.

“I said to him, 'Simon, you are telling a lie,' Bauer recalled in an interview Tuesday. ‘He said, “Sometimes you need to do that to get the results for things you think are essential.””

“Bauer and other historians who knew Wiesenthal said the Nazi-hunter told them that he chose the 5 million number carefully: He wanted a number large enough to attract the attention of non-Jews who might not otherwise care about Jewish suffering, but not larger than the actual number of Jews who were murdered in the Holocaust, 6 million. [...]

“[T]he number of non-Jews who died in the concentration camps is no more than half a million, Bauer said.” (Ron Kampeas, JTA, 31 January 2017)

Thus, such eminent Defenders of the Holocaust Faith as Deborah Lipstadt and Yehuda Bauer have now written Gypsies and Poles out of the Holocaust, not only by defining the Holocaust as an exclusively Jewish event but by drastically revising the non-Jewish death-toll downward. In other words, Jewish authorities now emphatically deny the non-Jewish Holocaust.

Denial of the non-Jewish Holocaust is really not new. Every time the figure of “6,000,000” was used as the alleged Holocaust death toll, it was an implicit statement that only Jewish deaths counted. What is new is that the exclusion of non-Jews is now emphatic and explicit.

After Yehuda Bauer in 1989 complained that the Auschwitz death toll was too high to be credible and must be lowered, the official non-Jewish death toll was reduced much more than the official Jewish death toll. Whereas non-Jews were alleged to constitute 37.5% of 4,000,000 victims before 1990, the current "best estimates" according to the USHMM are that non-Jews constitute 11.9% of 1,082,000 victims. The current explicit denial of the 5 million non-Jewish victims is just a confirmation of what Bauer and his ilk have been implying for decades.

Why Blame Wiesenthal?

About the origin of the 5 million figure, Kampeas writes:

“... Wiesenthal started to peddle it in the 1970s. Wiesenthal told the Washington Post in 1979, “I have sought with Jewish leaders not to talk about 6 million Jewish dead, but rather about 11 million civilians dead, including 6 million Jews.” (R. Kampeas, JTA, 31 January 2017)

Yehuda Bauer is the authority for the claim that it was Wiesenthal who promoted the specific figure of 5 million non-Jewish deaths, which Bauer now publicly rejects.

It is important for the Defenders of the Holocaust Faith to maintain an appearance that the Holocaust story never changes much, because a significant change in the story creates doubts among the faithful. If that was false, then what else was false? It is therefore helpful, when some element of the Holocaust must be discarded, to pretend that everybody who matters always regarded that particular element as apocryphal anyway. That is what Bauer accomplishes by pinning the claim that there were millions of non-Jewish Holocaust victims on Simon Wiesenthal (who, during his own lifetime, was always regarded as something of a bungler, as portrayed in The Boys from Brazil).

It might be true that Wiesenthal was the first to specify that there were “5 million” non-Jewish victims, but the specific claim of “5 million” is not what matters. As far as numbers are concerned, what matters for the defense of Trump's Holocaust Day statement is that significant numbers of non-Jews are included in the death toll of alleged Nazi barbarity.

It is not at all credible to say that Wiesenthal is responsible for the general proposition that there were millions of non-Jewish victims. That proposition was commonplace long before the 1970s when Wiesenthal is supposed to have invented the “5 million”: it originated during the war.

Non-Jewish Victimhood in *Why We Fight

The series of seven Why We Fight propaganda films made from 1942 to 1944 by Frank Capra for the War Department make almost no mention of Jews. Instead the emphasis is on the threat posed to the whole world by the Axis powers.

The delineation of the victims of the Axis powers in contemporary war propaganda was based on how those powers were characterized.

The first episode of Why We Fight, Prelude to War, begins by emphasizing that Americans believe in equality, whereas the Axis powers do not believe in equality, and feel therefore that they are entitled to rule the world, and intend to do so.

“They were out for world conquest, and what made it doubly serious was that they were 70 million Japanese, 45 million Italians, and 80 million Germans, all hopped up with the same idea. Their leaders told them that they were supermen, Herrenvolk the Nazis called it, the master race, destined to rule all other peoples on Earth. (Why We Fight: Prelude to War 30:34-31:03)

There was no hiding the fact that this propaganda was recycled from the First World War, and Why We Fight does not hide that fact, but tries to make a virtue of it:

“The symbols and the leaders change, but Germany’s maniacal urge to impose its will on others continues from generation to generation.” (Why We Fight: The Nazis Strike, 1:59-2:07)

In fact it was never National-Socialist doctrine that the Germans were a master race or the master race, and anyone who read Hitler’s books would know that conquering the entire world was not in his agenda. (I discussed the master-race canard briefly in my article, “The Joseph Hirt Story.”)

Also recycled was the accusation of anti-Christianity (which was true of the Soviet Union, but never of Germany). It is alleged that all churches in Germany were required to replace the cross with the swastika (Prelude to War, 16:56-17:05). Scenes of attacks on Catholic and Protestant churches and clergymen, and also a Star of David engulfed in flames, are portrayed. It is only in this context, the alleged persecution of religion, that Jews are mentioned in Why We Fight:

“Thousands of other men of God – Protestant, Catholic, Jewish – were arrested and confined in concentration camps.” (Prelude to War, 17:38-17:48)

In Why We Fight, the accusation of systematic mass murder based on ethnicity appears only in regard to Polish prisoners of war. The second episode of Why We Fight asserts, about the last Polish troops to surrender in 1939:

“On October the 1st the garrison at last surrendered – surrendered to face the fate of these men: Polish prisoners being marched off to Nazi prison camps, and eventual extermination. For the Nazi master-race theory calls for the complete wiping-out of so-called inferior races.” (The Nazis Strike, 36:04-36:27)

This episode of Why We Fight was made in 1943. It happens to have been in April of 1943 that the Katyn Forest Massacre, a mass murder of Polish prisoners of war by the Soviet government, became known. The need to divert attention from that fact very likely motivated the claim that those Polish POWs were “exterminated” by the Germans, and the old accusation that the Germans regarded themselves as the master race was a convenient way to couch that accusation.

The fifth episode, The Battle of Russia (1943), alleges that the Germans massacred Russian civilians, including children, who were “mass-murdered by orders of the high command.” It also alleged that the Germans did in Russia what was most notoriously done by the Red Army: rape of young girls. (The Battle of Russia, 45:40-47:02)

There was much embarrassing Soviet behavior that had to be obfuscated with such counter-accusations, especially in regard to Poland. Polish-American historian M.B.B. Biskupski complains that Why We Fight: The Nazis Strike whitewashes Soviet behavior in the war:

"[...T]he September 17 invasion of Poland by Russia is transformed into a seemingly peaceful 'occupation' set in the final hours of the war. The viewer would logically conclude that the Soviets committed no aggression and inflicted no casualties." (M. Biskupski, Hollywood's War With Poland, U. Press of Kentucky, 2010)

Beyond mere omission, one of the ways to cover Soviet atrocities against Poles and others was to accuse the Germans of doing the same, and worse.

Non-Jewish Victims in Immediate Post-War Propaganda

After all the concentration camps and alleged extermination camps were captured, the Anglo-American line continued to be that the evil Germans had mass-murdered a great diversity of victims because they were not German or because they disagreed with evil Nazi doctrine, Jews being at most a significant element within that diversity of victims.

Frank Capra, who had made Why We Fight for the War Department, also made Here Is Germany after the war (1945). Here Is Germany, although it uses concentration-camp footage, still does not emphasize Jewish suffering. Rather it emphasizes German villainy, alleging that the German cultural tradition makes the Germans inhumane and warlike. The Germans are described as:

“that clean, industrious people, fond of kids, fond of music, fond of tyranny, fond of aggression, fond of gas chambers.” (Here Is Germany, 7:27-7:39)

While the film pretends to show a “scientifically designed gas chamber,” it does not claim that Jews in particular were gassed. There is only an allusion to persecution of Jews through the use of the word pogroms, as only one aspect of the general phenomenon of German inhumanity, where the Germans are described as:

“The quiet, decent people – who prepared twenty years to bring war into the world. A religious people – who burned churches, imprisoned ministers, persecute the faithful. A kindly people – who accept blood purges, pogroms, concentration camps. A gentle people – who torture, starve, exterminate.” (Here Is Germany, 3:51-4:15)

Only Poles, Italians, Belgians, and Americans are specifically mentioned as groups mass-murdered by the Germans. (Here Is Germany, 6:23-6:56)

The cause of the German penchant for wreaking death and destruction is summarized this way:

“Each generation accepting and adding to the German tradition. The tradition of ruthlessness, and Mediaeval barbarism. The tradition of a master race, the tradition of German superiority. A false picture of the world inside German heads. These are some of the explanations for the murdered Poles in Lublin, the murdered Italians in Rome, the murdered Belgians at Bande, the murdered Americans at Malmèdy. And these are the reasons why, in our generation, nearly 30 million men have had to die. [Rows of crosses in a military cemetery are shown.] Because deep in the soul of Karl Schmidt has been planted the love of aggression and conquest. And unless that passion is uprooted, ten, twenty, or a hundred years hence, a new generation of Germans will find a new leader who will show them the way. How shall that be prevented?" (Here Is Germany, 45:53-47:02)

Here Is Germany speaks of murdered Poles, Italians, Belgians, and Americans, and 30 million dead from unnecessary wars putatively caused by the war-loving Germans, but makes no mention of Jews.

Nazi Murder Mills!, a newsreel from April 1945 produced for Universal Studios by Sam B. Jacobson, emphasizes the universality of victimhood without mentioning Jews at all:

"At Hadamar, an insane asylum served the mad Hun well! Behind its high walls their victims – Poles, Greeks, Russians, any non-Germans – were systematically slaughtered!" (Nazi Murder Mills!, 1:06-1:18)

Die Todesmühlen was a film made to be shown to German audiences. The maker is not identified in the film, but German Wikipedia states that it was produced by the U.S. Office of Military Government for Germany (OMGUS), and directed by Hanuš Burger and Billy Wilder. (There was also a Yiddish edition.) It refers to 20 million murdered "according to current estimates" (which implies 14 million non-Jewish deaths!) and claims that every concentration camp (of which there were more than 300, we are told) was a death mill. At the end of the film it is stated that such death mills (since every concentration camp was said to be one) had existed since 1933, eight years before the Holocaust, as presently conceived, is supposed to have begun. Die Todesmühlen mentions Jews but only as one of several persecuted religious groups:

"Angehörige aller europäischen Nationen: Russen, Polen, Franzosen, Belgier, Jugoslawen, Deutsche, Tschechen. Angehörige aller Religionen: Protestanten, Katholiken, Juden." (Die Todesmühlen, 1:06-1:20)

The War Department made an English-language edition of Die Todesmühlen called Death Mills (1946). The American narrator still refers to 20 million murdered, adumbrating the origins of the victims this way:

"Those who survived could answer the roll call of all the nations of Europe, of all religious faiths, of all political beliefs, condemned by Hitler because they were anti-Nazi." (Death Mills, 1:59-2:09)

Death Mills makes no specific mention of Jews, but does not really leave them out either, implicitly including them under the heading: "all religious faiths." The figure of 20 million of course implies 14 million non-Jewish deaths.

George Stevens's Nazi Concentration Camps portrays horrors suffered by prisoners at twelve locations. Only in regard to Ohrdruf (a satellite camp of Buchenwald) are Jews mentioned. About Ohrdruf the narrator says:

“At this concentration camp in the Gotha area, the Germans starved, clubbed, and burned to death more than 4000 political prisoners over a period of eight months. [...] The 4000 Ohrdruf victims are said to include Poles, Czechs, Russians, Belgians, Frenchmen, German Jews, and German political prisoners.”

In the narrations about the other eleven camps, various nationalities are mentioned, but never Jews. Poles and Russians are mentioned most often. At Mauthausen, an American POW, Jack H. Taylor from Hollywood, California, even claims that American POWs were gassed. Even at Bergen-Belsen, where an overweight Jewish female physician, Ada Bimko (future mother of Menachem Rosensaft of the World Jewish Congress), is shown for several minutes narrating the horrors of the place, Jews are not mentioned. A British officer at Bergen-Belsen refers to “what the German people have done here.” The emphasis is clearly on Germans as perpetrators, not on Jews as victims.

Alfred Hitchcock's unfinished propaganda film Memory of the Camps, which was never released during Hitchcock's lifetime but in 1985 began to be shown annually on PBS's Frontline, discusses a variety of camps but mentions Jews only twice, in connection with Bergen-Belsen and Buchenwald.

About Bergen-Belsen the narrator says:

“We shall never know ... whether they were Catholics, Lutherans, or Jews. We only know they were born, they suffered, and died – in agony – in Belsen camp. And so they lie, Jews, Lutherans, and Catholics, indistinguishable, cheek to cheek, in a common grave.” (Memory of the Camps, 30:11)

Only at Buchenwald does Hitchcock's film say that Jews were killed for being Jews:

“When the camp was liberated on April the 13th, 20,000 inmates remained: African Negroes, Albanians, Austrians, Belgians, Brazilians, Bulgarians, Canadians, Chinese, Croats, Czechs, Danes, French, Germans, British, Greeks, Dutch, Italians, Yugoslavs, Latvians, Letts, Norwegians, Mexicans, Poles, Rumanians, Spaniards, Swiss, Americans, and Russians. 55 thousand of them died because of this place. People were tattooed across the belly with slave numbers and forced to work on a starvation diet. People were coldly and systematically tortured. Here, Schoker, the camp commandant, said, 'I want at least 600 Jewish deaths reported in the camp-office every day.'” (Memory of the Camps, 42:16)

Those are the only two mentions of Jews in Hitchcock's film. Apart from the emphasis on Jewish deaths at Buchenwald, Hitchcock's film, like other films of the period, portrays a universality of victimhood. The claim that the commandant of Buchenwald wanted Jewish deaths is an anomaly in Hitchcock's film. (The falsity of this claim is evident in the fact that there never was a commandant of Buchenwald named Schoker: the two commandants were Koch, 1937-1941, and Pister, 1942-1945.)

The lack of emphasis on Jewish suffering in Memory of the Camps must have been seen as a problem by the producers of Frontline, because instead of simply letting the movie tell the story, Frontline's introduction concludes with this notice:

“At least six million people died in Nazi Germany's system of camps. More than three million were Jews.”

From the narration alone one would never infer that the majority of deaths were Jewish. This is obviously why Frontline added that preface.

Of course, accusations about mass murder of Jews were reported during the war—along with the crazy story that Jews were made into soap, which was endorsed by the president of the World Jewish Congress, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise (AP, 24 November 1942). But the alleged suffering of Jews in particular was not presented to the American people as a reason for going to war. Rather, one was led to believe that the evil Nazis posed a dire threat to everybody, and it was even claimed that they would soon be in America if no action were taken.

War Propaganda Continues to be Taken Seriously

The wartime claim that millions of non-Jews had been mass-murdered, although its propagandistic purpose is obvious, was not limited to mass propaganda. It survived in scholarship. A 1951 article in Foreign Affairs by Max Beloff, a professional historian of Jewish origin who at the time held positions at Oxford University, referred to “millions” of non-Jewish victims:

“In the course of the Second World War, the Germans as a matter of public policy put to death some 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 Jews and further millions of Poles, Jugoslavs, Russians, and others.” (Max Beloff, “Historians in a Revolutionary Age”, Foreign Affairs, January 1951, p. 252)

Litigation in Germany also seems to have been influenced by the kind of narrative presented by George Stevens and Frank Capra. From one of the Auschwitz trials staged in Frankfurt by Hesse's Jewish district attorney Fritz Bauer, it was reported:

"German historians testify that SS guards could do practically anything they wished with prisoners since Hitler's concentration-camp system was built to rid the world of what Nazi ideology considered inferior people – Jews, Slavs, Gypsies and others regarded as unfit to contribute to Nazi Germany's glory." (AP, 18 March 1964)

A German senior public prosecutor (Oberstaatsanwalt), Adalbert Rueckerl, attributed the following death tolls to the evil Nazis:

“‘They killed 6,000,000 Jews,’ Rueckerl said. ‘We know that. But they also killed 5,000,000 Russian civilians, 2,000,000 Poles and 1,000,000 other people – Gypsies, German free-thinkers or political opponents and German insane or incurably sick. Eight million of what they called ‘inferior stock’.” (Leo Katcher, Post mortem: the Jews in Germany Today \(1968\), p. 277)

Rather than Wiesenthal's mere 11 million, Rueckerl claimed 14 million – more non-Jewish than Jewish victims! Wiesenthal's "5 million" non-Jewish deaths thus represents not a concession but a vast reduction from the 8 million specified by Oberstaatsanwalt Adalbert Rueckerl in 1968 and the 14 million indicated by OMGUS in 1945.

So much for Yehuda Bauer's insinuation that the claim of several million non-Jewish victims never had much authority behind it. The claim has been taken very seriously by people in very important positions, and many people, not only the Trump Administration and the Huffington Post, have continued to believe it since the war. Bauer's recent declaration that non-Jewish deaths in the camps amounted to “no more than half a million” represents an enormous change from what we all were led to believe.

Anti-Axis and Pro-Zionist Propaganda Are Not the Same

Why the change? It is because anti-German and pro-Zionist propaganda have different requirements.

Widespread non-Jewish victimhood at the hands of the evil Nazis (sometimes combined with similar accusations against the Japanese and Italians) was alleged in order to make the war seem necessary to the people who had to endure it. In Hitchcock's film the point was explicitly stated by a British tommy at Buchenwald, who says twice that he knew why he was fighting because of what he had seen:

“We actually know now what has been going on in these camps, and I know, personally, what I am fighting for.” (Memory of the Camps, 28:46)

The implication is that adequate justification for the war had not been seen until the propaganda about mass murder in concentration camps filled that void. As a justification for war, the atrocity stories were most effective if the victims were as diverse as possible, so that all viewers could see themselves as potential victims.

In particular, it was important to include Poles as victims, because the Germans had exposed the Soviet NKVD's massacre of thousands of Polish officers in the Katyn Forest in 1943 and because Poland was about to be left under Soviet domination even though the fundamental purpose of the war had been, supposedly, to preserve the sovereignty of Poland.

The introduction of the proper noun "Holocaust" signals a change in how stories of atrocities during the Second World War would be handled. The religious connotation of the word helps in associating the event specifically with Jews, given that the Jews are, at least in some degree, a religious group, and in a greater degree are perceived that way. With the promulgation of the proper noun Holocaust, Jews in effect claimed a special status as victims during the Second World War.

For the general public in the United States it was NBC's five-part miniseries Holocaust in April 1978 that established Holocaust as a proper noun. The show's intro featured the symbol of the Jewish religion, a six-pointed star, engulfed in flames. It is similar to an image that was used in Why We Fight to represent Judaism as one of several oppressed religions.

The clear purpose of the Holocaust miniseries was to bolster Zionism. In Holocaust, the character of Anielewicz, an especially Semitic-looking Jew with a thousand-yard stare who identifies himself as a Zionist and speaks of “the Zionists” as the resistance to the Holocaust, plays the part of a divine messenger, informing the Jews of their destiny. Anielewicz tells the council in the Warsaw Ghetto what is happening and what they must do. What they must do is to take up arms. The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising thus becomes a metaphor for the State of Israel.

In case anyone misses the point, Tovah Feldshuh's character later tells us that Palestine is “where they cannot jail us, or beat us, or kill us.”

This is explicit promotion of Zionism.

At the time when Holocaust appeared, the State of Israel was subject to unprecedented criticism. The Israeli Prime Minister elected in 1977, Menachem Begin, was a hardliner and former terrorist. Meanwhile there was intensified criticism of the State of Israel in the Democratic Party, which happened to hold the White House at the time. (It was this shift in attitudes in the Democratic Party of that era that motivated the defection of Neoconservative Jews to the GOP.) Under these circumstances the Holocaust miniseries was created to justify the existence of the State of Israel and to excuse its violence.

This purpose meant that Holocaust would emphasize Jewish victimhood and the lack of safety for Jews living among non-Jews in general, rather than the specific villainy of the Germans. Although Holocaust represents many Germans as criminal brutes, the key German character in the drama, SS officer Erich Dorf, has no malice toward Jews but is simply an unprincipled careerist. It was this untrustworthiness of non-Jews in general that was supposed to make the State of Israel necessary.

Whereas Anglo-American war propaganda had portrayed Christianity as an object of oppression by the evil Nazis, the Holocaust miniseries represents Christianity, specifically the Christian legend that the Jews were responsible for the crucifixion of Jesus, as an important cause of anti-Jewish persecution. The implication is that Christians in general, not just Germans, have this proclivity for mass-murdering Jews. Some Christians complained that the show was anti-Christian.

Whereas the War Department's propaganda had portrayed Polish victimhood as comparable to, if not greater than, that of the Jews, Holocaust reversed this. Uniformed Poles were portrayed in three segments helping Germans to execute Jews.

A Polish-American Catholic priest, Msgr. John J. Wodarski, complained of the minimization of Polish victimhood and emphasis on Polish guilt:

"He and others complained that the program slighted the fact that Poles, too, were victims of the Germans. Six million Poles were exterminated, they said—three million Polish Jews and three million Polish gentiles. In addition, they said, while the program showed Poles helping the Nazis, there was little credit given the Poles who fought the Germans and helped save the lives of many Jews.

"Moreover, Polish-American gentiles here are also displeased that they are not represented on President Carter's Commission on the Holocaust. Spokesmen say they are also disturbed by the comments of Sigmund Strochlitz, a commission member from New London and a survivor of Auschwitz who, at a Holocaust Commemoration last April 27 in the Senate chambers of the General Assembly, spoke of 'Nazi executioners and their Polish helpers.'" (D. Henry, New York Times, 23 September 1979)

Thus there seem to be two main tendencies in accounts of what is now called the Holocaust. The tendency of war propaganda was to emphasize the special turpitude of the Germans, and to claim a wide range of victims. The tendency of Zionist propaganda, on the other hand, is to emphasize the special victimhood of the Jews, and to claim a wide range of victimizers (which has afforded wide opportunities for Jewish organizations to sue for damages, e.g. against the French national railway). Since the Holocaust miniseries, the Zionist version of what happened during the war has become prevalent, to the degree that some Jewish leaders now overtly minimize non-Jewish victimhood.

It would certainly be called denial if non-Jews gave the kinds of opinions on Jewish claims of suffering that Yehuda Bauer and Deborah Lipstadt have recently given in regard to the 5 million. Conversely, if a so-called documentary about German concentration camps just like the ones made in 1945 and 1946 were made today, Deborah Lipstadt would be compelled to denounce it as Holocaust Denial, because the narrative of that time does not give preeminence to Jewish suffering, indeed does not conform at all to what is today called “the Holocaust.”

Bait-and-Switch Scam

It is clear that Jews have in some ways benefited from the two contradictory narratives.

Although it was Jews who had agitated for war against Germany since 1933, the formally alleged purpose of the war in 1939 was to save Poland. The poor suffering Poles! We must help them! It was the Jews however, not the Poles, who benefited from the war. The Jews got Palestine and the Poles were not saved from tyranny but subjected to several decades under Soviet domination (which, contrary to the old propaganda, was not better than being under German occupation). One could characterize the way the war was advertised to the American public as a bait-and-switch scam.

It may be easy for Bauer and Lipstadt to treat Simon Wiesenthal as a marginal figure now, but in the 1970s he was quite prominent and even respected. He was reputedly the “Nazi-hunter” who discovered the whereabouts of Adolf Eichmann (although Wiesenthal's role is disputed). He also accused Polish-American immigrant Frank Walus (falsely, as it later turned out) of being “the Butcher of Kielce,” and was represented (pseudonymously, but blatantly) as the inept hero of the 1978 Hollywood movie The Boys from Brazil. In 1980 President Jimmy Carter presented to Simon Wiesenthal a Congressional Gold Medal. And of course the Simon Wiesenthal Center is named after him. Wiesenthal may have been less cautious than Yehuda Bauer, but in the Holocaust Industry he was not a minor figure.

When President Carter issued the executive order establishing the Holocaust Museum he used (what is, we are now told) Wiesenthal's figure: “11 million victims of the Holocaust.”

Now, Elie Wiesel, who reputedly disagreed vehemently with Wiesenthal on this question, was in communication with President Carter. He was in fact the chairman of the President's Commission on the Holocaust. Do you think that Elie Wiesel, or any other Jew, made efforts to impress upon President Carter that he should not say that there were 11 million victims of the Holocaust, during the period when efforts were being made to establish the Holocaust Museum? I would wager that he did not, just as Jews probably did not argue during the war against claims that Poles were being exterminated.

Just as the emphasis on non-Jewish victims was important in war propaganda, it seems likely that a nod to non-Jewish victims was helpful in gaining public acquiescence for a museum to commemorate the Holocaust. The proposal to build a museum on 1.9 acres of invaluable federal land close to the Washington Monument would likely have provoked much more criticism if it had been represented as specifically about Jews.

On 30 January 2017, however, three days after Trump's statement, the USHMM itself declared that the Holocaust was an exclusively Jewish event:

“The Holocaust was the systematic, state-sponsored murder of six million Jews by Nazi Germany and its collaborators.” (USHMM, 30 January 2017)

That is a perfectly clear definition, but then an apparent contradiction is added:

“Millions of other innocent civilians were persecuted and murdered by the Nazis, but the elimination of Jews was central to Nazi policy.”

Is this saying that there were non-Jewish victims of the Holocaust? No, because “Nazi policy” need not be perfectly synonymous with “the Holocaust.” The words must have been carefully chosen. The first sentence defines the Holocaust as specifically Jewish. It seems that the USHMM's statement was designed to appear ambiguous without actually being ambiguous.

What we see is that Jews gained a favor for their ethnic group, the establishment of a museum commemorating the alleged suffering of their ethnic group alone, on the premise that it was not going to be specifically about them. Whether it was planned that way or just worked out that way, the promotion of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum amid talk of the “11 million victims of the Holocaust,” when it was really only going to be about an alleged 6 million Jewish victims, amounts to a bait-and-switch scam.

What This Means

About the controversy around Trump's Holocaust Day statement, Ha'aretz quoted an anonymous Democratic staffer as saying:

"This is going to continue gaining attention, mainly because of how terribly it's been handled by the White House." (Ha'aretz, 9 February 2017)

A certain sense of entitlement seems to have blinded some people to the possibility that they themselves might have handled things terribly, when faced with a leader and a people no longer in a mood to be herded to self-destruction.

Trump's supporters regard him and his agenda as the last chance for the survival of the America that they always knew and cherished. If Trump's supporters are forced to choose between Trump and the Holocaust, or between saving their country and properly observing the so-called lessons of the Holocaust, public reverence for the Holocaust will certainly suffer for it.

But Lipstadt et al. have made matters worse for themselves by continuing to kvetch and by trying to demonstrate that Trump was wrong. In order to explain why Trump was supposedly wrong, certain points about the Holocaust had to be clarified. But the Holocaust legend has survived largely by remaining unclear. The more defined the Holocaust becomes, the easier it is to criticize.

With the clarification that the Holocaust is only about Jews, its relevance has been reduced. Many Christians and Poles, for example, thought that they had a stake in the Holocaust, but now they have been told that whatever martyrs they can claim are excluded.

It is also certain that the credibility of the Holocaust has been damaged by the publicity given to the drastically reduced estimate of non-Jewish deaths in concentration camps, from 5 million to less than half a million. If it is acceptable to repudiate the 5 million then why is it not acceptable to question the 6 million?

If nothing else, Lipstadt and others should have realized that applying epithets like Anti-Semite and Holocaust Denier to a leader who habitually does not yield under such pressure, and who has fanatical support in a large part of the citizenry, could only result in the diminution of whatever power those words retain.

What we are seeing is that the Holocaust as a force in politics and society is being marginalized and weakened through the arrogance and immoderation of its own Jewish proponents.

Abstract

For more than thirty years, historians have been aware of once-secret memoranda by senior British intelligence official Victor Cavendish-Bentinck in which he casts doubt on the alleged use of homicidal gas chambers by National Socialist Germany.<sup>[1]</sup> Writing to Whitehall colleagues at the end of August 1943, Cavendish-Bentinck used dismissive language which today in most European countries would undoubtedly see him prosecuted for “Holocaust denial”.

During the trial of British historian David Irving's libel action against Deborah Lipstadt in 2000 (now dramatized in the Hollywood film Denial) some of Cavendish-Bentinck's remarks were raised by Irving as justification of his claim that the gas chamber story originated as a propaganda lie. In his judgment against Irving, Mr. Justice Gray accepted the counter-arguments of Lipstadt's defense team. Their interpretation has since appeared in a book by Prof. Sir Richard Evans, who was among Lipstadt's defense witnesses.

Seventeen years on from the Irving-Lipstadt trial, it is now possible to access a broader range of British documents, including intelligence material. In this essay I shall attempt to clarify what these documents tell us about the role of British propaganda and intelligence in relation to the initial allegations of homicidal gassing by National Socialist Germany.

The conclusions can be briefly summarized:

- Britain's Political Warfare Executive and its predecessor first deployed stories of homicidal gassing as part of propaganda efforts in two areas unconnected to treatment of Jews. Their objective was to spread dissension and demoralization among German soldiers and civilians, and among Germany's allies.
- Partly because they knew of these earlier propagandist initiatives,<sup>[2]</sup> Victor Cavendish-Bentinck and his British intelligence colleague Roger Allen disbelieved later stories that homicidal gas chambers had been used to murder Poles and Jews. They succeeded in having these allegations removed from the draft of a joint Anglo-American Declaration on German Crimes in Poland, published on 30th August 1943.

Part I: The First Revisionists?

In August 1943 Poland's government-in-exile lobbied the British and American governments to issue a public statement condemning “German terror in Poland”. Moray McLaren – head of the Polish section of Britain's main propaganda body the Political Warfare Executive (PWE) – advised the Foreign Office “in confidence that, from his contacts with the Poles, he has recently gained the impression that they are becoming seriously worried lest the Germans might shortly succeed in persuading Polish quislings to come forward and even form some kind of puppet government. The present Polish request may possibly have some connexion with such fears.”[\[3\]](#)

Moreover Britain’s own Special Operations Executive (SOE), responsible for organizing and supplying Polish underground fighters, reported that German anti-partisan operations were increasingly successful in “affecting their work, in that the cells of the underground resistance movement in the affected areas are to a great extent liquidated, and materials delivered are liable to be discovered. SOE would accordingly welcome any form of deterrent that could be devised.”

Denis Allen of the Foreign Office’s Central Department (not to be confused with the unrelated Roger Allen who also figures in this story) suggested that a statement should be issued with “some indication that the actions being carried out by the German authorities in Poland will in some measure be held against Germany as a whole”. With the British Parliament in its summer recess and Prime Minister Winston Churchill on his way to Quebec for a secret summit with U.S. President Franklin Roosevelt, the most logical opportunity would be for a joint Anglo-American statement (issued to the press rather than to Parliament).

Allen’s department had prepared a draft statement which was discussed with the Poles. This condemned the “brutality” of German anti-partisan operations involving mass deportations in the Lublin area of southeastern Poland. The draft statement (which made no reference to Jews and seemed to relate to Polish civilians) alleged:

“Some children are killed on the spot, others are separated from their parents and either sent to Germany to be brought up as Germans or sold to German settlers or despatched with the women and old men to concentration camps, where they are now being systematically put to death in gas chambers.

His Majesty’s Government re-affirm their resolve to punish the instigators and actual perpetrators of these crimes. They further declare that, so long as such atrocities continue to be committed by the representatives and in the name of Germany, they must be taken into account against the time of the final settlement with Germany. Meanwhile the war against Germany will be prosecuted with the utmost vigour until the barbarous Hitlerite tyranny has been finally overthrown.”

By 27th August this draft had been agreed with the Americans and was planned for release three days later: a copy was handed to the Soviets. However, at this eleventh hour the intelligence side of Whitehall stepped in.

The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) had evolved shortly before the war and stood between the political and military “consumers” of intelligence, and the organizations responsible for obtaining it, including MI6, MI5 and GC&CS (known today as GCHQ). One former JIC chairman describes its role as the “final arbiter of intelligence”. [\[4\]](#)In a phrase, which might equally well apply today to historians, its wartime chairman and secretary wrote that the JIC had an important task in ensuring that information and sources were assessed with critical impartiality:[\[5\]](#)

“[...I]n the Political Departments, e.g. the Foreign Office and Colonial Office, the officials who receive, collate and assess information are also responsible for formulating policy. This is not necessarily a bad thing, but the system does possess a serious weakness. One who is concerned in devising and recommending policy, and in assisting in its execution is likely, however objective he may try to be, to interpret the intelligence he receives in the light of the policy he is pursuing. To correct this possible weakness, it is clearly desirable that some quite objective check be placed on all intelligence received. ...We believe that no Department, however experienced and well staffed, has anything to lose by bringing the intelligence directly available to it to the anvil of discussion and appreciation among other workers in the same field.”

During the war years the JIC was headed by Victor Cavendish-Bentinck,<sup>[6]</sup> who was also in charge of the Services Liaison Department at the Foreign Office, where his right-hand man was Roger Allen, a pre-war barrister.<sup>[7]</sup> (Since its creation in July 1942, Roger Allen had also served as Joint Secretary to the War Cabinet’s Committee on the Treatment of War Criminals.)<sup>[8]</sup> Rather belatedly on 27th August, with the draft statement almost ready for release, Roger Allen raised the alarm, pointing out that the statement seemed to be mainly based on an “aide-mémoire” supplied by the Polish government-in-exile. While he accepted that with regard to deportations of Polish civilians “the general picture painted is pretty true to life”, he warned Cavendish-Bentinck:

“On the other hand, it is of course extremely difficult, if not impossible, for us to check up on specific instances or matters of detail. For this reason I feel a little unhappy about the statement, to be issued on the authority of His Majesty’s Government, that Poles ‘are now being systematically put to death in gas chambers’.”

The “gas chambers” reference seemed to be based on two references in the Polish aide-mémoire’s appendix, both supposedly drawn from telegrams sent from Poland on 17th July 1943.

The first telegram stated, in relation to deportees sent to the Majdanek camp:

“Commander-in-Chief armed forces Lublin district informed me that he had evidence that some of these people are being murdered in gas cells there.”

By “commander-in-chief” this telegram presumably meant the district commander of the Polish underground army. The second telegram stated:

“It has been ascertained that on July 2nd and 5th 2 transports made of women, children, and old men, consisting of 30 wagons each, have been liquidated in gas cells.”

Roger Allen pointed out to Cavendish-Bentinck:[\[9\]](#)

“It will be observed that the first of these reports gives no indication of the date of the occurrence, or the number of people concerned; the second is silent as to the place and the source.

It is true that there have been references to the use of gas chambers in other reports; but these references have usually, if not always, been equally vague, and since they have concerned the extermination of Jews, have usually emanated from Jewish sources.

Personally, I have never really understood the advantage of the gas chamber over the simpler machine gun, or the equally simple starvation method. These stories may or may not be true, but in any event I submit we are putting out a statement on evidence which is far from conclusive, and which we have no means of assessing. However, you may not consider this of sufficient importance to warrant any action.”

Cavendish-Bentinck wasted no time in passing this analysis on later that day to the Foreign Office top brass, adding his own skeptical note:

“In my opinion it is incorrect to describe Polish information regarding German atrocities as ‘trustworthy’. The Poles, and to a far greater extent the Jews, tend to exaggerate German atrocities in order to stoke us up. They seem to have succeeded.

Mr Allen and myself have both followed German atrocities quite closely. I do not believe that there is any evidence which would be accepted in a Law Court that Polish children have been killed on the spot by Germans when their parents were being deported to work in Germany, nor that Polish children have been sold to German settlers. As regards putting Poles to death in gas chambers, I do not believe that there is any evidence that this has been done. There have been many stories to this effect, and we have played them up in PWE rumours without believing that they had any foundation. At any rate there is far less evidence than exists for the mass murder of Polish officers by the Russians at Katyn. On the other hand we do know that the Germans are out to destroy Jews of any age unless they are fit for manual labour.

I think that we weaken our case against the Germans by publicly giving credence to atrocity stories for which we have no evidence. These mass executions in gas chambers remind me of the stories of employment of human corpses during the last war for the manufacture of fat, which was a grotesque lie and led to the true stories of German atrocities being brushed aside as being mere propaganda.

I am very sad to see that we must needs ape the Russians and talk about 'Hitlerite' instead of 'German'."

Cavendish-Bentinck added a handwritten note to William Strang, who as an Assistant Under-Secretary was joint-third in the Foreign Office hierarchy:[\[10\]](#)

"I daresay that my minute is too late to be of use but I feel certain that we are making a mistake in publicly giving credence to this gas chambers story."

In fact, he was not too late: Cavendish-Bentinck and Allen became in effect the first successful Holocaust revisionists. Central Department's first response was: "it seems too late to make substantial changes. But we could telegraph to Washington and Moscow."

At 9.05 p.m. that evening a "Most Immediate" telegram was dispatched (marked "of particular secrecy and should be retained by the authorized recipient and not passed on"):[\[11\]](#)

"On further reflection we are not convinced that evidence regarding use of gas chambers is substantial enough to justify inclusion in a public declaration ...and would prefer if United States Government agree, that sentence in question should end at 'concentration camps'. "Please telegraph United States Government's views urgently."

Similar telegrams were sent to the Prime Ministers of the Dominions (Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa) retracting the earlier reference to "gas chambers".

The Americans agreed to the changes. Secretary of State Cordell Hull duly notified his Ambassador in Moscow:[\[12\]](#)

"At the suggestion of the British Government which says there is insufficient evidence to justify the statement regarding execution in gas chambers, it has been agreed to eliminate the last phrase."

The words "where they are now being systematically put to death in gas chambers" were removed from the statement before it was published simultaneously in London and Washington.[\[13\]](#)

David Irving's critics have sought to interpret this episode in their own way. Prof. Sir Richard Evans writes in his account of the Irving-Lipstadt libel trial:[\[14\]](#)

"There was no evidence here or anywhere else, indeed, that the British Political Warfare Executive had invented the story of the gas chambers: they had on the contrary received a report from people with contacts in Central Europe about them. Nor was there any evidence that the Foreign Office considered reports of gassings to be a lie; they were simply unsure about them. Moreover, their real doubts related to claims that Poles were being gassed. Even Cavendish-Bentinck agreed that the Germans were 'out to destroy the Jews of any age unless they are fit for manual labour.'"

Even when Prof. Evans wrote this fifteen years ago, it was clear that Cavendish-Bentinck had been skeptical about the existence of homicidal gas chambers, rather than (as Prof. Evans suggests) merely doubting that they had been used to gas Poles in addition to Jews. As for the role of PWE, the Cavendish-Bentinck minute suggests that they had (at least at some stage) exaggerated (if not actually invented) gas-chamber stories. For confirmation of this, we must turn to the PWE's own files from earlier in the war.

Part II: Whispers of Gas

In his judgment against David Irving in 2002, Mr. Justice Gray ignored or misinterpreted Cavendish-Bentinck's words. Gray wrote:[\[15\]](#)

“As to whether the British disbelieved the [gas-chambers] story, the only evidence to which Irving was able to point was the note made by Cavendish-Bentinck that there was no evidence to support the claim. That appears to me to be a far cry from disbelieving the story.”

As shown above, Cavendish-Bentinck went much further than pointing out the absence of evidence. He compared these latest “atrocious stories” to a “grotesque lie” perpetrated against Germany during the First World War, and suggested to a senior colleague that Britain should not be “publicly giving credence to this gas-chambers story”. How on earth could Mr. Justice Gray interpret this as meaning anything else but that Cavendish-Bentinck (at any rate in August 1943) disbelieved the story!

Mr. Justice Gray's judgment went on:

“As to whether British Intelligence made propaganda use of the story, the evidence produced by Irving extended no further than second-hand accounts of BBC broadcasts about the gassing. There was no indication that British intelligence played any part in these broadcasts. In my judgment the evidence does not support the claim made by Irving.”

In fairness to the judge, it is only now becoming possible to trace the detailed history of British propaganda and homicidal-gassing stories. Part of the problem is that in the early years of the Second World War, Britain's propaganda machinery was a tangle of bureaucratic and factional infighting. A year before the outbreak of war, an official Department of Propaganda in Enemy Countries was set up at Electra House, the London headquarters of the Cable & Wireless telegraph company. Around the same time, MI6 created Section D (based at St Ermin's Hotel near St James's Park) to study and prepare methods of unconventional warfare, including propaganda.[\[16\]](#)

In July 1940 Section D became part of the new Special Operations Executive, which for a while took over Electra House's operations as part of its own propaganda section known as SO1, based after November 1940 at Woburn Abbey, a country house in Bedfordshire. Continuing internal disputes led to the new Political Warfare Executive (PWE) being created in August 1941, under Foreign Office control. While PWE handled enemy countries, propaganda at home and in Allied countries was supposedly the domain of the Ministry of Information.[\[17\]](#)

The documentary record showing British propagandists' promotion of homicidal gassing stories runs from December 1940 (under SO1) to March 1942 (under PWE). In this period the gassing stories did not relate to Jews or Poles, but Cavendish-Bentinck would have suspected that the Jewish and Polish lobbies had picked up the story and put their own spin on it, in a case of what would later be termed “blowback”, defined as follows by intelligence historian Mark Lowenthal:[\[18\]](#)

“The main controversy raised by propaganda activities is that of blowback. The CIA is precluded from undertaking any intelligence activities within the United States. However, a story could be planted in a media outlet overseas that will also be reported in the United States. That is blowback. This risk is probably higher today with global twenty-four-hour news agencies and the World Wide Web than it was during the early days of the cold war. Thus, inadvertently, a CIA-planted story that is false can be reported in a U.S. media outlet. In such a case, does the CIA have a responsibility to inform the U.S. media outlet of the true nature of the story? Would doing so compromise the original operation? If such notification should not be given at the time, should it be given afterward?"

One of the most secret parts of SO1/PWE work involved the propagation of rumors, known as "sibs" from the Latin verb sibilare (to whisper), by an Underground Propaganda (UP) Committee. This dated back to the Electra House days in 1940 shortly before the creation of SOE, and continued through the various bureaucratic changes.

From August 1941, the UP Committee was chaired by David Bowes-Lyon, younger brother of the then Queen (and uncle of the present Queen Elizabeth II) – he was also a cousin of Victor Cavendish-Bentinck. He later summarized the purpose of sibs in a "Most Secret" paper for senior bureaucrats:

"The object of propaganda rumours is... to induce alarm, despondency and bewilderment among the enemies, and hope and confidence among the friends, to whose ears it comes. If a rumour appears likely to cheer our enemies for the time, it is calculated to carry with it the germ of ultimate and grave disappointment for them.

Rumours vary immensely in their degree of credibility, the wideness of their diffusion and the type of audience for which they are designed; but they have these factors in common, that they are intended for verbal repetition through all sorts of channels, and that they are expected to induce a certain frame of mind in the general public, not necessarily to deceive the well-informed."

The UP Committee (which included representatives from PWE, SOE, MI6 and the Ministry of Economic Warfare), was responsible in the first instance for deciding on suitable rumors, which would then be cleared through the Foreign Office or JIC:[\[19\]](#)

"Dissemination of those rumours finally approved is the function of SOE. For this purpose whispering organisations have been set up in neutral countries and in unoccupied France. Lines have also been established by which rumours can be passed to SOE's collaborators in Germany, and directives on oral propaganda to an organisation in Northern Italy.

It should be emphasised that the method of dissemination is essentially oral, and this is the most difficult form of propaganda for enemy security services to deal with.

Rumours are not deliberately placed in the Press and Radio in Europe, though they have from time to time appeared in the newspapers or broadcasts, having been picked up by correspondents or commentators.

In the USA, however, a news agency controlled by SOE has been used to place them in the Press of the American continent; but here again the newspapers were quite unaware that the material was in any way inspired.

Rumours are therefore the most covert of all forms of propaganda. Although the enemy may suspect that a certain rumour has been started by the British Government, they can never prove it. Even if they succeed in capturing an agent engaged in spreading whispers, there will be no written evidence against him, and should they extort a confession from him, nothing is easier than for the British Government to deny the whole story.

In fact, although more than 2,000 rumours have been disseminated in the last year, we have no evidence that the enemy have ever traced any of them back to a British whispering organisation. Those that have been denied or otherwise referred to have, as far as we know, been attributed to other sources.”

Alongside Bowes-Lyon other members of the UP Committee included Sir Hanns Vischer (a Swiss-born former missionary and MI6 officer since the First World War); Sir Reginald Hoare (Cavendish-Bentinck’s brother-in-law, a veteran diplomat and member of the Hoares Bank family); Leonard Ingrams (financier, pioneer aviator and father of Private Eye founder Richard Ingrams); and SOE representative Alec Peterson (an influential teacher, headmaster and educationalist who later created the International Baccalaureate system).[20]

On 3rd December 1940 a sib was launched via SOE[21]

“that the Superintendent of the Bethel Institute for Incurables had been sent to Dachau for refusing to permit the inmates to be put in lethal chambers. Within two weeks it was reported that this rumour was circulating in Switzerland and, on the 19th December, that the Vatican had issued a decree condemning the killing of physical or mental deficient. The rumour has appeared in intercepted letters, and last Sunday the Sunday Express carried the story that 100,000 mental deficient had been executed.”

The Bethel Institution was a well-known Protestant charitable hospital for the mentally ill and epileptics. In fact its director – Protestant theologian Friedrich von Bodelschwingh – was not sent to Dachau or any other camp. He survived the war and died in 1946.[22]

The main purpose of this sib was to stir up hostility between the Churches and the National Socialist Government over the issue of eugenics and euthanasia. SO1’s French specialist Prof. Denis Brogan (a Cambridge political scientist) was said to have “extremely fine Catholic contacts” in various countries,[23] and “Catholic channels for rumours” were also discussed with Douglas Woodruff, the influential editor of the Catholic journal The Tablet. [24] At this very early stage, the gassing rumor was restricted to “incurables” – it was a story about euthanasia rather than politically or racially motivated executions.

A few months later SOE reported with satisfaction that this sib had been picked up by Vatican Radio. Moreover, Elizabeth Wiskemann – a Swiss-based, Anglo-German journalist, historian and MI6 operative – had acquired “fresh evidence supplied by Austrian-born Swiss who had just returned from visiting Vienna to the effect that all elderly people in Vienna were in terror.”[25]

Among other euthanasia sibs (first circulated in November 1940) was a “rumour that doctors in military hospitals in France have been instructed to make death easy for incapacitated soldiers and airmen”. Extra bite was given to this sib by the suggestion (intended to promote inter-service resentment) that in the case of infantry the loss of one limb would amount to incapacity, leading to euthanasia, whereas this “was not to be considered incapacity in the case of Air Force or SS troops”. [26]

Intercepted letters from Swiss civilians during August 1941 showed that they were innocently passing on versions of the gas-chamber story. One wrote:

“Somebody from Bern who was in Germany said, the new bombs from England were awful, they break half a street to pieces, and somewhere in a shelter, people were all on the ceiling smashed like flies, it was terrible, and so very many were ill with their nerves as they had not room for them in the hospitals, and with some which were not get better, they just open the gas and kill them, like the heavy wounded too...”

A separate letter gave another variant inspired by the same sib:[\[27\]](#)

“The severely wounded Germans are apparently just gassed! We have heard several stories about this and from people coming back from the country.”

While most sibs originated from PWE, the success of this gas-chamber rumor led to a War Office suggestion passed to Cavendish-Bentinck’s JIC in November 1941. They had heard it from their military attaché in Berne, Col. H.A. Cartwright (who was in fact an MI6 officer) as “a story which, with some variations, has been circulating freely in Berne, and has come in from various quite independent informants always from apparently reliable sources.”[\[28\]](#)

In this version of the rumor:

“Guards and superintendents of trains containing wounded German soldiers from the Eastern Front are ordered at certain places to put on their gas masks. The trains then enter a tunnel where they remain for upwards of half an hour. On leaving the tunnel all the wounded soldiers are dead. Severely wounded soldiers are disposed of in the same manner in so-called emergency hospitals, of which there are many.”

Cartwright had added:[\[29\]](#)

“The Guard who furnished this information is stated to have been on duty on one of the trains in which wounded soldiers were ‘gassed’. He was sworn to secrecy under penalty of death, but stated he could no longer withhold his secret from the outer world by reason of his conscience, and wanted the German public to learn the fate of their wounded soldiers.”

The Inter-Services Security Board (through which PWE and others cleared their rumors in case they inadvertently clashed with other British secret operations) had raised no objection, and added: “We recommend this rumour also as useful propaganda.”

This recommendation might have proved significant in the longer term. The difference between a rumor/sib and propaganda is of course that the former (as with “black” propaganda) was intended to be untraceable to British sources.

During 1941 SOE “disseminated a rumour that the Germans had ordered 500 mobile crematorium units from the Ford works in Cologne and Antwerp to be ready by the Spring”. This sib came back in the form of a story circulating in France that “the German army has crematory ovens installed in lorries and cremate all their own dead. ... This enables the Germans to fix a figure for their losses at whatever they please, and leave no evidence to controvert them.”[\[30\]](#) Later an intercepted Swiss letter showed a variant of this rumor, that the Germans “burn their dead in travelling crematoria and keep their losses carefully concealed until the campaign is ended. In this way members of the family wait and hope for the best.”[\[31\]](#)

It might be relevant that during the summer of 1941 a rumor campaign was launched against I.G. Farben, the giant German pharmaceutical and chemical conglomerate.[\[32\]](#) The first hints of this suggest that the campaign was first designed for the Ministry of Economic Warfare to cause financial problems for the company in neutral countries, by for example adulterating samples of its products so as to undermine Farben's reputation.[\[33\]](#) By September 1941 it was reported with satisfaction that anti-Farben stories were widely believed in France:[\[34\]](#)

“There is now a conviction throughout the country that the Germans are attempting to ruin the health of the French people by sending back French sick and wounded prisoners inoculated by the Germans with the bacilli of disease, while there have been rumours of the flooding of the French market with German drugs producing certain forms of debility.”

It is unclear whether this campaign was in any way connected to later allegations that I.G. Farben's pesticide Zyklon B was used for homicidal gassings.

Some versions of the Farben rumors combined them with stories intended to spread panic about typhus, and an interesting variant was added by suggesting that typhus had become so bad that Jewish physicians had been called up for service as army medics.[\[35\]](#) The implication of this sib was that ordinary Germans (and citizens of German-occupied countries) would react badly to the idea of Jewish doctors: this is drawn out further in a later sib:[\[36\]](#)

“It is not only because of the plague danger that German doctors on the East front always wear surgical masks in the wards. So many of them are Jews now that there used to be trouble when the wounded were able to see their faces.”

In November 1941, the Underground Propaganda Committee approved a sib which cunningly linked euthanasia by gassing to typhus and defeatism:[\[37\]](#)

Meanwhile a fantastically gruesome sib hinted at mass murder and industrialized cannibalism:[\[38\]](#)

“The Germans are rounding up healthy Russian prisoners and transferring them in batches of a thousand at a time to a prison camp near Kiev. It may be a coincidence that cans of something called ‘Russian beef’ are already being exported from a factory near Kiev to the most hard hit parts in the Ruhr.”

Later that month a note from the War Office Deputy Director of Operations, Col. John Sinclair (who became Chief of MI6 from 1953 to 1956) to David Bowes-Lyon approved the UP Committee's new development of the gas-chamber story:[\[39\]](#)

“The Germans need every hospital they have got for their own wounded, so foreign workers who fall seriously sick are just sent to the gas-chamber.”

This was later given a further twist:[\[40\]](#)

“Foreign workers should not go to Germany because they are transferred to occupied Poland or blitzed districts, gassed if unfit, sterilised, cheated of their wages, or liable to be treated as hostages.”

As the situation on the Eastern Front worsened, the SOE Executive Committee noted:[\[41\]](#)

“We have now arrived at a situation where it is virtually impossible to distinguish between ‘come-backs’ on certain of our rumour campaigns and genuine reports from enemy and occupied territory. We have, for instance, for the last four months been keeping up a steady campaign on the subject of Fleck Typhus on the Eastern Front. This at first met with no noticeable reaction, but the number of reports has steadily grown, until the prevalence of this disease is now an accepted fact. It seems probable that the reports now refer to genuine outbreaks, but the rumour campaign can claim credit for putting into the minds of the German people an exaggerated idea of its seriousness.”

It is perhaps significant that SOE’s leaders here register the point that – in the case of typhus – propaganda rumors had become fact. Had he been aware of genuine use of homicidal gas chambers, Cavendish-Bentinck could have made a similar point in August 1943: but he didn’t.

In fact, when the Daily Mirror on 23rd March 1942 reported euthanasia by gassing in a report filed by its Lisbon correspondent, it was highlighted by SOE as a “come-back” of one of their sibs, rather than a potentially true story. The Mirror report read:[\[42\]](#)

“Through the widow of one of the men concerned, I learn that 300 Germans wounded in hospital at Dresden were quietly disposed of with gas as they were unlikely to be of further use to the Reichswehr. All had lost limbs or arms on the Eastern front, or had appalling body injuries.”

Conclusion

I have catalogued these very early references to homicidal gassings because they indicate that Victor Cavendish-Bentinck believed he had good reason, in August 1943, to disbelieve stories about mass murders of Poles and Jews in gas chambers. It is of course illegal in many European countries to express such a view today.

As opposed to the growing tide of historical revisionism, orthodox or “exterminationist” historians now suggest that the homicidal gassing of Jews began in February and March 1942, and maintain that the first homicidal gassings of Soviet and Polish prisoners in Auschwitz took place in August-September 1941.[\[43\]](#) Yet SOE were putting out a rumor or “sib” about the gassing of “incurables” (i.e. euthanasia by gas chamber) in December 1940, and an extension of this rumor to encompass gassing of severely wounded soldiers was already current by the summer of 1941 – i.e. before the very first alleged gassings of prisoners at Auschwitz.

Revisionists accept that a euthanasia program began in Germany at the start of the war (using lethal injections) but was abandoned in August 1941 on Adolf Hitler’s orders due to the scale of religious opposition, especially from the Catholic Bishop von Galen of Münster. The alleged use of gas chambers in this euthanasia program has been seen by revisionists as an attempt to bolster Holocaust myths.[\[44\]](#) British propagandists’ invention of a “lethal chamber” aspect to euthanasia could in this context be seen as the basis for later accretions of myth.

With so many gaps in the documentary record, we might never know precisely how these stories were built up. What we can say is that existing SOE and PWE records fatally undermine one of Prof. Richard Evans's arguments against David Irving. As noted above, Evans wrote:

“There was no evidence here or anywhere else, indeed, that the British Political Warfare Executive had invented the story of the gas chambers.”

In fact PWE/SOE certainly did invent stories about homicidal gassings – the inventions were circulated long before any such gassings are now alleged to have taken place.

[2]	In a footnote to his Encounter article (p 15), Laqueur writes that in an October 1979 letter to him, Cavendish-Bentinck "wrote that his pre-War experience of Germany had been limited, and that he therefore disbelieved the atrocity stories in 1942-43. He added that when he visited Auschwitz in late 1945 and reported to the Foreign Office that millions of people had been killed there, it was still not believed in the Foreign Office." This is Laqueur's paraphrase: neither in his 1980 article nor his 1981 book does he quote the precise words of Cavendish-Bentinck's letter, nor does he give any reference for Cavendish-Bentinck's claimed 1945 report to the FO from Auschwitz. In 1979-80 all SOE and PWE papers would of course have been closed to researchers, and Cavendish-Bentinck would still have felt bound by the Official Secrets Act, so it would not be surprising for him to have given Laqueur a false rationalization for his earlier skepticism.

Josef Mengele – the Creation of a Myth

by Germar Rudolf

May I ask my dear reader whether he or she recognizes any of the following names:

Fritz Klein, Heinz Thilo, Bruno Kitt, Erwin von Helmersen, Werner Rohde, Hellmuth Vetter, Horst Schumann, Carl Clauberg, Hans Wilhelm König, Franz Lucas, Alfred Trzebinski, Oskar Dienstbach, Siegfried Schwela, Franz von Bodmann, Kurt Uhlenbroock, Eduard Wirths, Hans Münch, Johann Paul Kremer, Horst Fischer, Friedrich Entress?

Unless you're an expert in the field, you probably have no clue who these people are. The only name I would recognize, if I were to turn off my expert knowledge, is Clauberg, and that only because that was the name of my high-school art teacher (first name unknown).

All the men listed above were at some point or other SS physicians at the infamous Auschwitz Camp.[\[1\]](#)

I omitted one name from the list, and that for a good reason, because that name would give it all away:

Josef Mengele.

Why is it that we all recognize this one name, but have no idea about all the others? And with all, I am not just referring to any of us. This all also includes Auschwitz survivors. If we read or listen to the many testimonies of the thousands of Auschwitz survivors, there seems to have been only one evil person in that entire huge camp: Josef Mengele. Almost every survivor mentions him as an evil SS doctor sending people either to the gas chambers or subjecting them to some cruel, senseless, torturous experiments. Just as Auschwitz has become the symbol for the Holocaust in general, so does Mengele symbolize the evil of Auschwitz. They are synonymous.

Why is that so?

Mengele Hysteria

Most of the above-listed individuals were arrested after the war at some point and either committed suicide while incarcerated or were sentenced to death or to extended prison terms. Mengele escaped. He was never caught. In 1985, years after his death in 1979 in his South-American exile, however, his former whereabouts were revealed, his remains eventually exhumed and identified.[\[2\]](#)

Mengele wasn't the only Auschwitz physician who managed to escape, though. Hans Wilhelm König was even better than Mengele. König disappeared without leaving a trace. But no one has ever heard that name, or have you?

We get an idea what the basis of the "Mengele Myth" is if we listen to one of the most-determined Nazi hunters of the world, the Israeli Efraim Zuroff. While hunting for Josef Mengele during the 1980s, he stumbled upon the remarkable fact that survivors immediately after the war did not describe Mengele as the same evil criminal as he was portrayed in the 1980s or even later. Sifting through newsletters published right after the war by and for "survivors," he came across the (false) news that Mengele had been arrested in early 1947. On that occasion, survivor newsletters asked their readers for incriminating testimonies against Mengele, and such testimonies were then even published. But, as Zuroff summarizes:[\[3\]](#)

"The content of these articles proved quite surprising because they clearly indicated that the Mengele of 1985, who had become a symbol of evil and the personification of the perversion of science, did not enjoy the same notoriety in 1947. [...Zuroff noted] that Mengele was not considered a very high-ranking criminal [in 1947], nor was his supposed arrest regarded as an event of exceptional significance. [...] This notice was, in effect, the first indication that the status of the infamous 'Angel of Death' had grown by leaps and bounds over the years. [...Mengele was], in a certain sense, not the same person who was simultaneously hunted for in South America."

Of course, memories are more accurate a short time after an alleged event than decades later, so the image survivors had of Mengele in 1947 was most certainly more accurate as well.

In 1986, shortly after the hunt for Mengele had been over, the Czech-German historian Zdenek Zofka wrote these memorable lines about how Mengele had become the center of attention of the Holocaust Industry:[\[4\]](#)

"After the fortieth anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz and after the 'Mengele Tribunal' had been staged on occasion of that anniversary in Jerusalem, the search for Mengele was intensified drastically. The reward leading to his capture was increased by the government of the German state of Hesse from 40,000 to one million deutschmarks, and the reward finally reached the staggering height of ten million deutschmarks due to private donations. Along with the intensified search for Mengele, the media's interest in the case escalated as well. The 'Angel of Death of Auschwitz' offered perfect opportunities for an incessant flood of sensational news, and increasingly cruel and shocking crimes committed by Mengele were revealed with reference to witnesses. The mass murderer Mengele turned into the evil incarnate as such, the outright superhuman demon, as Robert Lifton writes."

Zofka's aim with his paper was an attempt to "correct the image of Josef Mengele, which has been distorted and exorbitantly exaggerated by the sensational media." He admits that, when trying to assess the crimes allegedly committed by Mengele, there is basically no documentary evidence to rely on, and that relying on witness accounts in such an atmosphere of hysteria is problematic, to say the least. He continues by stating:

“All too often, it is impossible to be sure that their [the witnesses’] recollections really refer to Mengele at all. It is all too often possible to show that Mengele has been confused with other SS physicians. Almost all the inmates state that they were selected by Mengele on the ramp [to be sent to the gas chamber]. But camp physicians performed the selections in shifts; Mengele performed no more selections than any of the others.” (ibid., p. 246)

This underscores the point I made earlier.

When assessing Mengele’s purported crimes, we have to distinguish three different sets:

1. Selecting inmates for the gas chambers.
2. Experiments with twins.
3. Random medical experiments.

Let’s discuss all three of them here briefly, with reference to further reading for those who want to learn more. Let’s start with the last one first, because it can be dealt with rather swiftly.

Random Medical Experiments

There is “eyewitness” testimony galore about utterly senseless, cruel experiments allegedly performed by Mengele, like changing eye colors by injecting dye into an eye, transplanting limbs and organs to random places in the body, and other nonsense. While studying hundreds of “survivor” testimonies, I’ve come across a good share of these insults to the intellect, so insulting, indeed, that I will not waste my time listing them here. Google the net, and you’ll stumble across these Halloweenish horror stories all over the place. People evidently like to gawk at guts and gore, so the survivors, protected from scrutiny by their aura of sainthood, cater to that need. Interestingly, the alleged victims of these experiments, quite frequently the very witnesses telling these tales, show no signs whatsoever of these cruel procedures. And it goes without saying that there is not the slightest proof for any of it: no documents, no autopsies, no medical examination on survivors proving it. Nothing. It’s all a pack of lies, sweet and simple.

Twins

The alleged cruel experiments Mengele is said to have performed with twins deported to Auschwitz were so lethal that most of the twins he had enrolled in his research not only survived the war, but were even able to form an association in 1984, toward the peak of the Mengele hysteria, which was meant to lobby for their and their descendants’ interests: Children of Auschwitz Nazi Deadly Lab Experiment Survivors (CANDLES). Read and rethink the association’s name: How can deadly lab experiments have any survivors?

In fact, as Italian historian Carlo Mattogno has shown in his paper on Mengele’s twin research,[\[5\]](#) there are three facts which clearly prove that Mengele did not commit any crimes on those twins:

1. All the surviving paperwork clearly shows that his research was limited to anthropological and behavioral studies, but did not include any surgical or other intrusive procedures.
2. All the twins enlisted for his research were enrolled in that program for months on end, with none of them ever dying.
3. Most of those involved – the twins as well as Mengele’s inmate assistants – survived Auschwitz and the war.

Separately, think of that: Children are not supposed to have gotten beyond the camp’s railway ramp. Since they were obviously unfit for labor, the Holocaust orthodoxy has it that they were sent to the gas chamber straight away, but that's evidently not what happened, not just with Mengele's twin children, but in general.

For the long list of twins and children at Auschwitz who survived the camp, see Mattogno's paper.

Gas-Chamber Selections

Which brings me to the final point: The selections at the railway ramps near the Auschwitz Camp and (later) inside the Auschwitz-Birkenau Camp. There can be no doubt that these selections took place. They happened at Auschwitz, and they happened at other German wartime camps as well. They were usually performed by physicians, and it is safe to say that Mengele, as one of the many Auschwitz physicians, was ordered to do them as well.

But what were they about? Did those in charge, Mengele among them, decide who got to live and who was to die in the gas?

To answer this question comprehensively would require the analysis of tens of thousands of documents that survived the war. I'm not going to do this here, most importantly because there is no need to reinvent the wheel. Others have done that already, and I'll point the reader to them.

The issue boils down to two questions:

1. Are there any documents indicating that homicidal gas chambers existed at Auschwitz?
2. What do the documents reveal about the purpose of selection(s) made?

Regarding a., let me quote from an article published in late 2016 in the conservative mainstream periodical Taki's Magazine. It was written by Jewish activist David Cole, who in the 1990s was dabbling for a while in Auschwitz research. In this Taki article, Cole, who believes in all other aspects of the orthodox Holocaust narrative, explains why he has problems with Auschwitz:[\[6\]](#)

“Ah, Auschwitz. Yes, here's where we still have a problem. [...] there are genuine problems with what is commonly claimed to be part 3 [of the Holocaust]—that in 1943 Auschwitz-Birkenau was ‘renovated’ to become an ultra-super be-all end-all extermination facility. To me, the evidence just isn't there, and the evidence that does exist calls that claim into question. [...Orthodox historians] backed themselves into a corner by putting Auschwitz, with its phony, postwar tourist-attraction ‘gas chamber’ and its complete lack of documentary evidence supporting a killing program, front and center as the heart of the Holocaust. They're in so deep at this point that they can't back off.

It's surprisingly easy to get the leading lights of anti-denial to admit as much one-on-one. Rick Eaton has been the senior researcher at the Simon Wiesenthal Center for thirty years. He's as major a player in the fight against Holocaust denial as anyone on earth. Two years ago, I corresponded with him (under a pseudonym, of course... he'd never speak directly with the likes of me!) regarding the Auschwitz problem. I explained my thesis to him, that Auschwitz, having various ‘issues’ that call the credibility of extermination claims into question, should not be used to represent the Holocaust. He agreed [...].

Keep in mind that even though I was using a pseudonym, I was not falsely claiming to be anyone of note. In other words, Eaton made that admission to a complete nobody, a total stranger. One gets the feeling that many of these experts are secretly longing for the day when they can be open about the ‘Auschwitz problem’ and move past it [...].”

Fact is that challenging the orthodox Auschwitz – and Mengele – narrative is a crime in many countries, and in those countries where it is not, doing so will still turn challengers into social pariahs. Hence, you won't hear a word from any mainstream scholar about the fact that “the evidence just isn't there." When scientists have to act under the threat of legal or professional penalty, we can neither trust them nor their research results.

All that remains are the studies of those who don't bend to the pressure; who literally risk loss of life, limb and liberty when publishing their iconoclastic research results. I may point out two of those studies which can give the reader a good overview as to why we have an "Auschwitz problem":

1. The Real Case for Auschwitz by the already-mentioned Carlo Mattogno.<sup>[7]</sup> This thick volume of some 750 pages thoroughly discusses all the relevant documentary evidence on those buildings which are said to have contained homicidal gas chambers. This is the main foundation upon which Cole based his conclusion that the evidence for the existence of homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz "just isn't there," and that "the evidence that does exist calls that claim into question."

2. The Chemistry of Auschwitz, by, well, myself.<sup>[8]</sup> This 440-page book summarizes the documentary situation succinctly (which saves you having to read the 750 pages of the first book mentioned) and forensically evaluates various kinds of material evidence of the purported crime scene.

There are many more studies that could be listed, but the interested reader can learn about them when perusing the two works just mentioned.

The upshot of all these studies is quite simply that there cannot have been any homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz. The forensic and documentary evidence positively refutes even the possibility of their existence.

This brings us to Point b. If the selections were not designed to send people to the gas chambers, what purpose did they serve? Well, if a camp received hundreds of inmates in one swoop, what was the SS supposed to do? Just let those deportees walk in and do whatever they pleased? Some kind of admission procedure had to be in place where it was figured out which deportee was to be lodged in which building in which part of the camp, or who of them will even be sent to another camp. Such an admission procedure happens in every prison and camp in every country. That wasn't any different at Auschwitz. Having physicians involved to assess the health of incoming deportees makes sense, too. A detailed analysis of the surviving documentation clearly shows in this regard as well that there was nothing sinister or unusual about those selections at Auschwitz.<sup>[9]</sup>

Witnesses

Cover art for an upcoming study of the testimonies of one of the key witnesses propping up the orthodox Auschwitz narrative.

But what about all those witnesses? Well, if we look into witnesses who testified about their experiences with Dr. Mengele right at the end of the war, before memories got corrupted by the Mengele hysteria starting at the late 1970s/early 1980s, there is really only one witness saying anything of substance: the Jewish physician Miklos Nyiszli from Hungary, who for several months of his incarceration at Auschwitz was the assistant of Dr. Mengele, if we are to believe him.

The late German mainstream historian and expert of Third Reich history Prof. Dr. Werner Maser said about Nyiszli simply that he “lied excessively.”<sup>[10]</sup> He didn’t justify this harsh assessment, however, because that would have required citing the writings of heretics, which Maser didn’t want to do to prevent getting himself in trouble (so he admitted to me). In his above-quoted paper on Mengele, Mattogno gave a brief summary of the main reasons why Nyiszli was indeed an imposter and excessive liar. The reader interested in a thorough, 300-page critique of Nyiszli’s various tall tales in English will have to wait until later this year, though, when a study dedicated to this key witness is slated to appear.<sup>[11]</sup>

The Legacy

A drawing of a prisoner showing Dr. Wirths, garrison physician at Auschwitz between September 1942 and early 1945, as a knight in shining uniform battling against lice infestation and thus typhus

Mengele is special, so special, indeed, that this is the only uncommon German last name my English spell checker doesn't complain about. Like blitzkrieg and Auschwitz, this term has become a fixed part of the English language. What a proud legacy of a reviled concentration-camp physician!

In Mengele's case, however, it is safe to say that this isn't his fault. As Wikipedia writes correctly, quoting the one book that was most influential in cementing the Mengele hysteria:[\[12\]](#)

“Rolf [Mengele, Josef's son], who had not seen his father since the ski holiday in 1956, visited him there [in São Paulo, Brazil] in 1977 and found an unrepentant Nazi who claimed he had never personally harmed anyone and had only done his duty.”

Mengele was a deputy of the Auschwitz garrison physician Dr. Eduard Wirths. Wirths, in turn, was celebrated by hundreds of Auschwitz inmates as a hero, as the “Angel of Auschwitz” saving the lives of tens of thousands of them with his selfless efforts to improve their lot and to battle the epidemics reaping a gruesome harvest at Auschwitz.[\[13\]](#) Mengele was Wirths's right-hand man – in the battle to save as many lives as possible of those whom the authorities of the Third Reich had recklessly and irresponsibly deported to Auschwitz.

Mengele was not just innocent of the crimes he is accused of. Together with Eduard Wirths and the other physicians at Auschwitz, his tireless efforts saved the lives of ten thousands of inmates.

Ludwig Fanghänel, 8 October 1937 – 20 January 2017

by Jürgen Graf

R.I.P.

With immense sadness my wife Olga and I learned that our dear friend Dr. Ludwig Fanghänel passed away on 20 January. To the revisionist community Ludwig was known under his pen name Klaus Schwensen. He was the author of seven revisionist articles published in the English language at Inconvenient History:

<https://www.inconvenienthistory.com/columnists/2727>

Of these articles, the ones about the Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp and the Soviet Extraordinary Commission are of particular importance.

Several other studies authored by Dr. Fanghänel under the pseudonym Klaus Schwensen only appeared in German. Of special interest is his analysis of the so-called “Lachout Document” (Vierteljahreshefte für freie Geschichtsforschung, 2/2004). According to this document, which purportedly emanated from a “Militärpolizeilicher Dienst” in Vienna, no homicidal gassings had taken place in the concentration camps of the “Altreich” (Germany in its 1937 borders), nor at the Mauthausen camp. Unfortunately, the alleged authenticity of this document was tenaciously defended by several revisionists for many years.

As Dr. Fanghänel conclusively showed in his meticulous analysis, there is not the faintest evidence that a “Militärpolizeilicher Dienst” ever existed. As such an organization would inevitably have left ample traces in the archives; this alone is sufficient to demolish the credibility of the “Lachout Document” which was in all probability fabricated by Emil Lachout himself, a man whom Prof. Robert Faurisson had always suspected of being an imposter and who gave all kinds of contradictory explanations as to how he had obtained it. Of course this does not mean that the claim made in this “document” is wrong; as a matter of fact, no homicidal gas chambers existed at any of the aforementioned camps. But we revisionists cannot afford to base our claims on forgeries. We do not depend on them.

Ludwig Fanghänel was born in Saxony in 1937. He later emigrated to Western Germany and settled in Munich where he acquired a doctorate in chemistry and worked as a chemist for decades. He never lost his unmistakable Saxon accent.

I first met Ludwig in April 2003 when he visited me and Olga in Moscow. A second visit would follow ten years later. Ludwig was an exceptionally kind person; it was simply impossible not to love him. He was also a most fascinating interlocutor. An avid traveler, he had visited numerous countries from India to Mexico. I will never forget his vivid and humorous accounts of his adventures in these distant lands.

The unspeakable disaster which has struck his German fatherland under the treacherous Merkel regime deeply upset Ludwig. He placed his hope in the ADF (Alternative für Deutschland) party, whose electoral successes in East Germany filled him with cautious optimism.

Ludwig used to call me every few weeks from Munich. After his phone calls stopped and he did not reply to my mails, my wife and I became alarmed and contacted one of his friends who informed us that Ludwig, who wore a cardiac pacemaker and whose physical health had been deteriorating for some time, had been found dead in his flat. According to the forensic experts, his death had probably occurred on 20 January. He was buried in Munich.

A wonderful friend and excellent scholar has left us. May he rest in peace!

One Survivor, One Single Survivor!

Abstract

Orthodox Holocaust scholars reject the revisionist claim that the so-called Aktion Reinhardt Camps were transit camps for Jewish deportees on their way to the East. They challenge revisionists to show them one Jew, one single Jew, who was deported through any of those camps and survived. This paper presents evidence of thousands of Jews for whom those camps were mere layover stations.

Holocaust Archaeology

If we follow the orthodox Holocaust narrative, the so-called Aktion Reinhardt Camps – Bełżec, Sobibór and Treblinka – were pure extermination camps. In the very lethal sense of the word, they are said to have been dead ends for Jewish deportees sent there, who were allegedly murdered in homicidal gas chambers using engine-exhaust gas, and their corpses subsequently buried and later exhumed and cremated on huge outdoor pyres.[\[1\]](#)

During the past 20 years, archeological explorations were conducted by orthodox researchers at all three Aktion Reinhardt Camps in search of remnants of the claimed gas-chamber buildings and of the mass graves and mass-cremation sites claimed to have existed nearby.

The earliest such explorations were conducted between 1997 and 1999 at the site of the former Bełżec Camp.[\[2\]](#) While major amounts of disturbed soil were located, the amount of human remains discovered was minimal, and no trace of any building was found that resembles even remotely what witnesses have described as the homicidal gas chamber.[\[3\]](#)

Next in line was the Sobibór Camp, which was the focus of much larger explorations than those conducted at Bełżec. The investigations started in 2000 and extended well into the year 2014 and probably even beyond that. Unlike Bełżec, the researchers involved did not merely undertake core sample drillings, but they actually excavated several areas suspected to contain remnants of former camp structures: fence poles, buildings, mass graves and cremation pits.[\[4\]](#) In the summer of 2014, a structure was discovered which the researchers involved believe to have been the claimed homicidal gas chamber.[\[5\]](#) Until late 2016, the website dedicated to the Sobibór memorial had a 2014 news item posted announcing the impending publication of the research result.[\[6\]](#) When I approached them via email in late November 2016 asking whether that publication had yet appeared, and if so, where it could be found, instead of receiving an answer, the announcement was quietly removed. A revisionist critique of the findings at Sobibór was published in 2013, which of course does not address the claimed gas-chamber find.[\[7\]](#)

The Treblinka Camp was last in line to become the object of modern archeological research. This included the use of high-technology devices such as LIDAR scans and ground-penetrating radar. Core samples and minor excavations were also conducted, although apparently on a much smaller scale than at Sobibór. No dedicated research report, paper or book seems to have been published as a result of it, but the lead researcher, Dr. Caroline Sturdy Colls, did include some of her findings in a general book on the forensics and archeology of mass-murder sites.<sup>[8]</sup> A written revisionist critique published two years prior to the appearance of that book could analyze only small bits of information that had been published in rather superficial media items, hence is of merely limited value.<sup>[9]</sup> A revisionist video documentary addressing Sturdy Colls's research limits itself to what had appeared during a 2013 TV documentary,<sup>[10]</sup> hence has a narrow focus as well.<sup>[11]</sup>

Conflicting Claims

In any murder case, the burden of proof is on those claiming that a murder has happened. In any scientific dispute, the burden of proof lies on those making any claim about anything.

In the present case, everybody agrees that at least some 1.3 million people were deported to the Aktion Reinhardt Camps, a claim primarily based on a German radio message intercepted and deciphered by the British on January 11, 1943, which speaks of a total of 1,274,166 deportees.<sup>[12]</sup> But what happened to the Jews who arrived at those camps?

Orthodox historiography maintains that almost all of these Jews were murdered on the spot, usually within a few hours of their arrival at the latest. Only a few healthy young men were kept alive as slave laborers to run the camp's genocidal operation, but even those usually did not live long.

Revisionists, on the other hand, claim that these camps were transit camps, and that Jews arriving at these borderline stations merely swapped trains from European standard gauge to the Russian wide gauge, to be deported further East during a grand plan of resettling Europe's Jews.<sup>[13]</sup> The revisionist storyline has it that most of the Jews deported to those camps were kept there for only a short while – hours or days – during which they and their belongings may have been subjected to hygienic measures: showers and disinfestation. They also may have been subjected to some kind of selection to extract those individuals suitable for slave-labor deployment, to be sent elsewhere, while the rest boarded another train headed further east to be resettled in some part of the then-German-occupied parts of the Soviet Union.

Proving Mass Murder

Those claiming that a gigantic mass-murder operation unfolded at these places have to deliver the kinds of evidence required in any murder case: primarily traces of the bodies, evidence of murder, and any kind of trace of the murder weapon. The archaeological investigations mentioned earlier were carried out to some degree to do exactly that: locate bodily remains, determine the way they died, and find traces of the gas chambers. Revisionist critics have claimed that the evidence actually found falls extremely short of what has to be expected, yet orthodox counter-critics have argued otherwise.<sup>[14]</sup>

For this study, I will focus on the Treblinka Camp, which is said to have had the largest death toll of all three Aktion Reinhardt Camps.

First, let's define what kind of evidence would be required to prove that the claimed mass murder has taken place. Most-important, this concerns traces of the victims or of the manner in which their bodies were disposed of. The orthodoxy claims that some 700,000 victims were buried within the camp and later exhumed and cremated on huge pyres. I will leave aside here the question as to how such a task could have been physically possible, for if the remains of 700,000 victims can be located, that feat obviously was possible somehow. Hence, we need to worry about the How only if we do not find the expected traces.

The burial of 700,000 victims within a few months – most are said to have died between July and October 1942 – requires a minimum amount of space in the soil. In addition, large areas where the cremations allegedly took place must have existed, too. Finally, the cremation remains – ashes, body fragments, unburned wood – need to be found somewhere. This all needs quantification.

However, the task is not as simple as it seems, because we are not dealing with a pristine crime scene as it was left behind by the alleged perpetrators. Quite to the contrary: it is a matter of record that two forensic/archaeological investigations were conducted there at war's end or shortly thereafter, one by Soviet, the other by Polish authorities.<sup>[15]</sup> In addition, there is evidence suggesting that bombs were dropped onto the area of the former Treblinka Camp toward the end of the war, probably by Soviet aircraft, causing major devastation.<sup>[16]</sup> Furthermore, completely undocumented random digs by grave robbers have been going on for decades, as the site was left basically unguarded for decades after the war.

Hence, even if one were to succeed in determining exactly how much of the camp's underlying soil has been disturbed, how is one to tell which of these perturbations originate from the purported perpetrators and which have been added by the above-mentioned activities that unfolded after the camp had been dissolved? While it is perhaps possible to find out where and how much of a volume the Soviet and Polish investigative commissions dug up, and to what degree it included the volume of former mass graves and cremation sites, etc., it is probably rather difficult, if at all possible, to distinguish bomb craters and haphazard digs from original mass graves and cremation sites. But such a distinction is indispensable in order to be sure which soil perturbation is original and which is later. Admittedly, this prerequisite is a very high standard of proof which may be extremely difficult or even impossible to meet. But that failure of securing the evidence while it was fresh is merely the fault of the authorities in charge of the area right after the withdrawal of all German authorities in 1944. Worse still, if the camp's area was indeed bombarded by the Soviet Air Force, this raises the suspicion that the Soviets themselves were those who initiated the process of destroying the evidence. It is moot to speculate about their motives, but it is safe to say that securing evidence in a mass-murder case was obviously not on their minds. At any rate, not having conducted a thorough forensic investigation for so many decades has led to a considerable deterioration and spoliation of the evidence which we may never be able to overcome.

Still, considering that the cremation of 700,000+ victims must have left innumerable traces in and around the camp, it should be possible to come to some conclusions when scouring the soil of the entire former camp and its vicinity for these remains.<sup>[17]</sup> This might be a daunting task, but it seems to be the only way of determining with any degree of reliability the magnitude of events that unfolded there.

As to remnants of homicidal gas chambers, this seems to be a wild-goose chase undertaken by the orthodoxy. While it is expected that some building remains have to be found in those camps, finding a "gas chamber" seems illusory, for how are we to decide whether the ruins of a building served as a chemical mass-slaughter facility? While it is possible to expect chemical traces of mass murder committed with hydrogen cyanide aka Zyklon B – in the form of long-term-stable Iron Blue<sup>[18]</sup> – the lethal gas which orthodox historians today claim was allegedly used in the Aktion Reinhardt Camps – engine-exhaust gases – would not have left any trace whatsoever. Hence, if some ruins containing tiles are discovered, as was the case at Treblinka, how are we to decide whether these tiles were part of an actual shower room, as revisionists claim, or of a homicidal gas chamber merely disguised as a shower room, as orthodox historians insist? As far as I can see, there is no way of telling the difference.

Proving Transit Activities

Revisionists face a different challenge. If almost 1.3 million individuals were transited through those camps, where is the evidence for this? Where are these 1.3 million persons? Asking that question 75 years later is a little late, too. It cannot be expected that many of these individuals are still alive today. But what evidence is there that Treblinka, to stick with this camp, served as a layover station? And is there even one single Jew who was deported to Treblinka and showed up alive in “the East” or anywhere else, for that matter?

Interestingly, there are quite a few eyewitness accounts recorded by orthodox organizations who attest to the fact that they, together with hundreds of other deportees, were indeed transited through Treblinka. Eric Hunt has included some of these statements in his documentary on Treblinka.[\[19\]](#) Although these Jews were sent to the Majdanek labor camp rather than “to the East,” their stories still confirm that Treblinka did serve as a transit camp for thousands of Jews. This means that Treblinka had to have the logistical capability of serving that purpose.

Carlo Mattogno has pointed out a particularly illuminating case of a Jewish individual transited through Treblinka.[\[20\]](#) It concerns the fate of a certain Minna Grossova, who was born on Sept. 20, 1874. On October 19, 1942, this 68-year-old lady was deported to Treblinka – at a time when on average some 5,000 Jews are said to have been killed and buried there every single day. But instead of getting killed there, she was sent to Auschwitz, where she ... no, was not sent to the gas chambers either, although she was most certainly not “fit for labor,” but lived there another 14 months, finally dying there on December 30.[\[21\]](#) If Mrs. Grossova at age 68 was spared death in the gas chambers of Treblinka and Auschwitz, it is likely that the many hundreds of her fellow sufferers deported together with her shared her fate as well. This fate, too, underlines that Treblinka was indeed used as a transit camp where not even old, frail Jews were murdered.

How about Jews actually transited to “the East”? Jean-Marie Boisdefeu has documented an interesting case he stumbled over while skimming Vad Vashem’s database of Holocaust victims.[\[22\]](#) This case, too, is based on a memorial book published by government authorities, in this case of Germany. It concerns the Berlin Jew Siegmund Rothstein, born in 1867, who was first deported to the Theresienstadt Ghetto for elderly Jews in August 1942. Barely a month later, however, on September 26, he was deported to Treblinka at the age of 75. But that was not his end at all, because the German authorities found life signs of him further east, as they finally determined that Rothstein died in Minsk, the capital city of Belarus, some 240 miles (286 km) east of Treblinka. I doubt 75-year-old Mr. Rothstein jumped off the train prior to arriving at Treblinka and ran all the way to German-occupied Minsk, Hence, he must have traveled there by train. I also doubt that the German authorities reserved a train just for him or put just him on a military train going to Minsk. Rather, he must have made that journey on a deportation train together with hundreds or thousands of fellow deportees from Theresienstadt.

Boisdefeu states that none of the thousands of Jews deported from Theresienstadt is listed in the German memorial book as having been killed at Treblinka, but that they all are listed with a variety of different locations where they either died or were last heard of and then went missing.

This case, too, indicates that thousands of Jews seem to have been deported to “the East” with Treblinka as a transit station. As a result, Treblinka must indeed have had the logistics to temporarily house, feed and clean hundreds, if not thousands of individuals for short periods of time. Among other things, it most likely did have a very real shower facility for that very purpose.

It is therefore clear that orthodox historians have to adjust their narrative to accommodate that role somehow. For instance, Treblinka could be re-labeled as a combined extermination and transit camp, serving both purposes at once. This dual-interpretation approach, first observed by Arthur Butz in his trail-blazing book, [23] has been very successful in shoring up the orthodox extermination narrative for Auschwitz and Majdanek, when the mounting evidence against their cases threatened to undermine them. In the case of Treblinka, orthodox as well as revisionist historians could be accommodated by saying that, yes, there was a real shower, but, yes, it was also equipped to murder instead of shower the deportees. Whether that is a credible narrative, is for the reader to decide.

As far as I know, no one has done any thorough, systematic research trying to locate more individual cases of Jews transited through Treblinka, Sobibór or Bełżec to other places using the data available in published sources, victim and witness databases, etc. No one has even considered the question, let alone pursued it. Orthodox researchers are unlikely to undertake such research, as asking the question is a heresy worth the professional death penalty. Revisionists, on the other hand, have so far lacked the human, monetary, logistical and temporal resources to undertake such research on the grand scale it would require. So in this case as well, the evidence keeps deteriorating, as memories fade, documents decay and survivors die.

The one revisionist whom I had invited to do that research in late 2016 – Eric Hunt – got upset with me because I didn't offer him the research results on a silver platter ready for his consumption. Hence, he decided to take an altogether contrary stance with regard to the whole matter. Pity.

Samuel Crowell: In Memoriam! | CODOH

by Richard A. Widmann

I learned of the passing of Samuel Crowell as I have learned of the passing of several friends over the past year—via email. I had been away for the day but decided to check my messages prior to retiring for the evening. There were several stacked up regarding my late friend; the subject of the first was simply “Crowell.” Nearly three weeks had already passed since the heart attack that claimed his life on 1 April – news doesn’t necessarily travel fast on the Internet.

As revisionists, we are naturally skeptical and therefore question reports of contemporary events as well as historical accounts. The attachment of an obituary quickly removed all doubt. It is widely known that “Samuel Crowell” was a pseudonym—one of several which my colleague chose to assign to his articles; I shall for the sake of the privacy of his family use that name throughout this article. Crowell selected his nom de plume due to the threat of persecution that revisionists suffered from the mid-1990s on. It was in fact legislation throughout Europe trampling free speech with regard to the Holocaust story that first caught Crowell’s eye and resulted in his immersion in the subject.

The man who would become Samuel Crowell was born in San Francisco on 5 May 1955. Crowell loved his country and especially the freedoms that so many took for granted during the Eisenhower administration of his birth. He would join the Marine Corps where he served two tours of duty. He graduated from the University of California (Berkeley) where he studied philosophy, foreign languages, and modern European history. His continued love of history and amazing ability to recall facts resulted in his attainment of a Master’s degree in Eastern European History from Columbia University. He would later become a Professor of History at Lafayette College in Easton, Pennsylvania.

I first became aware of Crowell around 1994. I spotted his comments on the alt-revisionism newsgroup in the days before the appearance of any websites on the Holocaust (or just about any other matter). His user ID at the time was “Ehrlich606” and for the first couple years, I referred to him simply as Ehrlich. I noticed his comments initially because they were utterly free of cant. His questions were sharp. His comments were direct – but never derogatory. Crowell would later describe himself as a “moderate revisionist.” This was more than a label but rather a school of thought that he hoped would find more adherents. Crowell was genuinely interested in debunking the exaggerations and excesses of the Holocaust story but did so without any intention of offending anyone – especially the Jewish people.

Shortly after our first exchanges on the Internet, I introduced Crowell to Bradley R. Smith and the small cadre of volunteers around CODOH. Crowell was immediately drawn to Smith’s style, charm, and cause – namely to argue for intellectual freedom with regard to the Holocaust story. It was not long after this that I had the opportunity to meet Crowell face-to-face. It was the first of many such occasions in which we would gather with other revisionists for food, drink, and discussion of the latest turns in Holocaust studies. During that first meeting, we visited the home of Friedrich Berg, who was well known for his studies surrounding the absurdity of the diesel-gas-chamber story.

The Repal company of Leipzig offers "air defense shelter doors and shutters, in steel" in this advertisement, which appeared in a 1942 issue of the German trade periodical "Baulicher Luftschutz." Such doors were gas resistant. Note the protected peep hole.

Berg shared documents from his personal files including several having to do with the construction and sale of German air-raid-shelter components. While going through these wartime materials, we first saw the Repal advertisement for "air defense shelter doors and shutters, in steel." We immediately recognized that the gas-resistant door with protected peephole was identical to the Majdanek "gas-chamber door" replica that the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum (USHMM) had put on display for an American audience at their new museum on the National Mall.

By early 1997, Crowell's first article appeared on the CODOH Website, "Wartime Germany's Anti-Gas Air-Raid Shelters: A Refutation of Pressac's 'Criminal Traces.'" Crowell's approach was to address the leading "exterminationist" writers with a positive rather than negative approach. His idea was, rather than saying something could not have been used as a gas chamber, to explain what it may more likely have been used for. Beginning with Jean-Claude Pressac's noted 39 "Criminal Traces" – what he called "indirect proofs" of the Holocaust, Crowell presented benign explanations. When his article appeared in The Journal of Historical Review, the editor explained:[\[1\]](#)

"His basic argument is that the documents cited by Pressac as 'traces' of homicidal 'gas chambers' are references to air-raid shelters, or to their fittings or equipment. Specifically, he contends, the Birkenau crematory morgue rooms – the supposed 'gas chambers' where, it is alleged, hundreds of thousands of Jews were killed with 'Zyklon' pesticide – were modified to also serve as air-raid shelters with features to protect against possible Allied attacks with poison gas."

By July of 1997, Crowell penned his second article dealing with the "bomb shelter thesis" – this time expanding his argument and leveraging newly found materials.

"Defending Against the Allied Bombing Campaign: Air Raid Shelters and Gas Protection in Germany" quickly found adherents and detractors from both the revisionist and exterminationist camps. While Crowell never claimed to be the first to make the air-raid-shelter argument, he clearly developed it beyond what others had done.[\[2\]](#) For revisionists who had argued for years that the gas chambers were all disinfection or delousing chambers, the "bomb-shelter thesis" seemed to take direct aim at their work.

Likewise, a letter to Walter Reich, the Director of the USHMM explaining that the door displayed in the Washington DC museum was the replica of a common mass-produced air-raid-shelter door, went unanswered.<sup>[3]</sup>

Beyond various short book reviews, editorials, and commentary that Crowell penned at the time under various pseudonyms, he set to work to complete his revisionist magnum opus, The Gas Chamber of Sherlock Holmes: An Attempt at a Literary Analysis of the Holocaust Gassing Claim. Crowell's book-length effort now went beyond the "bomb-shelter thesis" and examined the origin of the gas-chamber stories from the first reports through the disinfection procedures, the confessions of key witnesses and even the euthanasia campaign. Again, using his standard approach, Crowell sought to find logical explanations for the stories, which developed into what he termed "the Canonical Holocaust." His approach was again a unique one. He applied the methodology of literary analysis and considered the sources and reports in a chronological and comparative method.

The title of Crowell's definitive work was based on his discovery that the gassing narrative by "witness" Alexander Werth bore a stark similarity to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's description of a poisonous gassing in his Sherlock Holmes tale, "The Adventure of the Retired Colourman" of the 1920s. Crowell observed that there were causes for the gassing claims and did not accept the often-repeated explanations of the more extreme revisionists that the entire tale amounted to a lie, a hoax, or some sort of Jewish conspiracy. Rather Crowell would call the gassing claims "the delusion of the Twentieth Century."

Bradley Smith published the first copies of Sherlock (as we referred to it) in an inexpensive Xerox-copied, plastic covered, spiral-bound edition. Smith began a public relations campaign called "Operation Sherlock" in which over a hundred copies of the book were sent to an elite of authors, intellectuals, and activists.<sup>[4]</sup> Needless to say, there were few who would respond publicly, or honestly.

In 2000, Crowell would tackle the bomb-shelter thesis once again. Based on additional research, Crowell wrote his highly provocative "Bomb Shelters in Birkenau: A Reappraisal." In "Bomb Shelters in Birkenau," Crowell argued that the crematoria at Birkenau had been equipped with gas-tight fixtures as part of a civil-defense measure and that this is the most plausible argument for their existence.

As Lao Tzu commented, "The flame that burns twice as bright burns half as long," Crowell's bright revisionist career abruptly ended as the millennium began. If interesting events occurred or new discoveries were made, Crowell would continue to comment among friends, but his public writing had all but ceased. It was a great surprise when in 2011 publisher Chip Smith decided to publish a proper volume of Sherlock now titled, The Gas Chamber of Sherlock Holmes and Other Writings on the Holocaust, Revisionism, and Historical Understanding.

The new 400-page edition by Nine-Banded Books included a new preface, and new chapters including "Revisiting the Bomb Shelter Thesis: A Postscript to 'Bomb Shelters in Birkenau,'" and "The Holocaust in Retrospect: A Historical and Revisionist Assessment." For a moment it seemed that Crowell was back. A prototype for a website was drawn up, but it was really not to be. The final words that Crowell would write on the subject were these:

"The destruction of the Jews in World War Two will remain an important object for study and commemoration among the Jewish people and the German people. The wars, revolutions, ethnic cleansings, famines, epidemics, and grand experiments in social engineering that dislocated many tens of millions of human beings, and killed a large proportion of them, and of which the Holocaust was a part, will be remembered by everyone who has a stake in the European inheritance. Like any series of events, it will be romanticized. Like any series of events, it will be mythologized. And, like any series of events, it will be properly understood only after the passage of time.”

Crowell was done with the Holocaust story. As such he turned his attention to other subjects. Foremost in his mind was another historical controversy—one that he claimed to wrestle with for 50 years — that of the authorship of the works of William Shakespeare. His final book was William Fortyhands: Disintegration and Reinvention of the Shakespeare Canon (2016). Crowell stated that his disintegration of the Shakespeare canon was the work that he was most proud of. Crowell inscribed the copy that he gave me, “The H. is over, so time for other things.” Indeed, for Crowell, he had said all that he could say on the Holocaust.

In early 2016, following news of the passing of his old friend, Bradley Smith, Crowell wrote what would be his last article – a memorial for Smith – “Bradley Smith: In Memoriam.” Here, once again, Crowell used the phrase “In Memoriam” just as he had dedicated his magnum opus many years prior. As used in Sherlock the Latin phrase seemed like a seal on the tomb of the Holocaust story itself, forever relegating it to memory. The meaning of these words shifted however when applied to Bradley Smith. The words had transformed into a requiem for a dear departed friend. It seems fitting that they be used once again to remember my friend Samuel Crowell. You will be missed.

The Nazis' Nuremberg Race Laws: Made in USA?

by Ezra Macvie

In 1933, Germany's National Socialists found themselves in command of one of the world's most advanced states with a pressing agenda to remove Jews from the command structure of its society, along with the upper strata of lucrative professions such as law, medicine and the media. With typically German methodicality, they set about crafting a body of law under which to bring this massive change about. Again in keeping with traits of order and logic for which the people are famous, they first launched an inquiry into precedents of law for carrying out programs such as theirs. There weren't many, around the world, with but one batch of 31 exceptions all in one country: the United States of America. This book examines the Germans' project of lawfare on the Jews, but never touches on the supreme irony that that very same United States of America outfitted and supplied the bulk of the massive military effort that laid their country waste and conquered less than ten years later.

Hitler's American Model: The United States and Making of Nazi Race Law. James Q. Whitman. Princeton University Press, Princeton, N.J., 2017, 224 pp.

In 1933, when the National Socialists became able to fulfill their long-stated ambition to rid German society of Jews, no modern state had ever before undertaken to formulate and enact laws to bring such a thing about. All previous episodes resembling the mooted cleansing had been accomplished by little more than royal decrees received by subjects to a greater or lesser extent eager to carry them out (and, of course, acquire such property as the victims had to leave behind, or surrender in exchange for safe passage).

The National Socialists initially feared that they might have to invent an entire body of law and jurisprudence from whole cloth, as it were.

Fortunately for them, it turned out that it would not be quite necessary to reinvent this evil “wheel.” There were, by their meticulous count, fully thirty-one governments that had enacted anti-miscegenation, anti-integration and/or multi-tiered citizenship and immigration laws. Every one of these, with the exception of the federal government itself, was a state of the United States.

Like good inventors everywhere, the Germans carefully cataloged those laws and actually published their findings in a number of lists and compendia preparatory to the process that ultimately, in 1935, produced the infamous Nuremberg Laws that as-precisely-as-possible defined who in Germany was a racial undesirable, and what disabilities these unfortunates were to be subjected to for as long as they remained in the territory claimed by the Master Race of National Socialist ideology. These unfortunates were, of course, the Jews. Perhaps the chief among many authentic sources Whitman cites for the product of the German inquiries is Heinrich Krieger’s 1936 opus Das Rassenrecht in den vereinigten Staaten (Race Law in the United States), the 361-page product of a two-year residence in the United States by Krieger.

Americans in particular misconceive the thrust of American race law as relating to segregation of public facilities such as bathrooms, drinking fountains, lunch counters and seats on a bus. Such segregation was never much on the minds of Germans, whose disfavored minority differed so little from themselves that ultimately Jews were required to display yellow stars on their clothing to distinguish themselves from the rest of the population. This “disconnect” has enabled past inquirers into connections between American and German race law to conclude that there is little to none. The author points out that this is a gross error.

The parts of American law that interested the Germans were those parts barring sexual relations and interbreeding as well as those that defined who was to be identified as members of the minority. Some states’ standards for “qualification” as a member of the minority (“one drop of blood”) indeed were so stringent that the Germans ultimately rejected those in favor of a system that gave a “pass” to candidates with only one Jewish grandparent who otherwise behaved themselves by not marrying Jews nor practicing the Jewish religion.

Aside from restriction of social/reproductive interactions with the “superior” majority, the Germans had other racialist goals that did not align quite so well with the aims of US laws, but that hardly rendered the American legislation irrelevant for the eager-to-learn Germans. For example, as Whitman repeatedly asserts, the goal of National Socialist racial policies was removal of Jews first from government, academia and the professions and then removal of the Jews from the territory of Germany. Ever since the death of Abraham Lincoln’s mass-deportation dream for emancipated Blacks, no such eventuality figured into American legislation: the Blacks were here to stay, and so had to be kept down (by the Whites). Removing them from government, academia and the professions was no issue beyond making sure to keep them out.

The antecedents to Germany’s “problem” vis-à-vis that of the United States were profoundly different. The objects of American policy were “up from slavery,” so to speak; the hapless victims (immigrated very much under duress, hardly of their own volition) had always been an underclass. The Jews, on the other hand, occupied socio-economic strata concentrated toward the middle and ranging upwards to the very peaks of German society and government. Removal from the upper strata was swift and straightforward; removal from the territory prior to the advent of eastward conquests in 1939 took the form of encouragement of emigration together with arrangements (the Haavara Agreement) with Zionists to support emigration specifically to Palestine. In that the latter was not a feature in any way enshrined in US law, Whitman gives it nary a mention.

Whitman does emphasize (again, repeatedly) that examples of this sort of law and regulation were nowhere to be found in the world for the inquiring Germans, except in scattered local traditions and practices in various colonial outposts of the British Empire. The United States was indeed the mother lode of such law and practice as the Germans sought to derive lessons from, albeit for reasons originally profoundly different from those impelling the Germans in the early and mid 1930s. One pervasive element at least of style, if not of substance, distinguishing American precedents from German imitations was the need of the pioneers, particularly in the southern states, to reconcile their aims with the equality and race-blind implications of the US Constitution, particularly its Fourteenth Amendment, in which slavery was abolished. Again, of course, slavery was not among the German antecedents to begin with, but the notions of racial “equality” at least before the law imparted a certain sub rosa quality to the American legislation that was altogether superfluous to the latter-day racists in Europe.

A subject such as the one of this book imposes an almost irresistible force upon the author to engage in German-bashing, up to and including the allegations of genocidal intent that form the noxious core of the common assaults upon the national nemesis of Jewry. Whitman admirably abjures it all, while at the same time avoiding the distastefully anodyne tone that can afflict such efforts when they are so scrupulously carried out. In a negative way, this phenomenon points to a very happy attribute that suffuses this text: Whitman is a serious, informative writer who manages at the same time to maintain an altogether engaging atmosphere in his writing. He does this entirely without artifice, without resort to tricks—at least, devices apparent to this reviewer—by means of which artificially to impart tension or arouse curiosity in the narrative. The story itself as rendered is quite sufficient to motivate brisk reading, without extraneous adornment.

On the other hand, this thorough, punctilious legal scholar does take the trouble to provide full context for the developments he reports. For example, what connection could there be between the famous 1935 incident aboard the North German Lloyd liner Bremen in New York harbor when a gang of communists stormed aboard and tore down the swastika banner on its bow, and the Nuremberg Laws? There most-definitely is a connection, and the author relates it clearly and carefully, and one comes away from the account with a renewed appreciation for the importance of what lately has acquired the label “path dependency.”

Photographs and reproductions of period maps round out this most-worthy account of a connection most would find surprising, and all could find informative in most-vital ways.

Abstract

I have been asked the question: Why do you think the German euthanasia program happened during World War II, but not the Holocaust? This article will show that the evidence for the German euthanasia program is overwhelming, while the evidence to support the Holocaust story is severely lacking.

Written Order

In August 1939, Hitler let it be known to his close associates that he approved any measure which could be seen as delivering incurable patients from pain and suffering. Probably in the late autumn or winter of 1939, Hitler backdated a document to Sept. 1, 1939, that authorized the euthanasia program. The authorization states:[\[1\]](#)

“Reich Leader Bouhler and Dr. Med Brandt are charged with the responsibility of enlarging the powers of specific physicians, designated by name, so that patients who, on the basis of human judgment, are considered incurable, can be granted mercy death after the most careful assessment of their condition.”

Historians have acknowledged that no similar document of a plan by Germany to exterminate European Jewry has ever been found. In his well-known book on the Holocaust, French-Jewish historian Leon Poliakov states that "...the campaign to exterminate the Jews, as regards its conception as well as many other essential aspects, remains shrouded in darkness." Poliakov adds that no documents of a plan for exterminating the Jews have ever been found because "perhaps none ever existed."<sup>[2]</sup> British historian Ian Kershaw states that when the Soviet archives were opened in the early 1990s:<sup>[3]</sup>

"Predictably, a written order by Hitler for the 'Final Solution' was not found. The presumption that a single, explicit written order had ever been given had long been dismissed by most historians."

The lack of a written order for the extermination of European Jewry led to Raul Hilberg's famous explanation of how the Holocaust happened:<sup>[4]</sup>

"What began in 1941 was a process of destruction not planned in advance, not organized centrally by any agency. There was no blueprint and there was no budget for destructive measures. They were taken step by step, one step at a time. Thus came about not so much a plan being carried out, but an incredible meeting of minds, a consensus mind reading by a far-flung bureaucracy."

On Jan. 16, 1985, under cross-examination at the first Ernst Zündel trial in Toronto, Raul Hilberg confirmed that he said these words.<sup>[5]</sup> Thus, Hilberg states that the so-called Holocaust was not carried out by a written order or plan, but rather by an incredible mind reading among far-flung German bureaucrats.

Defenders of the Holocaust story sometimes explain the absence of a written order to exterminate European Jewry by saying that the Nazis destroyed the evidence. However, an operation as big as the so-called Holocaust would have required written orders that would have been referred to in countless different ministerial bodies. It would have been impossible for all of these documents to have been completely destroyed at the end of the war. There would always have been carbon copies of the extermination order somewhere.[\[6\]](#)

Confessions of Defendants

The Doctors' Trial at Nuremberg, which opened on Dec. 9, 1946 and ended on July 19, 1947, tried German doctors for their participation in the euthanasia program. Dr. Karl Brandt readily admitted his involvement in the euthanasia program, since too many records and affidavits directly linked him to the killing operation. Brandt argued that the only rationale for the euthanasia program had been to free handicapped and incurably ill patients from suffering. Brandt considered his involvement in the euthanasia program authorized by Hitler to be absolutely legal.[\[7\]](#)

By contrast, none of the defendants at the Nuremberg trials stated that they knew anything about a program to exterminate Jews during the war. Hermann Göring, Hans Frank, Ernst Kaltenbrunner, Albert Speer, Gen. Alfred Jodl, and the other Nuremberg defendants all denied knowing anything of an extermination program of European Jewry. While such testimony is often dismissed as lying, the categorical and consistent nature of their testimony, sometimes by men who assumed they would be hanged, suggests that they are telling the truth.[\[8\]](#)

Hermann Göring in particular had no reason to lie about his lack of knowledge of a plan by Germany to exterminate European Jewry. As the highest ranking surviving Nazi, Göring's execution was certain. Göring told his wife Emmy to give up all hope that he would not be executed at Nuremberg.[\[9\]](#) Yet Göring repeatedly and emphatically denied any knowledge of the so-called Holocaust. Göring confided to American psychologist Dr. Gustave Gilbert in his jail cell at Nuremberg:[\[10\]](#)

“I wish I could have Himmler here – just for 10 minutes – to ask him what on earth he was up to out there.”

It is most unfortunate that Heinrich Himmler was a “suicide” while in British captivity. However, since Himmler was in a position to know the true story of the alleged Holocaust, it was not within the bounds of political possibility that Himmler live to testify at the Nuremberg trials.[\[11\]](#)

Discussion of Killing Methods

German doctors determined that carbon monoxide gas was the most painless and humane way to euthanize people. The use of carbon monoxide gas therefore became the standard technique to kill people in the adult euthanasia program, with the first killings probably beginning in January 1940. Dr. Karl Brandt, Albert Widmann, Dr. Leonardo Conti and others all stated that they determined carbon monoxide gas to be the most humane method of euthanizing adults.[\[12\]](#)

Dr. Karl Brandt wrote in his personal notebook:[\[13\]](#)

“Adolf Hitler asked me which method, based on current considerations and experiences, was the mildest, that is to say the safest, quickest and the most effective and painless one. I had to concede that this was death through the inhalation of carbon monoxide gas. He then said that this was also the most humane. I myself then took on board this position and put to one side my medical concerns for external reasons... I am convinced that the procedure with carbon monoxide was right.”

No such planning has been found regarding the use of homicidal gas chambers in German concentration camps. The Holocaust story claims that the first gassings occurred at Auschwitz using Zyklon B in September 1941. These gassings were allegedly done without any prior engineering considerations.[\[14\]](#) According to the officially accepted version of the Holocaust story, the SS at Auschwitz quickly built homicidal gas chambers that were capable of killing thousands of people out of ordinary buildings .[\[15\]](#)

This official version of the so-called Holocaust is pure nonsense. Homicidal gas chambers using Zyklon B cannot be built “on the fly” by SS men with no engineering background. This is shown by a comparison to the delousing chambers used in the German concentration camps. The German delousing chambers were patented by the German firm Degesch, involved extremely advanced engineering, and were carefully constructed to be gastight and safe for the operators.[\[16\]](#)

Feasibility of Killing Methods

Carbon-monoxide gas can be used to efficiently kill people in homicidal gas chambers. The dead bodies from the gassings can also be safely removed by personnel wearing only a gas mask. Richard von Hegener observed that patients in the euthanasia program would lose consciousness within two to three minutes of the gas entering the room. Within five minutes all of the patients had fallen into a “kind of sleep.” The gas was left running for half an hour before a physician, protected by a gas mask, entered the room, examined the bodies, and pronounced that all of the patients were dead.[\[17\]](#)

By contrast, Zyklon B cannot be safely used to kill large numbers of people in homicidal gas chambers. Dr. Robert Faurisson states in regard to Zyklon-B poisoning: “The corpse of a man who has just been killed by this powerful poison is itself a dangerous source of poisoning, and cannot be touched with bare hands. In order to enter the HCN-saturated chamber to remove the corpse, special gear is needed, as well as a gas mask with a special filter.”[\[18\]](#) The danger of touching someone killed with Zyklon-B gas is confirmed in the scientific literature.[\[19\]](#)

The alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau, and Majdanek could not have been used as homicidal gas chambers. The first scholar to make that observation was Dr. Robert Faurisson in the late 1970s.[\[20\]](#) He induced the American expert for execution technologies Fred Leuchter to come to similar conclusions in a 1988 study.[\[21\]](#) Leuchter’s research has since been revised, deepened and broadened by a number of subsequent technical studies coming to similar conclusions.[\[22\]](#)

The Diesel engines allegedly used at the Aktion Reinhardt camps of Treblinka, Belzec, and Sobibor also could not have been used to mass murder people as claimed either. The first to point this out was U.S. engineer Friedrich Paul Berg in a 1984 paper.[\[23\]](#) In a revised paper of 2000, Berg stated that for any Diesel arrangement to have been even marginally effective for mass murder, it would have required an exceptionally well-informed team of experts to know and do all that was necessary. Berg mentions that, even if someone had tried for a time to commit murder with Diesel exhaust, after a few tries it would have become apparent that something better was needed. Berg concludes that the evidence for Diesel gassings in the German concentration camps fails to meet the most basic standards that credible evidence must pass to satisfy reasonable people.[\[24\]](#)

After reading Berg's 1984 paper, Walter Lüftl, a prominent Austrian engineer and at that time the president of Austria's Association of Civil Engineers, confirmed in his own research paper that mass murder with Diesel-exhaust gasses is a sheer impossibility for reasons of time alone. Lüftl states in his report:[\[25\]](#)

“The laws of nature apply both to Nazis and anti-fascists. Nobody can be killed with diesel exhaust gas in the manner described [in the Holocaust literature].”

Public Knowledge

Public knowledge of the German euthanasia program was widespread in Germany. This public knowledge led to growing criticism from churches, the judiciary, and the state bureaucracy. Church leaders, and especially Bishop Clemens August Graf von Galen, made it internationally known that National-Socialist Germany was killing handicapped children and adults on an unprecedented scale. In a sermon on Aug. 3, 1941, Galen openly attacked the hypocrisy and the economic rationale for killing handicapped people. Instead of punishing Galen, Hitler ordered a stop to the euthanasia program on Aug. 24, 1941.[\[26\]](#)

By contrast, the German public was not aware of a program of extermination of European Jewry during the war. Nowhere in the archives, which contain mountains of intercepted cipher messages and the reports on bags of mail captured from enemy ships and from overrun enemy positions, is there the slightest evidence that a program of genocide against Jews was known by the German public.[\[27\]](#)

The German public became aware of the alleged genocide of European Jewry only when U.S. and British troops entered German concentration camps at the end of World War II. The horrific scenes of huge piles of dead bodies and emaciated and diseased surviving inmates were filmed and photographed for posterity by the U.S. Army Signal Corps. Films of the horrific scenes at the camps were made mandatory viewing for the vanquished populace of Germany, so that their national pride would be destroyed and replaced with feelings of collective guilt.

The tour of liberated concentration camps became a ritual in the occupied Germany of late April and early May. American officers forced local citizens and German POWs to view the camps. German civilians were paraded against their will in front of the sickening piles of dead bodies found in the German camps.[\[28\]](#)

What the general public was not told is that most of the inmates in these camps had died of typhus, typhoid, and other natural causes. None of the Allied autopsy reports shows that anyone died of poison gas. Also, contrary to publicized claims, no researcher has been able to document a German policy of extermination through starvation in the German camps. The virtual collapse of Germany's food, transport, and public-health systems and the extreme overcrowding in the German camps at the end of the war led to the catastrophe the Allied troops encountered when they entered the camps.

Other Considerations

Defenders of the Holocaust story inevitably raise eyewitness testimony as proof that the genocide of European Jewry happened. However, as I discussed elsewhere, eyewitness testimony to the so-called Holocaust is notoriously unreliable.[\[29\]](#)

The large number of Jewish survivors at the end of World War II also makes impossible a program of genocide against European Jewry. Dr. Arthur Robert Butz states in regard to the large number of Jewish survivors: “The simplest valid reason for being skeptical about the extermination claim is also the simplest conceivable reason; at the end of the war they were still there.”[\[30\]](#) Norman Finkelstein, the author of The Holocaust Industry, quotes his mother as asking:[\[31\]](#)

“If everyone who claims to be a Holocaust survivor actually is one, who did Hitler kill?”

Defenders of the Holocaust story also inevitably quote speeches from Adolf Hitler, Joseph Goebbels, and Heinrich Himmler or writings from Hitler, Goebbels, and Hans Frank to prove that Germany had an extermination program of Jews during the war. In fact, Himmler’s Posen speech of Oct. 4, 1943 has been called “the best evidence” to prove the Holocaust happened.[\[32\]](#) Himmler states in this speech:[\[33\]](#)

“I am referring here to the evacuation of the Jews, to the extermination of the Jewish people... it’s in our program, elimination of the Jews, extermination.”

Most translations of Himmler’s Posen speech assume that the German word “ausrotten” means murder or extermination. David Irving, who is very fluent in the German language, testified at the second Ernst Zündel trial that this is an incorrect translation of the word “ausrotten”:[\[34\]](#)

“There is no doubt that in modern Germany the word ausrotten now means murder. But we have to look at the meaning of the word ausrotten in the 1930s and 1940s, as used by those who wrote or spoke these documents. In the mouth of Adolf Hitler, the word ausrotten is never once used to mean murder, and I’ve made a study of that particular semantic problem. You can find document after document which Hitler himself spoke or wrote where the word ausrotten cannot possibly mean murder.”

Since Hitler never used the word “ausrotten” to mean murder, and since Hitler and Himmler spoke the same language, there is no reason to believe that Himmler was speaking about the murder of the Jews in his Posen speech.

Other defenders of the Holocaust story assume that the Nazis used code words such as “special treatment” to hide their genocide of European Jewry.[\[35\]](#) This theory does not explain why the Nazis used explicit written orders for all of their other crimes. For example, Heinrich Himmler authorized in writing many illegal human medical experiments and executions in the German concentration camps. Adolf Hitler’s other crimes including the euthanasia program were all made in writing. It is absurd to think that only the genocide of European Jewry was hidden behind code words, while all other German war crimes were clearly stated in writing.

Conclusion

The German euthanasia program is a well-documented reality. Hitler authorized the euthanasia program in writing, the defendants at the Doctors’ Trial admitted their involvement in the program, the best method for killing victims was discussed among the participants in the program, the carbon-monoxide gas used in the German euthanasia program can safely and effectively kill people, and the euthanasia program was widely known by the German public. In fact, public opposition to the program was so strong in Germany that Hitler ordered the end of the first phase of the euthanasia program in August 1941.

By contrast, the genocide of European Jewry is not well documented. No order has ever been found authorizing the mass murder of Europe's Jews. The German defendants at the main Nuremberg trial all stated they knew nothing about the so-called Holocaust. The Holocaust story absurdly states that the first gas chambers were built at Auschwitz using Zyklon B by SS personnel with no engineering experience. None of the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau, and Majdanek or the claimed diesel gas chambers at the Aktion Reinhardt camps of Treblinka, Belzec, and Sobibor could possibly have been used for mass murder. The alleged genocide of Jews was also not known by the German public during the war. The eyewitness testimony to the so-called Holocaust has consistently proven to be extremely unreliable. Finally, the large number of Jewish survivors at the end of the war makes impossible a program of genocide against European Jewry.

In conclusion, while the German euthanasia program is a well-documented reality, the Holocaust story is a fraud. Dr. Arthur Robert Butz has aptly stated:[\[36\]](#)

“The ‘Holocaust’ is such a gigantic fraud that it is a cornucopia of absurdities.”

Genoud, Heim & Picker's "Table Talk": A Study in Academic Fraud & Scandal

by Veronica Clark

Abstract

Hitler's Table Talk is a worthless primary source. There, I said it. And I'm not just saying this to evoke a reaction. I'm saying it because I really mean it. The renowned "Hitler expert" Lord Dacre, better known as Hugh Trevor-Roper, knowingly and willingly engaged in a massive cover-up regarding Hitler's Table Talk (hereafter TT).<sup>[1]</sup> Had it not been for the outstanding research at the low cost of just $50 taken up by historian Richard Carrier,<sup>[2]</sup> we might still be in the dark about this, 64 years after TT's first appearance in the English language. Sorry to bust this bubble, Hitler and Third Reich enthusiasts, but TT is worthless. In this article, I will establish three things: 1) that Hugh Trevor-Roper knowingly and willingly engaged in academic fraud for profit and prestige, 2) that TT is a worthless primary source, and 3) that renowned Hitler "experts", both revisionist and mainstream, have failed the public regarding reliable Hitler primary sources.

Whose "Table Talks"?

Before we commence, a brief word about the texts in question is necessary. The so-called "table talks" were written down by Martin Bormann's aides, Heinrich Heim and Henry Picker, from 1941 to 1944. Aside from Heim and Picker, there are two more "table talk" authors, Bormann himself, "who contributed at least four entries, and a man known only as Müller."<sup>[3]</sup>

Mr. Picker was the first to publish his "table talks," and he did so in German only. They were published as Tischgespräche im Führerhauptquartier 1941–1942, in 1951 and 1963, respectively. His book included some of Heim's notes that he happened to come across, and which he then altered for his book.

According to Swedish historian Mikael Nilsson, François Genoud, whom we will discuss later, published the first volume of a French version of the "table talks" a year later, following that up with a second volume in 1954. This French version (henceforth LP)<sup>[4]</sup> "was not based on the same German original as Picker's... but on a second manuscript that had purportedly been acquired by Genoud, the so-called Bormann-Vermerke" (henceforth B-V)<sup>[5]</sup>. And even though the "form, content and provenance of the [B-V] remain obscure,"<sup>[6]</sup> historian David Irving attested to this manuscript's authenticity nonetheless.<sup>[7]</sup> Adds Nilsson, LP eventually contained both Heim's and Picker's notes in subsequent volumes and editions. Genoud then had LP translated into English, by which time it had been "expanded to cover the whole period from 1941 to the end of 1944, and to include all of Heim's and Picker's notes said to have been in Genoud's possession."<sup>[8]</sup>

Writes Nilsson in this regard:<sup>[9]</sup>

"The German text, which the French and English editions are said to be based upon, was, for reasons that are unclear, not published until 1980. It was given the title Monologe im Führerhauptquartier... This edition does not contain Picker's notes either due to a struggle over intellectual property rights. It does not help that both Heim's and Picker's original manuscripts seem to have been lost. (Emphasis added)

So far, Mr. Carrier is the only historian who has compared these various "table talks" in a systematic way. His conclusions have exposed the English and French "table talks" as "highly questionable," particularly if they are based on the same manuscript used for Genoud's Monologe. The English "table talks," Carrier reveals, are based in whole or part on Genoud's LP, "and... both the English and French editions contain additions to, and mistranslations of, the German texts that they are supposedly based on." Nilsson himself "address[es] certain questions related to the authenticity of the B-V, as well as the accuracy of the translations,"<sup>[10]</sup> all of which is pertinent to most historians' claim that Hitler is the author/originator of the "table talks." As we will soon see, he was not.<sup>[11]</sup>

Indeed, there is a whole lot of mystery and very little certainty surrounding "Hitler's" supposed "table talks."

Hugh Trevor-Roper's Failings

Let's begin with Hugh Trevor-Roper. Contrary to his respectable and honest public image, Trevor-Roper knowingly and willingly engaged in deception and fraud behind the scenes. The Hitler Diaries, proven to be a fraud, were not a unique fail for Trevor-Roper. In fact, as Nilsson has demonstrated, Trevor-Roper had a long trail of academic fails that he hid from the public eye.

His first fail is The Testament of Adolf Hitler,<sup>[12]</sup> also known as Hitlers politisches Testament, first published in French in 1959, and in English in 1961. David Irving and other historians such as Ian Kershaw, exposed this document, which was "acquired" and doctored by the notorious NS apologist and document peddler François Genoud, as a fraud. A fake. One look at the doctored text should have dissuaded Trevor-Roper from even considering its authentication and subsequent publication:

anzurufen und beschwören, damit die Teilungslinien nicht blieben hätte England ganz im Gegenteil die Einigung Europas zulassen; was nicht geschehen sollte. Mit einem vereinigten
Europa verbünden, hätte die Welt die Möglichkeit erhalten, eine Schiedsrichtersache in den Angelegenheiten der Welt zu spielen.
Es scheint aber doch, als wolle die Vorsehung, die die Welt für die schrecklichen Verbrechen bestrafen wollen, die es im Laufe seiner Geschichte begangen hat, jene Verbrechen, die seine Größe waren. Das Auftreten Churchills in einer Zeit, die für England wie für Europa entscheidend war, ist die Strafe, die die Vorsehung gegen England ausgesprochen hat, so wie auch eben der Mann, den die degenerierte Elite Englands erwählte, diesem sanilen Tyrannen zu vorbehalten, um entschieden zu das Schicksal eines gewaltigen Imperiums und gleichzeitigen Europas zu bestimmen. Man muss sich selbst fragen, ob das britische Volk heute die Verantwortung übernehmen sollte, die es durch die Eigenschaften besitzt hat, die seine allherrschende Stellung im Weltreich ausmachen. Wenn man dieser Verantwortung nicht gewillt ist, dann muss man sich fragen, ob auf die Fehler seiner Führer hätte sein können, trotz der Warnungen an Gelegenheiten wahrhaftig hat, die dem Unglücksgraben den kühnen neuen und kühnen Weg erschließen.
England hätte die Möglichkeit gehabt
Wenn es das wollte hätte es im Anfang 1941 möglich gemacht den Krieg abzuwenden. Es hätte seinen Widerstands-führer nicht durch das Orde von St. Michael und St. George auftrag über London unter dem Namen "General" gestellt, sondern aufgedeckt die entscheidenden Niederlagen der Wehrmacht in Nordafrika und Osteuropa. In diesem Fall hätte die Welt keine Verbrechen mehr erlebt. Das traditionelle England hätte auch Frieden gesucht und über die Juden haben es nicht erlaubt. Ihre Helfershelfer Churchill und Roosevelt hätten dem nicht zugehört.
Ein Frieden im Frühjahr 1941 wäre ein letztes Gelegenheit gewesen.
Dann hätte die Welt Frieden erhalten und es wäre verhindert dass die Amerikaner ihre Mission in die Angelegenheiten Europas hinein sichteten, das sich, unter Führung des Reiches, schnell gewinnen würde. Nachdem das jüdische Volk einmal beseitigt war, wäre es leicht gewesen, Frankreich und Italien, ein nach dem anderen, um ein Hand auf dem Balkan und in den Mittelmeerraum zu legen. Die europäischen Angelegenheiten durch die beiden germanischen Mächte gewöhnten, hätten sich leicht abfinden lassen. Das eine ist die andere hätte auf eine Großmachtspolitik verzichten müssen, die nicht mehr zeitgemäß war. Die Welt hätte sich auf ihre Angelegenheiten~~

Figure 1. "This is a passage of the typescript of Hitlers Politisches Testament, as published by Albrecht Knaus Verlag, Munich, despite warnings from Mr Irving: the typescript, given to David Irving by Genoud, is largely written by Genoud himself (handwriting). David Irving has deposited this typescript with the Institut für Zeitgeschichte, Munich (Sammlung Irving)." [13]

Yet, publish it he did.

Unlike Trevor-Roper, Irving even compared the marginal handwriting to that of Genoud in a letter he had received from him. It is a perfect match:

Irving noted in this regard:[\[15\]](#)

“In 1979, Genoud phoned Mr Irving at his Paris hotel, and said: ‘I have a gift for you.’ He handed him a package. It contained a copy of the complete typescript of the Testament. The package gift from Genoud raised a new problem. Every page was heavily amended and expanded in somebody’s hand-writing. Mr Irving, astonished, asked Genoud whose was the writing. Genoud admitted it was his own. Later still, he admitted in conversation with Mr Irving that the entire typescript was his own confection, saying: ‘But it is just what Hitler would have said, isn’t it?’”

Et tu, Mr. Irving?

It is a mystery, then, why Irving failed to subject TT[\[16\]](#) to the same degree of scrutiny that he aptly applied to The Testament, and later on to the Hitler Diaries. Nilsson writes of Irving, Trevor-Roper, and the fraudulent Testament:[\[17\]](#)

“[... W]hen answering a question regarding this point coming from David Irving in late 1967 (Irving thought it was a forgery) [Trevor-Roper] stated that the style and context, Bormann’s signature, and Genoud’s story about how the document came to him, and the fact that Trevor-Roper could not see the motives for Genoud to produce a forgery, all pointed towards authenticity. Trevor-Roper did admit, though, that it was difficult to penetrate the mind of the perfect forger, and that highly qualified scholars had devoted enormous amounts of time to producing forgeries for nothing more than the private satisfaction of having fooled the experts. Because of this, Trevor-Roper wrote, one could not ‘reason confidently in such a matter’. As the evidence stood, however, he was inclined to believe it was genuine. Nevertheless, in public Trevor-Roper did in fact ‘reason confidently’ with regard to Genoud’s documents; in fact he never even hinted at any doubts or problems relating to them. By May 1969, after thinking about Irving’s objections a good deal, he had become even surer about its authenticity.” (Emphasis added)

We now know that Genoud, who lied to Trevor-Roper and to Mr. Irving’s faces about the authenticity of The Testament, also lied about the authenticity of his TT. Genoud (and partner Hans Rechenberg) told historian and sociologist Eduard Baumgarten, whom Genoud was also trying to hoodwink into accepting The Testament as authentic,[\[18\]](#)

“that Trevor-Roper had brought with him a colleague from Oxford who had examined the photocopy and concluded it was genuine. The photocopy had been returned the same day, according to Genoud and Rechenberg... However, this was a lie (and it was not the only lie about this meeting they had fed to Baumgarten). Trevor-Roper had not brought anyone with him and he had only been allowed to see the document in the hotel in Paris.”

What, then, could possibly have compelled Mr. Irving to write the following unequivocal endorsement of TT, when in fact he had doubted The Testament's authenticity[19] contrary to the opinion of Trevor-Roper (who had likely deceived Mr. Irving, as suggested by Nilsson's assessment of their exchanges concerning The Testament)[20].

About TT's authenticity, Irving writes on his website:[21]

“HITLER'S Table Talk comes from the original Bormann Vermerke which the late François Genoud purchased from Bormann's widow Gerda Bormann. They were actually typed from notes taken by the stenographer Heinrich Heim, whom I interviewed and who confirmed the procedure in detail. Each day's entry was initialled by Bormann at the end. They are genuine, in the first person, and highly reliable.[22]

2. Henry Picker took over as Bormann's secretary/adjutant from Heim. He found a lot of Heim's notes in his desk and rewrote them in reported speech and published them and his own notes as Hitlers Tischgespräche. Good, but less reliable.”

This is untrue. Heim's notes have never been authenticated, so Irving cannot possibly claim they “are genuine.” The notes are not in the “first person.” If Heim told Irving they were, then Heim lied. Indeed, Heim testified in court that he rarely took any notes while in Hitler's presence, and most were written the next day or even days later based on his memory. As such, they are not “highly reliable.” We have Mr. Nilsson to thank for exposing all this. Without the following testimony from Heim, we might still be in the dark and dependent on Irving's faulty assessment.

“[... N]one of the material in the Table Talk consists of the words of Hitler. No one was stenographically recording what he said as he said it. Rather, Heim and Picker, separately, simply hung out with Hitler during these rants, and then the next day wrote down their own thoughts about what he had said (as if in Hitler's voice). So these are actually the words of Picker and Heim—not Hitler. (And in some cases of Martin Bormann, as the Monologe explicitly shows some entries and alterations were made by him.) Worse, after Heim wrote down his thoughts a day later based on his loose memory of what he thought Hitler said (which means in Heim's own words, not actually Hitler's), and had them typed out, he then went back and hand-wrote lengthy and elaborate changes and additions. Those revisions appear in the Monologe, but not in Picker's edition.”

At least we can thank Mr. Heim, post facto, for embellishing his original “first person in Hitler's own words” notes. Had he not done this we might never have caught this fraud. As well, we might still be wading through dark waters had Mr. Henry Picker not appropriated Heim's notes and claimed them as his own. At any rate, this whole scandalous fiasco has been blown wide open with all the courtroom testimony surrounding intellectual-property rights and TT, which only Nilsson has examined to date.

“[...] Those changes and additions were not the words of Hitler. They were just more things in afterthought, sometimes days or weeks later, Heim wanted to add. But even the original drafts were not literally the words of Hitler. Picker thought Heim had been transcribing live dictation because Picker found (and used for his edition) Heim’s stenographic notes. But Heim testified in court that he only wrote his notes down in steno the next day, from memory (and sometimes some scribbled notes to himself on the occasion of a rant). Picker never knew that Heim had then typed them out (producing a slightly different German text even where Picker and Monologue agree, thus explaining those deviations) and then revised them further from his own handwritten notes—producing a more final edition under the also-meddling hand of Martin Bormann. It is that latter that came into Genoud’s possession, and was eventually published as the Monologue. Thus, more or less, all the discrepancies are now explained.”

May I ask again how Mr. Irving can possibly proclaim that TT is “genuine, in the first person, and highly reliable”? He was right about the Hitler Diaries being fraudulent, contrary to the “expert opinion” of Lord Dacre who had stunningly based its authentication on its own internal validity. In other words, because it sounded like Hitler, well, it must be Hitler! When the paper was later tested and the fraud exposed, Lord Dacre’s prestige took a massive blow. Imagine if Irving or some other notable historian, whether revisionist or mainstream, had exposed Lord Dacre’s other frauds? The fact that Trevor-Roper had two strikes against him – The Testament fraud and the Hitler Diaries fraud – ought to have raised many more eyebrows than have been raised vis-à-vis TT. Yet, where are the critics other than Mr. Carrier and Mr. Nilsson? We still have someone touting the TT in its own dedicated podcast series, Episodes 1 through 56. One revisionist writes on her website:[\[25\]](#)

“• How trustworthy is this text, since Martin Bormann assigned two of his aides to take the notes during meals, then turn them over to him for ‘checking’ and safekeeping;

• Why it is valuable to study this book;

• Questions about the translation and translators – for example, did François Genoud tamper with the parts about Christianity;

• Of those offended by this book, Christians are #1 on the list, complaining that it does not agree with Hitler’s ‘public record’ of positive remarks about Christianity in earlier years;

• David Irving and Albert Speer both confirmed that these recorded talks are authentically Hitler; Richard Carrier disagrees;

• Next week we’ll begin reading the text.”

Indeed, the only aspect of TT with which most National Socialists disagree is a few select entries about Christianity. Everything else is “legit” in their collective opinion. TT remains the most highly valued text next to Mein Kampf, also the result of extensive editing and external influence (such as that of Rudolf Hess and Max Amann)[\[26\]](#), in the White-Nationalist, Hitler-worshipping community. We therefore owe it to these groups, and to the public at large, to tell them the truth about this text. It is not the words of Adolf Hitler.

Again, I hope that Mr. Irving was simply (and naively) duped into accepting TT as reliable by Heinrich Heim and Hugh Trevor-Roper.[\[27\]](#) I hope that Irving went along with Heim's claims and Trevor-Roper's opinion because he really believed these two men. Otherwise, if Irving was ever privy to either man's lies or doubts, then he is equally guilty of fraud for the sake of profit and prestige.

At any rate, now that the "cat's out of the bag," Mr. Irving needs to announce the truth about TT. He needs to admit that Heim lied to him about his "authentic" notes. Irving owes it to the revisionist community, which places much faith in his scholarship and opinion. Irving will not be hurt by this. Irving initially correctly suspected two frauds before anyone else did: the Hitler Diaries (forged by Konrad Kujau) and The Testament (forged by François Genoud). He can afford to have been incorrect about TT, because nearly every historian was (and still is). The only person who stands to be ruined by these revelations is Trevor-Roper. Trevor-Roper lied about no fewer than three Hitler primary sources: The Testament, the Hitler Diaries, and Table Talk.

The most likely explanation for Irving's endorsement of TT above is that he was effectively deceived and influenced by the 'expert opinion' of Hugh Trevor-Roper and other mainstream historians who likewise accepted it,[\[28\]](#) with or without question. Much to his credit, Irving doubted The Testament's authenticity from the get-go, and he had informed Trevor-Roper of his doubts; but he appears to have been persuaded otherwise by Trevor-Roper regarding TT. How else could Mr. Irving endorse a Genoud document which had no original manuscript to back it? Nilsson's research uncovered that there is no original German manuscript for TT as it currently exists. The English edition of TT is in fact a mish-mash of Genoud's French version (which was back-translated into German!), 40 pages of Heim's notes (which have not yet been authenticated),[\[29\]](#) and Henry Picker's notes and embellishments of some of Heim's notes (also for which there is no original manuscript). The only original transcripts we have are a stack of 40 pages of stenographer Heinrich Heim's notes, which were seized by the Allies and placed in the Library of Congress.

It is possible that Mr. Irving has an alternative motive for accepting TT as totally reliable, but unless he states his motive publicly, the above is my best guess. He was convinced by Trevor-Roper's endorsement of it based on Trevor-Roper's claim to have seen and authenticated the German original. In fact, Trevor-Roper lied about ever seeing and authenticating an original of TT.[\[30\]](#)

Mr. Carrier, perhaps a shrewder and bolder critic of Lord Dacre, unabashedly writes on his website:[\[31\]](#)

“[W...]hen Trevor-Roper lists problems with the text [in his introductory TT essay “The Mind of Adolf Hitler”], he does not mention that the French was used anywhere in it or that there was anything problematic about the translation process at all. Indeed, in the original preface from 1953, no mention was made even of there being a French edition, much less that one was used at any point instead of the original German—which is a remarkable thing to omit.”

“Well, Thank You, Dr. Carrier”

We will now address how we have been let down, “bigly”, by revisionists and mainstream historians alike. Had it not been for a simple request to expose a few suspect

Hitler quotes about Christianity back in 2003, we might still be “in the dark” about TT. Mr. Carrier writes pertaining to this:[\[32\]](#)

“When I discovered that in fact the English was coming from the French, for all entries that at the time existed in French, all the leading experts I consulted were surprised by my findings: all the peer reviewers and editors at GSR [German Studies Review]; Gerhard Weinberg, author of the famous 1952 Guide to Captured German Documents (the expert I spoke to on German documents in preparing the GSR article at the advice of GSR’s editor); Richard Steigmann-Gall, historian and expert on Hitler’s religious beliefs, and author of the book that now cites me; and of course Dr. Mikael Nilsson; but even, sort of, Hugh Trevor-Roper himself.”

I myself noticed, after consulting Pastor V. S. Herrell’s The Real Hitler,[\[33\]](#) that Hitler was literally contradicting himself from day to day. This was especially noticeable relating to the subject of women and Christianity in TT. Hitler did tailor his remarks to his audience, true. And he contradicted himself on occasion like we all do. But the anti-woman and anti-Christian statements he allegedly made during his table talks were too much even for Hitler admirers! Even they suspected that something was amiss. I did too. In fact, I wrote a few essays on the subject of TT and Hitler’s Christianity back in 2006 when I still had my “Adolf Hitler Research Society” website.

As well, I wondered how it was that Louis Kilzer could claim that Bormann had insisted upon the utmost secrecy when recording Hitler’s words. Hitler could not know under any circumstances, writes Kilzer in Hitler’s Traitor. If Heim and Picker (and for a brief time Werner Koeppen, according to Toland and Kilzer) had been taking their notes in Hitler’s presence and in the first person, then how could they possibly conceal what they were doing? It didn’t make sense to me. But now we know from Heim’s court testimony, and from the research of Nilsson, that neither Heim nor Picker ever took but a few select notes in Hitler’s presence. Heim testified that he wrote his notes the next day or days later, and that Bormann signed off on them as though they were Hitler’s own words. Aside from an occasional scribble on a piece of note paper made in Hitler’s presence, they were never Hitler’s words, but the words of Heim and Picker simply recalling what Hitler had said (or what they thought he said). Since Picker’s notes are based in part on Heim’s stolen notes, which were then embellished and altered, neither man’s notes can be said to be the words of Adolf Hitler. The truth is that Picker’s and Heim’s notes are no more reliable or true to Hitler himself than the recollections of any of Hitler’s adjutants, such as Heinz Linge, Traudl Junge, Christa Schroeder, Otto Wagener, Kurt Luedecke, Ernst Hanfstaengl, etc. All of these recollections are based on human memory and notes that were occasionally written down for later reference. Albert Speer testified to Bormann occasionally jotting such notes; Otto Wagener claimed to have jotted down such notes; and Heinrich Heim admitted that he had only sometimes taken notes as Hitler spoke.

Repercussions of this Scandal

The collapse of TT and its exposure as a fraud makes the actual stenographic record of Hitler’s military conferences and utterings more valuable, along with his speeches behind closed doors. Two documents which come to mind include Hitler’s 1944 speech to officers and generals at Platterhof[\[34\]](#) and the published text Hitler and His Generals.[\[35\]](#)

In any case, Nilsson nailed it when he wrote, “it is not clear who the real author” of TT is. “We simply do not know how much of it is Hitler’s words as they were spoken, and how much is a product of the later recollection and editing process.”[36]

And that’s the final word on TT as a primary source. It is worthless until every single original manuscript upon which it is based has been located and authenticated insofar as that is even possible, systematically assessed by a team of Hitler experts, freshly collated to include also the notes taken by Werner Koeppen, and then retranslated (into English, etc.)

As Richard Carrier astutely concludes:[37]

“Here we have, within literally just days, the actual words of Hitler being distorted and filtered through the faulty memories, wishes and interpretations, and deliberate alterations, of several parties. And this was not even oral transmission, but in writing! Picker relayed slightly different memories than Heim’s, and even relayed the incomplete memories of Heim, who was continuing to ‘alter the text’ after transmitting an earlier version of it to Picker. And then, within mere years, less than a decade in fact, these distorted texts were altered even further, when they were translated into other languages.”

Picker & Heim’s “Table Talks” Must Be Checked against Koeppen’s Notes

Neither Carrier’s nor Nilsson’s assessments include the steno notes purportedly taken by Werner Koeppen, Alfred Rosenberg’s FHQ[38] liaison. Author Louis Kilzer writes[39] that Koeppen jotted notes while Hitler spoke, including top-secret military information. If true, any future editions of TT must be checked against Koeppen’s notes for the sake of validity. Depending on which person was taking notes while Koeppen was also present before Hitler, his – i.e., Picker’s or Heim’s notes – notes should match closely with those of Koeppen if they are to be accepted as reliable. Otherwise, future editions must admit, readily and openly in the introduction, that TT is uncorroborated and therefore unreliable as an account of Hitler’s own words. All entries based on Genoud’s French manuscript must be eliminated from any future editions.

Since I have not yet been able to examine the book that appears to contain Koeppen’s notes, I am not sure who authenticated them—if anyone has. Historian John Toland appears to have taken Koeppen seriously, as he references him extensively in his Hitler biography.

Toland writes of Koeppen:[40]

“Since early July [1941], at Rosenberg’s behest, he had been circumspectly recording the Führer’s table conversations. Koeppen assumed Hitler knew what he was doing and would furtively jot down notes on his paper napkin, then immediately after the meal write out only those parts of the conversation he could distinctly remember. An original and one copy of his records were forwarded to Berlin by courier.”

Kilzer believes that Koeppen was a spy with possibly nefarious intent.[41] While I am unsure about this, I do find it odd that an unnamed “courier” was passing on secret notes to Berlin which included “military matters.” Heim’s notes contained no military information “for security,” as he would later assert. However, there are more relevant problems with Koeppen’s and Heim’s claims as documented by Toland. For instance, Koeppen “assumed Hitler knew what he [Koeppen] was doing,” but according to historian Ian Kershaw, who also attests to the validity of TT, Hitler's secretaries never noticed any direct notetaking going on in Hitler's presence.

Nilsson writes in footnote 60 of his article:[\[42\]](#)

“Ian Kershaw states that the ‘tone of the monologues is unmistakably Hitler’ [!] But he also notes that Hitler's many secretaries seem to have been unaware of these being taken down by anyone. At least one of them questioned their authenticity although she thought it might be a compilation of Hitler's thoughts. She even ruled out the possibility of Bormann having recorded Hitler's words precisely because of the fact that Hitler hated ad verbatim records of his off the cuff statements.”

Wow. Now we have to question Mr. Kershaw's expertise as well as Koeppen's reliability. And, of course, Koeppen's one and only book[\[43\]](#) must be carefully scrutinized to determine how useful it is as a record of what Hitler allegedly said. I cannot say whether there is an original, authenticated Koeppen manuscript. If there is one, it needs to be checked against his book. In addition, Koeppen's original manuscript and subsequent book must be established as reliable or not. If it is reliable, it would serve as an excellent comparison text in relation to Heim's and Picker's notes. There is still much work to be done.

In Biography, Toland avows that Koeppen's notes corroborate Heim's. Perhaps they do,[\[44\]](#) but this avowal by Toland brings up a second problem with his (Toland's) reliance on Heim. Toland claims that Heim took down “copious notes on index cards which he hid in his lap” because he “wanted more accurate results” than Martin Bormann had requested.[\[45\]](#) Bormann explicitly requested that Heim “rely on his memory” so that “Hitler wouldn't know” he was being clandestinely recorded. Why, then, did Heim attest in court under oath that he recorded his notes the next day and even significantly embellished them post facto? “[Heim's extensive] revisions appear in the Monologe, but not in Picker's edition,” writes Carrier. He then adds that[\[46\]](#)

“[...] Heim testified in court that he only wrote his notes down in steno the next day, from memory (and sometimes some scribbled notes to himself on the occasion of a rant). Picker never knew that Heim had then typed them out (producing a slightly different German text even where Picker and Monologe agree, thus explaining those deviations) and then revised them further from his own handwritten notes—producing a more final edition under the also-meddling hand of Martin Bormann.”

We can only conclude from this that Heim lied and that Toland believed his lies. Again, it is a scholarly blessing that Picker decided to steal some of Heim's original notes and include them in his book as his own recordings, otherwise we might never have exposed Heim as the serial fabricator he was.

Concluding remarks

We have now come full circle in this article. We have established that Hugh Trevor-Roper (Lord Dacre) knowingly and willingly lied to the public for the sake of profit and personal prestige as the world's foremost “Hitler expert.”

We learn this from Genoud himself (in a letter to Lord Dacre):[\[47\]](#)

“The only thing that should count is, in my opinion, the historical value of these documents that we are talking about. Accordingly, it seems to me to be essential that your testimony can be put forth. You are unanimously recognized as the most qualified specialist in this matter, and I am sure that your objective opinion would have immense weight.”

And it did.

Here is my own assessment of TT while I was studying for my bachelor’s degree. I naively trusted the ‘establishment expertise’ of Lord Dacre like millions of other students worldwide—all duped by this fraud.

I had written on my former website back in 2006:[\[48\]](#)

“The table talks may portray a Hitler who had qualms with church and clergy, but they do not at all portray an agnostic, atheistic, or non-Christian Hitler. The table talks are most likely absolutely genuine. The only table talks that have been disputed, as to their credibility, are the final 1945 table talks. They are sold as a book entitled, The Testament of Adolf Hitler: The Hitler-Bormann Documents. These are the only table talks that might qualify as embellished or fraudulent... Moreover, it is my belief that historian Hugh Trevor-Roper would have been privy to fraudulent documents. He was certainly a credible and high quality historian. His discretion can be trusted over most others. I must say, though, that he did not notice that the so-called ‘Hitler diaries’ were written on new age paper; also, he overlooked the fact that Hitler never wrote anything down. So, he is not totally reliable, but mostly reliable. Historian David Irving exposed the fraudulent diaries, and he claims that the final 1945 table talks are fraudulent.” (Emphasis added)

As we can all see, I too trusted the expertise and word of Hugh Trevor-Roper.

Next, we have exposed the TT as a worthless primary source.[\[49\]](#) Nilsson judiciously concludes that “it is not clear who the real author of the words printed in these books is. We simply do not know how much of it is Hitler’s words as they were spoken, and how much is a product of the later recollection and editing process.” Unless and until this is resolved, the TT must be discarded as a genuine primary source. It has never been genuine.

Fortunately, I came across the excellent work of the “two Richards”, Richard Steigmann-Gall (author of The Holy Reich[\[50\]](#)) and Richard Carrier (author of “Hitler’s Table Talk: Troubling Finds”[\[51\]](#)). I owe it to these two researchers that I myself began to seriously question the authenticity of TT.

After reading the work of these two, I wrote on my website the following analysis of TT and its obvious problems:[\[52\]](#)

“Issues with Bormann’s Table-Talk”

Even though there is a marked duality in Hitler’s thoughts regarding the Christian religion within the various table talks, one cannot help but affirm that he maintained a consistent, positive, enthusiastic, and conciliatory attitude toward Christianity—at least up until the point of the table talks, as recorded by Martin Bormann.

[...] As a final point on this matter, the anticlerical, anti-paganist, anti-Christian, Martin Bormann ‘was indeed motivated not by a committed ideological opposition to Christianity, but by an attempt to outdo other Nazis, to shame them and thereby bring them under his control. His extremism transgressed the views of radicals like Rosenberg and even Hitler himself and seemed at times to flirt with atheism. In his attempted forays into ideology, he never mentioned Jesus, Luther, or positive Christianity [he was careful to avoid certain topics, obviously]. He seems to have outdone the party's anti-Christians at their own game. Given the many attempts within the party to curb him, it is safe to conclude that, without Bormann, Nazism would not have received quite the same anti-Christian reputation. He remained a party functionary first and foremost. His obsession with the churches, although very real, was as much about asserting his position in the party as it was about a true ideological commitment to Nazism. The singularity of this obsession, most likely based on a febrile need for Hitler's affection and a mounting hatred for his in-laws, arguably constituted a departure from Nazism as much as its most radical expression.' [53]"

And we have this similar analysis from my website back in 2006:[54]

“Hitler according to Martin Bormann’s Hitler’s Table-Talk: 1941-1944, Orig. pub. date 1953, this edition 2000, intro. by Hugh Trevor-Roper

Martin Bormann’s stenographically recorded memoirs are not completely reliable for a few notable reasons. Firstly, Bormann was a staunch and rabid anti-Christian. He was personally responsible for attacks against the Churches during Hitler’s presidency, along with Alfred Rosenberg. But even Rosenberg was not as opposed to the Churches as Bormann had been. Bormann is also known to have withheld numerous Jewish clemency applications from Hitler because he did not want them to get through to the Führer [see Bryan Rigg’s Hitler’s Jewish Soldiers].

Secondly, Bormann oftentimes interjected his own commentary here and there throughout these ‘table-talks.’ Thus, we have to assume that he may have altered some of the arguments allegedly put forth by Hitler. These conversations were subject to Bormann’s personal alteration, deletion, and manipulation after they were recorded. They should be read with caution, just as Robert McNamara’s In Retrospect should be read with caution. Indeed, Mr. McNamara cleverly indicts everyone in the Johnson administration—including the Joint Chiefs, whose job it was to win the Vietnam War—except himself.

Additionally, Hitler never attacks so many people or subjects—namely Jews and Christianity—with such virulent vehemence as he does in this particular set of memoirs. Bormann’s memoirs remain in stark opposition and contradiction to dozens of other sets of memoirs, many of which were written by individuals who had no reason to portray a decent portrait of Hitler.

Furthermore, Hitler is not portrayed as [as] eloquent a speaker as he had been in other memoirs. He comes off as somewhat crude and roughshod in this tract; thus, one may confidently assume that the stenographer left out a good portion of what Hitler had actually said. Numerous accounts of Hitler’s incredible speaking ability and eloquent conversational standards can affirm this.

Lastly, we have to be careful with regards to translation. Translators are also subject to their own personal biases and, oftentimes, they will choose the wrong word or phrase, or an inaccurate word or phrase for the English translation. One example that comes to mind is the difference between the translation of the German term that Hitler had used in Mein Kampf, versus, the term used in his personal notes, to describe the situation in the Rhineland while it was under French occupation. Ralph Mannheim translated Hitler's term as N*ggerization (in Mein Kampf), whereas Werner Maser translated Hitler's term as Negrification (in Hitler's Letters and Notes). Any intelligent person can see that there is a stark difference between these two terms. So, bear in mind, the translator of Table-Talk may have also allowed his own personal bias, against Hitler's person, to affect his English translation."

Not bad for a bachelor's-level writer. My egoism aside, I was not far off in my assessment. In fact, not even Nilsson lets Lord Dacre's translator off the hook. With reference to this he writes:[55]

"Apparently [...] Stevens was not as good a translator as they thought. Weidenfeld [the publisher of TT] used him also for the translation of the Bormann letters only a little over half a year later but then felt obliged to correct his translations by using another translator. 'Mr. Weidenfeld considers the translation now to be reliable as Col. Stevens's version has been entirely revised by, I believe, Ilsa Barea', said a letter then from the publisher to Trevor-Roper. However, Trevor-Roper still thought there were mistranslations, something that worried the publisher quite a bit." (Emphasis added)

But this isn't the only alarming aspect of TT's byzantine translation process. Stevens was likely a fine German-to-English translator, but when Lord Dacre compared his translation with Heim's and Picker's

German notes, he must have balked at the numerous incongruities. Indeed, Stevens never referred to an "original manuscript," but only to "the original German." [56] Apparently that "original German" was Genoud's own back-translated version based on his French edition. This is the only logical explanation as to why one of the German editions, the one that Stevens must have worked from, [57] perfectly matched Genoud's French edition. Lord Dacre was allegedly "hoodwinked" by this back-translated edition. [58] Now it makes sense why Genoud demanded that Lord Dacre and his team agree to the following stipulation: [59]

"III. The translation into English will be made on the basis of the French version by François Genoud and it is agreed that the licensor will permit the translator appointed by the licensee to examine at any time in Switzerland the original German version insofar as this is required by the work of translation." (Emphasis added)

Since Genoud authorized consulting "the original German" in the proviso above, it is probable that Stevens used it. And this would have been Genoud's back-translated German edition, which, like the English edition Stevens was working on, was also "made on the basis of the French version by François Genoud." [60] If this conclusion is correct, then Genoud effectively made fools of them all.

Nilsson similarly concludes: [61]

"[It] appears to be that the translation was not checked against Genoud's original manuscript but against a different German text, one that Genoud most likely had re-translated into German from his French version [...Publisher] Weidenfeld never said that the text had been checked against the Bormann-Vermerke, but only that it had been checked against ‘the original German’.” (Emphasis original)

In conclusion, this article has revealed that both revisionist and mainstream historians have failed the public. Not a single one of them ever looked into the convoluted history of TT and exposed it until 2003. We have Richard Carrier to thank for that. And now we have Mikael Nilsson to thank for taking Carrier’s research much further. While David Irving was the public’s best hope for exposing TT for the fraud it was and remains,[\[62\]](#) he either naively fell prey to Lord Dacre’s lies about TT or he deliberately protected Lord Dacre so as to prevent the decimation of his reputation. Either way it’s bad. And what makes it worse is that Irving still attests to TT’s validity and reliability despite the excellent and well-known work of Richard Carrier. That is unacceptable.

The public must be able to rely on expert historians who authenticate primary sources. Hugh Trevor-Roper’s scandalous behavior behind the scenes has shattered the image of this Hitler expert, revealing instead a man who lied, omitted and pretended for the sake of fame and money.

Pertaining to this, Nilsson concludes:[\[63\]](#)

“Trevor-Roper gained financially as an expert validator of Hitler documents – thanks in part to Genoud’s material. And Genoud’s documents increased considerably in value after Trevor-Roper had gone on record attesting to their authenticity. Trevor-Roper’s career as a Hitler expert had in fact started already when he published his famous book The Last Days of Hitler in 1947, a book that had propelled him to fame. This financial interest, too, may be part of the explanation for Trevor-Roper’s tendency to leave out critical information when it came to these documents.”

Nilsson’s upcoming publication on Trevor-Roper and TT is going to send a shockwave of distrust through the World War II/Third Reich historical community. Further compounding the problem of this scandal surrounding TT is that only one historian[\[64\]](#) prior to Mr. Carrier ever even bothered to investigate the authenticity or translation process of TT. One. And he met an untimely death before he could publish his research. Richard Carrier is the only historian besides this man to have done so—50 years later! And yet, we are expected to unquestioningly accept the authenticity of Hitler’s Second Book, The Goebbels Diaries, etc.?

Yes. The “experts” still expect us to trust them even after reading the following on Mr. Carrier’s website:[\[65\]](#)

“When I discovered that in fact the English [TT...] all the leading experts I consulted were surprised by my findings: all the peer reviewers and editors at GSR; Gerhard Weinberg, author of the famous 1952 Guide to Captured German Documents (the expert I spoke to on German documents in preparing the GSR article at the advice of GSR’s editor); Richard Steigmann-Gall, historian and expert on Hitler’s religious beliefs...”
(Emphasis added)

These “experts” could stand to learn a thing or two from “Grub Street.”[\[66\]](#) Anyone who has ever relied on TT and the “expertise” and “honesty” of Hugh Trevor-Roper will now have to revise or discard their research as a direct result of his clandestine chicanery. Those historians who are deceased will have to have their research amended or pulled from print to accommodate Mikael Nilsson’s trailblazing revelations. And those of us who conduct scholarly or amateur research on Adolf Hitler and the Third Reich today will have to slowly rebuild our trust in the (other) “experts” insofar as that is still possible. The profession and its so-called “experts” have a long road ahead of them. In fact, they may never recover from this. Public trust is not easily regained once it is lost.

I, for one, am putting more of my faith and hope in “Grub Street.”

Notes

[1]	Historian Mikael Nilsson writes: “In his introduction to Table Talk in 1953 Trevor-Roper stated that it had been translated from the original German manuscript.” This was a lie. From Mikael Nilsson, “Hugh Trevor-Roper and the English Editions of Hitler’s Table Talk and Testament,” Journal of Contemporary History 51, no. 4 (2016): 789, http://journals.sagepub.com/doi/pdf/10.1177/0022009415619689 (accessed June 14, 2017).

[4]	Libres propos sur la guerre et la paix (LP for short)
[5]	Nilsson’s research (see p. 806) suggests that Genoud’s B-V consisted exclusively of Heim’s notes, which are unauthenticated, lacking any original versions (minus approximately 40 typed pages seized by the Allies and ultimately returned to Germany), and had been altered and embellished by Heim after they had originally been recorded by him.
[6]	Ibid. , 790.
[7]	Hugh Trevor-Roper may be the impetus behind Irving’s subsequent acceptance of the B-V as authentic. Nilsson cautiously notes about this document: “It is still highly uncertain if, or at what point, Trevor-Roper got to see the Bormann-Vermerke and, if he did, how much of it he was allowed to look at. He certainly had no opportunity to undertake a proper investigation of the manuscript or to compare it with the various versions already in print.” (793)

[11]	Not surprisingly, I was attacked on Facebook for declaring that “Hitler’s Table Talk” is a “fraud,” which it is. The first attack reads: “Hitler’s table talk a fraud? based on what? what a BS. Have you ever red in in [sic] the original version? It is totally impossible to fake such prestigious thoughts that jump in all directions, but always in depth and related... you can not [sic] fake that, especially as their [sic] is no goal in faking it, they make hitler look better and there is not even a proof [sic] of gas chambers or whatsoever in it. BASIC LOGIC APPLIED Bitte.” The second attack reads: “Did you read it? No you didn’t. Nor has [C] here. No single argument in the content that proves it is a fraud either just a statement. Not even a ball pen argument like Anne Franck hoaxers. The table talks are ingenious remarks from a well thought person on a host of topics impossible to fake. Are there transcripion [sic] error or some augmented passages, possibly. But even then, for what agenda. There is NONE.”

[19]	Like the typed Bormann Vermerke photocopies transmitted to Irving, The Testament photocopies also contained Bormann’s signature as a sign of authentication. The Testament was “a typed copy of a typed copy of a photocopy,” nevertheless, Trevor-Roper told Baumgarten that “he did remember seeing Bormann’s signature on each page.” Both men used this signature as validation of The Testament ’s authenticity even though it was a triple copy of a non-existent original. (807) Irving used the same validation method to assess the Bormann Vermerke given to him by Genoud. How does Bormann’s signature authenticate TT but not The Testament ? The truth is that Irving was never shown the original TT manuscript, only copies. Recall that Irving writes on his website, “They were actually typed from notes taken by the stenographer Heinrich Heim, whom I interviewed and who confirmed the procedure in detail. Each day’s entry was initialled by Bormann at the end. ” Irving admits here that he was shown copies , not originals of TT . He then says that Heim only confirmed the procedure , not the copies Irving received from Genoud. It is not even certain if Heim ever saw these copies of Irving's. And how can Irving be sure of the authenticity of copies of typed notes if Bormann's signature was only a copy of his signature as it also appeared in the copies of The Testament ?

The applicable fan letter asks, "Is the book commonly know [sic] in the English-speaking world as the Hitler's Table Talk an English translation of François Genoud's French text? And how reliable is it?" David Irving should have answered this question 100% in the affirmative, that the English edition of TT is indeed based on Genoud's French edition. As it stands, Irving did not. Furthermore, in this same exchange Irving attests to Heim's notes as "highly reliable," which they are not.
[22]	Contrast Irving's assessment with that of Nilsson: "Much the same could naturally be said today about Genoud's other manuscript, the Bormann-Vermerke , and thus about both Table Talk and Monologe . That too is lost in its original form, except for the few notes now deposited in the Bundesarchiv ; the translation process was highly doubtful; the history of the manuscript from conception to publication is mysterious at best, and it is impossible to be sure that the majority of the entries are in fact authentic (that is, actual statements by Hitler as opposed to things he could have said)." [41]	See Louis Kilzer, Hitler’s Traitor: Martin Bormann and the Defeat of the Reich (Novato, CA: Presidio Press, 2000). Kilzer’s suspicions are valid. Why did Bormann suddenly decide that Hitler’s casual jabber would be so important for posterity? Why not in 1939 when the war actually started? Why 1941? Furthermore, is it just coincidence that Soviet spy “Werther” started leaking classified, top-secret military and related information to the Lucy apparat of the Red Orchestra right around the time that Koeppen appeared as a “circumspect” notetaker? These are valid questions we need to be asking and trying to answer. The fact that Heim claimed to openly defy Bormann’s order to maintain absolute secrecy is similarly suspect. “Bormann was taken aback,” claimed Heim, “but he gave [me] tacit approval to continue taking notes” nevertheless. [45]	Bormann’s request is strange in itself. Toland writes about this: “Shortly after their arrival at Wolfsschanze , Bormann had suggested almost offhandedly to Heinrich Heim, his adjutant, that he surreptitiously note down what the Chief [Hitler] said. So Hitler wouldn’t know he was being put on record, Bormann instructed his adjutant to rely on his memory. But Heim wanted more accurate results[!] and on his own initiative[!] he began making copious notes on index cards which he hid on his lap.” (Toland, 682) Let’s recap: Bormann carelessly made the request to start secretly recording top-secret information against Hitler’s wishes, which his subordinate Heim then took up with such alacrity that he wrote meticulous notecards in defiance of his superior’s request? Very unusual.

Though Stevens himself wrote “that he would ‘have preferred to translate direct from the original German’,” in relation to The Testament , ‘(as [he] did in [his] share of Hitler’s Table Talks)’.” (798) Why Lord Dacre would use a sub-standard translator for the single most-important Hitler source in the world at the time is beyond comprehension. The more likely explanation for Stevens’s poor translation is that he had only worked from Genoud’s French and German editions, not ever from Picker’s or Heim’s notes. Indeed, Lord Dacre thought there were still mistranslations even after Stevens’s translation was completely reworked. Why would Lord Dacre think this unless he had compared Stevens’s translation to the notes of Picker and/or Heim?

Abstract

In the whole world, the Federal Republic of Germany enjoys the reputation of being a liberal, democratic country under the rule of law. This self-portrait will not be simply adopted here, however, but it will be critically reviewed. The litmus test for a country under the rule of law is when the state's interests collide with those of its citizens, that is to say, when the state finds it expedient to prosecute and punish its citizens. Then it will show whether the law can prevent the authorities from misusing their omnipotence against defenseless citizens. Crucial in this regard is the Code of Criminal Procedure. It defines the rules according to which the judiciary may deal with those in the courtroom who got into the government's crosshairs for whatever reasons. Good laws prevent the state's misusing its power in the courtroom. In this regard, however, Germany performs abominably, because its Code of Criminal Procedure gives judges all the instruments needed to deal with defendants whichever way they (or their masters) please. They can gag the defense, deny all their motions for evidence, prevent any appeal, hide from the public what a case is all about, and they can claim anything they want in a verdict, because no protocol is made recording what is said in the courtroom by any party. Hence, if push comes to shove, the German judiciary can do arbitrarily whatever they (or their masters) want. And that is exactly what they do. But see for yourself.

Germany, Country under the Rule of Law: Role Model or Illusion? A Critical Inspection

Transcript

The Federal Republic of Germany enjoys a worldwide reputation as a functioning, well organized country under the rule of law that protects freedom and democracy. The Germans themselves have a reputation for organizing all kinds of things well, and the quality of German products is universally recognized.

When it comes to freedom and democracy, however, the historical record of the Germans is not quite so favorable, despite the insistence of the rulers of today's German state that the record has changed profoundly in the time since the end of World War II.

And how about the rule of law in that country? The independence and non-partisanship of the judiciary in Germany is older than the liberal democracy. It goes back to Frederick the Great, who made the king himself subject to the law in Prussia. He thereby introduced a principle that set a new standard for the whole of Germany. Frederick the Great once described this principle of the independence and nonpartisanship of the judiciary as follows:[1]

"You need to know that the least of peasants, and what is even more, the beggar is just as much a human being as is his majesty, and he has to find justice by the fact that all humans are equal before the law; it may be a prince suing a peasant or vice versa, then the prince will be equal to the peasant before the law; and in such affairs, it has to proceed purely by justice with no regard to the person. The justice councils in all provinces have to only comply with this. And wherever they do not go straight forward with justice without regard to person or class and put aside natural justness, they shall get in trouble with his royal majesty. A legal council which exercises injustices is more dangerous and worse than a gang of thieves; one can protect oneself against those, but nobody can protect himself against rogues who use the robes of justice to carry out their vicious passions; they are worse than the biggest scoundrels in the world and deserve double punishment.”

The image of the German judiciary in the eyes of its own constituents is best gauged by the respect with which the highest court in Germany is regarded: the Federal Constitutional Court. Surveys have shown that for decades the Federal Constitutional Court, see the red bars, has been able to maintain a reasonably consistent lead over the other branches of the government—the German parliament called the Bundestag, and the executive branch. Among the Germans, it is exceeded in prestige only by that enjoyed by the president; see the green bars.[2] The great prestige of the Federal Constitutional Court even inspired a special study by German scholars, from which the previously shown chart was taken.[3]

The German justice system also enjoys a stellar reputation internationally. For example, a decision by a U.S. federal court that denied the application for asylum in the United States, filed by a German, noted that Germany has a “highly developed and sophisticated legal system,” from which no unjust persecution could emerge.[4]

The lofty reputation of the German justice system, together with economic prosperity and political freedoms has led to Germany’s becoming a magnet for political as well as economic refugees ever since the 1960s.

In this connection, an asylum case is of interest that was mentioned in an article by Ingo Müller in the German journal Kritische Vierteljahresschrift für Gesetzgebung und Rechtswissenschaft (Critical Quarterly of Legislation and Jurisprudence). It had to do with the Turkish defense lawyer Şerafettin Kaya, here a more recent portrait of him, who in the early 1980s fled to Germany and there sought asylum from persecution by Turkish military tribunals. In his application for asylum, Kaya portrayed the Turkish military criminal law as unmistakably repressive, meaning that trials conducted by it automatically ought to be considered persecutorial in nature. The German federal agency for the recognition of foreign refugees nonetheless denied Kaya asylum in 1982 with the following justification, quote:[5]

“The Agency is in possession of an affidavit of the Max Planck Institute, that contains among other things a comprehensive comparison of the Turkish Code of Military Criminal Procedure with the German Code of Criminal Procedure. This comparison reflects a general congruence and even at points a more-liberal stance of the Turkish Code of Military Criminal Procedure ...”

Turkey at the time was unequivocally a repressive military dictatorship, not a modern liberal-democratic country under the rule of law.

The German Code of Criminal Procedure prescribes how criminal proceedings are to be conducted. As such, it is one of the most-important legal guidelines of the German justice system. What, then, might one make of the fact that German legal scholars, represented by researchers of a Max Planck Institute, in agreement with an agency of the German federal government, reported in the early 1980s that this legal guideline is at points less-liberal than that of a regime that ranks as a thoroughly repressive military dictatorship? That would seem to say that the German Code of Criminal Procedure of that time, formally speaking, permitted a more-repressive administration of justice than the Turkish Code of Military Criminal Procedure. Well, great!

I will return to this article by Ingo Müller again later.

Some aspects of the German judicial system are discussed in the following. They will not be compared with the irrelevant laws of a military dictatorship, but rather with those western ideals that the Federal Republic of Germany boasts of far and wide on its banners when it proclaims itself to be a country under the rule of law.

To start with, we will consider who may introduce evidence in German criminal trials. According to Section 214 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure, witnesses are summoned by the judge or by the district attorney, and evidence of other kinds is usually introduced by the district attorney, although the judge also has the power to do so.

Section 245 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure says in Clause 1:

“The taking of evidence shall be extended to all witnesses and experts who were summoned by the court and who appeared, as well as to the other evidence produced by the court or the public prosecution office pursuant to Section 214 subsection (4), [...]”

Do you notice anything? There’s no mention of the defense. The version of this paragraph in effect until 1975<sup>[6]</sup> read to the contrary as follows:

“The taking of evidence shall be extended to all witnesses and experts who were summoned and who appeared, as well as to the other evidence produced [...]”

Where previously the defense could force the introduction of evidence when this evidence had already been “produced,” that is, was present in the courtroom, since then the defense must first file a motion to introduce anything they wish to introduce, as stated in the new Clause 2 of this paragraph. The court can, however, deny these motions on a plethora of grounds. This list has likewise been greatly expanded vis-à-vis the version of 1975, which contained only the first two items (italicized):

- if the evidence is inadmissible,
- if the application has been filed for the purpose of protracting the proceedings,
- if the fact for which evidence is to be furnished has already been proved,
- if taking the evidence is superfluous due to common knowledge,

- if there is no connection between the fact and the matter being adjudicated, and
- if the evidence is completely unsuitable.

I won't elaborate here on each and every point, but will rather concentrate on two grounds of denial in this list, in which one can see what traps the state has set.

Any introduction of evidence is inadmissible where it is in any way contrary to law. This becomes problematic when case law has declared it a crime in certain cases to merely make certain claims about what a certain piece of evidence is supposed to prove. This condition was reached in Germany in the mid-1990s. I will get back to that later.

The common-knowledge formula appears already in Section 244 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure. It comprehensively covers the taking of evidence, therefore, among other things, also evidence that is not yet present in the courtroom, and so must first be procured. The list of possible grounds for denial is here still longer. Among other things, this paragraph also empowers the court to totally bar the procurement, that is to say, the acquisition of evidence when the court avers already to know the truth of the matter, no matter whether this truth is in accordance with the claims made by a motion or not. In Galileo Galilei's time, for example, it was common knowledge that the sun rotated around the earth. Under the application of a similar juridical logic the Inquisition forbade the accused to prove the contrary, since the court pretended to know what was true. Thus, Giordano Bruno ended up burning at the stake, and Galileo in lifelong house arrest.

Section 245 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure limits this absolute judicial power to declare what is true by declaring something to be common knowledge. It stipulates that a piece of evidence already present in the courtroom can be rejected on grounds of common knowledge only, if the claim to be proven is evidently true. Hence, the court needs to acknowledge that claims made in a motion about the evidence are true. However, this has not deterred German judges from barring such evidence anyway, when in a legal fix, by determining the claims about the evidence to be manifestly false. More on this later.

The gross imbalance of power between defense and prosecution in the admissibility of evidence, by the way, violates the spirit of the European Convention on Human Rights, in which in Clause 3 of Article 6 it is stated that every defendant is to be guaranteed the right “to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him.” Oddly, the convention speaks only of witnesses, as though there were no other kinds of evidence.

Now we come to another subject, the ways and means by which German judges deal with evidence. Section 261 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure says:

“The court shall decide on the result of the evidence taken according to its free conviction gained from the hearing as a whole.”

Therefore, according to German criminal-justice law only the judges who have conducted a criminal trial are empowered at their discretion to interpret the proffered evidence, and based thereon, to pronounce a verdict. Thereby, they are constrained by absolutely nothing—neither by logic nor by truthfulness nor by honesty. In other words: this is a blank check for German judges to err with no correction and to lie and swindle with impunity.

This might sound harsh. The fact is, however, that precisely because of this logic, no sort of verbatim transcript is taken in German courtrooms. This is even the case where the content of the introduction of evidence is at least recorded in summary, such as during criminal trials before County Courts, as prescribed by Section 273, Clause 2 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure. The criminal court judge therein named and the court with lay judges are institutions of the County Court.

However, absolutely no evidentiary value inheres in these summary transcripts as concerns the content of the argument. Section 274 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure provides that the evidentiary import of the transcript is strictly limited to the recorded formalities—at least the legal scholars interpret this legalese in such a way. So, when the transcript covering the proceedings before the County Court states that Witness X testified on day Y and stated that he saw a red car speed around the corner, the evidentiary content extends only to the fact that the witness testified on that day, but not what he actually said. When the judges then write in the verdict that the witness said he saw a green truck sitting by the side of the road, the judges are right and not the transcript, and that's that!

And if you're not entirely convinced, just look it up in Wikipedia.<sup>[7]</sup>

We must, unfortunately, read a couple more sections of that law to understand what really goes on in German courts. I beg a little patience for this.

In Germany, as mentioned, only a brief summarizing transcript of content is made in the County Courts. And why? Well, the reason for this brief summary lies in the fact that one can file for an appeal on the facts of the case against the verdict of a County Court. If the appeal is granted, the court of the second instance must take all evidence anew. See Section 328 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure. In order that the judges can shorten the proceedings in the second instance, they can consult the transcript of the County Court for what happened in the court of first instance. That can save them work.

Interestingly, one cannot file for an appeal on the facts of the case against the verdict of the first instance, if that verdict was handed down by a criminal division of a District Court or a Higher Regional Court. One may only apply for a so-called revision of these verdicts. A revision concerns only matters of law, meaning that one may only claim that some formalities were disregarded or that some other law was violated. It is not permitted to contest anything about the matters of fact, that is, about the factual findings stated in the verdict. Because strictly legally speaking it is therefore totally irrelevant what transpired before the District Court, these courts merely produce a record of formalities as set forth in the first clause of Section 273 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure. In such a protocol of formalities, one might for example read that Witness X testified on day Y, but no trace whatever will be found as to what was testified.

Judicial absolutism reigns also as to the interpretation of documents and material evidence. If in the taking of evidence a document is introduced that clearly proves Fact A, yet the court writes in the verdict that the document refutes Fact A, then the court is right. It has final disposition in the interpretation of the evidence produced. In the case of a verdict of a District Court, there is no possibility whatever of contestation.

Until the revision of 1965, the German Code of Criminal Procedure still made it the duty of all courts to record at least “[t]he main outcome of examinations at the main hearing.”<sup>[8]</sup> But since no appeal on the facts of the verdicts of German District Courts is possible in any case, the revision of 1975 relieved them of this duty. There is some fine logic to this: since errors and lies committed by German judges of the District Court cannot be contested anyway, there’s no need to even record what goes on in the courtroom. Great! This is the logic of terrorism!

For criminal trials that are first conducted at the District Court level, it’s pretty much all or nothing for the defendant. He is tried there for particularly serious offenses that carry potential sentences of more than four years. Those interested may look this up in Paragraphs 24 and 74 of the German Code on Court Constitution.<sup>[9]</sup> Here, I won’t annoy you any further with this welter of legal verbiage. It would be important precisely in these cases where no possibility of appeal exists, that the judges, in their own interest, get the facts right at this first and only time. But how can this be done without a verbatim transcript?

This absolute prerogative in the absence of a verbatim transcript has led to repeated harsh criticism. One of the most-prominent critics is the former defense attorney Rolf Bossi, who described and criticized this egregious defect in German criminal procedure in his book Halbgötter in Schwarz (Demigods in Black). Here is a description of this problem that was broadcast by the German TV channel 3Sat on the occasion of the release of Bossi’s book in 2005:

“A defense lawyer indicts. Star defender Rolf Bossi aims serious charges against the German judiciary. The unaccountability of judges, impunity and scandalous, wrong judgments render the rule of law in Germany a fiction, writes Bossi in his provocative book ‘Demigods in Black.’ Today, anyone could fall victim to a ruling that is utterly immune to effective oversight. ‘There is no requirement for verbatim transcripts for Penal Chambers of District Courts and even worse, for Jury Courts. There the judge can do whatever he likes. As a defense lawyer, I have no possibility of objection between the revelations of the investigation, the taking of evidence, and whatever he writes in his verdict. And I have no appeal.’ Thus, any judge can hide behind a mere authoritative-sounding verdict with no fear of correction. Today, even many judges agree that there is too little effective oversight in the German judicial system. ‘Bossi’s book comes at the right time. Whether intentionally or not, he has good timing, as the justice minister’s conference is in fact looking at a major structural reform.”

Since then, the German Code of Criminal Procedure has been revised several times, but in this regard, nothing has happened. Quite the contrary. Because some defense attorneys challenged the omnipotence of German judges and filed uncomfortable motions to introduce evidence, a section was slipped in in 1994 that empowers the court to gag the defense attorneys as they see fit—with the exception of the closing argument. Here is the text of the scandalous Section 257a:[10]

Since this applies to all parties to the proceeding, this sounds nicely neutral, but in fact this section is aimed exclusively at defense attorneys in order to gag them. Therewith, the right to a public hearing guaranteed as a civil right is undermined, since once a judge has denied the defense its voice, the public thereafter may learn only whatever the prosecutors and the judge happen to mention. Further, one may confidently assume that many motions that in the course of argument often arise spontaneously and are therefore rendered orally, by effect of this ruling of the judge, are never made.

Section 249 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure is of similar import. It allows the judge to stipulate that documents entered into evidence may not be read out in public. Instead, parties to the trial must read them in private. That is, they must take the documents home with them and read them in seclusion—or they must at least certify on the day designated for this that they have read them. Whether they really have, is not verified.

In extreme cases where all the evidence is in documents that must be read in seclusion, this means that the public finds out absolutely nothing about the content of any evidence. This also makes a mockery of the principle of public hearings.

Of both of these muzzling provisions, Dr. Dr. Uwe Scheffler, Professor of Criminal Justice at the Europa University in Frankfurt on the Oder wrote:

“According to this rule [Section 257a], the court can now deprive the parties to the trial of their voices and confine them to written form. How convenient: Since earlier laws had already provided for the option to read out documents by not reading them out, that is, by giving the parties to the action the opportunity to ‘become familiar’ with the text of the documents in quiet seclusion, this means that one can now maintain the silence of the grave in the courtroom. In addition to frequently voiced criticisms, the following may be pointed out: the legislature has clearly stated that this new regulation ‘streamlines’ the trial. Because writing and reading what was written takes longer than an oral argument, this means that the legislature downright aims at dispensing with the right to a legal hearing.”

There are many further modifications to the procedural law that are detrimental to defendants. I can't explore them all here. A list of some of the sections in question can be found in Footnote 5 of Rainer Hamm's article on the "Evidence as a Legal Concept and Its Scrutiny during Legal Revisions" ("Beweis als Rechtsbegriff und seine revisionsrechtliche Kontrolle") that can be found in the Festschrift für Gerhard Fezer cited here.<sup>[11]</sup> If you are interested in further details of the historical development of the Code of Criminal Procedure in the Federal Republic of Germany, I recommend reading the previously mentioned article by Ingo Müller. He describes therein how salutary departures were undertaken after the Second World War to make the German Code of Criminal Procedure more liberal after it had been decimated to the detriment of defendants under National Socialism. A countermovement developed in the 1970s, however, in response to the terrorism of the Red Army Faction in which all the liberal reforms were reversed. Thereafter followed wave after wave of "deliberalization," so that one can now rightly say that today the German Code of Criminal Procedure is more-repressive than it was under National Socialism.

Indeed, the historical origin of the German Code of Criminal Procedure is anything but liberal. It was created in 1877, that is, during the time of the Second German Empire. That could explain why it includes no verbatim transcript requirement, although other countries at the time already had verbatim transcript requirements. It must have been a major undertaking at the time to complete a verbatim transcript of what was said in the courtroom. For that, stenographers were needed and then typists. There is today, however, no excuse anymore not to maintain verbatim transcripts in police interrogation rooms and in courtrooms. In this age of the supercomputers, automatic voice-recognition software is employed by default: in the courtrooms of most other countries of the world, in the mass media, in medicine, etc.

What has been common practice in most western countries for centuries, isn't even discussed in Germany. The plans in the works for a general overhaul of the German Code of Criminal Procedure foresees no such change. All that is new, is that the police and the courts are allowed to video-record certain witness interrogations. No requirement for the creation of verbatim transcripts of what transpires in interrogation rooms or courtrooms, nor even the possibility of such as evidence for appeals and revisions is in prospect.

In a contribution to the Petersberg Days of the Criminal Law Study Group of the German Bar Association, Prof. Dr. Werner Leitner noted:[12]

“The German criminal justice system still has [...] medieval tendencies and shields itself, without really sound arguments, from adaptation to present-day technical and pertinent conditions.”

Just as little is it planned to impose definite limits on the totalitarian power of judges to evaluate evidence, such as that one would require that the evaluation be logical and be internally free of contradiction and with regard to the evidence. But without a verbatim transcript, the logical conclusiveness would be hard to determine, and any contradiction to witness testimony could never be even considered.

For this reason, the impending reform of the German Code of Criminal Procedure was correctly called a “missed opportunity” in an article in the Kriminalpolitisch Zeitschrift (Journal of Criminal Justice). [13]

Whether one considers the Turkish military dictatorship, Stalin’s Soviet Union or today’s Federal Republic of Germany: for fraudsters, thieves, thugs, extortionists and murderers things went and still today go little differently, and most people have little sympathy for such miscreants anyway.

So, let us focus on those innocents who get caught up in the wheels of the justice system. One of the functions of a legal system should be to prevent judges from making avoidable mistakes and errors which are detrimental to the innocent.

It is even much more-important, however, to prevent the misuse of the justice system to suppress the civil rights of individuals or groups. The first mark of the quality of a justice system appears when it affords to defendants adequate protection even in such cases where the taboos of a society are touched in any way. It is then that an unspoken prejudice reigns among practically all members of a society to regard certain views as evil and punishable, no matter how peaceable such views might be.

Unfortunately, Germany has a long history of persecuting dissidents by means of the criminal justice system. It reaches back long before the National Socialist period.

Section 100 of the Prussian Criminal Law Code of 1794 can serve here as the earliest forerunner. It threatened with four- to six-month prison terms those who in sermons or public speeches called out for hatred or ill feeling against any religion.<sup>[14]</sup> This section, which was considerably more-specific and gentler than all the laws that were to follow, reflected the tolerance of religion reigning in Prussia. Far more-repressive was Section 17 of a Prussian decree of 1849 that followed the suppressed revolution of 1848. It threatened with fines or prison terms of four weeks to two years those who—quote:<sup>[15]</sup>

“sought to disturb the public peace by publicly inciting citizens of the state to hate or disdain one another.”

In the eyes of the rulers, this step had become necessary because the 1848 revolution made it impossible to maintain pre-emptive government censorship. The new paragraph slipped censorship back in through the back door by motivating citizens to censor themselves in order to avoid punishment. This kind of censorship after the fact is considerably subtler and therefore less vulnerable to attack.

Two years later, in 1851, this paragraph resurrected in slightly reworded form the old Section 100 of the Prussian criminal code and so became the direct forerunner of today’s Section 130 – “Incitement of the People.”<sup>[16]</sup> Its first version, Section 130 of the Reich Criminal Code, in effect since 1872, forbade only class incitement, however, meaning the “class-warfare propaganda” disseminated by communists, socialists and social democrats. To-wit:

“Whosoever in such a manner as to endanger public order publicly incites different classes of the populace to take violent action against each other will be punished with fine [...] or imprisonment up to two years.”

This paragraph remained essentially unchanged until 1960, but nothing that was prosecuted in Prussia and thereafter in the German Empire is today viewed as agitation and prosecuted. National Socialism, which set the abolition of classes and the formation of an ethnic community as its resplendent goal, replaced the concept of class warfare by that of incitement of the populace, which worked primarily against those who agitated against the state, its political stance, its organs and its officeholders. It was therefore simply a shield for the state against criticism of its citizens, a classic inversion of human rights.<sup>[17]</sup> The Nazis also reinstated the preventive censorship abandoned in 1848, so that they had a comprehensive set of legal instruments to control public opinion, of which they are known to have made vigorous use.

The class-warfare section was not modified into its present form of “agitation of the populace” until the criminal-law revision of 1960, replacing the agitation against classes with that against parts of the population. This emendation was inspired by Swastika graffiti and other anti-Jewish actions that later were revealed to have been perpetrated by east-bloc secret-service agents in an effort to tarnish the reputation of the West German Federal Republic. Since 1960, the new paragraph read:

“Whosoever, in a manner capable of disturbing the public peace, assaults the human dignity of others by inciting hatred against segments of the population, by calling for violent or arbitrary measures against them, or by insulting, maliciously maligning or defaming them, shall be liable to imprisonment for no less than three months.”

Since then, this paragraph has been extended repeatedly and now has seven clauses, covers more than one page, and places pretty much all domains of opinion under penalty that are suspect to those in power.

This chart shows how the scope of this gagging paragraph has grown over the years to the present time.[18]

If the old class-warfare section was aimed at left-leaning views, the new incitement-of-the-populace paragraph is aimed at right-leaning views. It is a sort of hysterical overreaction of the German elites to the excesses of National Socialism.

No matter who in Germany is or was the target of state coercion of opinion, German judges were and are always compliant with the regime's prosecution agenda. As Bossi explained correctly in his book, the legally enforced coercion of opinion engaged in by the Nazis had no disadvantages for the German judiciary. No Nazi judge was ever prosecuted for his verdicts against dissenters. Even today the judges merely shrug, because all they're doing is applying the law. Legislation itself bears on them exactly as little as it is possible for them to reject prevailing law as illegal.

But wait. There is one exception. The judges of the German Federal Constitutional Court can indeed declare applicable law unconstitutional and thereby null and void it. And there is the catch.

In a comparison of the highest courts of the USA and the Federal Republic of Germany, a study by the Boston College International & Comparative Law Review came to the conclusion that one weakness of the German legal system lay precisely here. While in the USA every federal court can review the constitutionality of a law passed by the government, and in case of a conflict can declare the law unconstitutional and void, German county, district and superior district courts don't even have the authority to voice an opinion on that. They must rather blindly apply applicable law. Only when a case has made its way through all instances and has finally arrived at the Federal Constitutional Court, can the question of constitutionality be addressed.[19]

The judges of the German Federal Constitutional Court are appointed by the German parliament, the Bundestag. This usually happens as follows: the established parties agree in advance upon who has when the right to nominate a candidate from among one's party's partisans. This horse trading obviously makes a bad joke of the concept of separation of powers. What can be expected in a case of unconstitutionality from a court so filled with the hand-picked appointees of the ruling elites?

When in 2009 a case had to be decided whether passages of Section 130 of the German Penal Code violated the constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression, the decision of this court was revealing. I quote:[20]

"In general, restrictions to the freedom of opinion are permissible only on the basis of general laws according to art. 5, para. 2, alternative 1, Basic Law. A law restricting opinions is an inadmissible special law, if it is not formulated in a sufficiently open way and is directed right from the start only against certain convictions, attitudes, or ideologies. [...] Although the regulation of art. 130, para. 4, German Penal Code is not a general law [...] even as a non-general law it is still compatible with art. 5, para. 1 and 2, Basic Law, as an exception. In view of the injustice and the terror caused by the National Socialist regime, an exception to the prohibition of special laws [...] is immanent."

In other words: exceptions are forbidden, except in cases of exceptions. In this case, the logic of this exception is as follows:

Because in the past Germany burnt books and persecuted and imprisoned peaceful dissidents in violation of the Weimar Constitution,

Germany is now morally obligated to burn books and persecute and imprison peaceful dissidents in violation of the Bonn Constitution.

The fact is that, since its initial enacting in 1849, Section 130 of the German Penal Code has been directed "from the outset only against certain convictions, attitudes or ideologies” and has not lost this attribute to this day. It is thus clearly unconstitutional from beginning to end.

No system of justice in the world needs penal laws that forbid specific expressions of opinion. If anyone misuses freedom of speech to incite the violation of human and civil rights of third parties, then in all justice systems this is already covered by the prohibition of abetting (Section 26 German Criminal Code) or public incitement to crimes (Section 111 German Criminal Code). Only such laws deserve the description of a “general law.” Every additional censorship law is nothing more than the product of tyranny, to which every German has the right and the duty according to Article 20 Clause 4 of the Basic Law to resist, so long as the Federal Constitutional Court denies any relief.

In the originally planned foreword to his book Animal Farm, which was rejected by four publishers among other reasons for pressure applied by the British government, George Orwell expressed it thus:[\[21\]](#)

“If liberty means anything at all, it means the right to tell people what they do not want to hear.”

As previously mentioned, the quality of a system of justice is shown by whether the groups of the population whose views the powerful wish to suppress are protected from persecution by the state. This applies mostly to those persons who break the central taboos of a society or undermine its founding myths, that is, those whose criticism goes against the foundations of a society. As long as these views are peaceful, that is, do not advocate the violation of the rights of third parties or justify this, the justice system should not punish such publicly expressed viewpoints.

What then are the central taboos and the founding myths of today’s German society?

In 1999, then German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer put it this way:[\[22\]](#)

“All democracies have a base, a foundation. For France this is 1789. For the USA it is the Declaration of Independence. For Spain it is the Civil War. Well, for Germany it is Auschwitz. It can only be Auschwitz. In my eyes, the remembrance of Auschwitz, the ‘never again Auschwitz,’ can be the sole foundation of the new Berlin Republic.”

I could name a long list of personalities and media voices that express what they think of anyone who attacks that foundation. I will spare us that list because everyone knows what the overwhelming majority of the populace in Germany and elsewhere thinks of those who are said to deny Auschwitz or the Holocaust in its entirety. Many people think that such persons have the same moral standing as pedophiles. One can hardly sink lower than that.

What would you do if someone approached you and, in a peaceful and maybe even scholarly and factual way, said something about Auschwitz that you truly do not wish to hear? That is almost a mere rhetorical question in a society in which an almost monolithic consensus exists as to what must be done to any such taboo-breaking historical dissident.

But it is exactly here that the crucial question arises: how do you reconcile that with the rule of law? Can and will the German justice system protect peaceful dissidents of the historical narrative of the Third Reich from legal and social assault, or does it simply throw them to the wolves?

The hard realities of today’s Germany reveal unfortunately that the German justice system is perfectly tailored to enforce political prerogatives with the force of law with no compunction whatever.

In the following I will illustrate how such a thing proceeds in specific instances.

It is especially important to condemn the ringleaders of these dissidents in order to set a warning example for all to see. These are arraigned at the District Court level for a particularly serious disturbance of the public peace. This way all possibility of an appeal is denied them, and since in such criminal trials no sort of verbatim transcript is made, the door is wide open to manipulation.

All, really without exception all motions of the defense to introduce evidence demonstrating that the defendant's historical views are well founded or even correct, are denied on the grounds of common knowledge to the contrary. Decades of precedent ruling by the German Federal Supreme Court – not to be confused with Germany's Federal Constitutional Court – even compel German courts to this stance.

If the defense has its evidence already present in the courtroom, the German Code of Criminal Procedure actually prohibits denying such evidence with the reason that the opposite of what the evidence is said to prove is self-evident, but the German courts do so regardless, and the Federal Supreme Court, which should correct such violations of the law, has repeatedly allowed and confirmed this practice.[\[23\]](#)

Motions to introduce evidence with which the defense wishes to show per Section 244 Clause 4 of the German Code of Criminal Procedure that it possesses expert opinions which are superior to expert opinions previously submitted are likewise denied on grounds of common knowledge, although the probative value of new evidence unknown to the court cannot possibly be common knowledge. This violation of the law also receives the sanction of the Federal Supreme Court.[\[24\]](#)

Motions to introduce evidence that there is notable public objection to common knowledge are likewise and nonetheless barred on grounds of self-evidence.[\[25\]](#)

Motions to introduce evidence that the reason for the lack of any notable public objection to common knowledge is that historians fear legal repercussions and for that reason no longer express publicly what they really think, are nonetheless barred on grounds of self-evidence.[\[26\]](#)

Troubled by such motions by the defense in trials against historical dissidents, the German justice system went so far as to declare in the mid-1990s that filing a motion to introduce evidence is in itself already a crime, if the motion's aim is to prove that the punishable opinions of the defendant are correct. For with such an act, a defense attorney would publicly commit the very same crime in the courtroom for which his client has been indicted. These decisions, too, with which defense attorneys were sentenced merely for filing motions to introduce evidence, were approved by the Federal Supreme Court, since such motions were evidently inadmissible, because they violated standing law.[27]

One of Germany's most-brutal "hanging judges" against historical dissidents, the Mannheim Judge Ulrich Meinerzhagen, was quoted by the German left-wing newspaper tageszeitung as follows:[28]

"Finally, the court rejected all motions with the terse—and for some anti-fascists in the audience shocking—reason that it is completely irrelevant whether the Holocaust happened or not. Denying it is subject to punishment in Germany. And that is all that counts in court. 'Democracy must be able to handle this,' a law student lectured later in the lobby of the courthouse."

As we all know, democracy is when three foxes and a chicken decide what's for dinner—or here, that the overwhelming majority of all members of a society may prescribe under pain of punishment which opinions you may publicly express on certain historical subjects, and which you may not.

Obviously, the law student did not grasp that the rule of law was established precisely to prevent such assaults by the majority against minorities.

The denial of all motions to introduce evidence in such cases is nowhere near the end of the judicial repressive measures. Certain courageous lawyers did not accept their gagging, but instead proceeded unflinchingly in the face of threats by the legal authorities and the judges. They nevertheless kept filing motions with which they tried to defend their clients. The result was the 1994 introduction of the previously mentioned muzzling Section 257a into the German Code of Criminal Procedure, that empowered judges to require all motions except closing arguments to be submitted in writing. And that is exactly what regularly happens in such cases.

In order to avoid the appearance to the public that the defendants are being sent up for totally harmless and scientifically well-founded assertions, their writings are never read out in the courtroom, but rather are consigned to “off-site private reading” as a matter of principle.

Ever since, silence is again the civic duty in German courtrooms.

Traps shut and no grumbling!

At the end of such a show trial, in which the defense is basically completely paralyzed, comes a verdict in which the judges can write whatever they like. In the absence of a verbatim transcript hardly anything can be checked anyway. Thus, the judges build their careers, ape the lynch media, and serve the wiles of politics.

Silence is the citizen’s first duty!

But at the end of the day, dear observer, you probably needn’t trouble yourself. Because you could safely remain silent while they took the Holocaust deniers; for you weren’t a Holocaust denier, after all. You remained silent also when they came for the Nazis; you were certainly no Nazi. When they came for the right-wingers, you still remained silent, as you were certainly no right-winger. When finally they come for you, there will be no one left who could protest.

Then enjoy the farcical German justice system!

For you will evidently be an outlaw!

Here is the text of the German Basic Law article that has directly to do with this. It says there that there shall be no censorship, but German judges take this to mean merely a preemptive censorship. In Clause 2, the freedom of opinion is then immediately abrogated, because if even non-general censorship laws are valid at the say of the Federal Constitutional Court, then there is no freedom of expression at all.

In 1970, a professor of public law, who at the time taught at the University of Administrative Science in Speyer, Germany, wrote the following words in an obscure festschrift about the right of German citizens to oppose assaults by their state upon their civil rights as enshrined in the German Basic Law:[29]

17 years later the author of these lines became the president of the German Federal Constitutional Court, and 7 years after that he was elected federal president of Germany. The complete evisceration of freedom of expression in Germany was carried out during his term of office.

Summing up, this much is clear:

1. The justice system of the Federal Republic of Germany is in some regards medieval in its structure, and on paper, its procedural law allows for a more-repressive conduct of a trial than that of the Third Reich.
2. There is in the Federal Republic of Germany effectively no separation of governmental powers.
3. Every German has the right and the moral duty to oppose such an oppressive system on German soil.

“...but nobody can protect himself against rogues who use the robes of justice to carry out their vicious passions; they are worse than the biggest scoundrels in the world and deserve double punishment.”

Abstract

In the whole world, the Federal Republic of Germany enjoys the reputation of being a liberal, democratic country under the rule of law. This self-portrait will not be simply adopted here, however, but it will be critically reviewed. The litmus test for a country under the rule of law is when the state's interests collide with those of its citizens, that is to say, when the state finds it expedient to prosecute and punish its citizens. Then it will show whether the law can prevent the authorities from misusing their omnipotence against defenseless citizens. Crucial in this regard is the Code of Criminal Procedure. It defines the rules according to which the judiciary may deal with those in the courtroom who got into the government's crosshairs for whatever reasons. Good laws prevent the state's misusing its power in the courtroom. In this regard, however, Germany performs abominably, because its Code of Criminal Procedure gives judges all the instruments needed to deal with defendants which ever way they (or their masters) please. They can gag the defense, deny all their motions for evidence, prevent any appeal, hide from the public what a case is all about, and they can claim anything they want in a verdict, because no protocol is made recording what is said in the courtroom by any party. Hence, if push comes to shove, the German judiciary can do arbitrarily whatever they (or their masters) want. And that is exactly what they do. But see for yourself.

Die Bundesrepublik Deutschland genießt in der Welt ein hohes Ansehen als ein funktionierender, wohlorganisierter freiheitlich-demokratischer Rechtsstaat. Hier soll diese Selbstdarstellung des deutschen Staates aber nicht einfach so übernommen, sondern kritisch überprüft werden. Die Nagelprobe für einen Rechtsstaat ist es, wenn die Interessen des Staates mit dem seiner Bürger kollidiert, sprich, wenn der Staat meint, den Bürger verfolgen und bestrafen zu müssen. Hier erweist sich, ob die Gesetze es verhindern können, dass der Staat seine Allmacht gegen den machtlosen Bürger missbraucht. Zentral dafür ist die Strafprozessordnung. Sie setzt die Regeln dafür, wie die Justiz im Gerichtssaal mit jenen umspringen darf, die aus welchen Gründen auch immer ins Fadenkreuz des Staates geraten sind. Gute Gesetze verhindern den Machtmissbrauch des Staates im Gerichtssaal. Hier schneidet Deutschland jedoch hunds miserable ab. Seine Strafprozessordnung gibt deutschen Richtern nämlich alle Instrumente in die Hand, um mit einem Angeklagten nach blieben umspringen zu können. Der Verteidigung kann ein Maulkorb verpasst werden, all ihre Beweisanträge können abgelehnt werden, eine Berufung kann verwehrt werden, der Öffentlichkeit kann verheimlicht werden, um was es geht, und im Urteil können die Richter behaupten, was sie wollen, denn es gibt kein Protokoll, das festhält, wer was im Gerichtssaal gesagt hat. Wenn es hart auf hart kommt, darf die deutsche Justiz daher willkürlich machen, was sie will (oder was man ihr aufträgt). Und sie tut genau das. Doch sehen Sie selbst.

Rechtsstaat Deutschland: Vorbild oder Trugbild? Eine kritische Betrachtung

Transkript

Rechtsstaat. Den Deutschen eilt der Ruf voraus, allerlei Dinge gut organisieren zu können, und die Qualität deutscher Produkte wird weltweit einmütig anerkannt.

Wenn es freilich um Freiheit und Demokratie geht, ist die geschichtliche Erfolgsbilanz der Deutschen weniger überzeugend, auch wenn insbesondere die Eliten des heutigen deutschen Staates darauf bestehen, dass sich dies seit Ende der Zweiten Weltkriegs grundlegend gewandelt habe.

Und wie sieht es mit dem Rechtsstaat aus? Die Unabhängigkeit und Unparteilichkeit der Justiz ist in Deutschland älter als die freiheitliche Demokratie. Sie geht auf Friedrich den Großen zurück, der in Preußen den König selbst dem Recht unterstellte. Er führte damit ein Prinzip ein, das für ganz Deutschland einen neuen Maßstab setzte. Friedrich der Große beschrieb dieses Prinzip der Unabhängigkeit und Unparteilichkeit der Justiz einst wie folgt:[1]

Das Ansehen der bundesdeutschen Justiz bei der eigenen Bevölkerung lässt sich am deutlichsten an dem Respekt messen, den das höchste deutsche Gericht in Deutschland genießt: das Bundesverfassungsgericht. Wie Umfragen ergeben haben, hat das Bundesverfassungsgericht, siehe die roten Balken, im Vergleich zu den höchsten Institutionen der anderen Regierungsgewalten – dem Bundestag und der Bundesregierung – über die Jahrzehnte hinweg ein einigermaßen stetig hohes Ansehen bewahren können. Es wird nur vom Ruf übertroffen, den der Bundespräsident unter den Deutschen genießt; siehe die grünen Balken.[2] Das hohe Prestige des Bundesverfassungsgerichts war deutschen Forschern sogar eine eigene Untersuchung wert, der die zuvor gezeigte Grafik entnommen wurde.[3]

Auch auf internationaler Ebene genießt das bundesdeutsche Rechtssystem ein sehr hohes Ansehen. Beispielsweise heißt es in einer Entscheidung eines U.S.-Bundesgerichts, mit dem der Asylantrag eines Deutschen in den USA abgelehnt wurde, dass es sich beim deutschen Rechtssystem um ein „hochentwickeltes und ausgeklügeltes System“ handle, bei dem es zu keiner unrechtsstaatlichen Verfolgung komme.[4]

Das hohe Ansehen des deutschen Rechtssystems, in Verbindung mit dem wirtschaftlichen Wohlstand und den politischen Freiheiten, hat dazu geführt, dass Deutschland seit den 1960er Jahren eines der Hauptziele politischer wie auch wirtschaftlicher Flüchtlinge geworden ist.

Interessant ist in diesem Zusammenhang ein Asylfall, der in einem Beitrag von Ingo Müller in der Zeitschrift Kritische Vierteljahresschrift für Gesetzgebung und Rechtswissenschaft erwähnt wurde. Er betraf den türkischen Strafverteidiger Şerafettin Kaya, hier ein jüngeres Bild von ihm, der Anfang der 1980er Jahre wegen politischer Verfolgung durch türkische Militärgerichte nach Deutschland geflohen war und dort um Asyl gebeten hatte. In seinem Asylantrag vertrat Kaya die Ansicht, dass schon allein das türkische Militärverfahrensrecht derart repressiv sei, dass unter ihm durchgeführte Verfahren als unrechtsstaatlich gelten müssten. Das Bundesamt für die Anerkennung ausländischer Flüchtlinge verweigerte Kaya dennoch 1982 das Asyl, und zwar unter anderem mit folgender Begründung, ich zitiere:[5]

Die Türkei war damals freilich kein moderner freiheitlich-demokratischer Rechtsstaat, sondern eine repressive Militärdiktatur.

Die deutsche Strafprozessordnung regelt, wie Strafverfahren durchgeführt werden. Insofern ist sie eines der wichtigsten Regelwerke des deutschen Justizsystems. Was ist nun davon zu halten, dass schon die deutsche juristische Wissenschaft, repräsentiert durch Forscher eines Max-Planck-Instituts, in Übereinstimmung mit einem Bundesamt der Bundesregierung Anfang der 1980er Jahre davon ausging, dass dieses Regelwerk bisweilen weniger liberal ist als das Regelwerk eines Staates, der allgemein als repressive Militärdiktatur gilt? Das heißt doch wohl, dass das damalige deutsche Strafprozessrecht formalrechtlich betrachtet eine repressivere Rechtsprechung erlaubte als das türkische Militärstrafrecht. Na klasse!

Nachfolgend werden einige Aspekte des deutschen Justizsystems diskutiert. Verglichen werden diese nicht mit den irrelevanten Gesetzen einer Militärdiktatur, sondern mit jenen westlichen Idealen, welche die Bundesrepublik Deutschland groß und breit auf ihrem Banner vor sich herträgt, wenn sie von sich behauptet, ein Rechtsstaat zu sein.

Als erstes wollen wir betrachten, wer in deutschen Strafprozessen Beweise einführen darf. Laut §214 der Strafprozessordnung werden Zeugen vom Richter oder vom Staatsanwalt geladen, und andersartige Beweise werden üblicherweise von der Staatsanwaltschaft herbeigeschafft, obwohl der Richter dies auch übernehmen kann.

§245 der Strafprozessordnung führt in Absatz 1 aus:

Merken Sie etwas? Da ist keine Rede von der Verteidigung. Die bis 1975 geltende Fassung dieses Paragraphen<sup>[6]</sup> lautete hingegen wie folgt:

Konnte die Verteidigung früher also die Verwertung von Beweisen erzwingen, wenn diese Beweise bereits „herbeigeschafft“, also im Gerichtssaal anwesend waren, so muss die Verteidigung seither für alles, was sie als Beweis vorzulegen wünscht, erst Anträge stellen, wie es im neuen Absatz 2 dieses Paragraphen heißt. Das Gericht kann diese Anträge jedoch mit einer Vielzahl von Gründen ablehnen. Auch diese Liste wurde gegenüber der Fassung von 1975 großzügig erweitert, denn nur die ersten zwei der nachfolgenden Ablehnungsgründe waren in der alten Fassung vorhanden:

- wenn die Beweiserhebung unzulässig ist,
- wenn der Antrag zum Zwecke der Prozeßverschleppung gestellt ist,
- wenn die Tatsache, die bewiesen werden soll, schon erwiesen ist,
- wenn eine Beweiserhebung wegen Offenkundigkeit überflüssig ist,
- wenn zwischen der zu beweisenden Tatsache und dem Gegenstand der

Urteilsfindung kein Zusammenhang besteht, und

– wenn das Beweismittel völlig ungeeignet ist.

Ich werde hier nicht jeden einzelnen Punkt erläutern, sondern mich nur auf zwei Ablehnungsgründe in dieser Liste konzentrieren, anhand derer man erkennen kann, welche Fallen der Staat hier gestellt hat.

Unzulässig ist eine Beweiserhebung dann, wenn sie in irgendeiner Weise widerrechtlich wäre. Problematisch wird dies dann, wenn das Strafrecht bereits bestimmte Beweisbehauptungen zu Straftaten erklärt. Dieser Zustand ist in Deutschland seit Mitte der 1990er Jahre gegeben. Ich komme darauf später noch zurück.

Die Offenkundigkeitsformel taucht bereits in §244 der Strafprozessordnung auf. Er befasst sich ganz allgemein mit der Beweisaufnahme, unter anderem also auch mit Beweisen, die noch nicht im Gerichtssaal anwesend sind und somit erst erhoben werden müssen. Die Liste der möglichen Ablehnungsgründe ist hier noch länger. Unter anderem erlaubt es dieser Paragraph dem Gericht auch, eine Beweiserhebung, also die Beschaffung von Beweisen, gänzlich abzulehnen, wenn das Gericht meint, die Wahrheit schon zu kennen, gleichgültig, ob diese mit der Beweisbehauptung übereinstimmt oder nicht. Zur Zeit von Galileo Galilei war es zum Beispiel offenkundig, dass sich die Sonne um die Erde dreht. Unter Anwendung einer ähnlichen Prozesslogik verbot die Heilige Inquisition es Angeklagten daher, den Gegenbeweis anzutreten, weil das Gericht zu wissen meinte, was wahr ist. Daher endete Giordano Bruno auf dem Scheiterhaufen und Galileo im lebenslangen Hausarrest.

Der §245 der Strafprozessordnung schränkt diese absolute richterliche Macht zur Erklärung der Wahrheit dahingehend ein, dass bereits erhobene, also im Gerichtssaal anwesende Beweismittel nur dann wegen Offenkundigkeit abgelehnt werden können, wenn die zu beweisende Tatsache offenkundig wahr ist. Das Gericht muss also die Beweisbehauptung als wahr unterstellen. Das hindert deutsche Richter freilich nicht daran, im Notfall im Gerichtssaal anwesende Beweismittel auch dann abzulehnen, wenn sie die Beweisbehauptung für offenkundig falsch erklären. Auch dazu später mehr.

Die offenkundige Waffenungleichheit zwischen Verteidigung und Anklage bei der Beweisaufnahme widerspricht übrigens dem Geist der Europäischen Menschenrechtskonvention, in der es im Absatz 3 von Artikel 6 heißt, dass jedem Angeklagten das Recht zu garantieren sei, „die Ladung und Vernehmung der Entlastungszeugen unter denselben Bedingungen zu erwirken, wie sie für Belastungszeugen gelten“. Seltsamerweise spricht die Konvention nur von Zeugen, als ob es keine anderen Beweisarten gäbe.

Kommen wir nun zu einem anderen Thema, nämlich der Art und Weise, wie deutsche Richter mit Beweisen umgehen. §261 der Strafprozessordnung lautet:

Nach deutschem Strafprozessrecht sind daher allein die Richter, die einen Strafprozess durchgeführt haben, ermächtigt, die vorgelegten Beweise nach Gutdünken auszulegen und darauf basierend zu einem Urteil zu kommen. Sie sind dabei an rein gar nichts gebunden – weder an Logik noch an Wahrhaftigkeit noch an Ehrlichkeit. Mit anderen Worten: dies ist ein Blankoscheck für deutsche Richter, unkorrigiert zu irren und ungestraft zu lügen und zu betrügen.

Das mag sich harsch anhören. Tatsache ist jedoch, dass genau aufgrund dieser Logik in deutschen Strafgerichtssälen keinerlei Wortlautprotokoll geführt wird. Dies ist sogar dann der Fall, wo der Inhalt der Beweiserhebung wenigstens summarisch festgehalten wird, nämlich bei Strafverfahren vor Amtsgerichten, wie es §273, Absatz 2 der Strafprozessordnung vorsieht. Der dort genannte Strafrichter und das Schöffengericht sind Institutionen des Amtsgerichts.

Strafprozessordnung führt dazu aus, dass die Beweiskraft des Protokolls nur auf die protokollierten Formalitäten beschränkt ist – zumindest legen die Juristen dieses Kauderwelsch dahingehend aus. Wenn das Protokoll einer Amtsgerichtsverhandlung also ausführt, der Zeuge Soundso habe am Soundsovielten ausgesagt und dabei angegeben, er habe ein rotes Auto um die Kurve flitzen sehen, so erstreckt sich die Beweiskraft dieses Protokolls bloß auf die Tatsache, dass der Zeuge an jenem Tag aussagte, nicht aber, was er inhaltlich ausführte. Wenn die Richter also im Urteil schreiben, der Zeuge habe ausgesagt, er habe einen grünen Laster am Straßenrand stehen sehen, so haben die Richter recht und nicht das Protokoll, basta!

Und wenn Sie es partout nicht glauben wollen, lesen Sie es einfach bei Wikipedia nach.<sup>[7]</sup>

Leider müssen wir uns noch ein paar weitere Paragraphen anschauen, um zu verstehen, wie es in deutschen Gerichtssälen zugeht. Ich bitte dafür um etwas Geduld.

In Deutschland wird, wie erwähnt, nur beim Amtsgericht ein summarisches Inhaltsprotokoll geführt. Und warum? Nun, der Grund für dieses summarische Inhaltsprotokoll liegt darin, dass man gegen das Urteil eines Amtsgerichts Berufung einlegen kann. Wird der Berufung stattgegeben, so muss das Gericht der zweiten Instanz zu dem Fall erneut Beweise erheben. Siehe dazu §328 der Strafprozessordnung. Damit die Richter das Verfahren abkürzen können, können sie im Protokoll des Amtsgerichts nachlesen, was während der Verhandlung in erster Instanz vorgefallen ist. Das kann ihnen Arbeit ersparen.

Interessanterweise kann man gegen Urteile aus erster Instanz, die von einem Landgericht verkündet wurden, keine Berufung einlegen. Dies betrifft die sogenannten Strafkammern und Schwurgerichte, die am Landgericht tätig sind. Man kann bei derlei Urteilen nur eine sogenannte Revision einlegen. Bei einer Revision kann man nur rügen, dass irgendwelche Formalitäten nicht eingehalten oder anderweitiges geltendes Recht verletzt wurde. Dass irgendetwas mit den inhaltlichen Behauptungen des Gerichts im Urteil nicht stimmt, kann man nicht beanstanden. Weil es daher rechtlich gesehen völlig unerheblich ist, was sich bei einem Prozess vor dem Landgericht zutrug, führen diese Gerichte bloß ein Formprotokoll, wie sich aus dem ersten Absatz von §273 Strafprozessordnung ergibt. In einem solchen Formprotokoll liest man dann zum Beispiel, dass der Zeuge Soundso am Soundsovielten eine Aussage machte, jedoch findet sich keinerlei Silbe darüber, was er denn aussagte.

Auch bei der Auslegung von Dokumenten und Sachbeweisen herrscht richterlicher Absolutismus. Wenn bei der Beweisaufnahme zum Beispiel ein Dokument eingeführt wurde, das eindeutig einen Sachverhalt A beweist, das Gericht im Urteil aber schreibt, das Dokument widerlege den Sachverhalt A, dann hat das Gericht recht. Es hat die absolute Hoheit bei der Auslegung der eingebrachten Beweise. Im Falle eines Landgerichtsurteils gibt es dagegen keine Möglichkeit der Beschwerde.

Bis zur Fassung des Jahres 1965 macht es die Strafprozessordnung übrigens noch allen Gerichten zur Pflicht, wenigstens die „wesentlichen Ergebnisse einer (Zeugen)Vernehmung zu protokollieren“. [8] Da aber gegen die Urteile deutscher Landgerichte ohnehin keine Berufung in der jeweiligen Sache möglich ist, hat man die Landgerichte in der Fassung von 1975 von dieser Pflicht entbunden. Die Logik hat etwas für sich: Weil man eventuelle inhaltliche Irrtümer und Lügen deutscher Richter am Landgericht ohnehin nicht rügen kann, braucht auch nicht aufgezeichnet zu werden, was sich im Gerichtssaal zuträgt. Klasse! Das ist die Logik des Terrors!

Bei Strafverfahren, die gleich in erster Instanz vor dem Landgericht durchgeführt werden, geht es für den Angeklagten üblicherweise sozusagen um die Wurst. Er wird dort wegen besonders schwerer Verletzungen des Rechtsfriedens angeklagt, die mit mehr als vier Jahren Strafe geahndet werden können. Wen Näheres interessiert, der kann dies in den Paragraphen 24 und 74 des Gerichtsverfassungsgesetzes nachlesen. [9] Ich werde Sie her nicht auch noch mit diesem Paragraphenschungel nerven. Gerade in solchen Fällen, wo es keinerlei Berufungsmöglichkeit gibt, wäre es wichtig, dass die Richter im eigenen Interesse die Fakten gleich beim ersten und einzigen Mal richtig hinkriegen. Wie soll das aber ohne Wortlautprotokoll möglich sein?

Diese absolute Auslegungshoheit in Abwesenheit von Wortlautprotokollen hat wiederholt zu harscher Kritik geführt. Einer der prominentesten Kritiker ist der ehemalige Strafverteidiger Rolf Bossi, der diesen krassen Mangel des deutschen Strafrechts in seinem Buch Halbgötter in Schwarz darlegte und kritisierte. Hier ist ein Bericht zu diesem Problem, der von 3Sat anlässlich des Erscheinens von Bossis Buch 2005 ausgestrahlt wurde:

Das deutsche Strafrecht wurde seither mehrmals revidiert, aber in dieser Hinsicht geschah nichts. Ganz im Gegenteil. Weil einige Strafverteidiger die Allmachtsallüren deutscher Richter im Gerichtssaal anprangerten und unbequeme Beweisanträge stellten, wurde 1994 kurzerhand ein Paragraph hinzugeflickschustert, der es dem Gericht nach Gutdünken erlaubt, dem Verteidiger den Mund zu verbieten – mit Ausnahme des Plädoyers. Hier ist der Wortlaut des skandalösen §257a:[\[10\]](#)

Da sich dies auf alle Verfahrensbeteiligten bezieht, hört sich das schön neutral an, aber es ist eine Tatsache, dass dieser Paragraph ausschließlich gegen Strafverteidiger eingesetzt wird, um ihnen einen Maulkorb zu verpassen. Damit wird freilich das menschenrechtlich verbrieftete Recht auf ein öffentliches Verfahren unterlaufen, denn wenn ein Richter der Verteidigung erst einmal den Mund verboten hat, hört die Öffentlichkeit nur noch, was die Staatsanwälte und Richter zum Fall zu sagen haben. Zudem darf man davon ausgehen, dass viele Anträge, die in einem Verfahren oft spontan und daher mündlich vorgetragen werden, nach Erlass dieser Anordnung durch den Richter überhaupt nicht mehr gestellt werden.

Dazu passt der § 249 der Strafprozessordnung, der es dem Richter erlaubt, dass als Beweis eingeführte Dokumente nicht etwa öffentlich verlesen werden, sondern dass die Prozessbeteiligten den Inhalt im Selbstleseverfahren zur Kenntnis nehmen. Das heißt, dass sie das Dokument mit nach Hause nehmen und im stillen Kämmerlein lesen – oder sie müssen zumindest am dafür bestimmten Gerichtstag versichern, es gelesen zu haben. Ob sie das wirklich getan haben, wird nicht geprüft.

Im Extremfall, wenn die gesamte Beweisführung ausschließlich auf Dokumenten beruht, die alle im Selbstleseverfahren eingeführt werden, heißt dies, dass die Öffentlichkeit überhaupt rein gar nichts vom Inhalt der Beweise erfährt. Auch das ist eine Verhöhnung des Prinzips der öffentlichen Verhandlung.

Dr. Dr. Uwe Scheffler, Professor für Strafrecht an der Europa-Universität in Frankfurt an der Oder, schrieb zu diesen beiden Maulkorbparagraphen treffend:

h., daß man den Verfahrensbeteiligten nur die Möglichkeit gibt, von dem Wortlaut der Schriftstücke im stillen Kämmerlein ‚Kenntnis zu nehmen‘, kann man nun Totenruhe im Gerichtssaal herstellen. Es sei über die häufig geäußerte Kritik hinaus noch auf folgendes hingewiesen: Der Gesetzgeber hat ausdrücklich betont, diese neue Regelung diene der ‚Straffung‘ der Hauptverhandlung. Da nun mal Schreiben plus Wortlaut zur Kenntnis nehmen länger dauert als mündliches Vortragen, bedeutet dies, daß der Gesetzgeber regelrecht darauf zielt, daß nunmehr auf das rechtliche Gehör verzichtet wird.“

Es gibt noch viele weitere Änderungen des Strafprozessrechts, die sich nachteilig für Angeklagte auswirken. Ich kann hier aber unmöglich auf alle eingehen. Eine Auflistung einiger der betroffenen Paragraphen kann man der Fußnote 5 von Rainer Hamms Beitrag über den „Beweis als Rechtsbegriff und seine revisionsrechtliche Kontrolle“ finden, den man in der hier zitierten Festschrift für Gerhard Fezer findet.<sup>[11]</sup> Wenn Sie an weiteren Details zur geschichtlichen Entwicklung der Strafprozessordnung in der BRD interessiert sind, empfehle ich die Lektüre des bereits erwähnten Beitrags von Ingo Müller. Er beschreibt darin, wie es nach dem zweiten Weltkrieg löbliche Anstrengungen gegeben hat, das unter dem Nationalsozialismus zum Nachteil der Angeklagten ausgehöhlt Strafrecht wieder liberaler zu gestalten. Aufgrund des Terrorismus der Roten Armee Fraktion während der 1970er Jahre kam es jedoch zu einer Gegenbewegung, während der alle liberalen Reformen wieder rückgängig gemacht wurden. Danach kam es zu immer weiteren Wellen der „Deliberalisierung“, so dass man mit Fug und Recht sagen kann, dass das deutsche Strafprozessrecht heute repressiver ist, als es unter dem Nationalsozialismus war.

Schon der geschichtliche Ursprung der Strafprozessordnung ist kein liberaler. Sie stammt aus dem Jahre 1877, also aus der Zeit des Kaiserreichs. Das mag verständlich machen, warum darin keine Wortlautprotokolle vorgesehen waren, obwohl andere Staaten auch damals schon Wortlautprotokolle führten. Es mag damals wirklich aufwendig gewesen sein, ein Wortlautprotokoll von dem anzufertigen, was sich im Gerichtssaal abspielte. Man brauchte dafür Stenographen und später dann Tippsen. Heute gibt es allerdings keine Entschuldigung mehr dafür, dass in deutschen Vernehmungsräumen der Polizei und in Gerichtssälen keinerlei Wortlautprotokolle angefertigt werden. Im Zeitalter der Supercomputer wird automatische Spracherkennungssoftware heutzutage überall wie selbstverständlich eingesetzt: in den Gerichtssälen der meisten anderen Staaten der Welt, bei den Massenmedien, in der Medizin, usw.

Was in den meisten westlichen Rechtsstaaten seit Jahrhunderten übliche Praxis ist, steht jedoch in Deutschland noch nicht einmal zur Diskussion. Die gegenwärtig in Planung befindliche Generalüberholung der Strafprozessordnung sieht nämlich in dieser Hinsicht keinerlei Änderung vor. Neu ist dabei nur, dass der Kriminalpolizei und den Gerichten die Möglichkeit eingeräumt wird, bestimmte Zeugenvernehmungen audiovisuell aufzunehmen. Eine Pflicht zur wörtlichen Aufzeichnung all dessen, was sich in Vernehmungsräumen oder in Gerichtssälen abspielt, und die Möglichkeit, diese Protokolle bei Berufungs- und Revisionsanträgen als Beweise dafür anzuführen, was sich zutrug, ist nicht vorgesehen.

In einem Beitrag während der Petersberger Tage der Arbeitsgemeinschaft Strafrecht im Deutschen Anwaltsverein meinte Prof. Dr. Werner Leitner dazu passend:[12]

Ebenso wenig ist vorgesehen, der totalitären Beweiswürdigungsmacht des Richters gewissen Grenzen zu setzen, wie etwa, dass die Würdigung logisch und in sich sowie den Beweisen gegenüber widerspruchsfrei sein muss. Doch ohne Wortlautprotokolle ließe sich die logische Schlüssigkeit ohnehin kaum und die Widerspruchsfreiheit zu Zeugenaussagen überhaupt nicht überprüfen.

Als „vertane Chance“ wurde die anstehende Reform der Strafprozessordnung daher in einem Artikel der Kriminalpolitischen Zeitschrift zu Recht bezeichnet.[13]

Ob man nun die türkische Militärdiktatur, Stalins Sowjetunion oder die heutige Bundesrepublik Deutschland betrachtet: Betrügern, Dieben, Schlägern, Vergewaltigern und Mördern erging bzw. ergeht es in allen diesen Staaten letztlich nicht viel anders, und die meisten haben für derlei Straftäter ohnehin keinerlei Sympathie.

Konzentrieren wir uns also auf jene, die unschuldig in die Räder der Justiz geraten. Einer der Aufgaben eines Rechtssystems müsste es sein, zu verhindern, dass Richter vermeidbare Fehler und Irrtümer begehen, die zu Lasten Unschuldiger gehen.

Weitaus wichtiger ist es aber, zu verhindern, dass die Justiz dazu missbraucht wird, bestimmte Individuen oder Personenkreise zu unterdrücken. Die Qualität eines Strafrechtssystems erweist sich erst, wenn es Angeklagten selbst in solchen Fällen genügend Schutz gewährt, bei denen es in irgendeiner Weise um gesellschaftliche Tabus geht. Dann herrscht nämlich ein unausgesprochener Konsens unter fast allen Mitgliedern einer Gesellschaft, bestimmte Ansichten für böseartig und strafwürdig zu halten, seien diese Ansichten auch noch so friedlich.

Leider hat Deutschland eine lange Geschichte der Verfolgung Andersdenkender mittels der Strafjustiz, die vor die Zeit des Nationalsozialismus zurückreicht.

Als frühester Vorläufer kann hier der §100 des Preußischen Strafgesetzbuches von 1794 gelten, der mit vier- bis sechsmonatiger Freiheitsstrafe jene bedrohte, die in Predigten oder öffentlichen Reden gegen Religionen zu Hass oder Verbitterung aufriefen.<sup>[14]</sup> Der Paragraph, der wesentlich enger bestimmt war und milder bestrafte, als all das, was ihm folgen sollte, spiegelte die von Preußen gelebte Religionstoleranz wieder. Weitaus repressiver war der infolge der gescheiterten 1848er Revolution erlassene §17 einer preußischen Verordnung von 1849, der mit Geldstrafe oder mit vier Wochen bis zu zwei Jahren Freiheitsstrafe denjenigen bedrohte, der – Zitat:

Aus der Sicht der Herrschenden war dieser Schritt notwendig geworden, weil die 1848er Revolution die Aufrechterhaltung staatlicher Vorzensur unmöglich gemacht hatte. Der neue Paragraph führte die Zensur durch die Hintertür wieder ein, indem er durch Strafandrohung den Bürger zur Selbstzensur veranlasste, um einer Bestrafung zu entgehen. Diese Art der punitiven Nachzensur ist weitaus subtiler und daher weniger angreifbar.

Dieser Paragraphen ersetzte zwei Jahre später, also 1851, in leicht umformulierter Form den alten §100 des preußischen Strafgesetzbuchs und wurde so zum direkten Vorläufer des heutigen Volksverhetzungsparagraphen 130.[16] Dessen erste Fassung, der §130 Reichsstrafgesetzbuch, galt seit 1872, jedoch verbot er lediglich die Klassenhetze, sprich die von Kommunisten, Sozialisten und Sozialdemokraten verbreitete „Klassenkampfpropaganda“. Zitat:

Dieser Paragraph blieb im Wesentlichen bis zum Jahre 1960 unverändert, doch nichts von dem, was in Preußen und sodann im Kaiserreich strafverfolgt wurde, wird heute noch als Hetze angesehen und verfolgt. Der Nationalsozialismus, der sich die Auflösung der Klassen und die Schaffung einer Volksgemeinschaft auf die Fahnen geschrieben hatte, ersetzte das Konzept des Klassenkampfes durch das der Volksverhetzung, das sich primär gegen jene richtete, die gegen den Staat, seine Politik, Organe und Amtsträger hetzten. Es war daher ein reiner Schutzparagraph des Staates gegen die Kritik seiner Bürger, eine klassische Umkehrung der Menschenrechte.[17] Freilich führten die Nazis auch die 1848 aufgegebenen Vorzensur wieder ein, so dass sie über ein allumfassendes rechtliches Instrumentarium der Meinungskontrolle verfügten, von dem sie bekanntlich ausgiebig Gebrauch machten.

Erst mit der Strafrechtsänderung von 1960 wurde der Klassenkampfparagraph in den bis heute gültigen Volksverhetzungsparagrafen umgewandelt, der die Hetze gegen Klassen durch die Hetze gegen Bevölkerungsteile ersetzte. Ausgelöst wurde diese Novelle durch Hakenkreuzschmiereien und andere antijüdische Aktionen, die sich später als von Agenten des Ostblocks durchgeführte Geheimdienstaktionen erwiesen, die das Ziel verfolgten, dem Ansehen der Bundesrepublik Deutschland zu schaden. Der neue Paragraph lautete nun, Zitat:

Seither ist dieser Paragraph wiederholt erweitert worden und umfasst mittlerweile sieben Absätze, zieht sich über mehr als eine Seite hin, und stellt so ziemlich alles Gedankengut unter Strafe, das den Mächtigen suspekt ist.

Diese Grafik zeigt, wie der Umfang dieses deutschen Maulkorbparagrafen über die Jahre hinweg gewachsen ist.[18]

Wurde der alte Klassenkampfparagraph gegen linkes Gedankengut eingesetzt, so richtet sich der neue Volksverhetzungsparagraph gegen rechtes Gedankengut. Er ist eine Art hysterische Überreaktion der deutschen Eliten auf die Exzesse des Nationalsozialismus.

Egal, wer auch immer in Deutschland das Ziel staatlicher Gesinnungsjustiz ist oder war, deutsche Richter waren und sind immer willfährig bei der Umsetzung regierungsamtlicher Verfolgungsintentionen. Wie Bossi in seinem Buch richtig feststellte, hatte die Gesinnungsjustiz unter den Nazis für die deutschen Juristen keinerlei nachteilige Wirkung. Kein Nazirichter wurde je für seine Urteile gegen Andersdenkende vor Gericht gestellt. Auch heute zucken die Richter mit den Achseln, denn sie setzen ja nur geltendes Recht um. Die Gesetzgebung selbst obliegt ihnen genauso wenig, wie es ihnen möglich ist, geltendes Recht als Unrecht abzulehnen.

Doch halt. Da gibt es eine Ausnahme. Die Richter am Bundesverfassungsgericht können sehr wohl geltendes Recht als Unrecht ablehnen und somit für ungültig erklären. Und genau da ist der Haken.

In einem Vergleich der obersten Gerichte der USA und der BRD kam eine Untersuchung des Boston College für Internationales und Vergleichendes Recht zu dem Schluss, dass genau hier eine Schwäche des deutschen Rechtssystems liege. Während in den USA jedes Bundesgericht ein von der Regierung erlassenes Gesetz auf seine Verfassungskonformität überprüfen und im Konfliktfall für verfassungswidrig und somit ungültig erklären kann, haben deutsche Amts-, Land- und Oberlandesgerichte keinerlei Vollmacht, sich dahingehend auch nur zu äußern. Sie müssen hingegen geltendes Recht blindlings anwenden. Erst wenn ein Fall durch alle Instanzen gegangen ist und schließlich erfolgreich vor das Bundesverfassungsgericht gebracht wurde, kann dieses dann die Frage der Verfassungswidrigkeit behandeln.[19]

Die Richter des Bundesverfassungsgerichts werden vom Bundestag ernannt. Das läuft üblicherweise so ab, dass sich die etablierten Parteien im Voraus einigen, wer wann das Recht hat, einen Kandidaten seines Parteienklüngels dort einzusetzen. Dieser Kuhhandel macht freilich aus der Gewaltenteilung einen schlechten Witz. Was erwartet man also im Konfliktfall von einem Gericht, das so von den herrschenden Eliten handverlesen politisch besetzt wird?

Als es im Jahre 2009 darum ging, zu entscheiden, ob Passagen des §130 gegen das Verfassungsprinzip der Meinungsfreiheit verstoßen, war die Entscheidung dieses Gerichts entlarvend. Ich zitiere:[20]

Sonderrecht, wenn es nicht hinreichend offen gefasst ist und sich von vornherein nur gegen bestimmte Überzeugungen, Haltungen oder Ideologien richtet. [...] Zwar ist die Vorschrift des § 130 Abs. 4 StGB kein allgemeines Gesetz [...sie] ist aber auch als nichtallgemeines Gesetz ausnahmsweise mit Art. 5 Abs. 1 und 2 GG vereinbar. Angesichts des Unrechts und Schreckens, die die nationalsozialistische Herrschaft verursacht hat, ist [...] eine Ausnahme vom Verbot des Sonderrechts immanent.“

Oder anders ausgedrückt: Ausnahmegesetze sind verboten, außer in Ausnahmefällen. In diesem Fall heißt die Logik dieser Ausnahme wie folgt:

Weil Deutschland in der Vergangenheit unter Bruch der Weimarer Verfassung Bücher verbrannt und friedliche Dissidenten verfolgt und eingesperrt hat, ist Deutschland heute moralisch verpflichtet, unter Bruch der Bonner Verfassung Bücher zu verbrennen und friedliche Dissidenten zu verfolgen und einzusperren.

Tatsache ist, dass sich der §130 Strafgesetzbuch schon seit seiner Erfindung im Jahre 1849 „von vornherein nur gegen bestimmte Überzeugungen, Haltungen oder Ideologien“ richtete und diese Eigenschaft auch heute nicht verloren hat. Er ist daher klar von vorne bis hinten verfassungswidrig.

Kein Justizsystem der Welt braucht Strafgesetze zum Verbot bestimmter Meinungsäußerungen. Wenn jemand sein Recht auf Meinungsäußerung dazu missbraucht, öffentlich zur Verletzung der Grund- und Menschenrechter Dritter aufzurufen, dann wird dies in allen Rechtssystemen durch das Verbot der Anstiftung (§26 Strafgesetzbuch) oder des öffentlichen Aufrufens zu Straftaten (§111 Strafgesetzbuch) bereits abgedeckt. Diese Gesetze allein verdienen die Bezeichnung eines „allgemeinen Gesetzes“. Jedes zusätzliche Zensurgesetz ist nichts weiter als die Ausgeburt diktatorischen Denkens, gegen das jeder Deutsche nach Artikel 20 Absatz 4 des Grundgesetzes das Recht und die Pflicht zum Widerstand hat, sobald das Bundesverfassungsgericht eine Abhilfe verweigert.

George Orwell hat es im ursprünglich vorgesehenen Vorwort zu seinem Buch Animal Farm, das unter anderem auf Druck der britischen Regierung von vier Verlegern abgelehnt worden war, wie folgt ausgedrückt: [21]

“If liberty means anything at all, it means the right to tell people what they do not want to hear.”

Wie zuvor erwähnt, ergibt sich die Qualität eines Rechtssystems daraus, ob es in der Lage ist, Bevölkerungsgruppen, deren Ansichten die Mächtigen zu unterdrücken trachten, vor staatlicher Verfolgung zu schützen. Primär geht es dabei um jene Menschen, welche die zentralen Tabus einer Gesellschaft brechen oder ihre Gründungsmythen untergraben, also solche, deren Kritik an die Wurzeln einer Gesellschaft geht. Solange diese Ansichten friedlich sind, also nicht zur Verletzung der Rechte Dritter aufrufen oder eine solche Verletzung rechtfertigen, sollte die Justiz derlei öffentlich geäußerte Ansichten nicht bestrafen.

Was sind nun aber die zentralen Tabus und die Gründungsmythen der heutigen deutschen Gesellschaft?

1999 führte der damalige Bundesaußenminister Joschka Fischer Folgendes aus:[22]

“Alle Demokratien haben eine Basis, einen Boden. Für Frankreich ist das 1789. Für die USA die Unabhängigkeitserklärung. Für Spanien der spanische Bürgerkrieg. Nun, für Deutschland ist das Auschwitz. Es kann nur Auschwitz sein. Die Erinnerung an Auschwitz, das ‘nie wieder Auschwitz’, kann in meinen Augen das einzige

Fundament der neuen Berliner Republik sein.”

Ich könnte jetzt eine lange Reihe von Persönlichkeiten und Medienstimmen zitieren, die ausdrücken, was sie davon halten, wenn jemand an diesem Fundament rüttelt. Ich kann uns das aber ersparen, denn jeder weiß, was die überwältigende Mehrheit der Bevölkerung in Deutschland von denen hält, denen man nachsagt, sie leugnen Auschwitz bzw. den Holocaust als Ganzes. Derlei Menschen befinden sich für viele auf einem ähnlichen moralischen Niveau wie Kinderschänder. Tiefer könnte man kaum sinken.

Was würden Sie machen, wenn da jemand herkommt und Ihnen auf friedliche und womöglich gar wissenschaftlich-sachliche Weise etwas zu Auschwitz sagt, was Sie partout nicht hören wollen? Das ist fast schon eine rhetorische Frage in einer Gesellschaft, bei der ein fast monolithischer Konsens darüber besteht, was mit derlei tabubrechenden Geschichtsdissidenten zu geschehen hat.

Aber genau hier stellt sich die Gretchenfrage: Wie hältst Du es mit der Rechtsstaatlichkeit? Kann und wird das deutsche Rechtssystem friedliche Dissidenten zur Geschichtsschreibung des Dritten Reiches vor staatlichen und gesellschaftlichen Übergriffen schützen, oder wirft es sie den Wölfen zum Fraß vor?

An der harten bundesdeutschen Realität zeigt sich leider, dass das deutsche Justizsystem geradezu perfekt dazu maßgeschneidert ist, um politische Erwartungen ohne Widerstand mit juristischer Strafgewalt durchzusetzen.

Nachfolgend werde ich kurz aufzeigen, wie so etwas im Einzelnen abläuft.

Ganz besonders wichtig ist es, dass man die Rädelsführer dieser Dissidenten aburteilt, um ein Exempel für alle zu statuieren. Wegen einer besonders schweren Störung des Rechtsfriedens werden diese daher gleich vor dem Landgericht angeklagt. Damit verbaut man ihnen jegliche Möglichkeit zu einer Berufung, und da in derlei Strafprozessen keinerlei Inhaltsprotokolle geführt werden, wird der Manipulation Tür und Tor

Sämtliche, wirklich ausnahmslos alle Beweisanträge der Verteidigung, mit der sie beweisen will, dass die geschichtlichen Ansichten des Angeklagten wohlfundiert oder gar korrekt sind, werden wegen Offenkundigkeit des Gegenteils der Beweisbehauptung abgelehnt. Laut jahrzehntelanger Rechtsprechung des Bundesgerichtshofs müssen deutsche Gerichte das sogar.

Hat die Verteidigung ihre Beweise bereits im Gerichtssaal vorliegen, so verbietet es die Strafprozessordnung zwar, diese wegen Offenkundigkeit des Gegenteils der Beweisbehauptung abzulehnen, aber die deutschen Gerichte tun das trotzdem, und der Bundesgerichtshof, der derlei Rechtsbrüche rügen sollte, hat diese Praxis wiederholt genehmigt und bestätigt.[23]

Beweisanträge, mit denen die Verteidigung nach §244 Absatz 4 der Strafprozessordnung nachweisen will, dass ihr gutachterliche Beweise vorliegen, die früheren, bei Gericht vorgelegten Gutachten überlegen sind, werden ebenso wegen Offenkundigkeit abgelehnt, obwohl die Beweiskraft eines neuen und dem Gericht unbekanntes Beweismittels gar nicht offenkundig sein kann. Auch dieser Rechtsbruch wird vom Bundesgerichtshof abgesegnet.[24]

Beweisanträge, mit denen bewiesen werden soll, dass es einen merklichen öffentlichen Widerspruch gegen die Offenkundigkeit gibt, werden ebenso wegen Offenkundigkeit abgelehnt.[25]

Beweisanträge, mit denen bewiesen werden soll, dass es deshalb keinen merklichen öffentlichen Widerspruch gegen die Offenkundigkeit mehr gibt, weil Historiker Angst vor Strafverfolgung haben und sich daher zur Sache öffentlich nicht mehr ehrlich äußern, werden ebenso wegen Offenkundigkeit abgelehnt.[26]

Genervt von derlei Anträgen der Verteidigung in Prozessen gegen Geschichtsdissidenten, ging die deutsche Justiz dann Mitte der 1990er Jahre sogar so weit, zu entscheiden, dass schon das Stellen eines

Beweisantrages dann ein Rechtsbruch ist, wenn die Absicht darin besteht, die strafbaren Ansichten des Angeklagten als korrekt nachzuweisen. Denn damit würde ja der Strafverteidiger im Gerichtssaal das Verbrechen der Leugnung, wegen dem sein Mandat vor Gericht steht, in aller Öffentlichkeit gleich noch einmal begehen. Auch diese Entscheidungen, mit denen Strafverteidiger lediglich wegen der Stellung von Beweisanträgen verurteilt wurden, wurden vom Bundeshinrichtungshof gutgeheissen, da derlei Beweisanträge offenkundig unzulässig seien, zumal sie geltendes Recht verletzen.[27]

Einer der brutalsten Scharfrichter gegen Geschichtsdissidenten, der Mannheimer Richter Ulrich Meinerzhagen, wurde von der linken tageszeitung wie folgt zitiert:[28]

Denn wie wir ja alle wissen, Demokratie ist, wenn drei Füchse und ein Huhn darüber entscheiden, was es zum Abendessen gibt – oder hier, dass die überwältigende Mehrheit aller Mitglieder einer Gesellschaft unter Strafandrohung vorschreiben kann, welche Meinung Sie zu bestimmten Geschichtsthemen öffentlich äußern dürfen und welche nicht.

Offenbar hat der Jurastudent nicht begriffen, dass der Rechtsstaat gerade dazu erfunden wurde, um derlei Übergriffen der Mehrheit gegenüber Minderheiten einen Riegel vorzuschieben.

Die Ablehnung aller Beweisanträge ist in solchen Fällen aber noch lange nicht das Ende der juristischen Repressionsmaßnahmen. Bestimmte beherzte Anwälte ließen sich nämlich nicht den Mund verbieten, sondern trugen trotz Drohungen der Staatsanwaltschaft und der Richter mutig weiter Beweisanträge vor, mit denen sie versuchten, ihre Mandanten zu entlasten. Das Resultat dessen war 1994 die Einführung des bereits erwähnten Maulkorbparagraphen §257a in die Strafprozessordnung, die es Richtern ermöglicht, Verteidigern aufzuerlegen, sämtliche Beiträge mit Ausnahme ihres Plädoyers nur noch schriftlich vorzulegen. Und genau das geschieht in solchen Fällen regelmäßig.

Um vor der Öffentlichkeit den Eindruck zu vermeiden, dass die Angeklagten wegen gänzlich harmloser und wissenschaftlich wohlfundierter Äußerungen in die Kerker geschickt werden, werden ihre Schriften, für die sie vor dem Kadi stehen, nicht etwa im Gerichtssaal verlesen, sondern es wird grundsätzlich das „Selbstleseverfahren“ angeordnet.

Ruhe ist seither wieder jedermanns Bürgerpflicht in deutschen Gerichtssälen.

Klappe halten und bloß nicht aufmucken!

Am Ende eines solchen Schauprozesses, in dem die Verteidigung praktisch völlig gelähmt ist, steht dann ein Urteil, in das die Richter so ziemlich alles schreiben können, was sie wollen. Kontrolliert werden kann mangels Wortlautprotokolls ohnehin kaum etwas. So fördern die Richter ihre Karriere, reden den Lynchmedien nach dem Mund, und kuschen vor der Politik.

Ruhe ist erste Bürgerpflicht!

Aber letztlich brauchen Sie sich, werter Zuschauer, wahrscheinlich keine Sorgen zu machen. Denn als die Justiz die Holocaust-Leugner holte, konnten Sie getrost schweigen; Sie waren ja kein Holocaust-Leugner. Als sie die Nazis einsperrten, haben Sie weiter geschwiegen; Sie waren ja kein Nazi. Als sie die Rechten holten, haben Sie immer noch geschwiegen, denn Sie waren ja kein Rechter. Wenn sie dann einst Sie abholen werden, wird keiner mehr da sein, der protestieren könnte.

Viel Spaß dann mit unserer Possenjustiz!

Sie sind nämlich offenkundig vogelfrei!

Hier ist der Wortlaut des Grundgesetzartikels, um des es zentral geht. Dort steht, eine Zensur findet nicht statt, aber unsere Juristen verstehen darunter bloß eine Vorzensur. In Absatz 2 wird die Meinungsfreiheit dann gleich wieder abgeschafft, denn wenn laut Bundesverfassungsgericht eben auch nichtallgemeine Zensurgesetze in Ordnung sind, dann gibt es eben keine Meinungsfreiheit.

Im Jahre 1970 schrieb ein Professor für öffentliches Recht, der damals an der Universität für Verwaltungswissenschaften in Speyer lehrte, in einer obskuren Festschrift folgende passende Worte zu unsrem Widerstandsrecht gegen Übergriffe des Staates auf die im Grundgesetz verbürgten Menschenrechte:

17 Jahre später wurde der Autor dieser Zeilen zum Präsidenten des Bundesverfassungsgerichts, und weitere 7 Jahre später gar zum Bundespräsidenten gewählt. Die völlige Aushöhlung der Meinungsfreiheit in Deutschland vollzog sich während seiner Amtszeit.

Zusammenfassend ist festzuhalten:

1. Das Justizsystem der Bundesrepublik Deutschland ist stellenweise mittelalterlich in seiner Struktur, und formell betrachtet erlaubt die heutige Strafprozessordnung eine repressivere Prozessführung als die des Dritten Reiches.

2. In der Bundesrepublik Deutschland gibt es effektiv keine

Gewaltenteilung.

3. Gegen jeden Unrechtsstaat auf deutschem Boden haben alle Deutschen das Recht und die moralische Pflicht zum Widerstand.

The Fine Art of Hate-Speech Detection

by Germar Rudolf

Abstract

Hate speech is usually defined as a verbal attack on someone or some group based on some feature (disability, gender, religion, ethnicity, race etc.). To qualify, it can suffice that anyone finds that speech offensive. Hate speech is thus defined not by what it says, but by whether it is hated by someone. The present article tries to define hate speech in a rational, objective way, thus removing it from arbitrariness and subjective feelings.

One of the saddest lessons of history is this: If we've been bamboozled long enough, we tend to reject any evidence of the bamboozle. We're no longer interested in finding out the truth. The bamboozle has captured us. It is simply too painful to acknowledge—even to ourselves—that we've been so credulous. (So the old bamboozles tend to persist as the new bamboozles rise.) —Carl Sagan[\[1\]](#)

Denying certain groups their civil rights – like freedom of speech – starts by falsely portraying them as having an agenda aiming at violating other people's civil rights, as this cartoon does. CODOH is frequently and falsely lumped together with the “Nazis,” who are commonly – and grotesquely – seen as aiming at the mass-murder of everyone who isn't blond and blue-eyed.

Hate Speech is all around us, or so we are told. The Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC) is one of those organizations that enlighten us about this sad “fact” all the time, and they also list the haters it claims to have found in the US. Among them are the evil Holocaust Deniers, of which that center lists only six individuals or groups,[\[2\]](#) CODOH inevitably among them. There are other groups doing the same, like the ADL and Hillel, for instance. In their attempt to stymie CODOH's Campus Project, the ADL classified ads submitted by CODOH to student newspapers as “hate submissions.”[\[3\]](#) This categorization had been made popular by Deborah Lipstadt in her 1993 book Denying the Holocaust, which was a major first effort to thwart CODOH's advertisement campaign.

Of course, no one wants hate speech to be spread around. Or maybe I should say that everyone should be opposed to it. But that should concern all hate speech, not just the kind the SPLC, the ADL and Dr. Lipstadt want to see suppressed. It's a slippery slope to get on, as John Sack hinted when he wrote in 2001:[\[4\]](#)

“No one [at a revisionist conference in 2000] had ever said anything remotely like Elie Wiesel, ‘Every Jew, some-where in his being, should set aside a zone of hate – healthy, virile hate – for what persists in the Germans,’ [\[5\]](#) and no one had said anything like Edgar Bronfman, the president of the World Jewish Congress. A shocked professor told Bronfman once, ‘You are teaching a whole generation to hate thousands of Germans,’ and Bronfman replied, ‘No, I am teaching a whole generation to hate millions of Germans.’ Jew hatred like that German hatred, or like the German hatred I saw on every page of [Daniel Goldhagen’s 1996] Hitler’s Willing Executioners, I saw absolutely none of [...].”

Hence, if we all are to be treated equally, should Elie Wiesel, Edgar Bronfman and the ADL in general, and Daniel Goldhagen as well as other scholars writing in a similar vein all be categorized as hate mongers and hate groups?

Fact is that something isn't hate just because someone says so. As Deborah Lipstadt correctly stated:[\[6\]](#)

“When someone makes an outrageous claim, even though they may hold one of the highest offices in the land, if not the world, we must say to them: Where is the proof? Where is the evidence? We must hold their feet to the fire!”

So where is the proof that CODOH – and in extension Holocaust revisionism in general – is spreading hateful messages? And if they do, what sets their messages apart from what Elie Wiesel used to spread, or from what the ADL and the WJC are spreading? To find an answer to this, we need to first define how to detect hate speech. To do this, we need to first define what hate speech is. There are several ways of defining it, and here are some of them:

1. Hate speech can be recognized by the effect it has on others. It makes people hate other people or groups of people.
2. Hate speech can be recognized by the language used. It uses abusive, defamatory, insulting, libelous, denigrating, disparaging words to describe other people or groups of people.
3. Hate speech can be recognized by the actions it suggests. It advocates that the civil rights of others or entire groups be violated, or it at least suggests, justifies or condones such actions.

That list is not necessarily complete, and it goes without saying that speech can consist of any combination of these three characteristics. Let's now take a look at each one of these possible definitions.

1. Hateful Effects on Others

When Jesus Christ spread his message in Judea, it fomented hatred among some of his fellow Jews, leading to him being crucified and his followers being persecuted. That hateful persecution eventually encompassed the entire Roman Empire. This hatred, of course, was directed against Jesus, his message and against those following and spreading it. Once Jesus's message had become state doctrine in the 4th Century A.D., however, that persecution in the name of Jesus's messages turned against all those who refused to welcome and follow Jesus's message. The resulting hateful persecution of heretics and non-believers by what was later called the Holy Inquisition lasted deep into the modern time. Jesus's message therefore was capable of triggering hateful feelings, and thus reactions, both in his opponents and in his followers, with millions suffering tremendously over some 18 centuries as a consequence. Does that mean that Jesus's message is hate speech and therefore has to be banned? The same question could be raised about any religion, and even more so about any political ideology.

Here is another example along those lines: When Martin Luther spread his evangelical, protestant message in Germany in the 16th Century, it fomented hatred among his fellow Germans directed against the oppressive Church and state authorities, ultimately resulting in Germany's Peasant Wars, and eventually in Europe's first 30-Year War between 1618 and 1648, which devastated central Europe. To this day, Protestants and Catholics are holding grudges against each other which until not too long ago could erupt very violently in places like Northern Ireland. Therefore, Martin Luther's message triggered hateful feelings and thus reactions in others, with millions suffering tremendously during the past five centuries. Does that mean that Martin Luther's message is hate speech and therefore has to be banned?

It goes without saying that we do not have to limit this issue to religion and politics. Take the example of Charles Darwin. When he spread his theory of evolution, many Christians felt—and many still feel—deeply offended by it. On the other hand, quite a few people have developed unkind feelings toward Christians rejecting Darwin's theory. Only in a few cases may these feelings escalate to hatred. However, Darwin's theory had repercussions which have instilled far more hatred, starting with the eugenics movement, social Darwinism, and the whole gamut of racialist and racist ideologies which are all rooted to some degree in Darwin's theory of the "survival of the fittest." Hence, there can be no doubt that lots of hatred was fomented among mankind as a result of Darwin's theory. Does that mean that Darwin's theory is hate speech and therefore has to be banned?

I have chosen these three examples, because in these cases, answering the questions posed is easy. In all these cases, the answer is a categorical NO. This means that it cannot be determined by the reactions of others whether a speech is hateful. This is so, because the way others react to a speech does not merely depend on its contents, but on many more factors, like the historical, cultural, and societal context as well as the predisposition of each individual learning about the speech. It is a sad fact that people often hear something else than what a message actually says, or they make something else out of it. There is nothing in Jesus's speeches justifying the persecution of non-believers, just as there is nothing in Luther's theses calling for violent uprisings, or in Darwin's theory that justifies the denigration of religion, or racism of any kind. Hatred erupted and keeps erupting because people were and still are putting into Jesus's, Luther's or Darwin's mouth what they did not say, or at times even quite the opposite of what they said and taught.

Turning to Holocaust revisionism, it is clear that its message can instill hate in others. Most people develop unkind feelings against the messenger, but there may also be some who develop unkind feelings against individuals or groups who are most visibly spreading the orthodox Holocaust narrative, are profiting from it, or are opposing its revision by at times quite violent means, Jews most prominently among them. Only in a minority of cases, however, will those unkind feelings amount to hatred. The revisionist message as such, however, does not contain anything about attitudes toward anyone. It is merely about reassessing (claimed) historical events in the light of new, overlooked or re-evaluated evidence. Of course, there are writings by revisionists and their supporters that deal with attitudes toward others, but that is a separate issue, or at least it should be.

Hence, factual, evidence-based assertions about historical events can never fulfill the criterion of hate speech. Just because others develop unkind feelings when learning about them does not change this fact. If a factual statement about an event triggers emotions in people not directly involved in the event, the reason for that can usually be found in the way they have been conditioned as individuals and members of a society and a culture embedded in a certain zeitgeist. It is true that any event involving perpetrators and victims tends to trigger strong emotions, and so do statements made about such an event. It is therefore wise to choose words of empathy when dealing with such events, but no matter what we say, there is almost always someone who will be offended by what is said. If we all were required to stay silent in order to avoid offending someone – for it could lead to hate – humanity would have to relinquish its ability to speak.

The mainstream's take on it is different, though. When it comes to Holocaust revisionism, the less libelous and inciteful a speech is, the more dangerous it is considered by the mainstream. For instance, German journalist Patrick Bahners once stated about Holocaust revisionism:[\[7\]](#)

“But it is overlooked that the intention to incite [to hatred] cannot only be recognized by errors of form, which distinguishes beer table talks from a scientific lecture. Quite to the contrary, the incitement perfected in form is particularly perfidious.”

According to this logic, the more scientific and scholarly, unemotional and serious, hence factual and well-founded a speech is, the more likely it is to incite to hatred. That's the way the orthodox Holocaust establishment looks at Holocaust revisionism. If we were to apply this approach correspondingly, Charles Darwin's research would deserve to be burned at the stake, and Darwin probably alongside with it. That's the kind of anti-intellectual and anti-scientific attitude which endangers modern society at large, as Carl Sagan has correctly observed.[\[8\]](#)

2. Hateful Language

Cussing at people or groups of people or calling them names is a good indicator for hate speech, although it may depend on the context. If an African American within his circles calls his fellow African Americans “niggers,” that is not seen as an insult, because that expression is commonly used among many African Americans, but if a member of any other group uses that word, it is seen as an expression of denigration and thus hate. Whether that is always so again might depend on the context. The situation gets more complex when dealing with expressions that are not denigrating as such but which contain specific accusations that can be true or false. For instance, calling someone a criminal, a fraud or a liar may or may not be an insult, depending on whether or not the accusation can be demonstrated to be true. It's different when making sweeping accusations against entire groups, however, such as “all Jews are liars.” Except in a trivial way – in terms of all humans are liars, as everyone has lied at least once at some point in their lives – there is no way of ever proving such a statement to be true, hence it is defamatory and thus has the ability to instill feelings of hate. There are borderline cases, like the claim that Jews control U.S. foreign politics, or that the U.S. government is a ZOG – Zionist Occupied Government. Such a statement can in theory be shown to be correct or at least permissible, if the claim, sweeping and exaggerated as it may be, is pointing in a direction that is closer to the truth than any other similar assessment. We have seen it in the libel trial of David Irving against Deborah Lipstadt. Although the court found that some of Lipstadt's statements about Irving were defamatory, it found that Lipstadt's book is not defamatory as a whole, for the things it correctly stated were close enough to the truth to make the few mistakes it contains irrelevant.<sup>[9]</sup>

Holocaust revisionist texts deal with history. They do not use libelous terms in any regard, and they also usually don't concern themselves with making sweeping accusations against any particular group. Where they make them, they are usually qualified in terms of proffering evidence to support the claim. More frequent are accusations directed against witnesses – victims, bystanders, perpetrators – of erring, exaggerating and lying, in each case usually backed up with evidence to support the claim.

The orthodox Holocaust narrative is largely based on anecdotal evidence. If that narrative claims to be backed up by scholarly research, it needs to allow, even welcome the critical evaluation of oral claims made. Errors, exaggerations and lies by witnesses are the daily bread of every oral historian, and one of the duties of a scholar active in that field is to separate the wheat from the chaff. Although using potentially offending words to describe the lack of accuracy and reliability of a witness should be avoided as much as possible in order to maintain a detached, objective, scholarly attitude, there are sometimes clear-cut cases of lying where it must be allowed to call a spade a spade without running afoul of the thought police. Because let's face it: people do lie all the time. As a matter of fact, learning how to lie and how to deal with lies and liars is a very important skill children must learn in order to succeed in human societies.<sup>[10]</sup> Research has shown that we lie all the time, in particular to ourselves.<sup>[11]</sup> So, as a Holocaust revisionist, I may rightly ask: why should Jews be the only exception to the rule, in particular when it comes to a topic where so much is at stake for them? At the end of it, the proof lies in the pudding.

And again, just because some individual turns out to be indeed a liar, that does not mean that people are then entitled to develop feelings of hatred toward that person. Saying “you are a liar” does not contain the message “and thus you need to be hated,” in particular when considering that lying and exaggerating about our past experiences is more common than most people think. If a person jumps to that conclusion anyway, it is his or her own responsibility.

I remember that, as a young man, I was very impressed by the way some German political think tank was statistically evaluating the speeches of various German members of parliament for their “radicality.” They looked for words that were considered negative, such as insulting, spiteful or even hateful terms, gave each of them a value depending on how extreme those terms were considered, and made a tally. Their research showed that, the more a person's political views were considered “off-center,” the more radical was his or her choice of words.

Wikipedia says: “Hate speech is speech which attacks a person or group on the basis of attributes such as race, religion, ethnic origin, sexual orientation, disability, or gender.”

That definition is untenable. Take religion. If it is legitimate to criticize a religion, then why is it not equally legitimate to criticize, even verbally attack a person adhering to that religion?

Today I have severe reservations about that approach, because perforce it tends to portray those in power as moderate, while those in the opposition are portrayed as more or less radical, depending on how much they are in opposition to what those in power are doing or proposing to do. By the very nature of democracy and parliamentarianism, however, it is an opposition's obligation to criticize a government and to hold them responsible for what they do or plan. Those in power can always be more relaxed, while those in the opposition have the liberty of being more profound, even radical with their

If we turn to actual abuse of power by governments, it is clear that an opposition revealing such abuse will at times use strong words to describe that abuse, while a government has the tendency to veil or justify that abuse in calm, even legal terms that sound very reasonable. In extreme cases, where a government actually persecutes an opposition, the powerless victims of that persecution might scream bloody murder, while the government simply describes them as common criminals subject to perfectly normal and justifiable legal proceedings. If we were to analyze the speeches of either side in such a struggle using the above approach, it would turn out that the opposition is extremely radical, while the government is moderate, when in fact the exact opposite might be true. Hence, by their very design, such analyses of political speech tend to justify and thus stabilize governments, while they undermine the credibility of oppositional groups.

What I am getting at here is that speech needs to be seen in its context. To give one example: During the struggle against South-African apartheid, the ANC used radical terms in their fight against government policies, while the South-African government used cool legal terms to describe their suppression of this oppositional group. We can apply that to any such constellation. Hence, political speeches cannot be fairly evaluated without their proper political and societal context. If an oppositional group has justified grievances, it is also justified to use fitting terms to express them. The more extreme the grievances, the more they justify extreme expressions.

3. Suggesting or Condoning Hateful Actions

But where does it stop? To stick with my example, during the era of South-African apartheid, some members of the ANC at times advocated or justified the use of violence against representatives of the government, of other ethnic groups, or of competing oppositional groups. Although it is true that the political persecution which ANC members suffered made it acceptable for them to use strong words when talking about it, advocating, suggesting or condoning the violation of the civil rights of others is the very line we need to draw. Passing it is unacceptable.

Under certain circumstances, all governments of this world curtail the civil rights of their subordinates – when punishing offenders of the law for crimes committed. Such legal prosecution can turn into illegitimate persecution, however, if and when the law itself is in violation of inalienable human rights. Then, the justified curtailing of civil rights turns into their violation. “Hate speech” legislation is a case in point. If such legislation outlaws speech not because it calls for the violation of other people’s civil or human rights, but simply because some section of the population might develop unkind feelings toward another when listening to a speech, then “hate speech” is not defined by its content, but by the effect it might have on others. If the political or social conditions are tuned accordingly, such laws would get Jesus Christ, Nicolaus Copernicus, Giordano Bruno, Galileo Galilei, Martin Luther, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, Charles Darwin, Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King Jr. and all the other heroes of our civilization into peril. In fact, when looking at these individuals’ fate, we see that most of them did suffer to one degree or another because of that governmental attitude.

Hence, hate speech may never be defined by someone else developing feelings of hatred, but by the speech itself calling for or justifying violations of civil rights.

Think about the discussion in the U.S., in the context of the “war on terrorism,” whether it should be justified to subject suspects to torture. Individuals who justified third-degree interrogation methods argued very coolly and rationally. There was no hateful terminology in their language, no radical terms in what they expressed. And yet, they advocated and justified the violation of the human rights of others. It was and is hate speech in its purest form, but it was broadcast and taken seriously by the entire established media, who don't seem to have any rational, systematic tools to detect hate speech. They just go by their guts, by what they "feel" about a speech. If they hate it, it must be hate. This discussion about torture wasn't taking place in a vacuum, by the way, but at a time when people were – and still are – subjected to conditions in Guantanamo and elsewhere that can only be described as gross violations of their human rights.

Hate speech therefore does not have to use hateful terms. In fact, advocating or justifying that someone's civil rights should be violated is most effective if it comes with emotional detachment and scholarly reasoning. It's still hate speech, though.

On the other hand, expressions of hatred are not necessarily hate speech. I hate brown recluse spiders, because I got bitten by one last month, but that expression doesn't make it hate speech. Hate is an emotion that can, at times, be justified. It all depends on the circumstances, and it all depends what we make of it. Just as love doesn't allow us to harm people, hate also doesn't give us permission to wantonly harm or destroy the objects of our disdain, or to advocate or justify such acts.

4. Hateful Silence

There is another form of "hate speech" that is rarely talked about: condoning hateful actions. In the "war on terror," most mainstream media have been and keep looking the other way when it comes to governmental violations of civil rights, whether they take place in the United States, in Guantanamo Bay, in Iraq or elsewhere. Wars tend to have that effect on mainstream media. They turn into lackeys of the government. It wasn't any different during and after the Second World War either, when the victorious Allied nations committed their own crimes against humanity by implementing a policy of vengeance against the German people. Many a media outlet of those nations decided to look the other way. The New York Times, for instance, decided to report nothing about the anti-German mass slaughter and ethnic cleansing going on in Europe after the war. After all, the Germans had it coming, so deal with it.

Hence, there is hate speech – speech that advocates or justifies the violation of the human rights of others – and there is hateful silence, a tacit condoning of hateful acts that amounts to aiding and abetting in crimes, in particular if it is committed by people whose job it is to report about such things: the journalists of mainstream media.

This phenomenon is more widespread than we think. Censorship by omission is a common practice of all media. There are always some topics they won't cover, or will cover only in a slanted, negative way, and there are some individuals or groups of people about which the mainstream media simply won't say anything positive or supportive, lest it might help these pariahs in any way. The reason for this is that these groups at the fringe of society usually have an agenda, be it political or otherwise, that is despised – or even hated – by the mainstream media. Hence, if the members of such an ostracized group are unjustly persecuted, the media simply won't speak out. Worse still, they might actually pour oil into the fire of persecution, asking for it to be intensified, so that those who had it coming all along finally get what they deserve.

Both hate speech and hateful silence are most dangerous when they are committed by those with power and influence: by the government, and by the mainstream media. Both usually come under the cloak of respectability, integrity, and moderated, reasoned arguing. Hence, both cases are rarely ever even noticed.

5. Where Is CODOH in All This?

CODOH has the policy of not accepting, publishing, supporting or promoting any material that advocates, justifies or condones the violation of the civil rights of others.

Revising the history of the orthodox Holocaust narrative is just as perfectly acceptable as the revision of any other chapter of history. We draw the line, however, if anyone tries to justify or condone the civil rights violations committed by the Third Reich. We can discuss whether there were homicidal gas chambers used by the Third Reich to mass murder people, or whether the Third Reich planned and implemented a policy of extermination against Jews, Poles, Russians, Gypsies, Jehovah's Witnesses, Homosexuals, etc., until we're blue in the face, but we will not accept, publish, support or promote anything that tries to justify the use of homicidal gas chambers, or any other form of murder, or the implementation of any kind of policy in violation of civil right, be it a policy of ethnic cleansing, deportation, slave labor, or extermination.

If it happened, it is unjustifiable. If it didn't, the record needs to be corrected. The only way to distinguish the one from the other is by having an open debate without threats or name-calling against anyone.

Our commitment does not stop with the past, however. We will also not accept, publish, support or promote anything that advocates or justifies the violation of anyone's civil rights today or in the future. Hence, nothing we publish about the past justifies accusations of civil-rights violations today or in the future.

This follows the millennia-old golden rule that we must not wish onto others what we don't want to happen to ourselves. Plain and simple.

Hence, all those accusing CODOH of being a "hate group" spreading "hate speech" not only have it all wrong, but the shoe may actually be on the other foot. If they advocate, justify or condone that we at CODOH, our members and supporters be deprived of some of our civil rights just because they don't like our peaceful discussions of historical events, then their speech is a perfect match for real hate speech.

Sometimes, looking into a mirror is the quickest way to find a person engaged in hate speech...

Abstract

Holocaust revisionism is increasingly dismissed as a “conspiracy theory.” Two authors have turned the tables on revisionism’s accusers and have analyzed the orthodox narrative as to whether it qualifies as a “conspiracy theory” – and yes, it does.

Long branded as crackpot or “anti-Semitic,” Holocaust revisionism is increasingly dismissed by its adversaries, including such worthies as the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, Wikipedia, and Time magazine, as a “conspiracy theory.” The authors of Révisionnisme contre complotisme (Revisionism vs. Conspiracism) and Notes sur l'extermino-complotisme et le révisionnisme (Notes on Extermino-conspiracism and Revisionism) address this accusation head-on. The first, Rémi Perron, takes the conspiracy bull by the horns, to show that it is the Holocaust exterminationists who rely on conspiracy scenarios in defiance of the evidence. In Notes sur l'extermino-complotisme, François Fradin also surveys the exterminationists’ dependence on conspiratorial fantasies, but his chief focus is on the conspiracy theories of certain revisionist writers on the supposed Holocaust.

Both books dismiss what they call “conspiracism.” Perron defines conspiracism as the belief in “the existence of a conspiracy on the basis of invalid arguments (sophistries, bias) and/or claims to establish the evidence through an unscientific method” (Révisionnisme, 11). At the same time, Perron and Fradin accept that there are real conspiracies as well as imaginary ones.

The word “conspiracy” once designated a treasonous plot against the ruling order; in English law and its derivatives, “conspiracy” continues to be used to denote (single or related) crimes committed by more than one person consciously working together. Several decades ago, by dint of the efforts of government, academy, and media, the onus of conspiracy moved from conspirators, real and imagined, to those who impute conspiracies to powerful forces, often the state or supranational organizations. The odium and ridicule employed against conspiratorialists to bolster establishment interests has been such that the average person would rather be accused of conspiring than believing in conspiracies. This despite the fact that in the English-speaking countries, especially the United States, trying alleged conspirators occupies prosecutors on a daily basis.

Conspiracism is of course generally associated with the political right. Nonetheless, most persons continue to believe in conspiracies—they simply don't call them that. In this country the left side of the political spectrum frequently strives to strip off a false veneer of civility and decency that, to them, conceals an entrenched, grasping, brutal, and nearly always WASP power structure, as depicted in a raft of hard-boiled private-eye novels, exposés of the hidden WASP power structure of communities and institutions by academia and the press, all the way (for left conspiratorialists) to the assassinations of JFK and Martin Luther King, corporate misdeeds real and imagined, and today's "white privilege."

The more populist-minded subscribe to a myriad of theories that also involve corporate conspirators, from the widespread belief that the rise in gasoline prices following the OPEC oil embargo of the early 1970s was actually a plot by the big oil companies, to numerous claims that corporations conspired to eliminate their competitors, from the demise of the Tucker automobile to the disappearance of Los Angeles trolley lines. And no survey of conspiracy mongers would be complete without left-liberal, predominantly Jewish "watchdog" groups, such as the Southern Poverty Law Center and the ADL, which labor to find "links and ties" between conservative and nationalist groups and more-radical quarry, reprising the efforts of "red hunters" of an earlier era to expose the network of fellow travelers, undercover agents, et al. in the (rather more-menacing) communist conspiracy.

Thus, it is satisfying to follow Perron and Fradin as they redress the balance by refuting the claims of a hidebound establishment that Holocaust revisionism is a baseless conspiracy, at the same time that they convincingly pin the conspiratorialist label on the accusers. Perron opens his examination by briefly surveying contemporary and classic authors on the usual source of conspiracy theory in rumor during troubled times. Perron lays his groundwork on the findings of modern theorists Pierre-André Taguieff, Jean-Noël Kapferer, and Gérald Bronner on the rise of rumors and the types of the circumstances in which they arise, take root, and spread. He moves closer to his quarry with post-WWI analyses by historians Albert Dauzat and Marc Bloch of the establishment manufacture of atrocity stories from wartime rumors.

Before moving to expose and analyze the exterminationists' conspiratorial thinking on the Holocaust, Rémi Perron reminds us how often they invoke fictive conspiracies to explain events in National Socialist Germany separate from the Holocaust. He runs through the conspiracy theories that various establishment savants have brought to Hitler's 1923 Munich putsch; the 1933 Reichstag fire; the 1934 Night of the Long Knives; the 1938 Crystal Night riots against the Jews; and of course the conspiratorial certitude that Hitler was merely the puppet of international financial interests. Indeed, it should be pointed out that these conspiracy theories merely echo Count One of the Allied indictment at Nuremberg, according to which virtually everything involving National Socialism between 1921, when Hitler became leader of the NSDAP, to the end of the war was the result of a Nazi conspiracy—including a nefarious plot "to undermine and overthrow the German Government by 'legal' means." (<http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/count1.asp>)

It is the authors' novel approach to analyzing the fatal defects of exterminationism that gives these books' unique value. Perron and Fradin first establish that the exterminationists treat the Holocaust as if it were the result of a conspiracy: an evil deed planned by the German leadership and carried out by their henchmen in great secrecy. Next, rather than deconstruct the arguments of Holocaust exterminationism chronologically or by individual issue, e.g., the Wannsee Conference or the functioning of the "gas chambers," Perron identifies numerous different fallacies in logic and scientific method that underlie exterminationist argumentation. He further illustrates (as does Fradin in a more abbreviated manner) how exterminationist writers, despite their indictment of the revisionists as conspiratorialists, rely on such fallacies in the same way JFK and 9/11 buffs do in their conspiratorialist constructs.

Several of the fallacies considered by Perron spring from an a priori certitude in the Holocaust. Abductive reasoning, by which the conclusion precedes the investigation, plays a central role in the exterminationists' methods: not only is the Holocaust beyond question, but its individual components are as well. Related, though subsidiary, is the belief that the absence of evidence (documents, gas chambers, human remains, etc.) goes only to show the perpetrators' fiendish cunning in destroying all traces of that evidence. Then, of course, there is the claim that the Germans often repeatedly used innocent-sounding words in documents as code for sinister wartime Jewish measures against the Jews. The ability to designate some words as coded, and then interpret them according to external standards, is closely linked to confirmation bias, a fallacy of the exterminationists that skews their investigation of the historical evidence to accord with their Holocaust certitude.

Perron shows how exterminationist historians such as Walter Laqueur posit that Hitler prophesied the extermination of the Jews to the world, then veiled it in total secrecy—just one example of the failure of internal coherence that marks Laqueur and other exterminationists' method. He also points out how they cut themselves on Ockham's razor, the fourteenth-century English Franciscan's maxim that could be translated "keep it simple, stupid": to name just one transgression, their disregard of the documentation of German Jewish policy in favor of an undocumented (or coded) extermination policy they have invented.

Perron gives due attention to more exterminationist fallacies: the Germanophobia underlying rumored atrocities and consequent Allied propaganda; the practice of attempting to intimidate by a multiplicity of irrelevant arguments; cui bono, or attributing guilt to a party that allegedly benefits from a crime; and ignoring evident facts in favor of one-sided, posthumous psychologizing of the German leaders.

The reader may ask, does either writer consider the Holocaust allegation, as developed and defended, a conspiracy theory? Each is at best coy regarding this question. The founders of Holocaust revisionist scholarship have avoided casting the alleged Holocaust as the result of a conspiracy. Arthur Butz uses the word eight times in The Hoax of the Twentieth Century, each time in a context other than the Holocaust. Despite the massive academic, political, and judicial forces that have been deployed against him for forty years, Robert Faurisson doesn't characterize the obligatory (in his country) version of the Holocaust as a conspiracy theory.

François Fradin's study makes clear that these and other leading revisionists do not resort to the arguments and methods of conspiratorialists. He chides some twenty other revisionists, mostly of the second tier, for conspiracism. Nearly all of them are publicists rather than scholars, and Fradin tends to fault them not so much for applying conspiracy theory to the Holocaust claims as for subscribing to the JFK, 9/11, and other alleged conspiracies. His mentions of them are often brief, and perhaps more admonitory than categorical.

Nonetheless Fradin's attention to conspiracy thinking among revisionists is worthy. There's a reason, after all, that our adversaries have tried tar Holocaust revisionism with the conspiracy brush: crying conspiracy is a hindrance in outreach to new audiences. Instead, presenting their position as anticonspiracy and discreetly policing it, while attacking the other for conspiracy thinking, is surely the way to go.

Révisionnisme contre complotisme and Notes sur l'exterminocomplotisme et le révisionnisme are written in a French that non-Francophone readers with two or three years study of the language shouldn't find too dense. Each has a bibliography and an index, and is attractively bound. Both are timely as well as instructive, and make for pleasurable reading as well.

The Ventilation Systems of Crematoria II and III in Birkenau

by Carlo Mattogno, Giuseppe Poggi

Abstract

Every morgue needs a ventilation system to remove putrid gases developing when corpses decompose. Hence, the basement morgues of the Auschwitz Crematoria II & III had ventilation systems. In 1989, French historian J.-C. Pressac posited that the capacity of these morgues' ventilation systems was increased in early 1942, and that this change allowed the use of these basement rooms for homicidal purposes. Based on wartime documents and modern expert literature, this paper determines and analyzes the ventilations systems' features in minute detail, and how it changed during the years 1941-1943. The systems' features lead to conclusions as to whether these rooms could have been used for homicidal purposes.

Notice

The following study is a revised version of a series of articles written by Carlo Mattogno and Giuseppe Poggi, and published during 2016 on the Italian blog "Olodogma" in a rather polemic context due to contemporary circumstances, whereby the authors adopted the pseudonym "I Carolingi". The arguments are presented in a logical and structured way, unburdened by any element detracting from a strict documental and technical demonstration.

I) The ventilation equipment of the new crematorium (the future Crematorium II) of Birkenau

Jean-Claude Pressac claims that Leichenkeller 1 (Corpse Cellar 1 or Morgue #1) of Crematorium II of Birkenau was projected as a normal morgue, and that only at the end of 1942 it was transformed into a homicidal gas chamber. His general arguments have already been discussed in detail elsewhere.[\[1\]](#) In the present study, the function of Morgue #1 is examined from another point of view.

The ventilation system (intake/exhaust) of the new crematorium (the future Crematorium II) of Birkenau was designed by the engineer Karl Schultze of the Topf Company on March 10, 1942. It consists of a plan of the crematorium (D-59366), [2] in vertical and horizontal sectional views, in which the ventilation system of the prospective Morgue #1 – here called “B.Raum” (Belüfteter Raum, ventilated room) is very well highlighted. See Document 1. This ventilation system was composed of an intake pipe for the fresh air supply (Frischlufthkanal) of green color, as well as an exhaust pipe for the stale air (Abluftkanal) of blue color.

The map shows the distribution of the intake and exhaust ducts in the various horizontal and vertical sections.

1) Intake:

The two longitudinal brickwork ducts are positioned at two edges on top of the room. In Document 2, the vertical section, they are indicated with the letter A. Document 3 represents a horizontal section of the two ducts (A1) which run into a crosswise duct (A2) above the door; it presents the opening (A3) of a short horizontal duct which becomes vertical in A4; A4 is indeed the visible horizontal section of this vertical duct. The crosswise duct A2 and the opening A3 are drawn in Document 4 (vertical section). The position of section A4 of the vertical duct is indicated in Document 5: it rises from the basement up to the attic of the crematorium, running through the A-Raum (Aufbahrungs-Raum, laying-out room for the corpses).

This vertical tract of the duct, which we indicated with A6, is represented in Document 6 (vertical section of the ground floor and of the attic); in the attic, running through a bend, the duct becomes horizontal again, and it ends in opening A7 in front of the air-blower.

Document 7 shows a vertical section of the duct A6 which discharges into the Opening A7; A8 is the connection sleeve between the brickwork duct and the air-blower A9, while A10 is the intake tubing or chimney. At the bottom A2 is the vertical section of the duct A2, A3 is the short duct, which connects the horizontal duct A2 to the vertical one

A6, and A4 is the point in which the section A4 appears in Document 3.

On April 2nd, 1942, the head of the Central Construction Office, Karl Bischoff, at the time SS-Hauptsturmführer, notified the Topf Company of the decision to implement the intake and exhaust chimneys, which were originally planned to be made of metal plates “in the form of brickwork chimneys” (in Form gemauerter Kamine).<sup>[3]</sup> We will return to this issue in § I. 8) (“Later modifications”).

2) Exhaust:

Two horizontal ducts D run along the bottom, behind the brickwork of the room, and are connected to this through the openings D1 (Document 2). In accord with the internal wall, the two ducts turn 90 degrees towards the top into two vertical ducts D2; the left duct turns again 90 degrees, and it flows into a horizontal duct D3, which runs above the door, and enters into vertical duct D5, which is the extension of the right duct D2 (Document 8). As one can see in Document 3, duct D3 runs in front of the intake duct A2, and it flows into the vertical duct D5, of which D4 represents the horizontal section. Document 5 shows the dislocation of this opening D4, at the edge of the O-Raum (Ofen-Raum, furnace room). In Document 4, D5 is the vertical section of this vertical duct. As shown in Document 9, it runs through the ground floor, and with a turn, it becomes horizontal again and is connected to the air-blower D6; D7 is the exhaust tubing.

3) Exhaust chimney

Document 10 shows the view from above and from the front of the exhaust air-blowers of the furnace room (in red), and Morgue #1 (in blue), and the common brickwork chimney.

- Morgue #1: horizontal duct D5 is connected by the sleeve S to the air-blower D6; the stale air exits from the opening of the air-blower F2 and enters the vertical duct of the chimney.
- Furnace room: the hot air exits through the opening of the air-blower F1 and flows into the vertical duct of the common chimney. The motors of the air-blowers are indicated with the letter M.

4) Intake and exhaust ducts in Morgue #1

Inside Morgue #1 fresh air entered through 2 triangular-shaped ducts installed behind the masonry of the room, positioned on the two upper angles (Document 2, A).

For the extraction of the stale air, two masonry ducts were installed on the bottom, at a short distance from the floor of the room, behind the longitudinal walls (Document 2, D).

The Construction Office blueprint no. 934 of January 27 1942<sup>[4]</sup> shows the four ventilation ducts positioned symmetrically at the two sides of the room and configured respectively as “Belüftung” (intake) and “Entlüftungskanal” (exhaust duct). See Document 11.

The slanted part of the two intake ducts directed to the room featured 40 openings, 20 for each side, which allowed the flow of fresh air into Morgue #1. Also, the exhaust duct was connected to the room through 40 openings, 20 for each side, which slanted towards the floor (Document 2, D1), as it is clearly visible in Document 12, which shows a section of these two ducts.

The 40 bottom openings for exhaust were placed behind the brickwork of Morgue #1, 20 on each side, alternating in location. The openings on the left side (having their backs toward the crematorium's main building) were located at a distance of 152 cm from each other, measured at the center of each opening. The design project of March 10, 1942, also shows the indication "19 x 152 = 2,888". The number 19 corresponds to the number of spacings between one opening and the next (20 openings = 19 spacings). The sequence of the spacings, starting from the wall towards the crematorium, is as follows: 0.36 + 28.88 + 0.76 = 30 meters, where 0.36 m and 0.76 m are the wall sections before the first opening and after the last opening. The openings on the right side were placed in such a manner that each opening was placed exactly between the two openings on the opposite wall, as Document 13, section 1, segment A-B shows. The same system was also adopted for the intake openings, which were also designed in alternate locations (section 2, segment G-H).

The sections 1 and 2 of Document 13 represent, respectively, the lower and upper part of Morgue #1; the exhaust openings of the bottom right side of the room were located in a position exactly corresponding to the openings of the upper left side of the intake duct (segment C-D), and those exhaust openings of the bottom left side corresponded to those of the upper right side of the intake duct (section E-F). This system guaranteed the best air circulation inside the room and therefore the best air exchange, avoiding the laminar flows with subsequent clusters of stale air.

5) The throttles of the ventilation ducts

These devices are mentioned in a handwritten note of February 3rd 1943, by the installer of the Topf Company Heinrich Messing, who writes:[\[5\]](#)

“Frischluchtgebläse Nr. 450 für L. Keller I mit Saug- und Druckstutzen Drosselklappe”

“Air blower for fresh air no. 450 for Morgue #1 with aspiration and exhaust sleeve [and] butterfly valve.”

The Druckstutzen (exhaust sleeve; Document 14) was the connection (A8) which linked the air-blower (A9) to the brickwork duct towards Morgue #1 (A7), the Saugstutzen (aspiration sleeve) was the connection (A8') which linked the air-blower (A9) to the aspiration duct (A10), here represented in horizontal section (in fact it was the intake chimney for fresh air). M represents the motor of the air-blower.

This is confirmed by a drawing of the air blowers of the Topf Company (Document 15),[\[6\]](#) which clearly indicates Saugstutzen (aspiration sleeve) and Druckstutzen (exhaust sleeve); from the drawing, it results that the aspiration sleeve was linked laterally to the air-blower; the motor was located on the other side.

The Drosselklappe (butterfly valve) of the intake system was installed in the pressure sleeve (after the air blower); in the exhaust system, the butterfly valve was installed in the aspiration sleeve (before the air blower). Since the intake and exhaust ducts were structurally different, also different were their capacity losses; the aforementioned valves were needed to keep the whole ventilation system in balance.

6) The grates of the ventilation openings in Morgue #1 (Crematoria II and III)

The “protocol” issued by the Polish investigating judge Jan Sehn on July 24, 1945, which was later presented at the Höss trial,[\[7\]](#) recaps all the internal orders related to the crematoria in Birkenau made by various Auschwitz offices to the inmates' metalworking shop (Häftlings-Schlosserei). The internal orders are summarized with the transcription of the German text (the original documents were mostly handwritten), mingled with Polish terms.

As far as the closing devices of the ventilation openings of Morgue #1 are concerned, made in the form of grates, the "protocol" reports the following registrations:

– Crematorium II:[\[8\]](#)

"18.2.43, Nr. 83. K.G.L. Krematorium II.BW.30. Przedmiot [concerns] ... 50 Stück [sic, for: Stück] Blechsiebe [50 pieces sheet-metal screens] 7 x 18 cm. Liefertermin [delivery date] 17.2.43".

– Crematorium III:[\[9\]](#)

Order of the Construction Office no. 83 of March 14, 43. Made by: Dyntar, Puzyger, Durski, Kostkowki. Completed: March 22, 43.*]"

To recap:

Crematorium II, fresh-air intake: 50 sheet-metal screens

" , stale-air exhaust: ? iron-rod grates.

Crematorium III: fresh-air intake: 95 sheet-metal screens

" , stale-air exhaust: 45 iron-rod grates.

From these internal orders, Pressac deduced that the project of March 10, 1942 was modified for what would concern the openings of the ventilation ducts of the future Morgue #1; those of the fresh air were not 40 anymore, but 50, at a distance of 1.20 m from each other, resulting in the following calculation:  $(30 + 30) \div 50 = 1.2$  (double the length of the room in meters, divided by the number of protection devices).

In Crematorium III, according to Pressac, 95 openings were made (evidently 47 on one side and 48 on the opposite wall), one every 60 centimeters, in the fresh-air duct and 45 openings (22 on one side and 23 on the opposite wall), one every 1.5 meters, in the stale-

With this system, the fresh air entering from two intake openings had to be extracted from a single exhaust opening, thus creating a net imbalance in the intake-exhaust system of the original project. Pressac does not explain this obvious anomaly: why 50 intake openings were necessary in Crematorium II, but 95 in Crematorium III.

The main problem is that nothing is known about these architectural alterations. The only reference to them, which is not mentioned by Pressac, and which is rather enigmatic, appears in a letter of the Topf Company to the Central Construction Office of May 8, 1942, which has as a reference, “Intake and exhaust system for the crematorium to be built in the KL Auschwitz” (Be- und Entlüftungsanlage für das zu errichtende Krematorium im K.L. Auschwitz):[11]

[“The room measurements of Morgue #1 and 2 have changed. Therefore, other entry and exit openings for the intake of fresh air and for the exhaust of stale air result”.]

In fact, the dimensions of Morgue #1, 30 x 7 x 2.40 m, remained unchanged. The above-mentioned letter and the one of May 21, 1942,[12] which will be discussed later, make specific reference to two plans of the Topf Company, D 59394 and D 59395, a floor plan and a vertical section of the new ventilation system. Apparently, these documents have been lost; therefore it is not known which modifications were proposed by the Topf Company, or if they were eventually accepted by the Central Construction Office. No plan of Crematoria II and III and in fact no document dated later than May 21, 1942 contains any mention of these modifications, therefore the openings connecting the intake and exhaust ducts of Morgue #1 were constructed according to the plan of March 10, 1942.

Any modification after the construction of the crematorium appears rather improbable, if not illogical.

The explanation of Pressac – that on each side of Morgue #1, 25 openings were placed at a distance of 1.20 m from each other - would have been a radical and total change of the system envisaged in the plan design of March 10, 1942. In fact, if the first opening of this plan had been left unchanged, none of the remaining 19 openings would have been coincidental with the 24 of the new project, or in other words, no overlap of old and new openings would have occurred, because the new ones had a different “pitch” (distance) from each other. Therefore, it would have been necessary to drill 48 new holes in the 51-cm-thick brick wall in order to create the new openings.

And besides, during the week preceding the day of the first order for the manufacturing of the protection grates (February 18, 1943), the Topf Company sent the Auschwitz Central Construction Office various letters which also mentioned the ventilation of the crematoria, in particular the days of 11, 12 and 17 (see below, § II). On March 17, Bischoff, meanwhile promoted to SS-Sturmbannführer, notified the shops of the Deutsche Ausrüstungswerke that, in the basement of Crematorium II, the dimensions of a door had to be changed “für eine bauliche Abänderung” (for a structural modification).[13] A few days later, on the 26th, the plan to create an access to Morgue #2 (Eingang Keller 2) of Crematorium II was established.[14] It is therefore not credible that a structural modification of the openings connecting the intake and exhaust of Morgue #1 would have been implemented without any documentary trace. Such a change would moreover have been completely illogical: the motivation mentioned in the Topf letter of May 8, 1942 was in fact unsubstantiated, because Morgue #1 did not incur any volumetric change.

The installer of the Topf Company, Heinrich Messing, worked on the ventilation system of Morgue #1 of Crematorium II in the week from March 8, to March 14, 1943. He performed functional tests, and on March 13 he activated the system (“Be- und Entlüftungsanlagen Keller I in Betrieb genommen”, “Intake and exhaust ventilation systems in the basement I activated.”)[15]

At the time the internal orders for the protection devices (grates) had already been placed, but who, if not Messing, would have noticed a possible error in the number of the connecting openings between the ducts and the room; a mistake as substantial as to require such radical modifications? The ventilation ducts in Morgue #1, as explained above, were masonry work, and the change of the number of openings would have required a substantial masonry job.

On the other hand, Messing did not mention any functional anomalies of the ventilation system: if, therefore, the real 40 intake openings or the assumed 50 adequately fulfilled their function, why then would 95 have been necessary in Crematorium III?

Therefore, it must be assumed that the openings remained unchanged, 40 + 40, according to the project of March 10, 1942, and that the discrepant numbers of the protection devices which were ordered from the inmates’ metalworking shop are either the result of transcription errors, or that the devices were ordered in excess, for unknown reasons.

Pressac published some pictures of the protection grates for the openings for fresh air. They were as they appear in Document 16.[16] They were made of a perforated iron sheet welded to a sort of casing which was inserted in the masonry opening. The dimensions appear to conform to the measurements (7 cm x 18 cm) mentioned in the relative orders to the inmates’ fitter’s shop (no. 83 of February 18, 43 and no. 192 of March 15, 43).

The devices made of round iron bars which protected the exhaust openings for the stale air were without doubt more or less similar to Pressac’s drawing (Document 17).[17]

This seems to be confirmed by a picture taken on August 18, 1968 during excavation work in Morgue #1.<sup>17</sup>

It must be observed that the protection devices mentioned above were designed for a normal morgue; this is deduced from the fact that, while the stale-air openings had only a grate made of round iron bars, the fresh-air openings were covered by iron sheeting perforated by some 120 holes of 3 mm diameter each. These screens had a rather high air-flow resistance, resulting in the pressure loss along the entire length of the air-intake duct being small compared to the loss at each of those openings. That in turn made sure that the amount of air coming out of each opening was similar, and that the entire room had a reduced pressure compared to the outside.

The air-shutters of the ventilation system (Saugstutzen and Druckstutzen), which without doubt were regulated by Messing during the final inspection, obviously had to remain in an open position.

7) The function of Morgue #1

The plans of the basement morgue (Leichenkeller) of the Sachsenhausen concentration camp help us understand the project of the morgue of the new crematorium in Birkenau. Even though the documentation in question always refers to “Leichenkeller”, in the singular, [18] the facility contained de facto three morgues, as shown in the attached plan:

1. one for corpses without a casket (ungesargte Leichen): 80 corpses in 133.63 m<sup>2</sup>
2. one for the corpses inside a casket (ingesargte Leichen): 100 corpses in 80.63 m<sup>2</sup>
3. one for infected corpses (Infektionsleichen): 20 corpses in 37.51 m<sup>2</sup>.

The surface areas are calculated net of the area of the concrete supporting pillars. [19]

The first case was similar to the one in Birkenau; the effective surface area of Morgue #1, without the area occupied by the 7 concrete pillars, was – as we will show below – of 208.88 m<sup>2</sup>; and applying the same coefficient as in Sachsenhausen, it was planned for approximately 120 corpses. It can be assumed that it was planned to place them on the floor; 60 on each side, leaving the necessary space in the center for a transport trolley. Each exhaust opening would have expelled the feter of 3 corpses. Since the corpses had to be aligned on the floor, the exhaust openings were designed to be at floor level.

The intake from above and the exhaust from below was the only way to assure the continuous apportionment of fresh air, and to assure that the stench created by the initial decomposition of the corpses would be immediately aspirated away, and to pollute as little as possible the air inside the morgue and to inconvenience as little as possible the personnel who had to work there. All this was perfectly normal for a morgue.

8) Later modifications

The brickwork chimneys of the ventilation system, one isolated and four in a single masonry structure, are drawn in particular on Plan 1311 of May 14, 1942, 2003 of December 19, 1942 and 109/16A (Huta Company) of October 9, 1943. [20] Plan 109/15 of September 24, 1943, also of the Huta Company, shows that the right exhaust duct proceeded over the point D4 of Document 3 up to a vertical exhaust ventilation duct (Entlüftungsschacht) located at the corner of the room labelled “Goldarbeit” (gold work) between the corridor and the furnace room, and which emerged in the first chimney on the right from the group of four mentioned above.

The left intake duct A1, taking into consideration the drawings, also proceeded along the left wall of the vestibule (Vorraum) and emerged in the isolated chimney which was on the same line, but some meters away. The route of the ventilation ducts for the other rooms is not indicated in the drawings; it is sure that the isolated chimney was employed for the intake of fresh air into Morgue #1 and the group of four chimneys for the evacuation or exhaust of all rooms.

However there is no agreement with Pressac when he states that the first chimney on the right was planned for the expulsion of the hot air from the furnace room, [21] because the above-mentioned drawings connect it directly to the exhaust of Morgue #1.

And besides, the comparison with the drawing of March 10, 1942 shows that the isolated chimney corresponded to the fresh air intake duct of Document 7 and that the group of the four chimneys represented the bundling into one single brickwork structure of the two sheet-metal chimneys of Document 9, which respectively collected the flux of stale air from two rooms and aspirated by two air-blowers, specified as follows (Document 9a): [22]

1. ventilation of Morgue #1 (air-blower Type 450)
2. ventilation of the furnace room (air-blower Type 550 with 4.5 HP motor)
3. ventilation of Morgue #2 (air-blower Type 550 with 7.5 HP motor)
4. ventilation of the dissecting room [Sezierraum], of the laying-out room for the corpses [Aufbahrungsraum] and room for the washing of the corpses [Waschraum] (air-blower Type 375).

In the final project each of these ventilation ducts had its own brickwork chimney.

The data relative to the number and to the power output of the air-blowers is explained in the next section.

II) Capacity of the air-blowers of Morgue #1: the documents

1) The first cost estimate of the ventilation system of the future Crematorium II was prepared by engineer Schultze on November 4, 1941, in which the devices foreseen for the single rooms of the new crematorium (the future Crematorium II) are described. Point I refers to a “ventilation device for room “B”” (Entlüftungs-Anlage für “B”-Raum) – that is the future Morgue #1. A “tubing for intake of fresh air” (Frischluf-Ansaugerohrleitung) is mentioned, therefore, it is certain that the intake system was implied. In Point II the wording “ventilation device for the room ‘B’” (Entlüftungs-Anlage für “B”-Raum) is repeated, but this time it refers to a “tubing for the stale air” (Abluft-Rohrleitung), and therefore, here the exhaust system was implied.

The technical description of both systems is identical (Documents 18 and 19):

“Air-blower with the capacity of 4800 m<sup>3</sup> of air per hour against a total pressure of 40 mm of water column with a number of revolutions of the blower wheel of n=925 per minute and a power demand, measured at the drive shaft, of 1.6 HP”

Both systems were powered by a 380 volt three-phase motor (Drehstrommotor), 50 cycles (Perioden: Hz), with a power output (Leistung) of 2 HP at 925 revolutions per minute. Both the intake duct and the exhaust duct had a round section with a diameter of 450 mm. The total cost was 1,847 RM.

For the “L”-Raum (“L” room, the future Morgue #2), Point V, an air-blower with a capacity of 10,000 m<sup>3</sup> of stale air (Abluft) per hour was foreseen, against a total pressure of 55 mm of water column, with a number of revolutions of the blower wheel of n=920 per minute and a power demand of 4.5 HP; it was powered by a three-phase motor of 380 volts, 50 cycles, with a power output of 5.5 HP.

Point III refers to the “ventilation system for the furnace room (Entlüftungs-Anlage für Ofenraum)”, equipped with an air-blower with a capacity of 10,000 m<sup>3</sup> of stale air per hour, against a total pressure of 32 mm of water column, with a number of revolutions of the blower wheel of n=720 per minute and a power demand of 2.8 HP. The three-phase motor was equally of 380 volts, 50 cycles, with power output of 3.5 HP. The ventilation ducting started from a diameter of 550 mm and decreased down to 250 mm.

And finally (Point IV), the “ventilation system of the dissecting room, of the laying-out room for the corpses and of the room for the washing of the corpses” (Entlüftungs-Anlage für Sezier- Aufbahrungs- und Waschraum) foresaw an air-blower with a capacity of 3,000 m<sup>3</sup> of stale air per hour against a total pressure of 20 mm of water column, with a number of revolutions of the blower wheel of n=720 per minute and a power demand of 0.65 HP; it had also a three-phase motor of 380 volts, 50 cycles, with a power output of 1 HP. The exhaust ducting had a round section with a diameter of 375 mm.[24]

2) In the drawing of the new crematorium D 59366 of March 10, 1942 (Section g-g), the power outputs of the motors are modified as follows:

- “B”-Raum: from 2 to 3.5 HP (air-blower [Gebläse] Type 450)
- “L”-Raum: from 5.5 to 7.5 HP (air-blower [Gebläse] Type 550)
- Ofenraum: from 3.5 to 4.5 HP (air-blower [Gebläse] Type 550)
- Sezier- Aufbahrungs- und Waschraum: from 1 to 1.5 HP (air-blower [Gebläse] Type 375)

The significance of these modifications will be explained below.

3) The letter of Bischoff to the Topf Company dated February 11, 1943, says that in the delivery of materials of February 6 “an air-blower Type 450 with 3.5 HP motor” (ein Gebläse Nr. 450 mit 3,5 PS-Motor) foreseen for Morgue #1 and “a 7.5 HP motor for the exhaust air-blower Type 550” (1 Motor 7,5 PS für das Abluftgebläse Nr. 550) of Morgue #2 were missing.[25]

4) In its reply, dated February 12, the Topf Company reported that the air-blower Type 450 was delivered on November 8, 1942, and that the “air-blower Type 450 (wooden air-blower)” [Gebläse Nr. 450 (Holzgebläse)] was delivered on January 25, 1943. For the air-blower Type 550 the 7.5 HP motor was still missing; the Topf Company proposed to substitute it temporarily with a 10 HP motor “with the same revolution speed” (mit gleicher Drehzahl).[26] In a later letter, dated February 17, 1943, the Topf Company indicated as delivery date: November 18, 1942.[27] The delivery occurred therefore either on November 8 or 18, 1942, and the first date was only the result of a typing error (8 instead of 18).

The issue of the wooden fan casing has been explained elsewhere.[28]

5) The invoice (Rechnung) of the Topf Company no. 171 of February 22nd 1943, refers to the ventilation system of Crematorium II (Document 20).

For the “B”-Raum “1 air-blower with a capacity of 4,800 m<sup>3</sup> per hour against a 40 mm water column of total pressure with a three-phase motor of 380 volts, 50 cycles, protected from water splashes, power output = 2 HP, safety switch and star-delta switch without protection” (1 Gebläse zur Förderung von stündl. 4800 cbm Luft gegen 40 mm WS Gesamtpressung mit Drehstrommotor für 380 Volt, 50 Per. spritzwassergeschützt, N = 2 PS, Motorschutzschalter und Stern dreieckschalter ohne Sicherung) was invoiced and a second air-blower similar to this one for exhaust. The total amount was 1,847 RM. This data corresponds exactly with the cost estimate of November 4, 1941 and this is also valid for the systems relative to the “L”-Raum, Ofenraum and Sezier- Aufbahrungs- und Waschraum.[29]

6) The invoice of the Topf Company no. 729 of May 27, 1943 relative to Crematorium III, reports the same data and the same prices (Documents 21 a,b,c,d)

7) Pressac published an extract of the plan of the roof of Crematorium II of the delivery receipt of Crematorium II of March 19, 1943, which shows the power output of the ventilation devices located in the attic of the building:

- “B”-Raum: 3.5 HP
- “L”-Raum: 7.5 HP
- Ofenraum: 4.5 HP
- Sezier- Aufbahrungs- und Waschraum: 1.5 HP.[30]

However, it is not an original document, but simply an elucidation by Pressac, as follows from the comparison with the original plan (Document 22).

However, Pressac confirmed the power output of the motors indicated above.

As a result of this long procedure, the capacity of the air-blowers remained unchanged. Particularly the two rooms of interest, which concern us most:

- Morgue #1: 4,800 m<sup>3</sup> per hour (air blower for intake and exhaust)
- Morgue #2: 10,000 m<sup>3</sup> per hour (air-blower).

Morgue #1 measured in meters, was 30 x 7 x 2.40 = 504 cubic meters; Morgue #2 was 49.49 x 7.93 x 2.30 = approx. 903 m<sup>3</sup>.

The hourly air exchanges foreseen were respectively:

- 4,800 ÷ 504 = approximately 9.5
- 10,000 ÷ 903 = approximately 11.

Morgue #2 (or “L”-Raum) was the alleged “undressing room” of the victims; therefore, even after the purportedly “criminal” modifications claimed by Pressac, the “undressing room” remained more ventilated than the “gas chamber”!

III) The increase of the output power of the motors of the air-blowers

In his second study about Auschwitz, Pressac writes:

“About mid-March, the Central Construction Office received a new Topf plan for the ventilation, written on March 10th, which was still based on the first two studies of Dejacq. Schultze distinctly increased the power output of the electrical motors, and therefore of the intake and exhaust, however without changing the type of the air-blowers. The new power outputs are explained as follows:” (My emphases)

We report the relative data in simplified form.[31]

Room	motor power	New capacity	Previous capacity
B-Keller/intake	3.5 HP	8,000 m <sup>3</sup> /h	4,800 m <sup>3</sup> /h
B-Keller/exhaust	3.5 HP	8,000 m <sup>3</sup> /h	4,800 m <sup>3</sup> /h
L-Keller/exhaust	7.5 HP	13,000 m <sup>3</sup> /h	10,000 m <sup>3</sup> /h
O-Raum/furnace room	4.5 HP	12,000 m <sup>3</sup> /h	10,000 m <sup>3</sup> /h

A u. W-Räume	1.5 HP	4,000 m <sup>3</sup> /h	3,000 m <sup>3</sup> /h

Whence did Pressac deduce the alleged new capacities of the air-blowers? Apparently, he based the information on the Topf invoice no. 2134 of December 23, 1943 relative to the ventilation systems for Crematoria IV and V, to which we will return below. He refers to this document speaking about Crematoria IV and V:[\[32\]](#)

“For the two gas chambers and for the corridor, representing a volume of 480 m<sup>3</sup> almost identical to the one in Morgue I of Crematoria II and III, Schultze foresaw an exhaust blower of the same power: a pump [soufflerie: air-blower] Type 450 with a 3.5 HP motor, able to exhaust 8,000 m<sup>3</sup> per hour”.

Footnote 21 on page 120 refers indeed to the “preliminary invoice [sic] Topf of December 23rd 1943”. Here an air-blower of Type 450 with a capacity of 8,000 m<sup>3</sup> of air per hour with a three-phase motor of 3.5 HP is mentioned. If, therefore, it could have made sense to assume this capacity for Morgue #1 (equipped with two air-blowers Type 450), for the other rooms the values given by Pressac do not have any foundation, being based solely on simple arithmetical equations between the data relative to the power output of the motor and the capacity of the air-blowers, for which the results do not match at all:

$10,000 \div 2 = x \div 3.5$ ; hence  $x = 8,400$ .

The above-mentioned document says in fact 8,000, and therefore Pressac was forced to “rectify” the results of all other equations:

$10,000 \div 5.5 = x \div 7.5$ ; result ca. 13,600, reduced to 13,000

$10,000 \div 3.5 = x \div 4.5$ ; result ca. 12,900, reduced to 12,000

$3,000 \div 1 = x \div 1.5$ ; result 4,500, reduced to 4,000.

Before examining the technical aspects of the issue, it is necessary to solve a preliminary problem, which can be summarized in this question: why was the power output of the motors increased? Once this point is clarified, the question has to be examined whether the increase of the power output of the motors really corresponded to an increase of the capacity of the air-blowers.

It can be immediately noted that, in the Holocaustic prospective, the alleged increase of the capacity of the air-blowers in no case could have had any criminal implication, or rather it could not have borne any relation to the alleged transformation of a normal morgue room into a homicidal gas chamber. This results irrefutably from the fact that the increase of the power output of the motors was foreseen by Schultze on March 10, 1942; a date preceding by many months the date of the alleged idea to transform the “B”-Raum, the future Morgue #1, into a homicidal gas chamber. It results, therefore, that the modifications concerned only a normal hygienic-sanitary facility, such as a crematorium.

The only plausible reason for the increase of the power output of the motors is the following: Schultze revised the cost estimate based on a verbal order which was given to the Topf Company during the visit of Oberingenieur Kurt Prüfer in Auschwitz on October 21 and 22<sup>n</sup>, 1941.[\[33\]](#) The first drawing of the new crematorium was created on October 24, 1941.[\[34\]](#) Both Leichenkeller, only outlined, do not present any indication of ventilation ducts. This applies also to the plan drawn by the architect Werkmann in November 1941.[\[35\]](#) The first cost estimate of the ventilation system, dated November 4, 1941, was therefore created based on the first or second project, both without any indication regarding the ventilation systems. Essentially, Schultze revised the cost estimate at issue knowing neither the structure, nor the path of the ventilation ducts; but otherwise, he knew all the fundamental technical data: capacity of the air-blowers, total pressure, voltage, cycles, number of the air-blowers.

It has to be kept in mind that November 4, 1941 was also the day when the Topf Company confirmed the order by the Construction Office of Auschwitz (placed on October 22) of five furnaces with three muffles each, two devices for the introduction of a casket (Sarg-Einführungs-Vorrichtungen), three forced-draft devices (Saugzug-Anlagen), and one waste-incineration furnace (Müll-Verbrennungs-Ofen).[\[36\]](#)

In the letter of February 10, 1942, the Topf Company informed the Construction Office that the “necessary construction drawings for the realization of the brickwork intake and exhaust ducts” (die notwendigen Bauzeichnungen für die Ausführung der gemauerten Be- und Entlüftungs-Kanäle) would be ready within 3-4 weeks;[\[37\]](#) obviously they did not yet exist on November 4, 1941 and this fact confirms that Schultze, when writing the relative cost estimate, could not possibly have determine exactly the power output of the air-blower motors. When these drawings were eventually created, probably by Schultze himself, he recalculated the power output of the engines based on the passive drags of the system (length, sections, roughness of the internal walls of the ducts, change of section and direction, presence of 80 small openings inside the room) as it is indicated in Plan D 59366 of March 10, 1942. We summarize the data in the following table:

	11/4/41	3/10/42	11/4/41	3/10/42	11/4/41	3/10/42
LK 1 intake	450	450	4,800	4,800	2	3.5
LK 1 exhaust	450	450	4,800	4,800	2	3.5
Furnace room	550	550	10,000	10,000	3.5	4.5
Dissection room, etc.	375	375	3,000	3,000	1	1.5
LK 2	550	550	10,000	10,000	5.5	7.5

The letter of the Friedrich Boos Company to the Central Construction Office of May 24, 1943, which refers to the technical specifications of the Saugzuganlage Type H 13 (aspirated air-supply device Type H13) for a furnace, presents a similar case regarding the total pressure:

- volume of the gases: 13,500 m<sup>3</sup>/h
- static pressure at the exhaust of the air-blower: 40 mm water column
- increase of 10% as specified: 4 mm water column
- increase for additional drag: 55 mm water column
- difference of the static pressure: 99 mm water column
- power demand for the air-blower: 10 HP
- number of revolutions of the : 1,435 revolutions per minute.[\[38\]](#)

The nominal value of 40 mm of water column resulted in a real value of 99 mm, and therefore a power demand of 10 HP was calculated.

IV) Output power of the motors and capacity of the air-

blowers

It remains only to determine, as Pressac claims, whether or not the increase of the output power of the motors of the air-blowers resulted also in the increase of the capacity of the air-blowers.

First of all, it has to be noted that no known document states that the capacity of the air-blowers of Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III was increased from 4,800 to 8,000 m<sup>3</sup> of air per hour; incontrovertible data stating exactly the opposite exists: the cost estimate of the Topf Company of November 4, 1941, claims in fact, for the two air-blowers of the room at issue, a capacity of 4,800 m<sup>3</sup> of air per hour, and this is fully confirmed both by invoice no. 171 of February 22nd 1943 for Crematorium II, and by invoice no. 729 of May 27, 1943 for Crematorium III.

The basic technical elements relative to the two air-blowers of Morgue #1 are:

- three-phase motor
- 50 cycles (Hz)
- 380 volts
- 925 revolutions per minute
- total pressure 40 mm of water column
- capacity: 4,800 m<sup>3</sup>/h.

The three-phase motor (Document 23) is constituted by a stator, which is “the fixed part where the three main coils are inserted to which the supply voltage is applied”, and by a rotor, which is located inside the stator, which “due to the ‘activation’ by the magnetic field generated by the stator coils, starts to rotate”. In the stator more triplets of coils can be mounted, so that more magnetic fields are generated, one for each triplet.

A motor with one triple set of coils, in technical language, has one polar couple or more simply, two opposing poles.

And this is the central core of the question, the speed of rotation: [\[39\]](#)

“The speed of rotation of a motor depends on the Rotating Magnetic Field, which depends on the frequency of the supply voltage. In practice, for a motor with one polar couple, applying a voltage of 50 Hz, the speed of the rotor will be 50 revolutions per second, or 3,000 revolutions per minute [please see below]. When the stator is instead built with more polar couples, the rotating magnetic field does not rotate at 3,000 revolutions per minute anymore, but at lower speeds, due to the presence of other magnetic poles, which enable the rotor to cover a shorter path before finding the pole attracting it.”

In practice, the rotating speed of a three-phase motor is fixed, because it depends exclusively on the frequency of the electrical supply and on the number of polar couples, according to the known formula:

$$n = ( 60 \text{ sec/min} \times f ) \div p$$

n = number of revolutions per minute

f = frequency (50 Hz, “the standard frequency in Europe for the systems of distribution of alternating current “) p = number of polar couples.

In our example, we obtain:

$$n = (60 \times 50) \div 1 = 3,000 \text{ revolutions per minute}$$

Since the frequency of 50 Hz remains unchanged, the speed of rotation is fixed, and it depends solely on the number of polar couples, as explained by Dal Prà in the following table:

Number of poles	Polar Couples	Speed (rpm)
2	1	3000
4	2	1500
6	3	1000
8	4	750
10	5	600
12	6	500
20	10	300

The invoices of the Topf Company no. 171 of February 22nd 1943, and no. 729 of May 27, 1943, refer explicitly to the frequency of 50 periods or cycles, that is 50 Hz. Therefore, increasing the power output of the motor, from 2 to 3.5 HP, the number of the revolutions would have remained unchanged.

In the cost estimate of November 4, 1941, 925 revolutions per minute instead of 1,000 were indicated, because the rotor does not rotate at the same speed as the stator magnetic field, but at a speed slightly lower (due to mechanical and cooling losses); the difference between the stator speed (synchronic speed) and the speed of the rotor, known as run rate of flow, is set between 3% and 7%. The effective speed, and therefore the effective number of revolutions, results, consequently, as a little lower. In our specific case the rate of flow was calculated at 7.5%:  $1000 - (0.075 \times 1000) = 925$  revolutions/min.

The relation between performance, total pressure and used power are explained as follows:

1. the performance is directly proportional to the number of revolutions
2. the total pressure is directly proportional to the square of the number of revolutions
3. the used power is directly proportional to the cube of the number of revolutions. [\[40\]](#)

The cost estimate of November 4, 1941, as it was also stated above, indicates the number of revolutions of the three-phase motor and therefore of the air-blower as  $n=925$  revolutions/min. If the capacity of the air-blower (intake/exhaust), somehow increases from 4,800 to 8,000 m<sup>3</sup>/h, the number of revolutions would increase proportionally from 925 to 1,540; the total pressure would also increase  $(1540)^2 \div (925)^2 = 2.77$  times, and therefore from 40 to approx. 110 mm of water column, and finally, the used power would have increased  $(1540)^3 \div (925)^3 = 4.6$  times, or from 2 to 9.2 HP.

This confirms that the increase of capacity, within the conditions described, was impossible.

Because after increasing the number of revolutions, the total pressure increases (to the square), it is obvious that the used power also increases (to the cube), because the friction of the air in the ventilation ducts increases at higher speeds.

This is the only reason why Engineer Schultze, after having created the project of the whole ventilation system of the new crematorium, changed the power of the motors of all air-blowers.

This has also a precise technical explanation.

The mechanical performance ( $P_w$ ) of an air-blower is calculated according to the formula:

$$P_w = (Q \cdot p_t \cdot 100) \div \eta,$$

where,

$Q$  = air capacity in cubic meters/second ( $m^3/s$ )

$p_t$  = total pressure in Pa (Pascal: 1 mm  $H_2O$  = 9.8 Pa)

$\eta$  = efficiency rate of the air-blower in %.

Knowing that engineer Schultze, in the cost estimate of November 4, 1941, calculated a performance at the motor shaft of the air-blower of 1.6 HP (= 1,177 W) and of 2 HP for the three-phase motor; and further knowing the capacity ( $4800 m^3/h = 1.33 m^3/s$ ) and the total pressure (40 mm water column [ $H_2O$ ] = 392 Pa); and finally, knowing that the centrifugal type air-blowers had an efficiency rate of between 25 and 50%,[\[41\]](#) the performance of the air-blower results in 0.443:

The electrical power ( $P_e$ ) of the motor used from the electrical power grid is calculated according to the formula:

$$P_e = (P_w \div \eta_{mot}),$$

where  $\eta_{mot}$  = is the efficiency rate of the motor in %, which is set between 0.7 and 0.95.[\[42\]](#)

Since the output power of the motor calculated by Schultze was 2 HP, or 1,471 W, it is obvious that the efficiency rate of the motor was 0.8:

$$(1,177 \div 1,471) = 0.8,$$

or rather:

$$1,177 W (1.6 HP) \div 0.8 = 1,471 W (2 HP).$$

Applying the above-mentioned formula for the calculation of the used power of the air-blower, knowing the speed ( $1.33 m^3/s$ ), the performance rate of the air-blower (44.3%) and the efficiency rate of the motor (80%), results in:

3.5 HP ( $\times 735.5$  W/HP) 2,574 W;  $2,574 \times 0.8 = 2,059$  W (used power of the motor);

$P = 686$  Pa or  $(686 \div 9.8)$  70 mm H<sub>2</sub>O.

In practice, the change of the motor was required to overcome an additional real pressure of 30 mm H<sub>2</sub>O, due to the summation of the total friction in the air ducts.

What is explained above is confirmed in a table relative to the low-pressure centrifugal air-blowers in the Manuale dell'ingegnere Colombo[43] (see Document 24) where the data of different air-blowers are indicated with intake areas of increasing dimensions, with variable numbers of revolutions, variable air flow per minute, with variable effective pressure in mm of water column and used power.

Already the first two data are significant. An air-blower with an intake area of 210 x 210 mm at 600 revolutions/min has a capacity of 18 m<sup>3</sup>/min, with a pressure of 9 mm H<sub>2</sub>O and a used power of 0.07 HP; at 1,450 revolutions, the capacity turns into 50 m<sup>3</sup>/min, the pressure to 45 mm and the used power to 1 HP. Therefore, increasing the capacity  $(50 \div 18)$  4.44 times, the used power increased  $(1 \div 0.07)$  14.28 times.

In conclusion, Pressac's hypothesis is technically absurd and necessarily without any scientific foundation.

V) The air-blower Type 450 planned for Crematoria IV and V

The fact remains to be explained, noted by Pressac, that the invoice of the Topf Company no. 132 of December 23rd 1943, referring to "Ventilation devices for Crematoria IV and V" (Entlüftungsanlagen für die Krematorien IV und V) assigns to an air-blower Type 450 a capacity of 8,000 m<sup>3</sup> of air per hour. First of all, the technical data written there has to be analyzed (Document 25):

"Gebläse Nr. 450 zur Förderung von stündlich etwa 8000 cbm Abluft gegen 40 mm W.S. Gesamtpressung, Drehstrommotor für 380 Volt, 50 Per. mit Doppelnutanker, Spreitzwassergeschützt [sic], N = ca. 3,5 PS. n = 925 Upm)."[44]

["Air-Blower Type 450 with the capacity of approximately 8,000 m<sup>3</sup> of stale air per hour against a total pressure of 40 mm of water column, three-phase motor of 380 volts, 50 cycles, with rotor with double groove bolt, protected from water against splashes, output power N = approx. 3.5 HP, n = 925 revolutions per minute" ]

The related cost estimate (Kostenanschlag) of June 6, 1943, (Document 26)[45] reports the same technical data, but it further clarifies that "das Schaufelrad, welches fliegend auf Motorwellenstumpf aufgebaut wird" ["the blower wheel was connected directly onto the motor shaft"]. In other words, this formula characterizes the direct coupling of the motor shaft and the blower wheel, as shown in Document 27, taken from the drawing of the Topf Company D 57999 of November 30, 1940.[46] The detail shows the project of the aspiration device of Crematorium I of Auschwitz: M is the motor directly coupled through the motor shaft MW to the air-blower G; S is the chimney.

Document 28 shows the connection of the motor to the air-blower Type 450 in the future

Crematorium II.

At the time, there were three types of connections: with a belt (durch Riemen) (Document 29), with sprocket-gears reducer (Zahnradvorgelege) and with direct coupling (in direkter Kupplung) (Document 30).[\[47\]](#)

The sprocket gears reducer was formed by two or more cog wheels. For the air-blowers a special form of this system was the so called “Zentratorkupplung,” which was designed as a reducer, but it could also be used as a multiplier. The blower wheel had on its internal part three elastic rings which were mounted on the motor shaft, from which they received the motion and transmitted it to the blower wheel circulating over a bigger ring on its inside, as is shown in Document 31.[\[48\]](#)

Because of its configuration, this system was also called “Planetengetriebe” (planetary gear drive) or “Umlaufrädergetriebe” (circular gear drive) which could also have clogged pinions instead of the rings as shown in Document 32.

The latter system could also be used as a multiplier of revolutions, that means that it could induce the number of revolutions of the blower wheel to be greater than that of the motor shaft; in the case at issue this is excluded since the motor of the air-blower was directly coupled to the blower wheel.

In comparison to the two air-blowers Type 450 planned for Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III, the differences are twofold: the capacity (8,000 m<sup>3</sup> instead of 4,800) and the power output of the motor (3.5 HP instead of 2 HP originally foreseen). All the other parameters are identical. Since the power output of the motor could not influence the number of revolutions, which in fact in both cases remained the same (925 revolutions per minute), there are only two explanations: either one of the two capacities is wrong (4,800 or 8,000 m<sup>3</sup>/h), or different models of air-blower Type 450 existed with different volume capacities for each revolution of the blower wheel.

However, the first option of the dilemma is untenable, because another cost estimate of the Topf Company, the one of December 9, 1940, referring to a “Ventilation device for corpse cubicles and dissection room” (Entlüftungs-Anlage für Leichenzellen und Sezierraum) – the first facility planned for the crematorium of the main camp in Auschwitz – refers to an air-blower of Type 450 with a capacity of 6,000 m<sup>3</sup> of stale air per hour against a total pressure of 25 mm of water column, powered by a three-phase motor of 1.5 HP for 220/380 volts, 50 cycles, at 720 revolutions per minute.[\[49\]](#)

The total pressure is related to the number of revolutions, and therefore to the capacity of the air-blower, and therefore 25 mm of water column is linked to the 720 revolutions. In practice this fan no. 450, at 720 revolutions per minute, had a capacity of 6,000 m<sup>3</sup> of air per hour.

The alternative remaining (the second option above) is that different models of air-blower Type 450 existed, with a different volume capacity, as we will show below.

Returning to the air-blowers Type 450 foreseen for Morgue #1 and for Crematoria IV and V, it results in fact that the former had a volume capacity of

$$1) 4,800 \div 60 = 80 \text{ m}^3/\text{min};$$

$$80 \div 925 = 0.086 \text{ m}^3 \text{ (of air passing through the air-blower for each revolution of the motor wheel);}$$

while for the second, the capacity was instead:

$$2) 8,000 \div 60 = 133.3 \text{ m}^3/\text{min}$$

$$133.3 \div 925 = 0.144 \text{ m}^3;$$

for air-blower Type 450 of the crematorium of the main camp the capacity was:

$$3) 6,000 \div 60 = 100 \text{ m}^3/\text{min}$$

At 925 revolutions this air-blower would have had a capacity of  $([925 \times 6,000] \div 720 =)$  approximately  $7,700 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$ .

This value can be considered identical to Case 2, because the capacity of  $8,000 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$  was rounded off (“etwa”, approximately) and probably also the capacity of  $6,000 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$  was rounded off.

Since the capacity – as explained above – is directly proportional to the number of revolutions, it is impossible that two identical air-blowers both running at 925 revolutions per minute could have had different capacities; one of  $4,800 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$ , and the other of  $8,000 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$ ; a fact that only enhances the explanation made above.

The only possible explanation is that the air-blower Type 450, while assuming both the total volume of the casing and the diameter of the intake and exhaust tubes as equal, appeared in at least two different variants regarding the position of the vanes (concave or convex) and/or their angulation; this produced a different volume of air movement for each revolution of the blower wheel.

From the documents, it can be deduced that these models, running at the same numbers of revolutions, were distinguishable only by the diameters of the casings and by the capacities of the air-blower:

1. 450/4,800 and
2. 450/8,000.

VI) The deceptions of Richard Green-Jamie McCarthy and the tacit approval of Robert Jan van Pelt

In any case, it is certain that the increase in power of the motor of air-blower Type 450 from 2 to 3.5 HP does not equate to an increase in the capacity of the air-blower from  $4,800$  to  $8,000 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$ . On the contrary, this appears patently absurd, because – from Pressac’s perspective – the increase of power should have induced an increase in the number of revolutions per minute of the motor (the capacity being conditioned by this factor), but Topf’s invoice no. 132 of December 23, 1943 mentions clearly the same number of revolutions in the cost estimate of November 4, 1941 (925 rpm), which relates to the same capacity in both invoices no. 171 of February 22 and no. 729 of May 27, 1943 ( $4,800 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$ ).

The significance of the issue discussed above lies in the fact that Robert Jan van Pelt repeated the error of Pressac, in writing:[\[50\]](#) ventilation system of the crematoria was able to quickly remove the gas. The gas chambers of the Crematoria 2 and 3 were 30 m long by 7 m wide and 2.4 m high, which resulted in a volume of 504 cubic meters. They were equipped with a ventilation system with both intake and exhaust fans that were capable of cycling 8000 cubic meters [of air] per hour through the room. In other words, the system was able to create  $8,000 : 604 = 15.8$  air exchanges per hour.”

Van Pelt referred to an article by Richard J. Green and Jamie McCarthy with the title "Chemistry Is Not the Science: Rudolf, Rhetoric & Reduction".<sup>[51]</sup> The copyright is from 1999, but the last revision of the article was done on July 28, 2000.

The two authors write:

“The gas chambers were 30 m long by 7 m wide: 210 sq m. They were 2.4 m high, for a volume of 504 cubic meters.<sup>[52]</sup> Those same chambers had a ventilation system with both intake and exhaust fans, capable of cycling 8000 cu m through the room each hour. This is commonly referred to as  $8000 \div 504 = 15.8$  ‘air exchanges per hour.’ Note that the Holocaust-denier, Carlo Mattogno, has misrepresented these figures in his essay, Auschwitz: The End of a Legend”.

In the footnote, they explain:

“Mattogno, Carlo, Auschwitz: The End of a Legend, Newport Beach: IHR, 1994, pp. 60-62. Available in German translation as ‘Auschwitz: das Ende einer Legende’ at www.codoh.com/inter/intnackt/intnackausch3.html [now at <http://holocausthandbuecher.com/dl/14d-anf.pdf>; English: <http://holocausthandbooks.com/dl/14-apf.pdf>].

Mattogno misrepresents the planned ventilation capacity that was at one point planned as if it were real:

Consequently, for the supposed homicidal gas chamber, the SS had foreseen  $4,800 \div 506 = 9.48$  air exchanges per hour, while in the supposed changing room  $10,000 \div 902.7 = 11$  air exchanges per hour: thus the gas chamber was less ventilated than the changing room!

However, he is at least honest enough to point out (two pages earlier) that a larger capacity ended up being used:

Pressac states that Leichenkeller 1 of Crematories II and III was actually equipped with ventilators with a capacity of 8000 m<sup>3</sup>/h of air (p. 74 and 118), and even mentions the invoice of the ventilation system for Crematory III: invoice No. 729 of 27 March 1943 (p. 105, note 184).”

Mattogno would also have misrepresented the capacity foreseen in the planned project (4,800 m<sup>3</sup>/h) with the alleged one, of the realization of the project (8,000 m<sup>3</sup>/h) and this would be the base of his “misrepresentation”.

In reality, a veritable misrepresentation was actually performed by Green and McCarthy. In the above-mentioned book Auschwitz: The End of a Legend. Critique of Jean-Claude Pressac<sup>[53]</sup> (the English translation of Auschwitz. Fine di una leggenda<sup>[54]</sup>) the facsimile copies of the Topf invoices no. 171 of February 22nd, and no. 729 of May 27, 1943 are shown,<sup>[55]</sup> which both, we repeat, state a capacity of 4,800 m<sup>3</sup>/h. Now a high degree of brazenness is needed to pretend that invoices, which by definition correspond to items actually delivered, referred instead to a mere design specification!

What concerns the alleged admission of Mattogno that the effective capacity of the air-blowers was of 8,000 m<sup>3</sup>/h, the two authors maliciously pretended not to understand that Mattogno simply explained the hypothesis of Pressac, only to later refute it based precisely on the above-mentioned invoices.[\[56\]](#)

In fact, writing that Pressac “mentions even the invoice of the ventilation device for Crematorium III: invoice no. 729 of May 27, 1943”, which states a capacity of 4,800 m<sup>3</sup>/h, Mattogno only intended to underline the simple fact that Pressac was refuting himself.

In his report, written in 2001 as an expert opinion for the appeal trial of Irving-Lipstadt, Green returned to the question in these terms:[\[57\]](#)

“Holocaust-denier Carlo Mattogno claims in his essay, "Auschwitz: The End of a Legend" that the ventilation capacity is  $4,800 \div 506 = 9.48$  air exchanges per hour based upon what the SS planned to use originally.[\[58\]](#) Pressac claims that although the SS planned for only 4,800 cu m/hour, they eventually installed ventilation capable of 8000 cu m/hour. John Zimmerman has recently researched, 502-1-327, a Topf bill dated May 27, 1943, which may refer to Crematorium II (however, the first page in his copy is missing so he cannot yet be sure); it may indicate that the 4800 cu m/hour figure is correct”.

Therefore “recently”, that is, allegedly after July 28, 2000, the date of the last revision of the article mentioned above, Zimmermann found one page only of the invoice no. 729 of May 27, 1943, for which Mattogno had published in facsimile the complete text already in 1994! This document is kept in the Museum of Auschwitz (Documents 21c-d). The other document kept in the Russian State Archive of War in Moscow with the reference number 502-1-327, pages 16 and 16a, is shown in Documents 21a-b. However, here the date of May 27, 1943, appears on the first page only; therefore, if the first page was really missing in the copy found by Zimmermann, how could Green claim that the invoice was “dated May 27, 1943”? And moreover: how could he mention the capacity of 4,800 m<sup>3</sup>/h, since this value is reported only in the first page of the invoice?

It is clear that Zimmermann also found the first page, and he transferred it to Green (who also stated that it may “refer to Crematory II” only to create further deception). All these deceptions were needed to avoid public admission that the capacity indicated by Mattogno was the correct one, and only reluctantly did Green concede that it “may” (!) be correct.

This excursus shows the incompetence and the dishonesty of the most acclaimed orthodox holocaust experts regarding the ventilation in the crematoria of Birkenau.

From the revisionist point of view, the significance of the issue relating to the capacity of the air-blowers remains intact, that after the alleged transformation of Morgue #1 of Crematorium II into a gas chamber working with hydrogen cyanide (Zyklon B), the capacity of both air-blowers, the intake and exhaust, still conformed to a normal morgue. The number of air exchanges planned, approx. 9.5 per hour, was in fact the one prescribed by the technical manuals of the time, like the one by engineer Wilhelm Heepke:[\[59\]](#)

“The supply of fresh air is carried out from above. An air exchange rate of at least 5 times per hour has to be taken into consideration; owing to circumstances, the figure of 10 air exchanges may be reached due to higher usage of the room, whereas the higher number of air exchanges shall be reached by means of an air-blower (Eine Zuführung frischer Luft erfolgt von oben. Man hat mindestens mit einem 5fachen stündlichen Luftwechsel zu rechnen; unter Umständen kann man sogar bei stärker Benutzung des Raumes bis auf 10fachen gehen, welche hohe Luftabfuhr mit Hilfe eines Ventilators erreicht wird)“.

Paradoxically Engineer Schultze, in the above-mentioned cost estimate of December 9, 1940, stated:[\[60\]](#)

“Für den Sezierraum haben wir einen 10-fachen und für die Leichenzelle einen 20-fachen Luftwechsel vorgesehen.” [For the dissecting room we have planned 10 air exchanges and for the corpse cubicle 20 exchanges]

VII) Pressac, destroyer of the “gas chambers” of Auschwitz

1) The claim of a revisionist and Pressac’s answer

In his first book about Auschwitz, Pressac wanted to respond to the argument of a revisionist. The title of the “Attachment”, which summarized the objection, is: “GAS 3000 PEOPLE IN LEICHENKELLER I OF KREMATORIUM II? IMPOSSIBLE, THE BODIES WOULD HAVE BLOCKED THE LOWER AIR EXTRACTION ORIFICES”.

Pressac writes:[\[61\]](#)

“Following the exchange of letters and telephone calls with a correspondent who doubts the reality of the gas chambers, I have extracted two of his arguments that appear to me valid.

Describing the ventilation system of Leichenkeller I [of the future Krematorium II as per the cross-section on drawing 933], he pointed out to me that the air entered through the upper orifices, then was extracted through the lower ones, and concluded:

‘This arrangement is perfectly suitable if the room is used as a morgue: the air entering cools, becomes denser, and is extracted from the lower part.’

He then asked me to imagine:

‘the situation in the LK 1 after the gassing of a large number of people: the corpses are heaped on top of one another; they block most of the air extraction orifices; the room is full of warm toxic gas; how can there be rapid and efficient mechanical ventilation? I would say that it is not possible...’

These remarks mean that Leichenkeller I used as a gas chamber had a poorly designed ventilation system and in the case of large-scale gassings [3000 people in 210 m<sup>2</sup> according to Nyiszli, or 13.3 per square meter], the lower orifices being blocked ventilation would become impossible [a model visible at the Museum illustrates this ‘maximum’ case, though there are probably no more than one thousand victims depicted].

The figure of 3000 is theoretical and exaggerated, but if we take it as correct, then so is my correspondent's hypothesis and the ventilation is blocked and cannot work.

What would the SS have done in the case of such an 'incident'?

They would have proceeded in two stages:

1. Open wide the doors giving basement access through the north yard and those of the undressing room, whose ventilation system working at full power would prevent the basement being contaminated:

Before putting on their gas masks, the SS would have then ordered two to four members of the Sonderkommando to put on masks, open the gas chamber door and drag bodies out into the vestibule until several of the air extraction orifices had been cleared. Then the gas-tight door would have been closed again, the ventilation restarted, and to improve its efficiency all that was required was to open the Zyklon-B introduction covers, but not until that moment. After verifying by means of a gas detector that there was no longer any danger of hydrocyanic acid intoxication outside the gas chamber, operations would have resumed their 'normal' course.

2. Once the gas chamber had been emptied, a squad of fitters or bricklayers would have fixed at the end of the chamber, in the southeast corner a steel duct of about 20 cm diameter and 2 meters high or built a brick chimney of about the same dimensions connecting with or protecting one of the lower air extraction orifices and enabling it to take in warm contaminated air from above. The time taken for the 'repair' would not have been longer than an afternoon. Such an incident would not have interrupted the 'operation' of the Krematorium. As the documents we possess at present make no mention of such work we can assume for the moment that the case of the '3000' never occurred, the number of victims from a convoy always being less than this.

The initial ventilation system of Leichenkeller I, which was designed for a basement morgue, is not a 'definitive' obstacle to using the room as a gas chamber." (bold Pressac's; underscore added here)

The anonymous revisionist was without doubt the engineer Pierre Marais, who published similar reasonings in a book in 1991.<sup>[62]</sup> However, he did not presume the impossibility of the de-aeration from the occlusion of the related openings by a certain number of victims; he spoke generally of "several hundreds, or also of several thousand."<sup>[63]</sup> On the other hand, he constructed his argument in opposition to the explanations which were claimed by Georges Wellers in his book Les chambres à gaz ont existé,<sup>[64]</sup> in which he published the drawings of the vertical sections of Morgue #1 and 2 of the future Crematorium II. The written correspondence which Marais had with this orthodox historian shows that the case of "3,000" was completely outside his scope of contemplation.

This number was a simple ploy of Pressac in order to somehow extricate himself from a tight spot. In fact, as will be shown, such an obstacle would have been "crucial" even with half of the victims considered by Pressac: 1,500 and even less. On the other hand, Pressac himself, while discussing the claim of Nyiszli, states that 3,000 persons is an exaggerated number, and that the "real number was without doubt much lower, probably from 1,000 to 1,500".<sup>[65]</sup>

2) An insufficient solution

Could Pressac really have believed that a single opening with a total cross-sectional area equal to 1/40 of the total planned in the ventilation system of the room, if left unobstructed, would have allowed a “normal” ventilation of Morgue #1?

Document 33 shows the “chimney” imagined by Pressac in the south-east corner of Morgue #1. The air would have entered only from above (the same as in the duct hypothesis) and would have been expelled only through a single opening. Therefore this “modification” would have been completely insufficient.

In order to overcome the above-mentioned difficulty, it would have been necessary to keep open all the ventilation openings; the simplest system in order to achieve this would have been the installation of iron gratings, cemented at the bottom and to the wall, at an appropriate distance from the wall and to the height of a couple of meters, in order to protect all the ventilation openings on both sides of the room.

An example of such an iron grating is shown in Documents 34 and 34a.

Such work would have taken longer and also more floor space would have been lost, but – as we will prove below – without some protection devices of this kind, the homicidal gassing would have encountered a “crucial” and insurmountable obstacle, not only in the case of “3,000”, but also with 1,500 victims or 1,000 or even fewer.

The conclusion of Pressac is mind-boggling: because the documents do not mention the chimerical works imagined by himself, it follows that (!) the case of 3,000 victims never happened! Therefore the “gas chambers” always worked flawlessly!

It is obvious that, by accepting the reality of the extermination of the Hungarian Jews during Spring-Summer of 1944, due to their huge inflow in a short period, the case of 3,000 victims had to happen every day. Just to supply evidence, from May 14 to June 7, 1944, 289,357 Jews started from Hungary in the direction of Auschwitz in a period of 24 days, on average more than 12,000 per day. Taking into consideration that, from the orthodox perspective, during the period mentioned, the number of the alleged-gassed persons was around 70%, about  $(12,000 \times 0.7 =)$  8,400 Jews would have been killed every day,[\[66\]](#) and would have had to be gassed in the three crematoria in operation (II, III and V). Therefore, Morgue #1 of Crematoria II and III would have been crowded every day.

3) The “accident” of clogged ventilation openings

According to Pressac, Morgue #1 in the plan had the following dimensions: length: 30 m, width: 7 m; height: 2.41 m.[\[67\]](#) For the sake of exactitude, the most exact drawing of the Huta Company 109/13A and 109/14A of September 21st 1943, published by Pressac himself,[\[68\]](#) shows the presence of 7 concrete pillars to support the ceiling of 40 x 40 cm and 199 cm high, which support a concrete beam 41 cm high; the height of the room, indicated as 2.40 m in the drawing of September 21st 1943, is in fact the sum of 1.99 + 0.41.

The 7 pillars occupied a surface of  $(7 \times 0.4 \times 0.4)$  1.12 m<sup>2</sup>, and had a volume of  $(1.12 \times 1.99) = 2.22$  m<sup>3</sup>; the beam had a volume of  $(30 \times 0.41 \times 0.41) = 5$  m<sup>3</sup>.

In the orthodox scenario, also the surface area of 4 columns for pouring in Zyklon B  $(4 \times 70 \times 70$  cm, in total 1.96 m<sup>2</sup> and had a volume of  $1.96 \times 2.4 = 4.7$  m<sup>3</sup>) has to be added; the dimensions thereof were given by the notorious witness Michał Kula in his first deposition[69] (he reduced the size of these columns down to 24 × 24 cm in a second deposition[70]).

Therefore, the usable surface area for the victims was  $(30 \times 7) = 210 \text{ m}^2$ , minus  $(1.12 + 1.96)$ , or, approx.  $3 \text{ m}^2$ ; that is approximately  $207 \text{ m}^2$ .

Rudolf Höss claimed that in this room, 1,500-1,600 victims were crammed (see below). In a room of  $207 \text{ m}^2$ , 1,500 standing persons have a density of  $(1,500 \div 207)$ , over 7 persons per square meter. Once dead, with no more muscular tension, the persons would have slumped to the floor, forming a heap whose height can be estimated.

Van Pelt declared during the Irving-Lipstadt trial that the median weight of a victim was 60 kg;[71] most probably he took this number from Pressac, who already earlier mentioned a median weight of 60 kg.[72] With certainty, it can be assured that the total weight of the 1,500 victims was  $(1,500 \times 60) = 90,000 \text{ kg}$ , which we can consider equivalent to 90,000 liters or  $90 \text{ m}^3$ .

Theoretically  $90 \text{ m}^3$  distributed over a surface of  $207 \text{ m}^2$  correspond to a height of  $(90 \div 207) = 43.5 \text{ cm}$ , and to a coverage of the floor of 100%. Obviously, the corpses are not water or sand, and between them some space would have remained, even though small. If one assumes a double height of 87 cm, the volume and the surface available in reference to the heap of corpses would also have doubled:  $0.87 \times 207 = 180 \text{ m}^3$ , of which  $90 \text{ m}^3$  claimed by the corpses and  $90 \text{ m}^3$  of free space between them. In this case, the free space would constitute the sum of all interspaces and of all air pockets existing among the 1,500 corpses; there are thousands of interspaces and air pockets, not necessarily communicating with each other, for a total height of 87 cm.

This height corresponds more or less to that of conscious adults prone on their knees or sitting on the floor with an erect torso, as Drawings 1 and 2 of Document 35 show.[73]

The rendering of Crematorium II displayed by the Auschwitz Museum shows the “gas chamber” full of victims (Document 36). Pressac was referring to this; according to him, “not more than a thousand victims” are depicted.

In this reconstruction, the air-extraction duct is placed too high, and also the connection opening to the “gas chamber” is placed too high. The original drawings display in fact that these openings were located almost at floor level (see Document 2, D, D1, and Document 37).

In Document 36, Rectangles A, B and C represent three openings in their correct positions. Even though the heap of corpses appears exceedingly high, it can be intuitively understood that in a real gassing, all exhaust openings would have been inevitably obstructed by the corpses to one degree or another. The real scenario would also be:

- up to  $90 \text{ m}^3$  piled on top of the openings, penetrated by thousands of interspaces and air pockets between the corpses (not necessarily communicating with each other and, if not communicating, impossible to ventilate the trapped vapors of hydrogen cyanide), which would have hugely increased the friction of the gas mixture which was supposed to pass through;
- ventilation openings physically obstructed by the corpses lying on the floor.

In these conditions, the ventilation of the room would have been totally ineffective, if not impossible.

Document 38 depicts visually the “gas chamber” with the layer of corpses of approx. 87 cm in height.

The reasoning related to the height of the corpses is obviously valid only under certain limitations; it is obvious that, by reducing the number of victims, hypothetically also the surface available on the floor would have increased. For example, if only 1,000 victims are considered over a surface of 207 m<sup>2</sup>, a density of approx. 5 standing persons per square meter would have resulted; the height of the heap would have been definitely lower, but still, the corpses would obstruct the ventilation openings. These would remain more or less unobstructed only with fewer than 1,000 victims. But the number of 1,500 victims reported is claimed even by orthodox Holocaust historians as too small. Franciszek Piper states in fact that “approximately 2,000 persons were crammed inside Morgue #1 on average”.[\[74\]](#)

In this perspective, from the numerical point of view, the issue would be perfectly credible. Based on the Kalendarium of Danuta Czech,[\[75\]](#) from March 14, 1943 (first “gassing” in the Crematorium II) to the end of the year, the 47 “gassings” numerically more important would have been distributed like this:

- from 1,000 to 1,500 persons: 9
- from 1,500 to 2,000 persons: 16
- from 2,000 to 2,500 persons: 14
- from 2,500 to 3,000 persons: 6
- from 3,500 to 4,000 persons: 2.

The case of the “gassing” of 1,500 persons and more in Crematorium II would also have happened many times more in the year 1943. The case of the Hungarian Jews’ deportation in 1944 was mentioned earlier.

The deportation of the Jews from the ghetto of Łódź can also be mentioned. According to Franciszek Piper, 55,000-65,000 persons arrived at Auschwitz from August 15 to September 2, 1944, in 18 days;[\[76\]](#) this means  $(55,000-65,000 \div 18 =)$  3,055-3,610 per day. Add to this the eight “gassings” of 2,000 persons and the five of 3,000 during 1944 mention in Czech’s Kalendarium.

The rendering of the Auschwitz Museum represents one of the alleged devices which allowed pouring of the Zyklon B inside the room from above. The most-acclaimed witness, Kula, painstakingly described the device, and Pressac drew it with some precision.[\[77\]](#) It was constituted of a kind of small metal casing of tight iron mesh, of unknown height, which ran inside a larger column made of a net of iron mesh with a square section of 70 x 70 cm; but its course stopped in the upper part of the larger column without ever reaching the floor. Zyklon B was poured from above inside the metal casing, and it remained and evaporated in the upper part of the room, we can assume between 1.90-2.00 and 2.40 meters (the ceiling height).

Van Pelt disagrees, and he presents his own drawing, in which the casing reaches the floor.[\[78\]](#) Such a system would have determined in any case the dissipation speed of the vapors of hydrogen cyanide into the free space above the bodies of the victims. As the execution progressed, an increasingly dense and high layer of dead bodies would have blocked the dissipation of more gas into this space.

In this scenario, a gas pocket in the free upper part of the room with an increasingly high concentration of the gas would have resulted, and it would have been challenging to remove it.

4) Pressac and van Pelt speculate on the ventilation of Morgue #1

Pressac claims that, “After 15 minutes of ventilation the air in the room would be completely renewed. A homicidal gassing (using 5 to 7 kg of Zyklon-B for 1,000 to 2,000 persons) would last about 20 minutes: 5 minutes for the action of the HCN bringing swift death (the quantity introduced being 40 times the lethal dose) and 15 minutes of ventilation BEFORE BEING ABLE TO OPEN THE GASTIGHT DOOR. [79]

In his book of 1993, Pressac wrote that the ventilation lasted 15-20 minutes and that the air of the room was “practically exchanged every 3-4 minutes”. [80]

The prerequisite of his reasoning is that 4 air exchanges correspond to a total renewal of the air of the room ( $8,000 \div 60 \times 15 =$ )  $2,000 \text{ m}^3$  of air in 15 minutes;  $2,000 \text{ m}^3 \div$  approx.  $500 \text{ m}^3 = 4$  air exchanges in 15 minutes, according to the erroneous conjecture of Pressac of the increase of the air-blowers’ capacity to  $8,000 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$ ; with the real capacity of  $4,800 \text{ m}^3/\text{h}$ , the exchanges in 15 minutes would have been approx. 2.5.

Van Pelt presents two tables in which the residual concentration of hydrogen cyanide in the “gas chamber” is calculated in ppm (parts per million) as a function of time, as well as the median concentration to which a person would have been exposed for 15 minutes, all based on an initial concentration of 1,000 and of 10,000 ppm.

His Table 5.2 contemplates an initial concentration of 10,000 ppm of HCN, [81] which is the one more consistent with orthodox the Holocaust narrative, even though it is too low.

Rudolf Höss claimed that the gassing of 1,500-1,600 persons in Crematoria II and III took on average 7 kg of Zyklon B; [82] an amount which in the free space of the room of approx.  $497 \text{ m}^3$  (after deduction of the approximately  $7 \text{ m}^3$  occupied by the pillars and by the concrete beam) would have generated a theoretical end concentration of hydrogen cyanide of ( $7,000 \div 497 =$ )  $14 \text{ g}/\text{m}^3$ , equivalent to 11,662 ppm.

The table at issue is as follows:

Time [min]	HCN [ppm]	HCN [ppm] after 15 min.
0	10000	3805
10	1908	726
20	364	138
30	70	26

Van Pelt limited himself to taking this data from the above-mentioned description by Richard J. Green. He used at the time a calculator available on the site of the “American Conference of Governmental Industrial Hygienists” in which the data could be inserted in order to obtain the results. As he clearly stated and as results from the formula given by van Pelt, the value of air exchanges was 9.94 per hour, but this value corresponds to a capacity of  $4,800 \text{ m}^3/\text{hour}$ ; only some lines above, van Pelt claims, as we saw before, that the capacity was 8,000 m<sup>3</sup>/hour, and that the number of air exchanges was 15.8. Apparently, he did not notice this nonsense.

The reason for these calculations was to refute the statements of Germar Rudolf about the impossibility to access the “gas chambers” after a homicidal gassing.

The calculations are completely doubtful and inconsistent, because they do not take into consideration three crucial elements:

1. The “gassing” times declared by the most important witnesses are by far shorter: 3 minutes (J. Weiss), 3-5 minutes (C.S. Bendel), 5 minutes (M. Nyiszli), 3-15 minutes (R. Höss), 3-10 minutes (judge J. Sehn).[\[83\]](#) Immediately after the “gas chamber” was opened, the removal of the corpses of the victims began.
2. The evaporation of the hydrogen cyanide required extremely longer times to reach the maximum theoretical concentration, 3 hours at 15°C according to experiments performed in 1942.[\[84\]](#)
3. The theoretical scenario envisaged by Green and van Pelt presupposes an empty room, in which nothing obstructs the ventilation. It is then clear that even with some hundreds of persons inside the “gas chamber” this model would not correspond anymore to reality, because the corpses would represent a factor of disturbance – possibly even damaging – to the ventilation.

It is further obvious that the corpses of the victims would have reduced the available volume with a theoretical increase of the hydrogen-cyanide concentration. In the case of the 1,500 victims, the concentration would have been  $(504 - [2.22 + 5][\[85\]](#) - 90[\[86\]](#))$  ca. 406 m<sup>3</sup>;  $(7,000 \div 406) = 17.24$  g/m<sup>3</sup>, equivalent to 14,361 ppm.

This would also have affected the air exchanges per hour:

$(4,800 \div 406 =)$  11.8 per hour.

But the documents do not mention anything in this regard.

Since the “gas chambers” of Crematoria IV and V allegedly were activated without ventilation systems, one could ask how, according to van Pelt, the ventilation of the rooms was achieved, and especially how long it took. His embarrassment about such a simple question is shown by his silence, and it results even more from his pretense that Crematoria IV and V were “efficient and economical killing machines”.[\[87\]](#) Efficient? How could three “gas chambers” with a volume of approximately 521 m<sup>3</sup>, with 2 doors of 100 x 200 cm, and 7 small windows of 30 x 40 cm have an efficient ventilation?

The pretense of van Pelt is clearly absurd.

5) Opening the “gas-chamber” door

Pressac imagined that one could correct the unavoidable flow of the gas from Morgue #1 into the other rooms of the basement of the crematorium by opening the access door from the north court and the one at the end of Morgue #2, and then activating the ventilation system of this room. This solution does not take into account the fact that the “gas chamber” with its blocked air-exhaust channels may have been in overpressure (air blown inside from the intake air-blower, heat generated by the bodies of the victims), while the furnace room was in double underpressure, both for the air draft of the chimney and for its own ventilation system; also Morgue #2 was equipped with a similar ventilation system, and was also in underpressure; in simple terms, an air flow was constantly moving towards the cremation furnaces and towards the exhaust openings located on the ceiling of the furnace room; a similar air flow moved into Morgue #2 toward the corresponding air-blower.

By opening the door of the “gas chamber” with its blocked exhaust ducts, a lethal mixture of gas would have flowed out into the next room (in the drawings “Vorraum”, vestibule) and would have spread out all over the basement and via the elevator shaft into the furnace room. As a precautionary measure, and in order to avoid the gas mixture entering the three rooms of the former Leichenkeller 3 (Cubicles X, Y and Z in Document 39), it would have been necessary to close this door (but it was not gastight). How to eliminate the gas pocket of the vapors of hydrogen cyanide? The most rational system would have been this:

1. keep the door of the corpses chute open in order to let fresh air coming in dilute the air-vapor mixture coming out of Morgue #1;
2. turn on the exhaust air-blower of the ventilation system of Morgue #2, and wait for the number of air exchanges necessary to purify its air;
3. in order to prevent the gas mixture from seeping up the elevator shaft, it would have been necessary to deactivate the cremation furnaces and to avoid using the furnace room’s exhaust blower during the evacuation of the gas mixture.

This procedure is explained in Document 39.

How can anyone seriously believe that the engineer of the Topf Company and the Central Construction Office would have been so grossly inept as not to foresee these gross incongruities?

The danger of intoxication both for the inmates working in the crematoria and for the German guards watching over them should not be underestimated, since the lethal concentration of hydrogen cyanide by inhalation is of 300 ppm (0.36 g/m<sup>3</sup>).[\[88\]](#)

But the main problem is that these discrepancies, unavoidable in the absurd technical fabrication of the “gas chamber” were never raised by any “eye witness,” and they are not mentioned in any document of the concentration camp.

These drawbacks would have caused hydrogen cyanide intoxication of inmates and of SS guards practically during each gassing, but the only two known cases refer to the general matter of disinfestation; one was mentioned by Höss in the Sonderbefehl of August 12, 1942;[\[89\]](#) the other happened on December 9, 1943, when a civilian worker forced his way prematurely into an accommodation barrack which had been disinfested shortly before.[\[90\]](#)

The logical consequence to be taken from all that has been considered above is that “gassings” of 1,500 or even of 1,000 or even of some hundreds of persons never took place. However, because the reality of homicidal “gassings” is claimed only by witness statements, and these always adduce numbers well above 1,500; and because there would have been well over 1,500 gassing victims in each claimed batch due to the high number of Jewish transports arriving in Auschwitz, it can only be deduced that the claimed “gassings” described by witnesses as simple operations without dangers were impossible, and therefore they were not real.

Editor’s Remark

Typical air vents (registers)

Click on image to open large version

The screens covering the openings of a ventilation system, also called registers, usually have slits as openings as shown in the illustrations to the right. The type used in the Morgues #1 of Crematoria II & III at Auschwitz merely had very small holes, which increased the drag of the air-intake system considerably. Since these screens were made by the Auschwitz inmate workshop in early 1943, it is safe to assume that the Topf employees designing the ventilation system in November 1941 and March 1942, including its blowers and motors, did not know what these registers would look like. Rough calculations of the ventilation system's drag indicate that these vents actually caused half of the system's pressure loss.

If the engineers or fitters involved in installing the system wanted to reduced that drag, thus increase the air flow, the easiest way to accomplish this would have been by increasing the diameter of the holes in those screen, or by simply merging all holes of a row into a slit, rather than messing with the masonry ducting by adding additional air-intake holes.

Why Hitler Declared War on the United States

by John Wear

Abstract

Establishment historians state that Adolf Hitler made a mistake when he declared war on the United States. For example, British historian Andrew Roberts wrote:[\[1\]](#)

“It seems an unimaginably stupid thing to have done in retrospect, a suicidally hubristic act less than six months after attacking the Soviet Union. America was an uninvadable land mass of gigantic productive capacity and her intervention in 1917-18 had sealed Germany’s fate in the Great War.”

Historian Martin Gilbert wrote in regard to Germany’s declaration of war on the United States:[\[2\]](#)

“It was perhaps the greatest error, and certainly the single most decisive act, of the Second World War.”

In this article I will explain why Hitler was forced to declare war on the United States.

American Steps toward War

In his State of the Union address to Congress on January 6, 1941, Roosevelt outlined his plan for lend-lease aid to the anti-Axis powers. International law has long recognized that it is an act of war for a neutral government to supply arms, munitions, and implements of war to a belligerent. But Roosevelt brushed off objections to lend-lease based on international law. Roosevelt stated:

“Such aid is not an act of war, even if a dictator should unilaterally proclaim it to be.”

In this same speech, Roosevelt barred the door to suggestions of a negotiated peace:[\[3\]](#)

“We are committed to the proposition that the principles of morality and considerations of our own security will not permit us to acquiesce in a peace dictated by aggressors and sponsored by appeasers.”

President Roosevelt signed the Lend-Lease Act into law on March 11, 1941. This legislation marked the end of any pretense of neutrality on the part of the United States. Despite soothing assurances by Roosevelt that the United States would not get into the war, the adoption of the Lend-Lease Act was a decisive move which put America into an undeclared war in the Atlantic.

It opened up an immediate appeal for naval action to insure that munitions and supplies procured under the Lend-Lease Act would reach Great Britain.[\[4\]](#)

On April 9, 1941, the United States entered into an agreement with a Danish official for the defense of Greenland. Roosevelt simultaneously illegally sent American Marines to occupy Greenland.[\[5\]](#)

In June 1941, Roosevelt agreed with Churchill to relieve the British troops in Iceland, and this was done with U.S. Marines on July 7, 1941.[\[6\]](#) Also in June 1941, Roosevelt ordered the closing of all the German and Italian consulates in the United States.[\[7\]](#)

Another step toward war was the adoption on April 24, 1941, by the United States of a naval patrol system in the Atlantic to insure delivery of munitions and supplies to Great Britain. The American Navy under this scheme was assigned the responsibility of patrolling the Atlantic Ocean west of a median point represented by 25° longitude. American warships and planes within this area would search out German vessels and submarines and broadcast their position to the British Navy. Roosevelt tried to represent the naval patrol as a merely defensive move, but it was clearly a hostile act toward Germany designed to help the British war effort.[\[8\]](#)

The first wartime meeting between Roosevelt and Churchill began on August 9, 1941, in a conference at the harbor of Argentia in Newfoundland. The principal result of this conference was the signing of the Atlantic Charter on August 14, 1941. Roosevelt repeated to Churchill during this conference his predilection for an undeclared war, saying:

“I may never declare war; I may make war. If I were to ask Congress to declare war, they might argue about it for three months.”

The Atlantic Charter was in effect a joint declaration of war aims, although Congress had not voted for American participation in the war. The Atlantic Charter, which provided for Anglo-American cooperation in policing the world after the Second World War, was a tacit but inescapable implication that the United States would soon become involved in the war. This implication is fortified by the large number of top military and naval staff personnel who were present at the conference.[\[9\]](#)

Roosevelt’s Orders to Shoot-on Sight German Ships and Submarines

Roosevelt’s next move toward war was the issuing of secret orders on August 25, 1941, to the Atlantic Fleet to attack and destroy German and Italian “hostile forces.” These secret orders resulted in an incident on September 4, 1941, between an American destroyer, the Greer, and a German submarine.[\[10\]](#) Roosevelt falsely claimed in a fireside chat to the American public on September 11, 1941, that the German submarine had fired first.

The reality is that the Greer had tracked the German submarine for three hours, and broadcast the submarine’s location for the benefit of any British airplanes and destroyers which might be in the vicinity. The German submarine fired at the Greer only after a British airplane had dropped four depth charges which missed their mark. During this fireside chat Roosevelt finally admitted that, without consulting Congress or obtaining congressional sanction, he had ordered a shoot-on-sight campaign against Axis submarines.[\[11\]](#)

On September 13, 1941, Roosevelt ordered the Atlantic Fleet to escort convoys in which there were no American vessels.[\[12\]](#) This policy would make it more likely to provoke future incidents between American and German vessels. Roosevelt also agreed about this time to furnish Britain with “our best transport ships.” These included 12 liners and 20 cargo vessels manned by American crews to transport two British divisions to the Middle East.[\[13\]](#)

More serious incidents followed in the Atlantic. On October 17, 1941, an American destroyer, the Kearny, dropped depth charges on a German submarine. The German submarine retaliated and hit the Kearny with a torpedo, resulting in the loss of 11 lives. An older American destroyer, the Reuben James, was sunk with a casualty list of 115 of her crew members.[\[14\]](#) Some of her seamen were convinced the Reuben James had already sunk at least one U-boat before she was torpedoed by the German submarine.[\[15\]](#)

On October 27, 1941, Roosevelt broadcast over nationwide radio his Navy Day address. Roosevelt began his Navy Day address by stating that German submarines had torpedoed the U.S. destroyers Greer and Kearny. Roosevelt characterized these incidents as unprovoked acts of aggression directed against all Americans, and that “history will record who fired the first shot.”

What Roosevelt failed to mention in his broadcast is that in each case the U.S. destroyers had been involved in attack operations against the German submarines, which fired in self-defense only as a last resort. Hitler wanted to avoid war with the United States at all costs, and had expressly ordered German submarines to avoid conflicts with U.S. warships, except to avoid imminent destruction. It was Roosevelt’s shoot-on-sight orders to U.S. Navy vessels that were designed to make incidents like the ones Roosevelt condemned inevitable.[\[16\]](#)

Despite Roosevelt’s provocations, the American public was still against entering the war. By the end of October 1941, Roosevelt had no more ideas how to get into a formal and declared war:[\[17\]](#)

“...He had said everything ‘short of war’ that could be said. He had no more tricks left. The hat from which he had pulled so many rabbits was empty.”

Even full-page advertisements entitled “Stop Hitler Now” inserted in major American newspapers by Roosevelt’s supporters had failed to sway the American public. The advertisements warned the American people that a Europe dominated by Hitler was a threat to American democracy and the Western Hemisphere. The advertisements asked: “Will the Nazis considerately wait until we are ready to fight them? Anyone who argues that they will wait is either an imbecile or a traitor.” Roosevelt endorsed the advertisements, saying that they were “a great piece of work.”[\[18\]](#)

Yet the American people were still strongly against war.

Roosevelt Provokes Pearl Harbor Attack

Provoking Japan into an overt act of war was the principal policy that guided Roosevelt’s actions toward Japan throughout 1941. Lt. Cmdr. Arthur H. McCollum, head of the Far East desk of the Office of Naval Intelligence, wrote an eight-action memorandum dated October 7, 1940, outlining how to provoke a Japanese attack on the United States.[\[19\]](#)

The climax of Roosevelt’s measures designed to bring about war in the Pacific occurred on July 25, 1941, when Roosevelt froze all Japanese assets in the United States. This brought commercial relations between the nations to an effective end, including an end to the export of oil to Japan.

Prince Konoye, the Japanese premier, requested a meeting with Roosevelt to resolve the differences between the United States and Japan. American Ambassador Grew sent a series of telegrams to Washington, D.C. in which he strongly recommended that such a meeting take place. However, Roosevelt steadfastly refused to meet with the Japanese premier.[\[20\]](#)

Foreign Minister Toyoda made a dispatch to Japanese Ambassador Nomura on July 31, 1941. Since U.S. Intelligence had cracked the Japanese diplomatic code, Roosevelt and his associates were able to read this message:[\[21\]](#)

“Commercial and economic relations between Japan and third countries, led by England and the United States, are gradually becoming so horribly strained that we cannot endure it much longer. Consequently, our Empire, to save its very life, must take measures to secure the raw materials of the South Seas... I know that the Germans are somewhat dissatisfied with our negotiations with the United States, but we wish at any cost to prevent the United States from getting into the war, and we wish to settle the Chinese incident.”

This obvious Japanese desire for peace with the United States did not change Roosevelt’s policy toward Japan. Roosevelt refused to lift the oil embargo against Japan. The Roosevelt administration was well aware that Japan imported approximately 90% of her oil, and that 75% to 80% of her oil imports came from the United States. Roosevelt also knew that the Netherlands East Indies, which produced 3% of the world’s oil output, was the only other convenient oil producer that could meet Japan’s import needs.[\[22\]](#)

On October 31, 1941, an oil agreement between Japan and the Netherlands East Indies expired. The Netherlands East Indies had promised to deliver about 11.4 million barrels of oil to Japan, but actually delivered only half of that amount. The Japanese Navy had consumed approximately 22% of its oil reserves by the time the war broke out.[\[23\]](#)

By the closing months of 1941, the United States was intercepting and breaking within a matter of hours almost every code produced by Japan.[\[24\]](#) In the last week of November 1941, President Roosevelt knew that an attack by the Japanese in the Pacific was imminent.

Roosevelt warned William Bullitt against traveling across the Pacific:[\[25\]](#)

“I am expecting the Japs to attack any time now, probably within the next three or four days.”

Roosevelt and his administration knew this based on the intercepted Japanese messages. This information was not given to the commanders at Pearl Harbor to enable them to prepare for and thwart the Japanese attack.

Adm. Husband Kimmel, commander-in-chief of the U.S. Pacific Fleet, states that if he had all of the important information then available to the Navy Department, he would have gone to sea with his fleet and been in a good position to intercept the Japanese attack.[\[26\]](#) Kimmel concludes in regard to the Pearl Harbor attacks:

When the information available in Washington was disclosed to me I was appalled. Nothing in my experience of nearly 42 years of service in the Navy had prepared me for the actions of the highest officials in our government which denied this vital information to the Pearl Harbor commanders.

If those in authority wished to engage in power politics, the least that they should have done was to advise their naval and military commanders what they were endeavoring to accomplish. To utilize the Pacific Fleet and the Army forces at Pearl Harbor as a lure for a Japanese attack without advising the commander-in-chief of the fleet and the commander of the Army base at Hawaii is something I am wholly unable to comprehend.[\[27\]](#)

The Rainbow Five Plan

On December 8, 1941, President Roosevelt made a speech to Congress calling for a declaration of war against Japan. Condemning the attack on Pearl Harbor as a “date which will live in infamy,” Roosevelt did not once mention Germany.

Hitler’s policy of keeping incidents between the United States and Germany to a minimum seemed to have succeeded. Hitler had ignored or downplayed the numerous provocations that Roosevelt had made against Germany. Even after Roosevelt issued orders to shoot-on-sight at German submarines, Hitler had ordered his naval commanders and air force to avoid incidents that Roosevelt might use to bring America into the war. Also, since the Tripartite Pact did not obligate Germany to join Japan in a war initiated by Japan, it appeared unlikely that Hitler would declare war on the United States.[\[28\]](#)

The Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor surprised Hitler. Hitler had never wanted Japan to attack the United States. Germany had repeatedly urged Japan to attack Singapore and the rest of Great Britain’s Far East Empire, but Japan refused to do so. After the war Col. Gen. Alfred Jodl said that Hitler had wanted Japan to attack Great Britain and the Soviet Union in the Far East, which would have set up a two-front war. Hitler thought Roosevelt would probably not be able to persuade the American public to go to war to defend Britain’s Asian colonies. Jodl said that Hitler had wanted in Japan “a strong new ally without a strong new enemy.”[\[29\]](#)

Hitler’s decision to stay out of war with the United States was made more difficult on December 4, 1941, when the Chicago Tribune carried in huge black letters the headline: F.D.R.’s WAR PLANS! The Washington Times Herald, the largest paper in the nation’s capital, carried a similar headline.

Chesly Manly, the Tribune’s Washington correspondent, revealed in his report what Roosevelt had repeatedly denied: that Roosevelt was planning to lead the United States into war against Germany. The source of Manly’s information was no less than a verbatim copy of Rainbow Five, the top-secret war plan drawn up at Roosevelt’s request by the joint board of the United States Army and Navy. Manly’s story even contained a copy of President Roosevelt’s letter ordering the preparation of the plan.[\[30\]](#)

Rainbow Five called for the creation of a 10-million-man army, including an expeditionary force of 5 million men that would invade Europe in 1943 to defeat Germany. On December 5, 1941, the German Embassy in Washington, D.C., cabled the entire transcript of the newspaper story to Berlin. The story was reviewed and analyzed in Berlin as “the Roosevelt War Plan.” On December 6, 1941, Adm. Erich Raeder submitted a report to Hitler prepared by his staff that analyzed the Rainbow Five plan. Raeder concluded the most important point contained in Rainbow Five was the fact that the United States would not be ready to launch a military offensive against Germany until July 1943.[\[31\]](#)

On December 9, 1941, Hitler returned to Berlin from the Russian front and plunged into two days of conferences with Raeder, Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel, and Reichsmarschall Hermann Göring. The three advisors stressed that the Rainbow Five plan showed that the United States was determined to defeat Germany. They pointed out that Rainbow Five stated that the United States would undertake to carry on the war against Germany alone even if Russia collapsed and Britain surrendered to Germany. The three advisors leaned toward Adm. Raeder's view that an air and U-boat offensive against both British and American ships might be risky, but that the United States was already unquestionably an enemy.[\[32\]](#)

On December 9, 1941, Roosevelt made a radio address to the nation that is seldom mentioned in the history books. In addition to numerous uncomplimentary remarks about Hitler and Nazism, Roosevelt accused Hitler of urging Japan to attack the United States. Roosevelt declared:[\[33\]](#)

“We know that Germany and Japan are conducting their military and naval operations with a joint plan. Germany and Italy consider themselves at war with the United States without even bothering about a formal declaration... Your government knows Germany has been telling Japan that if Japan would attack the United States, Japan would share the spoils when peace came. She was promised by Germany that if she came in she would receive control of the whole Pacific area and that means not only the Far East, but all the islands of the Pacific and also a stranglehold on the west coast of North and Central and South America.”

All of the above statements are obviously lies. Germany and Japan did not have a joint naval plan before Pearl Harbor, and never concocted one for the rest of the war. Germany did not have foreknowledge and certainly never encouraged Japan to attack the United States. Japan never had any ambition to attack the west coast of North, Central, or South America. Germany also never promised anything to Japan in the Far East. Germany's power in the Far East was negligible.[\[34\]](#)

Roosevelt concluded in his speech on December 9, 1941:[\[35\]](#)

“We expect to eliminate the danger from Japan, but it would serve us ill if we accomplished that and found that the rest of the world was dominated by Hitler and Mussolini. So we are going to win the war and we are going to win the peace that follows.”

On December 10, 1941, when Hitler resumed his conference with Raeder, Keitel, and Göring, Hitler said that Roosevelt's speech confirmed everything in the Tribune story. Hitler considered Roosevelt's speech to be a de facto declaration of war. Since war with the United States was inevitable, Hitler felt he had no choice but to declare war on the United States. Hitler declared war on the United States in his Reichstag speech on December 11, 1941, stating among other things:

Since the beginning of the war, the American President Roosevelt has steadily committed ever more serious crimes against international law. Along with illegal attacks against ships and other property of German and Italian citizens, there have been threats and even arbitrary deprivations of personal freedom by internment and such. The increasingly hostile attacks by the American President Roosevelt have reached the point that he has ordered the American navy to immediately attack, fire upon and sink all German and Italian ships, in complete violation of international law. American officials have even boasted about destroying German submarines in this criminal manner. American cruisers have attacked and captured German and Italian merchant ships, and their peaceful crews were taken away to imprisonment. In addition, President Roosevelt's plan to attack

Germany and Italy with military forces in Europe by 1943 at the latest was made public in the United States, and the American government made no effort to deny it.

Despite the years of intolerable provocations by President Roosevelt, Germany and Italy sincerely and very patiently tried to prevent the expansion of this war and to maintain relations with the United States. But as a result of his campaign, these efforts have failed.[\[36\]](#)

Hitler ended this speech with a declaration of war against the United States. Roosevelt had finally gotten a declared war with Germany using Japan as a back door to war.

Closing Thoughts on Hitler’s Declaration of War against the United States

No nation has ever been led into war with as many soothing promises of peace as the American public received from President Roosevelt. Most of the American public felt that the United States had entered the First World War under false pretenses. Polls consistently showed that the American public did not favor entry into a second war in Europe. Roosevelt assuaged these fears with statements such as “...I have passed unnumbered hours, I shall pass unnumbered hours, thinking and planning how war may be kept from this nation.”[\[37\]](#)

The truth is that Roosevelt did everything in his power to plunge the United States into war against Germany. Roosevelt eventually went so far as to order American vessels to shoot-on-sight German and Italian vessels—a flagrant act of war. However, Hitler wanted to avoid war with the United States at all costs. Hitler expressly ordered German submarines to avoid conflicts with U.S. warships, except to prevent imminent destruction. It appeared that Hitler’s efforts would be successful in keeping the United States out of the war against Germany.

Hitler declared war on the United States only after the leaked Rainbow Five plan convinced him that war with the United States was inevitable. The extraordinary cunning of leaking Rainbow Five at the very time he knew a Japanese attack was pending enabled Roosevelt to overcome the American public’s resistance to entering the war. It allowed the entry of the United States into World War Two in such a way as to make it appear that Germany and Japan were the aggressor nations.[\[38\]](#)

Why the Holocaust Story Was Invented

Abstract

The genocide of European Jewry by National Socialist Germany is considered by many to be the most thoroughly documented event in human history. Tens of thousands of books, magazine, and newspaper articles have been written and numerous criminal trials have been conducted to document the mass extermination of European Jewry. The crimes of Germany against Jews are considered to be so uniquely evil that the term “the Holocaust” has been invented to describe the alleged genocide of European Jewry. I have been asked the questions: “Why was the Holocaust story invented? Who benefits from this falsification of history?” This article will answer these questions.

Justification for War with Germany

World War II was by far the bloodiest and most destructive war in human history. Many people wondered whether all of the death and destruction caused by the war had been necessary.

The so-called Holocaust was used by the Allies to demonize Germany and prove that their war effort was necessary to defeat such an evil nation.

With the liberation of Ohrdruf, Buchenwald and Dachau by the American army and the liberation of Bergen-Belsen by British troops, large groups of Western observers confronted the horrors of the German camps for the first time. The gruesome scenes of huge piles of dead bodies and emaciated and diseased surviving inmates were filmed and photographed for posterity by the U.S. Army Signal Corps. Prominent newsmen and politicians were flown in to Germany to see the harrowing evidence at the camps for themselves. The horrific scenes in the German camps were used by the Allies to justify their participation in the war.[\[1\]](#)

Jewish historian Robert Jan van Pelt writes:[\[2\]](#)

“To the Allies, the discovery of the camps proved a final justification of their war effort. In 1940, Churchill had proclaimed that a Nazi victory would bring “a new Dark Age made more sinister by perverted science.” The liberation of the camps proved that Churchill had not exaggerated the danger. And even though Auschwitz had been liberated by the Russians, the English and Americans heard many stories about that camp.”

Establishment of Israel

The Holocaust story has also been used to justify the creation of the State of Israel. Simon Wiesenthal writes:[\[3\]](#)

“The creation of Israel was the only possible and the only correct reaction to Auschwitz. There had to be a country in the world where the Jews were the landlords instead of tolerated guests, a place of refuge in the truest meaning of the word, even for Jews who live in other countries.”

David Ben-Gurion stated at the beginning of World War II that the war should end by giving the Zionists their own state. After the war, Ben-Gurion and other Israeli leaders said that the Holocaust had proven once again that the only solution to the Jewish problem was an independent state in Israel. David Ben-Gurion again mentioned during Adolf Eichmann’s trial that the Holocaust happened because Jews did not live in their own country.[4]

Israeli historian Tom Segev explains why the Holocaust story is so important to Israel:[5]

“Israel differs from other countries in its need to justify—to the rest of the world, and to itself—its very right to exist. Most countries need no such ideological justifications. But Israel does—because most of its Arab neighbors have not recognized it and because most of the Jews of the world prefer to live in other countries. So long as these factors remain true, Zionism will be on the defensive. As a justification for the State of Israel, the Holocaust is comparable only to the divine promise contained in the Bible: It seems to be definitive proof of the Zionist argument that Jews can live in security and with full equal rights only in their own country and that they therefore must have an autonomous and sovereign state, strong enough to defend its existence.”

Tom Segev further writes:[6]

“The demonization of Nazism and its mythologizing, in general, were also necessary since the Holocaust served as the main justification for the creation and existence of the State of Israel.”

Justification of Israeli Violence

There were at least 33 massacres of Palestinian villages during Israel’s “War of Independence.” Zionist forces were larger and better equipped than their opponents, and by the end of the war over 750,000 Palestinians were ruthlessly expelled from their homes.[7] As Tom Segev writes:[8]

“Israel was born of terror, war, and revolution, and its creation required a measure of fanaticism and of cruelty.”

Entire cities and hundreds of villages in Israel were left empty and repopulated with new Jewish immigrants. The Jewish immigrants numbered 100,000 in April 1949, most of them survivors of the so-called Holocaust. The Palestinians lost everything they had and became destitute refugees, while the Jewish immigrants to Israel stole the Palestinians’ property and confiscated everything they needed.[9]

The Holocaust story has been repeatedly used to justify Israel’s aggression against its neighbors. Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin justified the demolition of an alleged Iraqi nuclear facility in June 1981 with the words:[10]

“We must protect our nation, a million and a half of whose children were murdered by the Nazis in the gas chambers.”

Before Israel’s invasion of Lebanon in June 1982, Begin told his cabinet:[11]

“You know what I have done and what we have all done to prevent war and loss of life. But such is our fate in Israel. There is no way other than to fight selflessly. Believe me, the alternative is Treblinka, and we have decided that there will be no more Treblinkas.”

A few weeks after Israel’s invasion of Lebanon, Begin stated that after the Holocaust the international community had lost its right to demand that Israel answer for its actions. Begin declared in the Knesset, “No one, anywhere in the world, can preach morality to our people.” A similar statement was included in the resolution adopted by Begin’s cabinet after the massacres in Palestinian refugee camps on the outskirts of Beirut.[\[12\]](#)

By the late 1980s there was hardly a day when the Holocaust story was not mentioned in one of the Israeli newspapers. Such constant exposure encouraged many Israeli soldiers to plan ways to exterminate the Arabs. According to Israeli education-corps officer Ehud Prayer, “too many soldiers were deducing that the Holocaust justifies every kind of disgraceful action.”[\[13\]](#)

German Guilt

The so-called Holocaust has also been effectively used to induce guilt in the German people. As British historian Ian Kershaw writes:[\[14\]](#)

“Decades would not fully erase the simple but compelling sentiment... ‘I am ashamed to be German.’”

Friedrich Grimm, a renowned German authority on international law, was shown samples of new leaflets printed soon after the war in German to be distributed by the Allies throughout Germany. Describing German war crimes, the leaflets were the first step in the reeducation program designed for Germany. Grimm suggested to an Allied officer that since the war was over, it was time to stop the libel. The Allied officer replied:[\[15\]](#)

“Why no, we’re just getting started. We’ll continue this atrocity campaign, we’ll increase it till no one will want to hear a good word about the Germans anymore, till whatever sympathy there is for you in other countries is completely destroyed, and until the Germans themselves become so mixed up they won’t know what they’re doing!”

The Allied campaign to make Germans feel guilty concerning the so-called Holocaust has been highly successful. German guilt is so powerful that it has caused the German government to make enormous reparations and offer humble apologies to the Allies. Millions of German expellees have paid reparations to survivors of the German concentration camps even though these German expellees had their land and personal possessions stolen from them.

James Bacque writes in regard to German feelings of guilt:[\[16\]](#)

“Guilt pervades Germany like a religion. It is the ‘Canossa Republic,’ penitent in pain before its judges. Guilt is so powerful that it has caused the Canossa Republic repeatedly to deny any intention of reclaiming sovereignty over the eastern lands, although it is a well-established UN principle that no government has the right to waive the claims of individuals to their property. Nor may it impede their right of return to their former homeland.”

Allied Crimes against Germans

The Holocaust story has also been used to cover up and ignore Allied crimes against Germans after World War II. German deaths after the war can be divided into three groups of people. The first group is the German prisoners of war (POW) in both Europe and the Soviet Union. The second group is the German expellees, and the third group is the Germans already residing in Germany. While no one will ever know exactly how many Germans died from 1945 to 1950, it is certain that the deaths far exceed most traditional estimates. The great majority of these deaths were caused by the lethal policies imposed by the Allies against Germany after the war.

A conservative estimate of German deaths in the Allied POW camps is 1.5 million. This includes over 517,000 POW deaths in the Soviet Union, 100,000 POW deaths in Yugoslavia, Poland and other countries, with the remaining POW deaths in U.S. and French camps. The Germans who died in these Allied POW camps suffered inutterably from exposure, disease and slow starvation. This well-documented Allied atrocity is still ignored or denied by most historians today.

Probably a minimum of 2.1 million German expellees died in what was supposed to be an “orderly and humane” transfer. The estimate of 2.1 million German expellee deaths is acknowledged to be valid by most traditional historians. Notable authorities have estimated a much higher number of German expellee deaths.[\[17\]](#)

An estimated 5.7 million Germans already residing in Germany died from the starvation policies implemented by the Allies after the war. James Bacque details how this 5.7 million death total is calculated:

The population of all occupied Germany in October 1946 was 65,000,000, according to the census prepared under the ACC. The returning prisoners who were added to the population in the period October 1946-September 1950 numbered 2,600,000 (rounded), according to records in the archives of the four principal Allies. Births according to the official German statistical agency, Statistisches Bundesamt, added another 4,176,430 newcomers to Germany. The expellees arriving totaled 6,000,000. Thus, the total population in 1950 before losses would have been 77,776,430, according to the Allies themselves. Deaths officially recorded in the period 1946-50 were 3,235,539, according to the UN Yearbook and the German government. Emigration was about 600,000, according to the German government. Thus, the population found should have been 73,940,891. But the census of 1950 done by the German government under Allied supervision found only 68,230,796. There was a shortage of 5,710,095 people, according to the official Allied figures (rounded to 5,700,000).[\[18\]](#)

The sum of 1.5 million German POWs, 2.1 million German expellees, and 5.7 million German residents equals the minimum estimate of 9.3 million Germans who died needlessly after the war. This is far more Germans than died during the Second World War. Millions of these Germans slowly starved to death while the Allies withheld available food. The majority of these postwar dead Germans were women, children, and very old men. Their deaths have never been honestly reported by the Allies, the German government, or most historians. Instead, all that is ever memorialized is the alleged genocide of European Jewry.

Allied Guilt and Apathy

The Allies have also been declared guilty of not doing more to prevent the so-called Holocaust. Jewish historian Deborah Lipstadt writes:[\[19\]](#)

“A real antipathy toward Jews certainly affected the Allied response. While no one among the Allies or in the press wanted to see Jews killed, virtually no one was willing to advocate that steps be taken to try to stop the carnage. Many Allied officials in positions of power in London and Washington were tired of hearing about Jews and even more tired of being asked to do something about them even though there were steps that could have been taken.”

Elie Wiesel writes in regard to the Allies’ failure to rescue European Jewry:[\[20\]](#)

“It almost seems as if both diplomats and statesmen spent more time inventing reasons not to save the Jews than trying to find a way to save them.”

U.S. Presidents Jimmy Carter, Ronald Reagan, and George H. W. Bush have all made statements that the United States will never again fail to act to stop something as evil as the genocide of European Jewry. At the dedication of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, President Bill Clinton spoke in a similar vein:[\[21\]](#)

“For those of us here today representing the nations of the West, we must live forever with this knowledge: Even as our fragmentary awareness of crimes grew into indisputable facts, far too little was done.”

Michael Goldberg says in regard to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum:[\[22\]](#)

“The museum stands as a grim reminder that for all its purported ideals, America nevertheless turned its back on Jews fleeing Hitler...Hence, the museum’s recalling what happened to Jews in the past may move Americans and their national policymakers in Washington to support Israel in the present, lest in the future, the same fate lie in store for Jews again—and the same moral failure await Americans once more.”

President Barack Obama affirmed on the 70th anniversary of the liberation of Dachau:[\[23\]](#) “...we fervently vow that such atrocities will never happen again” and “History will not repeat itself.”

Of course, President Obama forgot to tell his audience that most of the inmates at Dachau died of natural causes. Obama also conveniently failed to mention that the single biggest atrocity that occurred at Dachau was the mass murder by American troops of 520 German guards on the day Dachau was liberated.[\[24\]](#)

Reparations to Jews

German guilt for the so-called Holocaust has resulted in massive reparations being paid to Holocaust survivors and the State of Israel. German reparations to Jews were discussed from the beginning of World War II. Tom Segev writes:[\[25\]](#)

“The idea [of reparations] seems to have been in the air from the time the war started, apparently sparked by the punitive reparations payments imposed on Germany at the end of World War I. Ben-Guiron received a memorandum on the subject as early as 1940. Berl Katznelson spoke of it publicly toward the end of that year. By December 1942, there was already a private organization in Tel Aviv called Justicia that offered to help Nazi victims draft compensation demands.”

Hatred of Germans in Israel was intense after the war. Many advocated a special law barring Israelis from all social contacts with German citizens. However, since most Israelis felt that the Germans owed them massive reparations for the so-called Holocaust, Germany and Israel began negotiating reparations on March 20, 1952. The Luxembourg Agreement was reached six months later and committed the German government to paying massive reparations to Holocaust survivors.[\[26\]](#)

Nahum Goldmann said in a 1976 interview that the Luxembourg Agreement “constituted an extraordinary innovation in the matter of international rights.” Goldmann also boasted that he had obtained 10 to 14 times more from the Bonn government than he had originally expected.[\[27\]](#)

Millions of Jews eventually received personal compensation for their pain and suffering in the so-called Holocaust. The German federal government as of 1998 had paid reparations to Israel and Third Reich victims of about $61.8 billion. In addition, Germans had paid many additional billions in private and other public funds to wartime forced laborers.[\[28\]](#) German reparations to Israel and Jews continue to this day.[\[29\]](#)

Jewish Solidarity

The Holocaust story is described by many Jewish leaders as a uniquely evil event. An example of this view was expressed by Abraham H. Foxman when he was the National Director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith:[\[30\]](#)

“The Holocaust is something different. It is a singular event. It is not simply one example of genocide but a near successful attempt on the life of God’s chosen children and, thus, on God Himself. It is an event that is the antithesis of Creation as recorded in the Bible; and like its direct opposite, which is relived weekly with the Sabbath and yearly with the Torah, it must be remembered from generation to generation.”

Michael Goldberg confirms that the Holocaust story has become a religion to many Jews:[\[31\]](#)

“As the Holocaust has become many contemporary Jews’ master story, so, too, its perpetual observance has become their paramount Jewish practice, its veneration their religion. And as with any organized church, this Holocaust cult has its own tenets of faith, rites, and shrines.”

Israelis are obsessed with the history and heritage of the Holocaust. A 1992 study of Israeli college students found that close to 80% of those asked identified with the statement, “We are all Holocaust survivors.” The so-called Holocaust has become a way for secular Jews to feel connected to their Jewish heritage.[\[32\]](#)

The Holocaust, which is remembered ritually through the observance of Holocaust Remembrance Day, is a major means of creating solidarity among Jews. While some Jewish communities experience conflicts among Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform Jews, they set aside their differences and join together to remember the so-called Holocaust. Any truth in Judaism’s slogan of “Jews Are One” manifests itself ritually on Holocaust Remembrance Day.[\[33\]](#)

Conclusion

The alleged genocide of European Jewry has been used to justify the Allied war effort, to establish the State of Israel, to justify Israeli violence against its neighbors, to induce guilt in both Germans and the Allied nations, to cover up and ignore Allied crimes against Germans, to allow Jews to receive massive reparations from Germany, and to create solidarity in the Jewish community. The extreme importance of the Holocaust story in advancing Zionist/Jewish interests ensures that this falsification of history will continue in the future.

Commandant of Auschwitz | CODOH

by Carlo Mattogno, Rudolf Höss

Abstract

From 1940 to 1943, Rudolf Höss was the commandant of the infamous Auschwitz Camp. Today's orthodox narrative has it that during this time, some 500,000 people were killed at Auschwitz in gas chambers. Yet when Höss was captured after the war, he confessed to having killed some 2,500,000 during that time. 40 years later, it was revealed that Höss had been severely tortured by his British interrogators. This is an excerpt of the upcoming study by Carlo Mattogno. It tells the gripping story of Höss's capture and mistreatments, and presents the texts of the various "confessions" which the British extorted from Höss while in their custody.

Introduction

In the Preface to the complete English translation of Rudolf Höss's notes which he wrote while in Polish custody in Cracow, Steven Paskuly, editor of the work, writes that they "are perhaps the most important document attesting the Holocaust" (Paskuly, p. 11). In his introduction, he adds (ibid., p. 21):

"There are fanatical groups in the United States, France, and even Australia who call themselves 'The Revisionist Historians.' They actually propose that Höss never wrote these documents – that they are a fraud. They also stated that even if the documents were written by Höss, they were obviously done under duress from the 'Communist authorities' in Poland. The 'research' and the conclusions of these 'historians' are absolute rubbish."

It is not worth responding to accusations apparently arising from crude ignorance, which extends even to basic notions of current orthodox Holocaust historiography, as I will show below. It is worthwhile, however, to highlight Paskuly's statement that the former commander of Auschwitz "fails to mention that the camp regulations and punishments were formulated by Höss himself" (ibid., p. 22), where he confounds Höss's Cracow writing titled "Lagerordnung für die Konzentrationslager"<sup>[1]</sup> (translated by Paskuly as "Rules and Regulations for Concentration Camps"; ibid., pp. 209-218), which Höss had jotted down from memory (see Chapter III.1.), with the 1941 "Dienstvorschrift für Konzentrationslager (Lagerordnung)" ("Service Regulations for Concentration Camps (Camp Regulations)"), of which only the title page and the table of contents are known.<sup>[2]</sup>

Already in 1987, I published a book dedicated to Höss's various post-war statements (Mattogno 1987). It listed 60 objections characterized by internal contradictions and insurmountable contradictions to the orthodox Holocaust narrative of that time, thus showing that "the former commander of Auschwitz lied on all essential points of his 'eye-witness testimony,' which must therefore be rejected as a vulgar fraud." The tortures inflicted by the British on Höss at the time, which in 1987 had already been documented, were therefore not mentioned a priori in order to invalidate Höss's declarations, but a posteriori in order to explain the contradictions and absurdities found in his statements.

In the present study, for which I had access to an enormously larger documentation, I approach the topic from a different angle. The fundamental problem which no one has ever considered is whether the core of Höss's first statements mirrored reality, or whether it mirrored some preordained "truth" which the British questioning Höss forced him to comply with in order to "confirm" it. In other words: did those statements come from Höss or from his torturers? Hence, are they true or not? And what is the relationship between Höss's first statements and those he made later?

This study is a well-founded and documented answer to these questions.

On March 15, 1946, the Field Security Section 92 summarized the events of Rudolf Höss's arrest with reference to a report dated 13 November 1945:[\[3\]](#)

“After five months of continuous investigations, interrogations and extensive searches, this Section has succeeded in arresting SS Obersturmbannführer HOESS Rudolf Franz Ferdinand, who commanded the notorious AUSCHWITZ Concentration Camp which was built under his supervision and who, in 1943, became chief of Amt 1 of Amtsgruppe D (Inspectorate of Concentration Camps) in the SS Wirtschafts und Verwaltungs Hauptamt. [\[4\]](#)

As mentioned in the above quoted previous report, HOESS' wife and her five children were located in this Section's area (Sugar Factory, ST MICHAELISDONN. SUEDERDITMARSCHEN).

When last interrogated in November 1945, Frau HOESS stated that she had last seen her husband in RENDSBURG on 30 April 1945. By assessing various psychological aspects of her story, members of this Section gained the firm impression that she was lying.

After careful plans for her re-interrogation, based on data accumulated during the elapsed five months, had been worked out, Frau HOESS was arrested during the night of 5 Mar 46. It was only at 1600 hrs on the 11 Mar 46 that she finally broke down and admitted having been visited by HOESS in ST MICHAELISDONN in July 1945, that she had communicated with him later and that she knew his present whereabouts. She named as his address – GOTTRUPEL near FLENSBURG, c/o the farmer, Hans Peter HANSEN.”

Höss's wife, Hedwig, was therefore arrested in the middle of the night, obviously in order to terrorize her and her five children, and “she finally[!] broke down” six days later. We will see later what methods were used to achieve this.

The British had been tracking down Höss for months. A “Report on search for Obersturmbannführer SS – HÖSS and investigation of alleged Nazi cell in ST MICHAELISDONN,” signed with “Sgt. 92 Field Security Section (Southern Sub-Area),” undated but written sometime between late October 1945 and prior to Höss's arrest, begins with this statement:

“339 FS Section, BRUNSBÜTTEL had received information via Umland agency, that the wife of SS Obersturmbannführer HÖSS ex-Kommandant of the notorious AUSCHWITZ Concentration Camp, was living in the Sugar Factory, ST MICHAELISDONN. Two NCO's of that Section interviewed Frau HÖSS, found her in possession of astonishingly large quantities of dresses, furs, cloth and other valuables, but she disclaimed all knowledge of the whereabouts of her husband. Some time after this, an officer of JAG (War Crimes) contacted 339 FSS and was eventually, since this Detachment had arrived in the area, passed on to us."

On October 24, 1945, the Field Security Section 92 organized a raid at the sugar factory of St Michaelisdonn, during which they interviewed all employees as well as Höss's wife. She made detailed statements about her husband, but did not reveal his hiding place. Meanwhile, the British had arrested Karl Sommer, who had been deputy chief of Office D II of the WVHA.<sup>4</sup> Sommer reported that all members of Office Group D had assumed pseudonyms, and that Höss was now Driver Lang.<sup>[5]</sup> The former commander of Auschwitz called himself Franz Lang.

Field Security Section 92, assisted by Section 318, went to Gottrupel on the night of March 13, where the farm was surrounded at 11 PM. Höss was surprised in pajamas.<sup>[6]</sup>

"He was forced down immediately and his mouth prised open. The Medical Officer of 5 RHA, 7 Armd Div rapidly examined him for any hidden poison as we had obtained information that all members of Amtsgruppe D had been issued with the same poison with which Reichsfuehrer SS HIMMLER had succeeded in killing himself after capture.

HOESS was living under the alias of LANG Franz at this farm (see attached statement<sup>[Z]</sup>) but admitted his true identity within ten minutes of his arrest.

He was brought back to the barracks of 5 RHA in HEIDE. After preliminary interrogation, it was thought best to submit an interrogation report in the form of a statement in his own words, signed by him and witnessed by two NCOs of this Section, who were present throughout the entire proceedings. HOESS gave his statement in a very matter of fact manner and it appears he is quite willing to give information.

Rudolf Franz Ferdinand HOESS must be regarded as one of the major War Criminals. While Commandant of AUSCHWITZ Concentration Camp, he was entrusted by the Reichsfuehrer SS HIMMLER with the task of exterminating the Jews of EUROPE.

The Reichsfuehrer communicated this to him in the course of a personal interview. During this time in Amtsgruppe D as the head of the Politische Abteilung, he can be held partially responsible for what happened in all other Concentration Camps – eg: – as recently as April 1945, he was advising KRAMER of BELSEN on how to cope with the situation."

On the day of the arrest, Captain William Cross, Chief of Field Security Section 92, signed the form "War Criminal Arrest Report" of the "Military Government of Germany," which provides all the relevant details; in addition to the date and time (March 11, 1946, at 23 PM), it contains the following statement (see Document 1):

"Ich bin Rudolf Höss und war Kommandant [sic] von Auschwitz, mein Rank [sic] war SS Obersturmbannführer[rer]."

"I am Rudolf Höss and was Kommandant [n] of Auschwitz, my rank was SS Obersturmbannführer[rer]."

The handwriting has some similarities with that of other manuscripts by Höss, but it differs from his handwriting in various letters. If the above sentence was indeed written by Höss, one can be certain that he was not himself.

On March 15, 1946, Höss was handed over to Captain Harvey Alexander of the War Crimes Investigation Team, which led him to the Rhine Army. On March 30, the prisoner was transferred to HQ 30 Corps District, in a detention facility called “Tomato” in Minden.[\[8\]](#)

After his extradition to Poland (May 25, 1946), while in prison at Cracow, Höss recounted his experience during his arrest:[\[9\]](#)

“I was arrested on 11 March 1946 (at 11 pm). My phial of poison had been broken two days before. When I was aroused from sleep, I thought at first, I was being attacked by robbers, for many robberies were taking place at that time. That was how they managed to arrest me. I was maltreated by the Field Security Police. I was dragged to Heide where I was put in those very barracks from which I had been released by the British eight months earlier. At my first interrogation, evidence was obtained by beating me. I do not know what is in the protocol, although I signed it. Alcohol and the whip were too much for me. The whip was my own, which by chance had gotten into my wife’s luggage. It had hardly ever touched my horse, far less the prisoners. Nevertheless, one of my interrogators was convinced that I had perpetually used it for flogging the prisoners.

After some days, I was taken to Minden-on-the-Weser, the main interrogation center in the British Zone. There I received further rough treatment at the hands of the 1st English public prosecutor, a major. The conditions in the prison accorded with this behavior.” (My emphasis)

This description, as Robert Faurisson unambiguously clarified in a valuable article (Faurisson 1986, 1987), is fully in line with reality. He drew attention to a book published in 1983: Rupert Butler’s Legions of Death, which recounted Höss’s arrest by the team of “Bernard Clarke, a British Jew and a sergeant in 92nd Field Security Section”:

“At 5 pm on 11 March 1946, Frau Hoess opened her front door to six intelligence specialists in British uniform, most of them tall and menacing and all of them practised in the more sophisticated techniques of sustained and merciless investigation.

No physical violence was used on the family: it was scarcely necessary. Wife and children were separated and guarded. Clarke’s tone was deliberately low-key and conversational.

He began mildly: ‘I understand your husband came to see you as recently as last night.’

Frau Hoess merely replied: ‘I haven’t seen him since he absconded months ago.’

Clarke tried once more, saying gently but with a tone of reproach: ‘You know that isn’t true.’ Then all at once his manner changed and he was shouting: ‘If you don’t tell us we’ll turn you over to the Russians and they’ll put you before a firing-squad. Your son will go to Siberia.’

It proved more than enough. Eventually, a broken Frau Hoess betrayed the whereabouts of the former Auschwitz Kommandant, the man who now called himself Franz Lang. Suitable intimidation of the son and daughter[\[10\]](#) produced precisely identical information” (My emphasis)

And here is the description of the arrest as published by Butler (pp. 235-237):

“Hoess screamed in terror at the mere sight of British uniforms. Clarke yelled: ‘What is your name?’

With each answer of ‘Franz Lang’, Clarke’s hand crashed into the face of his prisoner. The fourth time that happened, Hoess broke and admitted who he was.

The admission suddenly unleashed the loathing of the Jewish sergeants in the arresting party whose parents had died in Auschwitz following an order signed by Hoess.

The prisoner was torn from the top bunk, the pyjamas ripped from his body. He was then dragged naked to one of the slaughter tables, where it seemed to Clarke the blows and screams were endless.

Eventually, the Medical Officier urged the Captain: ‘Call them off, unless you want to take back a corpse.’ A blanket was thrown over Hoess and he was dragged to Clarke’s car, where the sergeant poured a substantial slug of whisky down his throat. Then Hoess tried to sleep. Clarke thrust his service stick under the man’s eyelids, and ordered in German: ‘Keep your pig eyes open, you swine.’ For the first time Hoess trotted out his oft-repeated justification: ‘I took my orders from Himmler. I am a soldier in the same way as you are a soldier and we had to obey orders.’

The party arrived back at Heide around three in the morning. The snow was swirling still, but the blanket was torn from Hoess and he was made to walk completely nude through the prison yard to his cell.[\[11\]](#) It took three days to get a coherent statement out of him. But once he started talking, there was no holding him.”

While in Nuremberg, Höss told psychologist Leon Goldensohn:[\[12\]](#)

“I was in Schleswig-Holstein, barefooted in a cell. When the British captured me, I was naked, and they just threw a couple of blankets around me and took me to prison. They didn’t give me any shoes or socks.”

Faurisson noted that the tortures inflicted on Höss had been confirmed by Moritz von Schirmeister, a former associate of Joseph Goebbels at the Reich’s Ministry of Propaganda. On May 7, 1948, he wrote a letter to Höss’s wife on request of the former commander of Auschwitz:[\[13\]](#)

“Of course, it is already more than two years ago that I was brought from Minden to Nuremberg together with your husband – on March 31 and April 1, 1946. But I promised your husband back then that after my release I would write you and convey his greetings.”

At Nuremberg, von Schirmeister was a witness to the defense and was about to be released soon. In the car carrying him, he sat in the backseat together with Höss, with whom he could speak freely during transit; in particular, he remembered Höss’s following outburst (see Document 3):

“On the things he is accused of, he told me: ‘Certainly, I signed a statement that I killed two and a half million Jews. But I could just as well have said that it was five million Jews. There are certain methods by which any confession can be obtained, whether it is true or not.’”

Von Schirmeister wrote that Höss thought it was his duty to help his “comrades” by testifying during the Nuremberg trial that only “very few knew about certain events,” but added that the future of his wife and children “was the only thing that worried him.” Although Höss was “treated well” in Nuremberg, meaning that he was no longer subjected to physical abuse, the threat that his wife and children would be handed over to the Soviets, which the British may have arranged already, “proved more than enough.”

While in prison at Minden, Höss was brutally treated to induce him to “confess,” as Ken Jones reported in 1986 (Mason 1986):

“Mr Ken Jones was then a private with the Fifth Royal Horse Artillery stationed at Heidi [sic] in Schleswig Holstein. ‘They brought him to us when he refused to co-operate over questioning about his activities during the war. He came in the winter of 1945/46 and was put in a small cell in the barracks,’ recalls Mr Jones. Two other soldiers were detailed with Mr Jones to join Hoss [sic] in his cell to help break him down for interrogation. ‘We sat in the cell with him, night and day, armed with axe handles. Our job was to prod him every time he fell asleep to help break down his resistance,’ said Mr Jones. When Hoss was taken out for exercise, he was made to wear only jeans and a thin cotton shirt in the bitter cold. After three days and nights without sleep, Hoss finally broke down and made a full confession to the authorities.”

This “confession” consists of the interrogation minutes signed by Höss at 2:30 AM on March 14, 1946.<sup>[14]</sup> It will be analyzed in Part Two. It had to be expected that this confession ends with an assertion claiming that it was made voluntarily and is truthful, but in the light of what was revealed here, this sounds tragically ironic: the document states indeed that its content corresponds to the statements made by the interrogatee and constitutes “die reine Wahrheit” – “the pure truth.” This is followed by the signatures of two witnesses and by Captain William Cross’s assertion that Höss had made this statement “voluntarily”!

It is worthwhile keeping in mind what Höss wrote about it in his Cracow notes:

“I do not know what is in the protocol, although I signed it.”

Jones mentions another person who would have had a major part in the first interrogation of former Auschwitz commander: Vera Atkinson, who had appeared during the TV show “Secret Hunters.” Ella “told how Hoss [sic] made a full and frank confession to the killing of two-and-a half million inmates of the concentration camp” (Mason 1986). During a video interview in January 1987, she made the following statements as reproduced in a 2012 book (Footitt/Kelly, pp. 61f.):

“While she was there [in the British zone], Rudolf Höss was captured and kept in a small prison in Minden (not far from Bad Oeynhausen). Vera was asked to act as interpreter at his interrogation because she was the only trustworthy person who could speak good enough German. Despite her many years of intelligence work, this experience was not without emotional consequences for her.

He was disguised as a local countryman, with big moustache disguise. The interrogation started as: 'So you are Blinky Blonk – the assumed name', and he said 'Yes!' 'and you've been on the farm, working on the farm?' 'Yes' 'and you had the lack of feeling to steal a bike from one of the farmers'. That was what we pretended to accuse him of, and he claimed that that was absolutely wrong. 'Well possibly, possibly, possibly that's true. But we know that you are not XX, because we know that you are Rudolph [sic] Höss, former commandant of Auschwitz'. Höss was taken outside to the courtyard, and the sergeant removed his moustache. He no longer denied who he was. 1 million 500 thousand people killed under his surveillance was the accusation, but he claimed that that was their own figure, but the correct one was over 2 million, about 2 million 300 thousand. We were all struck silent for a moment."

This story is clearly imaginative; in addition, Atkinson confused Höss with Pohl, as derives from her reference to the theft of a bike. Pohl had been arrested on May 27, 1946 on a farm "ostensibly on a charge of stealing a bicycle."[\[15\]](#)

Thomas Harding reported that a Jewish great uncle of his, the British Army captain Howard Harvey Alexander, called Hanns, had a prominent role in Höss's capture.

Earlier, on December 10, 1945, he had arrested Gustav Simon, the former Gauleiter and chief of the civilian administration in Luxembourg, who committed suicide a week later.[\[16\]](#) In a report dated "5/DEC/45" [sic] and signed by himself, he reported on the facts of the arrest. At first, he pointed out his qualifications:[\[17\]](#)

"Report of Captain Alexander H.H. of J.A.G. [Judge Advocate General] Staff Pool, H.Q. B.A.O.R. [British Army of the Rhine] attached to No. 1 War Crimes Investigation Team, c/o H.Q. 4th Wilts. [4th Battalion of the Wiltshire Regiment] at Belsen Camp."

Other documents confirm that Captain Alexander belonged to this unit headquartered at "Hohne (Belsen) Camp."<sup>17</sup>

On March 8, 1946, he went to the headquarters of the British Field Security Section 92 located at Heide. The British had created more than a hundred Field Security Sections, who controlled the territory of northern Germany with police and counter-espionage jurisdiction. Alexander explained to Cross, the head of this unit, that he had been put in charge of tracking down Höss. Although it was unknown where he was hiding, his family, who lived at an old farm at St. Michaelisdonn, was kept under surveillance. Cross objected that this was not his unit's task, but was convinced otherwise by the importance of the fugitive. A day earlier, hence on March 7th, Alexander had arrested Höss's wife Hedwig. She was interrogated in a cell, but refused to reveal her husband's hiding place. Then Alexander went to the farm and interrogated Höss's children, all minors (3 to 16 years old) who had been left behind alone. Not getting the answers he wanted, he jailed them as well, but Höss's wife still wouldn't talk.[\[18\]](#)

"With their tactics of isolation and intimidation failing to produce a result, Hanns realised that they must develop an alternative approach. At twilight on 11 March 1946, a noisy old steam train was driven past the rear of the prison. Hanns burst into Hedwig's cell and informed her that the train was about to take her son to Siberia and that she would never see Klaus again. Allowing the message to sink in for a few moments, Hanns then added that she could prevent her son's deportation if she told him where her husband was living and under what alias. Hanns then left Hedwig sitting on her cot with a piece of paper and a pencil. When he returned ten minutes later, he saw that she had written a note with Rudolf's location and his alias: the Kommandant of Auschwitz was living at Hans Peter Hansen's farm in Gottrupel under the name 'Franz Lang'."

Having obtained that information, Cross and Alexander hatched a plan for Höss's arrest:

"Over the next hour the men of Field Security Section 92 were assembled and briefed on the operation. Many of them were German Jews like Hanns, from the Pioneer Corps – men who had been driven out of their country and who had lost family members in Auschwitz. Some had kept their original names, such as Kuditsch and Wiener. Others had taken on British-sounding names, like Roberts, Cresswell and Shiffers. There were also English-born soldiers from Jewish families, similarly enraged, men such as Bernard Clarke, from the south coast, and Karl 'Blitz' Abrahams, from Liverpool."

Alexander also got in touch with the Field Security Section 318 and brought with him a physician from the 5th Royal Horse Artillery Regiment. This gang, which consisted of 25 men, acted the night of March 11, 1946:

"Rudolf was 'woken with a start' by the commotion outside. At first, he was unconcerned, assuming 'that it was one of the robberies which were frequent at this time in the area'. Then he heard a stern voice ordering him to open up. Realising that he had no alternative, Rudolf opened the door. Two men in British uniform stood facing him. Rudolf could tell by their insignia that one was a captain, the other a doctor. Behind them stood at least twenty soldiers, their guns drawn. He was confused by the lights and the presence of all these men.

Without warning the tall, handsome, fierce-looking captain thrust a pistol in his mouth. He was then searched for cyanide pills. 'Go and see that he is clean,' Hanns said to the doctor, holding Rudolf while his mouth was searched for vials of poison. After a few seconds, the doctor gave the all-clear.

The captain began talking in perfect German.<sup>[19]</sup> It was immediately obvious to Rudolf that the man was a native speaker. He introduced himself as Captain Alexander of the British War Crimes Investigation Team, and demanded his identity documents – Franz Lang, temporary card number B22595. Hanns had seen this name on the plate next to the barn door, but knew it to be untrue. The man looked too similar to the figure in the photograph that he carried with him. Older, sicker, thinner, to be sure, but similar.

Hanns flashed the photograph and told Rudolf that he believed him to be the Kommandant of Auschwitz. Again Rudolf denied the claim, pointing once more at his identity papers. Perhaps he would be able to wriggle out of this: after all, the British had let him slip through their fingers in the past.

However, Hanns remained convinced. He rolled back the man's shirtsleeves to see if there was a blood group tattooed on his arm, but there was nothing. The conversation went round in circles. Yet Hanns wasn't going to give up. His eyes roved about the barn entrance searching for a way to prove the man's identity. At last Hanns looked down and noticed his wedding ring.

‘Give it to me,’ he said.

‘I can’t, it has been stuck for years,’ Rudolf answered.

‘No problem,’ Hanns said, ‘I’ll just cut off your finger.’”

Alexander asked one of his soldiers to bring a knife, and at this point Höss caved in and handed it over. Inside the ring there were the names “Rudolf” and “Hedwig.”

“Having identified his man, Hanns was ready to make the arrest. But he sensed that his colleagues wanted to vent their hatred. Indeed, he wanted to join in. He had to make a quick decision: should he allow them free rein, or should he protect Rudolf? Turning to his men, Hanns said, ‘In ten minutes I want to have Höss in my car – undamaged’ and walked off. He knew that this made him responsible for what was about to happen, but he was prepared to face the consequences.

Rudolf was immediately surrounded by the remaining soldiers, who dragged him to one of the barn’s slaughter tables, tore the pyjamas from his body and beat him with axe handles. Rudolf screamed, but the blows kept coming. After a short period, the doctor spoke to Hanns: ‘Call them off,’ he said, ‘unless you want to take back a corpse.’

Just as suddenly as it had started, the beating stopped. A rough woollen blanket was wrapped around Rudolf’s shoulders and he was carried out of the barn.”

Höss was loaded onto a truck and taken to a prison in Heide. Along the way Alexander interrogated him. Höss admitted that he had been the commander of Auschwitz and claimed he was “personally responsible for the deaths of 10,000 people.”

The gang stopped in a bar in the city center to celebrate the arrest (Harding 2013b, pp. 240-244):

“After they were finished celebrating, Hanns walked back to the truck, pulled Rudolf out of the vehicle, removed the blanket from his shoulders, and made him walk naked to the prison on the other side of the snow-covered square. Once inside the prison, Hanns, along with a sergeant from the Field Security Section, began Rudolf’s first formal interrogation. Alcohol was forced down the prisoner’s throat and they beat him with his own whip, confiscated from the barn in Gottrupel. A pair of handcuffs were on his wrists at all times, and with the temperature in the cell well below freezing, Rudolf’s uncovered feet quickly developed frostbite.”

Here Harding reproduces a very telling photograph captioned “Rudolf Höss, after British arrest, March 1946” (ibid., p. 244, see Document 4). There are other photographs of the time, one of which is particularly significant (ibid., p. 245, see Document 4a).

“Three days later, on 15 March 1946, Hanns delivered Rudolf to Camp Tomato, a British-run prison near the town of Minden. There, Colonel Gerald Draper – the War Crimes Group’s lawyer – began a further round of intensive questioning. A few hours afterwards, Rudolf’s statement was typed into an eight-page confession and a one-paragraph summary. It was the first time that a concentration camp Kommandant had provided details of the Final Solution. Rudolf had confessed to coordinating the killing of two million people.”

The date of March 15 is obviously incorrect, unless it refers to the English translation of the “confession” (see below).

A Jewish sergeant from Liverpool, Karl Louis Abrahams, was also part of the unit which arrested Höss. On March 24, 1946, he wrote a letter to his wife, Betty, in which he informed her of the capture of “the greatest swine that ever was” (Jackman):

“His interrogation was an experience I shall never forget. We were at it for about three days and two nights on the trot. No sleep – the atmosphere was weird and unreal as we heard him confessing that he had personally supervised the gassing and burning of over two and a half million human beings – mostly our fellow Jews.”

On March 27, 1985, William Cross wrote an informative letter to Colonel Robson on Höss’s arrest, in which he confirmed the picture outlined above:[\[20\]](#)

“With regard to the interrogation of Frau Hoess, we received information that this person was living in a flat in a brewery in our area. We knew from experience that widows usually had photographs of their late husband, and we visited Frau Hoess and three sons; I think the eldest was about sixteen.

She was asked where her husband was and she replied that he was dead. Searching the flat we could not find a photograph, and felt that he was alive.

After a few months and no trace of him we decided to arrest her and the three sons<sup>[21]</sup> and place them in jail, Frau Hoess was put in a separate cell. For five days she was visited and asked one question – ‘Where is your husband’, and for five days her answer was ‘He is dead’; we knew this was untrue.

On the morning of the sixth day we put on an act; the rear of the cells backed on to a railway line and a train was organised to come to the rear of the cells with as much noise as possible, and stop outside.

We then informed Frau Hoess that the train outside was there to take her three sons to Siberia, unless she told us where her husband was and his aliases; if she did not do this then she could have two minutes to say goodbye to her sons, or tell us what we wanted to know. We left her for ten minutes or so with paper and pencil to write down the information we required. Fortunately our bluff worked; she wrote down the information and she and her sons were sent home.

That is how Rudolf Hoess, alias Franz Lang was captured.”

Inge-Brigitte, Höss’s youngest daughter, was located and interviewed by Thomas Harding while he was doing research for his already-mentioned book. In this interview, she stated (Harding 2013a):

“‘I remember when they came to our house to ask questions,’ she says, her voice tight. ‘I was sitting on the table with my sister. I was about 13 years old. The British soldiers were screaming:

‘Where is your father? Where is your father?’ over and over again. I got a very bad headache. I went outside and cried under a tree. [...]’

The story continues. ‘My older brother Klaus was taken with my mother. He was beaten badly by the British. My mother heard him scream in pain from the room next door. Just like any mother, she wanted to protect her son, so she told them where my father was.”

2. Statement of March 14, 1946

The history of this document has quite some enigmatic aspects. There is, first of all, a handwritten text by Höss of 10 pages, with a progressive numbering from 2 to 11 by the British, but without date and signature. The page numbers are at the top within a circle.<sup>[22]</sup> It consists of a duplicate text, that is, a first version going from pages 2 to 5, and a second, which looks like a neat copy, from pages 6 to 11. Pages 2 and 6, as well as 3 and 7 correspond almost completely to each other (except for minor variations), while pages 4 and 5 have no match in the second version, and pages 9 and 10 have none in the first version. Page 8 corresponds to page 11. The second version has an incomplete page numbering, with the numbers placed at the top left before the text; page 7 has the number 2, page 9 the number 4, and page 10 the Roman number “II”; the other pages do not contain numbers.

Next, there is an 8-page typed German-language text that should be the transcript of the manuscript. The last page has the handwritten date “March 14, 46” and the time, 2:30, followed by Höss’s signature. Beneath that the following typed phrase appears:

“I have read the text written above and confirm that it corresponds to my statements and that it is the absolute truth. 14 mar 46.”

Underneath this, yet another handwritten date and time as well as Höss’s signature appear. This is the only page signed by him.

At the bottom, there are two lines with the label “witnessed,” but only the second is filled out and signed by Sergeant Kudisch and dated, March 14, 1946.

The document closes with this typewritten text (see Document 6):<sup>[23]</sup>

“I certify that the above-named NCOs – Sjt KUDISCH M and Sjt ROBERTS HK – were present throughout the entire proceedings whilst the prisoner Rudolf HOESS made this statement voluntarily. 14 Mar 1946. Capt CC 92 Field Security Section.”

The main mystery is that this German “transcript” contains fundamental passages – such as Höss’s meeting with Himmler in Berlin, his visit to Treblinka, and the figure of three million Auschwitz victims – which have no equivalent passages in the two handwritten texts. Were these missing passages added later by Höss? But if that is so, then why are they not in any of the two handwritten texts? Or were they compiled by the British? If we consider that Höss stated he signed this document without knowing what was in it, this suggest that the second option is correct. However, the problem of authenticity of this text is only second in importance to that of its truthfulness, since Höss willingly or unwillingly supported this transcript by formally certifying it as the “absolute truth.” For this reason, I consider Höss to be the author of this text when analyzing it in Part Two, although there are serious doubts about it.

This document was then translated into English. This results from the headline “Production No. AD/2,” which also appears as a header of the German transcript, where it is all hand-written. This 8-page typed text is full of handwritten additions in English, mostly translation of German terms. At the end it is dated March 15, 1946, no doubt the day the translation was made. As is apparent from the attestations appearing on the last page, the translation was created in sections by three interpreters:

“I hereby certify that I have truly and accurately translated pages 1 – 3 of the original statement of Rudolf Hoess.”

This is followed by the signature of B. Grant and his qualification. The second certificate covers pages 4-6 and is signed by W. Rose. The last one refers to pages 7-8 and has the signature of P.D. Wuerzburger.

Finally, next to the date, there is the signature of Captain William Cross, Commander of the “92 Field Security Section” (see Document 7).

This translation then became Nuremberg document NO-1210. At least two official transcripts of this translation exist. One is preserved at the Centre de Documentation Juive Contemporaine in Paris and has the archival reference CXXXII-18; the document is classified as “D/749a 167b.” The text is a transcript of the above-mentioned typewritten text without the handwritten additions. Another transcript is headed “Translation of Document No. NO-1210 Office of Chief of Counsel for War Crimes.” The text, all typed, also includes the handwritten parts of the original text. At the end, after the three translation certifications mentioned earlier, there is a “Certificate of Translation” stating:

“I, Jules N. Beaumont, Civ. No. X-045038, hereby certify that I am thoroughly conversant with the English and German languages and that the above is a true and correct translation of the original document No. NO-1210. Jules N. Beaumont. Civ. No. X-045038.”

The date given (March 15) is clearly wrong. This version contains two handwritten notes in German that refer to an original. The first, p. 2, says “unsinnige Übersetzung” (“senseless translation,” next to the sentence: “I was given the order, by a higher authority the then inspectorate of the concentration camps”), while the other on p. 3, next to the phrase “(page 2 of the original),” says “Original unleserlich” (“Original illegible”). This indicates that the person adding these handwritten remarks probably had the German transcript available, and that he disagreed with the translation. It can be ruled out that this is Höss’s handwriting, but it cannot be determined with certainty that it is Beaumont’s, because this translation does not contain his handwritten signature. If these are Beaumont’s remarks, he obviously was not the author of the translation, as one would assume from his attestation.

In addition to the three texts mentioned above, there is another translation, unfortunately without date or signature. The text consists of nine pages, the first of which is torn at the top margin, so the first two lines read only: [24]

“... Franz LANG – having been duly warned... that the following statements are true.”

The comparison between this translation and the one appearing in the three documents mentioned earlier is not of particular interest to this study. Hence, I merely list a few examples (the first quote is from the text “Production No. AD/2,” the second from the translation certified by Beaumont):

1) “I was given the order, by an higher authority” (p. 1)

2) “My higher authority, The Inspectorate of Concentration Camps, instructed me” (p. 1).

1) “The Fuehrer ordered the solution of the Jewish question in Europe. A few so-called Vernichtungslager are existing in the general government (BELZEK near RAWA RUSKA Ost Polen, Tublinka [sic] near MALINA [sic] on the River Bug, and WOLZEK near Lublin)” (p. 2).

2) “The Fuehrer has ordered a solution of the Jewish problem in EUROPE. At present there are already several extermination camps in the territory of the General Government (BELZEK near RAWA RUSKA, Eastern Poland, TEBLINKA [sic] near MALINA [sic] on the river BUG and WOLZEK near LUBLIN” (p. 2).

1) “These camps were not very efficient and could not be enlarged. I visited the camp TREBLINKA in Spring 1942 to inform myself about the conditions” (p. 2)

2) “But the capacity of these camps is very small and they cannot be further extended (NB – At this point of giving his version of HIMMLER’S instructions, HOESS remarked “I myself visited the camp TREBLINKA in the spring of 1942 in order to acquaint myself with the conditions” (p. 2).

1) “In January 1945 there were about 63000 in all camps. In AUSCHWITZ I imagine about 3,000,000 people were put to death, about 2,500,000 were put through the gas-chambers” (p. 6)

2) “630,000[25] inmates was the combined state of all camps in January 1945. According to my knowledge 3000000 people lost their lives in the concentration camp AUSCHWITZ. I estimate that of these 2500,000 [sic] have been gassed” (p. 7/19).

2.1. The Two Handwritten Versions

In this subsection, I translate the most important passages of the two handwritten statements of March 14, 1946:[26]

2.2. The Transcript

In this subsection, I translate the most important parts of the typewritten transcript. [\[29\]](#)

“[p. 1] In November 1939, I was deployed as leader of a protective custody camp in the rank of an SS captain. Until my transfer to AUSCHWITZ on the first of May 1940.

I was commissioned by my superior authority, the former Inspectorate of C[oncentration]C[amp]s, to create from the grounds of the former Polish artillery barracks near AUSCHWITZ, a quarantine camp for inmates from Poland. After Himmler had visited the camp in 1941, I received the order to expand the camp as a large concentration camp for the east, in particular to deploy the inmates in agriculture, which had to be developed as much as possible, thereby turning the entire swamp and flood plain near the River Vistula into arable land. Furthermore, he ordered to make some 8 – 10,000 inmates available for the construction of a new Buna factory of the I.G. Farben. He concomitantly ordered to create a PoW camp for some 100,000 Russian PoWs in the Birkenau area.

The number of inmates grew from day to day despite my objections that there weren't enough accommodations, more internments were allocated to me. Since the sanitary facilities were not sufficient in any way, epidemic diseases were inevitable. Hence, mortality rose as well. Since it was not permitted to bury inmates, crematoria had to be built.

In 1941, the first transports of Jews came from SLOVAKIA and the region of Upper Silesia,[.] Those unable to work were gassed in the vestibule of the crematorium on orders of Himmler, which he gave me personally. In June 1941 [p. 2] I was summoned to Himmler in Berlin where he basically told me the following. The Fuehrer has ordered the solution of the Jewish question in Europe. Several so-called extermination camps already exist in the Government General (BELZEK near RAVA RUSKA eastern Poland, TREBLINKA near MALINA [Malkinia] on the River BUG, and WOLZEK near LUBLIN). These camps were under the authority of the Einsatzkommandos [deployment units] of the SECURITY POLICE headed by high SIPO officers and guard details. These camps had a low capacity, however, and could not be expanded.

I myself visited the Treblinka camp in spring of 1942 to acquaint myself with the conditions. The exterminations were conducted using the following method: There were small chambers the size of rooms which were filled with gases from vehicle engines through feeding pipes. This method was unreliable, because the engines consisted of old captured vehicles and tanks, which therefore failed frequently. Hence, the transports could not be processed in such a way that an exact implementation of the operational plan, this was about the evacuation of the Warsaw Ghetto, could be carried out. According to statements made by the camp leader, some 800,000 people had been gassed at the TREBLINKA camp in the course of half a year. For all the reasons given above, HIMMLER explained to me that the only option to expand these facilities so that they matched the general plan was at AUSCHWITZ, first as a railway junction of 4 transiting lines, and also because the sparsely populated camp area could be completely cordoned off. For these reasons, he had decided to move the mass extermination to AUSCHWITZ, and I had to immediately start with measures to carry this out. He wished [to see] exact construction plans conforming to these guidelines within 4 weeks. He stated moreover: This task is so difficult and serious that he cannot charge just anyone with it[.] He already intended to entrust another higher SS leader with this task, but during the construction phase it would not be good if 2 leaders were to give orders side by side. Hence, I received the clear instruction to carry out the extermination of the transports sent by the RSHA. Regarding the sequence of the incoming transports, I had to get in touch with SS

Obersturmbannführer [Lieutenant Colonel] EICHMANN of Office 4 (which was headed by Gruppenführer [Lieutenant General] MÜLLER). At the same time, the transports of Russian PoWs from the regions of the Gestapo headquarters BRESLAU, TROPPEAU and KATTOWITZ also arrived, which had to be exterminated at Auschwitz on HIMMLER's order, written direction of the Gestapo chief in charge. Since the newly to be erected cremation facilities were finished only in 1942, the inmates had to be gassed in provisionally erected gassing rooms, and then cremated in pits in the ground. I herewith describe the procedure of the gassing procedure [sic]:

2 old farm houses, located secludedly in the BIRKENAU area, were made free of gaps and equipped with strong wooden doors. The transports as such were unloaded on a side spur in BIRKENAU. Inmates fit for work were selected and taken to the camps, all luggage was put down a. later brought to the property warehouses. The others destined for gassings went on foot to the facilities some 1 km away. The sick and those unable to walk were transported there by truck. During transports arriving at night, all were carried there by truck. In front of the farmhouses, all had to undress behind erected brushwood screens. The doors had a sign saying DESINFECTIOIN ROOM. By means of interpreters, the sergeants in charge had to tell the people that they ought to pay close attention to their things, so that they would find them after the delousing. This prevented any agitation right from the start. Those undressed then went into the rooms, 2 – 300 people, depending on the size. The doors were screwed shut, and through small hatches, one to 2 cans of Cyclon B each were spread out[.] This was a granular mass of hydrogen cyanide. Duration of exposure depending on weather 3 – 10 minutes. After half an hour, the doors were opened and the corpses were dragged out by a unit working there constantly and burned in pits in the ground. Prior to the incineration, gold teeth and rings were removed, fire wood was stacked up between the corpses, and when a pile had some 100 corpses in it, the wood was lit using rags soaked with petroleum. Once the incineration was well under way, other corpses were thrown to this. The fat collecting at the bottom of the pit was poured back into the fire with buckets in order to accelerate the incineration process particularly during wet weather. The duration of the incineration lasted 6-7 hours. During westerly winds, the stench of the burned corpses could be noticed even inside the camp. After cleaning out the pits, the remaining ashes were crushed. This happened on a cement slab where inmates pulverized the remaining bones with wooden pounders. These remains were then poured into the Vistula at a remote location using trucks.

After erection of the new large cremation facilities, the following procedure was used:

[p. 3] After the first 2 large-scale crematoria had been finished in 1942 (the 2 others were finished half a year later), mass transports from France, Belgium, Holland and Greece commenced. The following procedure was used for this. The transport trains left [sic] at a ramp with 3 tracks which were built right between the crematoria, property warehouse and the Birkenau camp. The selection of those fit for work as well as putting down the luggage happened right on the ramp. Those fit for work were brought to the various camps, and those to be exterminated to one of the new crematoria. There they first walked into a large underground room for undressing. This room was equipped with benches and provisions to hand up clothes; here, too, the people were told by interpreters that they were led to take a bath and to be deloused and that they should pay attention to the location of their clothes. Then they walked into the next room that was also underground [and] that was equipped with water pipes and showers, which thus had to create the impression of a bathroom. Until the very end, 2 sergeants had to remain in the room in order to prevent any unrest.

It happened on occasion that inmates realized what this was about, especially the transports from BELSEN knew, for most of them came from the east, when the trains had reached the region of Upper Silesia, that they were most likely led to their extermination. During transports from BELSEN, security measures were reinforced, and the transports were split up in small groups, and these groups were then divvied up among the crematoria to prevent riots. SS men formed a tight chain and pushed resisters by force into the gassing rooms. This happened only rarely, though, for the reassuring measures simplified the procedure. I especially remember one example. A transport from BELSEN had arrived, and after roughly 2/3, these were mostly men, a mutiny broke out among the remaining third still present in the undressing room; 3 or 4 of the SS sergeants entered the room with their weapons in order to expedite the undressing, and because the inmates of their own cremation unit couldn't handle this. During this, the lighting cables were ripped out, the SS men assaulted, one of them stabbed, and all robbed of their weapons. Since it was completely dark in this room, a wild shooting broke out between the guards at the exit and the inmates inside. When I arrived, I ordered the doors shut, the gassing procedure of the first 2/3 finished, and then [we] went into the room with handheld searchlights and the pistols and forced the inmates into one corner, from where they were then led out individually and shot with a small caliber on my orders.

It often happened repeatedly that women hid their little children among their underwear and their clothes and didn't take them along into the gas chambers. The clothes were searched by the permanent unit of the cremation inmates under the [supervision of] the SS in charge, and any children found that way were afterwards also sent to the gas room. After half an hour, the electric fans in the gassing room were turned on, and the corpses were driven to the cremation furnaces located upstairs using elevators. The cremation of some 2,000 people in 5 furnaces lasted roughly 12 hours. At Auschwitz, there were 2 facilities with 5 double furnaces each and 2 facilities with 4 large furnaces each; furthermore, one temporary facility existed as described earlier. The second temporary facility had been eliminated.

All the accruing clothes and effects were sorted in the effects warehouse by the inmate unit that worked there permanently and was also lodged there. The valuables went each month to the Reichsbank to Berlin. Clothes after cleaning to armament companies for the eastern workers working there, and the settlers. The tooth gold was smelted and sent also every month to the sanitation office of the Waffen SS. In charge of this was Quartermaster General SS Gruppenführer BLUMENREUTER. I myself have never personally shot or beaten anyone.

Due to these mass admissions, the number of inmates fit for work increased immeasurably. My objections to the RSHA to delay the operations, that is to say, to let fewer transport trains roll, were always rejected with reference to an order by the Reichsführer SS that the operations had to be carried out expeditiously and that every SS leader impeding this in any way would be held responsible.

Due to this tremendous overcrowding of the existing inmate accommodations and the at once insufficient sanitary facilities especially in the BIRKENAU camp, new epidemics of typhus, scarlet fever and diphtheria flared up over and over again. The physicians tried everything in their power to fight the resulting epidemics, but almost all employed measures failed. In military respect, the physicians were subordinate to the camp commander, but with respect to medical issues, they had their own office channel and were subordinate to the head of the WVHA's medical corps, STANDARTENFÜHRER Dr. Lolling, who himself was subordinate to REICHSARZT SS-Obergruppenf. [ührer] Dr. GRAWITZ."

The statement continues that those condemned to death for non-political reasons were sent to the camp's Gestapo on orders of the RSHA. They were killed with lethal injections, including gasoline. Doctors had to draw up normal death certificates giving a disease as the cause of death. In Auschwitz, several medical experiments were carried out on detainees by Dr. Karl Clauberg and Dr. Schumacher (sterilizations).

"[p. 4] In order to fight the typhus epidemics, various methods were applied to exterminate lice. Utterly louse-infested healthy persons were treated with various remedies, such as LAUSETTO, [30] among other things, an agent obtained from horse dust, and then it was determined how well the agent worked.

Dr. WIRTHS Sturmbannf. [ührer] and garrison physician, picked out women who were suspected of having cancer in order to removed early-stage cancer surgically. In this regard, he relied on experiences of his brother [which] he had made at a Hamburg hospital. Furthermore, this physician also [carried out] experiments to kill persons by means of hydrogen cyanide injections, [on] such [persons] who had been slated for the death penalty by the Gestapo."

The maximum occupancy of the Auschwitz Camp was 140,000 detainees.

The statement goes on to assert that Höss, after his transfer to the WVHA, was assigned to the Political Department (Politische Abteilung) of Office DI (see Part Two, Chapter 42).

[p. 6] Applications for death penalties (Anträge auf Todestrafen) for grave crimes committed by detainees "had to be amply substantiated and submitted to HIMMLER, who had to approve them" "mussten eingehend begründet HIMMLER vorgelegt werden der darüber entschied"; furthermore, "applications for corporal punishment were decided by Himmler only in case of women. Regarding men, that decision was made by Glücks or his permanent deputy Maurer." In January of "bei Antragen auf Prügelstrafen entschied HIMMLER nur bei Frauen. Bei Männern hatte Glücks dei [die] Entscheidung bzw. sein standiger Vertreter Maurer." of 1945, some 630,000 inmates were present in all camps (the text erroneously states 63000).

The statement then returns to the extermination of the Jews by giving concrete numbers: [31]

"According to my estimate, some 3,000,000 people perished at Auschwitz itself. I estimate that of these, 2,500,000 were gassed. Apart from personal experiences, these numbers were made entirely officially by Obersturmbannf.[ührer] EICHMANN, the official in charge of Jewish issues at the RSHA, while reporting to the Reichsführer in April 1945. These were mainly Jews. I personally remember to have gassed 70,000 Russian PoWs during my time as commander in Auschwitz on the order of the Gestapo chiefs in charge. The maximum number of gassings on one day at Auschwitz was 10,000. This was the maximum that could be carried out on one day with the existing facilities. I personally remember the large mass transports, 90,000 from Slovakia, 65,000 from Greece, 110,000 from France, 20,000 from Belgium, 90,000 from Holland, 400,000 from Hungary, 250,000 from Poland and Upper Silesia, 100,000 from Germany and Theresienstadt.”

I will discuss the alleged assignment entrusted to Höss in March 1945 in Part Two, Chapter 42.

3. The Other Statements of March 1946

On March 16, 1946, Höss signed a handwritten English statement with the following text:

“Statement made voluntarily at [Minden] Gaol by Rudolf Hoess former commandant of Auschwitz concentration camp on 16th day of March 1946.

I personally arranged on orders received from Himmler in May 1941 the gassing of 2 million persons between June/July 1941 and the end of 1943 during which time I was commandant of Auschwitz.”

This is followed by Höss’s signature, together with his rank and his former duty as the commander of the Auschwitz-Birkenau Camp. [\[32\]](#)

It is evident that the statement’s text was not written by Höss; his handwriting was different, as can already be seen from the way in which the word “Auschwitz” was written by him and by the unknown British hand.

One may ask why the British submitted this text to Höss, which is in contradiction to his alleged statement made two days earlier regarding both the date of Himmler’s order (May instead of June 1941) and the number of victims (the gassing victims were reduced from 2,500,000 to 2,000,000). Apparently, the author(s) of these lines did not even know that Höss had returned to Auschwitz in May 1944 – according to the orthodox holocaust narrative in order to assist in the “gassing” of the Hungarian Jews, which is the most significant event, numerically speaking.

Assessing the events ex post facto, it looks like the British needed a brief and incisive way to attract the attention of the press.

Already on March 17, 1946, the New York Times published an article on page 31 titled “Nazi Mass Killer Taken; He Used Gas at Oswiecim.” The source given is “British Army Headquarters, Germany,” dated March 16. The article reads:

“British agents today [\[33\]](#) captured Rudolf Hoess, former commandant of the Oswiecim concentration camp, ending a nine-month search for the man they described as probably ‘the greatest individual killer in the history of the world.’ Hoess was the missing man at the war crimes trial of Josef Kramer, ‘the Beast of Belsen.’ Kramer repeatedly accused him of gassing millions of Germans [sic] as Heinrich Himmler’s camp administrator.”

On the following days, many newspapers, including German ones, reported on Höss's arrest, always accompanied by the alleged gassing of 2 million people.

On March 19, 1946, the Berliner Zeitung carried the front-page headline: "The man who gassed two million people" ("Der Mann, der zwei Millionen Menschen vergaste"). That news item, dated March 18, came from an "American news agency" and stated: "During an interrogation, Hoess confessed to have gassed some two million people at Auschwitz."

On the same day, Der Tagespiegel published a front-page article titled "The Commandant of Auschwitz arrested" ("Der Kommandant von Auschwitz verhaftet"), also referring to a news item of March 18. The "gassing" story was reported with the same words.

The next day, the same journal returned to that subject with another front-page article titled "Confession of the Auschwitz Commandant" ("Geständnis des Auschwitzer Kommandanten") that referred to "a remarkable confession" in which Höss had admitted "that he personally, in carrying out Himmler's orders, ordered that gassing of two million people in the time between June 1941 and the end of 1943, during which time he was commandant of Auschwitz."

The British newspapers published the statement of March 16, 1946 even in facsimile; so for instance The Daily Herald, in a front-page article by a certain Denis Martin ("This Man Killed 2,000,000"), which also very briefly summarized the statement of March 14, and The Daily Telegraph in a brief article on page 6 without headline.

References to the Belsen Trial were present in all these articles. This confirms that the British knew perfectly well which things "the greatest individual killer in the history of the world" had been made to "confess."

The British clearly aimed at influencing public opinion, especially in Germany, in view of the future "re-education" following the victors' paradigms. Höss's handwritten signature at the bottom of this document was designed to contribute a lot to this end.

Yet another document, also in English, also dates back to March 16, 1946:

"Statement of Rudolf Hoess. Statement of Rudolf Hoess, male, made voluntarily at Minden Gaol on 16th March 1946.

1. I was commandant of Auschwitz from May 1941 until December 1943.
2. During this time the camp was visited by the following high-ranking persons:

Schwerin-Krosigk – Finanzminister

Thierack – Justizminister.

They inspected the camp of Auschwitz, its factories and farms and remained for approximately 3-4 hours.

3. I held the position of Adjutant and Schutzhaftlagerführer in Sachsenhausen Concentration Camp from 1939 until 1940.

4. During this time I saw the following high ranking persons visit the camp of Sachsenhausen:

Frick – Innenminister (Minister of the Interior).

The above statement was made voluntarily by me, Rudolf Hoess, at Minden Gaol, Germany, on this 16th day of March 1946.

Sgd. Rudolf Hoess [only type, no handwritten signature]

Witnessed by me, Capt A. Vollmar, 22 Dragoons, an officier of the Judge Advocate General's Branch, HQ, BAOR at Minden Gaol, Germany this 16th day of March 1946.

Sgd. A. Vollmar, Capt, JAG Branch, HQ BACR.”

The declaration closes with this attestation:[\[34\]](#)

“Certified that the above text was read to the said Rudolf Hoess in German and that he agreed that it was true and voluntarily signed it.”

On March 20, 1946, Höss signed yet another declaration, which is doubtlessly authentic:

“Statement Made voluntarily at Minden Gaol by Rudolf Hoess, former Commandant of Auschwitz Concentration Camp, on the 20th of March 1946.

1. I was Commandant of the Concentration camp Auschwitz from 1 May 1940 to the first of December 1943.
2. When I took up my duties there were approximately 50 men Waffen SS as guard platoon and 12-15 men Waffen SS as HQ section.
3. At the time I relinquished my command there were 3000 men Waffen SS serving as guards, 300 men Waffen SS as Camp staff, and another 200 men Waffen SS employed on other administrative duties, all told 3500 men Waffen SS at the Concentration camp Auschwitz.
4. Out of those who served originally at the camp, approximately 2500 men Waffen SS were posted to field units and replaced by others, so that during my term of service all told 6000 Waffen SS served at one time or another at Auschwitz. After my departure this exchange of personnel continued, and I should say another 1000 men Waffen SS were replaced up to the time of the evacuation of the Camp in 1945, so that all told approximately 7000 men Waffen SS have served at one time or another at the Concentration Camp Auschwitz.
5. Once a man had been selected from the guard troops for service with the Camp staff, he remained with the staff, unless posted away from the Camp. [followed by Höss's signature].

Witnessed by me, Capt. A. Vollmar. XXII Dragoons, an officer of the Judge Advocate' General's Department, HQ, BAOR, at Minden Gaol in Germany on this 20th day of March 1946” (followed by the signature)

At the end, there is a statement similar to that of the March 16 statement:[\[35\]](#)

“I hereby certify that I have accurately translated this deposition from English into German to the said deponent Rudolf Hoess and that he fully agrees the contents thereof.”

As we will see below [in later chapters of this book; Ed.], these are more pieces of evidence allowing us to reconstruct the history of Höss's first statement. Schwerin von Krosigk, by the way, never set foot inside the Auschwitz Camp.

A photocopy of this statement, bearing the stamp "International Military Tribunal" (IMT), became document D 749 b. On April 15, 1946, during the deposition of Höss at the IMT in Nuremberg (see below, Section II.10), Colonel Amen presented the document as Exhibit Number USA-810.[36]

Marcel Nadjari's Message in a Bottle

by Hadding Scott

The apparent age and peculiar provenance of the document do not suffice to make it credible.

Smithsonian "Smart News" of 11 October 2017 and Deutsche Welle of 9 October reported that a thirteen-page letter from a member of the Sonderkommando at Birkenau, discovered in 1980, has been rendered legible. Deutsche Welle says that the letter was written in late 1944, then "stuck in a thermos, wrapped in a leather pouch and buried in the soil near Crematorium III" before the arrival of the Red Army. Only 10 to 15% of the letter, written by Greek Jew Marcel Nadjari, was legible when it was found in 1980, but with multispectral image analysis in 2013, 85 to 90% of the letter became legible.

Pavel Polian, an historian with the Institut für Zeitgeschichte in Munich, says that Nadjari's and several other writings found buried at Auschwitz "are the most central documents of the Holocaust." The other buried writings, Polian says, were all found shortly after the Red Army arrived in 1945; only the one written by Nadjari was discovered much later.

The letter describes the systematic killing of prisoners at Birkenau:

"Underneath a garden, there are two endless basement rooms: one is meant for undressing, the other is a death chamber. People enter naked and when it is filled with about 3,000 people, it is closed and they are gassed."
(Deutsche Welle, 9 October 2017)

Deutsche Welle says that the letter was buried near Krema III, where a homicidal gas chamber has been alleged (which according to revisionist findings was a morgue).

According to original German wartime blueprints, Morgue #1, the alleged homicidal gas chamber of Crematorium III at Birkenau, was 30 m long and 7 m wide, hence had an area of 210 m<sup>2</sup> (2,260 sq ft; ignoring the seven pillars of altogether a little over 1 m<sup>2</sup>). Deutsche Welle quotes Nadjari as saying that the prisoners were pressed into the room "like sardines" by whipping them.

The figure of 3,000 persons packed into the alleged gas chamber of Krema III happens to correspond to something in the pseudo-memoir of Rudolf Höss (pp. 110, 143), written while in Polish Communist captivity after the war. It says that Krema II (which is a mirror-image of Krema III and of the same size) could easily accommodate 2,000, but could potentially hold 3,000.

Is it necessary to point out the impossibility of marching 3,000 people into a room of only 2,260 square feet? Even if they are chased with a whip, it is not going to happen.

Nadjari says that, after one-half hour in the gas chamber (another figure attributed to Höss), he and others in the Sonderkommando would remove the corpses and take them to be cremated. Here, again, Nadjari supplies some interesting details. First, Nadjari says that the corpses were flammable:

"We carried the corpses of these innocent women and children to the elevator, which brought them into the room with the ovens, and they put them there in the furnaces, where they were burnt without the use of fuel, because of the fat they have.” (Smithsonian Smart News, 11 October 2017)

Anybody who has grilled meat over an open flame should know that this is impossible. Although pure fat is flammable, the fat of a carcass, human or otherwise, contains too much water to burst into flames. Certainly the people at Smithsonian “Smart News” should know this!

What remains after the cremation of a human corpse? Nadjari declares:

“a human being ends up as about 640 grams of ashes.” (Deutsche Welle)

That’s 1.41 lbs. Is that a realistic figure? A business that sells paraphernalia related to cremation has posted online general information about cremation, including a description of what remains:

“The cremated remains of an adult male will usually weigh around six pounds while the remains of an adult female will be closer to four pounds. The height of the deceased rather than their weight has a strong correlation with the weight of the ashes produced through cremation.” (Cremation Solutions)

The article says that the remains consist mainly of bone fragments, which means that neither emaciation nor obesity will significantly affect the weight after cremation. Nadjari’s 640 grams is thus about 28% of the average weight of cremated human remains. (It is surely possible that European Jews 70 years ago had smaller frames than present-day inhabitants of the United States, but not that much smaller.)

How does Nadjari say that the death factory of Birkenau disposed of the remains? He talks about:

“ ... bones that the Germans forced us to crush, to then press through a coarse sieve, and then a car picked it up and poured it into the Vistula River, which flows by in the area and thus they eliminate all traces.” (National Post, 19 October 2017)

Nadjari estimates that about 1.4 million victims were processed in this manner, and he is praised by Pavel Polian for the relative accuracy of his estimate, since it is much less than the 4,000,000 that the Auschwitz Museum claimed until 1990.

Even if the powdered bone fragments from each corpse weighed only 1.41 lbs, that is literally about 1,000 tons of crushed bone poured into the River Vistula. (If we use the more realistic figure of 4 lbs. per corpse, multiplied by the current official Auschwitz-Birkenau death toll of about 1.1 million, that makes 2,200 tons.) By what magic is a thousand tons or more of bonemeal dumped into the River Vistula not going to leave a trace?

Also, Nadjari is not even saying that the bones were pulverized: they were "crushed" to the point of being able to pass through a "coarse sieve," which means that there would be recognizable fragments of bone in the river.

There are other problems with Nadjari’s account, like the illogical and stupid way that he says gassings were managed, but the physical impossibilities alone should have been enough to alert the various major news agencies, and certainly the Smithsonian Institution, that the buried letter lacked credibility – even if it is one of “the most central documents of the Holocaust.”

Abstract

“The Holocaust” is widely known as the murder of six million Jews by Nazi Germany, many if not most of them in gas chambers deceptively disguised as shower rooms.

We have all seen the terrible imagery of dead prisoners taken after concentration camps were liberated. This documentary reviews some of the most memorable of these images, which were taken in camps such as Dachau, Nordhausen and Bergen-Belsen. A closer examination of this imagery we've all been exposed to reveals a very different story than what we were made to believe. Surprisingly, a large number of the bodies we were shown were the direct result of Allied bombing and strafing attacks, rather than victims of a systematically planned Nazi extermination policy.

Probing the Holocaust: The Horror Explained (Part 1) presents surprising information which shed a new light on the horrific imagery and enables many viewers for the first time to truly understand what transpired in Germany during and at the end of the war. Watching this presentation with an open mind will surprise you and leave you asking questions of your own.

Probing the Holocaust: The Horror Explained

Transcript

It's something we were told throughout our entire lives: Six million Jews, and large numbers of non-Jews, were murdered by the Nazis:

[Clips from various film footages:]

"Eleven million people died in Nazi Germany's death camps. Six million were Jews."

"An estimated six million Jews were killed during World War II."

"Hitler murdered six million Jewish people"

"six million Jews"

"six million died"

"six million people crying from the grave..."

The term Holocaust commonly refers to the systematically planned and executed extermination of six million Jews by Nazi Germany during World War Two. Mainstream historians agree that, of these six million Jews, approximately three million were killed in gas chambers. The vast majority of them, they say, were killed or died in six extermination centers in Polish territory. Here is a break-down of these three million alleged gas chamber victims by each of the six camps.

Camp	Jewish Gas Chamber Victims
Auschwitz/Oświęcim	900,000*
Treblinka	900,000
Bełżec	500,000
Sobibór	210,000
Kulmhof/Chelmno	240,000
Lublin-Majdanek	unknown (thousands)*
Total:	2,750,000 + thousands

* The total Jewish death toll of these camps is higher than the number given due to deaths resulting from other causes (diseases, exhaustion, executions etc.)

These numbers are averages of figures found on the websites of two of the most reputable Holocaust research institutions, the US Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., and the Yad Vashem Museum in Jerusalem.[1]

The Holocaust is so important that the United Nations even decided to create a dedicated memorial day for it. Every January 27th, the day when the infamous Auschwitz Camp was occupied by the Soviet Red Army in 1945, the whole world is reminded to commemorate the victims of the Holocaust.[2] In 2017, on the occasion of this International Holocaust Remembrance Day, the White House under U.S. President Donald Trump released this statement:[3]

["It is with a heavy heart and somber mind that we remember and honor the victims, survivors, heroes of the Holocaust. It is impossible to fully fathom the depravity and horror inflicted on innocent people by Nazi terror.

Yet, we know that in the darkest hours of humanity, light shines the brightest. As we remember those who died, we are deeply grateful to those who risked their lives to save the innocent.

In the name of the perished, I pledge to do everything in my power throughout my Presidency, and my life, to ensure that the forces of evil never again defeat the powers of good. Together, we will make love and tolerance prevalent throughout the world.]

Stop the video to read it, if you like. There is nothing unusual about the statement, except maybe the fact that Jews aren't mentioned in it. That triggered quite some vitriolic reactions, for instance from Jonathan Greenblatt, the current head of the Jewish Anti-Defamation League. He tweeted on that same day that Trump did not even mention Jews,[4] which triggered a deluge of similar attacks on the U.S. President for not having expressly mentioned the six million Jewish victims of the Holocaust.[5] The White House countered a day later that it wasn't just Jews who died in the Holocaust, but that five million gentiles were killed, too,[6] who also deserve equal remembrance, referring to an article which had appeared two years earlier in the Huffington Post.<sup>[7]</sup> That in turn unleashed a series of attacks on the president and that 2015 article, claiming that this “five-million-gentiles” victim figure is bogus and vastly over-inflated. Among those, I may quote here The Times of Israel’s take on this death toll:<sup>[8]</sup>

“It’s a statement that shows up regularly in declarations about the Nazi era. [...] It is, however, a number without any scholarly basis. [...] The ‘5 million’ [non-Jewish Holocaust victims] has driven Holocaust historians to distraction ever since Wiesenthal started to peddle it in the 1970s. [...]

Yehuda Bauer, an Israeli Holocaust scholar [...], said he warned his friend Wiesenthal [...] about spreading the false notion that the Holocaust claimed 11 million victims – 6 million Jews and 5 million non-Jews.

‘I said to him, ‘Simon, you are telling a lie,’ Bauer recalled in an interview Tuesday. ‘He said, ‘Sometimes you need to do that to get the results for things you think are essential.’

[...] Wiesenthal [...] told them that he chose the 5 million number carefully: He wanted a number large enough to attract the attention of non-Jews who might not otherwise care about Jewish suffering, but not larger than the actual number of Jews who were murdered in the Holocaust, 6 million.

It caught on: [...]

Deborah Lipstadt, a professor of Holocaust studies at Emory University in Atlanta, wrote in 2011 [...] ‘this number is simply inaccurate, in fact made up [...].’

Deborah Lipstadt went over the top, however, by accusing Trump of flirting with Holocaust denial.<sup>[9]</sup>

So, here we seem to have a case where a prominent Jew, the late Simon Wiesenthal, inflated the number of Holocaust victims for political purposes.

But did Wiesenthal really invent that number? And was he the only one exaggerating numbers?

During and right after the end of the Second World War, a number of war propaganda movies were filmed with the support or even under the control of the U.S. government. Throughout these propaganda movies, there are many references to the thousands and even millions of victims of National Socialist barbarism – yet none of these films ever single out Jews as the primary victims of a “Holocaust.”

The most infamous among those propaganda movies was titled Die Todesmühlen,<sup>[10]</sup> which was designed for, and eventually shown to, German audiences as a tool for shock-and-awe re-education. It was later also released in an English edition: Death Mills.<sup>[11]</sup> Both movies mention as the death toll of National Socialist persecution 20 million without making any specific reference to Jews:<sup>[12]</sup>

“But these eleven hundred were a small fraction of the twenty million men, women and children murdered by the Nazis. 20 million human beings, equal to the population of 22 American states. 20 million corpses.”

In fact, the narrator insists that the victims were

“of all the nations of Europe, of all religious faiths, of all political beliefs, condemned by Hitler because they were anti-Nazi.”<sup>[13]</sup>

This is only the most prominent example. There are more which highlight that death toll claims of National Socialist persecution have a history of exceeding the six million, and that Jews have been mentioned with regularity as only one among many victim groups.

This issue is also not just a matter of journalists and propagandists making up wild figures. In 2015, in a book about the forensic examination of mass-murder locations of the Holocaust, a British archaeologist who has been working with the leading scientists in the field for several years wrote, quote:[14]

She provides no source for that claim, though. So maybe she merely repeated what she had heard through Wiesenthal’s grapevine? But is it really Wiesenthal’s? Interestingly, the very same Washington Holocaust Museum that, according to just-quoted article in The Times of Israel, issued a statement on Trump’s text emphasizing the centrality of the annihilation of the Jews to the understanding of the Holocaust, had announced in 2013 in a press release that their research has revealed that:

“The Nazi Holocaust may have claimed up to 20 million lives,” while leaving the 6-million Jewish death toll basically unchanged.[15] This would mean that as many as 14 million non-Jews died in the Holocaust, not just five.

I may also point out that 20 million is not the ceiling of death-toll estimates. For instance, an article of Sept. 21, 1992, from Germany’s most prestigious daily newspaper, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung (p. 13), illustrates in a very useful manner the kind of topic we are dealing with and the problems that are related to it. The title of the article translates to “Traces of the Crime; Shoes, Shoes, even Children’s Shoes.” It is a report written by a student about his visit to the Stutthof concentration camp not far from Danzig, in postwar Poland, that has been turned into a museum. The author, in his fourth sentence, states that he cannot imagine what an extermination camp might look like and talks of, quote, “installations in which ‘6 million Jews and a total of 26 million detainees [...] were killed,” unquote. So here we have a combination of the general 20 million victims plus six million Jews.

At the end of his account the author writes that he found himself facing, quote “the remains of the most brutal genocide, the highly modern killing machines of the time, the cruelest crime of humanity,” unquote

By putting things that way, one of the most highly regarded newspapers in the world has given its definition of the Holocaust. The annihilation of a total of 26 million people by the National Socialists in ultra-modern killing machines is the cruelest crime in the history of humanity.

So, how many victims were there now? Six million Jews plus a few others, or eleven in total, or twenty, or even twenty-six million?

At most one of these figures can be correct, but with all this speculation going on, it may turn out that they are all wrong. But if that is so, what is the truth? Can you tell?

One thing is for sure: we obviously cannot believe everything we hear about the Holocaust, because the things we hear often contradict one another.

Let's start at the beginning, with the documentary “Nazi Concentration and Prison Camps” that the Americans introduced during the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg in 1945 as proof of Nazi atrocities. Psychologically speaking, it was one of the most powerful pieces of evidence submitted, because a picture tells more than a thousand words. Here are some scenes about the Dachau Camp. Dachau was one of the first major camps the Americans captured toward the end of the war:[16]

“Hanging in orderly rows were the clothes of prisoners who had been suffocated in a lethal gas chamber. They had been persuaded to remove their clothing under the pretext of taking a shower for which towels and soap were provided. This is the Brausebad, the shower bath. Inside the shower bath, the gas vents.”

Actually, what you are seeing here are not gas vents but recessed light fixtures.

“On the ceiling, the dummy showerheads. In the engineer’s room, the intake and outlet pipes. Push buttons to control inflow and outtake of gas. A hand valve to regulate pressure. Cyanide powder was used to generate the lethal smoke.”

Interestingly, on August 19, 1961, a letter to the editors by German mainstream historian Martin Broszat was published in Germany’s biggest weekly newspaper Die Zeit stating, among other things:

“Jews or other inmates were gassed neither in Dachau nor in Bergen-Belsen nor in Buchenwald. The gas chamber at Dachau was never fully completed and taken into ‘operation.’”

On January 24, 1993, the famous Nazi hunter Simon Wiesenthal wrote in a letter to the editors of the U.S. military magazine Stars and Stripes in the same vein:

“A gas chamber was in the process of being built at Dachau, but it was never completed.”

Thus, between the 1960s and late 1990s, the Dachau Museum had a sign displayed inside the Dachau gas chamber stating:

“Gas Chamber, disguised as a shower room never used as a gas chamber.”

Today, however, this sign is no longer there. Instead, a less-visible text on a sign outside that room states:

"Gas chamber

This was the center of potential mass murder. The room was disguised as 'showers' and equipped with fake shower spouts to mislead the victims and prevent them from refusing to enter the room."

Currently, the US Holocaust Museum itself admits, quote:[17]

"There is no credible evidence that the gas chamber in Barrack X was used to murder human beings."

Barrack X was the official name for the crematorium building where that sinister room was located.

One of the leading books by mainstream historians on the gas chamber question, the 1993 collective tome Nazi Mass Murder, states on page 202:[18]

"It has not yet been conclusively proved that killings by poison gas took place at the Dachau concentration camp."

And on page 203, we read:

"But during the trial there was only one witness, a Czech physician assigned to care for the prisoners, Dr. Frantisek Blaha, who declared that experimental gassings had taken place in the Dachau gas chamber."

Blaha signed an affidavit on January 9, 1946, in which he described his experience with the Dachau gas chamber. It is in German, but an English translation was read into the record during the Nuremberg Tribunal as follows:[19]

“Many executions by gas or shooting or injections took place right in the camp. The gas chamber was completed in 1944, and I was called by Dr. Rascher to examine the first victims. Of the eight or nine persons in the chamber there were three still alive, and the remainder appeared to be dead. Their eyes were red, and their faces were swollen. Many prisoners were later killed in this way.”

And that’s it. If Blaha was the only witness on trial testifying about the gas chamber, and if he had no experience whatsoever about the gassing procedure, then how did the American documentary makers know that the victims

“had been persuaded to remove their clothing under the pretext of taking a shower for which towels and soap were provided”?

Only a few days after the liberation of the Dachau Camp, a number of U.S. Congressmen visited the camp. Here they are shown inside the gas chamber. And this is footage taken in 2016. As you can see, the ceiling of that room is rather low. In fact, the room is roughly 2.15 meters or seven feet high. Why do I mention this? Because an official U.S. commission investigated what had transpired at Dachau, and in a report to the U.S. Congress dated May 15, 1945, compiled by David Chavez, we read, among other things, that in this room “the ceiling was some 10 feet in height”[20]

How can anyone confuse seven feet with ten feet? But that’s not all, because that report continues as follows:

“The supply of gas into the chamber was controlled by means of two valves on one of the outer walls, and beneath the valves was a small glass-covered peephole through which the operator could watch the victims die. The gas was let into the chamber through pipes terminating in perforated brass fixtures set into the ceiling.”

However, the ceiling did NOT have brass fixtures, but merely zinc-plated iron showerheads. Furthermore, as can be seen in this photo of a spot where a showerhead had been removed by the Americans as a piece of evidence, these were merely fake showerheads – or rather watering can rosettes such as this – that were not connected to anything. Already the documentary we watched earlier said that there was

“A hand valve to regulate pressure.”

But there’s a problem. Zyklon B, which was allegedly used for the murder, was not a gas under pressure that could be fed into pipes. It consisted of gypsum pellets soaked with liquid hydrogen cyanide, the active ingredient in Zyklon B. When such a can was opened, its poison evaporated slowly.

In addition, from many cases of accidental poisoning with hydrogen cyanide, and from executions with that poison as they were carried out in several U.S. states during the 20th century, we know that the victims Blaha claimed to have examined cannot have succumbed to Zyklon B. Such victims do not have red eyes. They do not have swollen faces. Actually, if they show any symptoms, it is a pinkish-reddish discoloration of their skin as shown here.

It is clear that the Americans, when making their documentaries and congressional reports, were jumping to a lot of conclusions, contradicting each other and the material facts in the process. But what’s the truth here?

The tubing shown in the American documentary is really impressive. Such heavy tubing with cast-iron hand valves are commonly used for piping large amounts of chemical liquids or pressurized gas. The design of this tubing was investigated by the French officer Capitaine Fribourg a week after the camp’s liberation. Here is a sketch drawn by him showing how the piping worked. According to this, fresh air was sucked in through this intake vent, which protrudes through the roof. This intake pipe is subsequently led through a heat exchanger located over the gas chamber in the building's attic. Here, the air is heated by the building's hot-water heating system. After that, the now-insulated pipe is split into two and led out of the attic area into the room behind the gas chamber, where both pipes are led in a semi-circle, each of which equipped with the hand valves shown. Leading back into the attic area over the gas chamber, Fribourg shows the pipes being merged back into the outgoing pipe, but that would make no sense at all, because then the air would go nowhere. Therefore, that's a mistake. In fact, a report compiled by German architect Axel Will in the early 2000s, a copy of which we received from the Dachau Museum, described in detail that the layout actually looks like this. Will wrote:

"Air is drawn in via a pipeline of 400 mm diameter extending over the roof, and is then led through a steam-operated heat exchanger. The pipeline is insulated behind the heat exchanger. It is split into two lines by means of a y-branch pipe, and leads with two pipes of 200 mm diameter into the room adjoining the gas chamber. There the airflow can be adjusted with a valve each. Both these and the other two valves of the ventilation system are made of massive cast iron and carry a $ sign in a circle. Such valves are common in gas pipelines but not in ventilation systems.

Behind the valves both pipelines are again led back into the attic area above the gas chamber and merged back together into one pipe. This pipe enters a sheet-metal shaft, which again goes through the adjoining room and leads the heated air to the air intake at the floor of the gas chamber.

This sheet-metal shaft is not insulated. This raises questions. Design logic suggests that this shaft would be the suitable location to add substances [such as Zyklon B] to the heated air prior to entering the gas chamber. The examination of the sheet-metal shaft has so far not revealed any opening for such a manipulation. Yet the missing insulation points to such a possibility."

So much from architect Will.

The air exhaust system starts with two openings in the ceiling. From there, the two non-insulated exhaust pipes merge into one, and are led toward the wall to the room behind the gas chamber, where the pipe splits up into two again. Then it is led outside in a semi-circle equipped with two hand valves, and led back into the attic area, where it is merged again into one pipe, as can be seen in this photo taken in the attic of that building. Then that merged pipe is fed into the electric blower that drives the whole operation, here visible in another attic photo, and from there out the exhaust chimney, which exits the roof here.

Now, if that gas chamber was meant to be operated with Zyklon B, it would have been smart, as architect Will correctly suggested, to equip the sheet-metal shaft running down the wall of the adjacent room with some trap door – hinted at here with blue lines – allowing for Zyklon B to be inserted into some kind of basket inside the shaft, hinted at here with the red meshwork. That way, the constant stream of warm air would have evaporated the poison gas quickly and would have spread it out inside the room rapidly. But, as architect Will correctly observed in his report, there is no trace of any provision to that effect.

So, the poison was neither administered using the false showerheads, as the congressional report claimed, nor using the ventilation system, as the U.S. documentary that was shown during the Nuremberg Tribunal suggested. But how else could it have been done? Here is the story as we are told today:

“Rocks with Zyklon B could be inserted from the outside”[22]

Here are some photos of these slots from the inside and from the outside. So, the entire sophisticated ventilation system did not serve any other purpose than moving air around. Why then was it so complicated? It makes no sense at all! It would have been much easier to simply feed the heated air directly into the shaft going into the chamber, as shown here, and to feed the exhaust pipes directly into the blower, using the blower's speed to adjust for any needed change in air volume. For now, this entire ventilation system seems to be a nonsensical mystery.

But that's not the only one. Fact is, that neither the congressional report nor the postwar documentary mentions these Zyklon B slots. In fact, David Chavez, the main author of the congressional report, had compiled an earlier version of this report that did not get submitted. It stated:[23]

"Gas Chamber. Gas tight doors. Wooden shed believed to contain pump or compressor."

This wooden shed located just outside the alleged gas chamber can be seen in many photos and film footages shot right after the liberation. It was located where today the two Zyklon B slots are located. But according to Chavez, it did not contain any slots, but rather some not clearly identified equipment.

The French officer Capitaine Fribourg describing the facility on May 25, 1945 as he claims to have seen it on May 5, 1945, hence, a week after the camp's capture by the Americans, also mentioned the wooden shed as follows:

"Right next to the shower room, adjacent to the building, is a palisade some 2 meters high fencing off a space of 2 m wide. It was not possible to get inside due to the presence of a pile of decomposing corpses stacked up against the palisade."

and

“behind the palisade is said to have existed or exists a compressor group (?)”

He also described two slots in the wall obscured by this shed from the outside as follows:

“At about 75 cm from the ground, 2 hoppers connect the shower room with the outside (palisade side). Each hopper ends on the inside with a grate, and on the outside with a movable shutter system.”

That’s also what we see there today. Fribourg even included those hoppers in one of his sketches.

If we look at the outside of this wall in that location today, we can see these strange features. It may have been the electrical outlet for the device operated in that shed.

Looking closer at the Zyklon-B slots, we notice that the mortar around them is not original. The original mortar used to build Barrack X contains coarse gravel rather than sand, while any mortar used around the Zyklon-B slots, and on later repairs and patch-ups, as we can see them here, are made of mortar containing fine sand. Here we can even see how some of the new mortar flowed over the old mortar.

On the inside, it is apparent that the tiles around those slots have been damaged. In fact, a simple test with the finger nail shows that these rough surfaces aren’t even tiles. They are plaster made to look similar to the tiles around them.

In other words, those slots are not part of the original building. They were added later on by hacking holes through the existing wall.

Who did that change, and when was it done? Chavez didn’t mention them, and neither did the U.S. documentary on Dachau of May 3rd. Fribourg saw them two days later, but he did not claim that they were used to throw in Zyklon B. That wouldn't have been a good idea anyway, because a large amount of the gypsum pellets would have gotten stuck on the grill on the inside. But what were those slots used for? Or is it a post-war forgery?

And if that is so, what else is?

Here is one hint. This footage was recorded on October 25, 2017 from the website of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. When searching their video archive for the term "gas chamber" the first result is this video. It's titled "Exhumation; inspection of gas chambers; Lt. Hodges."

This is footage taken after the liberation of Paris of an alleged Gestapo Torture Chamber near the Eiffel Tower. In the description, we read:

"World War II interiors of gas chamber used by the Germans in the execution of prisoners. Demonstrating method of securing prisoners in gas chambers. Various Close-ups, pipes leading into room."

And

"hand prints and scratches dug into cement wall of gas chamber by the victims."

Here are those ominous pipes. They are rather fancy, but not very functional. Most of all, they would have been within reach of the victims, and wouldn't have survived very long, because they would have been demolished very quickly. Also notice all those windows illuminating this room. How long would those window panes have lasted if the victims inside trashed the place and tried to break out?

For that footage, they even pumped some innocuous, but dramatic-looking smoke through the pipes.

Here are the handprints in the cement, allegedly created by gassing victims during their death throes. Needless to say, handprints can only be made in fresh mortar, and only insane people would use a room as an execution chamber whose walls had just been plastered.

These gas pipes and handprints are not evidence of Nazi atrocities, they are evidence of a deliberate Allied psychological warfare campaign to demonize the defeated Germans. Because this hoax is so obvious, no mainstream historian has ever taken that claim seriously. That does not prevent the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum from presenting it to an unsuspecting audience, though. Unfortunately, most people just accept whatever the government, media, or religion tell them to believe.

So, what was necessary for the Americans, who had liberated Paris several months earlier, to create that footage? First of all, they must have had a plan. Then, they must have had at their disposal the necessary hardware to create the film set: pipes, smoke-generating devices, and some workers able to install that hardware and to create a cement wall with handprints.

In contrast to that utterly unknown Gestapo torture chamber in Paris, Dachau was one of the best-known German concentration camps. It was the first one to be opened right after the Nazis came to power. When the Americans finally moved in in April 1945, this camp had dominated the fantasy of Nazi opponents for more than a decade. So, did the American psychological warfare executives have a plan? You bet they did! And did they come with hardware and workers to put that plan into action? If they did it in Paris in January 1945, they surely were even more likely to pull it off at Dachau, which was a much more promising propaganda stage.

So, let me ask again: why are these fanciful pipes in Dachau so impressive and even intimidating, but at the same time so completely useless and pointless?

Before we jump to conclusions, let's look at some wartime documents. First, there are the two photos shown earlier taken some time in 1944. On both, we can see the ventilation chimney that's part of the gas chamber's aeration system. So at least that exhaust chimney was built by the Germans prior to the end of the war. Next, among the few original documents available on that building, there are two blueprints of special interest. This one shows a cross section through the gas chamber. It shows that the ceiling is indeed only some 7 ft high, not 10 ft, as the rest of the building.[24] Next, a section enlargement of this document shows the floor plan of the gas chamber.[25] As we can see, both doors are 90 cm wide and consist either of two doors each, one opening inward, the other outward, or of a swinging door. Either way, such an arrangement would not have been suitable for a gas chamber, as swinging doors could neither be made gas tight nor panic-proof, and in case this layout consisted of two doors, the inner one opening inward could not have been opened if dead bodies were piled up against it inside the chamber. Such an arrangement is actually common for morgues. For instance, the blueprints of the morgue in the old crematorium at Auschwitz show the same type of door design.

Today, this room is equipped with two heavy steel doors of the type that were quite common for air-raid shelters. The doors are one meter wide and set in steel frames. The same doors are shown in the U.S. footage recorded on May 3, 1945, hence just five days after the camp was captured by the Americans. They were therefore most likely built in there long before the Americans arrived. Also, one of the walls actually consists of two layers with a hollow space in between, which is typically used as insulation, something also seen at the above-mentioned Auschwitz morgue.

Hence, it looks like this room was initially meant to serve as a morgue. In fact, the striking feature of this building is that, if we discard the idea that this alleged gas chamber served as a morgue, this building has no other room of a suitable size equipped with a ventilation system.

But if that is so, what about the weird, oversized piping? And what about those heavy doors? And what about the shafts on the outside, evidently added after the building was completed?

And what about the peephole in the rear wall which Capitaine Fribourg described in his report? He even drew a sketch of it. It slanted rather steeply downward, hence it wouldn't have allowed anyone to see anything except for maybe the feet of a few people standing or lying close to that hole.

The hole inside that gas chamber that is said to have been the other end of that peephole can be seen to this day, although it is way higher than what Fribourg reported, who in his sketch placed the peephole below the second little port visible on that wall, close to the floor. Today, neither the peephole's exit nor the switches are visible in the adjoining room. The switch panel and switch box are shown in the footage recorded on May 3, 1945 for the U.S. documentary. But that documentary neither shows nor mentions that peephole. There is, however, a photograph of that area from May 1945 showing not only the switch panel and switch box plus some of the insulated pipes and hand valves, but also a crude opening in the wall just beneath the switch panel. If we compare that image with a still of the footage just shown, we see:

a) that the lid of the switch box to the left has disappeared;

b), and more importantly, the upper, rugged edge of the hole in the photo should also be visible in the still, but it isn't. Therefore, somebody must have hacked that hole in there after the documentary was shot.

Here is how that hole looks on the inside, seen from the gas chamber. It does indeed angle upward. In the background you see bricks and mortar used by the museum to close up that gaping hole in the adjoining room. Inside this tube runs an electric cable put in there when the room was prepared as a museum exhibit.

What we see here is the fact that, since the camp's liberation on April 29, 1945, quite a few people seem to have tampered with the evidence of this suspected crime scene. It's difficult to assess what this hole was really used for. A peephole, however, would have been installed in the doors, as was and is common for air-raid shelter doors, rather than hacked through a thick brick wall, and it most certainly would not have slanted downward.

So, is the Dachau gas chamber a post-war fraud? Considering that the camp was liberated on April 29 and that the gas chamber was inspected by four members of the U.S. Congress only 3 days later, on May 2nd, this seems to be not enough time for a major fraud.

In fact, there is evidence pointing in a different direction. Most importantly, there is a letter in the German Federal Archives by Dr. Sigmund Rascher to Heinrich Himmler dated August 9, 1942, which reads:[26]

"As you know, the same facility as at Linz is being built at the Dachau concentration camp. Since the 'transports of invalids' end up in certain chambers anyway, I ask whether the effect of our various combat gases can be tested on people who are destined for that anyway? So far, all we have are experiments with animals, or reports on accidents during the production of these gases. Because of this paragraph, I am sending my letter marked 'Secret.'"

Dr. Rascher was the infamous doctor who conducted medical experiments on inmates at Dachau, which were among the crimes prosecuted by the American occupational powers after the war in the famous "Medical Case" of the Nuremberg Trials of War Criminals. While there was plenty of evidence for a variety of experiments on human guinea pigs such as exposure to low air pressure and extended submersion in cold water, tests of combat gases at Dachau were not among the charges. There was simply too little evidence to make that case.

We may speculate that Dr. Rascher had indeed tried to re-rig the morgue of Barrack X for the potential testing of combat gases, with those shafts perhaps simply serving as air-intake shafts for a better ventilation, since the room had no windows. But since Dr. Rascher was arrested by the German police in April 1944 and eventually executed for a number of crimes, child abduction and murder among them, that project, if it ever existed, ended up being abandoned at that point at the latest. When the Americans arrived a year later, the room was nothing more than a morgue, filled with the victims of diseases and malnutrition, which could not be cremated due to the lack of fuel.

For the time being, any answer to the question what these strange objects were meant for remains speculation to a large degree, because almost the entire original paperwork regarding the planning and construction of that building – cost estimates, progress reports, blueprints, invoices etc. – have disappeared from the Dachau camp archives. Only a few, not very informative documents are left, such as the ones we just saw plus a few others. So, either the Nazis destroyed them because they had something to hide, or the Americans confiscated and/or destroyed them, because they wanted to prevent anyone from figuring out what that room really looked like and was used for.

At Dachau, imagery of a gas chamber disguised as a shower room was driven into our minds.

Dachau is where the world came to believe the rumors and saw what we believed to be evidence of well-engineered German machinery, capable of gassing with precision and efficiency.

So, if that gas chamber wasn't what we are told, or at least wasn't used at all for mass executions, why were there massive amounts of clothes hanging in its vicinity when the Americans arrived?

“Hanging in orderly rows were the clothes of prisoners, who had been suffocated in a lethal gas chamber. They have been persuaded to remove their clothing under the pretext of taking a shower for which towels and soap were provided.”

Actually, these are clothes airing outside the Dachau disinfestation chambers. The narrator merely claims that this is the clothing of homicidal gas chamber victims. Then they deceptively cut to the shower room door, making the viewer believe they are the same door; the one with the obvious written gas warnings on it and the supposed gas chamber, disguised as a shower room, designed to trick those entering.

The hoaxers showed film of these disinfestation gas chambers for fumigating clothing, located at the end of the building. They claimed these doors, clearly marked with warning signs and skull and crossbones, were used to gas prisoners.

This is where the disinfestation chambers are and the doors clearly marked with warnings. But the “shower room,” the alleged gas chamber, is located a few rooms away. The deception was to trick the average viewer into thinking, the clearly marked delousing chamber door with skull and crossbones located at the end of the building was the same as the shower room door. This dirty deception continues to this day.

For example, take this 2012 documentary on Dachau by filmmaker Levi Mierau. After showing the gas chamber and describing how it allegedly worked, he, too, deceptively cuts to the disinfestation chamber while continuing his narration about homicidal gassing. Watch it:[\[27\]](#)

“A door labeled shower bath went into a large room, which is meant to deceive, since the room was not actually a shower room but a gas chamber. The room consisted of outlets in the walls, floor and roof.”

Stooooop! Outlets in the floor and roof? These showerheads weren't an outlet for anything, and those six drains in the floor are actually real drains, which indicates that the room was originally designed to handle a lot of water, not gas.

Fast forward a few seconds, we have this footage:[\[28\]](#)

“Rocks with poison gas pellets named Zyklon B could be inserted from the outside. Since the gas chambers were only built during the camp’s last months, only seven were killed in the gas chambers used as test subjects.”

So, while showing the disinfestation chambers, Levi deceptively talks about gas chambers, in the plural, used to kill seven people.

The same kind of deception is committed by the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum on its website (capitalization added):

“View of THE door of THE gas chamber in Dachau.”[29]

“An American soldier stands outside of THE gas chamber in Dachau”[30]

“View of THE door to THE gas chamber at Dachau next to a large pile of uniforms.”[31]

“THE door to THE gas chamber in Dachau. It is marked ‘showerbath.’”[32]

“View of THE door to THE gas chamber in the Dachau concentrations camp. A sign above it identifies it as a shower.”[33]

The US Holocaust Museum uses the singular “the” to imply, both of these doors were the same door of the same homicidal gas chamber, disguised as a shower room.

They show the outside of the clothing fumigation chamber doors, located at the end of the building, then show the inside of the shower room door, located all the way over here. There are four disinfestation chambers, not one.

But they chose photographs which show one door and used the singular “the” and mix it with images of the shower room. You can see the disinfestation chambers had warnings not to enter and marks designating when clothing fumigations started and when it was safe to open the doors again.

Here they refer to this as “a” gas chamber,<sup>[34]</sup> of course ignoring that it was one of the four used to delouse clothing.

The photograph’s caption reveals the early propaganda lies, still perpetrated today.

“Gas Room – People were hung up in here”

These hooks were not used to hang people in gas chambers. They were just hooks for clothing, of course.

“View of the hooks outside the door to the gas chambers in Buchenwald.”<sup>[35]</sup>

First, this isn’t even Buchenwald. This is a photo of a Dachau delousing chamber.

The original caption reads:

“Buchenwald was the home of Ilse Koch, wife of the commandant. She was known as the ‘bitch of Buchenwald,’ an insult to every dog who ever lived. She had her inmates tattooed in various designs, then had them killed, then skinned and their hides tanned to make book bindings, lamp shades, and other articles. I saw these things! One story has it that she enjoyed sexual intercourse with her victims – this may be apocryphal. These ‘meat hooks’ were used on the bodies of humans!”

Just about every claim in this miscaptioned photo is false. This example illuminates the typical hysterical propaganda common at the time and still repeated today by a government-funded institution. In reality, these alleged “meat hooks” are just hangers for clothes to air out after passing through the fumigation chambers.

This complex machinery sure looked like it would be something we’d expect in German-designed death chambers. But because this equipment could NOT be used to introduce Zyklon-B fumes into the chamber, today we are told the Germans instead just dumped the pesticide pellets onto the room’s floor through these vents in the outside wall. This is quite odd, because the disinfestation chambers right down the hall actually did have advanced specially designed mechanisms to properly heat and circulate cyanide gas from the Zyklon B pesticide pellets.

This was called the DEGESCH circulatory device made by the manufacturer of Zyklon B.<sup>[36]</sup> A member of a clothing fumigation crew would put a can of Zyklon B into the holder. A built-in can opener operated from the outside with a crank would open the can. The pellets would drop down a chute into a basket where hot air would be blown through to speed the release of cyanide gas from the pellets. The pesticide would be spread throughout the clothing fumigation chamber, and when finished, the gas would be removed from the chamber and fresh air blown in.

One should be very skeptical upon learning that today the official story is that the Germans, rather than using something like this specially designed device used in the clothing delousing chambers right down the hall, simply poured Zyklon B pellets through holes in the wall. Such a procedure would have been very detrimental, because once those pellets were inside the room, they could not have been removed, unless the room had been cleared of all the corpses. Since Zyklon B releases its poison for an hour or more, depending on temperature and humidity,[37] this means that any effort to swiftly ventilate the room after an execution would have been in vain.

Hence, these shafts, if they were added during the war within the framework of Dr. Rascher's testing frenzy, may simply have been designed to assist the ventilation of that room.

Anyway, this is not exactly the advanced German engineering we are constantly propagandized with, is it?

In the face of overwhelming evidence that this room was never used to gas anyone, mainstream historians now claim that the inmates employed to build this gas chamber managed to sabotage its completion by dawdling on the job for some three years, or so we read in the original French edition of Paul Berben's "official history" of the camp, quote:[38]

"The Dachau gas chamber, however, never functioned because to a certain extent, it seems, of sabotage carried out by the team of prisoners given the job to build it."

So, the narration of the Nuremberg trial evidence film "Nazi Concentration Camps" was completely wrong. This clothing did not belong to inmates suffocated in the gas chamber. This was just clothing which passed through the real gas chambers for delousing clothes and was airing out.

This deceptive narration of the Dachau segment is an important part of the falsehoods in the Nuremberg trials film evidence center piece.

This bizarre practice of calling shower rooms gas chambers continues to this day. We can see on the website of Israel's Holocaust Museum "Yad Vashem" a photograph of the actual inmate shower room at the Dachau Camp captioned

"A gas chamber after the liberation."[39]

This is just another real shower.

"Flossenbürg, Germany, Gas chambers, which were called showers."[40]

This claim is repeated on the "HistoryWiz" web site "The Final Solution". The photograph is captioned:[41]

"The final destination for those who could not work, the gas chamber – here, the gas chamber at Flossenbürg."

The hoaxers pulled the same old trick angle in the camera to block out the many windows of this real working shower room. The top official authorities today concede this room was a real shower, never used to gas anyone. Moreover, no mainstream historian has ever claimed that there was a homicidal gas chamber at the Flossenbürg Camp.

This doesn't stop Israel's Holocaust Museum and others from spreading gas shower nonsense. The "HistoryWiz" website presents an important quote

"To be ignorant of history is to remain always a child. – Cicero"

That certainly holds true for those who childishly and ignorantly believe showers were gas chambers.

A major reason we believed in the stories of the showers of death is the terrible images of corpses taken at the end of the war. But those horrific images of emaciated and dead prisoners are not proof of an extermination program.

"This special presentation of the Oprah Winfrey Show is brought to you with limited commercial interruption. It is supported in part by the new AT&T, committed to education.

I am here in Poland at the Auschwitz death camp, where it is estimated that 1.1 to 1.5 million people perished here in the Holocaust."

At an early age, you were probably already exposed to a program like this.<sup>[42]</sup> Documentaries such as this one are specifically aimed at young people. You can even see this copy was taken from a website called "School Tube". Videos like this shock their audience by showing atrocious imagery which, if it were fiction, would be rated unsuitable for children.

"That evil has a name: The Holocaust. A systematic mass murder meticulously planned and executed by Nazi Germany that brutally wiped millions of people off the face of the earth. More than six million of those human beings were Jewish."

But since this imagery is real, it is not rated unsuitable for children, although it is even more traumatizing exactly because it is real. However, hardly anyone, let alone a child, has the ability or experience to analyze the context of this imagery. This horrific film footage of emaciated corpses is presented with no context other than the claim that they are proof of a systematic extermination policy.

"The Holocaust. A systematic mass murder meticulously planned and executed..."

These images, however, were taken at the very end of the war. Mainstream historians claim, however, that any extermination activity had ceased in those camps in October of 1944 at the latest, based on an affidavit by German SS officer Kurt Becher, in which he quoted an order allegedly issued by Himmler in September of 1944 as follows:[43]

"I prohibit any annihilation of Jews with immediate effect, and on the contrary order the nursing of weak and sick persons. I hold you (with this, Kaltenbrunner and Pohl were meant) personally responsible for this, even if this order is not strictly followed by subordinate departments."

Both Kaltenbrunner and Pohl were top officials of the concentration camp system. No trace of that Himmler order has ever been found, but that's beside the point I want to make here. When we look at what was really going on in those camps, we are in for a surprise. Here is a chart showing the number of inmate deaths at Dachau as recorded first by the German authorities and then by the Americans. It clearly shows that mortality exploded at a time when Hitler's extermination policy is said to have been abandoned. The same happened at the Bergen-Belsen Camp, where mortality exploded only in early 1945, as can be seen from this chart exhibited today at the Bergen-Belsen museum.

The reason for that was severe overcrowding combined with the disastrous collapse of food and water supplies as well as medical care and hygienic measures, which taken together caused malnutrition, starvation, and fatal diseases such as typhus and dysentery to spread out of control.

In those months, the Allies bombed Germany's entire infrastructure to smithereens, including the supply lines into the camps. Shipments of medicine, sanitation supplies and food into the camps, power plants and water treatment plants were systematically bombed, and in some cases, they even bombed the actual camps. Not only Jewish concentration camp prisoners struggled and perished during the final months of World War II. For months upon months, the German civilian population was the target of an unprecedented fire-bombing campaign by the western Allies. From Hamburg to Dresden, tens of thousands of innocent German civilians were deliberately targeted and murdered. Women and children were burned alive, and terrified families suffocated from poison gas in bomb shelters. They don't ever show you these pictures, do they? You should ask why, though.

Anyway, many Germans who survived became refugees running for their lives, and also struggled to feed themselves.

In the east, German civilian populations were also fleeing the invading Soviet army which was torturing and murdering civilians en masse. The Red Army raped untold numbers of German women from young children to the elderly.

Using these horrific images, the catastrophic last days of a collapsing Germany surrounded on all sides and bombed to smithereens, as proof of deliberate extermination camps is the dirty trick that is the main reason people believe in the Holocaust.

It's why many react strongly against those critically investigating mainstream Holocaust claims. After all, we all saw the bodies, right? These images were taken in camps liberated by the western Allies, primarily Dachau, liberated by the Americans, and Bergen-Belsen, liberated by the British – camps which are today admitted, even by mainstream historians, not to have served as extermination or death camps.

Today, all of the so-called death camps or extermination camps are claimed to have been in Polish territories conquered by the Soviet Union.

Early witnesses originally claimed these western-liberated camps also had homicidal gas chambers, disguised as shower rooms. However, British and American doctors performed thousands of autopsies on some of the corpses the Allies discovered in those camps.

Russell Barton, an English medical student who had spent a month in Belsen after the camp's liberation and had investigated the reasons for the camp's disastrous conditions toward the end of the war, stated, quote:[44]

“German medical officers told me that it had been increasingly difficult to transport food to the camp for some months. Anything that moved on the autobahns was likely to be bombed. [...]

I was surprised to find records, going back for two or three years, of large quantities of food cooked daily for distribution. I became convinced, contrary to popular opinion, that there had never been a policy of deliberate starvation. This was confirmed by the large numbers of well-fed inmates. [...] The major reasons for the state of Belsen were disease, gross overcrowding by central authority, lack of law and order within the huts, and inadequate supplies of food, water and drugs.”

Here is an interview Dr. Barton gave to the late Ernst Zündel some ten years after this article had been published:[45]

“You were on the scene in Belsen as a young man.”

“Yes. I went with a group of medical students. We arrived in Belsen on May the second 1945, and I first went to the camp on May the third. Himmler ordered the camp to be ceded on April 11th in order to stop typhus, which was an epidemic spreading throughout Europe. The British came in; a tank division came in on April the fifteenth at three o’clock, and they did their best to segregate the typhus[-infected] and the dying from the other.”

“How many people were in the camp at the time when the British took over the camp?”

“I think there were about fifty-seven or sixty thousand. The British bombed everything, and the Americans, that moved on the roads. So getting food there was extremely difficult. The water supplies became contaminated with sewage, and the administration in the camp more or less broke down. The distribution of food in the individual huts was left to the inmates, and the inmates, we found out – we were fooled at first, but this was after May, after I got there. The inmates... one particular group was in control; they would take what they wanted and then leave whatever food there was left to the rest of the hut. So that meant, perhaps ten powerful people would gobble everything, and three hundred and fifty would have whatever was left. There were, I'd say, all nationalities, mainly Polish and Russian. Most of them were Jewish."

"Were there men and women?"

"Yes, there were men and women, and children."

"And were they segregated?"

"Segregated."

"Segregated camps. And that was still segregated when you got there?"

"Yes."

"Even, let's say, if the German camp administration had made maximum effort, and had been given everything at hand, could they have prevented this?"

"There was no cure for typhus at that time. The British put DDT, which is an insecticide, over everything and everybody, and in that way, I think, the typhus was contained. But it was a great danger. People don't realize it was typhus. It was... I supposed 50, 60 percent of the people died of typhus."

"Why are these bodies naked? I mean, some of them are so emaciated. Why don't they have their clothing on?"

"Well, they did. When they were pushed outside the huts, they had clothing on. But clothing was so scarce – everything was scarce – that the inmates would immediately rush out and take all the clothing off, because it was a pity to waste it. That's why they were naked."

"Did you see, when you got there two weeks after the British army took over, any evidence of gas chambers, the way propaganda has said that the Germans had in these camps? Or was there any claim made to that effect?"

"No. I don't think it was ever thought there was a gas chamber in Belsen-Bergen. People were dying at 500 a day, by the way, a rate of 500 a day."

"Even under British administration..."

"Under British administration, yes. And what was happening mostly, the English soldiers were giving people their food, people half starved, had very thin stomachs. The stomachs would burst, and they'd die. The inmates said that the conditions there, this is what inmates said, that conditions weren't too bad until the end of '44. And then this mass immigration... But by the time they put in another 50,000, fully 50,000, of course..."

"Were you there during the time when the bulldozers were actually putting these bodies in the graves, in these long trenches that we've seen?"

"The bulldozers... the bodies were being thrown in. They would put... a truck went around every day and picked up the bodies outside the hut, and then they would take them to where the bulldozer had dug the grave, and they would throw them into the grave."

"You are a man born in England. You published this article, I believe, for an English publication. And the London Times picked up on what you have published here?"

"That's right. This was published in November 1968. I was asked to write it. I was solicited. I had no intention of so doing."

"Nobody ever interviewed you from any German magazines or papers?"

"Oh no. No, no."

"To this day?"

"Not to this day."

"Did anybody ever, officially from Germany, come and contact you for a kind of historical documentation, of the [???German Federal] archives in Koblenz and places like that?"

"No."

"No. Never?"

"Never."

Similar to this is the account given by Dr. Charles Larson, a U.S. forensic pathologist working for the U.S. Army's Judge Advocate General. Right after the war, Dr. Larson performed autopsies on hundreds of victims in some twenty former concentration camps. In 1980, a newspaper article appeared reporting about his wartime experience. We read there:[\[46\]](#)

"Larson has talked little publicly about the war experience. One reason for his silence has been that his autopsy findings conflicted with the widely held belief that most Jews in Nazi camps were exterminated by gassing, shooting or poisoning.

'What we've heard is that 6 million Jews were exterminated. Part of that is a hoax,' Larson said. [...]

Never was a case of poisoning uncovered, he said."

Larson's biographer wrote the following about this episode, quote:[47]

"In one grave the bulldozers uncovered an estimated 2,000 bodies, many of which were subjected to autopsy examination by Major Larson. All of those autopsied had died of various conditions such as emaciation with starvation, tuberculosis, typhus or other infectious diseases.

For the next ten days, many nights with only an hour or two of restless sleep, Larson worked among the dead. He performed about 25 autopsies a day and superficially examined another 300 to 1,000 bodies. He autopsied only those bodies that appeared to have died questionably. 'Many of them died of typhus,' Dr. Larson told me recently.

At Dachau Larson's work – the profile of the prisoner population that his autopsies projected – indicated that only a small percentage of the deaths were due to medical experimentation on humans. It indicated that most of the victims died from so-called 'natural causes' at the time; that is, of disease brought on by malnutrition and filth which are the handmaidens of war."

Today, these particular camps are admitted not to have had homicidal gas chambers at all. So, none of the corpses seen in these images were gassed. What you see in these images are prisoners who died from disease as well as a lack of appropriate food, water and medical supplies.

A large part of their condition was due to the Allies bombing supply lines to the camps.

Allied fighter planes even bombed and strafed trainloads full of prisoners as they were being evacuated to different camps. Those prisoners who weren't hit by bullets or bombs were without appropriate supplies for days until arriving at their destination.

The liberation of Dachau concentration camp is dramatized in the film Shutter Island. The Americans liberating Dachau came across what became known as "The Dachau Death Trains". They saw bullet holes in the sides of the trains and dead prisoners inside in terrible condition, believing the Germans locked starved prisoners inside the trains, then machine gunned them, the Americans turned their fury to the capture of German guards.

"The guards surrendered, we took their guns, and we lined them up. It wasn't warfare, it was, it was murder!"

Many of the German guards who surrendered the camp had only recently been transferred to the camp in the final days of the war. Some were just teenagers from surrounding towns. Ironically, this young German guard even looks like the young DiCaprio. This young German was not a deliberate holocauster of Jews or anyone else but a young man tragically swept into the final days of the most brutal war in the history of mankind. The German soldiers surrendered, and with their hands up, the Americans shot dozens of captured unarmed German guards. And it didn't happen in the heat of the moment either, as this movie suggests. In fact, the Americans actually brought the guards to the camp's coal yard, got a heavy machine gun from their vehicle and brought it into position, and they had their army photographers take pictures of the event, as this photo and others prove. It was a war crime. The Americans played judge, jury and executioner. They even dragged German soldiers from a nearby hospital and shot them, even though they had nothing to do with the camp at all, let alone the death trains. Here is the testimony of one of the Americans involved in this murder:[48]

"I was not prepared for what I saw in Dachau. Nothing could prepare you for that. Nothing could prepare you for that type of slaughter that was carried on in that camp. [...]"

I never liked to see people killed unnecessarily, no matter what their stripe is or what they have done. We did kill some people there that I consider unnecessarily. However, given the circumstances, while I am sorry about it, it was just one of those things that no one could control. Actually, the people that we killed died a much easier death than the people that they tortured and killed as we subsequently found out. Torture and hangings and executions in various manners was a daily occurrence. So, in a way, we were kinder to them than they were to the people that they murdered."

The only problem is that the people he helped to kill were not those who had run the camp for many years.

But evidence has come to light that the Germans did not lock prisoners inside the trains and machine gun them.

The bullets which tore through the trains full of prisoners were not German bullets but in fact the result of Allied war planes strafing the trains.

Here is a Jewish former prisoner talking about the Allies bombing and shooting his train, killing prisoners on the way to Dachau, explaining their condition:

"I was ordered to go march out to the railroad station back into the cattle cars, but this time they had open wagons and regular cattle cars. But the only difference it was that the railroad tracks, on one track, the Nazis were retreating with the heavy artillery, ammunition and all their hardware. In another track the concentration camp inmates in the train load. The Nazis were hoping maybe because we are there they will not be bombed."

It would have been a short trip, but it took us almost three days to get to Dachau. What had happened, we got hit by air raid. They bombed the both of the tracks, they machine gunned our train. And in the train were I was sitting – this time it wasn't so loaded – we were all squatting down. Both of the fellows beside me got hit by machine gun fire. And I just, days... by then the guards were gone. We opened the railroad car and stumbled out of the car and walked into the woods in nearby, and hid there. Remember going out on the fields and dug off some potatoes for food. But they came back next morning or a day later with dogs, gathered us together and ordered us back to the railroad cars. They never removed the bodies. This is how we arrived to Dachau.”

This Jew's train was bombed and shot by Allied planes. The prisoners the Allies killed were left inside the train. Prisoners who weren't blown up or shot by the Allies suffered further malnutrition, in part due to the bombing of train tracks, delaying their journey.

The Allies were directly responsible for killing many on these death trains. Bullets from Allied air planes tore through the bodies of those prisoners shortly before the American infantry arrived at Dachau. American infantry, ignorant of the role of Allied bombing and strafing runs contributing to the deaths of the prisoners inside the death trains, put the blame on the Germans.

They lined the unarmed, surrendered German guards against a wall and executed them, committing a war crime, which has gone unpunished to this day. Misunderstandings, propaganda, falsehoods, blind patriotism, mistakes, rushing to judgement. How else could millions be driven to killing their own people, themselves essentially?

“It wasn't warfare, it was murder.”

The Allies also directly bombed concentration camp prisoners, and today we are told this is proof of a German planned Holocaust.

This is another segment from the American propaganda film “Nazi Concentration Camps” which was shown at the Nuremberg Trials.

“The slave-labor camp at Nordhausen liberated by the Third Armored Division, First Army. At least three thousand political prisoners died here at the brutal hands of SS troops and hardened German criminals who were the camp guards. Nordhausen had been a depository for slaves found unfit for work in the underground V-bomb plants and in other German camps and factories.”

A deceptively captioned image of Nordhausen appears in Steven Spielberg’s The Last Days companion book. We see American soldiers walking past corpses strewn on the ground. The caption reads:

“The horrific scene of mass annihilation within the Nordhausen concentration camp.”

Let’s look closer at the photograph. We can see the buildings have been bombed. Testimony of former prisoners shows they were lucky to survive Allied bombing attacks.

This Jewish former prisoner and doctor describes prisoners laying in the camp hospital sick of tuberculosis in the final days of the war.

“And there I had over 4 thousand prisoners laying on tuberculosis. Sick. What are you doing? It’s tuberculosis. No medications, nothing, hardly food, it was very meager already. The Germans didn’t have to eat.”

This former prisoner and doctor described conditions in the camp in the final days of the war. Sick prisoners didn’t have enough supplies. However, he points out the Germans themselves also didn’t have enough even to eat. Clearly, the Germans could have killed the sick prisoners at any time, yet instead treated them in hospitals.

“And all of the sudden, it was April 3rd at 3 o’clock, alarm, and American air force over us, and dropped the bombs just on our camp. And the whole camp was entirely destroyed. And out of this four thousand people, we were 200 survived. Because they died there. They were in the camps, you know. Hanging in the ceiling, their bodies and... It was awful. It was burning days and days. We were still..., the nurses, the doctors, the administration people, the working administration... we ran away. And the Americans made a mistake because they didn’t know this is a concentration camp. They knew it is a military camp. They emptied the military the month before and in January they put us in, you see. So, they didn’t know. So, they came back at 9 o’clock in the morning and hit the whole city. The whole city they flattened. We ran away in the wood, in the fields, and when they emptied the planes, they came and strafed us with machine guns. They didn’t know who it is. They are Germans, you know. And we went into the woods, and we remained about a week in the woods. And we ate only the raw potatoes.”

British Royal Air Force bombed the camp, full of sick prisoners. They turned around and shot survivors running for their lives. They flattened the nearby town, full of innocent German civilians.

The British are primarily responsible for the scene of, quote, “mass annihilation.” But images of Nordhausen recently bombed and strafed by British planes are still used today as proof of a deliberate German-planned Holocaust.

And it’s important to note that most of those seen in this photograph aren’t even Jews but primarily non-Jewish political prisoners, including Poles, Russians and Jehovah’s Witnesses. These majority non-Jewish victims of Allied bombing at a former labor camp are used to sell a supposed Jewish Holocaust.

The Oprah program deceptively used two shots of the aftermath of the British air raid at Nordhausen.

“More than six millions of those human beings were Jewish.”

This victim of the Allies blowing up and strafing sick prisoners at Nordhausen being carried over rubble was in fact likely not Jewish. So, we're looking at someone who is both not killed by the Germans but by the British and who is likely not a Jew.

Here is another clip of Nordhausen. The prisoners of the camp for seriously ill prisoners were blown up and shot by the British, and were buried in this mass grave. The soldiers standing at the edge are Americans. But we are led to assume they are Germans, standing at attention after a job well done.

“[...] that brutally wiped millions of people off the face of the earth.”

Actually, the British brutally wiped these prisoners off the face of the earth. The Germans put them in a camp with doctors and nurses.

What's incredible is that you were shown these images as proof of an organized, planned, systematic extermination program going according to plan.

“A systematic mass murder meticulously planned and executed ...”

...when in reality, this was the result of the total disorganization and utter chaos of a collapsing Germany which was still being bombed relentlessly into submission.

Rather than do the right thing and accept blame for what could be said is accidental collateral damage based on faulty intelligence, the Allies instead just blamed the Germans. Images of a camp full of sick prisoners bombed and strafed by British planes at Nordhausen are used as proof of a systematic, planned German extermination program. However, every single mostly non-Jewish prisoner in this imagery was killed due to a British bomb or bullet.

The editing of the film “Nazi Concentration Camps” was supervised by Budd Schulberg, born Seymour Schulberg, son of the head of Paramount Studios. Schulberg was Jewish and a member of the communist party USA until 1939.

All of these dead were murdered with British bombs or bullets. Yet no mention is made of that. Schulberg claims they died at the brutal hands of Germans.

“At least 3 thousand political prisoners died here at the brutal hands of SS troops and hardened German criminals who were the camp guards.”

This is a total lie and inversion of history. The final shot of the “Nazi Concentration Camps” film shows footage of a prisoner at Nordhausen who had his head blown off.

A prisoner account describes exactly how this happened and who is responsible:[49]

“THE APRIL 3 BOMBING. The accounts refer first of all to the Tuesday, April 3 bombing: ‘Right from the first blast, I took shelter under the concrete staircase of the Revier. A bomb hit the Block and the staircase was demolished. I ran to the middle of the camp, to a shelter dug right into the ground, where there were already a dozen civilians, women, children, and also an SS man – as green from fear as his uniform – who could only stammer: ‘Schrecklich! Schrecklich!’ (Horrible! Horrible!) And indeed, it was not a pretty sight; corpses every five or six yards, headless or their innards ripped open.”

Today, images of Nordhausen are widely used as proof of a Jewish Holocaust. Why is this particular image so popular? The bodies of those blown up or shot by the British, then pulled out of craters or the rubble of buildings and lined up in ordered rows by the Americans are meant to imply an orderly German method of mass murder. Apparently, they want us to believe the Germans lined all these prisoners up here in neat rows and shot them where they stood. If these dead people were German soldiers, the Brits would pat themselves on the back for a job well done. Instead, the Allies just blamed their bombing and shooting screw up on the Germans. What a horrific scam, pulled right in front of our very eyes. Imagery of tragic deaths which were the direct result of the Allies' actions are cynically exploited to sell a lie.

[Footage showing Historian Stephen Ambrose:]

“Adolf Hitler was pure evil. And he was in command of the most advanced technology and the best-disciplined people and the best-educated people in the world.”

“In the wrong hands, technology helped turn Europe into a slaughter house. This was a war that was also a crime.”

“Eisenhower, when he first encountered concentration camps, was shocked and surprised. He hadn't been told about it. His immediate reaction was, 'This is so horrible that there will inevitably become a revisionist movement some day to say 'this never happened; this is propaganda; this is a figment of wartime imagination,' so he insisted that every GI who could be marched through those camps and he said 'bring your cameras with you.'”

This is a classic quote used to attempt to refute revisionists. Eisenhower said, there would be deniers in the future, so he ordered witnesses march through camps and film them. No one denies these are real bodies. But the false analysis of their cause of death deflecting all blame onto Germans is the propaganda. Every single shot in this news segment was taken at Nordhausen. All of the footage of murdered prisoners in the sick camp at Nordhausen shows prisoners blown up or shot by the British.

This is another example of the propaganda formula: supposed expert, deceptive imagery, plus calling those who question it evil haters. It turns out this master historian was later accused of plagiarism throughout his entire career.<sup>[50]</sup> He even lied about spending hundreds of hours with Eisenhower and meeting with him daily. Official records show he spent five hours on the record with Eisenhower. This is the mentality of these master historians, promoted to the forefront of the monopoly media. There was no plan to turn these prisoners into this condition. This was the result of the catastrophic end to the war. Not everything going perfectly according to an evil plan.

Up until this time these images of a bulldozer dumping naked emaciated corpses into a mass grave at Bergen-Belsen were the most horrifying imagery in the history of film. This film footage was shown to our grandparents' generation on a big screen. It has been shown to you at a young age. What are you to believe? Some programs such as the Oprah presentation lead one to assume this is a German driving this bulldozer, making his quota of gassed Jews for the day, rather than a British soldier pushing epidemic typhus victims into a mass grave.

Until the end of the war, Bergen-Belsen was not a death camp where Germans deliberately starved to death and murdered prisoners. In fact, it was originally designated as a recuperation camp, or Krankenlager, where sick prisoners were sent to improve their health. It wasn't such a terrible place until the final days of the war, and there is evidence to prove it. Rose Kahn, a Hungarian Jew, was transported from Auschwitz to Bergen-Belsen in the summer of 1944. Before Auschwitz was abandoned, and Bergen-Belsen was severely overcrowded, she describes Bergen-Belsen as not such a terrible place.

"So, when we arrived to Bergen-Belsen, and they told us to get out, and the Nazis came with those big, big dogs, with their wolves, and they asked us who cannot walk, is sick, should tell 'em, so they gonna put us on a bus. I was afraid to say it. I couldn't walk, but I didn't say it. And if I would say, would been good, because this was not a bad place. This was not at that time, at that time."

"So in other words it wasn't a trick?"

"No, no."

"They really would have taken you by bus."

"Yes, yes, yes."

"I think you were right, though."

"Yes, but I was so afraid, so my mother and my friends were holding me. We had to walk a few miles, quite a few miles to it. And we arrived there, and we lived in tents and straw, we slept on straw. And we weren't treated badly. No, it wasn't too bad over there. We were given nice meals. What happened? They wanted us strong to send out to work, so they didn't want weak and sick people."

Witnesses such as this help prove that Bergen-Belsen was not a specially designed death camp whatsoever. Before the catastrophic end of the war, prisoners were routinely fed and decently cared for.

The major trick of the Holocaust promotion industry is to show these horrible images of emaciated bodies and make you believe that prisoners were always like this. That the Germans immediately starved them to death, and this deliberate starvation had been going on for years as part of their plan of extermination. However, witnesses such as this and others prove that at times the concentration camps were not so terrible.

"This was not a bad place. This was not at that time."

It was only as Germany was losing the war, surrounded on all sides by a terror bombing campaign from the west and marauding Soviets in the east, that conditions in camps such as Bergen-Belsen deteriorated disastrously.

"And then we stayed there until they started to build barracks for all the other Auschwitz people when Bergen-Belsen became hell."

Bergen-Belsen became hellish at the very end of the war. The major cause of this was the Allied bombing campaign. As the Allies fire-bombed German civilian population centers, burning innocent men, women and children alive and shot at or bombed just about anything that moved on roads or train tracks, even the Germans themselves had trouble finding enough to eat at the time.

[Camp survivors interviewed:]

"...hardly food, it was very meager already. The Germans didn't have to eat."

"Food didn't improve very much because, simple reason, they didn't have very much themselves, so..."

"Did the civilians try to help you at all? Did they trade goods for things?"

"It's as I say, we had almost everything what we wanted, from the soccer teams, from the civilians, from outside civilians."

The spread of deadly diseases and severe overcrowding exacerbated the entire situation. Prisoners from areas in the east which were now being overrun by the Soviets were hastily evacuated west. After days or weeks journey, often on foot, they wound up in these overcrowded camps full of deadly diseases. And because the German infrastructure was being destroyed, this was catastrophic.

In early February 1945, a large transport of Hungarian was admitted to Bergen-Belsen while the disinfection facility was out of order. As a result, typhus broke out and quickly spread beyond control. The hot-air delousing machine sometimes failed to work for several days. The worst killer was typhus. But typhoid fever and dysentery also claimed their lives.

There was a breakdown in order and communication throughout the German system as the Germans were losing the war and fighting for their survival. Trainloads of food were destroyed by Allied planes. At Bergen-Belsen, the final factor which guaranteed mass casualties was in the final weeks of the war: The Allies bombed the power plant which supplied electricity to the facilities that pumped water to the camp.

“Water too had been cut off. And so, the water cart was the most important thing to arrive. There had be no water supply for six days. The Germans pleaded it had been cut.”[51]

The electric plant which powered pumps supplying water to Bergen-Belsen was not cut by some unnamed force. It was blown up by the British. A destroyed system for providing clean water to the camp compounded already disastrous hygiene and medical conditions. Clean water, necessary to shower prisoners, wash clothing and treat dehydrated typhoid fever, dysentery and typhus patients was indeed cut off by British bombs.

“One might ask why all the inmates surviving were not removed out of the camp altogether to a large town, for example, where there would be feeding and housing facilities. The answer is simply the dread word – typhus.

A mobile bacteriological unit and all medical aid possible together with 90 medical students from London hospitals were rushed to the spot to deal with it.

Lack of soap and water brought lice to the inmates, and lice carry typhus. To get rid of typhus, one must first get rid of lice, so contaminated patients were removed from their huts and put through a laundry process.”

The British struggled to remedy disastrous conditions in Bergen-Belsen after liberation. Many thousands died after liberation. In the end, the British burned the wooden barracks, as they became infested with deadly epidemic-typhus-carrying body lice. Images of the disastrous situation at Bergen-Belsen are fraudulently used to portray a deliberate German extermination policy.

These post-liberation images of Bergen-Belsen as well as Dachau and Nordhausen have become symbols of German barbarism. But these people were victims of the larger war, not a deliberate German extermination plan. The Germans did what they could to keep people alive, and in some cases contacted the Red Cross for assistance and even turned over some camps to them. The shameful truth hidden amongst this Holocaust propaganda is that not only were none of these people gassed, but the Allies played a major role in their deaths.

As terrible as these images of emaciated prisoners are, images of union prisoners of the American confederate civil war camp Andersonville show liberated prisoners also appeared in a similar condition. What happened at Andersonville was a complete breakdown in hygiene measures due to inadequate sanitation facilities. Toilets in the overcrowded camp didn't drain properly, exposing prisoners to filth and disease, in particular dysentery. Symptoms of dysentery include diarrhea and rapid weight loss. In extreme cases, patients may pass over a liter of fluid per hour. It's easy to see how someone who is repeatedly defecating, vomiting and urinating would quickly lose body weight, especially if food supplies, medicine and water became scarce.

At Andersonville, as overcrowding increased, so did the death toll. The confederates also lost the war in a catastrophic way much like the Germans. So, there is a direct correlation between the images of Andersonville prisoners and the so-called Holocaust images.

Now, these people at Andersonville aren't Jews, and never has anyone alleged the South aimed for a total genocide of Northerners. The photographs of Andersonville and for instance Bergen-Belsen are quite similar and correlate with the breakdown in hygiene, overcrowding, the spread of disease and one side of the war losing catastrophically. What you see in these images at Bergen-Belsen is primarily the result of typhus.

Typhus is a disease carried by the body louse which is similar to head lice. But body lice prefer to attach themselves not to the scalp but to the inner seams of clothing. Typhus was responsible for the deaths of millions throughout history. Typhus epidemics routinely occurred throughout Europe during war time. During World War I, more than three million people died from typhus.

What you see in these images are primarily typhus epidemic victims. The Germans did not intentionally starve them to death. We can see several people liberated from the camps. Although not in pristine condition, some appear well fed, some even fat. They simply didn't have disease. The Germans in fact tried to stop the spread of disease. The insecticide Zyklon B was a pesticide used to kill these deadly typhus-carrying body lice.

There is nothing inherently murderous about Zyklon B. In fact, Zyklon B was used on the Mexican border to gas the clothing of Mexicans crossing the border. The delousing process went like this:

Prisoners entering a camp would strip their clothing and get a haircut to prevent any areas where deadly typhus-carrying body lice could thrive. Then they would take a hot shower. At the same time, their clothing would be put into specially designed fumigation chambers where fumigation crews would use the insecticide Zyklon B to kill deadly typhus-carrying body lice.

The prisoners would then be given clean, lice-free clothing, and enter the camp. It is easy to see how this life saving delousing process involving real fumigation chambers for clothing and real showers was misconstrued into wartime propaganda about showers of gas by prisoners spreading rumors as well as Soviet propaganda artists deliberately framing their enemies.

One of the final exhibits at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. sums up the importance of the information presented in this video.

Museum visitors are bombarded with film clips taken after the Allies captured concentration and labor camps. These films are meant to represent proof of a deliberate German extermination policy. But you have now seen many of these clips, explained and debunked.

Near the end of the museum's main exhibit two banks of three video monitors flanking a fallen Nazi flag play film footage taken after camps were captured by the Allies.

Each of the three monitors is dedicated to one of the three major Allied powers: the Soviet Union, United States and Great Britain.

On this screen is US Army footage taken at Nordhausen, Dachau and Buchenwald. The caption reads:

"Local German civilians are ordered to tour Buchenwald Concentration Camp."

This is an American army official gathering Germans around the supposed human-skin lamp shade and the table filled with propaganda props. Visitors are shown the Dachau death trains full of victims of Allied bombing and strafing attacks. Majdanek, the outside of a real shower facility, "Bath and Disinfection II," and the inside of "Bath and Disinfection I" showing the real, working shower room. Again, the camera is angled away from the many windows. The caption reads:

“Soviet Army officers inspect chambers where prisoners were killed by poison gas.”

Today, every serious mainstream historian acknowledges this wasn't a gas chamber with fake shower heads, it was a real working shower room designed to keep prisoners alive and free of disease.

Again, the bulldozer pushing epidemic typhus victims into a mass grave at Bergen-Belsen. A disaster, but not deliberate or planned.

On the last television screen, we're shown footage of Nordhausen bombed to smithereens by 500 British warplanes over two days. Much like at the Nuremberg trials, the final shot we are shown before moving on to the exhibit on post-war trials is the victim of British war planes at Nordhausen with his exposed brains.

How sick to show gory imagery of Allied air attack victims as proof of the evilness of Germans.

Mothers rushing their children past this section never question the context of this imagery. This is powerful, trauma-based mind control used to brainwash, not by using logic and facts, but by searing these horror images into a captive audience's mind, and manipulating emotions with mendacious narrations.

Real shower rooms, phony planted evidence like this lamp shade, and victims of Allied bombing are not proof of a genocide using gas chambers, disguised as shower rooms. We were manipulated, misled and lied to.

We were shown images taken during the final days of a destroyed and collapsed Germany as proof of a systematic, planned extermination program. Upon further investigation by the western Allies, these claims of extermination camps equipped with homicidal gas chambers in western-liberated camps have fallen by the wayside.

However, the powerful imagery of these western-liberated, overcrowded, disease-infested camps, devastated due to the Allied bombing campaign in the final months of the worst war in the history of mankind is still used to brainwash the public as proof of an extermination program of gas chambers disguised as shower rooms in camps captured by the Soviet Union.

In Part 2 of this documentary, we will explore some aspects of the most infamous of these camps: Auschwitz.

Disclaimer

This documentary is not meant to whitewash the National Socialist regime of Germany from any of its undisputed wrongdoings. Imprisoning people without proper due process is a crime. Any authority committing such a crime ultimately bears responsibility for those in its custody.

However, this crime was not only committed by the German authorities prior to and during World War II, but during the war also by the U.S. authorities who imprisoned many Japanese Americans as well as Italian and German immigrants. The biggest criminal in this regard, however, was the US's most important ally of the Second World War, the Soviet Union, where millions were imprisoned and ultimately murdered prior to, during and after the war.

Unfortunately, this crime of unlawful incarceration is today again committed by U.S. authorities in Guantanamo Bay and other similar facilities.

Abriss

“Der Holocaust” ist weithin bekannt als die Ermordung von sechs Millionen Juden durch das nationalsozialistische Deutschland, viele davon in Gaskammern, die irreführend als Duschräume getarnt waren.

Wir alle haben die entsetzlichen Bilder von toten Gefangenen gesehen, die nach der Befreiung der Konzentrationslager aufgenommen wurden. Dieser Dokumentarfilm zeigt einige der denkwürdigsten Bilder, die in Lagern wie Dachau, Nordhausen und Bergen-Belsen entstanden sind. Eine genauere Untersuchung dieses Bildmaterials, dem wir alle ausgesetzt waren, enthüllt eine ganz andere Geschichte als die, welche man uns glauben gemacht hat. Überraschenderweise war eine große Anzahl der Leichen, die uns gezeigt wurden, das direkte Ergebnis von alliierten Bomben- und Tieffliegerangriffen und nicht etwa Opfer einer systematisch geplanten Nazi-Vernichtungspolitik.

Prüfung des Holocaust: Das Entsetzen erklärt (Teil 1) präsentiert überraschende Informationen, die ein neues Licht auf das entsetzliche Bildmaterial werfen und es vielen Zuschauern zum ersten Mal ermöglichen, wirklich zu verstehen, was sich am Ende des Krieges in Deutschland zutrug. Eine unvoreingenommene Betrachtung dieser Präsentation wird Sie überraschen und ermuntern, selber Fragen zu stellen.

Prüfung des Holocaust: Das Entsetzen erklärt

Transkript

Dies wurde uns unsere ganzen Leben lang gesagt: Sechs Millionen Juden und viele Nichtjuden wurden von den Nazis ermordet:

[Clips von diversen Filmen:]

“Elf Millionen Menschen starben in den Todeslagern von Nazi-Deutschland. Sechs Millionen waren Juden.”

“Schätzungsweise sechs Millionen Juden wurden während des Zweiten Weltkriegs getötet.”

“Hitler hat sechs Millionen Juden umgebracht”

“Sechs Millionen Juden”

“Sechs Millionen sind gestorben”

“Sechs Millionen Menschen weinen aus dem Grab...”

Der Begriff Holocaust bezieht sich allgemein auf die systematisch geplante und durchgeführte Vernichtung von sechs Millionen Juden durch Nazi-Deutschland während des Zweiten Weltkriegs. Etablierte Historiker sind sich einig, dass von diesen sechs Millionen Juden ungefähr drei Millionen in Gaskammern getötet wurden. Die überwiegende Mehrheit von ihnen, sagen sie, wurden in sechs Vernichtungszentren auf polnischem Gebiet getötet bzw. sie starben dort. Hier ist eine Aufgliederung dieser drei Millionen angeblichen Gaskammeropfer auf diese sechs Lager.

Lager	Jüdische Gaskammeropfer
Auschwitz/Oświęcim	900.000*
Treblinka	900.000
Bełżec	500.000
Sobibór	210.000
Kulmhof/Chelmno	240.000
Lublin-Majdanek	unbekannt (Tausende)*
Gesamt:	2.750.000 + Tausende

* Die Gesamtanzahl der Opfer in diesen Lagern ist höher als die angegebene Zahl aufgrund von Opfern anderer Ursachen (Krankheiten, Erschöpfung, Hinrichtungen usw.)

Diese Daten sind ein Durchschnitt von Zahlen, die auf den Webseiten von zwei der renommiertesten Holocaust-Forschungseinrichtungen gefunden wurden, das US Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. und das Yad Vashem Museum in Jerusalem.[1]

Der Holocaust ist so wichtig, dass sogar die Vereinten Nationen beschlossen, ihm einen eigenen Gedenktag zu widmen. An jedem 27. Januar, als das berüchtigte Lager Auschwitz 1945 von der sowjetischen Roten Armee besetzt wurde, wird die ganze Welt daran erinnert, den Opfern des Holocaust zu gedenken.[2] Im Jahr 2017, anlässlich dieses Internationalen Holocaust-Gedenktages, veröffentlichte das Weiße Haus unter US-Präsident Donald Trump diese Erklärung:[3]

Aber wir wissen, dass in den dunkelsten Stunden der Menschheit das Licht am hellsten leuchtet. Wenn wir uns an diejenigen erinnern, die gestorben sind, sind wir zutiefst dankbar für diejenigen, die ihr Leben riskierten, um die Unschuldigen zu retten.

Im Namen derjenigen, die umkamen, verpflichte ich mich, während meiner Präsidentschaft und meines Lebens alles in meiner Macht Stehende zu tun, um sicherzustellen, dass die Mächte des Bösen nie wieder die Kräfte des Guten besiegen. Gemeinsam werden wir Liebe und Toleranz auf der ganzen Welt verbreiten.”]

Stoppen Sie das Video, falls sie es lesen möchten. Es ist nichts Ungewöhnliches an dieser Erklärung, außer vielleicht die Tatsache, dass Juden darin nicht erwähnt werden. Das löste einige giftige Reaktionen aus, zum Beispiel von Jonathan Greenblatt, dem derzeitigen Chef der jüdischen

Anti-Diffamierungsliga. Er schrieb am selben Tag auf Twitter, dass Trump Juden nicht einmal erwähnt habe,[4] was eine Flut ähnlicher Angriffe auf den US-Präsidenten auslöste, weil er die sechs Millionen jüdischen Opfer des Holocaust nicht ausdrücklich erwähnt hatte.[5] Das Weiße Haus konterte einen Tag später, dass nicht nur Juden im Holocaust gestorben seien, sondern dass auch fünf Millionen Nichtjuden getötet wurden,[6] die ebenso eine gleichartige Erinnerung verdienen, mit Bezug auf einen Artikel, der zwei Jahre zuvor in der Huffington Post erschienen war.[7] Das wiederum löste eine Reihe von Angriffen auf den Präsidenten und auf diesen Artikel von 2015 aus mit der Behauptung, diese Opferzahl von "fünf Millionen Nichtjuden" sei falsch und stark überhöht. Unter diesen Stimmen möchte ich hier die Times of Israel zitieren:[8]

"Dies ist eine Aussage, die regelmäßig in Erklärungen zur Nazizeit auftaucht. Diese Zahl hat jedoch keine wissenschaftliche Grundlage. [...] Die '5 Millionen' [nichtjüdische Holocaustopfer] hat Holocaust-Historiker zum Wahnsinn getrieben, seit Wiesenthal in den 1970er Jahren damit begann, sie zu verbreiten. [...]"

Yehuda Bauer, ein israelischer Holocaust-Forscher [...], sagte, er habe seinen Freund Wiesenthal gewarnt [...] bezüglich der Verbreitung der falschen Behauptung, der Holocaust habe 11 Millionen Opfer gefordert – 6 Millionen Juden und 5 Millionen Nichtjuden.

'Ich sagte zu ihm: Simon, du lügst', erinnerte sich Bauer in einem Interview am Dienstag. 'Er sagte: 'Manchmal muss man das tun, um Ergebnisse für Dinge zu bekommen, die man für wichtig hält.'"

Es machte Schule: [...]

Deborah Lipstadt, Professorin für Holocaust-Studien an der Emory University in Atlanta, schrieb im Jahr 2011 [...] 'diese Nummer ist schlicht ungenau, ja erfunden [...].'

Deborah Lipstadt ging jedoch zu weit, als sie Trump beschuldigte, mit der Leugnung des Holocaust zu flirten.[9]

Hier scheinen wir einen Fall zu haben, wo ein prominenter Jude, der verstorbene Simon Wiesenthal, die Zahl der Holocaust-Opfer für politische Zwecke übertrieben hat.

Aber hat Wiesenthal diese Zahl wirklich erfunden? Und war er der einzige, der Zahlen übertrieben hat?

Während und unmittelbar nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde eine Reihe von Kriegspropagandafilmen gedreht mit der Unterstützung oder sogar unter der Regie der US-Regierung. In diesen Propagandafilmen gibt es viele Hinweise auf Tausende und sogar Millionen von Opfern der nationalsozialistischen Barbarei – in keinem dieser Filme werden jedoch Juden als die primären Opfer eines Holocaust genannt.

Der berüchtigtste unter diesen Propagandafilmen hieß Die Todesmühlen,<sup>[10]</sup> der für ein deutsches Publikum entworfen und diesem auch gezeigt wurde als ein Mittel der schockartigen Umerziehung. Er wurde später auch in einer englischen Ausgabe veröffentlicht: Death Mills.<sup>[11]</sup> Beide Filme erwähnen als Opferzahl der nationalsozialistischen Verfolgung 20 Millionen, ohne Juden ausdrücklich zu erwähnen:<sup>[12]</sup>

In der Tat besteht der Erzähler darauf, die Opfer entstammten

“allen Nationen Europas, allen religiösen Glaubensrichtungen, allen politischen Überzeugungen, von Hitler verurteilt, weil sie antinazistisch waren.”[13]

Dies ist nur das prominenteste Beispiel. Es gibt mehr, die hervorheben, dass Behauptungen zur Opferzahl nationalsozialistischer Verfolgung die sechs Millionen oft überstiegen haben, und dass Juden regelmäßig als nur eine unter vielen Opfergruppen erwähnt wurden.

Dieses Problem ist zudem nicht bloß eine Frage von Journalisten und Propagandisten, die wilde Zahlen erfinden. Im Jahr 2015, in einem Buch über die forensische Untersuchung von Massenmordstätten des Holocaust, schrieb eine britische Archäologin, die mit den führenden Wissenschaftlern auf diesem Gebiet mehrere Jahre zusammengearbeitet hatte:[14]

Sie gibt jedoch keine Quelle für diese Behauptung an. Vielleicht wiederholte sie nur, was sie durch Wiesenthals Mundpropaganda erfahren hatte? Aber ist es wirklich Wiesenthals? Interessanterweise verkündete das gleiche Washingtoner Holocaust-Museum, das dem gerade zitierten Artikel in der Times of Israel zufolge eine Erklärung zu Trumps Text abgab, welche die Zentralität der Judenvernichtung für das Verständnis des Holocaust betonte, in einer Pressemitteilung im Jahre 2013, seine Forschung habe ergeben:

“Der Nazi-Holocaust könnte bis zu 20 Millionen Menschenleben

wobei die 6 Millionen jüdischer Todesopfer im Wesentlichen unverändert blieb.[15]

Dies würde bedeuten, dass im Holocaust 14 Millionen Nichtjuden gestorben sind, nicht bloß fünf.

Ich darf auch darauf hinweisen, dass 20 Millionen nicht die Obergrenze der Opferzahl-Schätzungen ist. Zum Beispiel illustriert ein Artikel vom 21. September 1992 aus Deutschlands renommiertester Tageszeitung, der Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, in sehr nützlicher Weise die Art des Themas, mit dem wir es zu tun haben, und die Probleme, die damit verbunden sind. Der Titel des Artikels lautet: “Spuren des Verbrechens: Schuhe, Schuhe, auch Kinderschuhe.” Es ist der Bericht eines Studenten über seinen Besuch im KZ Stutthof nicht weit von Danzig, im Polen der Nachkriegszeit, das in ein Museum umgewandelt wurde. Der Autor schreibt in seinem vierten Satz, dass er sich nicht vorstellen könne, wie ein Vernichtungslager aussehen könnte, und spricht von:

Wir haben hier also eine Kombination der 20 Millionen Opfer plus sechs Millionen Juden.

Am Ende seines Berichts schreibt der Autor, vor was er sich stehen sah: “vor den Zeugnissen des brutalsten Völkermords, den damals hochmodernen Vernichtungsmaschinen, dem grausamsten Verbrechen der Menschheit.”

Indem sie es so ausdrückte, hat eine der angesehensten Zeitungen der Welt ihre Definition des Holocaust dargelegt. Die Vernichtung von insgesamt 26 Millionen Menschen durch die Nationalsozialisten in hochmodernen Vernichtungsmaschinen ist das grausamste Verbrechen in der Geschichte der Menschheit.

Also, wie viele Opfer waren es nun? Sechs Millionen Juden plus ein paar andere, oder insgesamt elf, oder zwanzig, oder sogar sechsundzwanzig Millionen?

Höchstens eine dieser Zahlen kann stimmen, aber bei all diesen Spekulationen kann es sein, dass sie alle falsch sind. Aber wenn dem so ist, was ist die Wahrheit? Wissen Sie es?

Eines ist sicher: Wir können offenbar nicht alles glauben, was wir über den Holocaust hören, denn die Dinge, die wir hören, widersprechen einander oft.

Fangen wir am Anfang an, mit dem Dokumentarfilm Nazi Konzentrations- und Gefangenenlager, den die Amerikaner während des Internationalen Militärgerichtshofs 1945 in Nürnberg als Beweis für Nazi-Gräueltaten einführten. Psychologisch gesehen war dies eines der beeindruckendsten Beweisstücke, die eingeführt wurden, denn ein Bild sagt mehr als tausend Worte. Hier sind einige Szenen über das Lager Dachau. Dachau war eines der ersten großen Lager, das die Amerikaner gegen Ende des Krieges eroberten:[16]

Was Sie hier wirklich sehen sind keine Gasöffnungen, sondern eingelassene Lampen.

regulieren. Cyanidpulver wurde verwendet, um den tödlichen Rauch zu erzeugen.“

Interessanterweise wurde am 19. August 1961 ein Leserbrief des etablierten deutschen Historikers Martin Broszat in Deutschlands größter Wochenzeitung Die Zeit veröffentlicht, worin es unter anderem hieß:

“Weder in Dachau noch in Bergen-Belsen noch in Buchenwald sind Juden oder andere Häftlinge vergast worden. Die Gaskammer in Dachau wurde nie ganz fertiggestellt und ‘in Betrieb’ genommen.“

Am 24. Januar 1993 schrieb der berühmte Nazijäger Simon Wiesenthal in einem Leserbrief an das US-Militärmagazin Stars and Stripes im gleichen Sinne:

“In Dachau war eine Gaskammer im Bau befindlich, aber sie wurde nie vollendet.“

Zwischen den 1960er und den späten 1990er Jahren hatte das Museum Dachau daher ein Schild in der Dachauer Gaskammer aufgestellt, auf dem es hieß:

“Gaskammer, getarnt als ‘Brausebad’, war nicht in Betrieb“

Heute ist dieses Schild jedoch nicht mehr da. Stattdessen führt ein weniger sichtbarer Text auf einem Schild außerhalb des Raumes aus:

“Gaskammer

Hier befand sich das Zentrum des möglichen Massenmords. Der Raum wurde zur Tarnung als ‘Brausebad’ bezeichnet und mit Duschköpfen ausgestattet, die Attrappen waren. Damit wollte man die Opfer irreführen und verhindern, dass sie sich weigerten, den Raum zu betreten.“

Derzeit gibt das US Holocaust Museum selbst zu:[17]

“Es gibt keine glaubwürdigen Beweise, dass die Gaskammer in Baracke X zur Tötung von Menschen benutzt wurde.“

Baracke X war der offizielle Name für das Krematoriumsgebäude, wo sich dieser unheilvolle Raum befand.

Eines der führenden Bücher etablierter Historikern zur Gaskammerfrage, der 1993 [deutsch: 1983] erschienene Sammelband NS-Massentötungen, führt auf Seite 202 [277] aus:[18]

Und auf Seite 203 [279] lesen wir:

Blaha unterzeichnete am 9. Januar 1946 eine eidesstattliche Erklärung, in der er seine Erfahrungen mit der Dachauer Gaskammer beschrieb. Sie ist auf Deutsch, aber eine englische Übersetzung wurde wie folgt zu Protokoll gegeben während des Nürnberger Tribunals:[19]

“Viele Hinrichtungen durch Gas, Erschiessungen und Injektion fanden im Lager statt. Die Gaskammer wurde im Jahre 1944

vollendet, ich wurde von Dr. Rascher gerufen um die ersten Opfer zu untersuchen. Von den 8 bis 9 Personen die in der Kammer waren, waren drei noch am Leben und die anderen schienen tot zu sein. Ihre Augen waren rot und ihre Gesichter aufgedunst. Viele Gefangene wurden spaeter auf diese Art und Weise getoetet."

Und das ist alles. Wenn Blaha der einzige Zeuge beim Prozess war, der über die Gaskammer aussagte, und wenn er überhaupt keine Erfahrung mit dem Vergasungsverfahren hatte, woher wussten dann die US- Dokumentarfilmer, dass die Opfer

"überredet worden waren, ihre Kleidung auszuziehen unter dem Vorwand zu duschen, wofür Handtücher und Seife zur Verfügung gestellt wurden"?

Nur wenige Tage nach der Befreiung des Lagers Dachau besuchte eine Reihe von US-Kongressabgeordneten das Lager. Hier sind sie in der Gaskammer. Und das sind Aufnahmen aus dem Jahr 2016. Wie Sie sehen können, ist die Decke dieses Raumes ziemlich niedrig. Tatsächlich ist der Raum ungefähr 2,15 Meter oder sieben Fuß hoch. Warum erwähne ich das? Weil eine offizielle US-Kommission untersuchte, was in Dachau passiert war, und in einem Bericht für den US-Kongress vom 15. Mai 1945, zusammengestellt von David Chavez, lesen wir unter anderem, dass in diesem Raum

"die Decke ungefähr 10 Fuß hoch war."<sup>[20]</sup>

Wie kann man sieben Fuß mit zehn Fuß [3 m] verwechseln? Aber das ist noch nicht alles, denn dieser Bericht fährt wie folgt fort:

"Die Gaszufuhr in die Kammer wurde kontrolliert mittels zweier Ventile an einer der Außenwände, und unter den Ventilen befand sich ein kleines verglastes Guckloch, durch das der Betreiber die Opfer sterben sehen konnte. Das Gas wurde durch

Rohre in die Kammer eingelassen, die in perforierten Messingbeschlägen in der Decke enden.“

Die Decke hatte jedoch keine Messingbeschläge, sondern lediglich verzinkte Eisenduschköpfe. Außerdem, wie auf diesem Foto von einer Stelle zu sehen ist, wo ein Duschkopf von den Amerikanern als Beweisstück entfernt worden war, waren dies nur falsche Duschköpfe – oder besser gesagt Gießkannenrosetten – die mit nichts verbunden waren. Schon der Dokumentarfilm, den wir zuvor gesehen haben, sagte, es gab dort

“Ein Handventil, um den Druck zu regulieren.“

Doch gibt es da ein Problem. Zyklon B, das angeblich für den Mord verwendet wurde, war kein unter Druck stehendes Gas, das in Rohre eingeleitet werden konnte. Es bestand aus Gips-Granulat, das mit flüssiger Blausäure getränkt war, dem Wirkstoff in Zyklon B. Wenn solch eine Dose geöffnet wurde, verdunstete ihr Gift langsam.

Zudem wissen wird aus vielen Vergiftungsunfällen mit Blausäure und von Hinrichtungen mit diesem Gift, wie sie während des 20. Jahrhunderts in mehreren US-Staaten durchgeführt wurden, dass die Opfer, die Blaha untersucht haben will, keine Zyklon-B-Opfer gewesen sein können. Solche Opfer haben keine roten Augen. Sie haben keine aufgedunsenen Gesichter. Falls sie überhaupt irgendwelche Symptome zeigen, so ist es eine rosa-rötliche Verfärbung ihrer Haut, so wie hier gezeigt.

Es ist klar, dass die Amerikaner, als sie ihre Dokumentarfilme und Kongressberichte anfertigten, zu vielen voreiligen Schlüssen kamen, wobei sie einander sowie den materiellen Fakten widersprachen. Aber was ist die Wahrheit hier?

Die im amerikanischen Dokumentarfilm gezeigten Rohre sind wirklich beeindruckend. Solche schweren Rohre mit gusseisernen Handventilen werden üblicherweise verwendet, um darin große Mengen chemischer Flüssigkeiten oder Gase unter Druck zu leiten. Die Auslegung dieser Rohre wurde vom französischen Offizier Capitaine Fribourg untersucht, und zwar eine Woche nach der Befreiung des Lagers. Hier ist eine Skizze von ihm, die zeigt, wie die Rohrleitungen funktionierten. Demnach wurde Frischluft durch diese Öffnung angesaugt, welches durch das Dach ragt. Dieses Ansaugrohr wird anschließend durch einen Wärmetauscher geführt, der sich über der Gaskammer im Dachgeschoss des Gebäudes befindet. Hier wird die Luft durch die Warmwasserheizung des Gebäudes erwärmt. Danach wird das jetzt isolierte Rohr in zwei Teile geteilt und aus dem Dachboden in den Raum hinter der Gaskammer geführt, wo beide Rohre in einem Halbkreis geführt werden, von denen jeder mit den gezeigten Handventilen ausgestattet ist. Dann gehen sie zurück in den Dachboden über der Gaskammer, wo Fribourg zeigt, dass die Rohre wieder in das auslaufende Rohr einmünden, was aber überhaupt keinen Sinn ergeben würde, denn dann würde die Luft nirgendwohin gehen. Das ist daher ein Fehler. Ein Bericht des deutschen Architekten Axel Will aus den frühen 2000er Jahren, von dem wir eine Kopie vom Museum Dachau erhielten, beschreibt ausführlich, dass die Ausführung tatsächlich so aussieht. Will schrieb:

Die beiden Rohre werden nach dem Schieber wieder in den Dachraum oberhalb der Gaskammer zurückgeführt und dort zu einem Rohr zusammengefaßt. Dieses Rohr mündet in einen Blechschacht, der nun wiederum im Nebenraum die erwärmte Luft zum Lufteinlaß über dem Boden der Gaskammer führt.

Der Blechschacht ist nicht isoliert. Das wirft Fragen auf. Von der Planungslogik her wäre dieser Schacht der geeignete Ort, dem warmen Luftstrom vor seinem Eintritt in die Gaskammer Substanzen [wie Zyklon B] beizufügen. Die bisherige Überprüfung des Blechschachtes ließ keine Öffnungen für eine solche Manipulation erkennen. Trotzdem deutet die fehlende Isolierung auf diese Möglichkeit hin."

Soweit Architekt Will.

Die Abluftanlage beginnt mit zwei Öffnungen in der Decke. Danach werden die beiden nicht isolierten Abluftrohre zu einem zusammengefasst, und werden zur Wand zum Raum hinter der Gaskammer geführt, wo das Rohr sich wieder in zwei teilt. Dann nach draußen geführt und in einem Halbkreis mit zwei Handventilen, und dann zurück in den Dachboden geführt, wo sie wieder zu einem Rohr zusammengefasst werden, wie auf diesem Foto des Dachbodens dieses Gebäudes zu sehen ist. Dann wird dieses zusammengefasste Rohr in das elektrische Gebläse eingespeist, das den gesamten Vorgang antreibt, hier sichtbar in einem anderen Dachbodenfoto, und von dort in den Abluftkamin, der hier durch das Dach stößt.

Falls diese Gaskammer für den Betrieb mit Zyklon vorgesehen war, wäre es geschickt gewesen, wie Architekt Will richtig nahegelegt hat, den Blechschacht, der die Wand des angrenzenden Raumes hinunterlief, mit einer Klappe auszustatten – hier mit blauen Linien angedeutet – damit Zyklon B in eine Art Korb im Schacht hinzugefügt werden konnte, hier angedeutet mit dem roten Geflecht. Auf diese Weise hätte der konstante Strom warmer Luft das Giftgas schnell verdampft und flugs im Raum verteilt. Wie Architekt Will in seinem Bericht aber richtig bemerkte, gibt es von einer entsprechenden Vorrichtung keine Spur.

Demnach wurde das Gift weder durch die falschen Duschköpfe verabreicht, wie der Kongressbericht behauptete, noch durch das Lüftungssystem, wie es der US-Dokumentarfilm nahelegte, der während des Nürnberger Tribunals gezeigt wurde. Aber wie hätte es sonst noch gemacht werden können? Hier ist die Geschichte, wie man sie uns heute erzählt:

Hier sind einige Fotos dieser Schächte von innen und von außen. Demnach diente das gesamte ausgeklügelte Lüftungssystem keinem anderen Zweck, als Luft zu bewegen. Warum war es dann so kompliziert? Das ergibt überhaupt keinen Sinn! Es wäre viel einfacher gewesen, die erwärmte Luft einfach direkt in den in die Kammer eintretenden Schacht zu führen, wie hier gezeigt, und die Abluftrohre direkt in das Gebläse zu führen, und die Gebläsegeschwindigkeit zu nutzen, um die erwünschte Luftfördermenge anzupassen. Dieses gesamte Belüftungssystem scheint vorerst ein unsinniges Geheimnis zu sein.

Es jedoch ist nicht das einzige. Tatsache ist, dass weder der Kongressbericht noch der Nachkriegsdokumentarfilm diese Zyklon-B-Schächte erwähnt. Tatsächlich hatte David Chavez, der Hauptautor des Kongressberichts, eine frühere Version dieses Berichts zusammengestellt, die nicht eingereicht wurde. Es heißt dort:[23]

Dieser Holzschuppen, der sich direkt außerhalb der angeblichen Gaskammer befand, kann auf vielen Fotos und Filmaufnahmen gesehen werden, die gleich nach der Befreiung gemacht wurden. Er befand sich dort, wo heute die beiden Zyklon-B-Schächte sind. Aber laut Chavez enthielt er keine Schächte, sondern irgendeine nicht eindeutig identifizierte Ausrüstung.

Der französische Offizier Capitaine Fribourg beschrieb die Anlage am 25. Mai 1945, wie er sie am 5. Mai 1945 gesehen haben will, also eine Woche nach der Eroberung des Lagers durch die Amerikaner, und auch er erwähnte den Holzschuppen wie folgt:

“Direkt neben dem Duschraum, neben dem Gebäude, ist eine etwa 2 Meter hohe Palisade von 2 m Breite. Man konnte nicht hineingehen wegen des Vorhandenseins eines Haufens verwesender Leichen, die gegen die Palisade aufgestapelt sind.”

und

“Hinter der Palisade soll eine Kompressorgruppe bestanden haben oder bestehen (?).”

Er beschrieb auch zwei Schächte in der Wand, die von außen von diesem Schuppen vorgeborgen waren, wie folgt:

“Etwa 75 cm über dem Boden verbinden zwei Trichter den Duschraum mit der Außenseite (Palisadenseite). Jeder Trichter endet innen mit einem Rost und außen mit einem beweglichen Verschlusssystem.”

Das sehen wir auch heute noch dort. Fribourg hat sogar diese Trichter in eine seiner Skizzen aufgenommen.

Wenn man heute an dieser Stelle die Außenseite dieser Mauer betrachtet, sieht man diese merkwürdigen Strukturen. Dies könnte der Stromanschluss für das in diesem Schuppen betriebene Gerät gewesen sein.

Sieht man sich die Zyklon-B-Schächte genauer an, so erkennt man, dass der Mörtel um sie herum nicht original ist. Der ursprüngliche Mörtel, der zum Bau der Baracke X verwendet wurde, enthält grobkörnigen Splitt statt Sand, während der Mörtel, der um die Zyklon-B-Schächte herum verwendet wurde sowie bei späteren Reparaturen und Ausbesserungen, wie wir sie hier sehen können, aus Mörtel mit feinem Sand bestehen. Hier sieht man sogar, wie ein Teil des neuen Mörtels über den alten Mörtel geflossen ist.

Auf der Innenseite ist es offensichtlich, dass die Fliesen um diese Schächte herum beschädigt wurden. Tatsächlich zeigt sich ein einfacher Test mit dem Fingernagel, dass diese rauen Oberflächen nicht einmal Fliesen sind. Sie bestehen aus Verputz und ähneln den Fliesen um sie herum.

Mit anderen Worten, diese Schächte sind nicht Teil des ursprünglichen Gebäudes. Sie wurden später hinzugefügt, indem Löcher durch die vorhandene Wand gehackt wurden.

Wer hat das geändert, und wann wurde es gemacht? Chavez erwähnte sie nicht, und auch nicht der US-Dokumentarfilm über Dachau vom 3. Mai. Fribourg sah sie zwei Tage später, aber er behauptete nicht, dass sie benutzt wurden, um Zyklon B einzuwerfen. Das wäre ohnehin keine gute Idee gewesen, weil eine große Menge des Gips-Granulats an dem Gitter auf der Innenseite stecken geblieben wäre. Aber wozu dienten diese Schächte? Oder ist dies eine Nachkriegsfälschung?

Und wenn das so ist, was ist sonst noch gefälscht?

Hier ist ein Hinweis. Diese Aufnahme wurde am 25. Oktober 2017 gemacht, und zwar von der Website des United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. Sucht man deren Videoarchiv nach dem Begriff "Gaskammer" ab, so ist dieses Video das erste Ergebnis. Es trägt den Titel "Exhumierung; Inspektion von Gaskammern; Lt. Hodges."

Dies sind Aufnahmen, angefertigt nach der Befreiung von Paris, von einer angeblichen Folterkammer der Gestapo in der Nähe des Eiffelturms. In der Beschreibung lesen wir:

Und

Hier sind diese ominösen Rohre. Sie sehen recht schief aus, sind aber nicht sehr funktionell. Vor allem wären sie in Reichweite der Opfer gewesen und hätte nicht sehr lange überlebt, weil sie sehr schnell abgerissen worden wären. Man beachte zudem all diese Fenster, die diesen Raum erhellen. Wie lange würden diese Fensterscheiben bestanden haben, wenn die Opfer drinnen alles verwüsteten und versuchten auszubrechen?

Für dieses Filmmaterial pumpten sie sogar etwas harmlosen, aber dramatisch aussehenden Rauch durch die Rohre.

Hier sind die Handabdrücke im Zement, angeblich von Vergasungsopfern während ihres Todeskampfes geschaffen. Freilich kann man Handabdrücke nur in frischem Mörtel machen, und nur wahnsinnige Leute würden einen Raum als Hinrichtungskammer benutzen, dessen Wände gerade verputzt worden waren.

Diese Gasrohre und Handabdrücke sind kein Beweis für Nazi-Gräueltaten, sondern Beweise für eine vorsätzliche psychologische Kriegsführung der Alliierten zur Dämonisierung der besiegten Deutschen. Weil dieser Schwindel so offensichtlich ist, wurde er nie von irgendeinem etablierten Historiker ernst genommen. Das hindert jedoch das US-Holocaust-Gedenkmuseum nicht daran, ihn einem ahnungslosen Publikum vorzuführen. Leider akzeptieren die meisten Leute schlicht, was auch immer die Regierung, Medien oder Religion ihnen vorgeben zu glauben.

Also, was brauchten die Amerikaner, die einige Monaten zuvor Paris befreit hatte, um dieses Filmmaterial zu erstellen? Zunächst müssen sie einen Plan gehabt haben. Dann mussten sie zur Verfügung haben: die notwendige Ausrüstung für die Kulissen, also Rohre, raucherzeugende Geräte, und einige Arbeiter, um die Ausrüstung zu installieren und um eine Zementwand mit Handabdrücken zu schaffen.

Im Gegensatz zu dieser völlig unbekanntem Gestapo-Folterkammer in Paris war Dachau eines der bekanntesten deutschen Konzentrationslager. Es war das erste, das unmittelbar nach der Machtergreifung der Nazis eröffnet wurde. Als die Amerikaner im April 1945 einmarschierten, hatte dieses Lager die Fantasie der Nazi-Gegner mehr als ein Jahrzehnt lang dominiert. Also, hatten die amerikanischen Führungskräfte der psychologischen Kriegsführung einen Plan? Darauf können Sie wetten! Und kamen sie mit der Ausrüstung und den Arbeitern, um diesen Plan umzusetzen? Da sie es im Januar 1945 in Paris taten, war es noch wahrscheinlicher, dass sie es in Dachau durchzogen, das eine noch vielversprechendere Propagandabühne war.

Lassen Sie mich die Frage also noch einmal stellen: Warum sind diese komplexen Rohre in Dachau so beeindruckend und sogar einschüchternd, zugleich aber so völlig nutzlos und sinnlos?

Bevor wir voreilige Schlüsse ziehen, schauen wir uns einige Dokumente der Kriegszeit an. Zunächst gibt es die zwei zuvor gezeigten Fotos, die 1944 aufgenommen wurden. Auf beiden sehen wir den Lüftungskamin, der Teil des Lüftungssystems der Gaskammer ist. Zumindest dieser Abluftkamin wurde also vor Kriegsende von den Deutschen gebaut. Sodann befinden sich unter den wenigen Originaldokumenten, die es zu diesem Gebäude gibt, zwei Pläne von besonderem Interesse. Dieser zeigt einen Querschnitt durch die Gaskammer. Er zeigt, dass die Decke tatsächlich nur etwa 2 Meter hoch ist, nicht 3 m wie der Rest des Gebäudes.[\[24\]](#) Als nächstes zeigt eine Ausschnittvergrößerung dieses Dokuments den Grundriss der Gaskammer.[\[25\]](#)

Wie wir sehen können, sind beide Türen 90 cm breit und bestehen entweder aus zwei Türen, von der eine nach innen, die andere nach außen aufgeht, oder einer Schwingtür. In jedem Fall wäre eine solche Anordnung für eine Gaskammer ungeeignet gewesen, da Schwingtüren weder gasdicht noch paniksicher gemacht werden können, und falls diese Anordnung aus zwei Türen bestand, so hätte die innere, nach innen aufgehende nicht geöffnet werden können, wenn sich in der Kammer Leichen davor häuften. Eine solche Anordnung ist tatsächlich für Leichenhallen üblich. Zum Beispiel zeigen die Pläne der Leichenhalle des alten Krematoriums von Auschwitz die gleiche Türbauweise.

Heute ist dieser Raum mit zwei schweren Stahltüren ausgestattet von der Art, wie sie für Luftschutzbunker recht üblich waren. Die Türen sind einen Meter breit und in Stahlrahmen gefasst. Dieselben Türen werden in den US-Aufnahmen vom 3. Mai 1945 gezeigt, also nur fünf Tage, nachdem das Lager von den Amerikanern erobert wurde. Sie wurden daher höchstwahrscheinlich lange vor Ankunft der Amerikaner dort eingebaut. Außerdem besteht eine der Wände genau genommen aus zwei Schichten mit einem Hohlraum dazwischen, der typischerweise der Isolierung dient, was auch in der oben erwähnten Leichenhalle von Auschwitz zu erkennen ist.

Daher sieht es so aus, als ob dieser Raum ursprünglich als Leichenhalle dienen sollte. In der Tat ist das auffallende Merkmal dieses Gebäudes, dass, wenn wir die Idee verwerfen, dass diese angebliche Gaskammer als Leichenhalle diente, dieses Gebäude keinen anderen Raum von geeigneter Größe hat, der mit einem Lüftungssystem ausgestattet ist.

Aber wenn dem so ist, was ist dann mit den seltsamen, übergroßen Rohren? Und was ist mit diesen schweren Türen? Und was ist mit den Schächten in der Außenmauer, die offenbar hinzugefügt wurden, nachdem das Gebäude fertiggestellt wurde?

Und was ist mit dem Guckloch in der Rückwand, das Capitaine Fribourg in seinem Bericht beschrieb? Er zeichnete davon sogar eine Skizze. Es ist ziemlich steil nach unten geneigt, weshalb es niemandem erlaubt hätte, etwas zu sehen, außer vielleicht die Füße von ein paar Leuten, die nahe diesem Loch standen oder lagen.

Das Loch in dieser Gaskammer, welches das andere Ende dieses Gucklochs gewesen sein soll, ist bis heute dort zu sehen, obwohl es viel höher liegt als Fribourg es berichtete, der in seiner Skizze das Guckloch unterhalb des zweiten kleinen Lochs platzierte, das in dieser Wand sichtbar ist, nahe dem Boden. Heute sind im Nebenraum weder der Austritt des Gucklochs noch die Schalter zu sehen. Die Schalttafel und der Schaltkasten sind im Filmmaterial zu sehen, das am 3. Mai 1945 für den US-Dokumentarfilm aufgenommen wurde, doch wird dieses Guckloch im Dokumentarfilm weder gezeigt noch erwähnt. Es gibt jedoch ein Foto von diesem Bereich vom Mai 1945, das nicht nur die Schalttafel und den Schaltkasten zeigt sowie Teile der isolierten Rohre und Handventile, sondern zudem eine grobe Öffnung in der Wand direkt unter der Schalttafel. Wenn wir dieses Bild mit einem Standbild des gerade gezeigten Films vergleichen, sehen wir:

a) dass der Deckel des Schalterkastens links verschwunden ist;

b) und noch wichtiger, die obere, grobe Kante des Lochs im Foto sollte auch im Standbild sichtbar sein, ist es aber nicht. Daher muss jemand das Loch dort hineingehauen haben, nachdem der Dokumentarfilm gedreht wurde.

Hier sieht man, wie das Loch von der Gaskammer gesehen aussieht. Es ist tatsächlich nach oben geneigt. Im Hintergrund sieht man Ziegel und Mörtel, die das Museum benutzte, um das klaffende Loch im Nebenraum zu schließen. In dieser Röhre verläuft ein elektrisches Kabel, das dort verlegt wurde, als der Raum als Museumsstück vorbereitet wurde.

Was wir hier sehen, ist die Tatsache, dass seit der Befreiung des Lagers am 29. April 1945 einige Leute die Beweise dieses mutmaßlichen Tatorts manipuliert zu haben scheinen. Es ist schwierig zu beurteilen, wofür dieses Loch wirklich verwendet wurde. Ein Guckloch wäre jedoch in den Türen installiert worden, wie es für Luftschutztüren üblich war und ist, anstatt es durch eine dicke Mauer zu hauen, und es wäre sicherlich nicht nach unten geneigt gewesen.

Ist die Dachauer Gaskammer also ein Nachkriegsbetrug? In Anbetracht dessen, dass das Lager am 29. April befreit wurde und dass die Gaskammer nur 3 Tage später, am 2. Mai, von vier Mitgliedern des US-Kongresses inspiziert wurde, scheint für einen größeren Betrug nicht genügend Zeit gewesen zu sein.

Tatsächlich gibt es Hinweise, die in eine andere Richtung weisen. Vor allem gibt es einen Brief im deutschen Bundesarchiv von Dr. Sigmund Rascher an Heinrich Himmler vom 9. August 1942, worin man liest:[26]

“Wie Sie wissen, wird im KL Dachau dieselbe Einrichtung wie in Linz gebaut. Nachdem die ‘Invalidentransporte’ sowieso in bestimmten Kammern enden, frage ich, ob nicht in diesen Kammern an den sowieso dazu bestimmten Personen die Wirkung unserer verschiedenen Kampfgase erprobt werden kann? Bis jetzt liegen nur Tierversuche bez. Berichte über Unfälle bei Herstellung dieser Gase vor. Wegen dieses Absatzes schicke ich den Brief als ‘Geheimsache’.”

Dr. Rascher war jener berüchtigte Arzt, der an Insassen in Dachau medizinische Experimente durchführte, die zu jenen Verbrechen gehörten, die nach dem Krieg von der US-Besatzungsmacht verfolgt wurden im berühmten “Medical Case” der Nürnberger Kriegsverbrecherprozesse. Während es viele Beweise gab für eine Vielzahl von Experimenten an Versuchspersonen wie zum Beispiel Aussetzung an niedrigem Luftdruck und langes Eintauchen in kaltes Wasser, waren Tests mit Kampfgasen in Dachau nicht Teil der Anklage. Für diesen Vorwurf gab es einfach zu wenige Beweise.

Man kann darüber spekulieren, ob Dr. Rascher tatsächlich versucht hat, die Leichenhalle von Baracke X umzubauen für mögliche Versuche mit Kampfgasen, wobei diese Schächten vielleicht schlicht als Lufteinlassschächte für eine bessere Lüftung dienten, da der Raum keine Fenster hatte. Aber da Dr. Rascher im April 1944 von der deutschen Polizei festgenommen und schließlich für eine Reihe von Verbrechen hingerichtet wurde, unter anderem für Kindesentführung und Mord, wurde dieses Projekt, so es jemals existierte, spätestens zu diesem Zeitpunkt aufgegeben. Als die Amerikaner ein Jahr später eintrafen, war der Raum nichts anderes als eine Leichenhalle, gefüllt mit den Opfern von

Vorerst bleibt jede Antwort auf die Frage, wofür diese seltsamen Objekte gedacht waren, zum großen Teil Spekulation, weil fast alle Originaldokumente hinsichtlich der Planung und des Baus dieses Gebäudes – Kostenvoranschläge, Fortschrittsberichte, Baupläne, Rechnungen usw. – aus dem Dachauer Lagerarchiv verschwunden sind. Nur noch wenige, nicht sehr informative Dokumente sind übrig, wie jene, die wir gerade gesehen haben, sowie ein paar andere. Entweder haben die Nazis sie vernichtet, weil sie etwas zu verbergen hatten, oder die Amerikaner beschlagnahmten und/oder vernichteten sie, weil sie verhindern wollten, dass jemand herausfinden konnte, wie dieser Raum wirklich aussah und wofür es benutzt wurde.

In Dachau wurde uns die Vorstellung einer als Duschaum getarnten Gaskammer eingeprägt.

Wegen Dachau fing die Welt an, an Gerüchte zu glauben, und sie sah, was wir für Beweise einer ausgereiften deutschen Maschinerie hielten, die fähig war, mit Präzision und Effizienz zu vergasen.

Wenn jedoch diese Gaskammer nicht das ist, was uns gesagt wurde, oder zumindest gar nicht für Massenhinrichtungen benutzt wurde, warum hingen dort riesige Mengen an Kleidung in ihrer Nähe, als die Amerikaner ankamen?

Tatsächlich sind das jedoch Kleider, die außen vor den Entwesungskammern von Dachau auslüften. Der Erzähler behauptet lediglich, dies sei die Kleidung von Opfern der Menschengaskammer. Dann blenden sie irreführend zu der Duschräumtür, womit sie den Zuschauern glauben machen, dies seien dieselben Türen; jene mit den offensichtlichen Gaswarnungen darauf und die angebliche Gaskammer, getarnt als Duschaum, dazu bestimmt, die Eintretenden auszutricksen.

Die Betrüger zeigten einen Film von diesen Entwesungsgaskammern zur Kleiderentwesung, die sich am Ende des Gebäudes befindet. Sie behaupteten, diese Türen, die deutlich mit Warnzeichen und Totenkopf gekennzeichnet sind, seien benutzt worden, um Gefangene zu vergasen.

Die Entwesungskammern und die deutlich mit Warnungen markierten Türen befinden sich hier. Aber der "Duschaum", die angebliche Gaskammer, befindet sich ein paar Räume entfernt. Die Täuschung lag darin, den durchschnittlichen Betrachter dazu zu bringen, dass er glaubt, die deutlich markierte Entlausungskammertür mit Totenkopf am Ende des Gebäudes war die gleiche wie die Duschräumtür. Dieses dreckige Täuschungsmanöver dauert bis heute an.

Man nehme zum Beispiel diesen Dokumentarfilm über Dachau vom Filmmacher Levi Mierau. Nachdem er die Gaskammer gezeigt hat und beschrieb, wie sie angeblich funktionierte, blendet auch er irreführend zu den Entwesungskammern über, während er seine Erzählung über Menschenvergasungen fortsetzt. Schauen Sie nur:[27]

"Eine als Brausebad ausgezeichnete Tür ging in einen großen Raum, der täuschen soll, denn der Raum war in Wirklichkeit kein Duschaum, sondern eine Gaskammer. Der Raum bestand aus Auslässen in den Wänden, dem Boden und dem Dach."

Stooooop! Auslässe im Boden und im Dach? Diese Duschköpfe waren Auslässe für rein gar nichts, und diese sechs Abflüsse im Boden sind tatsächlich echte Abflüsse, was darauf hindeutet, dass der Raum ursprünglich für viel Wasser und nicht für Gas ausgelegt war.

Wir überspringen ein paar Sekunden, wonach es diese Szene gibt:[28]

“Steine mit Giftgasgranulat namens Zyklon B konnten von außen eingeführt werden. Da die Gaskammern nur während der letzten Monate des Lagers gebaut wurden, wurden nur sieben in den Gaskammern getötet, die als Testpersonen verwendet wurden.”

Während er also die Entwesungskammern zeigt, spricht Levi irreführend von Gaskammern im Plural, in denen sieben Menschen getötet wurden.

Die gleiche Art von Irreführung wird vom Holocaust Memorial Museum der USA auf seiner Webseite begangen: (Großbuchstaben hinzugefügt):

“Blick auf DIE Tür der Gaskammer in Dachau.”[29]

“Ein amerikanischer Soldat steht außerhalb DER Gaskammer in Dachau” [30]

“Blick auf DIE Tür zur Gaskammer in Dachau neben einem großen Haufen Uniformen.”[31]

“Die Tür zu DER Gaskammer in Dachau. Sie ist als ‘Duschbad’ ausgezeichnet.”[32]

“Blick auf DIE Tür zur Gaskammer im KZ Dachau. Ein Schild darüber gibt sie als Dusche aus.”[33]

Das US-Holocaust-Museum nutzt die Einzahl “die”, um zu unterstellen, dass diese beiden Türen dieselbe Tür derselben Menschengaskammer waren, die als Duschaum getarnt war.

Sie zeigen die Außenseite der Kleiderentwesungskammertüren, die am Ende des Gebäudes liegen, dann zeigen sie das Innere der Duschaumtür, die ganz hier drüben liegt. Es gibt vier Entwesungskammern, nicht bloß eine.

Aber sie wählten Fotos, die nur eine Tür zeigen, und benutzen die Einzahl "die" und vermengen diese mit Bildern des Duschraums. Wie man sieht, hatten die Entwesungskammern Warnungen, diese nicht zu betreten, und Markierungen, die angaben, wann Kleiderbegasungen begonnen hatten, und wann es sicher war, die Türen wieder zu öffnen.

Hier bezeichnen sie dies als "eine" Gaskammer,[34]

freilich übergehend, dass dies eine von vieren war, die verwendet wurden, um Kleider zu entlausen.

Die Bildunterschrift zeigt die frühen Propagandalügen, die heute noch verbreitet werden.

"Gasraum – Leute wurden hier aufgehängt"

Diese Haken wurden nicht benutzt, um Menschen in Gaskammern aufzuhängen. Dies waren freilich bloß Kleiderhaken.

"Blick auf die Haken vor der Tür zu den Gaskammern in Buchenwald." [35]

Erstens ist das noch nicht einmal Buchenwald. Dies ist ein Foto einer Entlausungskammer in Dachau.

Die ursprüngliche Beschriftung lautet:

"Buchenwald war die Heimat von Ilse Koch, Frau des Kommandanten. Sie war bekannt als die Hündin von Buchenwald. eine Beleidigung für jeden Hund, der je gelebt hat. Sie ließ ihre Insassen mit verschiedenen Motiven tätowieren, ließ sie dann töten, dann häuten und ihre Häute gerben, um daraus Buchumschläge, Lampenschirme und andere Gegenstände herzustellen. Ich habe diese Dinge gesehen! Eine Geschichte erzählt, dass sie Geschlechtsverkehr mit ihren Opfern genoss – das mag zweifelhaft sein. Diese 'Fleischhaken' wurden an den Körpern von Menschen eingesetzt!"

So ziemlich jede Behauptung in diesem falsch beschrifteten Foto ist falsch. Dieses Beispiel beleuchtet die typische hysterische Propaganda, die damals üblich war und heute noch von einer staatlich finanzierten Institution wiederholt wird. In Wirklichkeit sind diese angeblichen "Fleischhaken" nur Haken für Kleider, um diese nach Behandlung in den Begasungskammern auszulüften.

Diese komplexe Maschinerie sah sicher so aus wie etwas, was wir von Totenkammern Made in Germany erwarten würden. Da diese Ausrüstung jedoch NICHT dazu verwendet werden konnte, um Zyklon-B-Dämpfe in die Kammer einzuführen, sagt man uns heute, die Deutschen hätten das Pestizidgranulat einfach hineingeworfen, und zwar durch diese Öffnungen in der Außenwand auf den Boden des Raumes. Das ist ziemlich merkwürdig, weil die Entwesungskammern am Ende des Flurs tatsächlich speziell entwickelte, fortschrittliche Vorrichtungen besaßen, um das Blausäuregas sachgemäß zu erwärmen und zu zirkulieren, das aus dem Zyklon-B-Pestizidgranulat kam.

Dies wurde als DEGESCH-Kreislaufgerät bezeichnet, gebaut vom Hersteller von Zyklon B.[36]

Ein Mitglied einer Kleiderbegasungsmannschaft stellte eine Zyklon-B-Dose in den Halter. Ein eingebauter Dosenöffner, der von außen mit einer Kurbel bedient wurde, öffnete die Dose. Das Granulat fiel über eine Rutsche in einen Korb, durch den heiße Luft geblasen wurde, um die Freisetzung von Blausäuregas aus dem Granulat zu beschleunigen. Das Pestizid wurde in der Kleiderbegasungskammer verteilt, und nach Abschluss wurde das Gas aus der Kammer entfernt und Frischluft hineingeblasen.

Man sollte skeptisch werden, wenn man erfährt, dass die Deutschen laut der heutigen offiziellen Geschichte, anstatt etwas Ähnliches zu verwenden wie dieses speziell entworfene Gerät, das in den Kleidungsentlausungskammern am Ende des Flurs eingesetzt wurde, einfach Zyklon-B-Granulat durch Löcher in der Wand geschüttet haben sollen. Ein solches Verfahren wäre sehr nachteilig gewesen, denn sobald dieses Granulat im Raum war, hätte es nicht entfernt werden können, es sei denn, der Raum war von allen Leichen geräumt. Da Zyklon B sein Gift eine Stunde lang oder länger abgibt, je nach Temperatur und Luftfeuchtigkeit,[37] bedeutet dies, dass jeder Versuch, den Raum nach einer Hinrichtung schnell zu lüften, vergeblich gewesen wäre.

Daher mögen diese Schächte, falls sie während des Krieges im Rahmen von Dr. Raschers Testwahn hinzugefügt wurden, einfach dafür vorgesehen gewesen sein, die Lüftung dieses Raumes zu unterstützen.

Auf jeden Fall ist das nicht gerade die fortgeschrittene deutsche Ingenieurskunst, mit der man ständig Propaganda macht, oder?

Angesichts der überwältigenden Beweise, dass dieser Raum niemals benutzt wurde, um irgendjemanden zu vergasen, behaupten etablierte Historiker nun, den zum Bau dieser Gaskammer eingesetzten Häftlinge sei es gelungen, seine Fertigstellung zu sabotieren, indem sie drei Jahre lang bei der Arbeit herumtrödelten, so lesen wir es jedenfalls in der französischen Originalausgabe von Paul Berbens "offizieller Geschichte" des Lagers:[38]

"Die Dachauer Gaskammer hat jedoch nie funktioniert, in gewissem Maße, wie es scheint, aufgrund von Sabotage durch das Häftlingsteam, dem es oblag, sie zu bauen."

Die Schilderung des Nürnberger Prozessbeweisfilms "Nazi-Konzentrationslager" war also völlig falsch. Diese Kleidung gehörte keinen Insassen, die in der Gaskammer erstickt wurden. Das war lediglich Kleidung, welche die echten Gaskammern für Kleiderentlausung passiert hatte und auslüftete.

Diese irreführende Schilderung des Dachau-Segments ist ein wichtiger Teil der Unwahrheiten im zentralen Film-Beweisstück der Nürnberger Prozesse.

Diese abenteuerliche Praxis, Duschräume Gaskammern zu nennen, dauert bis heute an. Auf der Webseite von Israels Holocaust-Museum "Yad Vashem" sieht man ein Foto des tatsächlichen Häftlingsduschraums im Lager Dachau wie folgt beschriftet:

"Eine Gaskammer nach der Befreiung."[39]

Dies ist bloß eine weitere echte Dusche.

"Flossenbürg, Deutschland, Gaskammern, die Duschen genannt wurden."[40]

Diese Behauptung wird auf der "HistoryWiz"-Webseite "Die Endlösung" wiederholt. Die Bildunterschrift lautet:[41]

"Das letzte Ziel für diejenigen, die nicht arbeiten konnten, die Gaskammer – hier die Gaskammer in Flossenbürg."

Die Fälscher wandten den gleichen alten Trick mit dem Kamerawinkel an, um die vielen Fenster dieses echten Duschraums auszublenden. Die höchsten offiziellen Fachleute geben heute zu, dass dieser Raum eine echte Dusche war, die nie benutzt wurde, um irgendjemanden zu vergasen. Darüber hinaus hat kein etablierter Historiker jemals behauptet, es habe im Lager Flossenbürg eine Gaskammer gegeben.

Das hält Israels Holocaust-Museum und andere nicht davon ab, Gasduschen-Unsinn zu verbreiten. Die "HistoryWiz"-Website präsentiert ein wichtiges Zitat:

"Die Geschichte nicht zu kennen heißt, immer ein Kind zu bleiben. – Cicero"

Das gilt sicherlich für jene, die kindischer- und ignoranterweise glauben, dass Duschen Gaskammern waren.

Ein Hauptgrund, warum wir die Geschichten über die Todesduschen glaubten, sind bei Kriegsende aufgenommene schrecklichen Bilder von Leichen. Aber diese entsetzlichen Bilder von abgemagerten und toten Gefangenen sind kein Beweis für ein Vernichtungsprogramm.

“Ich bin hier in Polen im Todeslager Auschwitz, wo schätzungsweise 1,1 bis 1,5 Millionen Menschen umgekommen sind, hier, im Holocaust.”

Bereits in jungen Jahren waren Sie wahrscheinlich einem solchen Programm ausgesetzt.<sup>[42]</sup> Dokumentarfilme wie dieser sind speziell auf junge Leute ausgerichtet. Sie können sogar sehen, dass diese Kopie von einer Webseite namens “School Tube” stammt. Videos wie dieses schockieren ihr Publikum, indem sie grausame Bilder zeigen, die, wenn sie Fiktion wären, als jugendgefährdend eingestuft wären.

Aber da dies wirkliche Bilder sind, werden sie nicht als jugendgefährdend eingestuft, obwohl sie noch weitaus traumatisierender sind, gerade weil sie echt sind. Aber kaum jemand, geschweige denn ein Kind, hat die Fähigkeit oder Erfahrung, den Zusammenhang dieser Bilder zu bewerten. Dieses entsetzliche Filmmaterial ausgemergelter Leichen wird ohne Zusammenhang vorgestellt, abgesehen von der Behauptung, dass es eine systematische Vernichtungspolitik beweist.

“Der Holocaust. Ein sorgfältig geplanter und ausgeführter systematischer Massenmord...”

Diese Bilder wurden jedoch am Ende des Krieges aufgenommen. Etablierte Historiker behaupten allerdings, dass jedwede Vernichtungstätigkeit in diesen Lagern spätestens im Oktober 1944 aufgehört hatte, gestützt auf eine eidesstattliche Erklärung des deutschen SS-Offiziers Kurt Becher, in der er einen angeblich von Himmler im September 1944 erlassenen Befehl wie folgt zitiert:[43]

Sowohl Kaltenbrunner als auch Pohl waren Spitzenfunktionäre des KZ-Systems. Keine Spur wurde je von diesem Himmler-Befehl gefunden, aber darauf kommt es mir hier nicht an. Wenn wir uns anschauen, was wirklich in diesen Lagern vor sich ging, werden wir überrascht sein. Hier ist eine Grafik, welche die Zahl der Todesfälle von Insassen in Dachau zeigt, wie sie zuerst von den deutschen Behörden und dann von den Amerikanern aufgezeichnet wurden. Sie zeigt deutlich, dass die Sterblichkeit zu einer Zeit explodierte, als Hitlers Vernichtungspolitik aufgegeben worden sein soll. Das gleiche geschah im Lager Bergen-Belsen, wo die Sterblichkeit erst Anfang 1945 explodierte, wie aus dieser heute im Museum Bergen-Belsen ausgestellten Grafik hervorgeht.

Der Grund dafür war eine starke Überbelegung kombiniert mit dem katastrophalen Zusammenbruch der Nahrungs- und Wasserversorgung sowie medizinischer und hygienischer Maßnahmen, was zusammengenommen dazu führte, dass sich Unterernährung, Hunger, und tödliche Krankheiten wie Fleckfieber und Ruhr unkontrolliert ausverbreiteten.

In jenen Monaten zerbombten die Alliierten die gesamte deutsche Infrastruktur, einschließlich der Versorgungslinien in die Lager. Lieferungen von Medikamenten, Hygieneartikeln und Nahrungsmitteln in die Lager, Kraftwerke und Wasseraufbereitungsanlagen wurden systematisch bombardiert, und in einigen Fällen bombardierten sie sogar die Lager selbst. Nicht nur jüdische KZ-Häftlinge taten sich schwer und kamen um während der letzten Monate des Zweiten Weltkriegs. Monatelang war die deutsche Zivilbevölkerung Zielscheibe einer beispiellosen Feuerbombenkampagne der westlichen Alliierten. Von Hamburg bis Dresden wurden Zehntausende unschuldiger deutscher Zivilisten gezielt ins Visier genommen und ermordet. Frauen und Kinder wurden lebendig verbrannt, und verängstigte Familien erstickten in Luftschutzbunkern an Giftgas. Diese Bilder zeigt man Ihnen nie, oder? Sie sollten sich jedoch fragen warum.

Jedenfalls wurden viele Deutsche, die das überlebten, zu Flüchtlingen, die um ihr Leben rannten, und die es ebenfalls schwer hatten, sich zu ernähren.

Im Osten flohen deutsche Zivilisten zudem vor der einfallenden sowjetischen Armee, die massenhaft Zivilisten folterte und ermordete. Die Rote Armee vergewaltigte unzählige deutsche Frauen, von kleinen Kindern bis zu älteren Menschen.

Diese schrecklichen Bilder der katastrophalen letzten Tage eines kollabierenden Deutschlands, von allen Seiten umzingelt und in Schutt und Asche bombardiert, werden als Beweis für vorsätzliche Vernichtungslager vorgebracht. Dieser schmutzige Trick ist der Hauptgrund dafür, dass die Leute an den Holocaust glauben.

Deshalb reagieren viele sehr feindlich gegen jene, die etablierte Behauptungen zum Holocaust kritisch untersuchen. Schließlich haben wir alle die Leichen gesehen, oder? Diese Bilder wurden in Lagern gemacht, die von den westlichen Alliierten befreit wurden, hauptsächlich Dachau, befreit von den Amerikanern, und Bergen-Belsen, befreit von den Briten – Lager, von denen heute sogar von etablierten Historikern zugegeben wird, dass sie nicht als Vernichtungs- oder Todeslager gedient haben.

Heute wird behauptet, alle sogenannten Todes- bzw. Vernichtungslager sollen in den von der Sowjetunion eroberten polnischen Gebieten gelegen haben.

Frühe Zeugen haben ursprünglich behauptet, auch in diesen westlich befreiten Lagern habe es Menschengaskammern gegeben, getarnt als Duschräume. Britische und amerikanische Ärzte führten jedoch Tausende von Autopsien an einige dieser Leichen durch, die die Alliierten in diesen Lagern entdeckten.

Russell Barton, damals ein englischer Medizinstudent, der nach der Befreiung des Lagers einen Monat in Belsen verbracht und die Gründe für die katastrophalen Bedingungen des Lagers untersucht hatte, die dort gegen Ende des Krieges herrschten, schrieb:[44]

“Deutsche Sanitätsoffiziere sagten mir, dass es seit Monaten zunehmend schwieriger geworden sei, Lebensmittel ins Lager zu transportieren. Alles, was sich auf den Autobahnen bewegte, war in Gefahr, bombardiert zu werden. [...]

Ich war überrascht, Unterlagen zu finden, die zwei oder drei Jahre zurückreichten, über große Mengen an Lebensmitteln, die täglich zur Ausgabe gekocht wurden. Ich überzeugte mich, entgegen der öffentlichen Meinung, dass es nie eine Politik des vorsätzlichen Verhungerns gegeben hatte. Dies wurde durch die große Anzahl gut genährter Insassen bestätigt. [...] Die Hauptgründe für den Zustand von Belsen waren Krankheit, massive Überbelegung durch zentrale Behörden, Mangel an Recht und Ordnung in den Hütten, und unzureichende Versorgung mit Lebensmitteln, Wasser und Medikamenten.”

Hier ist ein Interview, das Dr. Barton dem verstorbenen Ernst Zündel gab, und zwar etwa zehn Jahre nach Veröffentlichung dieses Artikels:[45]

“Sie waren als junger Mann vor Ort in Belsen.”

“Ja. Ich ging mit einer Gruppe von Medizinstudenten. Wir kamen am 2. Mai 1945 in Belsen an, und ich ging zum ersten Mal am 3. Mai ins Lager. Himmler ließ das Lager am 11. April übergeben, um das Fleckfieber zu stoppen, was eine Epidemie war, die sich in ganz Europa ausbreitete. Die Briten kamen rein; eine Panzerdivision marschierte am 15. April um drei Uhr rein, und sie taten ihr Bestes, um die Fleckfieber[-infizierten] und die Sterben von den anderen zu trennen.”

“Wie viele Leute waren zu der Zeit im Lager, als die Briten das Lager übernahmen?”

“Ich denke, es waren ungefähr siebenundfünfzig- oder sechzigtausend. Die Briten bombardierten alles, und die Amerikaner, was sich auf den Straßen bewegte. Lebensmittel dorthin zu bekommen war extrem schwierig. Die Wasserversorgung wurde mit Abwasser verunreinigt, und die Verwaltung im Lager brach mehr oder weniger zusammen. Die Verteilung von Essen in den einzelnen Hütten wurde den Insassen überlassen, und die Insassen, wir fanden heraus – wir wurden zuerst getäuscht, aber das war nach dem Mai, nachdem ich dort angekommen war. Die Insassen... eine bestimmte Gruppe hatte die Kontrolle. Sie nahmen sich, was sie wollten, und überließen dann dem Rest der Hütte, was übrig geblieben war. Das heißt also, vielleicht zehn mächtige Leute würden alles verschlingen, und dreihundertfünfzig würden kriegen, was dann noch übrig war. Es gab, ich würde sagen, alle Nationalitäten, hauptsächlich Polen und Russen. Die meisten von ihnen waren Juden. “

“Gab es Männer und Frauen?”

“Ja, da waren Männer und Frauen, und Kinder.”

“Und waren sie getrennt?”

“Getrennt.”

“Getrennte Lager. Und das war immer noch getrennt, als Sie dort ankamen?”

“Ja.”

“Selbst, sagen wir mal, falls die deutsche Lagerverwaltung sich aufs Äußerste bemüht hätte, und alles zur Verfügung bekommen hätte, hätten sie das verhindern können?”

“Fleckfieber war damals unheilbar. Die Briten sprühten DDT, ein Insektizid, über alles und jeden, und auf diese Weise, denke ich, wurde das Fleckfieber eingedämmt. Aber es war eine große Gefahr. Den Leuten ist nicht klar, dass es Fleckfieber war. Es war... ich glaube 50, 60 Prozent der Leute sind an Fleckfieber gestorben.”

“Warum sind diese Leichen nackt? Ich meine, einige von ihnen sind so abgemagert. Warum haben sie ihre Kleidung nicht an? “

“Nun, sie hatten es an. Als sie aus den Hütten gebracht wurden, hatten sie Kleidung an. Aber Kleidung war so knapp – alles war knapp – dass die Häftlinge sofort rausstürzen und alle Kleidung auszogen, weil es zu schade war, sie zu verschwenden. Deshalb waren sie nackt. “

“Haben Sie, als Sie zwei Wochen nach der Übernahme durch die britische Armee dort ankamen, irgendeinen Hinweis auf Gaskammern gesehen, die die Deutschen in diesen Lagern hatten, wie es die Propaganda gesagt hat? Oder gab es irgendeine derartige Behauptung?”

“Nein. Ich glaube nicht, dass je davon ausgegangen wurde, es habe in Belsen-Bergen eine Gaskammer gegeben. Die Leute starben übrigens 500 am Tag, mit einer Rate von 500 pro Tag.”

“Selbst unter britischer Verwaltung...”

Und dann diese Masseneinweisung... Aber als sie 50.000 zusätzliche, ganze 50.000, dann freilich...”

“Waren sie zugegen, als die Planierfrauen diese Leichen in die Gräber schoben, in diese langen Gräben, die wir gesehen haben?”

“Sie sind ein Mann, der in England geboren wurde. Sie haben diesen Artikel, glaube ich, für eine englische Publikation veröffentlicht? Und die Londoner Times hat das aufgegriffen, was Sie hier veröffentlicht haben?”

“Das stimmt. Dies wurde im November 1968 veröffentlicht. Ich wurde gebeten, es zu schreiben. Ich wurde darum gebeten. Ich hatte das nicht beabsichtigt.”

“Niemand von deutschen Zeitschriften oder Zeitungen hat sie je

interviewt?"

"Ach nein. Nein, nein. "

"Bis heute?"

"Bis heute nicht."

"Ist jemals jemand, offiziell aus Deutschland, gekommen und hat Sie kontaktieren bezüglich einer Art historischer Dokumentation, vom [unverständlich] deutschen Bundesarchiv in Koblenz und von ähnlichen Orten?"

"Nein."

"Nein. Nie?"

"Nie."

Ähnlich ist die Darlegung von Dr. Charles Larson, einem US-Gerichtsmediziner, der für die oberste Militärstaatsanwaltschaft der US-Armee arbeitete. Gleich nach dem Krieg führte Dr. Larson Autopsien an Hunderten von Opfern durch in etwa zwanzig ehemaligen Konzentrationslagern. 1980 erschien ein Zeitungsartikel über seine Erfahrungen im Krieg. Wir lesen dort:[\[46\]](#)

"Larson hat über seine Kriegserfahrung wenig öffentlich gesprochen. Ein Grund für sein Schweigen war, dass seine Autopsiebefunde im Widerspruch zu der weit verbreiteten Überzeugung stehen, die meisten Juden seien in den Nazi-Lagern durch Vergasung, Erschießung oder Vergiftung ausgerottet worden.

‘Wir haben gehört, dass 6 Millionen Juden ausgerottet wurden. Ein Teil davon ist ein Schwindel’, sagte Larson. [...]

Es sei nie ein Fall von Vergiftung aufgedeckt worden, sagte er.”

Larson’s Biograph schrieb Folgendes über diese Episode:[47]

Die nächsten zehn Tage, viele Nächte mit nur ein oder zwei Stunden ruhelosem Schlaf, arbeitete Larson unter den Toten. Er führte ungefähr 25 Autopsien pro Tag durch und untersuchte oberflächlich weitere 300 bis 1000 Leichen. Er autopsierte nur jene Leichen, die eines fraglichen Todes gestorben zu sein schienen. ‘Viele von ihnen starben an Fleckfieber’, erklärte mir Dr. Larson neulich.

In Dachau zeigte Larsons Arbeit – das Profil der Häftlingspopulation, das seine Autopsien projizierten –, dass nur ein kleiner Prozentsatz der Todesfälle auf medizinische Experimente an Menschen zurückzuführen waren. Es wies darauf hin, dass die meisten Opfer damals an sogenannten ‘natürlichen Ursachen’ starben, sprich an Krankheiten, die durch Unterernährung und Schmutz verursacht wurden, den Handlangern des Krieges.”

Heute wird zugegeben, dass genau diese Lager überhaupt keine Menschengaskammern hatten. Demnach wurde keine der in diesen Bildern gezeigten Leichen vergast. Was Sie in diesen Bildern sehen, sind Gefangene, die an Krankheiten gestorben sind sowie aus Mangel an angemessenem Essen, Wasser und medizinischer Versorgung. Ihr Zustand wurde größtenteils verursacht durch die alliierte Bombardierung der Versorgungslinien in die Lager.

Alliierte Kampfflugzeuge bombardierten und beschossen sogar Zugladungen voller Gefangener, als diese in verschiedene Lager evakuiert wurden. Die Gefangenen, die nicht von Kugeln oder Bomben getroffen wurden, waren tagelang ohne ausreichende Versorgung, bis sie ihren Bestimmungsort erreichten.

Die Befreiung des KZ Dachau wird im Film Shutter Island dramatisiert. Die Amerikaner, die Dachau befreiten, stießen auf das, was als "die Todeszüge von Dachau" bekannt wurde. Sie sahen Einschusslöcher in den Seiten der Waggonen und in den Waggonen tote Gefangene in einem schrecklichen Zustand. Da die Amis glaubten, die Deutschen hätten hungernde Gefangene in die Züge gesperrt und sie dann mit Maschinengewehren beschossen, richteten sie ihre Wut auf die Ergreifung deutscher Wachleute.

"Die Wachleute ergaben sind, wir nahmen ihnen ihre Waffen weg, und wir ließen sie antreten. Das war kein Krieg, das war, das war Mord!"

Viele der deutschen Wachleute, die das Lager übergaben, war erst in den letzten Kriegstagen in das Lager überstellt worden. Einige waren bloß Teenager aus umliegenden Städten. Ironischerweise sieht dieser junge deutsche Wachmann sogar wie der junge DiCaprio aus. Dieser junge Deutsche war kein vorsätzlicher Holocauster von Juden oder sonst jemandem, sondern ein junger Mann, der tragischerweise in die letzten Tage des brutalsten Krieges der Menschheitsgeschichte gefegt wurde. Die deutschen Soldaten ergaben sich, und mit erhobenen Händen erschossen die Amerikaner Dutzende unbewaffneter deutscher Wächter. Und dies geschah auch nicht in der Hitze des Gefechts, wie es dieser Film suggeriert. Tatsächlich brachten die Amerikaner die Wachen in den Kohlenhof des Lagers, holten ein schweres Maschinengewehr aus ihrem Fahrzeug und brachte es in Stellung, und sie ließen ihre Armeefotografen Bilder von dem Ereignis machen, wie dieses Foto und andere beweisen. Es war ein Kriegsverbrechen. Die Amerikaner spielten Richter, Geschworene und Henker. Sie zerrten sogar deutsche Soldaten aus einem nahe gelegenen Krankenhaus und erschossen sie, obwohl die rein gar nichts mit dem Lager zu tun hatten, geschweige denn mit den Todeszügen. Hier ist das Zeugnis eines der Amerikaner, der an diesem Mord beteiligt war:[48]

“Ich war nicht darauf vorbereitet, was ich in Dachau sah. Nichts konnte dich darauf vorbereiten. Nichts konnte dich auf diese Art von Schlächtereier vorbereiten, die in diesem Lager durchgeführt wurde. [...]

Ich habe es nie gemocht, Menschen unnötig getötet zu sehen, egal, von welchem Schlag sie sind oder was sie getan haben. Wir haben dort einige Leute getötet, was ich für unnötig halte. Aber angesichts der Umstände, während es mir leidtut, es war halt eines jener Dinge, die niemand kontrollieren konnte. Tatsächlich haben die Menschen, die wir getötet haben, einen viel leichteren Tod erlitten als die Menschen, die diese gefoltert und getötet haben, wie wir später herausfanden. Folter und Erhängungen und Hinrichtungen auf verschiedene Arten waren tägliche Vorkommnisse. Wir waren daher ihnen gegenüber in gewisser Weise gütiger, als diese es gegenüber jenen waren, die sie ermordet hatten.”

Das einzige Problem ist, dass die Leute, bei deren Tötung er mithalf, nicht diejenigen waren, die das Lager jahrelang geführt hatten.

Es sind jedoch Beweise ans Licht gekommen, dass die Deutschen die Gefangenen nicht in Züge eingesperrt und mit Maschinengewehre beschossen.

Die Kugeln, die durch die Züge voller Gefangener rasten, waren keine deutschen Kugeln, sondern tatsächlich das Resultat alliierter Kampfflugzeugen, die die Züge beschossen.

Hier spricht ein ehemaliger jüdischer Häftling über die Bombardierung und Beschießung seines Zuges durch die Alliierten, wodurch Häftlinge auf dem

Weg nach Dachau getötet wurden, was ihren Zustand erklärt:

Es wäre eine kurze Fahrt gewesen, aber wir brauchten fast drei Tage, um nach Dachau zu kommen. Was passiert war, wir wurden einem Luftangriff ausgesetzt. Sie bombardierten beide Gleise, sie beschossen unseren Zug mit MGs. Und im Zug, wo ich saß – diesmal war er nicht so voll beladen – wir hockten uns alle nieder. Die beiden Kameraden neben mir wurden von Maschinengewehrsalven getroffen. Und ich halt, Tage... inzwischen waren die Wachen weg. Wir öffneten die Eisenbahnwaggons und stolperten aus den Waggons und ging in den Wald in der Nähe und versteckte uns dort. Erinnere mich daran, wie wir raus in die Felder gingen und Kartoffeln zum Essen ausgruben. Aber sie kamen am nächsten Morgen oder einen Tag später mit Hunden zurück, sammelten uns ein und befahlen uns zurück in den Waggons. Sie haben die Leichen nie entfernt. So kamen wir in Dachau an.”

Dieser Zug des Juden wurde von alliierten Flugzeugen bombardiert und beschossen. Die von den Alliierten getöteten Gefangenen wurden im Zug zurückgelassen. Gefangene, die von den Alliierten nicht gesprengt oder erschossen wurden, erlitten weitere Unterernährung, zum Teil wegen der Bombardierung von Bahngleisen, was ihrer Reise verzögerte.

Die Alliierten waren für die Tötung von vielen Opfern dieser Todeszüge direkt verantwortlich. Kugeln alliierter Flugzeuge zerfetzten die Körper dieser Gefangenen kurz bevor die amerikanische Infanterie in Dachau ankam. US-Infanteristen, die keine Ahnung über die Rolle alliierter Bomben-und Tieffliegerangriffe hatten, die zum Tod der Gefangenen in den Todeszügen beigetragen hatten, gaben den Deutschen die Schuld.

Sie ließen die unbewaffneten deutschen Wachen, die sich ergeben hatten, an einer Mauer antreten und richteten sie hin. Sie begingen ein Kriegsverbrechen, das bis heute ungesühnt geblieben ist. Missverständnisse, Propaganda, Unwahrheiten, Blinder Patriotismus, Fehler, voreilige Schlussfolgerungen. Wie sonst konnten Millionen dazu gebracht werden, ihre eigenen Leute zu töten, im Wesentlichen sich selbst?

“Das war kein Krieg, das war Mord.”

Die Alliierten bombardierten auch direkt KZ-Häftlinge, und heute wird uns gesagt, dies sei ein Beweis für einen deutschen geplanten Holocaust.

Dies ist ein weiterer Auszug aus dem US- Propagandafilm “Nazi Konzentrationslager”, der während des Nürnberger Tribunals gezeigt wurde.

“Das Sklavenarbeitslager in Nordhausen, befreit von der 3. Panzerdivision der 1. Armee. Mindestens dreitausend politische Gefangene starben hier durch die brutalen Hände von SS-Truppen und deutschen Gewohnheitsverbrechern, die die Lagerwachen stellten. Nordhausen war ein Aufbewahrungsort für Sklaven, die nicht fähig waren, in den unterirdischen V-Bombenanlagen zu arbeiten bzw. in anderen deutschen Lagern und Fabriken.”

Eine irreführende Bildunterschrift zu Nordhausen befindet sich im Begleitbuch zu Steven Spielbergs Film The Last Days. Wir sehen amerikanische Soldaten, die an Leichen vorbeilaufen, die auf dem Boden verstreut sind. Die Bildunterschrift lautet:

“Die entsetzliche Szene der Massenvernichtung im KZ Nordhausen.”

Schauen wir uns das Foto genauer an. Wir können erkennen, dass die Gebäude bombardiert wurden. Aussagen einstiger Insassen zeigen, dass sie Glück hatten, alliierte Bombenangriffe zu überleben.

Dieser ehemalige jüdische Häftling und Arzt beschreibt Häftlinge, die in den letzten Kriegstagen mit Tuberkulose im Lagerkrankenhaus lagen.

“Und dort hatte ich über viertausend Gefangene mit Tuberkulose. Krank. Was will man machen? Es ist Tuberkulose. Keine Medikamente, nichts, kaum Essen, es war schon sehr dürftig. Die Deutschen hatten nichts zu essen.”

Dieser ehemalige Gefangene und Arzt beschrieb Bedingungen im Lager in den letzten Tagen des Krieges. Kranke Häftlinge hatten nicht genug Versorgungsgüter. Allerdings weist er darauf hin, dass auch die Deutschen selbst nicht genug zu essen hatten. Es ist klar, dass die Deutschen die kranken Gefangenen jederzeit hätten töten können, doch behandelte sie diese stattdessen in Krankenhäusern.

“Und plötzlich, es war der 3. April um 3 Uhr, Alarm und amerikanische Luftwaffe über uns, und warf die Bomben just auf unser Lager. Und das ganze Lager wurde völlig zerstört. Und von diesen viertausend Menschen, wir waren 200 [die] überlebten. Weil sie dort gestorben sind. Sie waren in den Lagern, nicht wahr? Sie hingen an der Decke, ihre Körper und... Es war furchtbar. Es brannte tagelang. Wir waren immer noch..., die Krankenpfleger, die Ärzte, die Verwaltungsleute, die arbeitende Verwaltung... wir sind weggelaufen. Und die Amerikaner machten einen Fehler, weil sie nicht wussten, dass dies ein Konzentrationslager ist. Sie kannten es als eine Kaserne. Man hatte das Militär im Vormonat geräumt, und im Januar haben sie uns reingelegt, verstehen Sie? Sie wussten es also nicht. Sie kamen dann um 9 Uhr morgens zurück und bombardierten die ganze Stadt. Die ganze Stadt haben sie platt gemacht. Wir sind in den Wald, in die Feldern gelaufen, und als sie die Flugzeuge geleert hatten, kamen sie und beschossen uns mit Maschinengewehren. Sie wussten nicht, wer das ist. Sie sind Deutsche, weißt du? Und wir gingen in den Wald, und wir blieben ungefähr eine Woche im Wald. Und wir haben nur die rohen Kartoffeln gegessen.”

Die britische Royal Air Force bombardierte das Lager voller kranker Häftlinge. Sie kehrten zurück und schossen auf Überlebende, die um ihr Leben rannten. Sie zerbombten die nahegelegene Stadt voller unschuldiger deutscher Zivilisten.

Die Briten sind in erster Linie verantwortlich für diese Szene der “Massenvernichtung”. Bilder des kurz zuvor von britischen Flugzeugen bombardierten und beschossenen Nordhausen werden jedoch heute noch als Beweis für einen vorsätzlichen deutsch-geplanten Holocaust benutzt.

Und es ist wichtig festzuhalten, dass die meisten derjenigen, die auf diesem Foto zu sehen sind, keine Juden sind, sondern in erster Linie nichtjüdische politische Gefangene, einschließlich Polen, Russen und Zeugen Jehovas. Diese mehrheitlich nichtjüdischen Opfer alliierter Bombardements eines ehemaligen Arbeitslagers werden missbraucht, um einen angeblichen jüdischen Holocaust zu verhökern.

Das Oprah-Programm verwendete irreführenderweise zwei Szenen der Auswirkungen des britischen Luftangriffs auf Nordhausen.

“Mehr als sechs Millionen dieser Menschen waren Juden.”

Dieses Opfer alliierter Bombardierung und Beschießung kranker Häftlinge in Nordhausen, das über Trümmern getragen wird, war wahrscheinlich kein Jude. Wir sehen hier also jemanden, der nicht etwa von den Deutschen getötet wurde, sondern von den Briten, und der wahrscheinlich kein Jude ist.

Hier ist eine weitere Szene von Nordhausen. Die Gefangenen des Lagers für schwerkranke Insassen wurden von den Briten zerbombt und zerschossen und wurden in diesem Massengrab beerdigt. Die Soldaten, die am Rand stehen, sind Amerikaner. Aber uns suggeriert man, dies seien Deutsche, die nach gut getaner Arbeit strammstehen.

Tatsächlich haben die Briten diese Gefangenen brutal vom Angesicht der Erde gefegt. Die Deutschen steckten sie in ein Lager mit Ärzten und Krankenpflegern.

Es ist wirklich unglaublich, dass Ihnen diese Bilder als Beweis für ein organisiertes, geplantes, systematisches Vernichtungsprogramm gezeigt wurden, das nach Plan verlief.

“Ein [...] minutiös geplanter und ausgeführter systematischer Massenmord, [...]“

... in Wirklichkeit war dies das Ergebnis der totalen Desorganisation und des völligen Chaos eines kollabierenden Deutschlands, das immer noch gnadenlos in die Unterwerfung bombardiert wurde.

Anstatt das Richtige zu tun und ihre Schuld anzuerkennen für das, was man als versehentlichen Kollateralschaden bezeichnen könnte, verursacht durch fehlerhafte Informationen, wälzten die Alliierten ihre Schuld einfach auf die Deutschen ab. Bilder eines Lagers voller kranker Häftlinge, die von britischen Flugzeugen in Nordhausen bombardiert und beschossen wurden, dienen als Beweis für ein systematisches, geplantes deutsches Vernichtungsprogramm. Allerdings wurde jeder einzelne, zumeist nichtjüdische Gefangene in diesen Bildern von einer britischen Bombe oder Kugel getötet.

Die Bearbeitung des Films Nazi-Konzentrationslager wurde von Budd Schulberg beaufsichtigt, geborener Seymour Schulberg, Sohn des Chefs der Paramount Studios. Schulberg war Jude und bis 1939 Mitglied der Kommunistischen Partei USA.

All diese Toten wurden mit britischen Bomben oder Kugeln ermordet. Aber das wird nicht erwähnt. Schulberg behauptet, sie seien durch die brutalen Hände der Deutschen gestorben.

“Mindestens dreitausend politische Gefangene starben hier durch die brutalen Hände von SS-Truppen und deutschen Gewohnheitsverbrechern, die die Lagerwachen stellten.”

Dies ist eine totale Lüge und Umkehrung der Geschichte. Die letzte Aufnahme des Films Nazi-Konzentrationslager zeigt Aufnahmen eines Gefangenen in Nordhausen, dessen Kopf zertrümmert wurde.

Die Erzählung eines Gefangenen beschreibt genau, wie dies geschah und wer dafür verantwortlich ist:[49]

“Das Bombardement vom 3. April. Die Berichte beziehen sich allem voran auf die Bombardierung vom Dienstag, 3. April: ‘Schon bei der ersten Explosion ging ich unter der Betontreppe des Reviers in Deckung. Eine Bombe traf den Block, und die Treppe wurde zerstört. Ich rannte in die Mitte des Lagers, zu einem Bunker, der direkt in den Boden gegraben wurde, wo schon ein Dutzend Zivilisten, Frauen, Kinder und auch ein SS-Mann waren – so grün vor Angst wie seine Uniform – der nur stammeln konnte: ‘Schrecklich! Schrecklich!’ Und es war tatsächlich kein schöner Anblick; Leichen alle fünf oder sechs Meter, kopflos oder ihre Eingeweide aufgerissen.”

Bilder von Nordhausen sind heute als Beweis für einen jüdischen Holocaust weit verbreitet. Warum ist gerade dieses Bild so beliebt? Die Leichen, die von den Briten gesprengt oder erschossen, dann aus Kratern oder Gebäudetrümmern gezogen und von den Amerikanern in Reih und Glied hingelegt wurden, sollen eine geordnete deutsche Methode des Massenmordes suggerieren. Offenbar will man uns glauben machen, die

Deutschen hätten diese Gefangenen hier in Reih und Glied antreten lassen und hätten sie erschossen, wo sie standen. Wären diese Toten deutsche Soldaten, würden sich die Briten für diese glänzende Leistung auf die Schulter klopfen. Stattdessen schoben die Alliierten die Schuld an ihrer Bombardierungs- und Beschießungspanne schlicht auf die Deutschen ab. Was für ein entsetzlicher Betrug, der direkt vor unseren Augen abgezogen wird. Bilder von tragischen Todesfällen, die das direkte Ergebnis alliierter Handlungen waren, werden zynisch ausgebeutet, um eine Lüge zu verkaufen.

[Bildmaterial mit US-Historiker Stephen Ambrose:]

“Adolf Hitler war das Böse schlechthin. Und er war der Oberbefehlshaber der fortschrittlichsten Technologie und des am besten disziplinierten Volkes und des am besten ausgebildeten Volkes der Welt.”

“In den falschen Händen trug Technologie dazu bei, Europa in ein Schlachthaus zu verwandeln. Das war ein Krieg, der zudem ein Verbrechen war.”

“Eisenhower, als er das erste Mal Konzentrationslagern begegnete, war schockiert und überrascht. Er hatte davon nichts erfahren. Seine unmittelbare Reaktion war, ‘Das ist so schrecklich, dass es eines Tages unweigerlich zu einer revisionistischen Bewegung kommen wird, die sagen wird, ‘das ist nie passiert; das ist Propaganda; das ist ein Fantasiegebilde der Kriegszeit,’ weshalb er darauf bestand, dass jeder abkömmliche US-Soldat durch diese Lager geschleust wird, und er sagte: ‘Bringt Eure Kameras mit.’”

Dies ist ein klassisches Zitat, das verwendet wird, um Revisionisten zu widerlegen. Eisenhower sagte, es würde in Zukunft Leugner geben, weshalb er Zeugen befahl, durch die Lager zu gehen und sie zu filmen. Niemand bestreitet, dass dies echte Leichen sind. Aber die falsche Analyse ihrer Todesursache, den Deutschen die Schuld dafür unterzuschieben, das ist die

Propaganda. Jede einzelne Szene in dieser Nachrichtensendung wurde in Nordhausen aufgenommen. Alle Aufnahmen von ermordeten Gefangenen im Krankenlager von Nordhausen zeigen die von den Briten gesprengten oder erschossenen Gefangenen.

Dies ist ein weiteres Beispiel für die Propagandaformel: angeblicher Experte, irreführende Bilder, und all jene böartige Hasser nennen, die Frage stellen. Es hat sich gezeigt, dass dieser Meisterhistoriker später des Plagiats beschuldigt wurde, durchgeführt während seiner gesamten Karriere.[50]

Er log sogar über Hunderte mit Eisenhower verbrachte Stunden und über tägliche Treffen mit ihm. Offizielle Unterlagen zeigen, dass er mit Eisenhower offiziell fünf Stunden verbrachte. Das ist die Mentalität dieser Meisterhistoriker, die an die Spitze der Monopolmedien befördert wurden. Es gab keinen Plan, diese Gefangenen in diesen Zustand zu versetzen. Dies war das Ergebnis des katastrophalen Endes des Krieges. Nicht alles verlief perfekt nach einem böartigen Plan.

Bis heute sind diese Bilder von einer Planieraupe, die nackte, ausgemergelte Leichen in ein Massengrab in Bergen-Belsen schiebt, die schrecklichsten Bilder in der Geschichte des Films. Dieses Filmmaterial wurde unserer Großelterngeneration auf einer großen Leinwand gezeigt. Es wurde Ihnen in jungen Jahren gezeigt. Was sollen Sie glauben? Einige Programme wie die Oprah-Präsentation verleiten einen dazu anzunehmen, dies sei ein Deutscher, der diese Panieraupe fährt und sein Tagessoll an vergasteten Juden macht, anstatt eines britischen Soldaten, der die Opfer der Fleckfieberepidemie in ein Massengrab schiebt.

Bis zum Ende des Krieges war Bergen-Belsen kein Todeslager, wo Deutsche absichtlich Gefangene verhungern ließen und ermordeten. Tatsächlich wurde es ursprünglich als Erholungslager bezeichnet, bzw. als Krankenlager, wo kranke Häftlinge hingeschickt wurden, um ihre Gesundheit zu verbessern. Bis zu den letzten Kriegstagen war dies kein so schrecklicher Ort, und es gibt Beweise, die dies untermauern. Rose Kahn, eine ungarische Jüdin, wurde im Sommer 1944 von Auschwitz nach Bergen-Belsen transportiert. Bevor Auschwitz aufgegeben und Bergen-

Belsen stark überfüllt wurde, beschreibt sie Bergen-Belsen als keinen so schrecklichen Ort:

“Als wir also in Bergen-Belsen ankamen, und sie uns sagten, wir sollten raus, und die Nazis mit diesen großen, großen Hunden kamen, mit ihren Wölfen, und sie uns fragten, wer nicht laufen kann, krank ist, der sollte es ihnen sagen, damit sie uns in einen Bus setzen. Ich hatte Angst, es zu sagen. Ich konnte nicht laufen, aber ich sagte es nicht. Und wenn ich es gesagt hätte, wäre es gut gewesen, denn das war kein schlechter Ort. Das war es nicht zu dieser Zeit, zu jener Zeit.”

“Also mit anderen Worten, es war kein Trick?”

“Nein, nein.”

“Die hätten Sie wirklich mit dem Bus genommen.”

“Ja, ja, ja.”

“Ich denke du hattest recht.”

“Ja, aber ich hatte solche Angst, so dass meine Mutter und meine Freunde mich hielten. Wir mussten ein paar Meilen laufen, etliche Meilen dahin. Und wir kamen dort an, und wir lebten in Zelten und Stroh, wir schliefen auf Stroh. Und wir wurden nicht schlecht behandelt. Nein, es war nicht so schlimm dort drüben. Wir bekamen gute Mahlzeiten. Was ist passiert? Sie wollten uns kräftig haben, um uns zur Arbeit zu schicken, weshalb sie keine schwachen und kranken Menschen wollten.”

Zeugen wie diese helfen zu beweisen, dass Bergen-Belsen in keinerlei Hinsicht ein speziell ausgelegtes Todeslager war. Vor dem katastrophalen Ende des Krieges wurden die Gefangenen routinemäßig ernährt und anständig betreut.

Der große Trick der Holocaust-Werbeindustrie besteht darin, diese schrecklichen Bilder ausgemergelter Körper zu zeigen und Sie glauben zu machen, dass die Gefangenen immer so aussahen; dass die Deutschen sie sofort verhungern ließen, und dass dieses vorsätzliche Verhungern seit Jahren vor sich ging als Teil ihres Vernichtungsplans. Zeugen wie diese und andere beweisen jedoch, dass die Konzentrationslager manchmal nicht gar so schrecklich waren.

Erst als Deutschland den Krieg verlor, auf allen Seiten umzingelt von einem Terrorbombenfeldzug vom Westen und von marodierenden Sowjets im Osten, verschlechterten sich die Bedingungen in Lagern wie Bergen-Belsen katastrophal.

“Und dann blieben wir dort, bis sie begannen, Baracken zu bauen für all die anderen Auschwitz-Leute, als Bergen-Belsen zur Hölle wurde.”

Bergen-Belsen wurde ganz am Ende des Krieges zur Hölle. Der Hauptgrund dafür war der Bombenfeldzug der Alliierten. Als die Alliierten deutsche Bevölkerungszentren bombardierten und dabei unschuldige Männer, Frauen und Kinder lebendig verbrannten und so ziemlich alles beschossen oder bombardiert, was sich auf Straßen oder Bahngleisen bewegte, hatten selbst die Deutschen damals Schwierigkeiten, genug zu essen zu finden.

[Interviews mit Lagerüberlebenden:]

“Das Essen hat sich nicht sehr verbessert, weil, einfacher Grund, sie hatten selbst nicht viel, daher...”

“Haben die Zivilisten überhaupt versucht, Ihnen zu helfen? Haben sie Waren gegen Dinge eingetauscht?”

“Es ist wie ich’s sage. Wir hatten fast alles, was wir wollten, von den Fußballmannschaften, von den Zivilisten, von Zivilisten draußen.”

Die Ausbreitung tödlicher Krankheiten und starke Überbelegung verschlimmerten die ganze Lage. Gefangene aus Gebieten im Osten, die jetzt von den Sowjets überrannt wurden, wurden hastig nach Westen evakuiert. Nach tage- oder wochenlanger Reise, oft zu Fuß, verschlug es sie letztlich in jene überfüllten Lager voll tödlicher Krankheiten. Und weil die deutsche Infrastruktur zerstört wurde, war das katastrophal.

Anfang Februar 1945 wurde ein großer Transport von Juden in Bergen-Belsen eingewiesen, während die Entwesungsanlage außer Betrieb war. Infolgedessen brach Fleckfieber aus und verbreitete sich schnell unkontrolliert. Die Heißluft-Entlausungsmaschine arbeitete manchmal mehrere Tage lang nicht. Der schlimmste Mörder war das Fleckfieber. Typhus und Ruhr forderten aber auch Leben.

Ordnung und Kommunikation im gesamten deutschen System brachen zusammen, als die Deutschen den Krieg verloren und um ihr Überleben kämpften. Zugladungen von Lebensmitteln wurden von alliierten Flugzeugen zerstört. Der letzte Faktor, der in Bergen-Belsen massenhaft Opfer garantierte, kam in den letzten Wochen des Krieges hinzu: Die Alliierten bombardierten das Kraftwerk, das die Anlagen mit Strom versorgte, die Wasser ins Lager pumpten.

Das Kraftwerk, das die Pumpen mit Strom versorgte, die Bergen-Belsen mit

Wasser versorgten, wurde nicht etwa von einer unbekanntem Macht abgestellt. Es wurde von den Briten gesprengt. Ein zerstörtes System zur Versorgung des Lagers mit sauberem Wasser verschlimmerte die bereits katastrophalen hygienischen und medizinischen Zustände. Sauberes Wasser, das notwendig war, um Gefangene zu duschen, Kleider zu waschen und durstenden Typhus-, Ruhr- und Fleckfieberpatienten etwas zum Trinken zu geben, wurde tatsächlich von britischen Bomben abgestellt.

Eine mobile bakteriologische Einheit und alle möglichen medizinischen Hilfsmittel wurden zusammen mit 90 Medizinstudenten aus Londoner Krankenhäusern rasch zur Stelle gebracht, um damit fertig zu werden.

Mangel an Seife und Wasser brachte den Insassen Läuse ein, und Läuse übertragen Fleckfieber. Um das Fleckfieber loszuwerden, man muss zuerst die Läuse loswerden, weshalb kontaminierte Patienten aus ihren Hütten entfernt wurden und eine Reinigungsprozedur durchliefen.”

Die Briten hatten Mühe, die katastrophalen Zustände in Bergen-Belsen nach der Befreiung zu verbessern. Viele Tausende starben nach der Befreiung. Am Ende verbrannten die Briten die Holzbaracken, da sie mit tödlichen Fleckfieber-übertragenden Körperläusen verseucht waren. Bilder von der katastrophalen Lage in Bergen-Belsen werden irreführend benutzt, um eine absichtliche deutsche Vernichtungspolitik zu illustrieren.

Diese nach der Befreiung aufgenommenen Bilder von Bergen-Belsen sowie Dachau und Nordhausen sind zu Symbolen der deutschen Barbarei geworden. Aber diese Menschen waren Opfer des größeren Krieges, nicht einer vorsätzlichen deutschen Vernichtungspolitik. Die Deutschen taten, was sie konnten, um die Menschen am Leben zu erhalten, und in einigen Fällen kontaktierte sie das Rote Kreuz um Hilfe und übergaben ihnen sogar einige Lager. Die beschämende Wahrheit, die sich hinter dieser Holocaust-Propaganda verbirgt, ist nicht nur, dass keine diese Leute vergast wurden, sondern dass die Alliierten eine wichtige Rolle bei ihrem Tod spielten.

So schrecklich diese Bilder ausgemergelter Gefangener auch sind, Bilder von Nordstaaten-Gefangenen im Bürgerkriegslager Andersonville der Südstaaten zeigen auch befreite Häftlinge, die in einem ähnlichen Zustand erscheinen. Was in Andersonville passierte, war ein völliger Zusammenbruch der Hygienemaßnahmen aufgrund unzureichender sanitärer Einrichtungen. Toiletten im überfüllten Lager flossen nicht richtig ab, so dass die Gefangenen Schmutz und Krankheiten ausgesetzt waren, insbesondere Ruhr. Symptome von Ruhr sind Durchfall und schneller Gewichtsverlust. In extremen Fällen können Patienten einen Liter Flüssigkeit pro Stunde verlieren. Es ist leicht einzusehen, wie jemand, der wiederholt defäkiert, sich übergibt und uriniert, schnell an Körpergewicht verliert, vor allem, wenn Nahrungsmittel, Medikamente und Wasser knapp wurden.

Mit zunehmender Überbelegung stiegen ebenso die Opferzahlen in Andersonville. Auch die Südstaaten verloren den Krieg auf eine katastrophale Weise, ähnlich wie die Deutschen. Es gibt also einen direkten Zusammenhang zwischen den Bildern von Gefangenen in Andersonville und den sogenannten Holocaust-Bildern.

Nun sind diese Menschen in Andersonville keine Juden, und niemand hat je behauptet, die Südstaaten hätten einen totalen Völkermord an den Nordstaatlern angestrebt. Die Fotografien von Andersonville und zum Beispiel von Bergen-Belsen sind sich sehr ähnlich und korrelieren mit dem Zusammenbruch von Hygiene, mit Überbelegung, der Ausbreitung von Krankheiten und mit der katastrophalen Niederlage von einer Seite des Krieges. Was Sie in diesen Bildern in Bergen-Belsen sehen, ist in erster Linie das Ergebnis von Fleckfieber.

Fleckfieber ist eine Krankheit, die von der Körperlaus übertragen wird, die Kopfläusen ähnelt. Körperläuse bevorzugen es jedoch, sich nicht an der Kopfhaut anzulagern, sondern in den inneren Nähten der Kleidung. Das Fleckfieber war im Laufe der Geschichte für den Tod von Millionen verantwortlich. Fleckfieberepidemien traten in Kriegszeiten regelmäßig in ganz Europa auf. Während des Ersten Weltkriegs starben mehr als drei Millionen Menschen an Fleckfieber.

Was Sie in diesen Bildern sehen, sind in erster Linie Opfer einer Fleckfieber-Epidemie. Die Deutschen haben sie nicht absichtlich verhungern lassen. Wir können etliche Personen sehen, die aus den Lagern befreit wurden. Obwohl sie nicht in tadellosem Zustand sind, sind etliche gut genährt, einige sogar fett. Sie hatten einfach keine Krankheit. Die Deutschen versuchten tatsächlich, die Ausbreitung von Krankheiten zu stoppen. Das Insektizid Zyklon B war ein Pestizid, das verwendet wurde, um diese tödlichen Fleckfieber-übertragenden Körperläuse zu töten.

Zyklon B hat von Natur aus nichts Mörderisches an sich. Zyklon B wurde sogar an der mexikanischen Grenze eingesetzt, um die Kleidung von Mexikanern zu begasen, die die Grenze [zur USA] überschritten. Der Entlausungsvorgang lief wie folgt ab:

Gefangene, die in ein Lager kamen, zogen ihre Kleidung aus und bekamen einen Haarschnitt, um Bereiche zu verhindern, wo tödliche Fleckfieber-übertragende Körperläuse gedeihen könnten. Dann duschten sie heiß. Gleichzeitig wurde ihre Kleidung in speziell dafür ausgelegten Begasungskammern behandelt, wo Begasungsmannschaften das Insektizid Zyklon B verwendeten, um tödliche Fleckfieber-übertragende Körperläuse zu töten.

Die Gefangenen bekamen dann saubere, läusefreie Kleidung und betraten das Lager. Man erkennt leicht, wie dieser lebensrettende Entlausungsvorgang mit echten Begasungskammern für Kleidung und echten Duschen zu Kriegspropaganda über Gasduschen umgedeutet wurde, und zwar von Gefangenen, die Gerüchte verbreiten, wie auch von sowjetische Propagandisten, die ihre Feinde absichtlich verleumdeten.

Eines der letzten Exponate im Holocaust Memorial Museum der Vereinigten Staaten in Washington, D.C. fasst die Bedeutung der in diesem Video dargelegten Informationen zusammen.

Museumsbesucher werden mit Filmszenen bombardiert, die aufgenommen wurden, nachdem die Alliierten Konzentrations- und Arbeitslager erobert hatten. Diese Filme sollen Beweise für eine gezielte deutsche Vernichtungspolitik darstellen. Doch haben Sie jetzt viele dieser Szenen gesehen, erklärt und widerlegt bekommen.

Gegen Ende der Hauptausstellung des Museums gibt es zwei Sätze von je drei Videomonitoren, die eine gefallene Naziflagge flankieren. Sie zeigen Filmaufnahmen, die nach Eroberung der Lager durch die Alliierten aufgenommen wurden.

Jeder der drei Monitore ist einer der drei großen alliierten Mächte gewidmet: die Sowjetunion, die Vereinigten Staaten und Großbritannien.

Auf diesem Bildschirm sind Aufnahmen der US-Armee aus Nordhausen, Dachau und Buchenwald zu sehen. Der Untertitel lautet:

“Ortsansässigen deutschen Zivilisten wird befohlen, das KZ Buchenwald zu besuchen.”

Dies ist ein amerikanischer Armeeeoffizier, der Deutsche um einen angeblich aus Menschenhaut gemachten Lampenschirm versammelt sowie um einen mit Propaganda-Requisiten gefüllten Tisch. Den Besuchern werden die Dachauer Todeszüge gezeigt, die gefüllt sind mit Opfern alliierter Bomben- und Tieffliegerangriffe. Majdanek, die Außenansicht einer echten Duschanlage “Bad und Desinfektion II”, und das Innere von “Bad und Desinfektion I”, dessen echten, funktionierenden Duschaum zeigend. Auch hier ist die Kamera von den vielen Fenstern abgewandt. Der Untertitel lautet:

“Offiziere der Sowjetarmee inspizieren Kammern, in denen Gefangene durch Giftgas getötet wurden.”

Heute räumt jeder ernsthafte etablierte Historiker ein, dass dies keine Gaskammer mit falschen Duschköpfen war, sondern ein echter, funktionierender Dushraum, dazu ausgelegt, um Gefangene am Leben und frei von Krankheiten zu halten.

Und wieder die Planierraupe, die Opfer der Fleckfieberepidemie in Bergen-Belsen in ein Massengrab schiebt. Eine Katastrophe, aber weder beabsichtigt noch geplant.

Auf dem letzten Bildschirm zeigt man uns Aufnahmen von Nordhausen, das von 500 britischen Bombern zwei Tage lang völlig zerbombt wurde. Ähnlich wie beim Nürnberger Prozess zeigt man uns in der letzten Szene, bevor wir zur Ausstellung über Nachkriegsprozesse gehen, das Opfer britischer Bomber in Nordhausen mit seiner offenen Hirnschale.

Wie makaber, bluttriefende Bilder alliierter Luftangriffsoptionen als Beweis für die Bosheit der Deutschen zu zeigen.

Mütter scheuchen ihre Kinder an diesem Exponat vorbei, ohne je den Zusammenhang dieser Bilder in Frage zu stellen. Dies ist beeindruckende, traumatisierende Gedankenkontrolle zwecks Gehirnwäsche, nicht mittels Logik und Fakten, sondern indem man diese Horrorbilder in das Gedächtnis des gefesselten Publikums einbrennt, um Gefühle mit verlogenen Schilderungen zu manipulieren.

Echte Duschräume, gefälschte, untergeschobene Beweise wie dieser Lampenschirm und Opfer der alliierten Bombardierung sind keine Beweise für einen Völkermord mit Gaskammern, die als Duschräume getarnt waren.

Wir wurden manipuliert, irreführt und belogen. Bilder, die während der letzten Tage eines zerstörten und zusammengebrochenen Deutschlands aufgenommen wurden, wurden uns als Beweis für ein systematisches, geplantes Vernichtungsprogramm gezeigt. Nach weiteren Untersuchungen durch die Westalliierten sind diese Behauptungen von mit Menschengaskammern ausgestattet Vernichtungslagern in den vom Westen befreiten Lagern auf der Strecke geblieben.

Die beeindruckenden Bilder dieser vom Westen befreiten, überfüllten, krankheitsverseuchten Lager, die in den letzten Monaten des schlimmsten Krieges der Menschheitsgeschichte durch den alliierten Bombenfeldzug verwüstet wurden, werden jedoch immer noch dazu benutzt, um die Öffentlichkeit einer Gehirnwäsche zu unterziehen als Beweis für ein Vernichtungsprogramm mit Gaskammern, die als Duschräume getarnt sind, in Lagern, die von der Sowjetunion erobert wurden.

Im Teil 2 dieses Dokumentarfilms werden wir einige Aspekte des berüchtigtsten dieser Lager untersuchen: Auschwitz.

Erklärung

Dieser Dokumentarfilm will das nationalsozialistische Regime Deutschlands nicht von irgendwelchen seiner unbestrittenen Missetaten reinwaschen. Die Inhaftierung von Personen ohne ordnungsgemäße Verfahren ist ein Verbrechen. Jede Behörde, die ein solches Verbrechen begeht, trägt letztlich die Verantwortung für diejenigen, die sich in seiner Obhut befinden.

Dieses Verbrechen wurde jedoch nicht nur von den deutschen Behörden vor und während des Zweiten Weltkriegs begangen, sondern während des Krieges auch von US-Behörden, die viele japanische Amerikaner inhaftierten sowie italienische und deutsche Einwanderer. Der größte Verbrecher in dieser Hinsicht war jedoch der wichtigste Verbündete der USA des Zweiten Weltkriegs, die Sowjetunion, wo Millionen eingesperrt und schließlich ermordet wurden, und zwar vor, während und nach dem Krieg.

Leider wird dieses Verbrechen der ungesetzlichen Inhaftierung von US-Behörden heute wieder begangen in Guantanamo Bay und anderen ähnlichen Einrichtungen.

Some More Testimonies from Greece

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Abstract

Continuing from the previous article, we will examine some more Greek testimonies, this time from the book The Holocaust in the Testimonies of the Greek Jews (To olokautoma stis martyries ton ellinon evraion). This book contains excerpts from published testimonies as well as oral ones. We will examine the most important concerning the extermination claims.

Marcel Nadjari

This witness was recently in the news because researchers have managed to read a letter he supposedly buried in Birkenau where he supposedly worked as a member of a Sonderkommando (see this paper). According to the book, Nadjari wrote two manuscripts (A and B). Manuscript A was written in 1944 and is the aforementioned letter. Only a short paragraph is reproduced in the book, in which the author states that the Nadjari family has been murdered by the Germans and now he expects to die. No details are given.

Manuscript B was written in 1947. It is quite detailed, but curiously Nadjari does not mention the letter he buried. Anyway, let's see what he has to say. Upon arrival at the camp:

“At first sight everything looked normal, and in fact the Germans that received us at the station were quite good. We did not see them beating anyone, on the contrary they were all good.” (p. 53)

Then the selection followed. Old and disabled who could not walk were loaded onto trucks and driven off. He never saw them again. He and the rest went to Birkenau on foot for the shower and the haircut. They stayed in quarantine for a month, as to which he writes:

“Various rumors began to circulate, that those that have gone left in the trucks after we disembarked from the train have been burned, after they killed them. Of course we did not believe it and thought that the Poles in the camp were telling us this to demoralize us, make us ill and take our bread.” (p. 57)

He also describes the leader of his block, a Pole from France, large, always shaved and the “worst man you could imagine”, who beat them every day. Finally, he was transferred to Crematorium III (he refers to it as II as he doesn’t count the crematorium in Auschwitz) where he realized that the rumors were true. He describes the gassings as follows:

“Then, after it was filled and everyone had entered the gas room, the door was closed and, immediately afterwards, the two experts on the gas climbed above and opened four cans and emptied them from above either laughing or chatting about other things. They put back the concrete slab. Many times they came down to the small scuttle on the door, watching, with a stopwatch in hand, the minutes needed so that none remains alive (a matter of 6-7 minutes).” (p. 62)

Despite the fact that it is impossible to kill 2,500 people in 6-7 minutes, this description is in disagreement with the official claims. Nadjari speaks of ONE opening covered by a concrete slab, where there should have been four. Furthermore, the SS are supposed to have introduced the Zyklon in a basket which was then lowered into the chamber through iron-mesh columns. After the execution the Zyklon was removed by pulling the basket back up. But Nadjari has them simply emptying the cans in the hole.

After the execution the bodies had to be cremated. Nadjari first writes:

“The crematories were working constantly. Two or three trains came every day, and each train had from 2,500 to 3,000 people. In crematoriums I or II, it took about 24 hours to cremate 2,500 people, depending on the bodies.” (p. 61)

Crematoriums II and III had 15 muffles each (five triple-muffle furnaces), capable of cremating 15 bodies per hour. So in theory they could not cremate more than 300-400 bodies a day. We could push this to 500 or more and still it would be very far from 2,500. So how was this done? Nadjari claims they burned three bodies in 30 minutes in each muffle, with one of the bodies being always female as the burning was thus faster. Every six hours they removed the ashes (p. 64). Except for the fact that all this is impossible, even by his description and allowing around one hour for cleaning every six hours, they could cremate about 1,800 bodies, not 2,500 and certainly not 3,000.

In summary, this witness doesn’t say anything new when it comes to gassings and cremations, not taking into account the contradictions. Not only that, but claims such as the following are enough to shatter his credibility:

“As head of all the crematories they put Molle. [...] He was the terror of the camp and Kramer himself. [...] Once, he threw an entire truck loaded with patients, alive in the pit where they burned alive, in horrible pain.” (p. 60)

Albert Menasche

Menasche was a doctor. His memoir titled Memories of an Eyewitness: How 72,000 Greek Jews Perished was first published in 1947. But his narrative reads more like a novel than a report. Here is an example:

“Around the middle of May, work proceeds to a nightmarish rate. Every three hours, a train empties its wave of travelers. Usually, while the previous train has not yet left the station, another one comes and stops at the parallel track. Tireless, the doctor of the SS performs the selection. Endless lines of old men, women and children walk towards the ghastly ovens. During the 24 hours of the day, the sad parade continues. Chimneys of the crematories and pits burn non-stop. The sky is constantly black from the smoke. Night acquires a reddish hue that covers the entire camp with a horrid glow. The smell of burning flesh is choking us.” (p. 77)

So what about the facts? Well, here’s one:

“A truck is immediately sent to receive the sick. After a few minutes the load is emptied in the burning pit. It’s unnecessary to poison the sick with gas. It is, after all, much faster to throw them alive into the flames.” (p. 78)

The following illuminates even more the (in)credibility of this witness:

“We saw that in Birkenau there were four crematories, each equipped with four ovens. Each oven burned three bodies in three minutes. At such a rate Moloch gobbled up 144 victims every three minutes.” (p. 76)

Yes, you read correctly. Three MINUTES.

Mark Nahon

Also a doctor. His testimony was first published in 1949 in a newspaper. As with the previous witness, he has a hard time writing an objective account. For example:

“The crematory is, one would say, a savage and ravenous beast with great similarity to the beasts of mythology. It’s a kind of Minotaur, feeding on human victims. When there’s no transport, and therefore no food, it attacks the prisoners of the camp. It is not enough for it then to devour all the sick, what it needs is a specific number of people to devour, whether disabled or perfectly healthy. In order to satisfy its ravenous hunger, in order to preserve, one would say, in good condition its monstrous organs, it asks for two, three, four thousand victims, at once.” (p. 96)

According to him, after a transport arrived, the camp doctor sent to the crematory about 75% of the deportees. Every day more than 15,000 (!) people were burned. In addition to crematories, there were also two enormous pits where the Jews were burned with logs. More than 200 train cars with logs were always available for this. The prisoners, as they unloaded the logs from the train, were saying in all seriousness:

“This is my log. It will be used to burn me!” (p. 99)

The witness also gives the testimony of one of his friends, a reporter in a newspaper, who worked as a Sonderkommando. He describes a gassing in Crematorium II as follows:

“This door closes hermetically. Above it there is an electric clock and some kind of skylight which is closed with a very thick glass. An SS man opens the box and takes out two bottles, similar to heat-insulating bottles. They are bottles with asphyxiant gasses. He opens the skylight, throws with force the bottles, and he closes it quickly. The electric clock shows 8:05. As they fall, the bottles are smashed, and they cause a detonation. Immediately I hear a second sound, like hundreds of snakes hissing. Desperate voices and horrible screams are getting stronger. Am I in hell? The walls of the gassing room are shaking from the desperate hits of the suffocating unfortunate victims. Hands hit the glass of the skylight intending to break it. [...] Then there is absolute silence. How long did this last? Three minutes, five minutes? The SS man looks at the clock and presses a button. Inside the gassing room a fan clears the atmosphere. They open the door. What a dreadful sight!” (p. 102)

Needless to say, this description is entirely fictional. Suffice it to point out that it is completely at odds with the official version (see above).

Solomon Benadon

One final testimony that appeared in a Jewish newspaper on January 4, 1946. Officially, the Hungarian Operation involved some 400,000+ Jews. Here’s what this witness states about this with characteristic drama:

“The macabre transports of the Hungarians had started to arrive. In 3-4 weeks, the trains arrived day and night, and vomited their innocent cargo in the voracious mouths of the ovens of Birkenau. More than 800,000 new victims were thrown as prey to the Nazi beast during this time. The 60 mouths of hell were constantly devouring at the fastest possible rate.” (p. 106)

As these were not enough “mouths of hell,” two pits had to be opened. But the description is quite original:

“To accelerate the job, they had made two ‘bunkers’ (that name had various usages at the camps), gigantic. Those that worked there describe them as 2 huge concrete pools which had at their edges one Decauville railway track. At the bottom they placed large planks, on which they placed the corpses brought by the rail wagons, which came directly from the suffocation chambers, then a second layer of firewood, new corpses, then a third, fourth and so on, until the pit was full. They sprinkled everything with plenty of gasoline, and they set fire. Each bunker, which was divided into 4 compartments, could hold more than 500 bodies. The flames could be seen from many kilometers away. When someone would first see the fire, he would think that the forest around the macabre place was on fire. That time, spring of ’44, there was a shortage of Zyklon (the asphyxiant gas) for 2 weeks. During that time, they would throw the victims alive into the flames.” (p. 107)

This description is also totally at odds with the official version and entirely fictional. The pits that were supposedly used for the cremation of the bodies were just trenches, not concrete structures like a pool (and with compartments!).

Summary

In the Preface we read:

“According to Roman justice, to prove a crime two witnesses were necessary. For the crimes of Nazism, the numerous testimonies (18,000 by 1960) replaced the evidence that the perpetrators tried meticulously to eliminate.” (p. 8)

And yet, the more we examine these testimonies, the more we fail to find reliable information regarding the planned extermination of camp prisoners with poison gas. In fact the survivors above who claim to be actually eyewitnesses, apart from their nonsensical statements, contradict both themselves and the official story. What would a Roman judge rule with testimonies such as these?

Some Testimonies from Thessaloniki | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Abstract

Oral Testimonies of the Jews from Thessaloniki about the Holocaust. What's this you ask? This is the book we are going to focus on this time. As survivor testimonies are very important for the official storyline, it's clear that the more of them we examine, the closer we get to the truth. Testimonies are also a big hurdle for many people to even consider taking a look at Holocaust revisionism, as they tend to think that so many survivors cannot possibly be lying. They can't be blamed for that, and indeed, most of the survivors are certainly not lying. The problem is that very few people have actually read a single testimony, and those that have done so, did not do it carefully. So, let's get down to it.

The Numbers

There are 51 interviews in the book (26 women, 25 men). Except for two, the rest have been in Auschwitz–Birkenau. Now, here is the interesting part: 39 out of these 51 never mention gas chambers. Not once. On the other hand, almost all of them know about the crematories (45 out of 51). This is quite unexpected. But let's ignore this for now and see what the survivors have to say.

The Rumor Factory

As we know, upon arrival at the camp, there was a selection, and many would go on their separate ways. The survivors describe in detail the numerous hardships they have suffered, and how they lost their relatives. But how do they know this? When we look for an answer, we realize that they did not actually see them die. One witness puts it this way:

“I learned it in the camp. We were asking where are our moms, our dads and they were telling us: They are gone... [...] Since we did not see anyone, we believed it.” (p. 58)

Another:

“We learned it at the camp from the blockälteste, who told us to look after ourselves, because our people are no longer alive.” (p. 92)

Another:

“We have not yet learned anything about our parents. We could see smoke rising from afar and were wondering what it is. Until a prisoner, Slovak or Polish, in broken French, told us: ‘What are you waiting for? There are your mothers. They have burned them. There are no more.’ That’s how we learned about the great tragedy. At first we did not believe her. We thought she was crazy. But later we learned it for real!” (p. 118)

Another:

“We found out when we entered the camp. They were other older Greek women, who came before us. [...] They told us that they are burning them in the crematoria. [...] Since they who had been in the camp a long time were telling us this, of course I believed it.” (p. 176)

Another:

“After we went there, we were asking the Polish who were political prisoners, what is it that’s burning? For 5-10 days they were telling us it’s rye bread they are making, and then they told us it’s our families.” (p. 242)

Another:

“At first I did not believe it. ‘Impossible’, I said. ‘We are being duped’. But when after a week we heard other prisoners confirming it, most of them long-term inmates, French, Polish, Jews from Russia, we believed it.” (p. 289)

And another:

“We were seeing the ovens and they told us that they went to the ovens. The other prisoners told us this.” (p. 271)

And on and on. Those of us who have served in the military know very well what kind of a rumor factory a camp can be. All sorts of things are spread from one person to the next. Nobody questions what he hears, and usually he asks someone else for confirmation who is just as clueless. Needless to say, the misinformation problem was much worse in a concentration camp with the crematories next door, in the middle of a war. And the prisoners had no way of knowing the truth.

Now, what is most interesting is that there are two women who actually saw their fathers after they had been told that they were dead. The first talked with him for a while and later received a note from him before eventually losing all contact (p. 27). The second found out that her father was at Buna and perished during the retreat (p. 143).

So, most of the survivors are not lying. They fell victim to the rumors that were rampant at the camps. Here is another well-known rumor:

“Then they gave us a little soap and told us it’s from the ashes of our parents. We did not even touch those soaps.” (p. 29)

The Selections

Then, we have the selections. Selections were going on all the time at the camp. The prisoners went through numerous ones, and of course they were certain that these were life-or-death situations:

“Indeed, we knew very well then that whomever they picked not for work, he was to be burned; we had understood this well. Not only had we understood it, but it was deep in our minds that whoever was not for work was for burning.” (p. 27)

Or more simply:

“If someone got sick, he was immediately sent to the crematory.” (p. 147)

And yet in the same book we read about some prisoners who got seriously sick at the camp, but they did not “burn”. For example, one woman says:

“I contracted typhus at Birkenau. The Germans came every day to take for the oven. I wasn’t the only one at the hospital. There were others...” (p. 55)

Despite that, nobody sent her to the furnace. Instead, she was later sent to Auschwitz where she spent another two months in bed. She was eventually transferred to Bergen-Belsen.

Another woman suffered from scabies. She was treated at the Auschwitz hospital and recovered. And yet she seems to believe that:

“In Birkenau they would have never given me medicine, they would have put me to the gas.” (p. 196)

Finally, a prisoner was accidentally shot in the leg by an SS man. But no gas for him. He was sent to the hospital, where they removed the bullet. He also had an operation for a hernia in his stomach. He stayed four months at the hospital (p. 392). Quite a lot of trouble the Germans went through for one man, right? But the prisoners were so convinced that their lives were constantly in danger that they misinterpreted everything:

“If the German took your card with him, tomorrow morning you were going to burn. They were saying that they will send you to a better camp to recover some of your strength. They did this once to fool us. A transport that left for the crematorium, came back after a month.” (p. 329)

So, it was all just an evil German trick! But the prisoners were too smart for that. Still, sometimes they realized they were wrong. A prisoner went voluntarily through a selection in order to be transferred to Germany. He thought that those who were left behind were going to be killed. But:

“The rest were not murdered then. Some of course died later. But some were liberated six months before me. It wasn’t a selection for the crematoria, as we thought. They wanted only the strongest to be sent to Germany, while they kept the weakest at the camp. But who knew this back then?” (p. 260)

Indeed. And this is why we should never jump to conclusions.

Summary

In the Preface, one of the editors writes:

“It was the year of 1989. Suddenly within a week two ‘hostages’ had died, and the number of survivors from the Auschwitz and Birkenau camps was shrinking fast. At the same time, I was reading and hearing more and more about disputes on the number of the victims of the genocide of the Jews, and even on the events themselves. It became an obsession to me that I had to, as they were still alive, write down their testimonies. Nobody had ‘talked’ by then; nobody wanted to open the ‘box’ of his most terrible memories, which he had buried so deeply. And yet, while there are still those few survivors, others dare to dispute the undeniable facts of those times.” (p. 7)

So, the editors’ goal was to preserve the memories of the survivors in order to combat the growing doubt about the “undeniable facts.” They should be thanked for their efforts, of course, but despite what they believe, a critical reading reveals that these testimonies poke quite a few holes in the official version of events. The survivors suffered a lot, but when it comes to planned mass extermination, not only are there many inconsistencies, but even the infamous gas chambers very rarely appear. In time, this work might prove to be another nail in the coffin of the official storyline.

If the editors hadn’t passed away, the only way to show our gratitude would be by wishing that they would not be around to see it.

Defenders of the Holocaust story have attempted to discredit scientific reports which disprove the existence of homicidal gas chambers at German camps during World War II. For example, Deborah Lipstadt's defense attorney, Richard Rampton, referred in court to The Leuchter Report as "...a piece of so-called research which is not worth the paper it is written on..."<sup>[1]</sup>

Dr. Richard Green states about Germar Rudolf:<sup>[2]</sup>

"Owing to the fact that he actually has some understanding of chemistry, many of his deceptions are more sophisticated than other Holocaust deniers. [...] Ultimately, he engages in the same deceptions and specious arguments as [Fred] Leuchter and [Walter] Lüftl, but the case he makes for those deceptions and arguments involves more difficult chemistry."

This article will discuss attempts by chemists to discredit scientific reports which disprove the existence of homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz/Birkenau during World War II.

Historical Background

In 1988, the Canadian government put Ernst Zündel on trial a second time for the criminal offense of knowingly disseminating false news about "the Holocaust." As part of his defense in this trial, Zündel commissioned the U.S. gas-chamber expert Fred Leuchter to make a scientific examination of the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau and Majdanek. The resulting Leuchter Report is the first scientific study of the alleged German homicidal gas chambers.<sup>[3]</sup>

In addition to reporting that the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz, Birkenau and Majdanek were structurally unsuitable for gassing, Leuchter researched the chemical properties of the Zyklon B fumigant. Leuchter found that Zyklon B is a highly toxic compound that releases deadly hydrogen-cyanide gas. The released hydrogen-cyanide gas clings to surfaces and reacts chemically with materials containing iron, forming ferrocyanide compounds that have a distinctive blue color called Prussian Blue. Since building materials normally contain a certain amount of rust (iron oxide, usually between one and four percent), repeated exposure to hydrogen-cyanide gas would result in Prussian Blue staining on the walls of the alleged gas chambers.<sup>[4]</sup>

Leuchter took forensic samples from the alleged gas chambers at the visited sites and a control sample from the delousing facility at Birkenau. The samples were analyzed by an independent laboratory in the United States. The laboratory found no significant ferrocyanide compound traces in the samples taken from the alleged homicidal gas chambers, but the sample from a wall of the Birkenau delousing facility had heavy concentrations of the ferrocyanide compounds. Leuchter concluded that this result would be impossible if the alleged homicidal gas chambers had been repeatedly exposed to hydrogen-cyanide gas.[\[5\]](#)

Germar Rudolf, a certified chemist, expanded on Leuchter's work by writing the Rudolf Report in the spring of 1992. The Rudolf Report, which has been updated and revised several times, focused on engineering and chemical aspects of the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz and Birkenau. Rudolf observed in his on-site examinations that all of the delousing facilities at Auschwitz, Birkenau, Stutthof and Majdanek have one thing in common: their walls are permeated with Prussian Blue. Not only the inner surfaces, but also the exteriors of the walls and the mortar between the bricks of the delousing facilities have Prussian Blue staining. Nothing of this sort can be observed in any of the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz and Birkenau.

Rudolf also took samples from the alleged homicidal gas chambers and the delousing facilities at Auschwitz and Birkenau. Similar to Leuchter's samples, the alleged homicidal gas chambers exhibit only insignificant traces of ferrocyanide residue on the same order of magnitude as found in any other building. The samples from the delousing chambers, however, all showed very high ferrocyanide residues. Rudolf determined that, if mass execution gassings with hydrocyanic acid had taken place in the alleged homicidal gas chambers, the rooms in the alleged homicidal gas chambers would exhibit similar ferrocyanide residue as the delousing chambers. Therefore, Rudolf concluded that mass gassings with Zyklon B did not occur in the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz and Birkenau.[\[6\]](#)

Kraków Institute of Forensic Research

The Kraków Institute of Forensic Research published results in 1994 that attempted to refute the Leuchter Report. The team from this forensic institute led by Dr. Jan Markiewicz claims not to have understood how it was possible for Prussian Blue to have formed in walls as a result of their being exposed to hydrogen-cyanide gas. The researchers therefore excluded Prussian Blue and similar iron-cyanide compounds from their analyses, resulting in much lower cyanide traces for the delousing chambers. Their analysis made it practically impossible to distinguish between rooms massively exposed to hydrogen cyanide and those which were not: all would have a cyanide residue of close to zero. The Kraków researchers concluded from their analysis that since the gas chambers and delousing facilities all had the same amount of cyanide residues, humans were gassed in the gas chambers.

Watch the video on The Chemistry of Auschwitz

Germar Rudolf gave the Kraków researchers irrefutable proof that Prussian Blue can be formed in walls exposed to hydrogen-cyanide gas, citing a case document in expert literature.[\[7\]](#) The authors of the Kraków report refused to change their report and admit they made a mistake. Rudolf writes:[\[8\]](#)

“The only ‘scientific’ attempt to refute Frederick A. Leuchter’s most intriguing thesis turns out to be one of the biggest scientific frauds of the 20th century. How desperate must they be—those who try to defend the established version of the Holocaust, i.e., the alleged systematic extermination of Jews in homicidal ‘gas chambers’, that they resort to such obviously fraudulent methods?”

British science historian Dr. Nicholas Kollerstrom also refuted the Kraków Institute of Forensic Research report, as succinctly summarized by the retired professor of the philosophy of science Dr. James H. Fetzer:[\[9\]](#)

“When the Auschwitz museum was confronted with the fact that the innocuous delousing chambers at Auschwitz have blue walls – due to being saturated with blue iron cyanide compounds – but the alleged homicidal gas chambers have not, they commissioned their own chemical research. Instead of testing wall samples for the chemicals that had caused the blue stains, the researchers they commissioned simply excluded those chemicals from their analysis by employing a procedure that could not detect them. They justified this measure with the claim that they did not understand exactly how these compounds could form and that they might therefore be mere artifacts. Researchers who don’t understand what they are investigating have no business becoming involved. In this case, however, it appears to be deliberate. They have deliberately ignored an obvious explanation--that Zyklon B was only used for delousing--which would have remedied their lack of comprehension. As a result of this failure to adhere to the principles of science, they produced a report of no scientific value, which they used to arrive at a predetermined conclusion.”

Dr. Arthur Robert Butz writes in regard to the Kraków Institute of Forensic Research report:[\[10\]](#)

“The argument, to the extent that it was intelligible enough to be summarized at all, was that they did not understand how the iron-cyanide compounds got to be there, so they decided to ignore them in reaching their conclusions. I don’t understand how the moon got there, so I will ignore all effects associated with it, such as tides. I hope I don’t drown.”

Dr. James Roth

Dr. James Roth testified at the 1988 Ernst Zündel trial that he received samples from Fred Leuchter in his capacity as an Analytical Chemist at Alpha Analytical Laboratories. The purpose of the tests was to determine the total iron and cyanide content in the samples. Dr. Roth testified that the Prussian Blue produced by a reaction of the iron and hydrogen cyanide could penetrate deeply in porous materials such as brick and iron.[\[11\]](#)

Dr. Roth later changed his testimony in a documentary movie titled Mr. Death produced by Errol Morris. Dr. Roth states in this movie:[\[12\]](#)

“Cyanide is a surface reaction. It’s probably not going to penetrate more than 10 microns. Human hair is 100 microns in diameter. Crush this sample up, I have just diluted that sample 10,000; 100,000 times. If you’re going to go looking for it, you’re going to look on the surface only. There’s no reason to go deep, because it’s not going to be there.”

Dr. Nicholas Kollerstrom writes that Dr. Roth’s statements in Mr. Death are wrong:[\[13\]](#)

“The 1999 film about Leuchter features an interview with the chemist [Dr. James Roth] who had done the analysis of his wall-samples back in 1988. He had done this ‘blind,’ i.e. with no knowledge of where they had come from, which was correct scientific procedure. During the second Zündel trial in Toronto in 1988 he testified under oath concerning the method used and what Leuchter had sent him. He said back then that hydrogen cyanide can easily penetrate into brick and mortar. But then, when he was interviewed again by Morris for his documentary, he suddenly stated that the results were quite meaningless, because the cyanide could only have soaked a few microns into the brickwork. Wow, that was quite a whopper. Mortar and brickwork are highly porous to hydrogen cyanide, obviously so because the delousing chambers were more or less equally blue inside and out, it had soaked right through. But you can watch him on video explaining this, as if he were confusing brick and mortar with rock. The latter will only absorb cyanide to a few microns of its surface.”

Germar Rudolf writes in regard to Dr. Roth’s statements in Mr. Death:[\[14\]](#)

“It can be shown that Prof. Dr. James Roth is wrong for the following reasons:

1. It is a fact that the walls of the disinfestation chambers in Auschwitz, Birkenau, Stutthof, and Majdanek are saturated with cyanide compounds, and this not only superficially, but into the depth of the masonry, as I have demonstrated by taking samples from different depths of the wall. Compare in this regard my mortar and plaster Sample Pairs 9 & 11, 12 & 13, 19a & b. [...], which were each taken at the same spot but at different depths, as well as Sample 17, taken from below the overlying lime plaster (which is thus similar to 19b).

These values prove that hydrogen cyanide can rather easily reach deep layers of plaster and mortar. But even the other samples taken from the surface prove that Prof. Roth’s allegation is wrong: Provided that most of the cyanide detectable today is present in the form of iron cyanide (Iron Blue and other cyanoferrates), as Prof. Roth assumes himself, his thesis would mean that 10% to 75% of the iron content of these samples are located in the upper 10 micrometers thin layer of the samples (0.010 mm), i.e., they are located in less than 1% of the entire sample mass. The rest of the samples, however, would have been massively deprived of iron. How this migration of a major portion of iron to a thin surface layer would have happened is inexplicable to me. Fact is that this simply could not happen.

2. Furthermore, expert literature is detailed about the following:

a. Hydrogen cyanide is an extremely mobile chemical compound with physical properties comparable to water. [...]

b. Water vapor can quite easily penetrate masonry material, and thus also hydrogen cyanide. [...]

c. Hydrogen cyanide can easily penetrate thick, porous layers like walls. [...]

3. In addition, it is generally known that cement and lime mortar are highly porous materials, comparable for instance to sponges. In such materials, there does not exist anything like a defined layer of 0.01 mm beyond which hydrogen cyanide could not diffuse, as there can also be no reason, why water could not penetrate a sponge deeper than a millimeter. Steam, for example, which behaves physically comparable to hydrogen cyanide, can very easily penetrate walls.

4. Finally, the massive discolorations of the outside of the walls of the disinfection chambers in Birkenau and Stutthof, as shown in this expert report, are clearly visible and conclusive evidence for the fact of how easily hydrogen cyanide and its soluble derivatives can and do penetrate such walls.

As a professor of analytical chemistry, Prof. Roth must know this, so one can only wonder why he spreads such outrageous nonsense. That Prof. Roth is indeed a competent chemist can be seen from what he said during his testimony under oath as an expert witness during the above mentioned Zündel trial.:

‘In porous materials such as brick or mortar, the Prussian blue [recte: hydrogen cyanide] could go fairly deep as long as the surface stayed open, but as the Prussian blue formed, it was possible that it would seal the porous material and stop the penetration.’

[...] It is also revealing that Prof. Roth mentioned during this interview that, if he had known where Leuchter’s samples originated from, his analytical results would have been different. Does that mean that Prof. Roth manipulates his result according to whether or not he likes the origin of certain samples? Such an attitude is exactly the reason why one should never tell an ‘independent’ laboratory about the origin of the samples to be analyzed, simply because ‘independence’ is a very flexible term when it comes to controversial topics. What Prof. Dr. Roth has demonstrated here is only his lack of professional honesty.”

Dr. Richard Green

Dr. Richard Green, who has a Ph.D. in chemistry from Stanford University, agrees with Germar Rudolf that the Prussian Blue found in the delousing chambers is the result of gassings with hydrogen cyanide. However, Dr. Green offers a possible alternative explanation for why the outside walls of the delousing chambers have blue staining. Green writes:[\[15\]](#)

“[...] the discoloration on the outside of walls [of the delousing chambers], ought to make one consider what possible processes could have taken place outside of the delousing chambers. For example, is it possible that materials that had been soaked with aqueous solutions of HCN were leaned against the outside of the buildings? Not enough is known, but it is premature to conclude that the staining on the outside of buildings owes its origins to processes that took place within those buildings.”

Dr. Green’s speculation is absurd. Why would the Germans lean materials that had been soaked with aqueous solutions of HCN against the outside walls of the delousing chambers? Dr. Green is desperate to find an alternative reason for the heavy blue staining on the outside walls of the delousing chambers.[\[16\]](#)

Germar Rudolf writes in regard to Dr. Green’s speculation:[\[17\]](#)

“One major rule of science is that it is impermissible to immunize a theory against refutation, here in particular by inventing untenable auxiliary hypotheses to shore up an otherwise shaky thesis. [...] This is exactly what

Dr. Green is doing: coming up with a ludicrous attempt at explaining a fact which does not fit into his theory. Yet instead of fixing his theory, he tries to bend reality.”

Dr. Green also challenges the possibility of formation of any noticeable quantities of Prussian Blue in the alleged homicidal gas chambers. Dr. Green writes:[\[18\]](#)

“The difference in total cyanides (Prussian blue + non-Prussian blue) owes to the fact that Prussian blue formed efficiently in the case of the delousing chambers but not in the homicidal gas chambers, and Prussian blue once formed is likely to remain.”

Dr. Green is not able to provide any convincing evidence why Prussian Blue would not form efficiently in the homicidal gas chambers. For example, Dr. Green states that masonry in the alleged homicidal gas chambers has a neutral pH value which does not allow for the formation of cyanide salts. Germar Rudolf writes:[\[19\]](#)

“But if that were true, how come huge amounts of cyanides did accumulate in the walls of the disinfestation chambers?”

Rudolf has documented with expert literature on the chemistry of building materials that the cement mortars and concretes used in the alleged homicidal gas chambers are noticeably alkaline for many weeks, months, or even years. These walls would have been very much inclined to accumulate cyanide salts and to form Prussian Blue, even more so than the lime plaster of the disinfestation chambers.[\[20\]](#)

Conclusion

The alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz/Birkenau could not have been used to exterminate hundreds of thousands of people as described in pro-Holocaust literature for numerous reasons:[\[21\]](#)

1. they did not have escape-proof doors and windows;
2. they did not have panic-proof fixtures;
3. they did not have technically gastight doors and shutters;
4. they had no provision to quickly release and distribute the poison gas; and
5. they had no effective device to ventilate or otherwise render ineffective the poison gas after the execution.

By contrast, Germany built highly sophisticated and expensive disinfestation facilities at Auschwitz/Birkenau to kill lice and save inmate lives. By one estimate, the SS at Auschwitz spent almost $1 billion in today’s values to bring the typhus epidemics raging there under control.[\[22\]](#) An enormous amount of information exists concerning these German delousing facilities[\[23\]](#), but no similar information exists regarding the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz/Birkenau.[\[24\]](#)

The roof of the semi-underground Morgue #1 of Crematorium II at Birkenau, which is said to have been the building’s homicidal gas chamber, remains intact to some degree today. Contrary to eyewitness testimony, that roof has no Zyklon-B-introduction holes. This has been acknowledged by pro-Holocaust researcher Robert Jan van Pelt. Since it is impossible to close holes measuring 70 x 70 cm from a concrete roof without leaving clearly visible traces, it is certain that no Zyklon-B-introduction holes ever existed at Crematorium II. Consequently, Zyklon B could not have been introduced through the roof at this morgue as alleged by pro-Holocaust supporters.[\[25\]](#)

As documented in this article, chemists adhering to the orthodox Holocaust narrative have failed to explain why the walls of the delousing facilities at Auschwitz/ Birkenau are permeated with Prussian Blue, while nothing of this sort can be observed in any of the alleged homicidal gas chambers. The only reasonable explanation is that Zyklon B was never used in the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz/Birkenau. Nicholas Kollerstrom writes:[26]

“[...] for any alleged human gas chamber found in a German World War II labour camp let us merely measure cyanide in the walls: if it's not there, it didn't happen.”

The Holocaust: A New History

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Abstract

British historian Laurence Rees, the former Creative Director of History Programmes for the BBC, has written a new "magnum opus": The Holocaust: A New History. This review lays bare a few of the shortcomings of this old wine in new wineskins.

Greetings dear readers, we're back again with another episode of our loveable historian and award winner Laurence Rees. (For the first episode see here). This time we are going to have a look at his newest addition in the Holocaust arsenal – his magnum opus The Holocaust: A New History (Penguin Books, 2017). So fasten your seat belts because the ride is about to begin!

First Impression

The book itself is not impressive. Rather small in size (20x13 cm), 509 pages, simple cover design, low-quality paper. Not exactly what you would expect from an opus magnum. But perhaps there is more inside. Here are the contents:

1. Origins of Hate
2. Birth of the Nazis (1919-1923)
3. From Revolution to Ballot Box (1924-1933)

4. Consolidating Power (1933-1934)
5. The Nuremberg Laws (1934-1935)
6. Education and Empire-Building (1935-1938)
7. Radicalization (1938-1939)
8. The Start of Racial War (1939-1940)
9. Persecution in the West (1940-1941)
10. War of Extermination (1941)
11. The Road to Wannsee (1941-1942)
12. Search and Kill (1942)
13. Nazi Death Camps in Poland (1942)
14. Killing and Persuading Others to Help (1942-1943)
15. Oppression and Revolt (1943)
16. Auschwitz (1943-1944)
17. Hungarian Catastrophe (1944)
18. Murder to the End (1944-1945)

Rees starts with early anti-Semitism in Germany, Hitler's rise to power, the Nuremberg Laws, the first concentration camps, and the deportations. These are not in dispute, so we can skip them. What we want to know is what Rees has to say about the extermination claims. Most importantly, is there anything really new?

Give Me an Order

As there is no written order for the Holocaust, historians have been struggling for years to find a way around this. Rees concludes with the following:

“From quite early in my interaction with this history I had seen how some people had decided that, because the crime of the extermination of the Jews was so horrendous, it must have been orchestrated and planned at one monumental moment. But it seemed to me that this was a mistaken leap. As I hope this book demonstrates, the journey to the Holocaust was a gradual one, full of twists and turns, until it found final expression in the Nazi killing factories.” (p. 429)

So let's examine some specific points about this. Regarding Hitler's Prophecy, a speech he gave on 30 September 1939 (where he stated that if the Jewish financiers plunge mankind into another world war, the result will be the annihilation of the Jewish race in Europe), Rees comments as follows:

“What exactly did Hitler mean by this? A serious threat against the Jews, certainly. But did he explicitly mean that he intended to kill the Jews in the event of a world war? That is debatable, especially since there is no evidence that he had a detailed plan of destruction in mind for the Jews as he uttered these words. An alternative, more persuasive interpretation is that by 'annihilation' Hitler meant 'elimination', and thus one possible 'solution' to the Nazis' Jewish 'problem' remained the destruction of the Jews in Europe by forcibly removing them from the continent.” (p. 147)

Rees backs this up with other Hitler statements, thus poking another hole in the Holocaust storyline. Harsh words like these appear all the time as proof, but clearly they are not enough anymore. But Rees still has to explain the absence of a written order. He tries with the following trick:

“Much better, from Hitler's perspective, to make sure that no order in his name about this sensitive project ever existed. He was well aware that written orders could come back and haunt the sender. That is one reason he remarked in October 1941: it's much better to meet than to write, at least when some matter of capital importance is at issue." (p. 230)

That statement is from Hitler's Table Talk (2000, p. 56). But if someone checks the source, he will realize that Hitler did not talk about orders at all, but how he... managed his mail! Here is the full passage:

"I dictate my mail, then I spend a dozen hours without bothering about it. Next day I make a first set of corrections, and perhaps a second set the day after. In doing so, I'm being very prudent. Nobody can use a letter in my own hand against me. Besides, it's my opinion that, in an age when we have facilities like the train, the motor-car and the aircraft, it's much better to meet than to write, at least when some matter of capital importance is at issue."

Ohhh Rees, that trickster. And it doesn't end here. It has just begun. A few pages later we arrive at this:

"But does all this mean that Hitler made a decision in autumn 1941 to exterminate the Jews? Is this when the Holocaust as we know it began? A number of new initiatives certainly came together at this time, including not only the decision to deport Jews from the Old Reich and Protectorate to the east, and the construction of killing installations at Chelmno and Belzec in Poland, but also Hitler's own comments in private that October about the Jews. Ominously, he quoted from the 'extermination' speech he had given in January 1939. 'From the rostrum of the Reichstag', he said on 25 October 1941, 'I prophesied to Jewry that, in the event of war's proving inevitable, the Jew would disappear from Europe. That race of criminals has on its conscience the two million dead of the First World War, and now already hundreds of thousands more... It's not a bad idea, by the way, that public rumour attributes to us a plan to exterminate the Jews.'" (p. 237)

This is the quote from Hitler's Table Talk (p. 87) that Rees had previously falsified in his book on Auschwitz. This time he quotes it correctly but as can be seen he omits something. He also quotes it in a previous chapter with the same omission (p. 32). The unsuspected reader will not notice this, and it's actually the most important part:

"Let nobody tell me that all the same we can't park them in the marshy parts of Russia!"

As this sentence did not fit with the extermination claim, it had to go. In the same book we also find Hitler's statement on the Jews one week after the Wannsee Conference:

"The Jews must pack up, disappear from Europe. Let them go to Russia. Where the Jews are concerned, I'm devoid of all sense of pity." (p. 260)

This is the first tactic of the official historians: Suppress the evidence when possible. The other? What else? The "code language":

"On 19 July 1942, on a visit to Poland, Himmler ordered that the 'resettlement of the entire Jewish Population of the General Government' should be 'carried out and completed by 31 December 1942.' According to Himmler, a 'comprehensive clearing out' was necessary. This was a euphemistic way of saying that he wanted virtually all of these Jews to be murdered by the end of the year." (p. 295)

No historian ever bothers to explain this simple contradiction (they just hope you won't notice). What's the point for the Germans to hide their words but not their actions? Rees himself admits:

“The Nazis did not hide the concentration camps. Their existence was well known and newspapers across the world carried stories about them.” (p. 73)

And if we suppose that nobody paid attention:

“The dead bodies were burnt in ditches and the smoke that filled the sky was noticeable for miles around.” (p. 305)

Simple facts like these are enough to throw any claims about a code language in the garbage.

The Death Camps

A quick note on the death camps. Chelmno, Belzec and Sobibor are briefly discussed in Chapter 11 (2 or 3 pages each). Chapter 13 is about the death camps in Poland, but it mostly focuses on Treblinka and Majdanek. Auschwitz gets the largest share of the pie, with the events concerning it spreading from Chapter 11 to Chapter 17. But Rees offers nothing new at all. He simply repeats what can be found in all other books.

The Photos

There are 49 photos in the book. They are as follows:

- 27 photos of Hitler, Nazis or other Germans.
- 6 photos of camp prisoners or deportees.
- 4 photos of Jews in ghettos or elsewhere.
- 1 photo of a smashed shop after Kristallnacht.
- 1 photo of a burning synagogue.
- 1 photo of a Jewish ID.
- 1 photo of Chaim Rumkowski (ghetto leader).
- 1 photo of Pope Pius XII.
- 1 photo of a shooting at the eastern front.
- 1 photo of captured Soviet soldiers.
- 1 photo of Auschwitz (main gate).
- 3 photos of Birkenau (one air photo and two of the crematories).
- 1 photo of Bergen Belsen (a ditch with corpses).

For the most-documented event in human history we might expect something more. But still, that's better than nothing, right?

Witness Please!

The witnesses are of course indispensable in the official story. So how does Rees make use of them? This is quite interesting. First, he quotes a few known witnesses like Rudolf Reder, Samuel Willenberg and Jan Karski. But other major witnesses are totally absent. Names like Kurt Gerstein, Henryk Tauber, David Olère and Elie Wiesel are nowhere to be found. And even the rest that manage to have their 15 seconds of fame do not fare much better.

Rudolf Höss appears on several pages, but when it comes to gas chambers (details, construction, executions), his testimony is simply non-existent. Miklos Nyiszli, another top witness, appears three times. But what did Rees consider worthy of mentioning? A dinner (p. 326), a football game (p. 328) and an experiment of Mengele (p. 359). You read that right. Next witness, Yankel Wiernik: only one quote (p. 345), and that regarding the escape from the camp. So on to Rudolf Vrba, where we find this:

“But the Vrba-Wetzler report left no room for doubt about the real purpose of Auschwitz. It accurately described the opening of the new crematoria/gas chamber complexes at Birkenau in 1943 and the way in which the murders were conducted. It wasn’t surprising that the report was so authentic, because one of the Sondercommandos working in the crematoria, Filip Muller, had told the two Slovaks exactly what went on there.” (p. 400)

Nothing could be further from the truth, as that report is full of errors and a completely made-up plan of the crematories. Of course, the history-award winner Rees can’t let you know that. As for Müller (Hilberg’s star witness who among other things saw buckets jumping around because of still-living pieces of flesh inside), he appears one more time with an unimportant sentence (p. 406) before he vanishes into oblivion. That’s all folks.

So what’s new? A few unpublished testimonies here and there. These are basically the reason Rees chose the title A New History. But there is really no new information obtained from them. They’re just same old, same old.

Hitler’s Testament

One final note. Rees writes about Hitler’s political testament:

“He also hinted that he was responsible for – indeed proud of – the extermination of the Jews. He said that he had ‘never left any doubt’ that the ‘actual guilty party’ for starting the war would be ‘held responsible’. This was, according to him, ‘the Jews’. ‘Further,’ he said, ‘I have not left anybody in the dark about the fact that this time, millions of adult men would not die, and hundreds of thousands of women and children would not be burnt or bombed to death in the cities, without the actual culprit, albeit by more humane means, having to pay for his guilt.’ [...] Hitler was not sorry for the destruction he had brought into the world. Far from it. [...] He was pleased, even as Germany came crashing down about him, that he had brought about the death of 6 million Jews.” (p. 421)

Needless to say, Rees misquotes again. Here is the actual passage (3569-PS):

“I also made it quite plain that, if the nations of Europe are again to be regarded as mere shares to be bought and sold by these international conspirators in money and finance, then that race, Jewry, which is the real criminal of this murderous struggle, will be saddled with the responsibility. I further left no one in doubt that this time not only would millions of children of Europe’s Aryan peoples die of hunger, not only would millions of grown men suffer death, and not only hundreds of thousands of women and children be burnt and bombed to death in the towns, without the real criminal having to atone for this guilt, even if by more humane means.”

Spot the difference.

Summary

For anyone ignorant of the official storyline, this book is a good place to start. Cheap, not very long, and easy to read. For anyone already familiar with it, it would seem that historians have reached a dead end. They cannot move even one step further beyond Hilberg and Pressac. So, a good Holocaust book. But as a history book, I would say that the author's initials may have something to suggest:

Abstract

With her book Denying the Holocaust, Deborah Lipstadt tried to show the flawed methods and extremist motives of “Holocaust deniers,” who, so the book’s description claims, have “no more credibility than the assertion that the earth is flat.”

The following is the transcript a video documentary based on the book Bungled: “Denying the Holocaust.” How Deborah Lipstadt Botched Her Attempt to Demonstrate the Growing Assault on Truth and Memory. It demonstrates that Dr. Lipstadt clearly has neither understood what the principles and methods of science and scholarship are, nor has she any clue about the historical topics she is writing about. She misquotes, mistranslates, misrepresents, misinterprets, and makes a plethora of wild claims without backing them up with anything. Among other things, she utterly fails to use generally recognized standards of evidence. Given the way she handles documents and data, it is clear that she has no interest in scholarship or reason. In fact, truth has been the antithesis of her enterprise.

Rather than dealing thoroughly with factual arguments, Lipstadt's book is full of ad hominem attacks on her opponents. It is an exercise in anti-intellectual pseudo-scientific arguments, an exhibition of ideological radicalism that rejects anything which contradicts its preset conclusions.

Since she admits herself that her opponents' motives are irrelevant, as an inescapable consequence, so is her book.

1. Introduction

Dr. Deborah Lipstadt, April 7th, 2017, TED-x Talks, Sheldonian Theatre, University of Oxford, England:

“The first time I heard about Holocaust denial, I laughed. [...] Fast forward, a little over a decade, and two senior scholars, scholars of the Holocaust, two most prominent historians of the Holocaust approached me and said; ‘Deborah, let’s have coffee. We have a research idea that we think is perfect for you.’ Intrigued, and flattered that they came to me with an idea and thought me worthy of it, I asked, ‘What is it?’ And they said: ‘Holocaust denial,’ and for the second time, I laughed. ‘Holocaust denial? The flat-earth folks? The Elvis-is-alive people? I should study them?’”

youtu.be/wgPLG\_1BvQo; 00:25-00;29; 2:29-3:07

Dr. Lipstadt, professor of Modern Jewish History and Holocaust studies at Emory University, ended up accepting this research assignment, and it turned into a book that was to have major consequence. It first appeared in 1993 with the title Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory.<sup>[1]</sup>

In it, Ms. Lipstadt gives her perspective of the political background, motives and, what she calls the quote-unquote “spurious methodology” (p. 111) of the revisionists, and also tries to deal with some revisionist arguments.<sup>[2]</sup>

One of the persons whose political background, motives and methods Lipstadt briefly mentions in the book is the British historian David Irving. Lipstadt depicts him in her book as a racist, anti-Semitic Holocaust denier. Irving didn’t like his reputation smeared, so he decided to sue her and her publisher for defamation:<sup>[3]</sup>

“And the problem then is, if you have a 30-year writing career, and the press gets to know that you don’t defend yourself, they think it’s open season. And by 1996, I could see, as I stood at the bottom of this alley, a mudslide thundering down the slopes towards me and threatening to engulf me. And the only way to stop that mudslide was to start frantically hammering pegs into the countryside, which I did with these writs. I issued a writ against Deborah Lipstadt for the book that she wrote attacking me called 'Denying the Holocaust.' [...] Nothing that I write is good. Everything that I write is bad, mendacious, distorted, lying, fallacious, deliberately following a political agenda. All the accusations that were made against me by Deborah Lipstadt. And now they are surprised and pained to find themselves at the receiving end of a libel writ since 1996. And they are hoping that I go away. And to their horror, I am not going away, because I have just issued fresh steps in that particular action. And we are going through that whole hell again next year or the year after, because I don't lie down."

The libel suit unfolding in London at the turn of the millennium, however, ended in a complete disaster for Irving, since, according to the verdict, Lipstadt and her publisher managed to prove most of the claims made against Irving as true.[4]

As a consequence, a number of books appeared documenting not only Irving's defeat but also claiming that quote-unquote "Holocaust denial" has finally been exposed as a pseudo-historical movement driven by ulterior political motives and with no basis in factual reality.[5]

Lipstadt's case became so famous – or was considered so important to and by the mainstream – that her own account of the trial as published in her book History on Trial: My Day in Court with a Holocaust Denier[6] has been turned into a movie which was released in September 2016; parallel to this, her book telling the story of the trial was reissued under the same title as the movie: Denial: Holocaust History on Trial.[7]

Lipstadt's original work that triggered all this was also reissued, emphasizing the fact that the mainstream still considers this 24-year-old book to be highly relevant and topical. This new edition was released in December 2016. You can find it on Amazon[8] and anywhere else books can be bought.

In this documentary, we will neither deal with Irving's libel suit against Lipstadt nor with any of the publications based on it. Instead, we will go back to the roots of this entire affair, to Lipstadt's 1993 book Denying the Holocaust. Since for the new, 2016 edition no textual changes were made, what is said about the original edition is also true for the latest edition.

This presentation is divided into 4 parts:

In the first part, we will briefly discuss what science is, and how we can distinguish it from fake science, pretend science, or, to put it in Greek, pseudo-science. In the second part, we will briefly address Lipstadt's exposé of the evil denier's motives and their allegedly mendacious methods, while the third part discusses some of Lipstadt's claims about a few Holocaust deniers, or Holocaust revisionists, as they call themselves. In the last part, we will focus on some factual arguments proffered by Dr. Lipstadt about the Holocaust.

It goes without saying that we cannot discuss every claim Dr. Lipstadt made in her book, or else this documentary would last many hours. So we had to keep it brief here. A much more-thorough analysis of Dr. Lipstadt's claims appeared in a book of its own which, at least for now, is also available on Amazon and anywhere else books can be bought. [9]

2. Science and Pseudo-Science

Dr. Lipstadt claims numerous times that revisionist authors and organizations, the writings they publish and the arguments they proffer, are not scholarly in nature, but that they are only "pseudo-scientific" or "pseudo-academic," and that what revisionists write is merely "pseudo-history." In fact, her book is riddled with "pseudo" terms which we find on these pages in the 2016 edition of her book: 8, 29f., 35, 65, 137, 199, 225, 236, 243, 250, 252. Consequently, she calls the revisionists' method of writing history "spurious" (p. 127) and "fallacious" (pp. 183, 204; all page numbers given in this presentation refer to the 2016 edition).

Unfortunately, Lipstadt never explains what sets apart proper science and scholarship from sham science and fraudulent scholarship. So let us give a crash course on how to distinguish the two. We've taken our definitions loosely from Sir Karl Popper,[10] one of the most famous and prestigious philosophers of science of modern times. Of course, you can take any other one, but the result wouldn't be all that different.

Here are seven principles of science and scholarship.

1. Freedom of Hypothesis
2. Undetermined Outcome
3. Verifiable, Legitimate Evidence
4. Hierarchy of Evidence
5. Source Criticism
6. Welcoming Criticism
7. No Data Rigging

We'll say something briefly about each one.

1. Freedom of Hypothesis

The first principle concerns the first step in the creation of knowledge. It means that we are allowed and are even encouraged to ask any question that comes to our mind. Whatever curiosity drives us to investigate, or doubts make us explore, if we have a scientific mind, we welcome that. The opposite, pseudo-scientific mindset declares certain topics taboo, tends to stigmatize doubters, and bans certain questions from being asked. True scholars, on the other hand, are opponents of dogmas and taboos.

2. Unpredetermined Outcome

Now to the second point. It means that the answers to research questions can be determined exclusively by verifiable evidence, not by authority figures, not by social taboos, by political correctness, or even by penal law. So, when we are doing any scholarly activity, both the starting point and the end point of that activity – the initial question or assumption and the final conclusion – ought to be completely free of external constrictions. That's at least the ideal situation. Of course, scientists are only human, and so they bend and buckle occasionally, giving way to all kinds of pressure, but that aspect of their work is what actually tarnishes their work.

The path, however, which a scholar takes to get from his initial question to the final answer, that is to say, the way we gather and evaluate evidence, that is where a lot of strictures apply.

3. Verifiable, Legitimate Evidence

And that's our next point. Claiming something without proving it is profoundly unscientific. The way we prove things shows how our work lives up to scholarly standards. In essence, evidence we present must be verifiable by others. If others cannot locate, reproduce or recalculate the evidence we present, then we have failed. As mentioned before, there are certain methods and rules we have to comply with while collecting and interpreting our data.

To give an example, quoting a private collection of otherwise-unsourced newspaper clippings as proof for one's claim is unacceptable, because that private collection is inaccessible to anyone else. Likewise, saying that "Mr. So-and-so told me so" is also unacceptable, because anyone can claim this, and no one can verify that it is true.

4. Hierarchy of Evidence

Not all types of evidence are created equal. In general, the less a piece of evidence depends on human fallibility, the more reliable it usually is. In a hierarchy of the probative value of types of evidence, logic, natural laws, and then material or physical evidence reign supreme, while party testimony is the least reliable. DNA tests in court cases of parenthood or sexual abuse are a case in point. Any scientific mind weighing the results of a DNA test against that of the testimonies by the defendant or the litigant in a trial would side with the DNA test. Parties in a trial can lie and err. As a matter of fact, they often do, but independently performed DNA tests are almost bulletproof.

Of course, not all cases are that straight forward, but you get the idea. Here is a pyramid of the various kinds of evidence, with the most reliable at the top and the least reliable at the bottom.

The lowest layer, stories told by people emotionally affected by the issue at hand, is unfortunately also the most common type of evidence adduced when it comes to the Holocaust. Just because we have many of these stories doesn't mean they are any more reliable. After all, hundreds of years ago the courts in Europe collected thousands of witness accounts confirming that witnesses saw witches riding on broomsticks through the air and having sex with the devil. But such anecdotes don't get more reliable just because thousands swear to them.

5. Source Criticism

This brings up our next point: source criticism. A critical attitude is the core of any scientific endeavour. No critical researcher should take evidence at face value. Even though material and documentary evidence have the highest value, there is always the possibility that they were simply misinterpreted, or that artifacts have been planted, evidence has been manipulated, and documents fabricated or tampered with. The more that is at stake, politically speaking, the more likely such manipulations usually are.

In addition, just because a genuine document claims something, this doesn't make that claim automatically true. Whoever created that document may have been dishonest, misinformed or simply sloppy.

The greatest skepticism, however, is due when dealing with anecdotal evidence, that is to say, witness accounts. Not only is our human memory very fallible, we are also known to give our stories twists and turns that aren't always in accordance with the truth. It is therefore of great importance to embed witness statements in a framework of evidence that is more reliable, hence any of the other layers in our pyramid.

If a witness statement does not fit into that framework, it's most likely untrue, for whatever reasons.

6. Welcoming Criticism

Next, a true scientist wants to see his theories exposed to criticism, because that's the only way to find out whether they hold any water. After all, a scientist doesn't want to be right, he wants to get it right. The more critical helpers he has, and the tougher those helpers test his theories, the better for him. A true scientist therefore wants to get involved in discussions with those who disagree with his theories. He listens to those with other views.

7. No Rigging of Data

Finally, there are many ways of rigging one's data and evidence in order to force them to fit one's theory. All of them are hallmarks of an anti-scientific attitude. Here are those relevant to our topic:

First, ad-hominem attacks. Attacking opponents instead of their ideas by calling them names, imputing bad intentions, immoral motives, unpopular political convictions etc., is a big no-no. This tactic is probably the most commonly used and also the most effective, as most of us are inclined not to listen to arguments anymore if we consider the person making them to be despicable. It remains a fact, however, that such tactics are unacceptable and themselves morally deficient.

Censorship in Europe: The red countries have outlawed the dissemination of revisionist research regarding the Holocaust.

Next on our list is suppressing or ignoring unwanted data, which amounts to forgery, pure and simple. We don't have to explain that in detail. However, there is a form of suppressing unwanted data that is particularly vicious, and that is when governments outlaw certain research results, punish scholars for disseminating them, and destroy unwelcome research publications. Believe it or not, but that's exactly what happens in many Western countries today when it comes to the Holocaust. Here is a map of Europe. All the red countries destroy any research results and data that runs contrary to the official Holocaust dogma.

Last on our list is shifting the definition of terms, which means basically shifting the goalpost. That's a way of cheating. We all know it when it comes to playing games. It also happens in science and scholarship, however. It usually starts by not defining terms properly, or by changing the definition to make it fit one's agenda.

So, what, then, is pseudo-science, you might ask. Well, pseudo-science is analysis that pretends to be science but is not, because it fails to meet many if not most of the criteria just explained. There is, of course, a continuum between science and pseudo-science. The less the just-mentioned principles are maintained, the worse – and more-likely false – is the corresponding science.

In fact, “pseudo-science” is more frequent than established academia is willing to admit, in particular in the quote-unquote “soft” disciplines of the social sciences whose evidentiary rules aren't as rigorous as those of the quote-unquote “exact” sciences, such as math, technology and the natural sciences. History, of course, is a social science, hence more prone to fall prey to the fallacies of pseudo-science than, say, physics or chemistry. This is especially true for Modern History due to political and at times even legal pressure.

3. Motives and Methods

Let's now turn to Dr. Lipstadt's claims regarding the Holocaust deniers' motives and methods. About the revisionists' motives, she writes in her introduction on page sixteen, quote:

“In the 1930s Nazi rats spread a virulent form of antisemitism that resulted in the destruction of millions. Today the bacillus [meaning anti-Semitism] carried by these rats [referring to the deniers aka revisionists] threatens to 'kill' those who already died at the hands of the Nazis for a second time by destroying the world's memory of them.” – unquote

Hence, in her introduction, Lipstadt equates revisionists with rats. Once the Nazis equated Jews with vermin like rats, lice or bacilli. Lipstadt uses the same terms to indiscriminately disparage all persons holding certain opinions she disagrees with. A worse attack on the humanity of her fellow humans can hardly be conceived. This sentence alone should destroy her reputation as a scholar, but of course, it is politically correct to say these things, so she actually gets applause for it even from many scholars.

Lipstadt equates Holocaust revisionists with Nazis and fascists:

“[The deniers] are a group motivated by a strange conglomeration of conspiracy theories, delusions, and neo-Nazi tendencies.” (p. 28)

“at their core [the revisionists] are no different from these neo-fascist groups.” (p. 245)

Interestingly, Dr. Lipstadt claims that it is the deniers who engage in ad hominem attacks on their opponents. To support her claim, she relates a fanciful story which we won't read here, because it's a waste of time.

“The deniers understand how to gain respectability for outrageous and absolutely false ideas. [...] Professor X publishes a theory despite the fact that reams of documented information contradict his conclusions. In the ‘highest moral tones’ he expresses his disregard for all evidence that sheds doubt on his findings. He engages in ad hominem attacks on those who have authored the critical works in this field and on the people silly enough to believe them. The scholars who have come under attack by this professor are provoked to respond. Before long he has become ‘the controversial Prof. X’ and his theory is discussed seriously by nonprofessionals, that is, journalists. He soon becomes a familiar figure on television and radio, where he ‘explains’ his ideas to interviewers who cannot challenge him or demonstrate the fallaciousness of his argument.” (pp. 31f.)

She simply made that up. There is no evidence that any revisionist scholar ever did what she claims here, since Lipstadt gives no example and quotes no source. You just have to believe her! Fact is, however, that

- a. those living in glass houses should not throw stones; and
- b. making sweeping accusations without proving them is profoundly un scholarly.

On page one, Lipstadt opines that “Holocaust denial is” an “antisemitic ideology” rather than “responsible historiography.” It is a “purely ideological exercise,” and the revisionists merely appear to be “engaged in a genuine scholarly effort when, of course, they are not” (p. 2). Of course. Proof offered? None.

And so it goes on. We could quote a zillion similar passages where she pours out her disdain and contempt for dissidents of Third Reich History, but again, we don’t want to waste your time. It must suffice here to say that her main goal is to portray revisionists as people who hate Jews, because she uses terms like “antisemitism,” “antisemite” and “antisemitic” 182 times in her book, so on average almost on every single page. Here is a table showing how often she uses certain insults in her book.

Occurrence of Insults in Lipstadt’s Denying the Holocaust
anti-Semite/ic/ism	182
extremist/ism	68
conspiracy/ies	51
racist + racism	56
fascist/ism	43
[Nazi	332]

The number of times she uses the term “Nazis” includes many references to the actual historical National Socialists, so that number isn’t really telling much.

Anyway, this list shows what Lipstadt’s book is really about. If you’re hell-bent on reading an avalanche of mental diarrhea, simply get a copy of her book.

The question is, of course: where is the link between these political insinuations and Holocaust revisionism? While it is certainly true that some people holding revisionist views also have certain political views most people detest, it’s not true for all revisionists, simply because revisionism is primarily an attitude toward evidence, not politics. Hence, regarding the Holocaust, revisionism means simply that you think the orthodox narrative needs revision due to new, overlooked, misrepresented or misunderstood evidence.

We could and maybe even should define all the terms Dr. Lipstadt throws at her readers in order to disparage her opponents, so that we can demonstrate how arbitrarily she uses them. But time is precious, and since a more thorough analysis can be found in the Bungled book mentioned earlier,[9] we want to focus on the essentials here, so let us give you just one example, and that is her use of the term “extremism.” The word extreme, derived from the superlative form of the Latin adjective exter, meaning outside, denotes ideas that are at the far end of a spectrum. In the political context it commonly refers to individuals who are ready to violate the law in pursuit of their ideas. How liberally Dr. Lipstadt uses that term can be seen when she discusses U.S. writer Freda Utey, whom she calls an extremist on page 50 of her book. Needless to say, Dr. Lipstadt doesn’t define the term, and she also gives no hint in which way Utey was ever willing to violate any laws. In fact, Utey merely criticized others for violating international law.

The politically correct online encyclopedia Wikipedia has the following to say about Utey, quote:[11]

“Winifred Utley [...], commonly known as Freda Utley, was an English scholar, political activist and best-selling author. After visiting the Soviet Union in 1927 as a trade union activist, she joined the Communist Party of Great Britain in 1928. Later, married and living in Moscow, she quickly became disillusioned with communism. When her Russian husband, Arcadi Berdichevsky, was arrested in 1936, she escaped to England with her young son. (Her husband would die in 1938.)

In 1939, the rest of her family moved to the United States, where she became a leading anticommunist author and activist.” – unquote

Read her entire biography on Wikipedia and you realize that she was anything but an extremist. So why would Lipstadt call her that? Well, in 1948, Freda Utley published a book titled The High Cost of Vengeance where she documented the crimes against humanity committed by the Allied occupational forces in Germany during the first three years after the war.<sup>[12]</sup> These are historical facts which Dr. Lipstadt would like to see erased, but since she cannot refute them, she stigmatizes the author instead – a typical pseudo-scientific tactic.

Let's move on to what Dr. Lipstadt thinks about the methods used by the revisionists.

First, there are truth and memory. On page 23 she states that, quote

“at its core [Holocaust denial] poses a threat to all who believe that knowledge and memory are among the keystones of our civilization.” – unquote.

Here are a number of quotes from her book which suggest that Dr. Lipstadt wants her readers to believe in the equivalence of “truth” with “memory”:

- Subtitle: “The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory”
- p. xvi: “truth and memory are exceedingly fragile,”
- p. 236: “the deniers may have an impact on truth and memory”
- p. 244: “the fragility of memory, truth, reason, and history”
- p. 245: “the destruction of truth and memory”

Considering the fallibility of our senses and our memories, it goes without saying that memory and truth are two distinct things. Dr. Lipstadt acknowledges that on page 151, although she gives it her own twist to make it fit into her agenda, quote:

“It is axiomatic among attorneys, prosecutors, and judges that human memory is notoriously bad on issues of dimensions and precise numbers but very reliable on the central event.” – unquote

And guess how Lipstadt backs up this alleged axiom of the legal profession: not at all. It is not only unsubstantiated but also wrong, as Elizabeth Loftus has demonstrated with her vast research: Human memory can be utterly corrupted in just about any regard. You merely have to apply sufficiently suggestive techniques to achieve it.<sup>[13]</sup>

“In one of the first studies we did, we used suggestion, a method inspired by the psycho-therapy we saw in these cases. We used this kind of suggestion and planted a false memory that, when you were a kid, five or six years old, you were lost in a shopping mall. You were frightened. You were crying. You were ultimately rescued by an elderly person and reunited with the family. And we succeeded in planting this memory in the minds of about a quarter of our subjects. And you might be thinking, ‘Well, that’s not particularly stressful.’ But we and other investigators have planted rich false memories of things that were much more unusual and much more stressful. So, in a study done in Tennessee, researchers planted the false memory that, when you were a kid, you nearly drowned and had to be rescued by a lifeguard. And in a study done in Canada, researchers planted the false memory that, when you were a kid, something as awful as being attacked by a vicious animal happened to you, succeeding with about half of their subjects.”

All this apart from the fact that what people remember and what they tell isn't always the same thing, either. In fact, there is plenty of research showing just how much we all lie – to others and also to ourselves.[14]

“So, I want to talk a little bit about dishonesty. How many people here have lied at least once this year? Ok. How about the last week? I am not going to ask you about the last day and the last hour (laughter). But there is a very disturbing study in which they take two people who don't know each other, put them in a room and say, 'Talk to each other for ten minutes. Introduce yourself to the other person.' And then, they put them into separate rooms and say, 'Did you lie to the other person?' And almost everybody says, 'No.' And they say, 'Well, luckily we taped your discussion. Let's play it back to you sentence by sentence, and let's get your reaction to each sentence.' And on average, people admit to have lied between two and three times in those ten minutes.”

Under these circumstances, source criticism of testimony is a very important hallmark of scholarly works, particularly when it comes to the Holocaust, about which survivors, bystanders and alleged perpetrators simply have got to remember what the public expects them to, often under threat of severe social or even legal consequences. Taking any testimony about the Holocaust at face value is therefore not only unscientific, it is also dangerous, because only a critical listener encourages a witness to stick to the facts, whereas a credulous listener often gets what he deserves, or as Dr. Susan Haack, professor of philosophy and law at the University of Miami, put it:[15]

man is father to the liar and the cheat.’ What a great line! What he means, I take it, is that a credulous population creates the market for conmen, crooks, fakers etc., and for everykind of deceptive and misleading claim.”

Here is Dr. Lipstadt’s approach to the matter:

First, she admits that the orthodox Holocaust narrative rests almost exclusively on testimony:

“Given the preponderance of evidence from victims, bystanders, and perpetrators, [...].” (p. 28)

Next, she fears that, once the wartime generation has died off, there will be no one left to attest to the truth:

The revisionists’ “objective [...] will bear fruit [...] when there are no more survivors or eyewitnesses alive to attest to the truth.” (p. 29)

Again, she equates testimony with the truth, a typical, anti-scientific stance.

Then she lashes out against anyone shedding doubt on what quote-unquote “eyewitnesses” say, although science outright *demand*s that kind of source criticism.

Buchanan’s “attacks on the credibility of survivors’ testimony are standard elements of Holocaust denial.” (p. 7)

Butz “tried to shed doubt on the credibility of witnesses in general by declaring all testimony inferior to documents.” (p. 145)

Note here her use of the word “attack,” insinuating an aggression where there is none.

Finally, she tells her readers outright lies, such as the one we just discussed about the alleged reliability of human memory:

“It is axiomatic [...] that human memory is [...] very reliable on the central event.” (p. 151)

Or worse still, that the revisionists are the ones violating evidentiary standards, when in fact the shoe is on the other foot:

“Normal and accepted standards of scholarship, including the proper use of evidence, are discarded” by revisionists. (p. 32)

What Dr. Lipstadt insists on is to turn the hierarchical pyramid on its head, giving “survivor testimony” absolute priority. Nowhere in her books does she define what “the proper use of evidence” is. Hence, she is shifting the goalpost here again to make it fit into her agenda.

In 1996, the French mainstream historian Jacques Baynac said the following about the priority of documents over testimony, quote:[\[16\]](#)

“For the scientific historian, an assertion by a witness does not really represent history. It is an object of history [that is to say, it requires source criticism]. And an assertion of one witness does not weigh heavily; assertions by many witnesses do not weigh much more heavily, if they are not shored up with solid documentation. The postulate of scientific historiography, one could say without great exaggeration, reads: no paper(s), no facts proven [...].

Either one gives up the priority of the archives, and in this case

one disqualifies history as a science, in order to immediately reclassify it as fiction; or one retains the priority of the archive, and in this case one must concede that the lack of traces brings with it the incapability of directly proving the existence of homicidal gas chambers.” – unquote

Having said all this, it should be clear whose attitude is a real threat to “the keystones of our civilization,” because that civilization depends on critical, reasoned thinking, not dogmatic belief in what someone claims to be quote-unquote memory. Here is what Popper said about this when relating how the founders of Western civilization, the ancient Greeks, developed that keystone, the new tradition of criticizing theories:[17]

“Now what is new in Greek philosophy, [...is] a new attitude towards the myths. [...]

The new attitude I have in mind is the critical attitude. In the place of a dogmatic handing on of the doctrine [...] we find a critical discussion of the doctrine. Some people begin to ask questions about it; they doubt the trustworthiness of the doctrine; its truth.

Doubt and criticism certainly existed before this stage. What is new, however, is that doubt and criticism now become, in their turn, part of the tradition of the school. A tradition of a higher order replaces the traditional preservation of the dogma: in the place of traditional theory – in place of the myth – we find the tradition of criticizing theories [...].”

Not having defined what the “keystones of our civilization” are, Lipstadt can again shift the goalpost by declaring that a critical attitude to testimony is, quote,

“[...] a threat to all who believe in the ultimate power of reason. It repudiates reasoned discussion [...] it is an irrational animus

[...] Holocaust denial is the apotheosis of irrationalism." – unquote (p. 23)

So, because revisionists insist on an intellectual, rational, evidence-based, reasoned investigation of the reliability of witness testimony, they turn irrationalism into their god – because that's what apotheosis means! She really got it all upside down. If she knows it, she is a liar. If she doesn't, she has no clue what scholarship is all about.

In the same vein, she writes on page 245, quote

"They [meaning the revisionists] attempt to project the appearance of being committed to the very values that they in truth adamantly oppose: reason, critical rules of evidence, and historical distinction." – unquote

After all that we have explained so far, it ought to be clear that she's talking about herself here.

Her steadfast refusal to debate those who subject her narrative of the Holocaust to tough attempts at refutation is legendary:

"Whenever the plans include inviting a denier I categorically decline to appear [on TV talk shows]. As I make clear in these pages the deniers want to be thought of as the 'other side.' Simply appearing with them on the same stage accords them that status. [...] Refusal to debate the deniers thwarts their desire to enter the conversation as a legitimate point of view." (pp. xi)

"I explained repeatedly that I would not participate in a debate with a Holocaust denier. The existence of the Holocaust was not a matter of debate." (p. 1)

“Second, they are contemptuous of the very tools that shape any honest debate: truth and reason. Debating them would be like trying to nail a glob of jelly to the wall.” (p. 250)

“Time need not be wasted in answering each and every one of the deniers’ contentions. It would be a never-ending effort to respond to arguments posed by those who falsify findings, quote out of context, and dismiss reams of testimony because it counters their arguments. It is the speciousness of their arguments, not the arguments themselves, that demands a response.” (p. 33)

Of course, she has the right not to talk to or even be seen with people she dislikes. She even has the right not to address arguments she detests, which is exactly her approach, as she writes on page 33. Stop this video to read it. If you do, note again that she mentions only “reams of testimony,” but no documents or physical evidence.

Later in her book, however, she does discuss some revisionist arguments, which we will address later.

As we pointed out earlier, refusing to expose one’s own theory to serious attempts of refutation is a hallmark of a pseudo-scholarly attitude. Refusing to take opposing arguments into serious consideration sheds a bad light on those who do this – not on the arguments they reject out of hand.

In addition, claiming that certain things are simply not up for debate is also a clear and present sign of an unscholarly attitude, not to say sheer bigotry. Although Dr. Lipstadt admits that there are many aspects of the Holocaust that are debated among mainstream historians, she insists that – quote

“There is a categorical difference between debating these types of [mainstream] questions [about the Holocaust] and debating the very fact of the Holocaust.” – unquote (p. xii)

Well, we hate to tell you, Dr. Deborah, but the freedom of hypothesis is a fundamental principle of science. Just because you don't like it doesn't mean you can ignore its existence and still claim to be a scholar. You have to make up your mind.

Apart from all this, Lipstadt's warning that debating revisionists would improve their public reputation is not even true, because if the evidence for the Holocaust is as overwhelming and the claims of revisionists as untenable as Dr. Lipstadt claims, engaging them in a debate would be a golden opportunity to expose their alleged quackery and stupidity. Only if revisionism has intrinsic validity would it gain stature by a public hearing. Here is the real reason why Lipstadt won't debate revisionists:[18]

[Lipstadt:] 'I will not debate you. Not here, not now, not ever!'

[Iring:] 'Because you can't!'

We could easily turn the tables on Dr. Lipstadt by demonstrating that her primary motive is not historical accuracy but shoring up Jewish identity and group cohesion. But since we consider motives to be only of passing interest, and because they do not in any way invalidate factual arguments, we won't waste our time with this. Dr. Lipstadt, by the way, agrees that at the end of the day, motives are rather irrelevant when she writes on page 232 – quote:

"But on some level [U.S. historian Dr.] Carl Degler was right: [The revisionists'] motives are irrelevant." – unquote

But if that is so, then why write a whole book on proclaiming the revisionist's motives?

When it comes to Lipstadt's motives, there is one topic we have to briefly mention here. As stated before, Dr. Lipstadt considers anti-Semitic and related leanings to be abominable motives. Interestingly, she puts at the same level of abomination another attitude, and that is philo-Germanism.

She uses that term frequently together with anti-Semitism, racism and/or Nazism. Here are the quotes, which we won't read to you. You can stop the video if you want to take them in.

"The roots of Barnes's views about the Holocaust and his attitudes toward Israel go beyond his deep-seated Germanophilia and revisionist approach to history: They can be found in his antisemitism." (p. 91)

"Butz's book is replete with the same expressions of traditional antisemitism, philo-Germanism and conspiracy theory as the Holocaust denial pamphlets printed by the most scurrilous neo-Nazi groups." (p. 141)

"Most people who were aware of [the IHR's] existence dismissed it as a conglomeration of Holocaust deniers, neo-Nazis, philo-Germans, right-wing extremists, antisemites, racists, and conspiracy theorists." (p. 154)

"With the zeal of a convert, [Austin App] moved to the isolationist, pro-German end of the political spectrum and stayed there for the rest of his life." (p. 76)

These statements indicate that, for Dr. Lipstadt, having positive feelings for Germany or the German people is just as odious as being anti-Semitic or racist. To put the shoe on the other foot: what do you think the average person would think of us if we stated that it is odious to have pro-Jewish feelings? We'd be labeled an anti-Semite, right? But that stance would not be different than Dr. Lipstadt's attitude.

How crazy her attitude toward Germans and Germany really is can be seen from two more quotes. In one, she seriously states that Germany has the moral obligation to welcome anyone seeking refuge there:

"If Germany was also a victim of a 'downfall,' and if the Holocaust was no different from a mélange of other tragedies, Germany's moral obligation to welcome all who seek refuge within its borders is lessened.” (p. 243)

And in another one she states that she feels obligated to take charge of how the Germans look at their own history:

“We [historians] did not train in our respective fields in order to stand like watchmen and women on the Rhine. Yet this is what we must do.” (p. 222)

Considering that there are currently around a billion people on this planet who, due to war, famine, poverty and civil unrest, are inclined to seek refuge elsewhere,<sup>[19]</sup> and if we keep in mind that one favorite destination of those migrants is Germany, is Dr. Lipstadt seriously saying that Germany has the moral obligation to welcome a billion people, if they decide to come? Is she out of her mind? And why exactly does Germany have that obligation, but Israel does not?

To top it off, Dr. Lipstadt's father was German. That explains her last name, which is a town in Westphalia, Germany.<sup>[20]</sup> So what we have here is an ethnic German of the Jewish faith who hates her own ethnicity. It's a self-hating Jew of a different kind. Actually, many if not most Jews have some German blood running in their veins, and quite a few of them hate that fact with a passion. It's worth some psychiatric analysis, but we won't go there.

4. Lies about Revisionists

Let's now turn to some false claims Dr. Lipstadt makes about Holocaust revisionists and what they claim. Actually, let us rename this section the Straw-Man Fallacy, because that's what we are dealing with here. And here is how it works. First, you ignore the real arguments, or even the persons making the real, hard-hitting arguments. Then you either create a made-up, pretend argument, or you refute the weak arguments of some person who is only a marginal figure in the area of contention. Then you defeat that made-up or weak argument, and finally you declare victory over the entire area of contention. This table, broken into two parts, lists in the left column the people whom Dr. Lipstadt deals with in her book, and in the right column the people who have contributed major scholarly works to Holocaust revisionism as of 1992.

#	Persons in Dr. Lipstadt's Focus	Major Contributor to Holocaust Revisionism

11	Fred Leuchter	Fred Leuchter
12	David Irving	–

#	Persons in Dr. Lipstadt's Focus	Major Contributor to Holocaust Revisionism

15	Mark Weber	Mark Weber
16	–	Franz J. Scheidl
17	–	Emil Aretz
18	–	Wilhelm Stäglich
19	–	Udo Walendy
20	–	Walter N. Sanning
21	–	Carlo Mattogno

23	–	Friedrich P. Berg
24	–	Enrique Aynat Ecknes
25	–	Brian Renk
26	–	Henri Roques
27	–	Serge Thion

As you can see, of the 25 individuals listed, only five are a hit. Ten of the people Lipstadt discusses have never contributed anything of scholarly value to Holocaust revisionism. The late mainstream historian Dr. Nolte isn't even a revisionist by any stretch of the imagination. He got into Dr. Lipstadt's crosshairs only because he basically insisted that any historian claiming to be a scholar has to take the revisionists and their arguments seriously rather than ignore or malign them. Most of the others – Barnes, Hoggan, App, Carto, Zündel, Irving and Smith – have polemicized about the Holocaust, but not a single one of them has ever written even a single thoroughly researched and referenced article on the Holocaust, let alone a monograph. Lipstadt therefore cherry-picked these individuals exactly because they polemicized, which makes them an easy target. Bardèche even believed in the gas chambers and thus a Holocaust, in spite of Lipstadt's false claim to the contrary on her page 56.[\[21\]](#)

Ten persons who did contribute major scholarly works as of late 1992 are not on Dr. Lipstadt's list. And we apologize in case we missed anyone.[22] Not all of them are of equal value, and we are listing them here only to show that Dr. Lipstadt either has no clue what Holocaust revisionism is all about, or that she is maliciously hiding it from her readers.

In any case, she took a grotesque misrepresentation of Holocaust revisionism in order to show that it has no scholarly merits, and that revisionists are merely driven by detestable motives. And ever since, the Holocaust orthodoxy has declared victory over revisionism as such.

Had Dr. Lipstadt done her homework, she would have had no problem finding out which revisionist publications existed back then, because in 1988, Italian Holocaust researcher Carlo Mattogno published a paper on the birth, development and criticism of Holocaust revisionism.[23] It lists all major revisionist works published in all languages which had appeared by the time that article was finalized, and it also lists reactions by mainstream authors to those publications. Dr. Lipstadt knew the English-language journal where that paper was published, because she mentions and quotes papers from it in her book many times.

Dr. Lipstadt wrote her book at a time when Holocaust revisionism underwent a paradigm shift. Triggered by Fred Leuchter's expert report,[24] many new researchers joined that school of thought and gave it a major boost, resulting in a wide range of publications. Here is a list of the most important authors among them. Again, apologies in case we missed anyone.

- Jürgen Graf
- Jean Plantin
- Joseph Halow
- Germar Rudolf
- Jean-Marie Boisdefeu
- Willy Wallwey (using pen names)
- Don Heddesheimer

- Thomas Dalton
- Samuel Crowell
- Santiago Alvarez
- Nicholas Kollerstrom
- Warren B. Routledge
- Franco Deana
- Klaus Schwensen
- Paul Grubach
- Friedrich Jansson
- Thomas Kues
- Vincent Reynouard

At least the most important ones among them ought to have played some role in the 2016 edition of Lipstadt's book, but they didn't.

So much for Dr. Lipstadt's picking the wrong people. Let us now turn to some of the few hits she made. Four of them are of relevance here:

- Prof. Robert Faurisson,
- Mark Weber,
- Prof. Arthur Butz and
- Fred A. Leuchter

Let's deal with Prof. Faurisson first. By the time Ms. Lipstadt wrapped up her typescript in late 1992, Faurisson had published a monograph where he summarized his case,<sup>[25]</sup> a response to a major critic of his,<sup>[26]</sup> and a number of papers that deserve to be called "scholarly" in their approach,<sup>[27]</sup> although most of them in French, and some written under a pen name.<sup>[28]</sup> Dr. Lipstadt mentions none of them. In her footnote 14 on page 293, she does quote – although incompletely – one paper by Faurisson which summarizes his reason as to why the hypothesis that the Nazis used gas chambers to mass murder people is a problem, hence the title of the paper:[29] “The ‘Problem of the Gas Chambers.’” Considering the brevity and dearth of references of that paper, we hesitate calling it scholarly in nature. It’s more of a provocation and a mission statement, if you wish. But be that as it may, doing Faurisson justice in 1992 would have meant taking on his 280-page monograph Mémoire en defense and the sequel Réponse à Pierre Vidal-Naquet. But instead, Lipstadt focuses on polemical statements Faurisson made over the years.

When it comes to revisionist historian Mark Weber, Lipstadt mentions only one of his many papers on the Holocaust, of which we list here only the major ones:

- Weber, Mark, “Buchenwald: Legend and Reality,” Journal of Historical Review, 7(4) (1986), pp. 405-417
- Weber, Mark, “Jewish Soap,” Journal of Historical Review, 11(2) (1991), pp. 217-227
- Weber, Mark, “The Nuremberg Trials and the Holocaust,” Journal of Historical Review, 12(2) (1992), pp. 167-213
- Weber, Mark, “Bergen-Belsen Camp: The Suppressed Story,” Journal of Historical Review, 15(3) (1995), pp. 23-30
- Weber, Mark, “High-Frequency Delousing Facilities at Auschwitz,” Journal of Historical Review, 18(3) (1999), pp. 4-12

The paper highlighted here is mentioned by Lipstadt, but all she has to say about it is that Weber – quote

“blamed the postwar spread of the rumor that the Nazis made Jews into soap on Simon Wiesenthal and Stephen Wise – a claim that has no relationship to reality.” – unquote (pp. 226f.)

That’s not merely a straw-man fallacy, it’s one of the many lies Lipstadt spreads. Here is what Weber wrote, after having shown that Wiesenthal and Wise, among many others, spread the soap lie during and after the war. Quote:

“In April 1990, professor Yehuda Bauer of Israel’s Hebrew University, [...] had the chutzpah to blame the [soap] legend on ‘the Nazis.’

In fact, blame for the soap story lies rather with individuals such as [!!!] Simon Wiesenthal and Stephen Wise, organizations like the World Jewish Congress, and the victorious Allied powers, none of whom has ever apologized for promoting this vile falsehood.” – unquote (pp. 222f.)

Let’s now turn to Prof. Butz. Since his one and only monograph on the Holocaust is rather famous, Lipstadt couldn’t dodge that bullet, but she chose to ignore the main points of Butz’s book and focus on minor issues instead. Some of them she misrepresents, and by so doing, she turns her own argument into a straw-man fallacy. If you are interested in details, get the Bungled book shown. Here, we will focus on Butz’s two main arguments which Lipstadt completely ignores.

Butz’s first main argument goes as follows:

Germany’s enemies owned or had access to many dense information networks in German-occupied Europe: secret-service agents, underground resistance organizations, the Catholic Church, Jewish organizations, the Red Cross, to name only a few. Had a Holocaust been going on, they would have known. Yet the way they acted clearly indicates that they had no serious, trustworthy, reliable information about it.

In a 1982 paper, which Dr. Lipstadt also ignored, Dr. Butz summarized his thesis again, which is at times somewhat awkwardly presented in his book. The main points he makes in his book can be gleaned from the headlines he used in this article. Stop the video to read them.[\[30\]](#)

- “Both the wartime records and behavior of the Jews in occupied Europe show that they had no information of an extermination program.”

- “Jewish bodies outside occupied Europe [...] did not act as though they believed their own claims of ‘extermination.’”
- “Allied governments and their officials did not act as though they believed the extermination claims, and their intelligence services never produced any information corroborative of the claims.”
- “The Vatican did not believe the extermination claims.”
- “The actions and reports of the International Red Cross do not harmonize with the extermination claims.”
- “The German resistance to Hitler, including the substantial part that was lodged in German military intelligence, was not cognizant in any way of a program of exterminating Jews.”
- “The German documents speak not of extermination, but basically of a program of expulsion and resettlement in the east. There is nothing about ‘gas chambers’ in the concentration camp or other German records.”

Butz’s second main argument is that the Holocaust myth rests on the dual interpretation of innocuous items or events whose meaning the creators of the myth turned into something ill-boding. In the preface to the 2015 edition of his book, Butz writes about that – quote:[31]

“I analyzed the specifics of the alleged extermination process at Auschwitz. I showed that all of the specific material facts required a dual interpretation of relatively mundane facts, e.g. transports, selections, showers, shaving hair, Zyklon B, crematoria, etc., all real and all relatively mundane, had been given a second [devious] interpretation.” – unquote

Hence, the questions are:

- Were the Jews transported to be killed, or to be expelled and put to slave labor?
- On arrival in the camps, were fragile Jews selected to be killed, or to be sent elsewhere?

- Were the showers fake to camouflage gas chambers, or real to give the inmates a bath?
- Was the inmates' hair shaved off to exploit even the least body part before killing them, or to combat lice infestations?
- Was Zyklon B a mass-murder weapon, or was it used to kill lice, hence save inmates' lives?
- Were crematoria used to erase evidence of mass murder, or to prevent the spread of diseases?

There is much more in Butz's trail-blazing book which Lipstadt evidently cannot handle, some of which we can mention here only briefly, as for instance the issue of false confessions by alleged perpetrators. Lipstadt hides from her readers that

- a. the Allies systematically tortured their German prisoners after the war to extract quote-unquote "confessions," and that
- b. the Allies presented during the Nuremberg Tribunal quote-unquote "evidence", such as extorted confessions, fraudulent expert reports and film footage with mendacious narrations, which quote-unquote "convinced" some of the defendants that the Holocaust claims were true.

Lipstadt hides or misrepresents these and other facts laid out by Dr. Butz as well. See the Bungled book for more details.

The other individual discussed by Lipstadt who wrote a significant revisionist study is Fred Leuchter, the former U.S. expert on execution technologies. A lot of things that Lipstadt writes on him, however, are ad hominem attacks. But because that is completely beside the point, we'll simply ignore that here and will focus only on factual arguments. For this, let's turn again to her endnotes. Her chapter on Leuchter has a whopping 114 of them. How many of them refer to sources that address in any technical or scientific way any of the technical and toxicological issues raised by Leuchter? Basically only 13. One of them is an article by Robert Faurisson, which we can ignore, as Dr. Lipstadt doesn't quote it to support her own case. The other twelve are from three works by the French pharmacist Jean-Claude Pressac (notes 56, 58, 62-65, 85, 87-90).

We will again encounter the same pattern later when addressing the way Lipstadt discusses actual revisionist arguments about the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz. There, too, she relies exclusively on Pressac: of the 29 endnotes referencing her discussion about the gas chambers, 28 refer to Pressac's first book,<sup>[32]</sup> and one to a revisionist book by Faurisson – which, again, cannot be counted.

Such a referential monoculture is truly pitiful. Dr. Lipstadt basically has only one leg to stand on. How can any scholar seriously write a treatise when there is only one relevant work to quote from?

We'll postpone discussing Lipstadt's at-times-fallacious arguments to the last section of this documentary when dealing with all the rest of them.

In closing this section on revisionist personalities, let us briefly mention Bradley Smith, the founder of the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust. Lipstadt's chapter on him is the core of her book, but it is also the least substantiated. First of all, as we mentioned earlier, Smith never really wrote anything of substance on the Holocaust, which makes him an easy straw-man target. Next, Smith merely applies the Western ideal of the open marketplace of ideas to a topic where Lipstadt and her ilk don't want it applied. For decades, Smith has argued that – quote

“Anyone should be encouraged to investigate critically the Holocaust story in the same way they are encouraged to investigate every other historical event. This is not a radical point of view. The culture of critique was developed millennia ago by Greek philosophers like Socrates, and was renewed centuries ago during the Enlightenment.” – unquote (from a CODOH Campus Project ad, 1991)

What's wrong with that? Smith managed to place hundreds of these ads in campus newspapers, followed up by radio interviews and even TV shows. That's what caused the two mainstream historians mentioned by Dr.

Lipstadt to worry and ask her to research the matter. In fact, the cover art of the 1993 hardcover edition features press clippings from media reactions which Bradley Smith triggered with his Campus Project, that is to say, his attempt to bring Holocaust revisionism to the attention of college and university students as well as professors throughout the United States.

As results from what Lipstadt writes and from all the organizations supporting her, her book was primarily geared toward being part of a concerted effort to thwart Smith's Campus Project. Smith felt the effects early on. He describes it in his autobiography Break His Bones, which you can read online at the address shown.<sup>[33]</sup> If you are interested in finding out what motivated Smith to do this, and what he experienced as backlash from the establishment, we highly recommend reading it. But here is a brief video clip from the documentary El Gran Tabu.<sup>[34]</sup>

"[...] American ex-patriot living in Mexico. In the 1950s, Bradley, then a bookseller, was prosecuted by the U.S. government for selling the Henry Miller book Tropic of Cancer.

'My man's bringing my gear.'

It was then considered pornographic, even though now it is considered to be a great work of literature. Since then, Bradley has been a strong advocate for free speech and intellectual freedom. He travels North America speaking to college students about the persecution of Holocaust revisionists.

'The way I look at it, the ideal of intellectual freedom is the one great idea of American culture. There may be others, but that's the one great one. It didn't originate with the constitution. It came out of the renaissance, it came out of the Greek culture, and it came out of the British. And it was institutionalized in our constitution in the First Amendment. The First Amendment is rather peculiar, because things like it are not available, even in Canada. They don't have the equivalent of our First Amendment. We can't have intellectual freedom, if we don't have the right to dissent. It's just not possible. If you can't dissent from an orthodox opinion, you're not free to think about that view. Or if you're free to think about it, you have to keep it to yourself. But it's not a culture of intellectual freedom if you don't have the right to dissent. The professorial class is not in complete agreement with that. The professorial class believes that, in my experience, that most people have the right to dissent, but some don't.

Revisionist arguments with regard to the Holocaust are being criminalized in country after country after country in Europe, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the laws have already been drawn up to criminalize revisionist arguments here in America. And it's done by people who are sincere."

Lipstadt's chapter on Smith is a telling exposé of how she has been and keeps conspiring with her like-minded colleagues to suppress Smith's campaign for intellectual freedom and open debate on the Holocaust. Lipstadt claims that this is not a matter of First Amendment rights, because the First Amendment merely prevents the United States government from passing laws to limit free speech. While this is formally correct, it is also like saying that, while the U.S. government has to abide by the law, we normal people can act as we damn well please. In contrast, the Bill of Rights should be a moral example of how any responsible, powerful group of people should behave. Lipstadt's excuse on page 215 that, if the revisionists get turned down by one media outlet, quote, "there are always other publications," unquote, is a bad joke, because it's been her and her comrades' mission in life to make sure that there isn't any, quote, "other publication," unquote, except for those the revisionists publish themselves, and then Lipstadt and company strive to make sure that the sale of this revisionist material is banned everywhere else, too. It's like saying: "Yeah, you have the right to speak, but only to yourself!" Hence, this is not just about having the right to speak freely, but also for everyone to decide for themselves who they want to listen to. Using power the way Dr. Lipstadt and her ilk have been using it for decades in order to prevent others from being able to hear is a violent act. It's like locking you up in a soundproof room.

Smith has described how it works – quote:[35]

“Every professor and working reporter understands perfectly well that, once he or she is smeared with the neo-Nazi [or anti-Semitic] label [...] they know they are dead ducks. They know that from that moment on they are going to have to get a job at McDonalds or at a car wash someplace because no newspaper and no university will ever again employ them.” – unquote

That’s the power Lipstadt and her ilk wield, and her chapter on Smith proves that they misuse it wherever they see fit to destroy freedom of science and scholarship on this matter.

Lipstadt justifies that by claiming that Holocaust revisionists don’t have opinions but mere prejudices, as for instance about Smith on page 215. In essence, she lobbies for the idea that there should not be a freedom to express prejudices:

“Opinion must be grounded in fact. Facts inform opinions and opinions, inspired by different interests and passions, can differ widely and still be legitimate as long as they respect factual truth. Freedom of opinion is a farce unless factual information is guaranteed and the facts themselves are not in dispute.” (p. xiv)

But how can we distinguish between facts on the one hand and errors or lies on the other? Lipstadt just throws these terms at us and thinks that solves the issue, when in fact it merely confounds it. In other words, she is shifting the goalpost again.

If we wanted to cut out from a free exchange of ideas all those utterings that are not sufficiently based on facts, then the questions arise:

- a. How do we reliably measure the degree to which an opinion is based on facts?

- b. Who sets the limit below which we cut out non-eligible utterings?
And
- c. And most importantly: Who defines authoritatively what counts as a fact? A Ministry of Truth? Or Dr. Lipstadt?

And there's the rub. Dr. Lipstadt would like to play Goddess Almighty by deciding what is fact and what is not. To find out what is fact and what is not was exactly the purpose of Smith's campus advertisement project: get the smartest brains of the nation to mull it over – without being threatened by Dr. Lipstadt and her comrades, should they come to iconoclastic results. There's nothing wrong with Smith's approach. There is everything wrong with thwarting that process though, as is Dr. Lipstadt's goal. It is profoundly anti-academic, anti-intellectual, anti-scholarly, anti-scientific. It's dogmatic, taboo-driven, arrogant, imperious and overbearing.

The right to free inquiry, and even the obligation to inquire, is at the heart of academia. That is the first, most profound and most important thing that every professor should publicly profess. If they don't profess that, they are not professors. Period.

5. Discussing Arguments

Let's now turn to historical arguments themselves, which aren't the core of Lipstadt's book, but they are the core of the issue at hand. Before doing that, let us summarize how Dr. Lipstadt backs up factual claims. When analyzing her endnotes, we find that she relies heavily on political propaganda material, to a large degree written by the political pressure group ADL; she very frequently doesn't quote the source itself but third-party publications writing about them;<sup>[36]</sup> she cites source material that is utterly "unquotable," most prominent among them a collection of newspaper clippings,<sup>[37]</sup> and relies on only one author – Pressac – when discussing the core issue: were there homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz to exterminate the Jews? In many cases, however, she makes claims which she doesn't back up with anything at all.

As a result of her not going back to the sources, she commits major blunders, for instance in her section where she discusses claims allegedly made by the late German historian Dr. Ernst Nolte, whose writings Lipstadt evidently has never read. Most of what she claims, Nolte in fact never wrote or said.

Now we'll delve deeper into the factual discussion to see whether the same pattern can be found there. Buckle up and enjoy the ride!

5.1. The Chemistry of Auschwitz

In his famous report, Leuchter claimed that the active ingredient in Zyklon B, hydrogen cyanide, reacts with iron compounds present in masonry to form a very stable pigment called Prussian Blue, as it did in these walls of two Auschwitz fumigation chambers, and that this pigment ought to be present to this day in the walls of the claimed homicidal gas chambers of Auschwitz, where Zyklon B is said to have been used for mass murder. Lipstadt disputes that claim on pages 188-190. We wonder, though, what knowledge or education might permit her to make any statement in this regard. She is a specialist in Jewish history, not in chemistry, and she doesn't even try to shore up any of her claims with any references to chemical literature.

Since that issue has been dealt with in a separate, 100-minute documentary,[\[38\]](#) we take a pass here and direct the interested viewer to that video instead which was recently put into quarantine by YouTube, by the way. Suffice it here to say that Dr. Lipstadt isn't even aware of the many issues and aspects involved.

5.2. The Diesel Controversy

Next, let's turn to diesel gas chambers. In her first chapter, Dr. Lipstadt relates the controversy surrounding a statement made by U.S. journalist Pat Buchanan about the possibility of committing mass murder with diesel-engine exhaust, a method claimed for the so-called extermination camps at Treblinka and Belzec. Stop the video to read what she wrote about it.

“Patrick Buchanan, one of the foremost right-wing conservative columnists in the country, used his widely syndicated column to express views that come straight from the scripts of Holocaust deniers. He argued that it was physically impossible for the gas chamber at Treblinka to have functioned as a killing apparatus because the diesel engines that powered it could not produce enough carbon monoxide to be lethal. Buchanan’s ‘proof’ was a 1988 incident in which ninety-seven passengers on a train in Washington, D.C., were stuck in a tunnel as the train emitted carbon monoxide fumes. Because the passengers were not harmed, Buchanan extrapolated that the victims in a gas chamber using carbon monoxide from diesel engines would also not have been harmed. He ignored the fact that the gassings at Treblinka took as long as half an hour and that the conditions created when people are jammed by the hundreds into small enclosures, as they were at Treblinka, are dramatically different from those experienced by a group of people sitting on a train.” (pp. 6f.)

We won't bother going into the details here, because, heck, it's just a comment a journalist made. Lipstadt gets all upset about it, but in her discussion she completely fails to even mention the actual scientific paper upon which that debate is based.<sup>[39]</sup> We show some relevant publications here, just in case you are curious.<sup>[40]</sup> None of them can be found in Lipstadt's book. She just produced hot air.

5.3. Cremation Capacities

The next topic concerns the capacity of the crematoria at Auschwitz. If you wanted to figure out what the features of a cremation furnace are, what would you do? Well, any reasonable person would consult expert literature on cremation, and if push comes to shove, engineering calculations and experiments could also be performed. But not so our Debbie. She instead refers to a simple letter by the Auschwitz administration. Again, stop the video to read her ramblings, if you care to.

“Leuchter was unaware of a host of documents pertaining to the installation and construction of the gas chambers and crematoria. He did not know of a report filed in June 1943 by the Waffen-SS commandant of construction at Auschwitz on the completion of the crematoria. The report indicated that the five crematoria had a total twenty-four-hour capacity of 4,756 bodies. Leuchter had stated that the crematoria had a total capacity of 156 bodies in the same period of time. Even if the SS’s calculation was overly ‘optimistic,’ the difference between it and Leuchter’s was staggering.” (pp. 187)

What’s her source for that letter? The transcript of the Second Zündel Trial.<sup>[41]</sup> Needless to say, that document isn’t part of the trial transcript. A proper historian would give an archival reference for the document itself<sup>[42]</sup> or some secondary literature where it can be found.<sup>[43]</sup>

Logic – that is to say, math – natural laws that govern incineration processes, technical cremation possibilities at the time, and the expert evaluation of physical evidence, such as experiments and still-existing crematories, as well as documentary evidence, such as construction plans, operating instructions and cremation logs, play no role in her argument at all. She might as well have quoted “survivor testimonies,” some of which claim absolutely absurd cremation capacities. That’s Dr. Lipstadt’s world of lala-science, also called pseudo-science.

If you want to read a book dealing with that topic, for which the authors have gone through all the above steps to separate fact from fiction, then look at this 3-volume work written by the late Italian engineer Dr. Franco Deana together with Italian historian Carlo Mattogno.<sup>[44]</sup> In this massive work, the authors concluded that the actual cremation capacity of Auschwitz roughly coincided with the recorded death toll of registered inmates who died mainly of diseases, as documented in the Auschwitz death records.<sup>[45]</sup> We’ll leave it at that, because the cremation issue is too huge to be covered here in detail.

5.4. Untenable Technical Claims

When it comes to the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz, Dr. Lipstadt makes a number of claims, every single one of which is both unsubstantiated and untrue.

- the homicidal gas chambers had “powerful” (pp. 168, 253) or “sophisticated ventilation systems” (p. 195), “especially designed” for that purpose (p. 253)
- the delousing chambers “were constructed in the same fashion as the [alleged] homicidal gas chambers” (p. 189).
- the Germans used “advanced technology for the purposes of mass murder” (p. 102) by building “technologically advanced instruments” (p. 106)]

We won't bother proving this here, for one because the next documentary slated for production – Questioning the Holocaust: Why We Believed, Part 2 – will deal with all these issues in depth, and also because we've taken up too much of your time already.

One of Lipstadt's favorite expressions is that there are “reams” of documents which allegedly refute what revisionists claim (p. 196). As mentioned before, she relies in this regard entirely on Pressac's 1989 book on Auschwitz,<sup>25</sup> as she admits on page 255.

“The next few pages contain a brief summary of Pressac's extensive findings. Those who have found the deniers' claims about gas chambers the least bit troubling should have their doubts set aside. Those who have never been persuaded in the least by this assault on the truth will find the documents overwhelming proof of the degree to which the deniers distort history and lie about the evidence.”

And that's where Lipstadt goes terminally bust. Pressac's vacuous ramblings have been dissected and refuted in the most minute and comprehensive manner possible in two separate monographs which, admittedly, appeared only after the first edition of Lipstadt's book had come out.[46] The new, 2016 edition should have taken that into account, but nay, Dr. Lipstadt doesn't need to pay attention to what's going on in the real world. She has the backing of the rich and mighty, and that's good enough for her.

Pressac's claims, which have reinforced the belief of millions in the myth, will be one of the main focuses of the upcoming documentary Questioning the Holocaust: Why We Believed, Part 2, to which we referred.

6. Conclusion

We have never read such shoddy quote-unquote "scholarship" in our lives as in Dr. Lipstadt's book. She clearly has neither understood what the principles and methods of science and scholarship are, nor has she any clue about the historical topics she is writing about. She misquotes, mistranslates, misrepresents, misinterprets, and makes a plethora of wild claims without backing them up with anything. No wonder she refuses to debate the revisionists

[Lipstadt:] 'I will not debate you. Not here, not now, not ever!'

[Iring:] 'Because you can't!'

In fact, Dr. Lipstadt herself has proclaimed the judgment in her own case. All we have to do is quote her:

"[T]ruth has been the antithesis of [her] enterprise." (p. 57)

"Given the way [she] handle[s] documents and data, it is clear that [she has] no interest in scholarship or reason." (p. 232) million adults, which, children added to the mix, would probably get close to one billion: Neli Esipova, Julie Ray, "700 Million Worldwide Desire to Migrate Permanently," Gallup poll, November 2, 2009, <http://news.gallup.com/poll/124028/700-million-worldwide-desire-migrate-permanently.aspx> (Aug 30, 2016). With Germany's announcement in 2015 that "all are welcome," resulting in a deluge of migrants pouring into Germany, that number has probably gone up again. Most prospective migrants come from the Middle East, North and sub-Saharan Africa, whose primary destinations for reasons of geography are European countries, mainly Germany (for economic reasons) and the UK and France (for linguistic reasons).

Abstract

With her book Denying the Holocaust, Deborah Lipstadt tried to show the flawed methods and extremist motives of “Holocaust deniers,” who, so the book’s description claims, have “no more credibility than the assertion that the earth is flat.”

Rather than dealing thoroughly with factual arguments, Lipstadt’s book is full of ad hominem attacks on her opponents. It is an exercise in anti-intellectual pseudo-scientific arguments, an exhibition of ideological radicalism that rejects anything which contradicts its preset conclusions.

Since she admits herself that her opponents’ motives are irrelevant, as an inescapable consequence, so is her book.

1. Introduction

Dr. Deborah Lipstadt, April 7th, 2017, TED-x Talks, Sheldonian Theatre, University of Oxford, England:

“The first time I heard about Holocaust denial, I laughed. [...] Fast forward, a little over a decade, and two senior scholars, scholars of the Holocaust, two most prominent historians of the Holocaust approached me and said; ‘Deborah, let’s have coffee. We have a research idea that we think is perfect for you.’ Intrigued, and flattered that they came to me with an idea and thought me worthy of it, I asked, ‘What is it?’ And they said: ‘Holocaust denial,’ and for the second time, I laughed. ‘Holocaust denial? The flat-earth folks? The Elvis-is-alive people? I should study them?’”

youtu.be/wgPLG\_1BvQo; 00:25-00;29; 2:29-3:07

Dr. Lipstadt, professor of Modern Jewish History and Holocaust studies at Emory University, ended up accepting this research assignment, and it turned into a book that was to have major consequence. It first appeared in 1993 with the title Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory.<sup>[1]</sup>

In it, Ms. Lipstadt gives her perspective of the political background, motives and, what she calls the quote-unquote “spurious methodology” (p. 111) of the revisionists, and also tries to deal with some revisionist arguments.<sup>[2]</sup>

One of the persons whose political background, motives and methods Lipstadt briefly mentions in the book is the British historian David Irving. Lipstadt depicts him in her book as a racist, anti-Semitic Holocaust denier.

Irving didn't like his reputation smeared, so he decided to sue her and her publisher for defamation:[3]

“And the problem then is, if you have a 30-year writing career, and the press gets to know that you don't defend yourself, they think it's open season. And by 1996, I could see, as I stood at the bottom of this alley, a mudslide thundering down the slopes towards me and threatening to engulf me. And the only way to stop that mudslide was to start frantically hammering pegs into the countryside, which I did with these writs. I issued a writ against Deborah Lipstadt for the book that she wrote attacking me called 'Denying the Holocaust.' [...] Nothing that I write is good. Everything that I write is bad, mendacious, distorted, lying, fallacious, deliberately following a political agenda. All the accusations that were made against me by Deborah Lipstadt. And now they are surprised and pained to find themselves at the receiving end of a libel writ since 1996. And they are hoping that I go away. And to their horror, I am not going away, because I have just issued fresh steps in that particular action. And we are going through that whole hell again next year or the year after, because I don't lie down.”

The libel suit unfolding in London at the turn of the millennium, however, ended in a complete disaster for Irving, since, according to the verdict, Lipstadt and her publisher managed to prove most of the claims made against Irving as true.[4]

As a consequence, a number of books appeared documenting not only Irving's defeat but also claiming that quote-unquote “Holocaust denial” has finally been exposed as a pseudo-historical movement driven by ulterior political motives and with no basis in factual reality.[5]

Lipstadt's case became so famous – or was considered so important to and by the mainstream – that her own account of the trial as published in her book History on Trial: My Day in Court with a Holocaust Denier[6] has been turned into a movie which was released in September 2016; parallel to this, her book telling the story of the trial was reissued under the same title as the movie: Denial: Holocaust History on Trial.<sup>[7]</sup>

Lipstadt's original work that triggered all this was also reissued, emphasizing the fact that the mainstream still considers this 24-year-old book to be highly relevant and topical. This new edition was released in December 2016. You can find it on Amazon<sup>[8]</sup> and anywhere else books can be bought.

In this documentary, we will neither deal with Irving's libel suit against Lipstadt nor with any of the publications based on it. Instead, we will go back to the roots of this entire affair, to Lipstadt's 1993 book Denying the Holocaust. Since for the new, 2016 edition no textual changes were made, what is said about the original edition is also true for the latest edition.

This presentation is divided into 4 parts:

In the first part, we will briefly discuss what science is, and how we can distinguish it from fake science, pretend science, or, to put it in Greek, pseudo-science. In the second part, we will briefly address Lipstadt's exposé of the evil denier's motives and their allegedly mendacious methods, while the third part discusses some of Lipstadt's claims about a few Holocaust deniers, or Holocaust revisionists, as they call themselves. In the last part, we will focus on some factual arguments proffered by Dr. Lipstadt about the Holocaust.

It goes without saying that we cannot discuss every claim Dr. Lipstadt made in her book, or else this documentary would last many hours. So we had to keep it brief here. A much more-thorough analysis of Dr. Lipstadt's claims appeared in a book of its own which, at least for now, is also available on Amazon and anywhere else books can be bought.<sup>[9]</sup>

2. Science and Pseudo-Science

Dr. Lipstadt claims numerous times that revisionist authors and organizations, the writings they publish and the arguments they proffer, are not scholarly in nature, but that they are only "pseudo-scientific" or "pseudo-academic,” and that what revisionists write is merely “pseudo-history.” In fact, her book is riddled with “pseudo” terms which we find on these pages in the 2016 edition of her book: 8, 29f., 35, 65, 137, 199, 225, 236, 243, 250, 252. Consequently, she calls the revisionists’ method of writing history “spurious” (p. 127) and “fallacious” (pp. 183, 204; all page numbers given in this presentation refer to the 2016 edition).

Unfortunately, Lipstadt never explains what sets apart proper science and scholarship from sham science and fraudulent scholarship. So let us give a crash course on how to distinguish the two. We’ve taken our definitions loosely from Sir Karl Popper,<sup>[10]</sup> one of the most famous and prestigious philosophers of science of modern times. Of course, you can take any other one, but the result wouldn’t be all that different.

Here are seven principles of science and scholarship.

1. Freedom of Hypothesis
2. Undetermined Outcome
3. Verifiable, Legitimate Evidence
4. Hierarchy of Evidence
5. Source Criticism
6. Welcoming Criticism
7. No Data Rigging

We’ll say something briefly about each one.

1. Freedom of Hypothesis

The first principle concerns the first step in the creation of knowledge. It means that we are allowed and are even encouraged to ask any question that comes to our mind. Whatever curiosity drives us to investigate, or doubts make us explore, if we have a scientific mind, we welcome that. The opposite, pseudo-scientific mindset declares certain topics taboo, tends to stigmatize doubters, and bans certain questions from being asked. True scholars, on the other hand, are opponents of dogmas and taboos.

2. Unpredetermined Outcome

Now to the second point. It means that the answers to research questions can be determined exclusively by verifiable evidence, not by authority figures, not by social taboos, by political correctness, or even by penal law. So, when we are doing any scholarly activity, both the starting point and the end point of that activity – the initial question or assumption and the final conclusion – ought to be completely free of external constrictions. That's at least the ideal situation. Of course, scientists are only human, and so they bend and buckle occasionally, giving way to all kinds of pressure, but that aspect of their work is what actually tarnishes their work.

The path, however, which a scholar takes to get from his initial question to the final answer, that is to say, the way we gather and evaluate evidence, that is where a lot of strictures apply.

3. Verifiable, Legitimate Evidence

And that's our next point. Claiming something without proving it is profoundly unscientific. The way we prove things shows how our work lives up to scholarly standards. In essence, evidence we present must be verifiable by others. If others cannot locate, reproduce or recalculate the evidence we present, then we have failed. As mentioned before, there are certain methods and rules we have to comply with while collecting and interpreting our data.

To give an example, quoting a private collection of otherwise-unsourced newspaper clippings as proof for one's claim is unacceptable, because that private collection is inaccessible to anyone else. Likewise, saying that "Mr. So-and-so told me so" is also unacceptable, because anyone can claim this, and no one can verify that it is true.

4. Hierarchy of Evidence

Not all types of evidence are created equal. In general, the less a piece of evidence depends on human fallibility, the more reliable it usually is. In a hierarchy of the probative value of types of evidence, logic, natural laws, and then material or physical evidence reign supreme, while party testimony is the least reliable. DNA tests in court cases of parenthood or sexual abuse are a case in point. Any scientific mind weighing the results of a DNA test against that of the testimonies by the defendant or the litigant in a trial would side with the DNA test. Parties in a trial can lie and err. As a matter of fact, they often do, but independently performed DNA tests are almost bulletproof.

Of course, not all cases are that straight forward, but you get the idea. Here is a pyramid of the various kinds of evidence, with the most reliable at the top and the least reliable at the bottom.

The lowest layer, stories told by people emotionally affected by the issue at hand, is unfortunately also the most common type of evidence adduced when it comes to the Holocaust. Just because we have many of these stories doesn't mean they are any more reliable. After all, hundreds of years ago the courts in Europe collected thousands of witness accounts confirming that witnesses saw witches riding on broomsticks through the air and having sex with the devil. But such anecdotes don't get more reliable just because thousands swear to them.

5. Source Criticism

This brings up our next point: source criticism. A critical attitude is the core of any scientific endeavour. No critical researcher should take evidence at face value. Even though material and documentary evidence have the highest value, there is always the possibility that they were simply misinterpreted, or that artifacts have been planted, evidence has been manipulated, and documents fabricated or tampered with. The more that is at stake, politically speaking, the more likely such manipulations usually are.

In addition, just because a genuine document claims something, this doesn't make that claim automatically true. Whoever created that document may have been dishonest, misinformed or simply sloppy.

The greatest skepticism, however, is due when dealing with anecdotal evidence, that is to say, witness accounts. Not only is our human memory very fallible, we are also known to give our stories twists and turns that aren't always in accordance with the truth. It is therefore of great importance to embed witness statements in a framework of evidence that is more reliable, hence any of the other layers in our pyramid.

If a witness statement does not fit into that framework, it's most likely untrue, for whatever reasons.

6. Welcoming Criticism

Next, a true scientist wants to see his theories exposed to criticism, because that's the only way to find out whether they hold any water. After all, a scientist doesn't want to be right, he wants to get it right. The more critical helpers he has, and the tougher those helpers test his theories, the better for him. A true scientist therefore wants to get involved in discussions with those who disagree with his theories. He listens to those with other views.

7. No Rigging of Data

Finally, there are many ways of rigging one's data and evidence in order to force them to fit one's theory. All of them are hallmarks of an anti-scientific attitude. Here are those relevant to our topic:

First, ad-hominem attacks. Attacking opponents instead of their ideas by calling them names, imputing bad intentions, immoral motives, unpopular political convictions etc., is a big no-no. This tactic is probably the most commonly used and also the most effective, as most of us are inclined not to listen to arguments anymore if we consider the person making them to be despicable. It remains a fact, however, that such tactics are unacceptable and themselves morally deficient.

Censorship in Europe: The red countries have outlawed the dissemination of revisionist research regarding the Holocaust.

Next on our list is suppressing or ignoring unwanted data, which amounts to forgery, pure and simple. We don't have to explain that in detail. However, there is a form of suppressing unwanted data that is particularly vicious, and that is when governments outlaw certain research results, punish scholars for disseminating them, and destroy unwelcome research publications. Believe it or not, but that's exactly what happens in many Western countries today when it comes to the Holocaust. Here is a map of Europe. All the red countries destroy any research results and data that runs contrary to the official Holocaust dogma.

Last on our list is shifting the definition of terms, which means basically shifting the goalpost. That's a way of cheating. We all know it when it comes to playing games. It also happens in science and scholarship, however. It usually starts by not defining terms properly, or by changing the definition to make it fit one's agenda.

So, what, then, is pseudo-science, you might ask. Well, pseudo-science is analysis that pretends to be science but is not, because it fails to meet many if not most of the criteria just explained. There is, of course, a continuum between science and pseudo-science. The less the just-mentioned principles are maintained, the worse – and more-likely false – is the corresponding science.

In fact, “pseudo-science” is more frequent than established academia is willing to admit, in particular in the quote-unquote “soft” disciplines of the social sciences whose evidentiary rules aren't as rigorous as those of the quote-unquote “exact” sciences, such as math, technology and the natural sciences. History, of course, is a social science, hence more prone to fall prey to the fallacies of pseudo-science than, say, physics or chemistry. This is especially true for Modern History due to political and at times even legal pressure.

3. Motives and Methods

Let's now turn to Dr. Lipstadt's claims regarding the Holocaust deniers' motives and methods. About the revisionists' motives, she writes in her introduction on page sixteen, quote:

“In the 1930s Nazi rats spread a virulent form of antisemitism that resulted in the destruction of millions. Today the bacillus [meaning anti-Semitism] carried by these rats [referring to the deniers aka revisionists] threatens to 'kill' those who already died at the hands of the Nazis for a second time by destroying

the world's memory of them.” – unquote

Hence, in her introduction, Lipstadt equates revisionists with rats. Once the Nazis equated Jews with vermin like rats, lice or bacilli. Lipstadt uses the same terms to indiscriminately disparage all persons holding certain opinions she disagrees with. A worse attack on the humanity of her fellow humans can hardly be conceived. This sentence alone should destroy her reputation as a scholar, but of course, it is politically correct to say these things, so she actually gets applause for it even from many scholars.

Lipstadt equates Holocaust revisionists with Nazis and fascists:

“[The deniers] are a group motivated by a strange conglomeration of conspiracy theories, delusions, and neo-Nazi tendencies.” (p. 28)

“at their core [the revisionists] are no different from these neo-fascist groups.” (p. 245)

Interestingly, Dr. Lipstadt claims that it is the deniers who engage in ad hominem attacks on their opponents. To support her claim, she relates a fanciful story which we won't read here, because it's a waste of time.

“The deniers understand how to gain respectability for outrageous and absolutely false ideas. [...] Professor X publishes a theory despite the fact that reams of documented information contradict his conclusions. In the ‘highest moral tones’ he expresses his disregard for all evidence that sheds doubt on his findings. He engages in ad hominem attacks on those who have authored the critical works in this field and on the people silly enough to believe them. The scholars who have come under attack by this professor are provoked to respond. Before long he has become ‘the controversial Prof. X’ and his theory is discussed seriously by nonprofessionals, that is, journalists. He soon becomes a familiar figure on television and radio, where he ‘explains’ his ideas to interviewers who cannot challenge him or demonstrate the fallaciousness of his argument.” (pp. 31f.)

She simply made that up. There is no evidence that any revisionist scholar ever did what she claims here, since Lipstadt gives no example and quotes no source. You just have to believe her! Fact is, however, that

- a. those living in glass houses should not throw stones; and
- b. making sweeping accusations without proving them is profoundly unscholarly.

On page one, Lipstadt opines that “Holocaust denial is” an “antisemitic ideology” rather than “responsible historiography.” It is a “purely ideological exercise,” and the revisionists merely appear to be “engaged in a genuine scholarly effort when, of course, they are not” (p. 2). Of course. Proof offered? None.

And so it goes on. We could quote a zillion similar passages where she pours out her disdain and contempt for dissidents of Third Reich History, but again, we don’t want to waste your time. It must suffice here to say that her main goal is to portray revisionists as people who hate Jews, because she uses terms like “antisemitism,” “antisemite” and “antisemitic” 182 times in her book, so on average almost on every single page. Here is a table showing how often she uses certain insults in her book.

Occurrence of Insults in Lipstadt’s Denying the Holocaust
anti-Semite/ic/ism	182
extremist/ism	68
conspiracy/ies	51
racist + racism	56
fascist/ism	43
[Nazi	332]

The number of times she uses the term “Nazis” includes many references to the actual historical National Socialists, so that number isn’t really telling much.

Anyway, this list shows what Lipstadt’s book is really about. If you’re hell-bent on reading an avalanche of mental diarrhea, simply get a copy of her book.

The question is, of course: where is the link between these political insinuations and Holocaust revisionism? While it is certainly true that some people holding revisionist views also have certain political views most people detest, it’s not true for all revisionists, simply because revisionism is primarily an attitude toward evidence, not politics. Hence, regarding the Holocaust, revisionism means simply that you think the orthodox narrative needs revision due to new, overlooked, misrepresented or misunderstood evidence.

We could and maybe even should define all the terms Dr. Lipstadt throws at her readers in order to disparage her opponents, so that we can demonstrate how arbitrarily she uses them. But time is precious, and since a more thorough analysis can be found in the Bungled book mentioned earlier,[9] we want to focus on the essentials here, so let us give you just one example, and that is her use of the term “extremism.” The word extreme, derived from the superlative form of the Latin adjective exter, meaning outside, denotes ideas that are at the far end of a spectrum. In the political context it commonly refers to individuals who are ready to violate the law in pursuit of their ideas. How liberally Dr. Lipstadt uses that term can be seen when she discusses U.S. writer Freda Utey, whom she calls an extremist on page 50 of her book. Needless to say, Dr. Lipstadt doesn’t define the term, and she also gives no hint in which way Utey was ever willing to violate any laws. In fact, Utey merely criticized others for violating international law.

The politically correct online encyclopedia Wikipedia has the following to say about Utey, quote:[11]

“Winifred Utley [...], commonly known as Freda Utley, was an English scholar, political activist and best-selling author. After visiting the Soviet Union in 1927 as a trade union activist, she joined the Communist Party of Great Britain in 1928. Later, married and living in Moscow, she quickly became disillusioned with communism. When her Russian husband, Arcadi Berdichevsky, was arrested in 1936, she escaped to England with her young son. (Her husband would die in 1938.)

In 1939, the rest of her family moved to the United States, where she became a leading anticommunist author and activist.” – unquote

Read her entire biography on Wikipedia and you realize that she was anything but an extremist. So why would Lipstadt call her that? Well, in 1948, Freda Utley published a book titled The High Cost of Vengeance where she documented the crimes against humanity committed by the Allied occupational forces in Germany during the first three years after the war.<sup>[12]</sup> These are historical facts which Dr. Lipstadt would like to see erased, but since she cannot refute them, she stigmatizes the author instead – a typical pseudo-scientific tactic.

Let's move on to what Dr. Lipstadt thinks about the methods used by the revisionists.

First, there are truth and memory. On page 23 she states that, quote

“at its core [Holocaust denial] poses a threat to all who believe that knowledge and memory are among the keystones of our civilization.” – unquote.

Here are a number of quotes from her book which suggest that Dr. Lipstadt wants her readers to believe in the equivalence of “truth” with “memory”:

- Subtitle: “The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory”
- p. xvi: “truth and memory are exceedingly fragile,”
- p. 236: “the deniers may have an impact on truth and memory”
- p. 244: “the fragility of memory, truth, reason, and history”
- p. 245: “the destruction of truth and memory”

Considering the fallibility of our senses and our memories, it goes without saying that memory and truth are two distinct things. Dr. Lipstadt acknowledges that on page 151, although she gives it her own twist to make it fit into her agenda, quote:

“It is axiomatic among attorneys, prosecutors, and judges that human memory is notoriously bad on issues of dimensions and precise numbers but very reliable on the central event.” – unquote

And guess how Lipstadt backs up this alleged axiom of the legal profession: not at all. It is not only unsubstantiated but also wrong, as Elizabeth Loftus has demonstrated with her vast research: Human memory can be utterly corrupted in just about any regard. You merely have to apply sufficiently suggestive techniques to achieve it.<sup>[13]</sup>

“In one of the first studies we did, we used suggestion, a method inspired by the psycho-therapy we saw in these cases. We used this kind of suggestion and planted a false memory that, when you were a kid, five or six years old, you were lost in a shopping mall. You were frightened. You were crying. You were ultimately rescued by an elderly person and reunited with the family. And we succeeded in planting this memory in the minds of about a quarter of our subjects. And you might be thinking, ‘Well, that’s not particularly stressful.’ But we and other investigators have planted rich false memories of things that were much more unusual and much more stressful. So, in a study done in Tennessee, researchers planted the false memory that, when you were a kid, you nearly drowned and had to be rescued by a lifeguard. And in a study done in Canada, researchers planted the false memory that, when you were a kid, something as awful as being attacked by a vicious animal happened to you, succeeding with about half of their subjects.”

All this apart from the fact that what people remember and what they tell isn't always the same thing, either. In fact, there is plenty of research showing just how much we all lie – to others and also to ourselves.[14]

“So, I want to talk a little bit about dishonesty. How many people here have lied at least once this year? Ok. How about the last week? I am not going to ask you about the last day and the last hour (laughter). But there is a very disturbing study in which they take two people who don't know each other, put them in a room and say, 'Talk to each other for ten minutes. Introduce yourself to the other person.' And then, they put them into separate rooms and say, 'Did you lie to the other person?' And almost everybody says, 'No.' And they say, 'Well, luckily we taped your discussion. Let's play it back to you sentence by sentence, and let's get your reaction to each sentence.' And on average, people admit to have lied between two and three times in those ten minutes.”

Under these circumstances, source criticism of testimony is a very important hallmark of scholarly works, particularly when it comes to the Holocaust, about which survivors, bystanders and alleged perpetrators simply have got to remember what the public expects them to, often under threat of severe social or even legal consequences. Taking any testimony about the Holocaust at face value is therefore not only unscientific, it is also dangerous, because only a critical listener encourages a witness to stick to the facts, whereas a credulous listener often gets what he deserves, or as Dr. Susan Haack, professor of philosophy and law at the University of Miami, put it:[15]

“Okay. I think this is probably the best line ever written on the subject of credulity, by William Kingdon Clifford: 'The credulous

man is father to the liar and the cheat.' What a great line! What he means, I take it, is that a credulous population creates the market for conmen, crooks, fakers etc., and for everykind of deceptive and misleading claim."

Here is Dr. Lipstadt's approach to the matter:

First, she admits that the orthodox Holocaust narrative rests almost exclusively on testimony:

"Given the preponderance of evidence from victims, bystanders, and perpetrators, [...]." (p. 28)

Next, she fears that, once the wartime generation has died off, there will be no one left to attest to the truth:

The revisionists' "objective [...] will bear fruit [...] when there are no more survivors or eyewitnesses alive to attest to the truth." (p. 29)

Again, she equates testimony with the truth, a typical, anti-scientific stance.

Then she lashes out against anyone shedding doubt on what quote-unquote "eyewitnesses" say, although science outright demands that kind of source criticism.

Buchanan's "attacks on the credibility of survivors' testimony are standard elements of Holocaust denial." (p. 7)

Butz "tried to shed doubt on the credibility of witnesses in general by declaring all testimony inferior to documents." (p. 145)

Note here her use of the word “attack,” insinuating an aggression where there is none.

Finally, she tells her readers outright lies, such as the one we just discussed about the alleged reliability of human memory:

“It is axiomatic [...] that human memory is [...] very reliable on the central event.” (p. 151)

Or worse still, that the revisionists are the ones violating evidentiary standards, when in fact the shoe is on the other foot:

“Normal and accepted standards of scholarship, including the proper use of evidence, are discarded” by revisionists. (p. 32)

What Dr. Lipstadt insists on is to turn the hierarchical pyramid on its head, giving “survivor testimony” absolute priority. Nowhere in her books does she define what “the proper use of evidence” is. Hence, she is shifting the goalpost here again to make it fit into her agenda.

In 1996, the French mainstream historian Jacques Baynac said the following about the priority of documents over testimony, quote:[\[16\]](#)

“For the scientific historian, an assertion by a witness does not really represent history. It is an object of history [that is to say, it requires source criticism]. And an assertion of one witness does not weigh heavily; assertions by many witnesses do not weigh much more heavily, if they are not shored up with solid documentation. The postulate of scientific historiography, one could say without great exaggeration, reads: no paper(s), no facts proven [...].

Either one gives up the priority of the archives, and in this case

one disqualifies history as a science, in order to immediately reclassify it as fiction; or one retains the priority of the archive, and in this case one must concede that the lack of traces brings with it the incapability of directly proving the existence of homicidal gas chambers.” – unquote

Having said all this, it should be clear whose attitude is a real threat to “the keystones of our civilization,” because that civilization depends on critical, reasoned thinking, not dogmatic belief in what someone claims to be quote-unquote memory. Here is what Popper said about this when relating how the founders of Western civilization, the ancient Greeks, developed that keystone, the new tradition of criticizing theories:[17]

“Now what is new in Greek philosophy, [...is] a new attitude towards the myths. [...]

Doubt and criticism certainly existed before this stage. What is new, however, is that doubt and criticism now become, in their turn, part of the tradition of the school. A tradition of a higher order replaces the traditional preservation of the dogma: in the place of traditional theory – in place of the myth – we find the tradition of criticizing theories [...].”

Not having defined what the “keystones of our civilization” are, Lipstadt can again shift the goalpost by declaring that a critical attitude to testimony is, quote,

“[...] a threat to all who believe in the ultimate power of reason. It repudiates reasoned discussion [...] it is an irrational animus [...] Holocaust denial is the apotheosis of irrationalism.” – unquote (p. 23)

So, because revisionists insist on an intellectual, rational, evidence-based, reasoned investigation of the reliability of witness testimony, they turn irrationalism into their god – because that’s what apotheosis means! She really got it all upside down. If she knows it, she is a liar. If she doesn't, she has no clue what scholarship is all about.

In the same vein, she writes on page 245, quote

"They [meaning the revisionists] attempt to project the appearance of being committed to the very values that they in truth adamantly oppose: reason, critical rules of evidence, and historical distinction." – unquote

After all that we have explained so far, it ought to be clear that she's talking about herself here.

Her steadfast refusal to debate those who subject her narrative of the Holocaust to tough attempts at refutation is legendary:

"Whenever the plans include inviting a denier I categorically decline to appear [on TV talk shows]. As I make clear in these pages the deniers want to be thought of as the 'other side.' Simply appearing with them on the same stage accords them that status. [...] Refusal to debate the deniers thwarts their desire to enter the conversation as a legitimate point of view."
(pp. xi)

"I explained repeatedly that I would not participate in a debate with a Holocaust denier. The existence of the Holocaust was not a matter of debate." (p. 1)

“Time need not be wasted in answering each and every one of the deniers’ contentions. It would be a never-ending effort to respond to arguments posed by those who falsify findings, quote out of context, and dismiss reams of testimony because it counters their arguments. It is the speciousness of their arguments, not the arguments themselves, that demands a response.” (p. 33)

Of course, she has the right not to talk to or even be seen with people she dislikes. She even has the right not to address arguments she detests, which is exactly her approach, as she writes on page 33. Stop this video to read it. If you do, note again that she mentions only “reams of testimony,” but no documents or physical evidence.

Later in her book, however, she does discuss some revisionist arguments, which we will address later.

As we pointed out earlier, refusing to expose one’s own theory to serious attempts of refutation is a hallmark of a pseudo-scholarly attitude. Refusing to take opposing arguments into serious consideration sheds a bad light on those who do this – not on the arguments they reject out of hand.

In addition, claiming that certain things are simply not up for debate is also a clear and present sign of an unscholarly attitude, not to say sheer bigotry. Although Dr. Lipstadt admits that there are many aspects of the Holocaust that are debated among mainstream historians, she insists that – quote

“There is a categorical difference between debating these types of [mainstream] questions [about the Holocaust] and debating the very fact of the Holocaust.” – unquote (p. xii)

Well, we hate to tell you, Dr. Deborah, but the freedom of hypothesis is a fundamental principle of science. Just because you don’t like it doesn’t mean you can ignore its existence and still claim to be a scholar. You have to make up your mind.

Apart from all this, Lipstadt's warning that debating revisionists would improve their public reputation is not even true, because if the evidence for the Holocaust is as overwhelming and the claims of revisionists as untenable as Dr. Lipstadt claims, engaging them in a debate would be a golden opportunity to expose their alleged quackery and stupidity. Only if revisionism has intrinsic validity would it gain stature by a public hearing. Here is the real reason why Lipstadt won't debate revisionists:[18]

“[Lipstadt:] ‘I will not debate you. Not here, not now, not ever!’”

We could easily turn the tables on Dr. Lipstadt by demonstrating that her primary motive is not historical accuracy but shoring up Jewish identity and group cohesion. But since we consider motives to be only of passing interest, and because they do not in any way invalidate factual arguments, we won't waste our time with this. Dr. Lipstadt, by the way, agrees that at the end of the day, motives are rather irrelevant when she writes on page 232 – quote:

“But on some level [U.S. historian Dr.] Carl Degler was right: [The revisionists'] motives are irrelevant.” – unquote

But if that is so, then why write a whole book on proclaiming the revisionist's motives?

When it comes to Lipstadt's motives, there is one topic we have to briefly mention here. As stated before, Dr. Lipstadt considers anti-Semitic and related leanings to be abominable motives. Interestingly, she puts at the same level of abomination another attitude, and that is philo-Germanism. She uses that term frequently together with anti-Semitism, racism and/or Nazism. Here are the quotes, which we won't read to you. You can stop the video if you want to take them in.

“The roots of Barnes’s views about the Holocaust and his attitudes toward Israel go beyond his deep-seated Germanophilia and revisionist approach to history: They can be found in his antisemitism.” (p. 91)

“Most people who were aware of [the IHR’s] existence dismissed it as a conglomeration of Holocaust deniers, neo-Nazis, philo-Germans, right-wing extremists, antisemites, racists, and conspiracy theorists.” (p. 154)

“With the zeal of a convert, [Austin App] moved to the isolationist, pro-German end of the political spectrum and stayed there for the rest of his life.” (p. 76)

These statements indicate that, for Dr. Lipstadt, having positive feelings for Germany or the German people is just as odious as being anti-Semitic or racist. To put the shoe on the other foot: what do you think the average person would think of us if we stated that it is odious to have pro-Jewish feelings? We’d be labeled an anti-Semite, right? But that stance would not be different than Dr. Lipstadt’s attitude.

How crazy her attitude toward Germans and Germany really is can be seen from two more quotes. In one, she seriously states that Germany has the moral obligation to welcome anyone seeking refuge there:

“If Germany was also a victim of a ‘downfall,’ and if the Holocaust was no different from a mélange of other tragedies, Germany’s moral obligation to welcome all who seek refuge within its borders is lessened.” (p. 243)

And in another one she states that she feels obligated to take charge of how the Germans look at their own history:

“We [historians] did not train in our respective fields in order to stand like watchmen and women on the Rhine. Yet this is what we must do.”(p. 222)

Considering that there are currently around a billion people on this planet who, due to war, famine, poverty and civil unrest, are inclined to seek refuge elsewhere,[19] and if we keep in mind that one favorite destination of those migrants is Germany, is Dr. Lipstadt seriously saying that Germany has the moral obligation to welcome a billion people, if they decide to come? Is she out of her mind? And why exactly does Germany have that obligation, but Israel does not?

To top it off, Dr. Lipstadt’s father was German. That explains her last name, which is a town in Westphalia, Germany.[20] So what we have here is an ethnic German of the Jewish faith who hates her own ethnicity. It’s a self-hating Jew of a different kind. Actually, many if not most Jews have some German blood running in their veins, and quite a few of them hate that fact with a passion. It’s worth some psychiatric analysis, but we won’t go there.

4. Lies about Revisionists

Let’s now turn to some false claims Dr. Lipstadt makes about Holocaust revisionists and what they claim. Actually, let us rename this section the Straw-Man Fallacy, because that’s what we are dealing with here. And here is how it works. First, you ignore the real arguments, or even the persons making the real, hard-hitting arguments. Then you either create a made-up, pretend argument, or you refute the weak arguments of some person who is only a marginal figure in the area of contention. Then you defeat that made-up or weak argument, and finally you declare victory over the entire area of contention. This table, broken into two parts, lists in the left column the people whom Dr. Lipstadt deals with in her book, and in the right column the people who have contributed major scholarly works to Holocaust revisionism as of 1992.

As you can see, of the 25 individuals listed, only five are a hit. Ten of the people Lipstadt discusses have never contributed anything of scholarly value to Holocaust revisionism. The late mainstream historian Dr. Nolte isn't even a revisionist by any stretch of the imagination. He got into Dr. Lipstadt's crosshairs only because he basically insisted that any historian claiming to be a scholar has to take the revisionists and their arguments seriously rather than ignore or malign them. Most of the others – Barnes, Hoggan, App, Carto, Zündel, Irving and Smith – have polemicized about the Holocaust, but not a single one of them has ever written even a single thoroughly researched and referenced article on the Holocaust, let alone a monograph. Lipstadt therefore cherry-picked these individuals exactly because they polemicized, which makes them an easy target. Bardèche even believed in the gas chambers and thus a Holocaust, in spite of Lipstadt's false claim to the contrary on her page 56.[\[21\]](#)

Ten persons who did contribute major scholarly works as of late 1992 are not on Dr. Lipstadt's list. And we apologize in case we missed anyone.[\[22\]](#) Not all of them are of equal value, and we are listing them here only to show that Dr. Lipstadt either has no clue what Holocaust revisionism is all about, or that she is maliciously hiding it from her readers.

In any case, she took a grotesque misrepresentation of Holocaust revisionism in order to show that it has no scholarly merits, and that revisionists are merely driven by detestable motives. And ever since, the Holocaust orthodoxy has declared victory over revisionism as such.

Had Dr. Lipstadt done her homework, she would have had no problem finding out which revisionist publications existed back then, because in 1988, Italian Holocaust researcher Carlo Mattogno published a paper on the birth, development and criticism of Holocaust revisionism.<sup>[23]</sup> It lists all major revisionist works published in all languages which had appeared by the time that article was finalized, and it also lists reactions by mainstream authors to those publications. Dr. Lipstadt knew the English-language journal where that paper was published, because she mentions and quotes papers from it in her book many times.

Dr. Lipstadt wrote her book at a time when Holocaust revisionism underwent a paradigm shift. Triggered by Fred Leuchter's expert report,<sup>[24]</sup> many new researchers joined that school of thought and gave it a major boost, resulting in a wide range of publications. Here is a list of the most important authors among them. Again, apologies in case we missed anyone.

- Jürgen Graf
- Jean Plantin
- Joseph Halow
- Germar Rudolf
- Jean-Marie Boisdefeu
- Willy Wallwey (using pen names)
- Don Heddesheimer
- Thomas Dalton
- Samuel Crowell
- Santiago Alvarez
- Nicholas Kollerstrom
- Warren B. Routledge
- Franco Deana

- Klaus Schwensen
- Paul Grubach
- Friedrich Jansson
- Thomas Kues
- Vincent Reynouard

At least the most important ones among them ought to have played some role in the 2016 edition of Lipstadt's book, but they didn't.

So much for Dr. Lipstadt's picking the wrong people. Let us now turn to some of the few hits she made. Four of them are of relevance here:

- Prof. Robert Faurisson,
- Mark Weber,
- Prof. Arthur Butz and
- Fred A. Leuchter

Let's deal with Prof. Faurisson first. By the time Ms. Lipstadt wrapped up her typescript in late 1992, Faurisson had published a monograph where he summarized his case,[25] a response to a major critic of his,[26] and a number of papers that deserve to be called "scholarly" in their approach,[27] although most of them in French, and some written under a pen name.[28] Dr. Lipstadt mentions none of them. In her footnote 14 on page 293, she does quote – although incompletely – one paper by Faurisson which summarizes his reason as to why the hypothesis that the Nazis used gas chambers to mass murder people is a problem, hence the title of the paper:[29] "The 'Problem of the Gas Chambers.'" Considering the brevity and dearth of references of that paper, we hesitate calling it scholarly in nature. It's more of a provocation and a mission statement, if you wish. But be that as it may, doing Faurisson justice in 1992 would have meant taking on his 280-page monograph Mémoire en defense and the sequel Réponse à Pierre Vidal-Naquet. But instead, Lipstadt focuses on polemical statements Faurisson made over the years.

When it comes to revisionist historian Mark Weber, Lipstadt mentions only one of his many papers on the Holocaust, of which we list here only the major ones:

- Weber, Mark, “Buchenwald: Legend and Reality,” Journal of Historical Review, 7(4) (1986), pp. 405-417
- Weber, Mark, “Jewish Soap,” Journal of Historical Review, 11(2) (1991), pp. 217-227
- Weber, Mark, “The Nuremberg Trials and the Holocaust,” Journal of Historical Review, 12(2) (1992), pp. 167-213
- Weber, Mark, “Bergen-Belsen Camp: The Suppressed Story,” Journal of Historical Review, 15(3) (1995), pp. 23-30
- Weber, Mark, “High-Frequency Delousing Facilities at Auschwitz,” Journal of Historical Review, 18(3) (1999), pp. 4-12

The paper highlighted here is mentioned by Lipstadt, but all she has to say about it is that Weber – quote

“blamed the postwar spread of the rumor that the Nazis made Jews into soap on Simon Wiesenthal and Stephen Wise – a claim that has no relationship to reality.” – unquote (pp. 226f.)

That’s not merely a straw-man fallacy, it’s one of the many lies Lipstadt spreads. Here is what Weber wrote, after having shown that Wiesenthal and Wise, among many others, spread the soap lie during and after the war. Quote:

“In April 1990, professor Yehuda Bauer of Israel’s Hebrew University, [...] had the chutzpah to blame the [soap] legend on ‘the Nazis.’

Let’s now turn to Prof. Butz. Since his one and only monograph on the Holocaust is rather famous, Lipstadt couldn’t dodge that bullet, but she chose to ignore the main points of Butz's book and focus on minor issues instead. Some of them she misrepresents, and by so doing, she turns her own argument into a straw-man fallacy. If you are interested in details, get the Bungled book shown. Here, we will focus on Butz's two main arguments which Lipstadt completely ignores.

Butz's first main argument goes as follows:

Germany's enemies owned or had access to many dense information networks in German-occupied Europe: secret-service agents, underground resistance organizations, the Catholic Church, Jewish organizations, the Red Cross, to name only a few. Had a Holocaust been going on, they would have known. Yet the way they acted clearly indicates that they had no serious, trustworthy, reliable information about it.

In a 1982 paper, which Dr. Lipstadt also ignored, Dr. Butz summarized his thesis again, which is at times somewhat awkwardly presented in his book. The main points he makes in his book can be gleaned from the headlines he used in this article. Stop the video to read them.[\[30\]](#)

- "Both the wartime records and behavior of the Jews in occupied Europe show that they had no information of an extermination program."
- "Jewish bodies outside occupied Europe [...] did not act as though they believed their own claims of 'extermination.'"
- "Allied governments and their officials did not act as though they believed the extermination claims, and their intelligence services never produced any information corroborative of the claims."
- "The Vatican did not believe the extermination claims."
- "The actions and reports of the International Red Cross do not harmonize with the extermination claims."
- "The German resistance to Hitler, including the substantial part that was lodged in German military intelligence, was not cognizant in any way of a program of exterminating Jews."

- “The German documents speak not of extermination, but basically of a program of expulsion and resettlement in the east. There is nothing about ‘gas chambers’ in the concentration camp or other German records.”

Butz’s second main argument is that the Holocaust myth rests on the dual interpretation of innocuous items or events whose meaning the creators of the myth turned into something ill-boding. In the preface to the 2015 edition of his book, Butz writes about that – quote:[31]

“I analyzed the specifics of the alleged extermination process at Auschwitz. I showed that all of the specific material facts required a dual interpretation of relatively mundane facts, e.g. transports, selections, showers, shaving hair, Zyklon B, crematoria, etc., all real and all relatively mundane, had been given a second [devious] interpretation.” – unquote

Hence, the questions are:

- Were the Jews transported to be killed, or to be expelled and put to slave labor?
- On arrival in the camps, were fragile Jews selected to be killed, or to be sent elsewhere?
- Were the showers fake to camouflage gas chambers, or real to give the inmates a bath?
- Was the inmates’ hair shaved off to exploit even the least body part before killing them, or to combat lice infestations?
- Was Zyklon B a mass-murder weapon, or was it used to kill lice, hence save inmates’ lives?
- Were crematoria used to erase evidence of mass murder, or to prevent the spread of diseases?

There is much more in Butz’s trail-blazing book which Lipstadt evidently cannot handle, some of which we can mention here only briefly, as for instance the issue of false confessions by alleged perpetrators. Lipstadt hides from her readers that

- a. the Allies systematically tortured their German prisoners after the war to extract quote-unquote “confessions,” and that
- b. the Allies presented during the Nuremberg Tribunal quote-unquote “evidence”, such as extorted confessions, fraudulent expert reports and film footage with mendacious narrations, which quote-unquote “convinced” some of the defendants that the Holocaust claims were true.

Lipstadt hides or misrepresents these and other facts laid out by Dr. Butz as well. See the Bungled book for more details.

The other individual discussed by Lipstadt who wrote a significant revisionist study is Fred Leuchter, the former U.S. expert on execution technologies. A lot of things that Lipstadt writes on him, however, are ad hominem attacks. But because that is completely beside the point, we'll simply ignore that here and will focus only on factual arguments. For this, let's turn again to her endnotes. Her chapter on Leuchter has a whopping 114 of them. How many of them refer to sources that address in any technical or scientific way any of the technical and toxicological issues raised by Leuchter? Basically only 13. One of them is an article by Robert Faurisson, which we can ignore, as Dr. Lipstadt doesn't quote it to support her own case. The other twelve are from three works by the French pharmacist Jean-Claude Pressac (notes 56, 58, 62-65, 85, 87-90).

We will again encounter the same pattern later when addressing the way Lipstadt discusses actual revisionist arguments about the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz. There, too, she relies exclusively on Pressac: of the 29 endnotes referencing her discussion about the gas chambers, 28 refer to Pressac's first book,[\[32\]](#) and one to a revisionist book by Faurisson – which, again, cannot be counted.

Such a referential monoculture is truly pitiful. Dr. Lipstadt basically has only one leg to stand on. How can any scholar seriously write a treatise when there is only one relevant work to quote from?

We'll postpone discussing Lipstadt's at-times-fallacious arguments to the last section of this documentary when dealing with all the rest of them.

In closing this section on revisionist personalities, let us briefly mention Bradley Smith, the founder of the Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust. Lipstadt's chapter on him is the core of her book, but it is also the least substantiated. First of all, as we mentioned earlier, Smith never really wrote anything of substance on the Holocaust, which makes him an easy straw-man target. Next, Smith merely applies the Western ideal of the open marketplace of ideas to a topic where Lipstadt and her ilk don't want it applied. For decades, Smith has argued that – quote

“Anyone should be encouraged to investigate critically the Holocaust story in the same way they are encouraged to investigate every other historical event. This is not a radical point of view. The culture of critique was developed millennia ago by Greek philosophers like Socrates, and was renewed centuries ago during the Enlightenment.” – unquote (from a CODOH Campus Project ad, 1991)

What's wrong with that? Smith managed to place hundreds of these ads in campus newspapers, followed up by radio interviews and even TV shows. That's what caused the two mainstream historians mentioned by Dr. Lipstadt to worry and ask her to research the matter. In fact, the cover art of the 1993 hardcover edition features press clippings from media reactions which Bradley Smith triggered with his Campus Project, that is to say, his attempt to bring Holocaust revisionism to the attention of college and university students as well as professors throughout the United States.

As results from what Lipstadt writes and from all the organizations supporting her, her book was primarily geared toward being part of a concerted effort to thwart Smith's Campus Project. Smith felt the effects early on. He describes it in his autobiography Break His Bones, which you can read online at the address shown.<sup>[33]</sup> If you are interested in finding out what motivated Smith to do this, and what he experienced as backlash from the establishment, we highly recommend reading it. But here is a brief video clip from the documentary El Gran Tabu.<sup>[34]</sup>

"[...] American ex-patriot living in Mexico. In the 1950s, Bradley, then a bookseller, was prosecuted by the U.S. government for selling the Henry Miller book Tropic of Cancer.

It was then considered pornographic, even though now it is considered to be a great work of literature. Since then, Bradley has been a strong advocate for free speech and intellectual freedom. He travels North America speaking to college students about the persecution of Holocaust revisionists.

'The way I look at it, the ideal of intellectual freedom is the one great idea of American culture. There may be others, but that's the one great one. It didn't originate with the constitution. It came out of the renaissance, it came out of the Greek culture, and it came out of the British. And it was institutionalized in our constitution in the First Amendment. The First Amendment is rather peculiar, because things like it are not available, even in Canada. They don't have the equivalent of our First Amendment. We can't have intellectual freedom, if we don't have the right to dissent. It's just not possible. If you can't dissent from an orthodox opinion, you're not free to think about that view. Or if you're free to think about it, you have to keep it to yourself. But it's not a culture of intellectual freedom if you don't have the right to dissent. The professorial class is not in complete agreement with that. The professorial class believes that, in my experience, that most people have the right to dissent, but some don't.

Revisionist arguments with regard to the Holocaust are being criminalized in country after country after country in Europe, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, and the laws have already been drawn up to criminalize revisionist arguments here in America. And it's done by people who are sincere."

Lipstadt's chapter on Smith is a telling exposé of how she has been and keeps conspiring with her like-minded colleagues to suppress Smith's campaign for intellectual freedom and open debate on the Holocaust. Lipstadt claims that this is not a matter of First Amendment rights, because the First Amendment merely prevents the United States government from passing laws to limit free speech. While this is formally correct, it is also like saying that, while the U.S. government has to abide by the law, we normal people can act as we damn well please. In contrast, the Bill of Rights should be a moral example of how any responsible, powerful group of people should behave. Lipstadt's excuse on page 215 that, if the revisionists get turned down by one media outlet, quote, "there are always other publications," unquote, is a bad joke, because it's been her and her comrades' mission in life to make sure that there isn't any, quote, "other publication," unquote, except for those the revisionists publish themselves, and then Lipstadt and company strive to make sure that the sale of this revisionist material is banned everywhere else, too. It's like saying: "Yeah, you have the right to speak, but only to yourself!" Hence, this is not just about having the right to speak freely, but also for everyone to decide for themselves who they want to listen to. Using power the way Dr. Lipstadt and her ilk have been using it for decades in order to prevent others from being able to hear is a violent act. It's like locking you up in a soundproof room.

Smith has described how it works – quote:[35]

“Every professor and working reporter understands perfectly well that, once he or she is smeared with the neo-Nazi [or anti-Semitic] label [...] they know they are dead ducks. They know that from that moment on they are going to have to get a job at McDonalds or at a car wash someplace because no newspaper and no university will ever again employ them.” – unquote

That’s the power Lipstadt and her ilk wield, and her chapter on Smith proves that they misuse it wherever they see fit to destroy freedom of science and scholarship on this matter.

Lipstadt justifies that by claiming that Holocaust revisionists don’t have opinions but mere prejudices, as for instance about Smith on page 215. In essence, she lobbies for the idea that there should not be a freedom to express prejudices:

“Opinion must be grounded in fact. Facts inform opinions and opinions, inspired by different interests and passions, can differ widely and still be legitimate as long as they respect factual truth. Freedom of opinion is a farce unless factual information is guaranteed and the facts themselves are not in dispute.” (p. xiv)

But how can we distinguish between facts on the one hand and errors or lies on the other? Lipstadt just throws these terms at us and thinks that solves the issue, when in fact it merely confounds it. In other words, she is shifting the goalpost again.

If we wanted to cut out from a free exchange of ideas all those utterings that are not sufficiently based on facts, then the questions arise:

- a. How do we reliably measure the degree to which an opinion is based on facts?
- b. Who sets the limit below which we cut out non-eligible utterings?
And

c. And most importantly: Who defines authoritatively what counts as a fact? A Ministry of Truth? Or Dr. Lipstadt?

And there's the rub. Dr. Lipstadt would like to play Goddess Almighty by deciding what is fact and what is not. To find out what is fact and what is not was exactly the purpose of Smith's campus advertisement project: get the smartest brains of the nation to mull it over – without being threatened by Dr. Lipstadt and her comrades, should they come to iconoclastic results. There's nothing wrong with Smith's approach. There is everything wrong with thwarting that process though, as is Dr. Lipstadt's goal. It is profoundly anti-academic, anti-intellectual, anti-scholarly, anti-scientific. It's dogmatic, taboo-driven, arrogant, imperious and overbearing.

The right to free inquiry, and even the obligation to inquire, is at the heart of academia. That is the first, most profound and most important thing that every professor should publicly profess. If they don't profess that, they are not professors. Period.

5. Discussing Arguments

Let's now turn to historical arguments themselves, which aren't the core of Lipstadt's book, but they are the core of the issue at hand. Before doing that, let us summarize how Dr. Lipstadt backs up factual claims. When analyzing her endnotes, we find that she relies heavily on political propaganda material, to a large degree written by the political pressure group ADL; she very frequently doesn't quote the source itself but third-party publications writing about them;<sup>[36]</sup> she cites source material that is utterly "unquotable," most prominent among them a collection of newspaper clippings,<sup>[37]</sup> and relies on only one author – Pressac – when discussing the core issue: were there homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz to exterminate the Jews? In many cases, however, she makes claims which she doesn't back up with anything at all.

As a result of her not going back to the sources, she commits major blunders, for instance in her section where she discusses claims allegedly made by the late German historian Dr. Ernst Nolte, whose writings Lipstadt evidently has never read. Most of what she claims, Nolte in fact never wrote or said.

Now we'll delve deeper into the factual discussion to see whether the same pattern can be found there. Buckle up and enjoy the ride!

5.1. The Chemistry of Auschwitz

In his famous report, Leuchter claimed that the active ingredient in Zyklon B, hydrogen cyanide, reacts with iron compounds present in masonry to form a very stable pigment called Prussian Blue, as it did in these walls of two Auschwitz fumigation chambers, and that this pigment ought to be present to this day in the walls of the claimed homicidal gas chambers of Auschwitz, where Zyklon B is said to have been used for mass murder. Lipstadt disputes that claim on pages 188-190. We wonder, though, what knowledge or education might permit her to make any statement in this regard. She is a specialist in Jewish history, not in chemistry, and she doesn't even try to shore up any of her claims with any references to chemical literature.

Since that issue has been dealt with in a separate, 100-minute documentary,[\[38\]](#) we take a pass here and direct the interested viewer to that video instead which was recently put into quarantine by YouTube, by the way. Suffice it here to say that Dr. Lipstadt isn't even aware of the many issues and aspects involved.

5.2. The Diesel Controversy

Next, let's turn to diesel gas chambers. In her first chapter, Dr. Lipstadt relates the controversy surrounding a statement made by U.S. journalist Pat Buchanan about the possibility of committing mass murder with diesel-engine exhaust, a method claimed for the so-called extermination camps at Treblinka and Belzec. Stop the video to read what she wrote about it.

"Patrick Buchanan, one of the foremost right-wing conservative columnists in the country, used his widely syndicated column to express views that come straight from the scripts of Holocaust deniers. He argued that it was physically impossible for the gas chamber at Treblinka to have functioned as a killing apparatus because the diesel engines that powered it could not produce enough carbon monoxide to be lethal. Buchanan's 'proof' was a 1988 incident in which ninety-seven passengers on a train in Washington, D.C., were stuck in a tunnel as the train emitted carbon monoxide fumes. Because the passengers were not harmed, Buchanan extrapolated that the victims in a gas chamber using carbon monoxide from diesel engines would also not have been harmed. He ignored the fact that the gassings at Treblinka took as long as half an hour and that the conditions created when people are jammed by the hundreds into small enclosures, as they were at Treblinka, are dramatically different from those experienced by a group of people sitting on a train." (pp. 6f.)

We won't bother going into the details here, because, heck, it's just a comment a journalist made. Lipstadt gets all upset about it, but in her discussion she completely fails to even mention the actual scientific paper upon which that debate is based.<sup>[39]</sup> We show some relevant publications here, just in case you are curious.<sup>[40]</sup> None of them can be found in Lipstadt's book. She just produced hot air.

5.3. Cremation Capacities

The next topic concerns the capacity of the crematoria at Auschwitz. If you wanted to figure out what the features of a cremation furnace are, what would you do? Well, any reasonable person would consult expert literature on cremation, and if push comes to shove, engineering calculations and experiments could also be performed. But not so our Debbie. She instead refers to a simple letter by the Auschwitz administration. Again, stop the video to read her ramblings, if you care to.

"Leuchter was unaware of a host of documents pertaining to the installation and construction of the gas chambers and crematoria. He did not know of a report filed in June 1943 by the Waffen-SS commandant of construction at Auschwitz on the completion of the crematoria. The report indicated that the five crematoria had a total twenty-four-hour capacity of 4,756 bodies. Leuchter had stated that the crematoria had a total capacity of 156 bodies in the same period of time. Even if the SS's calculation was overly 'optimistic,' the difference between it and Leuchter's was staggering." (pp. 187)

What's her source for that letter? The transcript of the Second Zündel Trial.[41] Needless to say, that document isn't part of the trial transcript. A proper historian would give an archival reference for the document itself[42] or some secondary literature where it can be found.[43]

Logic – that is to say, math – natural laws that govern incineration processes, technical cremation possibilities at the time, and the expert evaluation of physical evidence, such as experiments and still-existing crematories, as well as documentary evidence, such as construction plans, operating instructions and cremation logs, play no role in her argument at all. She might as well have quoted “survivor testimonies,” some of which claim absolutely absurd cremation capacities. That's Dr. Lipstadt's world of lala-science, also called pseudo-science.

If you want to read a book dealing with that topic, for which the authors have gone through all the above steps to separate fact from fiction, then look at this 3-volume work written by the late Italian engineer Dr. Franco Deana together with Italian historian Carlo Mattogno.[44] In this massive work, the authors concluded that the actual cremation capacity of Auschwitz roughly coincided with the recorded death toll of registered inmates who died mainly of diseases, as documented in the Auschwitz death records.[45] We'll leave it at that, because the cremation issue is too huge to be covered here in detail.

5.4. Untenable Technical Claims

When it comes to the alleged homicidal gas chambers at Auschwitz, Dr. Lipstadt makes a number of claims, every single one of which is both unsubstantiated and untrue.

- the homicidal gas chambers had “powerful” (pp. 168, 253) or “sophisticated ventilation systems” (p. 195), “especially designed” for that purpose (p. 253)
- the delousing chambers “were constructed in the same fashion as the [alleged] homicidal gas chambers” (p. 189).
- the Germans used “advanced technology for the purposes of mass murder” (p. 102) by building “technologically advanced instruments” (p. 106)]

We won't bother proving this here, for one because the next documentary slated for production – Questioning the Holocaust: Why We Believed, Part 2 – will deal with all these issues in depth, and also because we've taken up too much of your time already.

One of Lipstadt's favorite expressions is that there are “reams” of documents which allegedly refute what revisionists claim (p. 196). As mentioned before, she relies in this regard entirely on Pressac's 1989 book on Auschwitz,<sup>25</sup> as she admits on page 255.

“The next few pages contain a brief summary of Pressac's extensive findings. Those who have found the deniers' claims about gas chambers the least bit troubling should have their doubts set aside. Those who have never been persuaded in the least by this assault on the truth will find the documents overwhelming proof of the degree to which the deniers distort history and lie about the evidence.”

And that's where Lipstadt goes terminally bust. Pressac's vacuous ramblings have been dissected and refuted in the most minute and comprehensive manner possible in two separate monographs which, admittedly, appeared only after the first edition of Lipstadt's book had come out.<sup>[46]</sup> The new, 2016 edition should have taken that into account, but nay, Dr. Lipstadt doesn't need to pay attention to what's going on in the real world. She has the backing of the rich and mighty, and that's good enough for her.

Pressac's claims, which have reinforced the belief of millions in the myth, will be one of the main focuses of the upcoming documentary Questioning the Holocaust: Why We Believed, Part 2, to which we referred.

6. Conclusion

We have never read such shoddy quote-unquote "scholarship" in our lives as in Dr. Lipstadt's book. She clearly has neither understood what the principles and methods of science and scholarship are, nor has she any clue about the historical topics she is writing about. She misquotes, mistranslates, misrepresents, misinterprets, and makes a plethora of wild claims without backing them up with anything. No wonder she refuses to debate the revisionists

"[Lipstadt:] 'I will not debate you. Not here, not now, not ever!'

In fact, Dr. Lipstadt herself has proclaimed the judgment in her own case. All we have to do is quote her:

"[T]ruth has been the antithesis of [her] enterprise." (p. 57)

Holocaust Handbooks, the world's leading book series critically exploring what the powers that be don't want examined. With Germany's announcement in 2015 that "all are welcome," resulting in a deluge of migrants pouring into Germany, that number has probably gone up again. Most prospective migrants come from the Middle East, North and sub-Saharan Africa, whose primary destinations for reasons of geography are European countries, mainly Germany (for economic reasons) and the UK and France (for linguistic reasons).

The Malmedy trial took place from May 16 to July 16, 1946 at Dachau before a military tribunal of American officers operating under rules established by the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal. [\[1\]](#) American historian Steven P. Remy has written a book titled The Malmedy Massacre which disputes that the 73 German defendants in this trial were improperly convicted.

Remy states in his book's conclusion that American interrogators did not use physical or psychological pressure to obtain information at any of their postwar trials. Remy writes: [\[2\]](#)

“There is no evidence that in the North African, European, or Pacific theaters American interrogators relied on systematic forms of physical and psychological pressure to obtain information from combatants or civilians. Nor is there convincing evidence that they did so in war crimes investigations after the war.”

This article will document some of the physical and psychological pressure used in the Malmedy and other American-run postwar trials.

Improper Postwar Interrogations

Scene from the Malmedy Show Trial

Contrary to Remy's statement, physical and psychological pressure was frequently used by interrogators in American-run postwar trials. Benjamin Ferencz, a Jewish American war crimes investigator who received a Harvard law degree in 1943, was assigned to investigate the concentration camps at Buchenwald, Mauthausen and Dachau.<sup>[3]</sup> Ferencz admits that he used threats to obtain confessions. Ferencz relates a story concerning his interrogation of an SS colonel in which he took out his pistol in order to intimidate him:<sup>[4]</sup>

“What do you do when he thinks he's still in charge? I've got to show him that I'm in charge. All I've got to do is squeeze the trigger and mark it as auf der Flucht erschossen (shot while trying to escape)... I said 'you are in a filthy uniform sir, take it off!' I stripped him naked and threw his clothes out the window. He stood there naked for half an hour, covering his balls with his hands, not looking nearly like the SS officer he was reported to be. Then I said 'now listen, you and I are gonna have an understanding right now. I am a Jew—I would love to kill you and mark you down as auf der Flucht erschossen, but I'm gonna do what you would never do. You are gonna sit down and write out exactly what happened—when you entered the camp, who was there, how many died, why they died, everything else about it. Or, you don't have to do that—you are under no obligation—you can write a note of five lines to your wife, and I will try to deliver it...' (Ferencz gets the desired statement and continues:) I then went to someone outside and said 'Major, I got this affidavit, but I'm not gonna use it—it is a coerced confession. I want you to go in, be nice to him, and have him re-write it.' The second one seemed to be okay—I told him to keep the second one and destroy the first one. That was it.”

The fact that Ferencz threatened and humiliated his witness and reported as much to his superior officer indicates that he operated in a culture where such illegal methods were acceptable.<sup>[5]</sup> Any Harvard law graduate knows that such evidence is not admissible in a legitimate court of law.

The defense counsel at the Mauthausen trial in Dachau insisted that signed confessions of the accused, used by the prosecution to great effect, had been extracted from the defendants through physical abuse, coercion, and deceit.<sup>[6]</sup> Ferencz admits that these defense counsel's claims were correct:<sup>[7]</sup>

“You know how I got witness statements? I'd go into a village where, say, an American pilot had parachuted and been beaten to death and line everyone up against the wall. Then I'd say, 'Anyone who lies will be shot on the spot.' It never occurred to me that statements taken under duress would be invalid.”

Robert Kempner was the American chief prosecutor in the Ministries Trial in which 21 German government officials were defendants. Kempner was a German Jew who had lost his job as Chief Legal Advisor of the Prussian police department because of National Socialist race laws. He was forced to emigrate first to Italy and then to the United States. Kempner was bitter about the experience and was eager to prosecute and convict German officials in government service.<sup>[8]</sup>

Kempner bribed German Under Secretary Friedrich Wilhelm Gaus to testify for the prosecution in the Ministries Trial. The transcript of Kempner's interrogation of Gaus reveals that Kempner persuaded Gaus to exchange the role of defendant for that of collaborator with the prosecution. Gaus was released from isolation, and a few days later a German newspaper reported a long handwritten declaration from Gaus in which he confessed the collective guilt of the German government service. Kempner had given Gaus's confession to the newspaper.<sup>[9]</sup> Kempner had also threatened to turn Gaus over to the Soviets unless Gaus was willing to cooperate with the prosecution.<sup>[10]</sup>

Attorney Charles LaFollete said that Kempner's "foolish, unlawyer-like method of interrogation was common knowledge in Nuremberg all the time I was there and protested by those of us who anticipated the arising of a day, just such as we now have, when the Germans would attempt to make martyrs out of the common criminals on trial in Nuremberg."<sup>[11]</sup>

Kempner also attempted to bribe German State Secretary Ernst von Weizsäcker during the Ministries Trial. However, von Weizsäcker courageously refused to cooperate. Richard von Weizsäcker, who helped defend his father at the trial, wrote: "During the proceedings Kempner once said to me that though our defense was very good, it suffered from one error: We should have turned him, Kempner, into my father's defense attorney." Richard von Weizsäcker felt Kempner's words were nothing more than pure cynicism.<sup>[12]</sup>

Torture of Defendants

Allied prosecutors often used torture to help convict the defendants at Nuremberg and other postwar trials. A leading example of the use of torture to obtain evidence is the confession of Rudolf Höss, the former commandant at Auschwitz. Höss's testimony at the Nuremberg trial was the most important evidence presented of a German extermination program. Höss said that more than 2.5 million people were exterminated in the Auschwitz gas chambers, and that another 500,000 inmates had died there of other causes.<sup>[13]</sup> No defender of the Holocaust story today accepts these inflated figures, and other key portions of Höss's testimony at Nuremberg are widely acknowledged to be untrue.

In 1983 the anti-Nazi book Legions of Death by Rupert Butler stated that Jewish Sgt. Bernard Clarke and other British officers tortured Rudolf Höss into making his confession. The torture of Höss was exceptionally brutal. Neither Bernard Clarke nor Rupert Butler finds anything wrong or immoral in Höss's torture. Neither of them seems to understand the importance of their revelations. Bernard Clarke and Rupert Butler prove that Höss's testimony at Nuremberg was obtained by torture, and is therefore not credible evidence in establishing a program of German genocide against European Jewry.<sup>[14]</sup>

Bernard Clarke was not the only Jew who tortured Germans to obtain confessions. Tuvia Friedman, for example, was a Polish Jew who survived the German concentration camps. Friedman by his own admission beat up to 20 German prisoners a day to obtain confessions and weed out SS officers. Friedman stated that "It gave me satisfaction. I wanted to see if they would cry or beg for mercy."<sup>[15]</sup>

Joseph Kirschbaum was also accused of physical abuse at the Malmedy trial when German prisoner Otto Eichler accused Kirschbaum of beating him. A review of the medical records indicated that Eichler had received an injury, but it could not be proven that Kirschbaum had caused the injury.<sup>[16]</sup>

False and Perjured Witness Testimony

False witnesses were used at most of the Allied war-crime trials. Stephen F. Pinter served as a U.S. Army prosecuting attorney at the American trials of Germans at Dachau. In a 1960 affidavit Pinter said that “notoriously perjured witnesses” were used to charge Germans with false and unfounded crimes. Pinter stated, “Unfortunately, as a result of these miscarriages of justice, many innocent persons were convicted and some were executed.”[\[17\]](#)

Joseph Halow, a young U.S. court reporter at the Dachau trials in 1947, later described some of the false witnesses at the Dachau trials:[\[18\]](#)

“...the major portion of the witnesses for the prosecution in the concentration-camp cases were what came to be known as ‘professional witnesses,’ and everyone working at Dachau regarded them as such. ‘Professional,’ since they were paid for each day they testified. In addition, they were provided free housing and food, at a time when these were often difficult to come by in Germany. Some of them stayed in Dachau for months, testifying in every one of the concentration-camp cases. In other words, these witnesses made their living testifying for the prosecution. Usually, they were former inmates from the camps, and their strong hatred of the Germans should, at the very least, have called their testimony into question...”

As is easily demonstrated by studying the Franz Kofler trial, these witnesses had often never laid eyes on the men against whom they were testifying! That they lied in court is clear from a close reading of the proceedings of the trials, for their testimony is frequently full of contradictions and inconsistencies.[\[19\]](#)

An embarrassing example of perjured witness testimony occurred at the Dachau trials. U.S. investigator Joseph Kirschbaum brought a former concentration-camp inmate named Einstein into the court to testify that the defendant, Menzel, had murdered Einstein’s brother. Menzel, however, foiled this testimony—he had only to point to Einstein’s brother sitting in the court room listening to the story of his own murder. Kirschbaum thereupon turned to Einstein and exclaimed, “How can we bring this pig to the gallows, if you are so stupid as to bring your brother into the court?”[\[20\]](#)

The use of false witnesses has been acknowledged by Johann Neuhäusler, who was an ecclesiastical resistance fighter interned in two German concentration camps from 1941 to 1945. Neuhäusler wrote that in some of the American-run trials “many of the witnesses, perhaps 90%, were paid professional witnesses with criminal records ranging from robbery to homosexuality.”[\[21\]](#)

Willis N. Everett, Jr.

American attorney Willis N. Everett, Jr. was the lead defense counsel at the Malmedy trial. Everett was convinced that the Malmedy trial had been an ethical abomination. Approximately 100 of Everett’s friends and some additional American military officers advised Everett to forget about the Malmedy case and live in the present. Everett’s sense of ethics, however, set him on a mission to obtain justice for the Malmedy defendants.[\[22\]](#)

Everett and another defense-team member prepared a 228-page critique of the investigation and trial, stating that the Malmedy convictions had been secured primarily on the basis of “illegal and fraudulently procured confessions.” The petition also argued that the trial was a travesty of justice to German soldiers since the Allies were also guilty of the same violations of international law. Everett sent this document to Lt. Col. Clio Straight’s office for inclusion in the internal review process that was mandatory before verdicts and sentences became final.[\[23\]](#)

Everett began a multipronged campaign of judicial appeal, publicity and congressional pressure to get a retrial of the Malmedy case. Everett filed an unsuccessful petition with the U.S. Supreme Court to rehear the Malmedy case. Everett then prepared an appeal to the International Court of Justice in The Hague (ICJ). Everett knew there was little chance the ICJ would accept his case since only states could be parties to cases before the ICJ. The ICJ predictably refused to hear Everett's appeal of the Malmedy case.[\[24\]](#)

Everett made a huge personal and financial sacrifice to free the Malmedy defendants. The physical and emotional stress from the appeal process caused Everett to suffer from declining health and at least one heart attack. Everett estimated his out-of-pocket expenses to be as much as $50,000, to which must be added the income lost through his neglect of his law practice. The West German consul in Atlanta later presented Everett with a check for $5,000 as a gesture of appreciation for his inexhaustible efforts on behalf of the Malmedy defendants.[\[25\]](#)

Why did Everett make such a huge personal and financial sacrifice? Remy writes:[\[26\]](#)

“Everett also believed the army had treated him shabbily. He had been given an assignment for which he did not have the requisite experience or enough time, in his view, to prepare the case. Though he and the other defense lawyers had nonetheless mounted a vigorous defense, they lost the case, and badly. Facing the prospect of returning to his struggling Atlanta law firm and professional obscurity, he viewed a challenge to the outcome of the Malmedy trial as an opportunity for personal and professional redemption. Not least, there was the possibility of considerable financial gain, as he believed he had a story worth a great deal of money to the press.”

Remy provides no documentation for his contention that Everett challenged the outcome of the Malmedy trial “as an opportunity for personal and professional redemption” and “the possibility of considerable financial gain.” Everett had more to gain financially and professionally by forgetting the Malmedy trial and working full time in his law firm. Remy by his unsubstantiated statements is attempting to discredit Everett's motives for challenging the Malmedy verdict.

Conclusion

Steven Remy writes:[\[27\]](#)

“The creation and perpetuation of self-serving myths about the past remains one of the most powerful cultural and political forces in the modern world. Gone unchallenged, such myths harden hearts and impede dialog and reconciliation between individuals, communities, and entire nations. They block the flow of honest and open-ended argument about the past and its significance to the present. Understanding the relationship between conflict and memory—individual and collective—will always be difficult and inconclusive. The point is to keep having the arguments.”

Remy is correct that we should keep having the arguments. These arguments should include the following from American attorney Warren Magee, who served as defense counsel in the Ministries Trial:[\[28\]](#)

“‘An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth’ is the driving force behind the prosecutions at Nuremberg. While it grieves me to say this, the prosecution staff, its lawyers, research analysts, interpreters, clerks, etc. is largely Jewish. Many are Germans who fled their country and only recently took out American citizenship. Jewish influence was even apparent at the first trial, labeled the IMT. Atrocities against Jews are always stressed above all else... With persecuted Jews in the background directing the proceedings, the trials cannot be maintained in an objectivity aloof from vindictiveness, personal grievances, and racial desires for revenge... Basic principles have been disregarded by 'new' Americans, many of whom have imbedded in their very beings European racial hatreds and prejudices.”

The arguments should also include the following from Benjamin Ferencz:[\[29\]](#)

“I was there for the liberation, as a sergeant in the Third Army, General Patton’s Army, and my task was to collect camp records and witness testimony, which became the basis for prosecutions...But the Dachau trials were utterly contemptible. There was nothing resembling the rule of law. More like court-martials. For example, they might bring in 20 or 30 people, line them up, each one with a number on a card tied around his neck. The court would consist of three officers. None of them had any legal education as far as I could make out; it was coincidental if they did. One officer was assigned as defense counsel, another as prosecutor, the senior one presiding. The prosecutor would get up and say something like this: We accuse all of you of being accomplices to crimes against humanity and war crimes and mistreatment of prisoners of war and other brutalities in the camp, between 1942 and 1943, what do you have to say for yourself? Each defendant would be given about a minute to state his case, which was usually, not guilty. One trial for instance, which lasted two minutes, convicted 10 people and sentenced them all to death. It was not my idea of a judicial process. I mean, I was a young, idealistic Harvard law graduate.”

Ferencz states that nobody including himself protested against such procedures in these Dachau trials.[\[30\]](#)

The Malmedy trial was probably closer to a fair judicial process than Ferencz’s aforementioned description. However, the Malmedy trial was not a fair and impartial hearing. The lack of documentary evidence, the use of mock trials and interrogation methods designed to produce false confessions, military judges with little or no legal training, and unreliable eyewitness testimony assured the conviction of all 73 German defendants in the Malmedy trial.[\[31\]](#)

Censorship with a Capital “C”

by Ken Meyercord

Censorship can take many forms. There’s the government censorship we associate with socialist regimes (a notable exception being Israel, which has been under military censorship for its entire existence). Take Cuba, for instance, which exercises tight control over the access its citizens have to the internet. We are encouraged to attribute this restriction to the fear Cuba’s leaders have that, if they allow information from outside to seep through, their citizens will rise up in anger over being denied the rights of a free people: inflammatory trolls, click-bait ads, and women-degrading pornography.

A recent episode in our relations with that feisty little island suggests the Cuban government may have a different reason for limiting internet access. Back in 2010, the US government—through that clandestine CIA-front organization, the US Agency for International Development—attempted to take advantage of the Cuban government’s decision to allow its citizens to own cellphones. USAID sponsored a team of geeks to send text messages to the newly linked-in Cuban populace through a service they called ZunZuneo, a sort of Cuba-specific Twitter.

The messages were initially apolitical so as not to arouse the suspicion of either the Cuban authorities or Zunzuneo’s Cuban subscribers as to who might be behind the site. Zunzuneo proved very successful initially, garnering 40,000 subscribers in just its first year. But, in the long run, Zunzuneo proved ineffective in achieving its covert objective—fomenting rebellion—especially after the Cuban government noticed it and started blocking the site. In 2012 the operation was defunded and shut down (partly because USAID was paying a large amount in text-messaging fees to the Cuban telephone company, Cubacel).*

This spy-vs-spy saga lends legitimacy to foreign governments who have incurred our displeasure constraining their citizens’ access to information from abroad. If we can get so paranoid about a rinky-dink operation in Russia directing a miniscule number of innocuous tweets our way, think how the Cubans feel, especially as in the case of the USA versus Cuba, it’s asymmetric cyberwarfare. Think of the Russian meddlers being a hundred times more powerful than they were (like our NSA) and us having one-hundredth our true capability to counter their subversion (like Cuba), how would you want our government to react?

Whatever your answer, no need to speculate on how our government would respond as we have evidence from another covert action event. In 2014, Udo Ulfkotte, a German journalist who at one time worked as an editor at one of Germany’s leading newspapers, the Frankfurter Allgemeine Zeitung, published a memoir in which he claimed virtually the entire German press corps was on the payroll of the CIA. He had personal knowledge of this as he himself had been a beneficiary of CIA largesse.

The book, Gekaufte Journalisten (“Bought Journalists”), became a bestseller in Germany despite the German media being banned from mentioning it. An English edition, entitled Journalists for Hire, came out last spring but was immediately suppressed. It’s listed on Amazon, but the only copy available sells for \$997.09 (plus $3.99 shipping!). I myself preordered the book a month before it was due out but have yet to receive my copy (Amazon owes me $13.95).

The Canadian house which published the book, Tayen Lane, has removed it from its list of publications without offering any explanation. Obviously, some very powerful censors have managed to deny the English-speaking world the benefit of Mr. Ulfkotte's revelations, and we can't hear from him directly any more as he died of a heart attack last year at age 56.

When I was living in Lebanon a while ago, a line popular amongst the Lebanese was, "The American media treats the American people as if they were raising mushrooms: they keep them in the dark and feed them bullshit." The fate of Journalists for Hire illustrates the dark, malodorous, spore-filled trays in which we Americans are cultivated. Who needs socialist-style government censorship when capitalists do such an effective job censoring themselves? Look at how accommodating Amazon is in removing unacceptable books from its shelves, or Google in doctoring its search results, Facebook in blocking unacceptable pages, YouTube in censoring controversial videos, and Twitter in deleting provocative tweets and twitters (unless presidential)—all with just a little prodding from an insecure, hypocritical government.

(If you'd like to read Journalists for Hire in our native tongue, demand the cause be taken up by such selectively indignant protectors of press freedom as PEN America, which claims to "defend writers and protect free expression in the United States and around the world"; the Newseum-linked Freedom House where "freedoms of expression, association, and belief ... are guaranteed"; and George Soros's sovereignty-infringing Open Society, which believes in "encouraging critical debate and respecting diverse opinions".)

* The information on ZunZuneo came from an article in the UK's Guardian newspaper. Before you give The Guardian—and by extension the capitalist press in general—credit for exposing a reprehensible covert action, consider the ulterior motive they might have had for doing so. They may have sought to misdirect the Cuban government by claiming a mole within the Cuban telephone company provided the numbers of Cuba's half-million cellphone users when the numbers were actually obtained by hacking into Cubacel's computer. Also, the article suggests Spanish authorities were unaware a company operating on their territory was violating Spanish law by collecting politically-oriented personal data, when, more likely, the Spaniards were quite cooperative (which would justify the Cubans responding in kind). In any case, revealing the Zunzuneo scheme was harmless, as the Cubans were onto it and the operation had been terminated (replaced by something more sophisticated and better funded?).

Christian Gerlach's The Extermination of the European Jews

by Panagiotis Heliotis

This time we will take on the latest comprehensive elaboration on the Holocaust written by a mainstream historian: The Extermination of the European Jews (Cambridge University Press, 2016) by German historian Christian Gerlach, professor of modern history at the University of Bern and associate editor of the Journal of Genocide Research. The book's content is organized as follows:

1. Introduction

Part I: Persecution by Germans

2. Before 1933

3. From enforced emigration to territorial schemes: 1933–41

4. From mass murder to comprehensive annihilation: 1941–42

5. Extending mass destruction: 1942–45

6. Structures and agents of violence

Part II: Logics of persecution

7. Racism and anti-Jewish thought

8. Forced labor, German violence and Jews

9. Hunger policies and mass murder

10. The economics of separation, expropriation, crowding and removal
11. Fighting resistance and the persecution of Jews

Part III: The European dimension

12. Legislation against Jews in Europe: A comparison
13. Divided societies: Popular input to the persecution of Jews
14. Beyond legislation: Non-German policies of violence
15. In the labyrinths of persecution: Survival attempts
16. Conclusion: Group destruction in extremely violent societies

The Holocaust, that is to say its major events, is basically covered in Part I (140 pages), so we will focus on that. Parts II and III deal with other topics.

Imagined Solutions

Gerlach starts with the situation before 1933. In a sub-chapter titled “Imagined ‘Solutions’” he writes:

“It is often said that everybody should have known before 1933 that Hitler and the Nazis wanted to destroy the Jews. However, relevant documents do not make this so obvious. According to the 1920 program of the Nazi Party, which was later declared ‘unchangeable,’ Jews should be stripped of their German citizenship, all Jews should be legally regarded as foreigners, and, as such, Germans should have priority over them with regard to employment, with the suggestion of a possible option to expel Jewish competitors. Jews were to be removed from the civil service, from journalism and from ownership of journals and newspapers; all immigration was to be outlawed and all immigrants (not just Jews) arriving after August 2, 1914, were to be expelled. [...] In his book, Mein Kampf, Hitler did not explicitly say that he wanted to kill the Jews. His likening of Jews to vermin on several occasions was suggestive of this fact, but not unheard of in German anti-Jewish discourse.” (p. 33)

He also notes:

“German activists were not alone in wanting to evict Jews from their country or from all of Europe. A number of public figures in Europe advocated this. In fact, some intellectuals had imagined removing all Jews from Europe since the late eighteenth century. Paul de Lagarde seems to have been the first – in the late 1800s – to suggest Madagascar explicitly as a possible destination, a thought that became widespread later and was taken up by the Nazis in 1940–41. By the 1930s, however, many other Jewish settlement areas were being discussed.” (p. 35)

And what was the policy after 1933?

“If there was one overarching goal of the central authorities after 1933, it was emigration. All Jews were supposed to leave Germany, and actions in the country were supposed to serve that goal.” (p. 48)

After the outbreak of the war, that policy was changed. Resettlement instead of emigration was the new plan:

“Such thinking was not exclusively German. US, British, French, Polish and Japanese politicians suggested resettlement schemes. The Polish Prime Minister in exile, Władysław Sikorski, suggested the resettlement of 3.5 million Polish Jews to the British Foreign Minister, Anthony Eden, as late as in January 1942. Other deportation destinations suggested were Alaska, Dutch Guyana and various other South American countries, Manchuria, Angola, Ethiopia, Northern Rhodesia and the Philippines. Jewish emigration to Palestine added to the territorial resettlement options. During the Evian conference, Polish and Romanian diplomats urged President Roosevelt of the US (unsuccessfully) to include the emigration of their Jewish nationals in the work of the Intergovernmental Committee on Political Refugees.” (p. 60)

So far, so good. But when and how did this change to total extermination?

The Road to Extermination

Gerlach describes the evolution of the Nazi policy on the Jews as follows:

“Within one-and-a-half years, from the spring of 1941 to the late summer of 1942, the imaginations about schemes for the territorial concentration of the Jews came to include more and more violence combined with ideas for the selective mass murder of Jews in the Soviet Union that was to be occupied. This led to intentions to kill virtually all Soviet Jews; to which were then added plans to murder those Polish Jews who were regarded as unproductive, until, finally, the plan to kill all European Jews by 1943 was developed. Such policies came about through a complex process involving different central and regional authorities and agencies – at different levels of their hierarchies – and were the result of a number of intertwined motives. Practice evolved accordingly, though in regionally uneven ways – from selective mass shootings to almost complete annihilation in the occupied Soviet territories in 1941, though in some regions large numbers of Jews were spared for a year or longer; and from selective deportations from many countries to newly built extermination centers; and then the almost complete wiping out of Jewish communities in 1942.” (p. 66)

According to Gerlach, the Nazi system was “semi-decentralized and permitted a good deal of flexibility, informal coordination and autonomy” (p. 119). He concludes:

“Historians have paid much attention to this German decision-making process, and to changes in anti-Jewish policies. Following decades of research it has become clear that there was no Nazi master plan from the beginning and that decision-making was a complex and drawn-out process involving many actors at many levels.” (p. 438)

Hence in short, Gerlach is basically in line with Hilberg. There was no central plan, no budget, no special agency to exterminate the Jews. There were “ideas”, “intentions”, “complex processes”, “different regional authorities and agencies”, “intertwined motives” and “many actors”. If all this sounds confusing, it’s because it is.

Hitler’s Decision

Nevertheless, there had to be some sort of decision by Hitler to kill all of the European Jews. Indeed, in his sub-chapter “Hitler’s decision in principle to kill all of the European Jews” Gerlach informs us that:

“As a batch of documents shows, Hitler announced his decision in principle to murder all of Europe’s Jews on or around December 12, 1941.” (p. 80)

But the reader will wait in vain for Gerlach to produce this “batch” (in his footnotes actually he cites mostly authors, not documents). Instead, he quotes the following entry from Goebbels’s diary:

“Regarding the Jewish question the Führer is determined to clear the table. He warned the Jews that if they were to cause another world war, it would lead to their own destruction. Those were not empty words. Now the world war has come. The destruction of the Jews must be its necessary consequence. We cannot be sentimental about it.” (ibid.)

Of course, Gerlach keeps silent about later entries which explain what Goebbels meant by destruction, like the one on December 14, 1941:

“I speak with the Führer regarding the Jewish Question. He is determined to take consistent action and not be deterred by bourgeois sentimentality. Above all, the Jews must leave the Reich.”

Or that on February 5, 1942:

“The Jewish Question is again giving us a headache; this time, however, not because we have gone too far, but because we are not going far enough. Among large sections of the German people the idea is gaining headway that the Jewish Question cannot be regarded as solved until all Jews have left the Reich.”

Looking for some hard evidence, we move on to the sub-chapter “Toward a plan for swift, direct extermination” where we read:

“Hitler’s decision in principle did not immediately lead to mass murder or the erection of new extermination centers. The infamous Wannsee conference of January 20, 1942 – a high-level interagency meeting about the persecution of Jews – sheds light on why not. It provides insights into the structures of the political process. But because the conference does not fit well with many historians’ periodizations, some have been embarrassed by it and have concluded as a result that it was not very important.” (p. 84)

Fortunately, Gerlach is here to save the day. He continues:

“At the conference Heydrich presented only vague plans for ‘combing out Europe from West to East,’ bringing the captured Jews to eastern Europe, letting most of them die during transport and forced labor, and then killing the rest.” (p. 85)

Unfortunately, there is no mention of killings in the Wannsee Protocol. The only words that appear are expulsion and emigration. Gerlach knows this, so he does not quote anything from it. In fact, the passage he refers to says:

“In the course of the practical execution of the final solution, Europe will be combed through from west to east. Germany proper, including the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia, will have to be handled first due to the housing problem and additional social and political necessities. The evacuated Jews will first be sent, group by group, to so-called transit ghettos, from which they will be transported to the East.”

Casualties through labor are mentioned in the preceding passage:

“Under proper guidance, in the course of the final solution the Jews are to be allocated for appropriate labor in the East. Able-bodied Jews, separated according to sex, will be taken in large work columns to these areas for work on roads, in the course of which action doubtless a large portion will be eliminated by natural causes. The possible final remnant will, since it will undoubtedly consist of the most resistant portion, have to be treated accordingly, because it is the product of natural selection and would, upon release (bei Freilassung), act as the seed of a new Jewish revival.”

Despite what the historians would like us to believe, there is no plan for mass murder here. The text actually refers only to able-bodied Jews who will manage to survive the harsh conditions, and upon release, help in the Jewish revival. So, they must be kept detained, not killed.

Gerlach furthermore writes:

“Josef Bühler, the State Secretary of the General Government, and Alfred Meyer, the Deputy Minister for the occupied Soviet territories, called for the extermination to be carried out first in their territories because – as one of Bühler’s remarks was summed up, ‘motives of labor policy would not impede the course of this action.’” (ibid.)

Here’s what the Protocol actually says about Bühler:

“State Secretary Dr. Buehler stated that the General Government would welcome it if the final solution of this problem could be begun in the General Government, since on the one hand transportation does not play such a large role here nor would problems of labor supply hamper this action. Jews must be removed from the territory of the General Government as quickly as possible, since it is especially here that the Jew as an epidemic carrier represents an extreme danger and on the other hand he is causing permanent chaos in the economic structure of the country through continued black market dealings.”

It is clear that Gerlach is misleading the reader by cherry picking phrases and stitching them together in his extermination scenario, a tactic much favored by Holocaust historians. Even worse, he does not hesitate to resort to indirect falsifications. For example:

“On July 19 Himmler ordered that the only Jews remaining in the General Government by the end of the year should be confined in five large labor camps. This was necessary, he argued, for the ‘separation of races and peoples necessary for a new order in Europe,’ for security reasons, and because Jews were a ‘moral and physical source of infection.’” (p. 91)

That order was directed at SS Obergruppenführer Krüger and it says (NO-5574):

“I herewith order that the resettlement of the entire Jewish population of the General Government be carried out and completed by December 31, 1942. From December 31, 1942, no persons of Jewish origin may remain within the General Government, unless they are in concentration camps in Warsaw, Cracow, Czestochowa, Radom, and Lublin. All other work on which Jewish labor is employed must be finished by that date, or, in the event that this is not possible, it must be transferred to one of the concentration camps.”

But a few pages later referring to the same order Gerlach writes:

“On July 19, 1942, Himmler had ordered that all of the Jews in the General Government were either to be murdered or brought to SS camps by December 31.” (p. 107)

The underlined text is a sly addition by Gerlach. He uses the same trick a little further on with another order by Himmler on June 21, 1943. The order says (NO-2403):

“1) I order that all Jews still remaining in ghettos in the Ostland area be collected in concentration camps. 2) I prohibit the withdrawal of Jews from concentration camps for [outside] work from August 1, 1943. 3) A concentration camp is to be built near Riga to which will be transferred the entire manufacture of clothing and equipment now operated by the Wehrmacht outside. All private firms will be eliminated. The workshops are to be solely concentration camp workshops. The Chief of the SS Economic and Administrative Main Office is requested to see to it that there will be no shortfall in the production required by the Wehrmacht as the result of this reorganization. 4) Inmates of the Jewish ghettos who are not required are to be evacuated to the East. 5) As many male Jews as possible are to be taken to the concentration camp in the oil-shale area for the mining of oil-shale. 6) The date set for the reorganization of the concentration camps is August 1, 1943.”

And here’s what Gerlach claims:

“On June 21 he ordered that all of the ghettos in Reich Commissariat Ostland be emptied by August 1 and that a certain proportion of their inhabitants be killed, with the rest transferred to concentration camps.” (p. 110)

Needless to say, no source is given.

The Death Camps

Surprisingly, in a book about the Holocaust, the death camps rarely appear. There is a very brief description about the killing operations in Belzec, Sobibor and Treblinka (p. 92), and a few other references like this:

“Under direct German administration the removal of German, Austrian and Czech Jews, including many of those in Theresienstadt, was largely completed by August 1943. Most of these were murdered at Auschwitz. Repeatedly, the Jews remaining in Polish and Soviet territories occupied by Germany were sorted according to skill or ability to work. Large numbers were killed in the process and the rest were gradually moved to camps. Most of the ghettos were dissolved.” (p. 102)

Or this:

“Large-scale deportations started on May 15, 1944, only two months after the German invasion, and 430,000 Hungarian Jews were shipped to Auschwitz within just eight weeks; about 75% were killed immediately upon arrival.” (p. 114)

Or this:

“The first murders in the gas chambers at Belzec started in March 1942, targeting Jews from the districts of Lublin and Galicia. They were designed to kill people unfit for work – about 60% of the population, excluding those aged between sixteen and thirty-five years old.” (p. 243)

There is also a table with some basic information (p. 120). Gerlach lists five of the six death camps (he leaves Majdanek out), their area of responsibility, the murder method, the construction date, the operation period, and the numbers and origins of Jews killed. And that’s all. No details, no photos and of course, no witnesses. He merely quotes books written either by himself or by similar historians, such as Berger, Browning, Pohl, Schelvis and Tuchel.

Gerlach has a response for this (well, sort of):

“Why does this book not analyze methods of violence or killing in more detail? The comparison of violence against a variety of groups suggests caution for the following reasons. First, a wide array of forms of violence were applied to the same group (for example, the Jews in Ukraine). Second, the same method of violence was used against different groups (for example, disabled people, Jews, Soviet POWs, Roma and Polish and Soviet political opponents were all gassed). Third, the same unit or individual might use various methods of violence. Also, inasmuch as people other than those in the killing units determined who was to be killed or deported, and when, the ways in which the killings occurred do not explain the events. All this implies that the methods of violence employed do not necessarily say much about the relationship between perpetrator and victim, and do little to explain why an act of violence took place.” (p. 140)

But before explaining why something happened, we must know what exactly happened. Unfortunately, the author does not help, most probably for reasons very different than those stated.

Summary

This book should have been titled The Persecution of the European Jews, as very little space is devoted to the extermination part (not even the word Zyklon appears), and that part is also quite confusing. Gerlach uses the usual tricks employed by Holocaust historians: Cherry picking, suppression of evidence, omissions, falsifications. But he puts forth an interesting question:

“Why did so few oppose mass extermination? It is true that the authorities did not announce the destruction publicly, and that most people within Germany heard only rumors, snippets of information or the claims broadcast on enemy radio stations. In the occupied countries, however – where most of the mass murder took place – the widespread, active support and almost total lack of opposition is remarkable. Fully explaining this remains a task for future research.” (p. 446)

For revisionists the answer is easy: There was no mass extermination to oppose. But for orthodox historians, well, good luck with that.

From Athens to Auschwitz | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Are our readers ready to look into yet another testimony? Sit back and relax. Tonight's guest of honor is Errikos Sevillias. So let's go.

Sevillias was deported from Athens to Auschwitz and then Birkenau in 1944 at the age of 43. His memoir Athens-Auschwitz was published first in English in 1983 (Lycabettus Press, Athens) and then in Greek in 1995 (Αθήνα - Άουσβιτς, Vivliopōleion tēs “Hestias,” Athens). His account is generally believable. Simple, clear, and with no verbalisms. After his stay in Birkenau, he was transferred to Breslau which proved to be much worse as he had to work at night shifts in the freezing cold. He suffered severely from hunger, frostbites and lice, as there were no cleaning measures (in Birkenau he received clean clothes every week). Upon liberation, he was 32 kg and at the brink of death. He slowly recovered and returned to Greece. So let's see what he has to say about the extermination claims.

The Selections

On his second day in Auschwitz he asked another prisoner about the selection he had went through the previous day:

“After I ate, I went out with my son-in-law to find out what happened to the others who had come with us and I asked one of the Greeks who had been there for a long time. I said to him, ‘You, as a long-term inmate, should know where they sent the others who had come with us.’ He laughed bitterly and told me: ‘If you wish to know, look there, that big chimney with the big flame. They all went there, the old, the sick and the mothers with the children.’ I could not understand a thing, new as I was. And he told me, ‘There are the crematories, that is the place where they kill and then burn whoever is unfit for work. And they send all the mothers who have little children.’ When I heard it, I froze out of horror and started crying painfully for my little nephew who had gone with them.” (p. 60)

Once again we see the rumor factory at work. From one prisoner to the next, everyone repeated what they had heard. So Sevillias, for the rest of his internment, every time he witnessed a selection he thought that those selected had been sent to the crematory.

The Gas Chambers

Sevillias has no personal experience with gas chambers. His information is derived from his son-in-law who supposedly worked at Crematorium II or III. Here is his description:

“Every day they killed thousands of people. When they were bringing them into the crematorium, they put them in a large underground room that had numbered hangers on the walls, and they said to them: ‘Now you have to take off your clothes, and each of you place it on a hanger remembering the number, so you can find them when you exit the shower.’ They were telling them this so that they would not suspect what awaited them, but they were all shaking from fear. When they had undressed, a door opened leading to another room – about 8 x 8 meters – and they ordered them to go in. When the first ones entered and saw that there were no showers but merely four empty walls, they realized that their time had come, and they started crying and shouting. The rest, hearing the cries, would not enter, they resisted. Then the Germans beat them mercilessly with a whip, and they had to go in. But as there were too many and they could not all fit inside, they squeezed them to the point that they had to raise their arms up to fit inside; that is because they were always more than a thousand persons, and it was almost impossible to fit them in. In the end, they grabbed the little kids left and threw them above the heads of the adults. When everyone was finally inside, they sealed the door and channeled a poisonous gas into the room, that killed them within three minutes.” (p. 79)

Not only has he no idea what kind of gas they used or how, but his description of the gas chamber is totally wrong. The room in question was actually 30 × 7 meters in size, with seven concrete pillars, and according to official history, four wire-mesh columns as well as fake shower heads. Therefore, whoever provided him with this information had never set foot in that basement and wasn't familiar with the mainstream narrative either.

The Crematories

Now here's the description of the cremation ovens:

“They were not any different than the usual furnaces, only they were much larger, they were about 80 meters in length, and in every two meters there was an opening. In front of each opening there was a worker; he took the bodies left by the little rail cars as they passed by and threw them in the furnace. This went on until they were none left. Within two hours more than a thousand people had been killed and thrown into the furnaces, and the gas room was ready for new victims, and then more and more. Sometimes the four crematories operated day and night, because ten or fifteen thousand people happened to arrive a day, who all had to be executed.” (p. 80)

Furnaces 80 meters long? An opening every two meters? Little rail cars passing by? Throwing corpses into furnaces? The furnace room of the largest crematoria in Auschwitz, nos. II and III, was 30 meters long. It was equipped with five furnaces that were 3.5 m wide each with three openings whose center was some 1.2 m apart. No carts were running on rails or otherwise to deliver the corpses, because that room was on the ground floor, while the alleged gas chamber was in the basement. They were linked only by a freight elevator.<sup>[1]</sup> Furthermore, corpses had to be introduced into the cremation muffle through the 60-cm narrow and even lower opening using a steel stretcher. They could not have been “thrown.” It is therefore evident that the informant had never even been near any of the Birkenau crematoria. And here's the most interesting “information”:

“When the corpses they had put in the furnaces were completely burnt, the fat from them was sent through pipes in a pit behind the furnace. From there they were put into barrels and taken to cars. Where they went and what they did with it, I did not know.” (p. 81)

In the presence of a spark or flame, body fat catches fire at temperatures exceeding 184°C (its flash point).<sup>[2]</sup> Considering that the inside of a cremation muffle needs to be at least 800°C hot to function properly, there is no way any fat could have oozed from a body lying in a cremation muffle, let alone drip off, without instantly catching fire and burning off quickly.

The Revolt

Finally, Sevillias offers some interesting information regarding the alleged Sonderkommando revolt (which he places on October 6). According to the orthodox narrative,<sup>[3]</sup> on October 7, 1944, 300 members of the Sonderkommando in Birkenau slated to be put on a transport – which they thought was equivalent to their impending execution – planned a mass escape. This plan, however, was betrayed by another inmate, so a premature, spontaneous revolt broke out instead, during which Sonderkommando members at Crematorium IV attacked their SS guards with hammers, axes and stones. They set Crematorium IV ablaze and threw a few self-made grenades at the arriving SS reinforcement. The Sonderkommando members of Crematorium II joined the uprising, while the crews of the other crematoria remained inactive. Some of the insurgents managed to reach the grove behind Crematorium IV, where most of them were killed in the ensuing fight against SS guards. A few escaped, but most of them were later captured. Three SS men were killed in this revolt.

About this event, Sevilias writes that on October 5 his son-in-law told him that they would attempt a mass escape “tomorrow afternoon.” Here’s what followed:

“On October 6, I went as usual to work, and at some point, when I saw him through the wires, he told me that everything was fine. When noon had passed, we started waiting anxiously for the signal. We were all nervous, but we had all made up our minds. But at 2 o’clock, as we were working, we heard many cries from the crematorium. This worried me, and in a moment we saw the internal workers coming furiously out with axes in hand, cutting the wires and running away from the crematorium. We were at a loss not knowing what to do, and we stayed there still.” (p. 94)

Then the Germans arrived shooting anyone moving. Many prisoners were killed, and the escape failed. Sevilias learned later that the operation had been betrayed by another prisoner hoping for a reward. When the workers in the crematorium realized this, they grabbed the axes and tried to run away, but the Germans caught up with them.

The above seems to be largely corroborated by a few German wartime documents confirming that this revolt took place, indeed, including a garrison order naming the three SS casualties,[\[4\]](#) and by an escape report of the Gestapo published by the Auschwitz Museum. The hour is exactly the same mentioned by Sevilias, the only difference being the date (September 7),[\[5\]](#) but that seems to be an error of the document, as other German wartime documents put that event firmly on October 7, so for instance the just-mentioned garrison order and a telegram sent by the Auschwitz camp headquarters to the local Gestapo office saying:[\[6\]](#)

“On October 7, [19]44 the Kommandos of the crematoria here attempted a mass escape. Through the swift and decisive intervention of the guard staff here, however, it was possible to prevent this. The vast majority of these prisoners were shot while fleeing. At present the following [4] prisoners are still unaccounted for: [...].”

Of course, we cannot expect to find any details of the event in German wartime document, so we will probably never know whether the details of the orthodox narrative as recounted by Czech based on a number of testimonies (such as those by S. Lewenthal, H. Mandelbaum) are correct. But the general framework of the event seems to be firmly established.

Summary

This witness can be considered mostly credible with regard to events he personally experienced, as it agrees with solidly documented facts, while unverified rumors he received from others are clearly false, in particular when it comes to the alleged gas chambers and the claimed equipment and operation of the crematoria.

Hence once again, another witness does not offer reliable information about mass killings in gas chambers.

From Greece to Birkenau | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Without a doubt the most important piece of evidence regarding the Holocaust are the testimonies of the members of the so-called Sonderkommandos. They were the workers in the crematories who allegedly took the bodies from the gas chambers to be cremated. Normally, such witnesses should not exist, as the orthodox narrative has it that they were killed every few months to be replaced by others. And yet they do, even claiming that they were Sonderkommando members for many months, even years.

Enter Leon Cohen. He was deported to Auschwitz in the middle of April 1944. He was then transferred to Birkenau where he received the registration number 182,492, and soon he was put to work in the Sonderkommando. He claims to have remained there for 11 months (which is impossible, as the crematories went out of service in November 1944). Strangely, he and his co-workers were not killed, and after the evacuation, he was sent to Mauthausen and other camps, where he was liberated by the Americans on May 5, 1945. He returned to Greece, and in 1980 he migrated to Israel.

His memoir From Greece to Birkenau: The Crematoria Workers' Uprising was first published by the Salonika Jewry Research Center in Tel Aviv in 1996 (English edition). He is one of three Sonderkommando members, along with Marcel Nadjari and Filip Müller, to have written their memoirs. Let's see what this most important witness has to say.

Gas Chambers and Crematories

Cohen gives a detailed description of the crematories and the procedures followed (pp. 111-114):

“There were four brand new crematories. They were numbered from 1 to 4 and they were built on the two sides of the buildings. Number 1 was in front of number 2, and, similarly, number 3 was in front of number 4. Between them there was a distance of 250 meters. The whole setting was quite uniform, except for Crematories 3 and 4 which were located at the center of the camp, whereas the first two were at its corner. Each crematory had its own basement, ground floor and upper floor.”

The first two major mistakes. Crematories 3 and 4 (IV-V) were not at the center of the camp but at the north-west corner. Furthermore, they did not have a basement or an upper floor. Cohen seems to think that all four were similar in design.

“One could reach the basement by walking down twelve steps four meters wide, which led to an anteroom 250 m<sup>2</sup>, about 20 x 12 meters.”

The stairway that led to the basement had actually 10 steps and it was about 2 meters wide. As for the anteroom (Leichenkeller or Morgue #2), it was about 50 meters long and 8 meters wide.

“When the people arrived at the basement, they were told that they would have a shower, so to disinfect them and their clothes. Then they would enter a room with showers, in which the only visible thing was a fake spout nailed on the ceiling. They all had to undress. For reasons of decency, women and children entered first, then men. When a group was ready, the door of the anteroom was opened, which was 16 m<sup>2</sup>. That room led from the shower to the gas chamber.”

This account totally contradicts the orthodox version. The gas chamber itself was supposed to be the fake shower room, but according to Cohen the fake shower room was in the undressing room – and with only one fake shower head!

“This diabolical chamber was about 30 meters long, 15 meters wide and 3.5 meters high.”

Actual dimensions of Morgue #1 said to have been that “chamber”: 30 x 7 x 2.4 m.

“Its maximum capacity was 500 people, but we managed to squeeze up to 750.”

An interesting divergence from the usual claims of about 2,000 to 3,000 people. Cohen gives more realistic figures, putting 750 people in a chamber of 30 x 15 m. Obviously he’s done the math.

“Inside there were hollow pillars, placed every 8 meters. The pillars were covered with pierced metal plates, which had holes of 15 mm and through them the gas entered the chamber.”

Curiously, instead of just saying the number of pillars, he places one pillar every 8 meters. In a room 30 meters long, that would mean 3 pillars in total, but only if there was only one row. With a second row, there would have been 6 pillars. And he doesn’t seem to notice that there were also 7 concrete pillars supporting the roof.

Also, in another divergence, he claims that the pillars were covered (probably referring to their sides) with iron plates which had small holes, whereas they were supposedly made of several layers of iron wire-mesh with a wire-mesh insert for inserting and removing the Zyklon B pellets.

“The prisoners would remove the slab from outside and the soldiers added the frozen gas, which was in the form of liquid crystals weighing about one kilogram. From closure till the crystals turned to gas, about one hour passed. In the winter we would first preheat the chamber, setting fire with coals to accelerate the evaporation. To make sure that they were all dead, we had to wait one more hour before opening the door.”

Cohen seems to be aware that high temperatures were needed in the gas chamber but his description of Zyklon (which he does not name) is wrong. It implies that it was in the form of ice crystals which melted and turned to gas, whereas it was gypsum granules soaked with hydrogen cyanide that slowly evaporated upon opening the can. Furthermore, he gives two full hours for an execution (followed by two more hours for ventilation), again a realistic figure, but in total contradiction with all the witnesses who speak of only a few minutes up to half an hour at most for the whole procedure.

“Strangely, the corpses near the pillars were completely bruised, almost black, while those further away were pink. I suppose this was due to the amount of gas they had inhaled but as I am not a scientist nor a doctor, I cannot draw a conclusion.”

Cyanide poisoning causes a pink discoloration, a fact that almost all witnesses get wrong. Cohen seems to get it right. But does he? Other Sonderkommando members like Dario Gabbai have claimed that the bodies were black and blue. Cohen’s statement looks like an attempt to reconcile those claims with reality.

The Cremation

We now move to the cremation of corpses (pp. 115-118).

“As for the third stage, the 35 meters long chamber-furnace was divided in two sections. The crematories were in the first section, which was the largest. The second, smaller section, was about 10 meters long and it had been converted to a luxurious chrome-plated paved bathroom.”

Cohen does not explain what was supposed to be the purpose of that bathroom. In fact, there was no such bathroom. Next to the furnace room there were several rooms: The coke bunker, the commanding officer’s office, a toilet, and the quarters of the workers.

“Two groups of workers worked there, each on a twelve hour shift, from six to six. The burning, that is, would continue non-stop round the clock. The ovens had been assembled in units of three and were about five meters apart. Each oven could take five corpses. The capacity, that is, was 15 corpses per unit and 75 in total. The procedure lasted for half an hour. [...] In short, within 24 hours and if there was no stop, 3,600 corpses could be cremated.”

Cohen describes correctly the ovens (five triple-muffle furnaces), but his other data is absurd. It was physically impossible to fit five corpses into one muffle, as they were designed only for one corpse each. But even if it had been possible, the cremation would have lasted several hours, because so many corpses would have clogged the muffle and overtaxed the coke hearths, making a proper cremation impossible.<sup>[1]</sup>

“Although the male corpses were more than the female ones in an analogy three to two, when the crematory was full, the surplus of the female fat was absolutely capable by itself to keep the fire going.”

This is absolute nonsense. Fat is flammable, but the amount of fat contained in a normal body is not enough to keep a cremation going in the kind of furnaces installed at Auschwitz. They were neither insulated nor had any means of recovering the heat from the exhaust gases. Without additional fuel, the muffles would have swiftly cooled down, and the cremation would have stopped.

Finally, according to Cohen the cremation ashes weigh 700 grams, a figure close to Nadjari's 640 grams. But their actual weight is 2 to 3 kg.

The Pits

The orthodox narrative has it that during the deportation of the Hungarian Jews in late spring and summer of 1944, the crematories could not keep up with the thousands of corpses. So some pits were dug in the northern backyard of Crematorium V to burn them, in addition to similar burning pits dug near the so-called Bunker 2 outside of the camp proper. What does Cohen have to say about this?

Well, for starters he does give neither their number nor their location. Additionally, he claims that pits were regularly used:

“Under normal circumstances, the corpses were burned in the crematories. But whenever too many prisoners arrived at the same time, it was impossible to squeeze them all in the crematories and the burning had to be done inside the pits.” (p. 119)

He also adds that pits and crematories were working for 10 months (p. 122). Now here's the description of a pit:

“A pit was a trench five meters deep, with a gradually narrowing width from about six meters to one meter. It was full to the top with alternating layers of fir and pine branches and of corpses. As soon as it was full, they would pour oil and set fire. To speed up the cremation procedure, the Sonderkommandos were standing at both sides of the pit poking the fire with long stakes. The completion of the job on each pit usually lasted two days and two nights. When the fire went off due to shortage of fuel, the trench had to be cleared from the remains, like the half-burned branches and the accumulated fat.” (p. 119)

In the swamp that was Birkenau, it would be impossible to dig a pit five meters deep.<sup>[2]</sup> Also the heat would have been so intense (he speaks of flames five to six meters high) that approaching the fire would have caused severe burnings if not death. Finally, even more ridiculous is the claim about the accumulated fat. The same fat that was allegedly enough to keep the cremation going in the cremation furnaces did not burn off in the pits but rather gathered to such a degree that it had to be cleared out?

Gas Vans?

As it turns out, gas chambers, crematories and flaming pits were not enough for Cohen, so he discovered gas vans at Birkenau, of which the orthodox narrative knows nothing:

“The trucks were permanently parked at the center of the fields, about 300 meters from the trenches. In there up to 100 people were squeezed, and half an hour after the doors were closed, the gas would enter through a small opening, that closed afterwards. Hearing those unfortunate people screaming and hitting the walls was unbearable. All this lasted ten to fifteen minutes and then, all of a sudden, there was a terrifying silence. Fifteen minutes later, we opened the back door of the truck and loaded the corpses on special carts, which we pushed on the temporary railways to the trenches. When we reached there, we tipped over the carts and emptied the corpses into the trenches.” (p. 121)

Commander Wire

Leaving aside for a moment the gas chambers and the fires, let's have a look at another example that highlights the historical value of this book. Before his deportation, Cohen was held at a camp in Haidari, a suburb of Athens. As they did not know the commander's name (in a footnote the editor writes that it was Paul Radomski), they had named him Wire (from a Greek expression). Later, on one day while in Birkenau, they were ordered to clean the crematorium, because the new camp commander was about to come any time soon. Several days later, a black Mercedes arrived and an officer with a uniform full of medals and a whip in hand got out. And what a surprise, it was Wire himself! Long time, no see...

The Uprising

Finally, let's see what Cohen has to tell us about the famous uprising of the Sonderkommandos, which is officially placed on October 7, 1944.

First, he seems to be quite confused regarding the date. In the Introduction he claims it was on July 7 (p. 21). Then he writes it was on October 7 (p. 128). Lastly, when he starts describing the event (p. 151), he places it on September 7! Anyway, here's what allegedly happened (pp. 155f.):

“At two o'clock the prisoners were ordered to gather in the furnace room and submit a report at the Disinfection Unit. At that point, a Greek yelled: Upon them! That was the starter to begin the uprising. The other Greeks responded immediately and charged at two guards to grab their weapons. However, the expected help from the rest never came. On the contrary, in fact, some non-Greek prisoners tried to take the weapons from the rebels and give them back to the Germans. I still cannot understand their attitude. There were some shootings in the air and amidst the panic a group of 25 Greeks ran towards the exit. They ran a distance of 50 meters to Crematorium 3 and grabbed the weapons of two more Germans. Subsequently they let the Germans go, fortified themselves in the crematory and waited. All the prisoners, Greek or not, waited with them. [...] The Germans responded quickly. One or two minutes later one of the soldiers of Crematorium 4 regained his nerve, ran to the watchtowers and raised the alarm. [...] Within 15 minutes trucks full of armed soldiers arrived, who surrounded the crematory and ordered the rebels to surrender. They responded with a fusillade of bullets. Obviously, some of the rebels' bullets had hit their target, because the Nazis stopped shooting and in a few minutes ambulances arrived. Soon they started shooting again. [...] The battle, however, could not go on forever. The Germans started throwing grenades and opening holes on the walls. [...] The next step was to set the crematory on fire. Within a few minutes, Crematorium 3 was engulfed in flames and all Greeks perished.”

A number of German wartime documents have surfaced in the meantime proving that an attempt at mass escape did indeed happen on October 7, 1944, which was thwarted by the camp authorities.<sup>[3]</sup>

This confirms an attempted mass escape. The usual narrative about this event, however, has it that the prisoners blew up Crematorium IV themselves and set it on fire, and that most participants of this attempted escape were shot while trying to flee, or during subsequent reprisals.<sup>[4]</sup>

Summary

The witness obviously lacks any credibility. His book is quite similar to Eyewitness Auschwitz by Filip Müller: Full of errors, contradictions, fictional events and outrageous claims. Cohen writes that one reason for putting his experiences to paper is because of the intense allusions that the Holocaust is a myth. Unfortunately his book provides even more fuel to these allusions.

With such an array of scholars, is this the end for revisionism? Well, not really. This book is not an attempt at refuting revisionism. It’s an analysis of its history, the methods employed by various countries to counter it, and other relevant matters. As the editors state:

“It is not the purpose of this book to engage in a debate with deniers, and it does not aim to elevate their statements to the level of academic discussion.” (p. 3)

So the question is, can we expect an objective presentation? The answer is probably a clear No, but let’s make sure. Holocaust denial and revisionists are basically covered in Part I. The rest of the book is mostly legal discussions. Let’s get going.

Introduction

The Introduction begins with the usual preaching:

“The facts of the Holocaust are clear; the suffering of its millions of victims is beyond reasonable dispute. It is evidenced by the words and writings of those who escaped the machinery of death, and indeed of those who devised it and kept it in running order. The documentary and architectural proof is overwhelming. Films demonstrate the conditions of the concentration camps; there are witness statements of those who liberated Bergen-Belsen, Auschwitz and the other places in which the human capacity for evil had been given a new definition. As if that were not enough, the events have been subjected to judicial examination – ranging from the trial of the International Military Tribunal at Nuremberg to trials in the 21st century; proceedings in which the killings, torture and mistreatment received meticulous examination and had to withstand scrutiny under adversarial systems.” (p. 1)

It continues:

“In light of this, it is legitimate to ask why Holocaust and genocide denial would merit a study in its own right. The claims of deniers, after all, carry a degree of absurdity which puts them well within the ranks of those who maintain that the landing on the Moon was a hoax and that the Earth is flat. And there is the risk that even the mention of such claims gives them a prominence that they do not deserve. Ignoring them seems the safer option and in due time, so the thinking goes, they will wither away. In that regard, however, the denial of mass violence is a rather different matter. There is nothing trivial about it. To the survivors of the events and their families, denial causes renewed suffering. It targets one of the few things that they salvaged from the horrors of the time: their right to the memory of the events, which is an integral part of their personalities. It typically attacks their dignity, for the denial of mass violence carries the implied message that the reports of these events had been an invention.” (ibid.)

And:

“Nor is such denial the pastime of a few eccentric individuals. Holocaust denial in particular has become an industry. The denialist movement has held conferences, publishes journals and has established organisations such as the ‘Institute for Historical Review’ and the ‘Committee for Open Debate on the Holocaust’. Its followers are keen to occupy the spotlight in print media and on the internet.” (p. 2)

Norman Finkelstein, author of The Holocaust Industry, would probably burst out with neurotic laughter upon reading this. An industry by definition involves products, lots of advertising and publicity from the media and, of course, tons of money. A few journals, some conferences and a website are absolutely not up to par. And let us not forget that we read this in a book costing $123, when revisionists give most of their books away for free. So it is already clear that this book is not aimed at anyone familiar with revisionism. Now let's have a closer look.

Denial and Its Purpose

We begin with two excerpts from Chapter 1, written by Mark Hobbs. After giving a brief history of Holocaust denial in Britain, our professor assures us that:

“Indeed, it seems today as if Holocaust denial is the main aspect of the far right ‘history’ and conspiracy theory, and that other conspiracy theories about Jews stem from this idea rather than the other way around.” (p. 12)

Of course, it's a usual slander to call Holocaust denial a conspiracy theory. But here's how you turn the tables (literally): Go to the Nuremberg trial records, the so-called Blue Series, and read Count One of the Indictment (Vol. 1, pp. 29-41). The title is THE COMMON PLAN OR CONSPIRACY, and in the text the word conspiracy appears no less than 15 times. The word conspirators appears 60 times! And as for the Holocaust:

“Of the 9,600,000 Jews who lived in the parts of Europe under Nazi domination, it is conservatively estimated that 5,700,000 have disappeared, most of them deliberately put to death by the Nazi conspirators.”

In fact, the Holocaust itself, from the supposed code language of the Nazis to the complete erasure of the traces of the crime, fits much more with the concept of a conspiracy theory. Regardless, what is the purpose of this denialist “conspiracy theory”?

“Holocaust denial therefore provides a different mantle. It has been used, of course, to expunge the crimes of the Nazis and to present fascism and Nazism as legitimate alternatives to democratic institutions, as argued by Lipstadt. Today it is used as a flag to attract like-minded individuals and followers to its cause. Holocaust revisionism and negationism almost stand as an expression of anti-Semitic hatred which carefully camouflages overt anti-Semitic rhetoric, allowing its proponents to present a public face with the label of ‘legitimate historical revisionism’ while keeping the more ugly side of their anti-Semitic views behind closed doors and away from a public audience.” (p. 19)

As argued by Deborah Lipstadt? Instead of addressing it here, I refer the reader to a [relevant article and documentary\[1\]](#) with no further comment.

Denial and Nuremberg

Chapter 2 was written by Michael Salter, and it's about countering Holocaust denial in relation to the Nuremberg trials. Salter first informs us that:

“Such denial includes specific claims that, notwithstanding well-established historical facts to the contrary, the Nazis did not murder c.[a?] 6 million Jews, that the notion of murderous gas chambers is a myth, and that any deaths of Jews occurring under the Nazis took place only because of wartime privations. Such denial persists despite the fact that this genocide is one of the best-documented instances, with a broad range of mutually corroborating and compelling evidence reaffirming its various elements.”

(p. 22)

For this “compelling evidence” Salter refers us to Evans, Lipstadt, van Pelt, Pressac, Rees and Shermer/Grobman. Unfortunately for Salter, not only have all of the above authors’ arguments been refuted, but some of them also have been proven to be liars and falsifiers. Perhaps this is why this accursed denial persists?

“Attempts at genocide denial are clearly flying in the face of proven historical evidence consisting of hundreds of original documents and witness testimony. The latter’s authenticity was vindicated by a trial process in which defence lawyers found it nearly impossible to challenge, let alone discredit, their authenticity, other than in two or three irrelevant instances.”
(p. 26)

Well, this is no surprise considering Article 21 of the Tribunal’s Charter:

“The Tribunal shall not require proof of facts of common knowledge but shall take judicial notice thereof. It shall also take judicial notice of official governmental documents and reports of the United Nations, including the acts and documents of the committees set up in the various allied countries for the investigation of war crimes, and of records and findings of military or other Tribunals of any of the United Nations.”

But don’t wait for Salter to tell you about that (he doesn't). He continues as follows:

“Outside these ‘common sense’ reactions to instances of denial, virtually every serious scholarly study of the Nuremberg evidence and its implications is able to provide a mass of reasons discrediting Holocaust denial.” (ibid.)

No kidding. Well, in the words of Carlos Porter, all one needs to do in order to endanger the Holocaust a bit further, or perhaps even drive it into extinction, is to get the Nuremberg Trial transcript and read some of it. There one will discover “compelling evidence” such as the following:

- Steam chambers.
- Floors with electric current.
- Soap made from human fat.
- Lampshades, book covers and gloves made from human skin.
- Shrunken heads of inmates.
- Poisoning an entire city with poisoned soft drinks.
- Forcing prisoners to climb trees, then cut the trees down.
- Blast an entire village of 20,000 Jews with a sort of A-bomb.
- 1.5 million Majdanek victims.
- 4 million Auschwitz victims.

All this (and many, many more) are today in the trash can of history. In short, a study of the IMT transcript provides an insuperable mass of reasons discrediting Nuremberg “evidence”.

So, what does Salter think is the best way to counter denial?

“Nevertheless, it would, I suggest, prove counterproductive to engage in an open and public debate with David Irving et al. To do so would risk suggesting that established academic historians are recognising his work as the embodiment of genuine scholarship with which one is having merely an academic disagreement for purely scholarly reasons. This is already an excessive and unwarranted concession, which bears little relationship to reality. Attempts by genocide deniers to attract attention to their absurd and politically motivated claims by either involving or provoking public debates with established academics, thus need to be resisted. They must be rejected out of a concern that the very attempt at engagement contains an implicit endorsement that such claims somehow demand scholarly reactions, analysis. It presumes that they are at least potentially legitimate contributions to academic historical debate, which they are clearly not. The idea of my own work directing readers to take seriously Irving's claims as a debating partner is repugnant at every imaginable level: cognitive, political and ethical." (p. 28)

Does this sound like a professor, or a religious zealot? Salter seems to sense this, so he tries to salvage something from the wreckage in the next paragraph:

"On the other hand, there are dangers in simply passing over in silence the claims of negationists when one has already secured full copies of original documentation that refutes them. This is particularly true where the latter's implications are, when read in context, almost the opposite of that which Irving ascribes to them – for example in relation to the 'tampering with evidence' claim. In my view, there is a lot to be said for Lipstadt's response in her 1993 book Denying the Holocaust. This focuses not on debating the truth-quality of the claims, as if these were legitimate contributions to academic debate. Instead, it concentrates on uncovering the questionable pseudo-analytical methods Irving and other Holocaust deniers deploy to falsify the historical record. At least as an instructive act of immunisation, there remains merit in highlighting the methods and techniques through which such polemical works deliberately misrepresent empirical archival evidence."

The problem with this claim is that a detailed revisionist study of Lipstadt's book shows precisely that these characterizations fit Lipstadt's own book perfectly: She is the one who uses "questionable pseudo-analytical methods" in order "to falsify the historical record," "and techniques through which" she "deliberately misrepresents empirical archival evidence."

And what does Salter think of criminalization of denial?

"Should the State promote a mandatory core of basic truths about historical genocides in ways that are analogous to the social values defended by other laws against blasphemy, sedition, treason and defamation? If we accept the policy of granting such historical facts a privileged status of this kind, if only as the lesser evil, this would still provoke familiar human rights objections based on liberal objections to any form of 'censorship'. In response, it is arguable that our participation in the public discourse of a liberal democratic State presupposes a minimal commitment to regulating truth-telling, good faith and respect for empirical evidence. In turn, such a democratic value commitment requires at least a symbolic form of legal enforcement, particularly in the extreme case represented by expressions of genocide denial oriented towards a fascist politics." (p. 31)

A "symbolic" form of legal enforcement? What exactly is symbolic with heavy fines, jail terms, family tragedies, along with professional and social ostracism, just for expressing an opinion on a historical matter? For the likes of Professor Salter, in order to prevent a fascistic politics, it is fine to apply fascistic politics as long as one is committed to democratic values!

Anyway, after going back and forth, Salter proposes this:

“Perhaps the best antidote to expressions of denial that falsely claim to be rooted firmly in historical fact is well-researched empirical/archival studies, which are clearly detached from any Zionist political agenda. The overall effect of such studies upon their readership is surely to place the issues raised by deniers into the same category of those of the flat Earth society.”
(p. 32)

Keeping in mind the esteemed professor’s name, let’s take this with a grain of salt.

Denial and the Web

Chapter 3 is about Holocaust denial in the age of the Worldwide Web, and was written by Nick Terry. Offering a brief history of the movement after the Irving-Lipstadt trial, it begins with the following:

“Twenty-four years ago, Deborah Lipstadt labelled Holocaust denial a ‘growing assault on truth and memory’. How has the phenomenon of Holocaust denial developed in recent years? At first glance, denial appears to be everywhere on the internet. Tap the words into Google, and the curious internet surfer will be rewarded with more than 3.4 million hits to web pages within the English speaking world alone. Yet raw search engine results tell us little about the true size of actually existing Holocaust denial, or about the vitality of so-called ‘Holocaust Revisionism’ in the present day. Closer scrutiny of Holocaust denial on the internet suggests that despite a spate of highly publicised news stories, far from growing in recent years, the ‘Revisionist’ movement is arguably in relative decline.” (p. 34)

He also adds:

“Thus, while Holocaust denial continues to have great brand recognition, it now has surprisingly few customers.” (p. 35)

First of all, science is not a restaurant. It is the evidence that matters, not the customers. The soap story still has plenty of customers, but still, that doesn’t make it true. Now for the rest, Terry argues that after 2002 the Revisionist movement has been in decline (although earlier we were told it has become an industry), with his arguments focusing on the demise of IHR, the death or quitting of some revisionists, and the low Internet traffic of revisionist websites. Although some of this is true, are they enough to substantiate the claim?

The first thing to consider is that even before 2002 revisionism had never been even remotely “big.” It has always had only a few researchers with even fewer resources (and this has not changed). Sometimes it received more attention in the media (Faurisson, Zündel), but aside from that, it has never been a “movement” that could be described as skyrocketing. With the arrival of the Internet, however, revisionism became known and accessible to a much wider audience. So, what can we say about the present state of revisionism?

Let’s begin with the “customer” issue. An ADL survey in 2014 gave the following results:

If we are to trust the ADL, not only are there still many people who have never even heard of the Holocaust, but a remarkable 32% express doubts about it or clearly rejects it. Because of this, bombastic headlines such as “The World is Full of Holocaust Deniers” appeared on some web pages such as The Atlantic.<sup>[2]</sup>

A percentage of 32% is still a minority, but a significant one that cannot be the result of a decline.

So what about the research state of revisionism? Of this, there can be no doubt. From the pioneer studies of Rassinier and Butz, the era after 2002 saw the publication of dozens of revisionist works (books and videos) that are still growing, focusing on all aspects of the Holocaust, not at all a sign of decline. And there is more. On March 2017, all revisionist books, numbering in the hundreds, were BANNED from Amazon. Clearly, there are people out there, much more influential than Terry, who do not at all endorse his claims about a revisionist decline. And Terry does not utter a single word about this.

Here is how Terry summarizes his reasons for the alleged revisionist decline (p. 53):

1. Consistent social disapproval
2. Its political ineffectiveness
3. The ease of finding other ways of expressing anti-Semitism or delegitimising Israel
4. Loss of “market share” to other conspiracy theories
5. Inability to cope with the volume of recent Holocaust research
6. Lack of novelty
7. The ageing of the “movement”

Reasons 2 and 3 concern only neo-Nazi parties and the like. If they abandon Holocaust denial in order to become more mainstream, revisionism has nothing to lose, as it does not owe them anything in the first place. Reason 4 is unsubstantiated. Reasons 5 and 6 are wishful thinking, and they apply perfectly to the orthodox historians themselves. As for Reason 7, people may age, but ideas do not. Especially when they are backed up by the evidence.

Interestingly, the most important reason why revisionism is prevented from growing and succeeding is not listed – unless we force it into his first point of “social disapproval,” which would be a major downplaying of the issues involved:

- censorship by governments, social media platforms, media distributors and retailers, and the mass media
- denial of service by credit-card processing firms, banks, Internet service providers, etc.
- persecution through cancellation of tenancy agreements, labor and employment contracts, denial and revocation of academic degrees, etc.
- prosecution in a steadily growing number of countries, ending with fines and imprisonment of revisionists, which labels them “criminals,” turning them into the ultimate pariahs and outcasts.
- physical attacks by thugs, with government authorities looking the other way.

Now let’s see what Terry has to say about the revisionists themselves.

“Central to the codification of ‘Revisionism’ as the outright denial of the Holocaust was the French author Paul Rassinier, whose writings took on an implacably negationist stance from the end of the 1950s.” (p. 35)

Terry does not inform the reader that Rassinier had actually been a camp prisoner himself, because that would spoil his soup. He continues:

“A series of public scandals in France together with two widely publicised trials of Canadian neo-Nazi activist Ernst Zündel in 1985 and 1988 convinced ‘Revisionists’ that they now had momentum, a belief bolstered by the conversion of the right-wing popular historian David Irving to the ‘Revisionist’ cause and by a new-found emphasis on physical evidence.” (p. 36)

Those trials proved beyond any doubt that revisionism was something more than a silly conspiracy theory. Survivors were cross-examined for the first time, as well as the “Holocaust Pope” himself, Raul Hilberg. The pressure put on them by the defense attorney by a fusillade of precise questions was so much that both refused to appear for the second trial. Unsurprisingly, Terry neglects to mention any of this.

“This ‘forensic turn’ in negationism, exemplified by the infamous Leuchter report and its tests of cyanide traces in the ruins of the gas chambers of Birkenau, marked a shift from the pseudohistory of Rassinier and Faurisson towards pseudoscientific argumentation. After the errors of the Leuchter report were swiftly exposed, German negationists tried to improve on the gambit with a new forensic report by a young German doctoral student of chemistry, Germar Rudolf, whose ‘Rudolf Report’ helped sustain a prolonged propaganda offensive in reunified Germany during the first half of the 1990s.” (p. 37)

Terry does not bother to explain what exactly is pseudoscientific about focusing on physical evidence. Furthermore, the Leuchter Report, aside from some deficiencies, remains in principle unrefuted, as well as the Rudolf Report.

“Since 2000, the most prominent negationist researchers have been the Italian negationist Carlo Mattogno, active since 1985, the Swiss anti-Semite Jürgen Graf, active since the early 1990s, and the Swedish writer Thomas Kues (a pseudonym), the sole author of any note to emerge in third-phase ‘Revisionism’. Mattogno in particular stands out for his hyperproductivity, having authored or co-authored close to 50 books and pamphlets in 30 years. Unlike the overwhelming majority of ‘Revisionist’ authors, Mattogno, Graf and Kues (MGK) cite primary sources and have conducted archival research, yet none of them is in fact a properly trained historian, nor does any of them possess more than a Master’s degree in any other discipline. Thus, while MGK have undoubtedly raised the quality of negationist research to a new level, this has come at the expense of an increasing isolation and inability to communicate their ideas to other ‘Revisionists’, much less mainstream academics.” (p. 41)

Here we go again. Don’t pay attention to those deniers, they are not real historians, blah, blah, blah. Unfortunately, there is one little problem with this – or rather, there are three little problems:

One: This knife cuts both ways. Neither Hilberg nor Pressac, Lipstadt, Rees, van Pelt or Shermer, to name only a few, are “properly trained” historians. Yet this doesn’t stop their works from being considered “standard” in the field.

Two: Many times being a properly trained historian is not nearly enough. When a plane crashes, we do not turn to historians for answers. It’s the job of the qualified investigators to find out what happened. The same is true for any event. The situation may call for a trained chemist, physicist, doctor, archaeologist, navigator, engineer, geologist, astronomer, etc. Not only do orthodox Holocaust historians possess none of these qualifications, they never even bother with such things. They are, as Dr. Faurisson put it, only paper historians.

Three: Something overlooked and always taken for granted: The most important qualification of a historian, and a scientist in general, is SINCERITY. No university in the world will train you to tell the truth. There is no degree in Sincerity. Training will give you the tools and some of the knowledge. But these won't stop you from lying if you wish – or if “social disapproval” – meaning threats of persecution and prosecution – move you to lie.

As for Terry's remark of MGK being unable to communicate their ideas to other revisionists and mainstream academics, it's one more instance of his wishful thinking. Revisionists know from anonymous and confidential feedback that some mainstream academics are listening. They don't speak out because they all realize they have to remain silent or even keep lying in order to avoid falling victim to “social disapproval.”

“Pseudoscholarly ‘Revisionism’ bears all the hallmarks of a ‘degenerating research programme’, to use the terminology of the philosopher of science Imre Lakatos. In this regard, negationism mirrors a common tendency among conspiracy theory pseudoscholarship more generally. Not only are there simply fewer ‘Revisionist’ researchers, but their books have lengthened as the gurus are forced to confront a larger body of evidence for the Holocaust. Moreover, denier research remains resolutely negationist, with significantly more effort expended attacking eyewitnesses, documents and forensic evidence generally thought to prove mass murder than in locating any evidence that might support ‘Revisionist’ conspiracy claims about Allied and Soviet manipulation, or which might prove an alternative explanation of the fate of the Jews in Nazi and Axis hands.” (p. 42)

First, there is no “larger body of evidence for the Holocaust.” Revisionists simply cover more and more topics in greater detail, while orthodox historians keep repeating the same things again and again. Second, the term “negationist” is clear misinformation. A real negationist stance is usually expressed in the form “I don't believe this”. You can't fill book after book with such a stance. Revisionism is about setting the record straight. What happened and what did not. Zyklon was for killing lice, not prisoners. Furnaces were for cremation, not erasing the traces. Or put more simply: Santa Claus does not bring the presents. The parents do. Third, Terry's hallucinations on “‘Revisionist’ conspiracy claims about Allied and Soviet manipulation” are misleading. Revisionists researchers don't claim that there was such a conspiracy. The development of the orthodox Holocaust narrative was a highly complex process which cannot be explained by any kind of conspiracy.

“All of the remaining negationist gurus combine a deep and abiding ignorance of the overwhelming majority of recent Holocaust research with ad hominem attacks on historians and an obsessive ‘refutational’ style aimed at real or hallucinated debate partners, something which also marks out other ‘revisionist’ schools of history writing. Yet these arguments are largely howled into the void, since the response to MGK's work has been a deafening silence from academics. This in turn has led MGK to believe they are really onto something, in a classic illustration of the topsy-turvy circular logic of fringe pseudoscholars, since the lack of response from academics must mean that historians cannot refute the negationist gurus.” (p. 43)

Of course, Terry does not give any examples of these supposed ad hominem attacks against historians. As for the deafening silence of academics, revisionists do not need any topsy-turvy logic. The at-best-average response by Shermer and Grobman as well as the way-below-average response by Lipstadt prove that academics have thrown in the towel.

So finally, who is this Nick Terry anyway? How many customers does he have? Well, despite being a university lecturer, for many years Terry has been nothing but a blogger. His output is practically zero. His only contribution is a response to revisionists available only as a downloadable pdf file. Academics totally ignore him. The revisionists, on the other hand, not being so cruel, devoted a considerable effort to his work, publishing an entire two-volume book in response. On this, Terry comments in a footnote:

“A 1396-page response appeared in the autumn of 2013, bloated to more than twice the length of the refutation by ‘fisking’ it paragraph by paragraph, rendering the response largely unreadable.” (p. 43)

Too long to be readable? Is that what properly trained historians are taught? Well, send him a postcard next time.

As a final note, Terry was supposed to publish the book Auschwitz: The Practice of Extinction in 2016. So far it appears on Amazon UK with no price and as “Currently Unavailable.” Of course, we’ll be here if and when it eventually becomes available. Until then, so much for the properly trained historian Dr. Terry.

Dealing with Denial

As already noted, the rest of the book is about legal matters. But a few things from Chapter 15 written by Paul Behrens are worth mentioning. First, Behrens begins with the following:

“The disturbing effect of denialism manifests itself in various forms. One of its most troubling aspects must be seen in the implied message that it typically carries: that the survivors of grave atrocities are dishonest about their own experiences. Where such statements are made publicly or are directly addressed at victims, their consequences can be devastating: they impose new suffering on those who already have to deal with the traumatic consequences of the inhumane treatment to which they had been subjected in the past.” (p. 230)

Revisionists avoid implying. They justify their claims with documented facts. And as has been shown, most of the survivors are not deliberately dishonest. They are just victims of rumors and hearsay. But there have been deliberately dishonest individuals as well. [A recent example is one Joseph Hirt\[3\]](#) who gave public speeches in schools claiming to be an Auschwitz survivor. But his story turned out to be a complete fabrication. He was exposed by a history teacher who obviously would not agree with Behrens. Unfortunately, in science, logic comes before sentiment, whether we like it or not.

“For one, the ideas to which deniers subscribe do not disappear merely because their expression has been made punishable. Lechtholz-Zey is right when she points out that, in the age of the internet, the relevant ideas remain merely a mouse click away, and with that, the recruitment of new followers remains a reality. But even in societies in which denialism has no strong basis in the population, the link between the weakness of the movement and the threat of legal sanction is not a foregone conclusion. The fact that an average member of society might not fall prey to the efforts of deniers, may indeed have more to do with the educational efforts of the State (and the overwhelming force of the facts) than with the adoption of criminalisation. Crediting the criminal justice system with successes of this kind, means putting confidence in the law which the law may not deserve.” (p. 241)

To his credit, Behrens admits that laws against denial may not have the desired effect. His suggestions are worth quoting in full:

“But if the law is not the solution, alternatives must be offered that may achieve more efficient results. Various options have been explored in this chapter, but the most convincing approach might require a combination of several methods. It is suggested that the following aspects have an impact on this consideration. First, genocide and Holocaust denial takes place in different societies and in different contexts. The identification of the most appropriate ratio of methods to counter denialism is therefore dependent on situational parameters. In some societies, the widespread nature of denial may require more of a communal effort, including a heightened emphasis on public education and the establishment of institutions capable of reaching out to society as a whole. Where denialism is promoted merely by a small minority within a society, the focus might shift to options for dealing with the leaders and followers of that movement. Second, not all deniers are cut from the same cloth. The political leader who built a following on denialism, the author whose prominence relies on denialist ideology, act from motivations which differ from those at the bottom of the movement, who may often not have given much thought to the evidence of the atrocities or indeed to the consequences of denialist activities. Genuine curiosity may occasionally be encountered in the latter group, but cannot be expected in the former, and the appropriate methods of dealing with the conduct of deniers will therefore have to vary accordingly. Third, even within a particular target group, a detailed assessment of the available methods is indispensable. The impact of an academic article on a juvenile delinquent may be doubted; the showing of a film on the atrocities that he denied might be more effective; the confrontation with actual physical remnants of international crimes and meetings with survivors have carried some success in the past. Fine-tuning these approaches is key to the development of a persuasive response mechanism; and that in turn requires a certain insight into the psychological conditioning of the followers of denialism. Since the disassociation from ‘mainstream society’ is often at the core of their ideology, the success of any option to counter denialism might well be measured not by the degree to which their exclusion from the community has been achieved, but by the degree to which society has managed to effect their reintegration.” (p. 249)

Very good. If only Professor Behrens could convince some politicians...

Conclusion

This is a quite predictable book. There is no attempt to refute the revisionists, nor a clear presentation of their ideas. Instead we find the usual misinformation and slanders, and all this, sadly, by university professors and academics. Some contributors try to save the day, although not much. But then again, considering the threat of “social disapproval” hanging over everyone who doesn’t scream “bloody murder” at the sight of a revisionist, that's probably all we could expect. At least the cover design is pretty neat.

Notes

Homage to Fred Leuchter, the Alleged Impostor and True Engineer

by Andrea Carancini

Abstract

This year, 2018, marks the 30th anniversary of the Leuchter Report, the expert report compiled by Fred A. Leuchter on the rooms at the Auschwitz, Birkenau and Majdanek Camps commonly referred to as “gas chambers.” In this contribution, I will not deal with the merits of Leuchter’s Report, on which rivers of ink have been poured out. In this regard, I limit myself to pointing all interested parties to the critical edition of Leuchter’s reports edited by Gernar Rudolf. What I propose, instead, is to examine Leuchter’s professional qualifications, about which many falsehoods have been promoted in an attempt to denigrate and discredit the aforementioned Report.

The Genesis of the Leuchter Report

It all started with the trials staged in the 1980s against Canadian revisionist of German origin Ernst Zündel. In 1981, Zündel – who died a few months ago, in August 2017 – had republished Richard Harwood’s revisionist brochure: Did Six Million Really Die?. During a first trial, in 1985, Zündel was sentenced to fifteen months in prison. The verdict was overturned in 1987. A new trial began in January 1988. Zündel instructed his lawyer’s assistant Barbara Kulaszka to contact the chief wardens of several U.S. prisons in an attempt to convince them to come to court and to explain to the jury the operation of a homicidal gas chamber. Bill Armontrout, head warden of the Jefferson City (Missouri) penitentiary agreed to come and testify that no one in the United States knew more about how gas chambers worked than the Boston technician Fred Leuchter. Subsequently, the French professor Dr. Robert Faurisson, who at the time was Zündel’s defense advisor, went to visit Leuchter. Leuchter agreed to come to Toronto to examine the documentation on the Nazi “gas chambers” collected by Zündel and Faurisson. Then, as Faurisson writes:[\[1\]](#)

“After that, at Zündel’s expense, he [Leuchter] left for Poland with a secretary (his wife), a draftsman, a video-cameraman and an interpreter. He came back and drew up a 192-page report (including appendices). He also brought back 32 samples taken, on the one hand, from the crematories of Auschwitz and Birkenau at the site of the homicidal ‘gassings’ and, on the other hand, in a disinfection gas chamber at Birkenau. His conclusion was simple: there had never been any homicidal gassings at Auschwitz, Birkenau, or Majdanek.

On April 20 and 21, 1988, Fred Leuchter appeared on the witness stand in the Toronto courtroom. He told the story of his investigation and presented his conclusions.”

Fred Leuchter According to Wikipedia

Some falsehoods on behalf of Fred Leuchter can be found in the homonymous entry at Wikipedia. Before examining them, however, it is pertinent to make a caveat. The Wikipedia text contains expressions such as “practicing engineering” and “professional engineer.” It must be kept in mind that in most other languages, the term engineer refers exclusively to individuals who have an academic degree in engineering, whereas in the English language it has a far broader meaning. In addition to academic engineers, the term can also refer to any kind of technician.<sup>[2]</sup>

Let’s now see what Wikipedia writes in the paragraph “Education and career” (all emphases are mine):

“Leuchter received a Bachelor of Arts degree in history from Boston University in 1964. He holds patents for a geodetic instrument and an electronic sextant. In 1991 Leuchter faced charges of practicing engineering without a license issued by the Board of Registration of Professional Engineers and of Land Surveyors, which regulates professional engineers, a violation of Massachusetts law. As a result of those charges, Leuchter signed a consent decree with the board, in which he stated that he was not and had never been registered as a professional engineer, despite having represented himself as one. He settled with prosecutors by serving two years of probation and agreeing to stop disseminating documents in which he presented himself as an engineer, including the Leuchter Report. In a speech given over a year later, Leuchter claimed that:

a spurious criminal complaint was filed against me in the Massachusetts court system with the intent of destroying my reputation by putting me in prison for three months.

In point of fact, a license is not required in Massachusetts, or any other state, unless the engineer is involved in construction of buildings, and is certifying compliance with specifications. [...]

As confirmation of the spurious nature of this charge, it should be pointed out there are more than fifty thousand practicing engineers in Massachusetts, of whom only five thousand are licensed. Although the state’s licensing law has been in effect since 1940, there has been no record of any prosecution for this offense.”

On all this, I contacted – via Facebook – the same Leuchter, and here’s what he answered:<sup>[3]</sup>

“I was illegally charged with practicing as a licensed engineer. You needn’t be licensed to be an engineer. I never represented myself as licensed. There was a consent agreement between myself, the DA [District Attorney] and the Board of Engineers. Since I never represented myself as licensed, that did and does not apply. The Agreement prevented the DA and the Jewish organization from persecuting me. I agreed never to say I was licensed for a two year period unless I became licensed. The Licensing Board was required to accept my application for licensing and to issue said license based on my background, if I applied. I did not wish to be licensed then or now (state interference).”

So much from Leuchter. For my part, I observe that the document signed at the time by Leuchter was a consent decree, a settlement agreement that does not include an admission of guilt on the part of the person concerned. Therefore, it seems unlikely that he was given “probation,” which instead presupposes guilt (and a conviction).

Francesco Rotondi’s Slanders

In November 2005, Francesco Rotondi, cardiologist at the San Giuseppe Moscati Hospital in Avellino, published a book titled Honeymoon at Auschwitz: Reflections on Holocaust Denial.<sup>[4]</sup> It is a full-fledged anti-revisionist libel, filled not only with falsehoods, but also with pure slander against revisionists. At the time, Carlo Mattogno responded to this book for his part. Mattogno’s answer, however exhaustive it may be, concerned almost exclusively the objections brought against his own work. It did not take into consideration the poisonous ad hominem attacks made by Rotondi against Zündel and Leuchter.<sup>[5]</sup> I try to respond to these, despite the time that has passed, first of all because Rotondi’s book was favorably received by Italy’s academia (before being published by an Italian science publisher, it had been presented as a thesis) and also because I think it is always useful to show the bias of revisionism’s detractors.

The two sections of Rotondi’s book that interest us here are as follows:

1. “The Leuchter Report or the Honeymoon at Auschwitz by a So-called Engineer” (“Il Rapporto Leuchter ovvero la luna di miele ad Auschwitz di un sedicente ingegnere,” pp. 67-70) and
2. “Leuchter’s credibility” (“La credibilità di Leuchter,” pp. 70-73).

Rotondi begins as follows (all emphases are mine):

“It is the well-known French revisionist, the scholar Robert Faurisson, who comes up with the idea of scientifically demonstrating the inexistence of the gas chambers, a subject he had been working on for some time. He chooses as an ‘expert’ the American Fred A. Leuchter, who called himself a chief engineer, although he never graduated in engineering, and who presented himself as a ‘specialist in the design and manufacture’ of gas chambers intended for the implementation of capital punishment in the USA. In February 1988, thanks to a large sum paid by neo-Nazi Ernst Zündel, he was sent to Poland. His fresh bride Carolyn, an industrial designer who incredibly speaks of it as her honeymoon, an interpreter and a cameraman, a friend of Zündel, also participate in the expedition.”

In a footnote, Rotondi defines the agreement between Leuchter and the Board of Engineers as “judicial plea bargain.”

In the second section under review here, Rotondi’s claim that Leuchter boasted to have a degree in engineering is the first slander in that section. From the text of the agreement it is clear that the dispute did not concern a graduate degree but Leuchter’s failure to register with the Board of Engineers. If Leuchter had indeed boasted of such a degree, there would have been no agreement, and he would have gone straight to prison. From this point of view, it is also tendentious to have defined the aforementioned “Consent Decree” as a “judicial plea bargaining,” which instead presupposes both an admission of guilt and a subsequent conviction.

From the choice of sources on which Rotondi based his study, I conclude that he knows the English language. But then, he should know that the English term “engineer” corresponds only partially to what Europeans mean when using that term. That the English term “engineer” can also refer to a “specialized technician” is stated in all dictionaries. Hence, Rotondi has no excuse whatsoever. As to the fact that Leuchter has defined the expedition to Poland as his honeymoon, we need to clarify: Rotondi’s source for this is evidently Errol Morris’s movie *Mr. Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter Jr.*, a documentary that has Leuchter as its protagonist. Well, Rotondi omits to report the full sentence stated by Leuchter (starting at 31:04):

“We were married for less than a month when we went. Although she doesn’t like to hear it, I normally tell her: that was her honeymoon. That’s not a particular good place to go for a honeymoon – Poland.”

When it comes to putting a revisionist in a bad light, they evidently latch on to everything. Rotondi then continues by targeting the person who had commissioned the Leuchter Report (all emphases mine):

“Ernst Zündel is a folkloric and boisterous German neo-Nazi fugitive in Canada, who was being prosecuted at the time for spreading Harwood’s negationist booklet Did six million really die?, a big man who likes to perform in public dressed up in various carnival attires and who protests, surrounded by equally ridiculous bodyguards, by parading with a cross on his shoulders or even by wearing a Jewish camp uniform, with the telephone number on a hard hat.”

To complete his denigration of Zündel, Rotondi adds in a footnote that “Zündel is, among other things, the author of two curious volumes: UFO’s: Nazi Secret Weapons, and The Hitler We Loved and Why, whose titles alone are indicative.”

First of all, Zündel did not “flee” to Canada but emigrated there (from Germany). Rotondi could have easily found this fact even on Wikipedia’s entry dedicated to Ernst Zündel. In fact, it seems unlikely that he did not consult that entry, but as Francesco Bacone used to say: “slander, slander, something will remain.” To fathom the pettiness of Rotondi’s polemics, however, we need to say a few words about Zündel’s life. Ernst Zündel was a talented (and successful) graphic designer who could have comfortably enjoyed the fruits of his profession (even financially), but because of his intellectual generosity, he ended up being persecuted and prosecuted for a good part of his life. In 1984, Sabina Citron, a Jewess who is the founder and spokesman of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, provoked violent demonstrations against him in Canada. As Prof. Faurisson wrote:[\[6\]](#)

“The Canadian postal service, treating Revisionism the way it treats pornography, refused him all service and all right to receive mail. Zündel only recovered his postal rights after a year of judicial procedures. In the meantime, his business has failed. At the instigation of Sabina Citron, the Attorney General of Ontario filed a complaint against Zündel for publishing a ‘false statement, tale or news.’ The charge was based on the following reasoning: the defendant had abused his right to freedom of expression; by distributing the Harwood pamphlet, he was spreading information that he knew was false; in fact, he could not fail to be aware that the ‘genocide of the Jews’ and the ‘gas chambers’ were an established fact.”

Rotondi speaks of boisterous behaviors and “carnival” attire, but we must understand that at the time Zündel was fighting for his life. He survived at least three attacks on his person, including a devastating arson attack against his home. It is true that he paraded with a cross on his shoulders (as you can see in the aforementioned film by Morris), but Rotondi “forgets” to mention a significant detail: on the cross brought by Zündel there was a scroll saying “Freedom of Speech,” the very freedom of speech that Jewish organizations wanted and still want to deny anyone who dares to challenge their power. Zündel’s bodyguards were anything but ridiculous, since every time he entered the court, Zündel risked physical assault. But I am unaware that he ever wore a Jewish camp uniform; there is no trace of it in Morris’s film. As for the two volumes “whose titles alone are indicative” according to Rotondi: the first one on UFOs “was nothing more than popular fiction to build publicity for Samisdat,” as Zündel stated in an interview:

“I realized that North Americans were not interested in being educated. They want to be entertained. The book was for fun. With a picture of the Führer on the cover and flying saucers coming out of Antarctica it was a chance to get on radio and TV talk shows. [...] And that was my chance to talk about what I wanted to talk about.”

As to the second book, the Italian Wikipedia entry on Zündel states that he denied authorship of that book. It is not easy to be more biased than Wikipedia when it comes to revisionism, but Rotondi evidently succeeded in that.

Let’s go back to Leuchter. Rotondi wrote (p. 69):

“Leuchter’s ‘expert report’ would not suffice to save him [Zündel] from a 9-month prison term, because it was to be rejected by the judges of the Toronto Court for the following reason: He was not any expert (was not competent).”

In a footnote, Rotondi reports: “Official transcript of the Zündel Trial, p. 9052.”

In this regard I contacted Rotondi via Facebook and I asked him to send me a scan of the aforementioned transcript page, but Rotondi evidently believed it was better not to respond. The reason for this may be, because he culled that quote from another source without due verification? In any case, reading Barbara Kulaszka's book 'Did Six Million Really Die?' (not to be confused with Harwood's booklet), which is a meticulous and very extensive documentation of that trial, reality seems to be a little different. As for Fred Leuchter's testimony, there are three paragraphs that deserve to be quoted in full:[\[7\]](#)

“[Judge] Thomas held that Leuchter could give oral evidence but that the report itself was not going to be filed. (32-9032) He held Leuchter was not a chemist or a toxicologist. (32-9034) He further held that Leuchter was an engineer because he had made himself an engineer in a very limited area. (32-9048)

Thomas stated that Leuchter's opinion in the report was that there were never any gassings or exterminations carried on in the facilities. He held that Leuchter was not capable of giving that opinion. (32-9049) Nor was he capable of testifying regarding the results of the analysis of the samples. His testimony was restricted to the taking of the samples and who he turned them over to. (32-9047, 9048) Leuchter was allowed to testify with respect to his own work, his observations of the camps and the information he had gathered concerning the facilities, and whether the facilities were feasible as gas chambers. (32-9054) Defence counsel was instructed not to refer to the Leuchter Report during the in-chief examination. Thomas held that Leuchter had no expertise whatsoever in crematories and disallowed any testimony relating to crematories. (32-9052, 9054)

Fred A. Leuchter was qualified as an expert in the design, construction, maintenance and operation of execution gas chambers. He was allowed to give opinion evidence on the operation of gas chambers and the suitability of the facilities he inspected in Poland to operate as gas chambers. (32-9062,

“Thomas held that Leuchter had no expertise whatsoever in crematories and disallowed any testimony relating to crematories.” This is the entire sentence that Rotondi speciously truncated in half. Moreover, the same Judge Thomas, although far from being well-disposed toward the defense, recognized that Leuchter had the qualification of an engineer and was expert on gas chambers. And Rotondi cannot claim that he does not know Kulaszka’s book, since he mentions it in a note on page 68!

But that’s not all. As for his qualifications as an engineer, Leuchter specified during the cross-examination conducted by the public prosecutor<sup>[8]</sup> that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and the Department of Drug Enforcement had recognized him by issuing two medical licenses, and also “the United States Navy in all of the work he had done with them on navigational instrumentation.”

Continuing with what Rotondi wrote, we find another slander against the American engineer on p. 71 of his section on Leuchter’s credibility:

“Even the simple qualification, which is self-attributed, of being an ‘expert specializing in the design and manufacture of devices for capital punishment,’ above all by means of gas chambers, belongs into the realm of fairy tales.”

We have just seen how Leuchter’s qualification in this regard was recognized by Judge Thomas. But, also during the Toronto trial, there was yet another element that Rotondi hides from his readers: the testimony of Bill M. Armontrout, at that time chief warden at the Missouri State Penitentiary in Jefferson City:<sup>[9]</sup>

“Armontrout testified that there was only one consultant in the United States that he knew of in the design, operation, and maintenance of gas chambers. That consultant was Fred Leuchter. (32-8896)”

Even the New York Times recognized Leuchter’s expertise in this regard in a prominent article of October 13, 1990, and in a follow-up article on June 13, 1991 about the settlement between Leuchter and the Massachusetts Board of Registration of Professional Engineers and Land Surveyors, the New York Times wrote, “was once one of the nation’s leading advisers on the administering of capital punishment.” The problem for Leuchter was that, the NYT writer stated right afterwards, that Leuchter “angered Holocaust survivors with articles in which he contended that historians had inflated the number of victims of the Nazis.”<sup>[10]</sup>

Rotondi, however, insists (p. 71):

“In his Report and later in his testimony during the Zündel Trial, he had declared before the Court that he had worked, by virtue of his skills, as a consultant for Missouri, California and North Carolina. The director of the St. Quentin prison (California), Vasquez, quoted by Leuchter, stated instead that his prison had never had any relationship with him, and Gary T. Dixon, director of the North Carolina prison, argued that his penitentiary had never used Leuchter’s assistance either.”

Let’s start by saying that, in his Report, Leuchter does not name any of the prisons cited by Rotondi. He claims only that he designed hardware in the United States used in the execution of convicts using hydrogen cyanide gas. As for his testimony during the Zündel Trial, Leuchter testified:<sup>[11]</sup>

“Leuchter testified that he was a consultant to the states of South Carolina and Missouri with respect to the operation of gas chambers used for prisoner executions, and was currently under contract with the state of Missouri to completely reconstruct their gas chamber.”

Kulaszka’s documentation contains neither a trace of Vasquez’s testimony nor of Dixon’s testimony. Rotondi refers in this regard to an entry of the anti-revisionist Nizkor website, which claims to quote the persons in question without, however, giving any sources for it. Rather, it must be kept in mind that at that time the prison wardens with whom Leuchter worked were warned and threatened by Jewish organizations, as Leuchter himself reported:[\[12\]](#)

“I have been vilified both privately and publicly in all forms of the media. My clients have been cajoled and threatened into not dealing with me. [...]

At Klarsfeld’s initiative, [...] they began to threaten prison wardens with political consequences if they dealt with me.”

Revisionist historian Mark Weber wrote in the same vein:[\[13\]](#)

“The most insidious (and effective) effort has been a behind-the-scenes campaign to destroy his livelihood by pressuring state governments to stop employing him as their execution hardware engineer. To allow Leuchter to continue working for the state, declared Illinois Representative Ellis Levin (D-Chicago), ‘would be an affront to the Jewish community.’ (Chicago Daily Law Bulletin, August 17, 1990.)”

There is no trace of all this in Rotondi’s book. He instead writes (pp. 71f.):

“Leuchter is a strange guy, has a raspy voice and chuckles continuously for no reason, showing his teeth yellowed by nicotine ... He takes selfies without restraint with a noose around his neck and tied up in an electric chair, boasting with contract relationships, expert reports and degrees without worrying the least about being exposed as a liar.”

That sentence is not criticism but real character assassination. And yet, in this case it is Rotondi himself who is not the least worried about being exposed as a liar. Even in this sentence, there is no dearth of lies. Anyone who has watched Errol Morris’s documentary will have noticed that Leuchter’s voice is absolutely normal, and that he does not chuckle continuously for no reason. (I am also unaware whether Leuchter has ever been photographed with the noose around his neck).

Finally, I venture to doubt that Faurisson, in an article for the French weekly Rivarol, spoke of Leuchter as a “genius” (p. 72). Rotondi provides neither the issue nor the page number. Another copied and pasted quote without verification?

Rotondi’s Libels Regurgiated by Prof. Aldo Giannuli

In 2009, Italian scholar Aldo Giannuli published a book titled The Public Abuse of History: How and Why Political Power Falsifies the Past.<sup>[14]</sup> As we read on the Book's flaps, Prof. Giannuli is a researcher of contemporary history at the University of Milan.<sup>[15]</sup> He was a consultant for the prosecutor's offices in Bari, Milan (on the Piazza Fontana massacre), Pavia, Brescia (on the Piazza della Loggia massacre), Rome and Palermo. From 1994 to 2001, he collaborated with the Italian Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry on Terrorism in Italy and on the causes of the failure to identify those responsible for the massacres.

Therefore, he is not an "amateur" (as is the self-confessing Rotondi) but a scholar of clear fame. Unfortunately, however, the level of his approach to revisionism (and, in particular, to Leuchter) is identical to that of Rotondi, and indeed, it seems that he took cues from him. In Giannuli's book, the third chapter, which is dedicated to the (alleged) refutation of revisionism is titled "The Tribunalization of History" ("La tribunalizzazione della storia"). Giannuli deals with the Leuchter Report on pages 115-117, from which I take the following quote (all emphases are mine):

"On examining its merit, this report has been taken apart completely. Moreover, Leuchter admitted not to be an engineer but a graduate in philosophy, that he based his research exclusively on the works of Robert Faurisson, and that the publisher Zündel commissioned and financed his trip to Poland. In short, Leuchter was merely an indisputable crook. In spite of this, his report has nevertheless remained one of the deniers' basic texts. Leuchter's affirmations prompted understandable indignation of camp survivors; his false credentials moreover attracted the mass media's attention, overshadowing the issue of merit. On the other hand, this is in the logic of the mass media: saying that a certain guy is an impostor who boasts to have titles he does not possess takes a headline of two lines, but in order to say that in the gas chambers of Auschwitz five times more people could enter than Leuchter counted, a headline is not enough.”

One single observation is due here: if anyone is a crook and an impostor here, it surely is not Leuchter. Moreover, it is not true that Leuchter based his research exclusively “on the works of Robert Faurisson.” Actually, Leuchter wrote four expert reports in total, and his fourth report is dedicated to a technical evaluation of Jean-Claude Pressac’s magnum opus, Technique and Operation of the Gas Chambers.<sup>[16]</sup>

To conclude, although it certainly is true that a headline does not suffice to elaborate on the problems raised by the (first) Leuchter Report, the three paltry – and pitiful – pages dedicated to it by Giannuli aren’t enough either, just as the other three pages dedicated by Giannuli to revisionism in general (his pages 112-114) are not enough compared to the monumental historiographical and scientific work published in recent years by authors such as Carlo Mattogno and Germar Rudolf.

Rather, one wonders: how come, when it comes to revisionism, even authors like Giannuli (but I also think of Giovanni Fasanella) who are used to “flying high,” end up sinking below sea level?

On Leuchter’s Competence

Fred Leuchter is not only an engineer but also an inventor who owns several patents. I found interesting news about him in the article by Mark Weber titled “Fred Leuchter: Courageous Defender of Historical Truth”:<sup>[17]</sup>

“Since 1965, he has worked as an engineer on projects having to do with electrical, optical, mechanical, navigational and surveying problems. He holds patents in the fields of optics, navigation, encoding, geodetic surveying and surveying instrumentation, including patents on sextants, surveying instruments and optical instrument encoders.

From 1965 through 1970 he was the technical director for a firm in Boston, where he specialized in airborne, opto-electronic, and photographic surveillance equipment. He designed the first low-level, color, stereo-mapping system for use in a helicopter, which has become an airborne standard.

In 1970, he formed an independent consulting firm. During his period with this firm, he designed and built the first electronic sextant and developed a unique, light-weight, compact and inexpensive optical drum sector encoder for use with surveying and measuring instruments. He also built the first electronic sextant for the US Navy. He has worked on and designed astro trackers utilized in the on-board guidance systems of ICBM missiles.

Because of his work in navigational devices he has had hands-on experience with surveying and geodetic measuring equipment and a thorough knowledge of map-reading and cartography. He is trained in reading and interpreting aerial photographs. He designed a computerized transit for surveying use, and several years ago he developed the first low-cost personal telephone monitor.”

Conclusion

Since it was written, the Leuchter Report has been the object of many criticisms:

sometimes honest, often dishonest. Of course, it contains some flaws which the revisionists themselves have detected, but being a pioneering work, this was inevitable. What I wanted to point out here, however, is that it is still the work of an expert who had every right to express his dispassionate opinion, a right that Jewish organizations and many societies have tried ruthlessly to infringe upon as a warning to everyone, experts and non-experts alike, who dares to speak out freely and frankly on the greatest taboo of our time.

How the Standard Holocaust Narrative Got off the Ground

by Ezra Macvie

Commandant in Auschwitz: Rudolf Höss, His Torture and His Forced Confessions. Carlo Mattogno and Rudolf Höss, English translation by Germar Rudolf. Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, U.K, 2017, trade paperback, 402 pp.

Carlo Mattogno, Rudolf Höss, Commandant of Auschwitz: Rudolf Höss, His Torture and His Forced Confessions, Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, UK, Nov. 2017; 402 pages pb, 6"×9", bibliography, index, ISBN: 9781591481911. Read it free of charge or purchase a hard copy here.

Hellishly flaming crematoria. Lines of doomed Jews trudging through the snow from cattle cars. Heartless selections. Gas chambers! It's all part of the gruesome furniture with which the minds of going on three generations of Westerners have been filled since the swastika flag finally came down for the last time. The insanely cruel and destructive assault upon Jewry by every non-Jew in Germany is indelibly branded upon the knowledge of every Westerner—including Germans—from childhood.

Like success itself, the wildly successful story of the Six Million has many authors,<sup>[1]</sup> whose ranks at this late remove still show no signs of slowing in their phenomenal growth. But pride of place in the composition and certification of the Greatest Crime in History may belong to the unfortunate SS Lieutenant Colonel from Baden-Baden whom the British nabbed in occupied Germany almost a year after the end of the war and charged with crimes committed during his tenure as commandant of the concentration camp at Auschwitz. Over the ensuing 401 days and nights, Obersturmbannführer Höss admitted to practically all the charges and obligingly if not credibly supplied virtually the entire outline of the Holocaust Story that reigns (literally, by law) supreme everywhere in the Western world to this day. He not only authoritatively supplied the horrifying, fascinating details, he did it mostly in 1946, that is, very early in the game, and he willingly signed a total of 85 affidavits and depositions in German, English and Polish—so many in fact that voluminous quotations from these qualify him to be named as co-author of the book here reviewed. His own co-author, maestro massimo of the Holocaust Carlo Mattogno, was born six years after Höss's death by hanging at the hands of Polish executioners in that very same Auschwitz—by then reverted to its Polish name of Oswiecim—of which he had had charge for years during World War II.

Few authors indeed in the history of the written word could be said to have as profoundly influenced the content of popular belief around the world than this devoted family man who resided with his wife and five children in a house on the very grounds of the “death camp” he is said to have commanded during the war. Just how this came to be in the years following his execution would be a fascinating chronicle whose particulars would surely rival those of the aftermath of the Crucifixion, though with execration, rather than veneration, for the martyr at the heart of the story. But that is not the book here reviewed.

The first matter addressed by this paragon of meticulous historiography is exactly what Höss said (wrote, attested to), how he said it, where and when. The full-depth approach taken here—the signature approach taken by Mattogno in whatever subject he investigates—enables the reader both to trace the unfolding of what is largely Höss’s creation and to observe the glaring inconsistencies between successive presentations of the same subject, a process the author defers to Part II, the larger part by a slight margin of this magisterial work. Doing this obviously required, along with inexhaustible patience, careful scrutiny and a steel-trap memory for thousands of details, but fluency in at least English, German and Polish. Mattogno wrote in Italian and did not rely on translators for the source languages. English-language material is quoted verbatim, while translations from source material in other languages was translated into English directly from the source language.

It is chiefly in Part I that the damning specifics of Höss’s odyssey through the horror-house of vengeance erected and operated by the victorious Allies in Europe is described, beginning with the terrorization of Höss’s wife and children to extract information permitting Höss’s own capture and continuing with the torture that dominated the first weeks of Höss’s time in Allied captivity. The lessons taught Höss in the benefits of cooperation with his captors are vividly portrayed in the descriptions of his handling. By the time in late 1946 when Höss was transferred to (Communist) Polish authorities, Höss had apparently mastered the life-or-death art of eliciting less-cruel, if not actually gentle, treatment from those who obviously wanted crackling good testimony from their prize captive. If only in behalf of his still-threatened family, Höss seems to have developed a large appetite for decent treatment; that in satisfying it, he condemned present and future generations of his countrymen to inextinguishable guilt and calumny seems not to have occurred to him, and indeed it would seem that such an outlandish eventuality would not have occurred to any reasonable person, even one not subject to the irresistible incentives that Defendant Höss was subject to.

The scholarly “heavy lifting” is undertaken in Part II, where the content of Höss’s testimony is analyzed both in relation to the context of events surrounding the testimony and to other testimony given by Höss on related matters—the fitting together of the pieces, to use the analogy of a puzzle or other such integrated whole. It is in this process that the image of a “motivated witness” becomes apparent, and the artifacts of fictional creativity emerge. Not until the last section (Conclusions) does Mattogno voice his interpretation that the “star witness” had indeed become starstruck in his role as the center of attention. Mattogno here implicitly neglects the fact that Höss remained as much concerned as ever not only for sparing himself any reprise of the torture to which he had been prolongedly subjected the previous year, but also for the continued safety of his wife and five children. Mattogno further ignores the Grand Prize to be at least theoretically hoped for by anyone in Höss’s predicament: clemency, or even mere delay in the imposition of the ultimate punishment.

Höss was ultimately hanged, and if Mattogno overlooked the notion that Höss might however unrealistically have hoped to be spared this outcome, perhaps it might be noted that Mattogno ruthlessly suppresses and expunges any and every flight of imagination from his exacting analyses without fail. Mattogno’s legendary scrupulousness in analysis of facts may be the very thing that limits him in the necessarily speculative contemplation of counterfact. But counterfact everywhere and always ultimately drives fact, so I will cite Jett Rucker’s insightful analysis on codoh.com titled “Telling Stories to Stay Alive: Rudolf Höss vs. Scheherazade,” which lays out the theory quite adequately.

In a final letter to his wife, reproduced in this book, Höss contritely tells her not only that he expects to be executed, but that he deserves to be executed. He expressed such thoughts on other occasions also recorded and cited in the book. He presumably did expect to be executed. But his saying so did not in any way increase the likelihood that he would be executed. To the contrary, if they had any effect at all on the likelihoods in play at the time, they would have militated against finally executing him. Ruling such strategies out of the condemned man’s mind would contradict Samuel Johnson’s famous quip, “Depend upon it, Sir, when a man knows he is to be hanged in a fortnight, it concentrates his mind wonderfully.”

[1] Aside from outright frauds such as Benjamin Wilkomirski, the opportunists riding this “juggernaut of conscience” include Rainer Höss, grandson of the commandant, who claims that, if magically he could somehow meet his grandfather, he would kill him.

Memories of a Thessalonian Jewess

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Erika Kounio was the editor of the book Oral Testimonies of the Jews from Thessaloniki about the Holocaust examined in an earlier article. As she was also a Holocaust survivor, we will now have a look at her own memoir, 50 Years Later: Memories of a Thessalonian Jewess.[\[1\]](#)

Kounio was deported along with her family to Birkenau on March 20, 1943 at age 15. Since she and her parents could speak German, they worked as interpreters. Later she was transferred to Auschwitz where she worked as a secretary, filling in the death registers. On January 18, 1945, when the camp was evacuated, she was sent on a “death march” to Ravensbrück, and later from there to an unknown destination. Along with other prisoners, they managed to escape and hid in a deserted barn. The Russians found them a few days later, and she eventually returned to Greece.

Despite working as a secretary, she had a really hard time at Auschwitz. But what exactly does she tell us regarding the extermination claims?

Radio Propaganda

The first interesting incident she reports is about her grandfather, before the deportation. Her grandparents lived in the Sudetenland. In 1939, they fled the country to escape the Germans, and came to Greece. Here is what happened one night:

“It must have been November, always in 1942, when in the evening – as every evening – we heard on the radio the BBC news. Everything was closed in the room, and the front door was locked. At one point, we heard the speaker saying indifferently that two Polish Jews had come to the radio station that morning who had escaped from a 'camp' named 'Lublin.' There – the speaker continued just as indifferently – they were mass killing the Jews. With no further comment, he continued with the rest of the news. I will never forget the face of my grandpa. He rose all red with eyes popped out and turned off the radio. He turned to my parents and said, 'This is English propaganda.' He had arrived here three years earlier, a hunted refugee, to find shelter in Greece, at the house of his daughter, and yet he still believed that the Germans were a superior people! And all that from London was propaganda!" (p. 64)

Perhaps her grandpa knew better?

Selection Time

After arriving at Birkenau, the usual procedure followed. Children, sick and the old were loaded onto waiting trucks:

"The people kept going onto the trucks, which left as soon as they were full. Where did they go? Unknown!" (p. 87)

When they arrived later at their block, they asked the other prisoners about this. Once again they received the all too common reply:

"For a minute there was dead silence; some started going away from us, and two or three told us the unbelievable, the unheard of: 'They are no more; they burned them all; they turned into smoke coming out of the chimneys...' Crazy, I thought, totally crazy, they've lost it, they don't know what they're saying." (p. 91)

But as usual, it didn't take too long for her to believe it as well.

The Special Treatment

Kounio gives some interesting information regarding those that were supposed to be sent to the gas chambers:

"Near the 'office' there was Block 25. It was also a barracks where they collected all those women that had gone through a 'selection.' Many times they were kept there for as much as three or four days, until they were led to the gas chamber. [...] The lists with the names of those that had gone to Block 25 had to be filled, the names had to be written quickly and correctly. [...] Here's another sample of the German meticulousness. Compose the lists with the names of 'candidates to die,' with their names written correctly, and insert them into their files." (p. 107)

She claims that this was done on every selection, whether it was a mass selection among new arrivals, or one of those carried out daily before and after work. A few pages later she adds:

"The names of all those that had gone through a selection at the Birkenau and Auschwitz camps were recorded on lists which were sent at the central offices of the P. A. [Politische Abteilung, the camp's police section] where we worked, for registration. On each one of those lists there were also written the discreet letters S.B., which means Sonder Behandlung, that is 'special treatment.' Those people who were on the S.B. lists were 'specially treated', that is killed with gas." (p. 114)

But according to the orthodox narrative, those arriving at the camp who were allegedly selected for the gas chambers were not registered anywhere. If people who had been selected were "meticulously" registered, that can only mean they were not about to enter a gas chamber. As for special treatment, and the word special in general, it appears on many documents that have nothing to do with killings.<sup>[2]</sup> Kounio also writes:

"Every time a child was born it would receive its serial number and the lists of newborns would arrive at our offices for the archives." (p. 139)

It could hardly be worse! Registration of newborns? How can this be reconciled with the extermination of the unfit?

The Extermination

So, we arrive at the main point: Extermination with poison gas. But on this critical issue, Kounio has absolutely nothing specific to say. Nothing on the gas chambers, nothing on the crematories. Number, location, operation, anything at all, are totally absent. There are only vague descriptions like this:

"They lived for some months there, when one day we learned that the Gypsy Camp had been emptied. They sent them all to the gas chambers." (p. 139)

Or this:

"Almost every day there were new arrivals, thousands. The percentage of those who entered the camp was about the same on every transport, about 200 to 500 persons at most, men and women together. The rest of the thousands went directly to the gas chambers." (p. 141)

On the same page, regarding the deportation of the Hungarian Jews in spring/summer 1944, we read:

"Thousands, many thousands arrive daily at the 'ramp' of Birkenau. From many cars they do not disembark at once, they wait endless hours inside for their turn. A 'road' was created leading from the ramp directly to the gas chambers, without passing with the trucks through the camp. The crematories are working non-stop and cannot keep up. They opened large pits; they throw wood, corpses, and set fires. They burn them there, because the crematories are not enough."

Not only the description is vague but the story about a newly built road right from the railway ramp to the gas chambers makes no sense. In fact, the railway line itself was extended in early 1944 to enter the camp alongside the camp's main road, there forming a new ramp. It ended right next to Crematoria II and III at the western end of the main road. It's clear that Kounio is repeating mere hearsay. She admits it herself:

"Another time, a woman brought us the news that infants, babies up to two or three years old, were thrown alive into the flames by the SS, into the pits they had prepared." (p. 142)

Needless to say, she believed that as well.

Summary

Kounio's memoir was first published in 1996. As she states, she decided to write 50 years after the events because more and more people were disputing the Holocaust, and there had to be a way to refute them. But if someone actually reads her book, the conclusion he will draw is that perhaps it would have been better if she had kept silent. Her own experiences do not confirm the orthodox storyline. It should be added that both she and her mother got seriously sick at the camp (her mother contracted typhus), and yet they were sent to the hospital, not the gas chamber, and they were given all the care needed to recover. Regarding her extermination claims, she does not offer any reliable information. Hence, we have yet another credible witness whose fear prevailed over reason.

Let's close with this illuminating incident:

“A kid in elementary school who visited the exhibition organized by our community in 1993 with documents, photos and various objects, all about the Holocaust, asked in his father full puzzlement: Were the Germans so dumb and kept all this evidence?” (pp. 89f.)

Myths and Their Murderers: Lorenzo Valla and Arthur Butz

by Jett Rucker

Throughout the Middle Ages and well into the Renaissance, respectable opinion held that Emperor Constantine had, sometime early in the Fourth Century AD, given his sovereignty over Rome and much of Italy to the Christian Pope of his day, Sylvanus, with the intent that this sovereignty should devolve, as time went on, to pope after pope, rather than from emperor to emperor, as it had up to that time (Constantine's imperial successors clung to this sovereignty, allegedly in contravention of this Donation, as it became known). This was, during most of the period in which it reigned, a matter of profound significance to the geopolitical contests of the day, in which popes continued to vie for territorial hegemony in much of Italy.

LAURENTIUS VALLIA

Lorenzo Valla (1407-1457)

(<https://fineartamerica.com>, photograph by Granger).

The document with which this was purportedly done was a fraud, concocted in the Eighth Century, and a priest named Lorenzo Valla published a book, De falso credita et ementite Constantini, in 1440 that proved this conclusively. Over a century later, long after Valla's death in 1457, his book was placed on the Catholic Church's Index Librorum Prohibitorum, the list of books, issuing forth from the newfangled invention of the printing press, that it was a sin to produce, distribute, buy, sell, or read (this fearsome new medium was not a factor in Valla's lifetime) in 1558. The counterfeit nature of the Donation is today subscribed to by the cognizant scholars with at least the unanimity with which climate scientists support the concept of anthropogenic global warming.

The actual death of the Myth of the Donation of Constantine is dated to about 1600, when a prominent Catholic authority declared it a nullity—160 years or more after Valla had done the job insofar as research and commitment to writing are concerned.

Arthur R. Butz<sup>[1]</sup>, then a professor of electrical engineering at Northwestern University, put the myth of what had only recently then acquired the name "Holocaust" to rest in 1976, when he published, with that damn printing press again, The Hoax of the Twentieth Century: The Case against the Presumed Extermination of European Jewry. Butz at the time was 44 years old, while Valla was 33 when his jeremiad came out. Valla at the time was an ordained priest.

It would seem, then, that the definitive work that kills the anointed myth enjoys an initial period of acceptance (or perhaps of being ignored), and thereafter encounters (or engenders) countermeasures, especially if, after the initial assault, new media (the printing press, the Internet) come to the fore with which such "alternate" points of view can gain a hearing that was once denied them.

Valla was long dead when his opus made the "enemies list" in 1559. Butz, on the contrary, was very much alive when his work, after being carried for more than 20 years, was struck from Amazon.com's offerings on March 6, 2017. He is, as author of one of the 155 revisionist books delisted by Amazon on that day, a pariah in his own time—41 years after publication, not that he hasn't been abundantly attacked less-effectively throughout that period by the enemies of sound history.

Like Valla's, Butz's work fell victim to (or benefitted from, depending on how you look at it) technological improvements in the dissemination of information subsequent to initial publication. Valla's opus appeared in 1440, some years before the printing press, and spreading literacy, enabled his words to spread farther and faster. The Pauline Index first appeared in 1559, after the printing press and its products—books, newspapers, pamphlets, etc.—had diffused to a considerable extent, and Valla's work made the cut<sup>[2]</sup>. Butz's work made it onto the Amazon bandwagon safely enough (Amazon started up in 1994), but its (downloadable) Kindle edition came along around the time of what might be deemed the Holocaust's current "supernova" period beginning perhaps around 1992, when Germany enacted its first law criminalizing Holocaust denial, and it all got to be too much for those institutions, such as the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial and Museum, and the Index of the Twenty-First Century finally came crashing down.

Yes, history does not repeat itself, but it sure as hell rhymes. Valla was a priest, and had no apparent wife or children. Butz likewise seems to be quite innocent of such relations, a condition common among people who challenge entrenched social mores. Both authors wrote their books before the lists (the Index and Amazon, respectively) came out, and both got their books on the lists (automatically). But the lists, of course, were opposite: the Index was a black list (don't buy/read this) and Amazon is now, whatever it was initially, a white list (you may buy/read these). The sales of Valla's book aren't known, neither before nor after its listing, and the sales of Butz's book before and after its first listing on Amazon aren't known to me even if they are to Butz or someone else.

But the occasion for this article is the eventual removal of Butz's book from the list that was once (still?) reputed to contain "every" book. It seems safe to assume that a low level of sales was succeeded on March 6, 2017 by a still-lower level of sales, hardly uncommon for a book in its 42nd year of publication (and its fourth edition). Valla's book, for its part, is not only still in print (at least in English and German translations), but proudly offered for sale on ... Amazon! There's nothing against heresy in Amazon's choices (and they are now very much choices) of what to sell; it's just that some heresies aren't allowed (anymore). Maybe the older ones that have finally won the day are OK. The ones still struggling ... well, which way is the political wind blowing?

Valla and Butz were both important intellectual figures entirely aside from their heretical writings. Valla was a leading scholar of ancient Greek and Latin and a master of Latin grammar who may never since have been overtopped by any later generation. Butz's contributions lie in a field far removed from any at issue in the present contemplations, something I would like in my ignorance to call "computational electronics." Whether their heretical writings here discussed constituted the crowning, or most-significant accomplishments of their lives would be something for each of their admirers (and detractors) to decide for themselves. It is clear that Butz went on teaching electrical engineering at Northwestern University until his retirement, and that the Hoax did not visibly dominate his life during that time. As to Valla, a number of his works postdate de falso credita, so it would appear that his own contribution, as in Butz's case, did not quite take over his career or brief remaining life after its creation.

So Valla's book enjoyed, if only from neglect by the authorities, acceptability at least until such time as it was set in type and printed and/or translated into the rising vernacular languages in Europe (Valla died during this period). Then it was blacklisted, then it might have been taken off the blacklist at some point, and it had become the forerunner of dominant opinion by 1600 or so. Butz's book seems to have enjoyed some favorable notoriety along with the unfavorable type to be expected, and Butz addressed several annual conferences of the Institute for Historical Review in the early to mid Eighties. While Butz's book had the stage for revisionist books (again, in English) virtually to itself for its first decade or two, the subsequent appearance of dozens upon dozens of new books and translations of older books have still not dislodged it from its place of pride at the head of the list of scholarly books on the Holocaust. If mere quality and extent of scholarship really mattered in the impact such works have, the Holocaust legend would not have survived past 1980.

As it is, of course, the Holocaust is very much alive today in 2018 and enjoying the rudest of health, thank you very much, protected by both censorship and criminal penalties against disputation in twenty countries or more. Arthur Butz today is 84 years old. He is probably resigned to the fate that befell his predecessor of the Sixteenth Century, of dying before the ultimate demise of the monster he so early found and so valiantly took on. But we will prevail, and on that happy day, if I should still be alive, I know I will be far from alone in remembering Arthur Butz's signal deed.

Someday, very quietly I am sure, Butz's book will be taken up once again by Amazon. I wonder if they're saving the hundreds of reviews and ratings received by the past incarnation of the title on their august pages, to restore when that inevitable day comes. Most likely, at the time of this anticipated event, people will care much less than they do now about the Holocaust whether they believe in it, decline to believe, or have never even heard of it. By that time, people may not care very much about Amazon's whitelist of books, either.

Pope Paul VI abolished the Index Librorum Prohibitorum in 1966. The act received little note.

[1] I am indebted to Dr. Butz for describing the case of the Donation of Constantine and the roles of Lorenzo Valla and others at some length in his magnum opus. I had previously been aware of none of it, but I could say the same for his landmark revelations concerning the Holocaust, quite as well.

Telling Stories to Stay Alive: Rudolf Höss vs. Scheherazade

by Jett Rucker

Commandant in Auschwitz: Rudolf Höss, His Torture and His Forced Confessions. Carlo Mattogno and Rudolf Höss, English translation by Germar Rudolf. Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, U.K, 2017, trade paperback, 402 pp.

Carlo Mattogno, Rudolf Höss, Commandant of Auschwitz: Rudolf Höss, His Torture and His Forced Confessions, Castle Hill Publishers, Uckfield, UK, Nov. 2017; 402 pages pb, 6"×9", bibliography, index, ISBN: 9781591481911. Read it free of charge or purchase a hard copy here.

After his capture on March 11, 1946 by British occupation troops, Rudolf Höss stayed alive for 401 days and nights, largely on the strength of the (in)credible stories he supplied concerning genocide conducted at the Auschwitz concentration camp during his tours as commandant of the camp. History contains many precedents for every element of Höss's dolorous fate from the time of his capture. For example, in 2010, I reported remarkable similarities between Höss's case and that of Henry Wirz, former commandant of the Confederate POW camp at Andersonville Station, Georgia, whose execution in 1865 by the US Army was the only execution of a war criminal to follow the US War between the States.

The framing story of A Thousand and One Arabian Nights itself may or may not be truly historical, but the story itself, even many of the stories within the story, have been so celebrated, so studied, translated, published, perhaps even in some cases believed, that the entire subject has very truly attained historical stature quite equal to many accounts of actual historical events and exceeding that of many, many more. Briefly, of course, there was in antiquity a king of Persia whose wife had been unfaithful to him and after he had her executed, he remarried and had his new bride executed on the day after their wedding night so as to eliminate the possibility of her being unfaithful to him. The king repeated this gruesome practice many times, never allowing his successive wives to survive for more than 24 hours after their weddings, until Scheherazade submitted herself as a bride with a secret plan to stop the carnage of innocent women.

The king duly married her, with his plan to continue his well-known practice very much in mind. But Scheherazade told her murderous husband the beginning of a story on their wedding night that so fascinated the king that he allowed her to survive until the next night so that he could hear the end of the story. It is not stated whether the king, or anyone else, actually believed the story(ies), which include such chestnuts as “Aladdin and the Magic Lamp,” “The Flying Carpet” and other charming fantasies. Scheherazade, who has gone down in (cultural) history as the consummate storyteller, finished her first story on that second night, but before turning out the lamps, she started a second story, which again captivated the king. Thus our raconteuse continued through the succeeding thousand nights, the while bearing her auditor three sons, after which the king finally abandoned his lethal plans and allowed the mother of his sons to remain alive as his queen for the rest of her natural life.

Although Rudolf Höss’s real-life (and -death) story of 1946-47 was true, the stories he told were much more like Scheherazade’s—that is, contrived so as to prolong his life. How could they not have been? At first, it is incontrovertibly known, he was tortured, and he made up stories such as the ones his torturers wished to hear so as to stop the insufferable pain he was subjected to. Then, besides the relief from the pain, his tormentors improved the circumstances of his day-to-day (the days as captive of your malefactors can be so long). Höss began, as only an idiot could fail to do, to see the way to a bearable future, however short or long it might ensue to being: tell stories—wondrous stories, impossible stories, anything to delight and fulfill the vengeful men who controlled the air you breathed, the food you ate, the cold you suffered, the light you saw. One wonders whether the precedent of Scheherazade, surely known to Höss, might have occurred to him. Either way, the path to survival, at least to tomorrow, lay down the path of incredible, horrific stories and signing the affidavits that made them documented truth, at least for the gullible, the vindictive, and those who, ultimately, had further uses for the “information,” including those who would found a new state upon it—a state today secretly numbered among those capable of raining thermonuclear destruction upon the innocent billions who live within a certain distance from the seas traversed by their submarines.

Höss had, and knew he had, far more at stake than his own flayed and bleeding skin. His arrest itself had been enabled by the capture and incarceration of his wife and three children; these remained pawns in the control of the occupying victors to do with as might best serve to elicit the desired testimony from the trembling, fear- and pain-wracked shell of a man who knew not what awaited him or his beloved family by the next dawn. That he retained the use of his formidable powers of imagination and creativity is at today's remove an object of deserved wonderment. And he rewarded his "king" bounteously, with lurid and detailed accounts of the slaughter of millions of his hapless charges in the hell-pit of Auschwitz that he had erected and operated with hideous efficiency at the behest of Heinrich Himmler, the Reichsführer-SS himself. Scheherazade has been toppled from her perch enjoyed until then as the world's most-creative, if not most-desperate spinner of tall tales to preserve her very life.

But Scheherazade's tales inhabit the domain of fairy tales—no one believes in flying carpets, nor are there any laws providing prison terms for anyone announcing that they decline to believe in such things.

Rudolf Höss's desperate flights of fancy, however, inhabit a very different domain. Upon the strength, largely, of the sworn testimony of Obersturmführer Höss, a legend has arisen to challenge such as the Immaculate Conception of Christ, the Parting of the Red Sea, even the bearing of the entire earth upon the mighty shoulders of Atlas. And this body of legend has teeth: since 1952, Germany has paid over $89 billion to victims of the Holocaust. Israel continually invokes this Holocaust, attested to by Rudolf Höss and many others under similar duress and, like Höss, subsequently executed for their troubles, in expiation of the atrocities Israel visits upon the luckless inhabitants of Palestine in the Jewish state's relentless drive to conquer Lebensraum in the Holy Land for the Jews of today and tomorrow.

The fruits of Rudolf Höss's last 401 nights are fully detailed in Carlo Mattogno's 2017 *Commandant of Auschwitz—Rudolf Höss, His Torture and His Forced Confessions*, though Mattogno concludes that Höss, rotting in a prison cell and in fear for his wife and three children, is more motivated by gratification in being the center of much attention than by anything that might be called a Scheherazade Syndrome. Perhaps the two aren't entirely different in the first place. But I think the Scheherazade Syndrome might, for such situations, take its place alongside, for example, the Stockholm Syndrome.

Ultimately, as with so many things about that so-called Holocaust with all its testimonies and sworn affidavits, we'll never know. Rudolf Höss was hanged at Auschwitz on April 16, 1947. We wouldn't have known even if he hadn't been hanged. The Truth is ever-elusive.

Ever elusive.

The Diary of Prisoner Number 109565

by Panagiotis Heliotis

We examined the memoir of Erika Kounio earlier. This time is the turn of her brother, Heinz Kounio, who also wrote a memoir: A Liter of Soup and Sixty Grams of Bread: The Diary of Prisoner Number 109565 (first published in Greek in 1981 under the title I Lived Death and later in English and German).

Kounio was deported to Auschwitz on March 20, 1943 at the age of 15. He and his father were sent to work at the tailor shop where they stayed until the evacuation in January 1945. Afterwards he was sent to Mauthausen, then Melk, and finally Ebensee, where he was liberated by the Americans on May 6, 1945. While at Melk he started keeping a diary which served as the basis for his book.

Kounio's experience is typical of most Holocaust survivors: Hard work, illness, beatings, anguish and extreme hunger. But what does he have to say about the extermination story?

Says Who?

As usual, after arriving at the camp, it wasn't long before Kounio heard rumors about the mass killings:

“From the very beginning we had asked ourselves what was this concentration camp. Would we see our loved ones again? They had been so abruptly taken from us. We had not even had the chance to say good-bye. We had heard that they had been killed, that there were crematories where the corpses were burned, but we did not want to believe such rumors. We thought that these stories were just another means of terrifying us. However, these rumors were true!" (p. 17)

Yet he does not explain how he verified that the rumors were true. He limits himself to adding:

"The transports from Greece arrived one after the other. Every third day, or once a week, we learned of a new transport, and of how many had been burned and how many new arrivals entered the camp." (ibid.)

Meaning, the rumor factory was working full time.

Not a Day without a Selection

Like the rest of the witnesses, Kounio claims that a selection's purpose was to decide who would live and who would die:

"What did this traumatic word mean? In order to understand, you must realize that each day a new transport arrived, with new arrivals entering the camp. They were brought there from all parts of Europe. From each dispatch, only 10% were selected to live. The rest were destined for the crematories." (p. 20)

And like the rest of the witnesses, he had no way of confirming this. However, he gives an interesting piece of information regarding the hospital selections:

"The women also had to pass naked in front of the Doctor. He examined them with the same indifference as he did the men. Many times, even if an inmate did not show any signs of weakness, he still fell victim to the malevolent doctor. Both men and women were led to the crematories, even though they showed no signs of defect." (p. 22)

But if they showed no signs of defect, wasn't it possible that they were really sent somewhere else? After all, if you kill those unfit for work, why do you need a hospital in the first place?

By the way, here's Kounio's own experience:

"I personally survived seven selections. During the last one I was so weak. I was overcome by fear. Only my faith in God helped me to survive." (ibid.)

The Crematories

Kounio gives quite a few details on the crematories and their function (pp. 34-37). So let's see how the cremations that they "learned" about every third day were done.

"The crematories were constructed with the express purpose of preventing any delay in the extermination of as many Jews as possible. It was here that the corpses of the prisoners were burned. The prisoners were sent to their death in large groups inside the same buildings that housed the crematories. They were killed by poisonous gas. The gas used was Zyklon. It was preferred because it would spread quickly into the air and kill with great speed. Within 10 minutes there was no sign of life.”

However, the characteristic of Zyklon B was its slow evaporation. It was certainly not a gas that could be described as spreading quickly.

“Each crematory was housed in a building containing three floors. On the lowest level there were two large rooms internally connected by a metal door. In the first room there was a large cabinet filled with soap. Alongside there were about 150 showers, one foot apart. It was the infamous gas chamber. No one ever came out of there alive, nor did you ever hear of anyone being rescued by a miracle. At the far end of the hallway there was a moveable door that led to a lift, connecting it to the floor above.”

This description fits partially with Crematoriums II-III (Kounio seems to ignore that the rest were of a different design). In the basement there were actually four rooms forming a  $\Gamma$  shape: Morgue #1 (the alleged gas chamber), Morgue #2 (the alleged undressing room), Morgue #3 (later subdivided into smaller office and utility rooms), and a hallway connecting them all with the elevator leading upstairs.<sup>[1]</sup> Also, Kounio places a cabinet with soaps in the gas chamber, not mentioned by any other witness.

“At normal functioning, the crematory had the potential to burn over 2,000 corpses a day. All the crematories together had the capacity to burn over 10,000 human beings a day.”

Needless to say, these numbers have nothing to do with reality. All four Birkenau crematoria had 46 muffles in total, although they were never all operable at any one time. These muffles could cremate one corpse per hour, hence all muffles together could theoretically dispose of a maximum of about 1,000 corpses a day, hence a tenth of what Kounio claims.<sup>[2]</sup> And that is not all. Describing the deportation of the Hungarian Jews in late spring/early summer 1944, Kounio gives even more outrageous numbers:

“During the spring and summer of 1944, when the Jews of Hungary, France and Belgium were being annihilated in mass, the crematories worked at full capacity. The furnaces alone were insufficient to burn such a large quantity of people. There were 100’s of thousands who were gassed to death, and the Germans forced prisoners to dig large holes alongside the crematories. This is where the leftover corpses were burned. Many times they actually threw live babies into the pyres! During this time, the number of burned corpses rose to 25,000 a day. This lasted until the end of the summer of 1944. After this operation was completed, they concealed the pits. The number of burned corpses never went lower than 5,000 a day. In this way, more than 1,500,000 human beings disappeared in the crematories of Auschwitz, and this was only one of the concentration camps.”

Air photos taken during that time, however, show no trace of these gigantic pyres.<sup>[3]</sup>

The Gassing

Now let’s see how the execution was done (pp. 39-41).

“In the adjacent chamber were the so-called ‘baths.’ Here, up to 1,500 people were crammed together in a suffocating environment. They were placed under the ‘shower,’ and were told to prepare themselves for a bath. From the moment that the heavy metal door closed, their death was only minutes away. For those of us who were outside, it seemed like an eternity. The gas pellets were in a container that was screwed into a hole in the middle of the ceiling. When the door was closed, they unscrewed the cap and opened the gas container. Small blue stones began to fall from the container. The gas, called 'Zyklon,' began to spread rapidly into the air."

This description is totally at odds with the orthodox narrative. The Zyklon-B pellets were supposedly poured from opened cans through holes in the roof (Crematoria II + III) or the walls (Crematoria IV + V). The cans were in no way "screwed" into the ceiling. After all, had this been the case, how could they have unscrewed the can's cap from the outside?

"After 10 minutes had passed, the SS officers, who had been observing from a small window in the door, opened the door. Wearing gas masks, they quickly opened the vents in order to remove the gas."

It's clear that Kounio has no idea how a gas chamber works, real or imaginary. Any indispensable, efficient gas-chamber ventilation would have been mechanical in nature. To start it, no vents had to be opened, only electric motors had to be switched on. And any execution gas chamber would have had to be ventilated out a long time before any door could have been opened safely. Even in case of the ground-floor rooms of Crematoria IV + V that purportedly served as homicidal gas chambers, their wall openings allegedly used to both throw in Zyklon B and to ventilate the rooms afterwards were closed with wooden shutters that were operated from the outside.

"Afterwards, they entered with a group of prisoners from the Sonderkommando. These prisoners were changed every half hour. The prisoners were in two teams: 4 members of the team separated the corpses that had become enmeshed together and then threw them to 2 others, who stacked them near the lift and then threw them into it. When the number of corpses reached fifty, they were lifted to the floor above, where two other prisoners were waiting."

The makeshift freight elevator in Crematorium II was actually rather small and had a permissible maximum load of just 300 kg, or 5 to 6 corpses. In Crematorium II, an elevator with a higher maximum load may have been installed, but even that could not carry more than maybe 20 corpses at a time.<sup>[4]</sup> 50 corpses is a totally imaginary number.

But Kounio is not done. As he informs us, the Nazis used also other types of extermination:

"If the number of condemned prisoners was small in number, they did not kill them with gas. First, the prisoners had to strip naked and were placed in a chamber. One of the members of the Sonderkommando lined them up one behind the other. Another Sonderkommando then took each one by the ear and led him to another chamber. An SS officer was hiding behind the door. He shot each one in the temple. The pistol had a silencer on it. When the condemned prisoner fell, two other inmates would transport him to the lift. If the number of condemned prisoners were extremely small, the Germans did not use gas or a pistol to kill them. They would burn them alive, throwing them into the fire."

And this brings us to the most important question: How did Kounio know all this? He worked as a tailor in Auschwitz and never even set foot in Birkenau. Who provided him with that information? A member of the Sonderkommando? Probably not, because not only the information is wrong, but he also states:

“It is not easy to describe the work that the Sonderkommando did. Only those who survived this hell would be able to tell us. On the other hand, what would someone actually remember, after having survived this unheard of, unimaginable hell?”

That leaves other prisoners as the possible source. But who exactly? He does not say. Only later when he describes two uprisings at the camp he writes that the narrative comes from a “personal acquaintance” working in the crematories who survived and conveyed the information to him (p. 66). And again, the information is wrong, as he claims that during the Sonderkommando revolt of October 7, 1944, Crematoria II and III were set on fire, when in fact it was Crematorium IV. So we have wrong information from an unknown source. And that’s all there is to it.

Summary

After the Epilogue, Kounio explains the reasons for writing his book as follows:

“This book was published after many years of silence. It was published after I went back and revisited those Nazi concentration camps where I had been a prisoner. I decided to publish this book for three reasons: my personal response to Holocaust denial, out of respect for the memory of those that did not survive, and in response to my children’s pleas.” (p. 167)

He further adds:

“I am not a historian, and there is no way that I can relate everything that happened during these years. I can only relate what I myself experienced.” (p. 168)

And yet his book has plenty of things that he most certainly did not experience, things which are all wrong, and he does not even try to back them up. That neither helps his credibility nor his response to Holocaust denial. It just makes it worse.

The Violinist | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Do you ever go to concerts? Meet Jacob (Jacques) Stroumsa, the violinist of Auschwitz.

Stroumsa was an electrical engineer and an amateur violinist. He arrived at Birkenau on May 8, 1943. After spending one month in the camp orchestra, he was transferred to Auschwitz where, after some gardening duties, he managed to find a job fitting his expertise: in a metal factory. In January 1945 he was sent to Mauthausen on a “death march,” then to Gusen, then back to Mauthausen, then Gusen II where he was liberated by the Americans on May 8, 1945. After the war, he lived in Paris before emigrating to Israel in 1967.

His memoir Geiger in Auschwitz was published in 1993, in English in 1996, and in Greek in 1997 under the title I Chose Life.<sup>[1]</sup> Let’s see what we can find in it that either supports or undermines the orthodox narrative.

Where did they Go?

As with other witnesses, Stroumsa never actually saw any extermination of prisoners. On his first day at Birkenau, after a first questioning from an officer regarding his age, skills etc., he was sent to another room for a medical examination. There he found a doctor who was a friend of his from Thessaloniki. The doctor told him:

“Right now, your parents, your wife and her parents have already been gassed in a gas chamber, and then they will burn them in the crematorium furnaces. The young have a small chance of staying alive, if they don't get sick. They will have to work, each according to his expertise, until the end of the war." (p. 46)

At first, Stroumsa thought he was crazy and delirious. But in the end, that was it. Stroumsa believed that those unfit for work were gassed. He writes about his cousin:

"He was sick. The cause was a hangnail on his finger that had festered. Jacques was at the Revier, the camp hospital, and there, in a Selektion, that is selection, they took him for the gasses." (p. 14)

But as he clearly states (p. 145), the only thing he ever actually saw was the chimneys of the crematoria.

At the Hospital

After his transfer to Auschwitz, Stroumsa felt during a night a sharp pain in his lower abdomen. He went to the hospital, where an SS doctor diagnosed a hernia and ordered surgery. Stroumsa was trembling with fear and could not sleep at night. On the next day he was in the surgery room. They told him not to be afraid as they would administer a local anesthetic. After the injection, they tied him to the table. As he was lying there watching everything he wondered:

"I could not understand the mindset of our executioners. On the one hand they beat, killed, sent anyone to the gas chamber for the most trivial reasons, like for example a hangnail on the finger. And on the other hand they had orchestra, a hospital with a real surgical room, they gave you anesthesia so that you would not suffer, intending to cure a hernia and be useful to them again for work. All this seemed unbelievable!" (p. 62)

This is very important. The prisoners were so convinced about things they had not seen that they had trouble believing what they actually did see.

The Trial

Here's another "unbelievable" incident. Stroumsa had made friends at work with a Polish Catholic. One night, the Pole invited him to his house when the war would be over. He gave him his address on a piece of paper. But when later an SS technician searched him and found the paper, the SS men accused him of planning to escape. Stroumsa was immediately locked up in Block 11, and two days later he was put on trial.

First, the SS judge asked him politely whether he would like to have an interpreter. Stroumsa, being quite familiar with German, declined. He answered calmly all their questions. Here's what followed:

"Then, an unbelievable thing, the court, after consultation, set me free and sent me back to work, in fact they also gave me a day off." (p. 79)

Many years later, in the book Secretaries of Death by Lore Shelley,[\[2\]](#) Stroumsa found out, along with some biographical information, who the SS judge was: SS Unterscharführer Klaus Dylewski.

"Dylewski was responsible for the murder of prisoners at Block 11, and also took part at the 'selektion' at the train platform. He was arrested on April 1959 and sentenced to imprisonment by the Frankfurt court. But he saved my life by sending me back to my work.” (p. 80)

What about the Gas Chambers?

In the main text of the book, Stroumsa does not give any information on the gas chambers. Only in the appendix does he give the testimony of a friend, Hazan Saul, who claims to have worked in the Sonderkommando. Starting on page 143, we read the following:

“When the Jews disembarked from the train, after the first selection, they took those soon to die into the gas room, which could take in around 3,000 people. Inside along the walls there were benches, and above them hangers, and above each hanger a number. They were told to undress and hang their clothes, and remember the number where each had hung his things. In the ceiling they could see the shower heads, in order to have the illusion that soon water would come out. As soon as the room was full, the doors were hermetically closed. An SS man came on a motorcycle bringing two cans of Zyklon. He put on a mask, opened the cans, and poured the content through two openings. One or two skylights allowed him to see into the room to observe the procedure that lasted around half an hour. Finally, they opened the door and turned on special fans to remove the poisonous gasses.”

Here we have some common contradictions to the orthodox narrative. The facility described closely resembles Crematoria II & III, but there, Zyklon was allegedly not poured directly into the chamber but into some contraptions; it allegedly had not two but four openings through which Zyklon B was poured, and observation is said to have occurred through a peephole in the door, not through non-existing skylights. Furthermore, the story contains two physical impossibilities: 3,000 people cannot fit into a space of some 210 m<sup>2</sup>, and ventilation would have had to occur for an extended period of time long before the door could have been opened. But the most egregious mistake in this description is that it seems to imply that the undressing room and the gas chamber were one and the same room.

As for the crematoria, no details are given. There is only the much-repeated fairy tale of trucks unloading sick prisoners directly into fiery pits, as the crematoria allegedly could not keep up (p. 143).

Summary

The witness is certainly credible. His doctor friend had told him that there was a chance of surviving if you didn't get sick, but his experience proves otherwise. His trial also delivers a heavy blow to the portrayal of the SS as bloodthirsty monsters who tortured and killed prisoners for fun. And once again there is no first-hand knowledge of mass killings. Once more, it is quite an irony that testimonies offered in favor of the extermination thesis turn out to support the revisionist viewpoint.

Voices of the Holocaust | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

We will continue our search through the testimonies by having a look at the book Remembering: Voices of the Holocaust (Carroll & Graf, New York 2006) edited by Lyn Smith. The foreword is by Laurence Rees who, explaining the reasons for publishing this book, writes:

“There’s one final reason, of course, why the world is a better place for this book being in it; which is that there are still those who want to pretend none of this ever happened. Recently, at a talk I gave about my Auschwitz book, I was confronted by a Holocaust denier who started screaming at me. He would not listen to argument and was high on insane conspiracy theories. Such people really do exist. And there is always the chance that once everyone personally involved in this terrible history has died, more attempts will be made to diminish or deny what really happened. Each of the people who agreed to give their testimony to this project fights back personally against such a calumny. Each of them bears witness to the truth that there existed in Europe in the middle of the twentieth century a criminal regime like no other in history. Each of them preserves the memory of their suffering forever.” (p. 3)

Of course, we have every reason to suspect that Rees, being the trickster that he is, does not tell us everything about this denier who would not listen to his “argument.” Nevertheless, let’s move on.

The book has more than 100 testimonies, mostly Jews and some non-Jews, but not in the form of individual interviews. They are divided by topic as follows:

1933-36: Persecution
1937-39: The Search for Refuge
1939: War
1940-41: The Third Reich Expands
1939-42: The Ghetto (i)
1943-44: The Ghetto (ii)
1940-44: The Camps (i)
Resistance
1944-45: The Camps (ii)
1945: Death March
1945: Liberation
Aftermath

In every chapter there is a statement by some witnesses, usually a paragraph long. So, what do they have to offer in the fight against the calumny of Holocaust denial?

Rumors, Rumors, and More Rumors

Reading through the testimonies, we once again notice that the survivors did not have any first-hand knowledge about the supposed extermination at the camps. First, Michael Etkind, a Polish Jew, writes about the Lodz Ghetto:

“By the end of 1941, more and more people who were not working were being sent out of the ghetto. They got notices and their food was cut off, and they were ordered to the railway station to be moved out in cattle trucks. Nobody knew exactly what was happening, but nobody wanted to be sent out of the ghetto. As a postman, I was the one who was bringing those notices to those people. We were nicknamed the ‘Malchamoves’ – the biblical ‘angel of death.’ It wasn’t pleasant because when you gave the notices, the people would burst into tears. These were the people who couldn’t work: too old or too young or just incapable because they were so weak from starvation. Sometimes you’d see a piece of soap with a letter RIF on it, and the joke which spread through the ghetto was that this RIF was Yiddish for ‘Real Jewish Fat’: Jews were being evacuated and turned into soap. Those jokes started at the end 1941, beginning 1942, so rumours that Jews were being exterminated were about even then.” (p. 120)

Next, Anna Bergman, a Czech and inmate at Auschwitz:

"I was with a friend whose parents were in the same transport but had been sent to the other side during the selection by Mengele. When we got into our barrack, she asked the women already there, 'Where are my parents? When will I see them again?' And they all started screaming with laughter, 'You stupid idiot, they are in the chimney by now!' We thought they were mad, and they thought we were mad." (p. 162)

Jan Hartman, a Czech Jew:

"What struck me about the camp was the smell. By then we knew it was an extermination camp: we saw chimneys and the fire was very high. 'You go through the chimney' - that was the standard saying. I never heard about the gas chambers, so I didn't know how people were killed. But we saw the chimneys and we associated the flames with the transports coming in..." (ibid.)

Never mind that by design no flames could emanate from the crematorium chimneys at Auschwitz. [\[1\]](#) Clive Teddern, a German Jewish soldier, after arriving with his unit at Hamburg on May 8, 1945, started looking for his parents:

"Of course, I was there asking people if they knew my parents and if they knew what had happened to them. And those from Theresienstadt told me, 'Your parents were sent from Theresienstadt to Auschwitz, to the gas chambers. They're not coming back.' And that's how I found out." (p. 290)

Fritz Moses, a German civilian from Munich:

"We hadn't known about the full extent of the murders; we only knew that something had happened. But this selection, this perfection, I don't think that was known by the mass of the people; only a few knew. But the fact that people knew about it could be concluded from a few things. Like, there was a certain kind of soap, the size of this packet of cigarettes, a terrible grey-green colour and stamped with the initials 'R I F' and the meaning most people applied to this was 'Ruhe in Frieden' - 'Rest In Peace,' because it was made out of the fat of Jews. I mean, when something like that was spoken, there has to be something to it. So now people are supposed to be saying that they didn't know about it - right? That is the proof ... very macabre." (p. 303)

Others, like Leon Greenman, a British Jew, are more assertive:

"Then one of the prisoners in a striped uniform commanded us to follow him. Well, we turned to the left and walked a little way for two or three minutes. A truck arrived, stopped near us and on the truck were all the women, children, babies and in the centre my wife and child standing up.

They stood up to the light as if it was meant to be like that – so that I could recognise them. A picture I’ll never forget. All these were supposed to have gone to the bathroom to have a bath, to eat and to live. Instead they had to undress and go into the gas chambers, and two hours later those people were ashes, including my wife and child.” (p. 159)

This is similar to the statement by Dennis Avey, a British POW:

“Now dreadful things were happening in Auschwitz-Birkenau during 1944. They were gassing and burning thousands of people who couldn’t work anymore because of their failing strength; I knew practically everything that was going on there. I knew that from all over the continent people would be brought to Auschwitz-Birkenau: men, women, children, old people; then they were sorted out and some were gassed right away. There were heaps and heaps of clothing, glasses, footwear – huge warehouses full of possessions taken from these people. They just put them into the gas chambers using this Zyklon B gas and then they were burned. And this happened day in and day out.” (p. 210)

How does he know this, he does not explain. He just knew.

We move on to Michael Honey, a Czech Jew, who has some better “information,” as he got in touch with a member of the Sonderkommando. And once again, the “information” is all wrong: tipper trolleys on rails, “rows” of furnaces, each taking three bodies at once, and using their fat as fuel:

“The Sonderkommando (special Jewish crews forced to work in the gas chambers and crematoria) foreman told me, ‘We have to empty the gas chamber by loading the bodies onto trolleys, rail trolleys like you use on building sites. You have to heave them onto these trolleys because they are not flat trolleys, they are tipper trucks. So we have to heave them high into these tipper trucks then by rail take them to the crematorium where they are burnt. There are rows of ovens, each oven is big enough to take three. So we take a fat man or a fat woman, a smaller person and a child. This is how we save fuel. The fat of the fat person helps to burn the others.’ He said the hardest thing is to dispose of those who come from the camp and die of natural causes because they are so emaciated, there is no fat on them. They take so much fuel that the Germans stop the burning and leave the bones on the plate so that the next lot will burn the bones until there are only ashes left.” (p. 164)

Those Selections Again

The orthodox narrative has it that, after a selection, those unfit to work were sent to the gas chambers, some of which were disguised as shower rooms. But again, some witnesses have quite a different story to tell.

First, here's the account of Anita Lasker, a German Jewish cellist:

"What I remember about arriving in Auschwitz, June 1943, was a lot of noise, a lot of dogs barking, screaming, shouting and waiting all night for something - we didn't know what. Then when morning came we were shoved in another barrack and all the ceremony was started: you know, the hair was shaved, the number tattooed and your clothes were taken off you. All this was done by prisoners not SS people. Auschwitz was run by the inmates, the SS were on the fringe, but the actual work was done by the inmates. The person who processed me asked a lot of questions: What is going on outside? How is the war going? Where do you come from? What do you do? I told her where I came from and for some reason I said that I played the cello. 'Oh,' she said, 'that's fantastic! Stand here to the side.' Everybody else was going through and I was still standing there... I waited and waited and I didn't know what I was waiting for. I knew the gas chamber looked like a shower room and I was in a shower room - I thought: that's probably it. But it wasn't, because into this room marched a lady who introduced herself as Alma Rosé who was the conductor of the camp orchestra. [...] Now I hadn't touched the cello for two years and I asked for five minutes' practice time and then played her something. And I became a member of the famous orchestra." (p. 180)

And here's what happened later:

"Eventually in 1944, the day came when someone came to our block - the music block was the only block where Jews and non-Jews were mixed. Then came the dreaded moment, 'Aryans to one side, Jews to the other.' We thought, 'Now we'll be sent to the gas chamber.' But that was when they sent us to Bergen-Belsen." (p. 221)

Second, Barbara Stimler, a Polish Jewess:

"One day Mengele comes to the block and we all stand on one side, a thousand of us. He stands with two SS men near the door. It is September 1944 and the sun is shining. We have to undress, we hold our clothes on our arms. He takes us by the hand, turns us front and back. One woman is sent to the other side of the block, and one is sent outside. Now, which is which? We are sent outside, looking behind to see where the fat ones are going and where the thin. We can't do anything: if we have to go, we have to go. They take us to the shower. Now, what is going to come out: will it be water or will it be gas? We are holding our hands, praying to God. Water comes out. We all sigh with relief. They give us clothes: a dress, stockings, clogs and a coat and they take us to Pirschcow, a farm in Germany, to dig antitank ditches." (p. 223)

And third, Roman Halter, a Polish Jew:

"Mengele and his officers came to the block and a rope was put down longitudinally. We were all put on one side of it. The order was that everyone had to go up to the rope, stretch out our arms and then on a certain order turn them over palm up. Everybody thought the strongest and best would be selected for work, so they came to the forefront. Mengele would then walk along the rope, looking at the palms saying, 'You are a metal worker with such soft hands? What did you really do in Lodz Ghetto, you are lying.' And they would be marked and dealt with. So we behind quickly spat on our hands and rubbed them in the floor in order to get dirt into our palms and we sighed with relief when we were marked OK. Those who were marked thought they were for certain death, but nothing happened - it was simply a sadistic thing which was Mengele's way of dealing with people." (ibid.)

Leaving aside the fact that fooling the Germans by putting dirt on the hands sounds silly, what exactly was sadistic if nothing happened?

The Eyewitnesses

There are two witnesses who claim to have actually seen gassings at Auschwitz. But their credibility is far from established. First, there is Kitty Hart, a Polish Jewess:

"What I observed was that the women and children had been separated from the men and were sitting in the small wood just across from our barrack; the children would pick flowers, the women would sit and picnic and give the children the food and drink they still had. Then a group would be led into the low building which was Crematorium 4, and you heard a sort of muffled sound. Then from one of the windows from my barrack I could see a person walking up a ladder wearing a gas mask and he would empty a tin into an opening, a sort of skylight, at the top, and he would run down the ladder very quickly. You couldn't hear a lot, other than the muffled sound; sometimes you could actually hear screams. After a pause you could see smoke coming out of the chimney of Crematorium 4, and a while later activity could be seen at the rear of the crematorium; ash was being dumped at the back into a pond." (p. 214)

Overlooking the fact that the tiny openings in Crematorium IV were barred, thus preventing any introduction of Zyklon B,<sup>[2]</sup> Hart's account cannot be true because, according to her story, all the work - gassing, ventilating, corpse removal, cremation, clearing, dumping - was completed in only a few minutes.

The second witness is Antonin Daniel, a Czech gypsy:

“Then they went into the gas chamber, a place like a shower, until there were lots of them and then it was locked. They didn’t know anything about it. The gas was switched on and that was the end. There was a sort of peep-hole there. We were able to watch. I saw, I saw; but if that Kapo had caught us, he would have beaten us to death. They fell like flies. It took fifteen minutes and some, well many of them were still alive, they were still breathing. We opened it up to make the gas go away and then we dragged them out. Those who were still breathing, they beat to death. [...] There were about two to three hundred in the chamber, it was not always the same. They were Jews: women, children and men too - whole families, yes, yes. They did not put Roma (gypsies) there. When Roma died, yeah, they would throw them into the furnace. After the gassing we dragged the corpses from there. They gave us kinds of belts, we had to tie them to a leg and pull it to that crematorium. Only Jews were selected (for work in the crematorium), they were very strong kids, see, young. They got more to eat; at the most they were there three or four months; then finished, sent to the gas chambers and others took their place. I had already learned my lesson. I had grown accustomed to it. It did not do anything to me.” (p. 218)

Again, an obviously problematic and contradictory account. The gas is described as being “switched on” - rather than Zyklon B being thrown in - causing the victims to fall “like flies,” and yet many of them were still breathing after 15 minutes (which would have been impossible to discern by looking through a tiny peep-hole). Then the chamber was opened “to make the gas go away,” and those still alive were beaten to death. Why not wait for the gas to take effect? Furthermore, just opening a room doesn’t make any gas contained in it “go away.” Such a “natural ventilation” would have taken many hours, yet the description implies nothing of the sort.

Furthermore, why were only Jews and not also gypsies sent into the gas chamber? In fact, the orthodox, heavily flawed narrative has it that all gypsies admitted to Auschwitz were eventually gassed.<sup>[3]</sup> And if only Jews were selected to work in the crematorium, how come he worked there? And finally, how did he survive, if these workers were “finished” off after “three or four months”?

Where Are They, Then?

In an effort to counter revisionism, one much repeated question is of course, if the Jews were not murdered at the camps, where are they? As Hilberg once put it, they are certainly not hiding in China!

Well, perhaps the following statement by Jan Imich, a Polish Jew living in the UK, can shed some light on this:

"I never spoke to anybody about my experiences. Jean, my wife, didn't know that I was Jewish for something like four or five years after we got married. It was only through psychoanalysis that I slowly started to come out of the shell as it were. I can see us at that particular moment: we were actually on holiday in the country by the sea, sitting on the grass, and I finally blurted it out. And Jean was wonderful about it. But it wasn't for many, many years after, that anybody else knew. It was only in the last ten years that I've been fairly free and easy, telling my best friends. I suppose I was scared in case people turned against me; maybe I was ashamed of being a Jew. God knows why when I think of it now! It could also have been an outcome of the Nazi anti-Semitism. I know for a fact that, for instance, at this point in time, there are just under two hundred Jews living in Krakow, but there are five or six more times [sic] that number of Jews that don't admit it, people who might even have changed their names; but they are there, I know that for a fact because a lot of friends and acquaintances of my friends in Krakow are Jewish but nobody knows." (p. 320)

Summary

In the Acknowledgments, the editor writes:

"My greatest debt is to the survivors and witnesses who have given their testimony and allowed the use of tapes and photographs. To survivors in particular, I'd like to say what a privilege it has been to record and present your voices. I realise that each voice deserves its own book, and for every voice presented here, there are hundreds of others of equal worth and interest. The good thing is that they are all preserved for posterity in the Sound Archive, potent evidence against Holocaust denial." (p. xvi)

Potent evidence against Holocaust denial? Actually, in the above testimonies we find statements clearly at odds with the orthodox narrative while we fail to find reliable information regarding these elusive gas chambers. If these testimonies are representative of the whole, then they are certainly potent evidence in favor of Holocaust denial.

Babi Yar | CODOH

by John Wear

One of the worst atrocities attributed to the Einsatzgruppen was the Babi Yar massacre, which allegedly occurred in a large ravine outside Kiev in the Ukraine. The allegation is that Einsatzgruppe C rounded up 33,771 Jews in Kiev and shot all of them over the period September 29-30, 1941.<sup>[i]</sup> German Reserve Police Battalion 45 and Police Battalion 303 are said to have assisted in the operation.<sup>[ii]</sup> This article will examine the veracity of these allegations.

Einsatzgruppen Report

The figure of 33,771 Jews murdered at Babi Yar comes from Einsatzgruppen Event Report 106 of October 7, 1941.<sup>[iii]</sup> That the Germans let copies of the Einsatzgruppen reports fall into the hands of the Allies is strikingly odd. They could have easily burned these few stacks of incriminating papers before the Allies conquered Germany.<sup>[iv]</sup> The authenticity of the Einsatzgruppen reports has also been questioned because, like so much other “evidence” of Nazi atrocities, the documents emerged from the Soviet occupation zone.<sup>[v]</sup>

The Einsatzgruppen reports that have been produced are copies which often show clear signs of postwar additions, inaccurate and inflated figures, and rare signatures which appear on non-incriminating pages. Such reports would not constitute valid proof to historians or a legitimate court of law.<sup>[vi]</sup> It is also surprising that the alleged mass murder at Babi Yar took place almost four months prior to the Wannsee Conference, where the mass killing of Jews was allegedly first planned.<sup>[vii]</sup>

The very few figures given in Event Report 106 are provable fabrications. This report claims that there were about 300,000 Jews in Kiev at the time the report was made. The population of Kiev at the time of the report, however, had shrunk from 850,000 or more persons to about 305,000 due to evacuations. So if there had still been 300,000 Jews in Kiev on October 7, 1941, there would have been practically no one in Kiev who was not Jewish. The German experts who made the Einsatzgruppen reports would not have made such a major mistake in their report.<sup>[viii]</sup>

Cremation Eyewitness

Today there are no remains to be found of the tens of thousands of Jews allegedly murdered by the Einsatzgruppen at Babi Yar. The official Holocaust story claims that the Nazis sent a special team back to the site in 1943 to exhume and burn the bodies.<sup>[ix]</sup>

The Jew Vladimir K. Davidov is apparently the only survivor who claims to have participated in the cremation of bodies at Babi Yar. Davidov stated that on August 18, 1943, he and 99 other prisoners were taken to Babi Yar and forced to dig up the bodies of the Jews shot in 1941. He claimed that 70,000 bodies had been buried in the mass graves of Babi Yar. Davidov said that he and about 35 to 40 other prisoners escaped their own murders during the night of September 29. About 10 of his comrades were killed during this escape.<sup>[x]</sup>

According to Davidov, the prisoners exhumed the dead bodies and later burned them on grilles that consisted of granite blocks with train rails laid upon them. A layer of wood was piled on top of these grilles with the dead bodies piled on top of the wood. This resulted in an enormous stack of bodies 10 to 12 meters high. According to Davidov, there was only a single grille in the beginning, but later 75 grilles were built.[\[xi\]](#)

Davidov said that the cremation of the bodies at Babi Yar was finished on September 25 or 26, 1943. The German Luftwaffe took an aerial photograph of the area around Babi Yar on September 26, 1943.[\[xii\]](#) John C. Ball, a Canadian mineral-exploration geologist with experience interpreting air photos, has published this photograph with the following commentary:

Photo 2—September 26th, 1943:

This photo was taken one week after the end of the supposed mass cremations in the ravine. If 33,000 people were exhumed and burned evidence of vehicle and foot traffic to supply fuel should be evident in the area where the Jewish cemetery meets Babi Yar ravine, however there is no evidence of traffic either on the end of the narrow road that proceeds to the ravine from the end of Melnik Street, or on the grass and shrubbery or on the sides of the cemetery.[\[xiii\]](#)

Ball writes regarding an enlarged section of the same photograph:

An enlargement reveals no evidence that 325 people were working in the ravine finishing the cremation of 33,000 bodies just one week earlier, for many truckloads of fuel would have had to be brought in, and there are no scars from vehicle traffic either on the grass and shrubs at the side of the Jewish cemetery or in the ravine where the bodies were supposedly burned.

1943 air photos of Babi Yar Ravine and the adjoining Jewish cemetery in Kiev reveal that neither the soil nor the vegetation is disturbed as would be expected if materials and fuel had been transported one week earlier to hundreds of workers who had dug up and burned tens of thousands of bodies in one month.[\[xiv\]](#)

Ball's findings are all the more valuable since according to Davidov the cremation of the bodies at Babi Yar was completed on the same day or the day before the photo of September 26, 1943 was taken. This would have left behind clear evidence from the cremation of the bodies that would have shown on the photo. Carlo Mattogno and Jürgen Graf write:

[T]he cremation of 33,771 bodies would have required approximately 4,500 tons of firewood and approximately 430 tons of wood ashes and about 190 tons of human ashes would have been generated by the process. Moreover, several dozen tons of granite (gravestones and monuments) would have had to have been transported from the Jewish cemetery to Babi Yar and back again in order to construct the support for the 75 "ovens." If the claims put forward about Babi Yar were true, all of this would have had to leave behind unmistakable traces on the air photo of September 26, 1943.[\[xv\]](#)

If 33,771 Jews had been shot at Babi Yar, large numbers of rifle bullets would have also remained at the site. To shoot people with rifles, one needs at least twice as many bullets as there are people to be shot. Since the lead core of bullets survives practically forever, finding the remains of these bullets would have been an easy matter.[\[xvi\]](#)

No one ever conducted a detailed forensic investigation to confirm the witness statements and allegations at Babi Yar. Why was no detailed forensic investigation ever conducted at Babi Yar? The only reasonable answer is that the mass shootings of Jews at Babi Yar never took place. Since there is no material evidence for the mass shootings and cremation of the bodies at Babi Yar, and since the photograph of September 26, 1943 disproves these allegations, Davidov's eyewitness testimony is clearly inaccurate. [\[xvii\]](#)

Survivor Eyewitnesses

Some Jewish survivors and authors have described the massacre at Babi Yar. Elie Wiesel wrote in one of his books that after Jews were executed at Babi Yar: "Eye witnesses say that for months after the killings the ground continued to spurt geysers of blood. One was always treading on corpses." [\[xviii\]](#) Wiesel later repeated this claim with some embellishment: "Later, I learn from a witness that, for month after month, the ground never stopped trembling; and that, from time to time, geysers of blood spurted from it." [\[xix\]](#) This story lacks all credibility.

A. Anatoli Kuznetsov wrote a novel titled Babi Yar to document the alleged Babi Yar massacre. The author was born in Kiev on August 18, 1929. [\[xx\]](#) Thus, he was only 12 years old when the alleged massacre of Jews at Babi Yar took place. This is a relatively young age and tends to lessen his credibility.

Kuznetsov wrote: "On September 29th, 1941, for example, every single eye witness of what happened in Babi Yar was executed, but the people of Kureniovka knew all about it an hour after the first shots had been fired." [\[xxi\]](#) So Kuznetsov says that he knows of no living eyewitnesses to the massacre of some 33,771 Jews at Babi Yar. Kuznetsov attempts to document the alleged atrocity at Babi Yar with almost exclusively hearsay evidence.

Dina Mironovna Pronicheva was a Jewess who says she survived the alleged massacre at Babi Yar. She is the only person believed to have fallen into the ravine unwounded and feigned death. Assuming various non-Jewish identities, she survived the German occupation of the Soviet Union during World War II. While nobody seems to have interviewed Pronicheva with a tape recorder, there are 12 written records of her testimony dating back to the 1940s. These records differ in substance, and most of the texts fail to meet the standards of contemporary oral history interviews. [\[xxii\]](#)

Despite the inconsistencies in her testimony, historian Karel C. Berkhoff writes that historians of the alleged Babi Yar massacre should use Pronicheva's and other testimonies much more extensively. Berkhoff writes: "The fact remains that only very few sources come as close as Pronicheva's testimonies do to the horrendous details of Kiev's Jewish Holocaust." [\[xxiii\]](#)

Berkhoff and other historians fail to acknowledge the extreme disparity in the eyewitness testimonies regarding the events at Babi Yar. For example, Pronicheva's accounts emphasize guns and rifles as the murder weapons. Other eyewitness accounts have included clubs, rocks, rifle butts, tanks, mines, hand grenades, gas vans, bayonets and knives, burial alive, drowning, injections, and electric shock as the murder weapons at Babi Yar. Herbert Tiedemann asked: "What would an unbiased court do if it had to pass judgement on an alleged mass murderer, if the witnesses were in such thorough disagreement?" [\[xxiv\]](#)

Jürgen Graf writes concerning the contradictory testimony of witnesses at Babi Yar:

According to the established version of the facts, these 33,711 Jews were shot and their bodies thrown into the ravine of Babi Yar on 29 September 1941. But the first witnesses told completely different stories: The massacre was perpetrated in a graveyard, or near a graveyard, or in a forest, or in the very city of Kiev, or on the banks of the Dnieper. As to the murder weapons, the early witnesses spoke of rifles, or machine guns, or submachine guns, or hand grenades, or bayonets, or knives; some witnesses claimed that the victims had been put to death via lethal injections whereas others asserted that they had been drowned in the Dnieper, or buried alive, or killed by means of electric current, or squashed by tanks, or driven into minefields, or that their skulls had been crushed with rocks, or that they had been murdered in gas vans.[\[xxv\]](#)

Conclusion

Witness testimonies of the alleged Babi Yar massacre have been given full credence by historians even though these testimonies contradict each other and claim the most ridiculous impossibilities. Also, no one ever tried to secure any evidence in order to prove the murders. The Soviets after the end of the war turned the ravine of Babi Yar into a municipal garbage dump, and later into a garbage-incineration site. It is no less incomprehensible that the Soviets intended to build a sports facility over this site of the alleged mass murder of 33,771 Jews.[\[xxvi\]](#)

The air photo taken of the ravine of Babi Yar on September 26, 1943 shows a placid and peaceful valley. Neither the vegetation nor the topography has been disturbed by human activity. There are no burning sites, no smoke, no excavations, no fuel depots, and no access roads for the transport of humans or fuel. We can conclude with certainty from this photo that no part of Babi Yar was subjected to topographical changes of any magnitude right up to the Soviet reoccupation of the area. Hence, the mass graves and mass cremations attested to by witnesses at Babi Yar did not take place.[\[xxvii\]](#)

Escape from Auschwitz | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

When it comes to Holocaust survivors we almost always tend to think about Jews. It can't be helped actually as it is only Jews who appear on the media. But Jews were not the only ones sent to concentration camps. There were others as well. Today we will have a look at the testimony of one of them: Russian POW Andrei Pogozhev and his book Escape from Auschwitz (Pen & Sword, 2007).

Pogozhev was sent to Auschwitz in October 1941 and then transferred to Birkenau. In November 1942 he managed to escape along with other prisoners and in 1965 he testified at the Auschwitz Trial. Let's see what he witnessed regarding the exterminations.

It's May 1942 and Pogozhev writes:

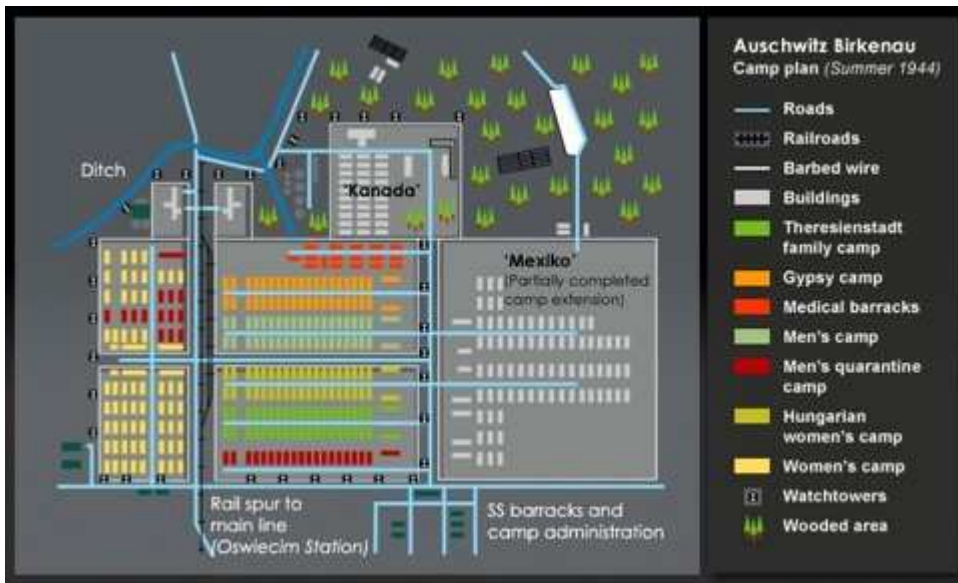

“It was in those days of pan Olek's sickness, during visits from his numerous comrades, that I first discovered the Fascists had begun mass extermination – not only of prisoners but also of whole transports of people. Apparently the main extermination effort had shifted to Birkenau. They'd set up a 'bath-house' with pipes and a 'shower' grid and turned it into a gas chamber. People would be sent inside as if for a shower, then locked in and gassed. [...] Fires cremating corpses after gassings in the 'bath-house' burned day and night at Birkenau. The fires and gas chambers were serviced by 'Sonderkommandos' ['Special Units' – trans.], specially formed from prisoners held outside the camp. No one knew exactly who they were.” (p. 97)

In 1942 there were no crematoriums in Birkenau and the only gas chambers according to the official story were Bunkers 1 and 2, or Little Red House and Little White House. Those were simple farmhouses outside the camp that had been converted into gas chambers. The corpses were then buried in pits. Pogozev continues:

“Early July 1942. Birkenau is meshed with barbed wire, giving it the appearance of a huge spider’s web. I can see that a central road divides the camp in two. On the right sprawls a vast area under construction – the gouged ground ready for new drains and foundations. Meanwhile, prefabricated wooden huts stand already completed. On each of them shines a bright enamelled square containing large, black German script: ‘Pferde Baracken’ – ‘Horse Barracks’. On the left of the road I see the entrance to the women’s camp. Behind it, separated by barbed wire, is that of the men. In both these compounds big new structures have been built alongside the original brick barracks – they look just like the stables opposite. Now I look straight ahead: the only road crossing the camp from east to west terminates at a small grove immediately beyond its limits – the gas chambers and crematorium are situated there. This is the appearance of the Birkenau camp – ‘Auschwitz II’ – as our truck approaches. I am one of a large group of prisoners being driven from Central Auschwitz ...” (p. 104)

Here a map (of reality on the ground) is needed (North to the right):

As one would enter the camp, the women’s barracks was on the left of the road but the men’s was on the right and not behind them. Also the grove was not visible from the main road as it was a little further to the north. Referring to Bunker 2, Pogozev places also a crematorium there which he clearly distinguishes from the pits. For example:

“Away to our left, pyres were blazing deep in the Secret Grove. Further beyond, the crematorium was puffing out black smoke.” (p. 146)

He continues on the Sonderkommandos and their duties (pp. 115-122):

“The first Sonderkommando was formed at the end of 1941. It dug pits and carried out mass burials of bodies which, for some reason, hadn't been taken to the crematorium. The burials were done in Birkenau. The second Sonderkommando was formed in March 1942. The men of the Sonderkommandos lived in isolation in the main camp, so no one could tell what they were doing in the forest, which grew right up to the camp grounds on its northwestern side. This secrecy led to the most incredible rumours – many of them contradictory. Even we, who'd grown used to atrocities, couldn't believe these horror stories. Some rumours reached my ears when I was in the hospital, and there we had even less idea what was going on in Birkenau.”

But despite the secrecy he claims that:

“We quickly got acquainted with the Sonderkommandos and established good relations, not only with the Kapos of the teams, Weiss and Goldberg, but also with many ordinary crew members, who knew Polish and Russian.”

Now here's what he claims he witnessed:

“On my return to Birkenau I'd been placed in the 'Wascherei' crew – in the washhouse. My duty was to hang out linen to dry after washing. The washhouse was situated in the south-western corner of the men's camp, and watching over the drying linen I could see the adjacent grove. There, hidden behind the trees, I could make out silhouettes of people and the outline of a building. Black puffs of smoke – sometimes with bright tongues of fire – rose from this wooded area behind the camp day and night, dissipating in the air or settling on the ground as a grey coating. We nicknamed this place where pyres were burning the 'Secret Village' or 'Secret Grove'.”

As we already saw in the map, the men's camp was far from the grove. The only way to observe the site of Bunker 2 would be from the Sauna, which was behind the Kanada section and right next to the camp fence.

“At the end of July 1942 (or the beginning of August) both Sonderkommandos were merged and transferred to permanent accommodation in Birkenau. They were allocated a separate barracks-stable next to the fence. One end of the barracks was boarded up, the other faced a watch tower with an SS guard. Two men were chosen from the Soviet POWs for around-the-clock guard duty at the Sonderkommando barracks. To my great surprise one of those two happened to be myself. [...] After a few days, in spite of the strict prohibition, we – and not only we – knew at first-hand what was happening in the 'Secret Grove' behind the camp; knew what the Sonderkommandos were doing and who was involved. The rumours were fully confirmed. One Sonderkommando – more numerous than the other – dug pits for mass graves – burying the evidence from pyres, gas chambers and crematoria. The other one serviced the first gas chamber, which was set up like a bath-house. Corpses were burned in the crematoria and on pyres. Everyone in the crew had his duties clearly spelled out. Each man knew what he was supposed to be doing. And no corpse would be burned (either in the crematorium or on the pyres) until it had undergone a thorough examination.”

Of course there never was any crematorium there, proving that the rumors were not fully confirmed but fully worthless. And an even better example for this can be found a few paragraphs later:

“Here was an astonishing puzzle! We’d heard stories from Sonderkommando crewmen about how the gas dosage used for mass extermination – fatal for adults – sometimes failed to kill babies. Indeed, the younger they were, the more signs of life these infants displayed: they’d lose their voice and move their arms and legs silently. The Bull could casually finish those kids off with his pistol. There were cases when he and another SS-Mann took kids by the legs and threw them into the flames of a pyre. Few could witness this kind of sadism and remain sane.”

Summary

With a rather sensational book cover Pogozhev gives us a sensational account of his experiences but with surprisingly few details on the crimes committed. Whereas in other parts of the book there are tedious details about all sorts of things (even entire long verbatim dialogues between prisoners), the extermination part is much briefer despite his claimed close contact with the Sonderkommandos. Pogozhev is unaware of the term Bunker, their number, their internal arrangement, the gassing method, or the location or number of pits, not to mention the claim of a non-existent crematorium.

Finally in the Epilogue he concludes:

“Auschwitz! The whole world knows that name: the place where Fascists exterminated 4 million people from all over Europe in four years.” (p. 167)

With rumors, contradictions, and horror stories, Andrei Pogozhev proves himself to be a worthy servant of the Motherland.

Jewish Survivors of Auschwitz-Birkenau | CODOH

by John Wear

In addition to numerous Jewish survivors of Auschwitz-Birkenau I have met, it is amazing how many survivors of these camps are mentioned in pro-Holocaust books and other mainstream sources. This article will discuss some of these Jewish survivors and other eyewitnesses who prove that genocide did not take place at Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Famous Jewish Survivors of Auschwitz-Birkenau

The fate of Anne Frank, who is known around the world for her famous diary, is typical of many Jews who died in German camps during the war. Anne and her father were first deported from the Netherlands to Auschwitz-Birkenau in 1944. Anne's father, Otto Frank, contracted typhus and was sent to the camp hospital to recover. He was one of thousands of Jews who remained at Auschwitz-Birkenau when the Germans abandoned the camp in January 1945. He survived the war and died in Switzerland in August 1980.[\[1\]](#)

If Auschwitz-Birkenau had been a place of mass exterminations, why would the German authorities leave behind thousands of disabled Jews such as Otto Frank to testify to their genocide? The SS would have easily been able to gas and cremate these Jewish inmates in Crematorium V at Birkenau during the first week of January 1945.[\[2\]](#)

In the face of the advancing Soviet army, Anne Frank was evacuated to Bergen-Belsen, where she died from typhus in March 1945. While Anne Frank's fate was tragic, her story is not consistent with a German program of extermination against the Jews. Along with thousands of other Jews at Bergen-Belsen, Anne died from a typhus epidemic and not from a German plan to commit genocide against European Jewry.[\[3\]](#)

Elie Wiesel, whose autobiography Night written in 1956 helped him win the Nobel Peace Prize, never mentioned homicidal gas chambers at Birkenau in his book. Instead, Wiesel wrote that Jews were killed en masse by being thrown alive in burning pits.[\[4\]](#)

Wiesel also mentioned in Night that he had surgery on an infected foot in January 1945. The German authorities at Birkenau gave Wiesel and other hospital patients unfit to travel the option to remain in the camp. Wiesel and his father decided to evacuate Birkenau and travel to Buchenwald with the Germans rather than be liberated by the Russian army.[\[5\]](#)

Viktor Frankl's book Man's Search for Meaning has been ranked by the Library of Congress as one of the 20th century's 10 most influential books in the United States. Frankl described his experiences at Auschwitz in this book as if he had spent many months there. In reality, Frankl was in Auschwitz only for a few days in October 1944 while in transit from Theresienstadt to a sub-camp of Dachau.

Frankl has admitted this to the American evangelist Robert Schuller: "I was in Auschwitz only three or four days...I was sent to a barrack, and we were all transported to a camp in Bavaria."[\[6\]](#) Frankl's short time in Auschwitz is substantiated by the prisoner log from the sub-camp of Dachau, Kaufering III, which listed Frankl's arrival on October 25, 1944, six days after his departure from Theresienstadt.[\[7\]](#) Thus, Frankl's descriptions of his long stay at Auschwitz in Man's Search For Meaning are false and inaccurate.

Primo Levi was a Jewish Communist who one would think would have been executed at Auschwitz-Birkenau. However, along with about 7,000 to 8,000 additional disabled Jews, Levi was left behind in Auschwitz. Although the Germans could have executed Levi and the other Jews in a few days, the Germans let them survive to tell their story about Auschwitz-Birkenau.[\[8\]](#)

Young Jewish Survivors of Auschwitz-Birkenau

Numerous Jewish survivors of Auschwitz-Birkenau have publicly described a German policy of genocide. I will discuss in this section Jewish inmates of Auschwitz-Birkenau who were so young that one would not expect them to survive if there had been a German policy of genocide.

Thomas Buergenthal

Thomas Buergenthal is a Jewish survivor of Auschwitz-Birkenau and Sachsenhausen as well as the Polish ghetto of Kielce. Buergenthal, a Harvard-educated lawyer who served on the International Court of Justice at The Hague, was only 10 years old when he arrived in Auschwitz. Buergenthal claims in his memoir, A Lucky Child, that his group was spared the selection process because it luckily arrived in Auschwitz instead of Birkenau.[\[9\]](#)

Buergenthal writes that he was later transferred to Birkenau and lived in Camp Sector E, which had housed many thousands of Gypsy families.[\[10\]](#) Buergenthal explains how he was spared the selection process at Birkenau:[\[11\]](#)

“Soon after we had arrived in Auschwitz, my father, seeing how routine selections were conducted and that children were most at risk, came up with a strategy to beat the system. Every morning when we had to line up for the daily counting exercise, I would try to stand all the way in the back and very close to the entrance of the barrack. As soon as we had been counted and if it appeared that there might be a selection, I would try to slip back into the barrack and hide. That strategy saved me a number of times. It was not always easy to execute, however, because I had to disappear without being seen by the SS or the barrack boss, but I was never caught.”

Buergenthal says he escaped other random selections by obtaining a job as an errand boy for a Kapo friend. In late October 1944, Buergenthal says, he was then sent to a barrack at a hospital camp.<sup>[12]</sup> The SS one night dragged out all the people in this barrack to be gassed, but Buergenthal says he was lucky again. Buergenthal writes:<sup>[13]</sup>

“It was a miracle, I thought, that the SS had not found me. Soon, though, I learned how I had been saved. When we first arrived at this barrack, a red X had been placed on the backs of our individual index cards. My friend, the young Polish doctor, apparently tore up my card and issued me a new one without the red X. When the SS came in and demanded the cards with the red mark, my card was not among them. The doctor had saved my life, and my nightmares saved me from witnessing what was happening that night and possibly giving myself away.”

A week or two later Buergenthal was moved to the children’s hospital in camp D. Buergenthal thus confirms what Holocaust revisionists know; numerous children were also “lucky” and survived the alleged selection processes at Birkenau.<sup>[14]</sup>

Bernard Marks is a Jewish survivor of Auschwitz and Dachau who says he spent five and one-half years in these camps. Marks was 87 years old when he made this statement in March 2017, which means he would have been at most 10 years old when he entered Auschwitz. Similar to Thomas Buergenthal, Marks survived Auschwitz even though he was only a 10-year-old child at the time.<sup>[15]</sup>

A Jewish man in a video on Facebook claims he was sent to Auschwitz at age 10 and survived. The man says that Dr. Mengele would make selections to determine who went to the gas chambers. He claims he told Dr. Mengele that he was 17 years old, and his life was saved because Dr. Mengele miraculously let him live. The man also claims in this video that 1.5 million children were killed in the gas chambers at Auschwitz. If this man survived at age 10, however, certainly many other Jewish children survived as well.<sup>[16]</sup>

On January 21, 2015, Reuters listed numerous Jewish survivors who were young children while in Auschwitz-Birkenau. These include Jacek Nadolny, who was only age seven when sent to Auschwitz-Birkenau, and Zofia Wareluk, who was born in Auschwitz two weeks before the camp was liberated. Other Jewish survivors who were no older than age 10 while in Auschwitz-Birkenau include Elzbieta Sobczynska, Henryk Duszyk, Danuta Bogdaniuk-Bogucka, Janina Reklajtis and Barbara Doniecka.<sup>[17]</sup> The survival of so many young Jewish children at Auschwitz-Birkenau is not consistent with a German policy of genocide against the Jews.

The survival of young children at Auschwitz-Birkenau is not surprising since Auschwitz-Birkenau served as a transit camp for detainees unfit for work. This is proven by a note dated July 21, 1942, concerning a telephone conversation that took place the day before. SS Hauptsturmführer Theodor Dannecker wrote:<sup>[18]</sup>

“The question of the evacuation of children was discussed with SS-Obersturmbannführer Eichmann. He decided that transports of children are to take place as soon as transports into the General Government are again possible. SS-Obersturmbannführer Nowak promised to provide about six transports to the General Government at the end of August/beginning of September, which may contain Jews of all kinds (also those unfit for work and old Jews).”

Eyewitness Testimony

A credible eyewitness who states that genocide did not take place at Birkenau is the Austrian-born Canadian Maria Van Herwaarden, who was interned at Birkenau from December 2, 1942 to January 1945. Van Herwaarden testified at the 1988 Ernst Zündel trial that she saw nothing at Birkenau that resembled mass murder. The Jewish prisoners she saw at Birkenau were not treated differently from the other prisoners. She also testified that many of the inmates at Birkenau died of diseases, and some inmates committed suicide.[\[19\]](#)

Joseph G. Burg, a Jewish author who wrote several books on the Holocaust story, testified at the 1988 Zündel trial that he had spoken to hundreds of people who had been at Auschwitz-Birkenau when he visited the camp in the fall of 1945. Burg formed the opinion that there were no German extermination camps, the gas chambers had never existed, and there was no plan to exterminate the Jews of Europe.

Joseph Burg also testified at the 1988 Zündel trial that he spoke to hundreds of people who serviced and operated the crematoria, but he could not find anyone who had operated homicidal gas chambers. Burg testified that the crematoria had been established for hygienic purposes as a result of typhus and other diseases. Burg also testified that he attended the Nuremberg trials in 1946 and met Ilya Ehrenburg, who had visited Auschwitz-Birkenau, as well as a Jewish publisher who had been interned in Auschwitz for several years. Both Ehrenburg and the Jewish publisher said they did not see any homicidal gas chambers while at Auschwitz-Birkenau.[\[20\]](#)

Thies Christophersen was another witness who said the alleged genocide of Jews during the war never happened. Christophersen supervised about 300 workers, many of them Jewish, at Auschwitz from January to December 1944. On a number of occasions during this period he visited Birkenau where allegedly hundreds of thousands of Jews were being gassed to death. In The Auschwitz Lie, a memoir first published in Germany in 1973, Christophersen wrote that during the time he was at Auschwitz he did not notice the slightest evidence of mass gassings. He also successfully answered numerous pointed questions by the prosecuting attorney at the 1988 Ernst Zündel trial about his experiences at Auschwitz.[\[21\]](#)

The prosecutors in the 1985 and 1988 Ernst Zündel trials were not able to find any credible witnesses. In fact, the prosecution witnesses in the 1985 Zündel trial were so bad that the prosecutors did not call any witnesses in the 1988 Zündel trial. Even Sabina Citron, a Jewish Auschwitz survivor who originally filed the criminal complaint against Zündel, did not take the witness stand in either of these two trials.[\[22\]](#)

The failure of the prosecutors in the Ernst Zündel trials to find credible witnesses caused Robert Kahn to write:[\[23\]](#)

“If the concept of ‘symbolic victory’ is sometimes difficult to apply precisely, the 1985 prosecution of Ernst Zündel clearly backfired. What had been an attempt to silence Zündel, and possibly use the legal system to repudiate denial, became instead a public relations coup for the Toronto publisher and his supporters.”

Alan Dershowitz concurs, calling the Zündel trials “a total victory for Holocaust deniers and a total disaster for Holocaust survivors and the Jewish people.”[\[24\]](#)

Dr. Wilhelm Stäglich also wrote that he did not see any evidence of genocide of the Jews at Auschwitz. Stäglich, a German judge, visited Auschwitz several times during the Second World War as a German orderly officer of an anti-aircraft detachment. Dr. Stäglich published an account of his visits to Auschwitz in which he stated that on none of these visits did he see gassing installations, instruments of torture, or similar horrors. Stäglich wrote:[\[25\]](#)

“None of the inmates behaved as though they were in fear of mistreatment, let alone death.”

Violette Fintz, a Jewish woman who had been deported from the island of Rhodes to Auschwitz in mid-1944, and then to Dachau and then to Belsen in early 1945, said that from her experience Belsen was worse than Auschwitz. Fintz is another Jew who survived Auschwitz and lived to describe her experiences at the camp.[\[26\]](#)

Conclusion

The large number of Jewish survivors of Auschwitz-Birkenau and other German camps makes impossible a program of genocide against European Jewry. These Jewish survivors include many children who were obviously too young to be good workers and contribute to the German war effort. Dr. Arthur Robert Butz writes in regard to the large number of Jewish survivors of the so-called Holocaust:[\[27\]](#)

“The simplest valid reason for being skeptical about the extermination claim is also the simplest conceivable reason; at the end of the war they were still there.”

Manny Steinberg's Outcry | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Welcome back dear readers for our next inquiry into a Holocaust memoir. Today's guest is Manny Steinberg and his memoir is Outcry: Holocaust Memoirs (Amsterdam Publishers, 2015). Approaching 1,400 reviews with 81% rating it five stars on Amazon, this merits a look.

Mendel "Manny" Steinberg was born in 1925 in Radom, Poland. In 1942 his ghetto was liquidated and he spent the rest of the war years in various camps including Auschwitz, Vaihingen and Neckagerach. After liberation he moved to America in 1946 along with his father and brother.

Before we move on with the content, two things should be pointed out. First, Steinberg begins with this declaration:

"The following pages recount my real-life experiences and memories, but the names in my story have all been fictionalized." (p. 2)

Usually this is for privacy protection, although he does not explain why it is needed, or if there is some other reason.

Second, there are problems with the chronology as given. Born in 1925, Steinberg would have been 16-17 years old in 1942. He mentions this year of his first deportation as follows:

"Our miserable existence in the Ghetto ended in June of 1942." (p. 63)

But after this he claims several times that he was 14 years old. Later he writes:

“Three long years had been spent in this prison camp and now I was to leave it, destination unknown. I had reached the age of seventeen, and although I would have still been considered a boy, the experience of living through this hell had aged me considerably.” (p. 94)

So we arrive at 1945 and yet after a few pages we read the following:

“After several days, we finally reached our mysterious destination. It was Auschwitz, the most infamous of the concentration camps. Here the gas chambers were said to work day and night to keep up with the mass murdering.” (p. 100)

This is impossible as the camp had been evacuated in January of that year. If Steinberg was indeed 17 when he was sent to Auschwitz, this was in 1942 and he could not have spent 3 years in the first camp (near Radom) as he claims. The confusion continues with one last remark:

“I was nineteen years of age and in many ways still a boy.” (p. 164)

This after he moved to New York in 1946, when he was 21 years old. So it seems that at least Steinberg has not reconciled his dates/ages. Anyway, let's see what he has to say on the extermination story.

The first time he hears about it is as follows:

“Some of the Polish men working on the trains were in sympathy with the Jews and passed on information. They told of how a chemical that smelled like chlorine would be sprinkled inside the cars. When the prisoners urinated, a deadly gas would form, suffocating them to death.” (p. 74)

This is the story of the “trains of death” made known by Jan Karski<sup>[1]</sup> which was nothing but propaganda and today has vanished from history, although Karski himself still appears here and there.

After this, Steinberg heard from a friend that his mother and his youngest brother had been killed at Treblinka. When he asked for proof his friend told him what he had learned from another friend working on the railroads. The train had gone to Treblinka, where only 40% of the people arrive alive to be delivered “to the gas chambers and crematorium” (p. 75). In short, the proof came from the information of a friend, of a friend, of a friend...

So, what was Steinberg's own experience?

“At the gate to Auschwitz was a group of German doctors. They were wearing white aprons spotted with blood. They resembled butchers, and that is exactly what they were. Only the meat was now human instead of animal. I watched their bloody hands and thought of the Jewish people they had tortured, killed, mutilated and experimented on. They had no feelings about us. We were just another group of Jews to be sorted. The young separated from the old, the well from the sick. Then another gas lever to be pulled for the unfortunate ones selected to die.” (p. 100)

Doctors with aprons stained by blood at the selections remind one more of a horror film, not to mention that such a detail would not have gone unnoticed by others. Even Elie

Wiesel with his geysers-of-blood stories never wrote anything quite like that. Steinberg continues in the next paragraph:

“We were told to remove our clothes and put them in a pile at our feet so that a physical examination could be carried out. I heard someone be addressed as Dr. Mengele and knew that this was the end.”

Clothing removal during the selections is also unheard-of. Furthermore if Steinberg was deported in 1942 he could not have seen Mengele who was at Birkenau after May 1943. But Steinberg gives even more fanciful details. After the selection, in order to drown the cries of those selected to die, a group of naked (!) Gypsy women banged on drums (p. 101)! And here’s what followed:

“For the first time I saw the tall chimneys with the reddish smoke billowing out from the top. They were the crematoriums. As soon as people arrived in the cattle cars, they were taken to the gas chambers. Older people that were too weak to walk or young children who had not learned to walk yet were thrown onto trucks with hydraulic lifts. The trucks would drive over to the crematorium, reverse up to it, and then use the hydraulic lift to make the people slide to a fiery death. Prisoners were given a piece of soap and told that we could take a bath if we wanted. This would have been a great treat, but of course we were afraid. We knew that this had been used to lure people into the gas chambers. On the soap were the letters ‘RJF’. The ‘R’ was for ‘Rein’, German for pure. The ‘J’ for ‘Jew’ and the ‘F’ for ‘Fett’, German for flesh.” (p. 102)

He also adds that he had the task of removing the gold teeth from the dead as well as cutting the hair of the women killed but stops right there without further details.

Anyway, after these “questionable” statements, here is something more believable. It’s January 1945 and Steinberg is in another prison camp:

“One day a group of German officers arrived in the camp and began making a special selection of prisoners. We were given a medical examination and I was one among some six hundred who were loaded onto trucks and hauled away. As usual, we had no idea where we were going. One thing I did know: we were all sick. Some of us were skeletons, others had an unhealthy bloated appearance, but all were undernourished and in rags. We were a sad sight. We were all sure that we were on the way to be exterminated at last. What else were we good for? We said our goodbyes to each other and waited for the ordeal to be over. Just let this death sentence be quick, I prayed. During this trip, we talked about what we had done before the war, where we had lived, about our families and our lives before we had been forced into concentration camps. Each person talking in their own language, with everyone’s words intermingling. We all held hands and there was much sobbing. Suddenly the long line of trucks came to an abrupt halt. I tried to peek under the canvas to see where our journey had ended.” (p. 130)

Thinking that the gas chamber was waiting for him, he hesitated. But:

“The canvas cover was taken off the truck. My heart was beating very fast. I clasped the hand of the prisoner next to me and tearfully said goodbye. As my eyes adjusted to the light my mouth dropped open at the sight before me. Stretchers! A long line of stretchers with men waiting to help us! My God! Could this really be true? Was help here at last? Immediately I was lifted, yes lifted, off the truck, placed on a stretcher, covered with a blanket;

a warm blanket and taken to wooden barracks that were set up as part of a recuperation center. As we moved along, I realized that I would be given medical help, perhaps more food, that I now had the chance to live. I thanked God silently. As I was carried into the barracks, my eyes caught sight of the supplies and equipment intended for us. There were rows of bunks, and in each bunk was an occupant covered with their very own blanket. There were windows, it was clean and attendants were waiting on the prisoners. I closed my eyes for a minute and thought perhaps I had died and gone to heaven. The feeling of a real blanket over my body, the first one in five years, gave me a sense of real luxury. I snuggled into it and tears of joy ran down my face. A little human kindness after all the years of cruel treatment. This was more than I could stand without giving way to my feelings. For the first time in all these long and torturous years I felt safe; all was well and I would survive. The danger of extermination and fear vanished. Surely they would not go to the trouble of getting me well and then exterminate me. My chances of survival seemed better than at any other time. A feeling of great happiness came to me and I slept.” (p. 131)

Summary

Books like this are praised to the skies and offered all the time as evidence of the Holocaust. And yet a simple reading of them reveals passages that would make any historian run away. The single fact that in 2015 the soap story is still offered as eyewitness testimony without even an editor’s comment, proves the total bankruptcy of the Holocaust story.

Editor's note: Amsterdam Publishers is not a publisher in the traditional sense; it is a provider of publishing services to authors publishing their own works, their website explains. Before the advent of the Internet, such operations were called "vanity publishers." Instead of paying their authors, their authors pay them.

The Artist within the Warlord

by R.T. Sloane

The Artist within the Warlord: An Adolf Hitler You've Never Known, Wilhelm Kriessmann Ph.D and Carolyn Yeager (The Barnes Review, Washington D.C.) 2017.

Do we need a reappraisal of Adolf Hitler? Yes, we do. Though the so-called factual basis of the Holocaust has been debunked by revisionists ... The homicidal gas chambers, gone ... The intention and plan to kill all of Europe's Jews, never found, doesn't exist ... The 6,000,000 murdered Jews. an impossible fantasy number used again and again since before WWI ... yet in spite of the loss of all that, we're still left with the commonly-held belief in a criminal Adolf Hitler.

The justification for this rests on a vague notion that Hitler was a “bad guy” and therefore we don't want any more Hitlers to get power. This notion is generally based on the idea that nationalism is bad (encourages wars), democracy is good (encourages cooperation), populism is dangerous (encourages mob rule). With such beliefs, there is little incentive to reassess the poisoned popular portrayal of this man in light of new or other information.

A book has just come out that can be classed as one of the other portraits of Hitler the man. Back in 1977, Adolf Hitler's architect, Munich-born Hermann Giesler published his 500-page memoir titled Ein Anderer Hitler (Another Hitler), after which it remained untranslated into other languages and little known outside Germany. That is, until the translations by Wilhelm Kriessmann Ph.D. and Carolyn Yeager were turned into the book I'm reviewing here. The Artist Within the Warlord: An Adolf Hitler You've Never Known is mostly comprised of the last one hundred pages of Giesler's memoir, dealing with Giesler's time as Hitler's guest at the various Fuehrer headquarters between 1940-1945. In these pages, we learn of a Hitler who, though he was forced to wage limited war to bring back the Germany that existed prior to the Great War and the robbery by the Versailles Treaty—a high priority for him—was yet always seeking peace so he could accomplish the architectural restructuring of German cities according to his long-held vision.

Hitler and his entourage enter the Paris Opera in the pre-dawn hours on June 22, 1940.

Kriessmann and Yeager's book begins with the short flight to Paris from the Western military headquarters at Bruly de Peche on June 22, 1940, on the eve of the signing of the armistice after the German victory over France. Hitler had already planned this “sight-seeing” trip before the French campaign began and had promised Giesler, architect Albert Speer and sculptor Arno Breker that he would take them along. The purpose was to look at the most important architectural sites in Paris in advance of the planning of major renovation to the city centers of Berlin and Munich. Hitler is seeing everything with an eye to how the architecture and street layouts work in Paris and how they will do it in their German cities. Among Hitler's spoken words that Giesler records from this trip, one statement sticks with me:

“Planning our architecture, we will aim at a classicism of stricter, sharper forms, according to our character.” (p. 17)

Hitler was as serious as can be about the city-building he wanted to do. Giesler leaves us in no doubt that Adolf Hitler was a true, a genuine artist. This runs throughout the book and others have reported the same thing. So this is one aspect of his personality, a very important one, that is disregarded in the mainstream presentation of him. Another one is his humanism, and another his kindness and thoughtfulness.

His humanism is seen on a number of occasions in the book, but particularly in regard to Dunkirk. In June 1940, Hitler saw the British as decisively beaten and the possibility of reaching a peace agreement in the West, enabling him to concentrate his forces in the East as he wished to do. On humanitarian grounds, he didn't like the idea of destroying or capturing and holding in poor conditions what turned out to be around 350,000 British soldiers. He had also been misinformed that there were influential men in Britain who wanted to end the war with Germany. (There were some but they had lost their influence by then.) In addition, he was desirous of getting the conflict resolved before the United States entered into it, which he knew Roosevelt was working toward. Based on all this, plus real military considerations by his top advisers, he made his Dunkirk decision. He told Giesler in 1942:

“And did not a slight possibility of peace still exist, even though a vague one, which I might have obstructed by a pitiless defeat of the Dunkirk army?” (p. 49)

But he was let down on that and nothing materialized from it. When he was forced to invade the Soviet Union in a preemptive strike, without having achieved peace in the West, he knew he must defeat the Red Army quickly, and so laid down much harsher guidelines for the battles and rules for dealing with political commissars, saboteurs and irregular fighters. This is largely responsible for the reputation Hitler has been given for brutality and even “war crimes.” Unfortunately, his own generals were sometimes unwilling to carry out these orders, causing greater difficulties and losses for German soldiers. Parts of the book are about these conflicts and disagreements which led to assassination attempts against the Fuehrer hatched by a faction within the Army. Four chapters out of thirteen describe in detail the extent and ramifications of the Valkyrie plot of 1944. Giesler wrote of these officers:

“*[T]*hey were still entrenched in the 19th century. They hadn't learned anything at all. They hadn't recognized that this is a war of life or death, not restricted to soldiers, folk or the nation. [...] a fateful struggle in a revolutionary fight for the existence of Europe—in a battle for a new idea of life.” (p. 190)

The prophetic sense of a fateful struggle for Europe was exactly right, considering how Europe is being destroyed in our present century by the replacement of our race with huge flows of migrants from the Third World. This is what happens when international concerns take the place of national concerns.

After the two massive firestorm-and-phosphorous bombing raids on Dresden on the night of February 13, 1945, very late that night Hitler said in Giesler's company:

“What was possible after the terror attack at Hamburg, Cologne, Berlin and wherever else—to trace the victims—at Dresden is impossible. [...] I think back to the situation in 1940. The defeated French and English forces were encircled at Dunkirk. At that time I was pondering, realistic and responsible, as a soldier (1st WW) and politician. Should I admit that an ethical thought might have been involved in my deliberating? It is not easy to order the annihilation of hundreds of thousands.

Today, my decision is considered a mistake, stupidity or weakness. Naturally, after the years of armed clashes degenerating into actions of terrible destruction—today, after Dresden, I would react differently.

During the lucky, but also during the hard, unlucky battles of those war years, I tried to be sensible. I made the effort to hold on to some kind of humanity—if one could react that way responsibly in the middle of a relentless war. I did not lead a war of destruction against cities and cultural institutions, neither when occupying a place nor moving out—Rome, Florence or Paris. They should not pretend keeping Paris undamaged was the merit of the resistance or even the Allied forces. If I would have thought the defense of the city would have been necessary, that would have happened. And if I wanted the destruction of Paris, a battle-experienced commander with a division would have been enough.” (pp. 228f.)

Herman Giesler (left) and Adolf Hitler stand on the bank of the Danube River looking across to Linz.

There are numerous examples of Hitler's thoughtfulness, his acts of friendship and kindness. One is on page 13, when after viewing the crypt of Napoleon in the Dome des Invalides in Paris, Hitler orders Bormann to see that the body of Napoleon's son by the Austrian princess Maria Luisa, buried in the Habsburg royal tomb in Vienna, is removed to his father's crypt in Paris, as a gift to the French people.

In October 1940, Giesler meets Hitler for lunch at a Munich restaurant as the latter is en route from Spain to Italy. The subject of Rudolf Hess comes up and Hitler confides that he is worried about Hess's hypochondria and state of mind, not only because of Hess' high position but because he is sincerely fond of him.

“That I keep him in such high esteem, that I feel an obligation, well, he is the 'Faithful' since the beginning of the National Socialist struggle.” (p. 76)

On one visit to Winniza in 1942, Hitler said to him after lunch.:

“Giesler, you are not only exhausted but you also have not had enough sleep. I can see it. You will now take a walk – naturally with company – and then go to the sauna and you will sleep well. I'm very busy with military discussions and deadlines; no planning talks today. I'll see you at tea-time, late evening after the Lage.” (p. 52)

Hitler always defended Martin Bormann from the criticism he received for shielding the 'Chief' from so many who wanted appointments with him. On one occasion, Giesler quotes Hitler as saying, “Please go along with Bormann” and “He relieves me, he is steady, unshakable and an achiever—I can depend on him.” Another time, Hitler told Giesler:

“If you want to drive away from here early, mad because of Bormann—but you are Mrs. Bormann's guest, and you are also my guest—no, you cannot do that to us. By the way, let it be said to you, in that case Bormann acted absolutely correctly. He naturally should have given you some explanation, which I herewith do now ...”

Giesler writes:

“In retrospect, I always found out on my own that Bormann was correct to get tough on me, or that he acted on Hitler's order.” (pp. 142f.)

When Giesler was staying in the Fuehrerbunker in Berlin in February 1945, he got a call from his brother telling him his mother had been killed by the guns of an American bomber in Munich. When he went to give word to Hitler that he was leaving, Hitler walked out of the military meeting to greet him and give his condolences. Then the Fuehrer told him he would not allow him to travel alone, took him into the meeting room until it was finished, then walked with him back to the bunker, telling him that Kaltenbrunner, the Reich security chief, would take him to Munich in his own train, as he was going there that night. When Kaltenbrunner arrived, the two said goodbye.

“Hitler gave his hand and, as so often, he laid his left hand on my arm. Wordlessly, I looked into Hitler's eyes for the last time.” (pp. 231-233)

Because Hermann Giesler spent a considerable amount of time with Adolf Hitler both alone and in the company of others, in the various Fuehrer military headquarters as well as on trips to cities in connection with architectural work, what he tells us should carry some weight. This book is packed with interesting tidbits about the German Fuehrer, as well as long conversations with him. Often, he is quoted at length. Getting at the truth will come from expanding our sources of information past the usual court historians. A careful reading of this book can be a start of that.

Historical Background

The Einsatzgruppen trial was the ninth of 12 American-run trials held after the International Military Tribunal (IMT) at the Palace of Justice in Nuremberg, Germany. The trial was officially titled “The United States of America v. Otto Ohlendorf et al.” and lasted from September 29, 1947 to April 10, 1948. The court indicted 24 Einsatzgruppen leaders on three counts of criminality: crimes against humanity, war crimes, and membership in organizations declared criminal by the IMT. Only 22 defendants were tried because one committed suicide and another had to be excluded for health reasons.<sup>[1]</sup>

Benjamin Ferencz, a 27-year-old Harvard-educated attorney, was appointed by Telford Taylor as chief prosecutor in the case. The prosecution’s case was based primarily on the Einsatzgruppen reports his team had discovered in Berlin. Ferencz later said about the Einsatzgruppen reports:<sup>[2]</sup>

“So we had the names of each town and village, the date, the number of people killed, the name of the unit, the officer in charge, and other officers. I sat down in my office with a little adding machine, and I began to count the people that were murdered in cold blood. When I reached a million, I said that’s enough for me. I flew from Berlin to Nuremberg, to see Telford Taylor, who by then was a general. And I said, we’ve got to put on another trial.”

Ferencz said the Einsatzgruppen trial would not have taken place if his team had not had the extraordinary luck of finding these reports.<sup>[3]</sup>

The presentation of the prosecution’s evidence lasted less than two days and consisted mainly of excerpts from the Einsatzgruppen reports. Ferencz and the four attorneys assisting him called no prosecution witnesses and presented no films during the trial. Thus, the Nuremberg prosecutors set out to prove by documentation alone that the defendants had participated in some of the worst crimes of the National Socialist regime.<sup>[4]</sup> Since the Einsatzgruppen reports were crucial to the prosecution’s case, we will examine the validity of these reports.

The Einsatzgruppen Reports

The Einsatzgruppen sent reports of their activities back to Berlin by radio. These reports were transcribed and edited by civil servants and distributed in summary format to non-SS offices such as the German Foreign Office. None of these reports exist today in the original—all of them are copies.[5]

That the Germans let copies of the Einsatzgruppen reports fall into the hands of the Allies is strikingly odd. They could have easily burned these few stacks of incriminating papers before the Allies conquered Germany.[6] The authenticity of the Einsatzgruppen reports has also been questioned because, like so much other “evidence” of Nazi atrocities, the documents emerged from the Soviet occupation zone.[7]

The copies of the Einsatzgruppen reports which have been produced show clear signs of postwar additions. A typical example is Einsatzgruppen Report No. 111. Peter Winter writes that this report contains not only completely garbled wording, but also a clear addition to the end of a paragraph (highlighted in italics below)[8]:

These were the motives for the executions carried out by the Kommandos: Political officials, looters and saboteurs, active Communists and political representatives, Jews who gained their release from prison camps by false statements, agents and informers of the NKVD, persons who, by false depositions and influencing witnesses, were instrumental in the deportation of ethnic Germans, Jewish sadism and revengefulness, undesirable elements, partisans, Politruks, dangers of plague and epidemics, members of Russian bands, armed insurgents—provisioning of Russian bands, rebels and agitators, drifting juveniles, Jews in general.

Dr. Arthur Robert Butz also questions the authenticity of the Einsatzgruppen reports. Butz writes [9]:

They [the documents] are mimeographed and signatures are most rare and, when they occur, appear on non-incriminating pages. Document NO-3159, for example, has a signature, R. R. Strauch, but only on a covering page giving the locations of various units of the Einsatzgruppen. There is also NO-1128, allegedly from Himmler to Hitler reporting, among other things, the execution of 363,211 Russian Jews in August-November 1942. This claim occurs on page four of NO-1128, while initials said to be Himmler’s occur on the irrelevant page one. Moreover, Himmler’s initials were easy to forge: three vertical lines with a horizontal line drawn through them.

Carlo Mattogno has shown that the figures quoted in the Einsatzgruppen reports are inaccurate. Mattogno writes [10]:

For example, in the summary of the activity of Einsatzgruppe A (October 16, 1941, to January 31, 1942) the number of Jews present in Latvia at the arrival of the German troops is 70,000, but the number of Jews shot is reported as being 71,184! Furthermore, another 3,750 Jews were alive in work camps. In Lithuania, there were 153,743 Jews, of which 136,421 were allegedly shot, whereas 34,500 were taken to the ghettos at Kaunas, Wilna, and Schaulen, but the total of those two figures is 170,921 Jews!

The British trial of German Field Marshall Erich von Manstein in Hamburg, Germany also proved the inaccuracy of the Einsatzgruppen reports. The prosecution’s case was based on the reports showing that Einsatzgruppe D under the command of Otto Ohlendorf had executed some 85,000 Jews in four and one-half months. Manstein’s defense attorney, Reginald T. Paget, wrote that these claims seemed quite impossible[11]:

In one instance we were able to check their figures. The S.D. claimed that they had killed 10,000 in Simferopol during November and in December they reported Simferopol clear of Jews. By a series of cross checks we were able to establish that the execution of the Jews in Simferopol had taken place on a single day, 16th November. Only one company of S.D. was in Simferopol. The place of execution was 15 kilometers from the town. The numbers involved could not have been more than about 300. These 300 were probably not exclusively Jews but a miscellaneous collection of people who were being held on suspicion of resistance activity...

It was indeed clear that the Jewish community had continued to function quite openly in Simferopol and although several of our witnesses had heard rumors about an S.D. excess committed against Jews in Simferopol, it certainly appeared that this Jewish community was unaware of any special danger...

By the time we had finished with the figures and pointed out the repeated self-contradiction in the S.D. reports, it became probable that at least one "0" would have to be knocked off the total claimed by the S.D. and we also established that only about one-third of Ohlendorf's activities had taken place in von Manstein's area. It is impossible to know even the approximate number of murdered Jews, for not only was Ohlendorf lying to his superiors but as we were able to show, his company commanders were lying to him.

Von Manstein testified that he had no knowledge that Einsatzgruppe D or the German army had a policy of murdering Jews. The court believed Manstein and found him innocent of murdering Jews.[\[12\]](#)

Benjamin Ferencz's Credibility

Benjamin Ferencz has made statements that call into question his independence and integrity. For example, the defense counsel at the Mauthausen trial in Dachau insisted that signed confessions of the accused, used by the prosecution to great effect, had been extracted from the defendants through physical abuse, coercion and deceit.[\[13\]](#) Benjamin Ferencz admits in an interview that these defense counsel's claims were correct[\[14\]](#):

You know how I got witness statements? I'd go into a village where, say, an American pilot had parachuted and been beaten to death and line everyone up against the wall. Then I'd say, "Anyone who lies will be shot on the spot." It never occurred to me that statements taken under duress would be invalid.

In the same interview, Ferencz admits that he observed the torturing and execution of a captured Nazi at a concentration camp[\[15\]](#):

I once saw DPs [Displaced Persons] beat an SS man and then strap him to the steel gurney of a crematorium. They slid him in the oven, turned on the heat and took him back out. Beat him again, and put him back in until he was burnt alive. I did nothing to stop it. I suppose I could have brandished my weapon or shot in the air, but I was not inclined to do so. Does that make me an accomplice to murder?

Ferencz, who enjoys an international reputation as a world-peace advocate, further relates a story concerning the interrogation of an SS colonel. Ferencz explains that he took out his pistol in order to intimidate him<sup>[16]</sup>:

What do you do when he thinks he's still in charge? I've got to show him that I'm in charge. All I've got to do is squeeze the trigger and mark it as auf der Flucht erschossen [shot while trying to escape]...I said "you are in a filthy uniform sir, take it off!" I stripped him naked and threw his clothes out the window. He stood there naked for half an hour, covering his balls with his hands, not looking nearly like the SS officer he was reported to be. Then I said "now listen, you and I are gonna have an understanding right now. I am a Jew—I would love to kill you and mark you down as auf der Flucht erschossen, but I'm gonna do what you would never do. You are gonna sit down and write out exactly what happened—when you entered the camp, who was there, how many died, why they died, everything else about it. Or, you don't have to do that—you are under no obligation—you can write a note of five lines to your wife, and I will try to deliver it..."
[Ferencz gets the desired statement and continues:] I then went to someone outside and said "Major, I got this affidavit, but I'm not gonna use it—it is a coerced confession. I want you to go in, be nice to him, and have him re-write it." The second one seemed to be okay—I told him to keep the second one and destroy the first one. That was it.

Peter Winter asks the question: "Is this the sort of 'objective' legal person who can be relied upon to produce evidence at a major trial?"<sup>[17]</sup> The fact that Ferencz threatened and humiliated his witness and reported as much to his superior officer indicates that he operated in a culture where such illegal methods were acceptable.<sup>[18]</sup> Any lawyer knows that such evidence is not admissible in a legitimate court of law.

Defendants' Testimony

Otto Ohlendorf testified at the IMT that Einsatzgruppe D, the mobile security unit he commanded in the Crimea between June 1941 and 1942, was responsible for the murder of approximately 90,000 people. Ohlendorf's testimony horrified the court and had a depressing effect on the defendants. Dr. Gustav M. Gilbert, the American prison psychologist, wrote that Ohlendorf's testimony established "the inescapable reality and shame of mass murder...by the unquestionable reliability of a German official."<sup>[19]</sup>

British attorney Reginald Paget, however, questioned the validity of Ohlendorf's testimony at the IMT. Paget wrote: "Ohlendorf had reported that not only Simferopol but the whole Crimea was cleared of Jews. He was clearly a man who was prepared to say anything that would please his employers. The Americans, also, had found him the perfect witness."<sup>[20]</sup>

Otto Ohlendorf at the Einsatzgruppen trial retracted his earlier testimony at the IMT that there had been a specific policy to exterminate Jews on racial or religious grounds. Under cross examination, Ohlendorf testified that any Jews or Gypsies killed by his Group D were killed as part of anti-partisan activities. Ohlendorf also testified that only 40,000 people had been executed by his Group D instead of the 90,000 that he had testified to at the IMT.<sup>[21]</sup>

Another defendant at the Einsatzgruppen trial, Walter Haensch, testified that he knew nothing of the murder of the Jews and denied any criminal wrongdoing by his Kommando while he was its leader. Haensch claimed he first learned of the murder of Jews in July 1947 when his interrogator at Nuremberg told him of the Final Solution. Haensch testified that the Einsatzgruppen reports that contradicted his testimony were inaccurate. After the trial, Haensch became so obsessed with proving his innocence that he refused to apply for parole, hoping that American officials would see their error and grant him the clemency he deserved.[22]

Benjamin Ferencz claims the Einsatzgruppen reports were definitive proof that the Einsatzgruppen had mass murdered Jews. Ferencz states: “There were times when I felt outraged. For example, the day one defendant, a colonel, said: ‘What, Jews were shot? I hear that in this courtroom for the first time.’ We had the records of every day that man was out murdering, and he had the gall to say that. I was ready to jump over the bar and poke my fingers into his eyes.”[23]

Michael Musmanno, the presiding judge, provided the defendants with wide latitude in their presentation of evidence in the Einsatzgruppen trial. However, Ferencz writes that Musmanno was convinced early on of the defendants’ guilt[24]:

The judge handed down worse sentences than I would have imposed. So he had made up his mind, early on, that he wasn’t going to be deceived. For him the question was how to sentence them. He was a devout Catholic, and he went into a monastery for a week before sentencing. He convicted all 22 people, and of these he sentenced 13 to death by hanging. During the trial, he had let everyone say whatever they wanted to say. He gave so much leeway; he was leaning over backwards to show the world that it was a fair trial.

Conclusion

Four Einsatzgruppen units altogether numbering 3,000 men—including non-combat troops such as drivers, interpreters, and radiomen—became operational soon after the German invasion of the Soviet Union. One of their missions indisputably consisted of fighting against partisans, and in pursuit of this mission they performed numerous mass shootings.[25]

The official Holocaust historiography, however, claims that the Einsatzgruppen had the additional task of committing genocide against Soviet Jews. The Einsatzgruppen reports, which fall into the period from June 1941 to May 1942, are the primary proof of this alleged genocide. The Einsatzgruppen reports that have been produced are copies which show clear signs of postwar additions, inaccurate and inflated figures, and obscure signatures appearing on non-incriminating pages. Such reports would not constitute valid proof for legitimate historiography or a legitimate court of law.[26]

The defendants at the Einsatzgruppen trial did not receive a fair hearing. The shootings carried out by the Einsatzgruppen were not nearly as extensive as claimed at the trial, for the numbers mentioned in the Einsatzgruppen reports cannot be objectively confirmed and in many cases are demonstrably exaggerated. These reports provide no basis in justice or fact to convict the Einsatzgruppen defendants of genocide against Soviet Jewry.[27]

The Manuscripts of Marcel Nadjari

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Μαρσέλ Νατζαρή (Marcel Nadjari), Χειρόγραφα 1944-1947: Από τη Θεσσαλονίκη στο Ζόντερκομάντο του Άουσβιτς (Hirografa 1944-1947: Apo ti Thessaloniki sto Sonderkommando tou Aousvits), Alexandria Publications, Athens 2018, 978-960-221-768-9, 21 cm × 14 cm, 240 pages, €14.-

Greetings to all. Remember Marcel Nadjari? He was a Greek Jew deported to Auschwitz in April 1944 where he supposedly worked in the Sonderkommando of Crematorium III. After the evacuation of the camp, he was sent to Mauthausen, then Melk, then Gusen II, then back to Mauthausen before liberation. In 1951, he moved to New York where he died in 1971 at age 54.

Previously we had but a brief look at his testimony from a book that contained excerpts from his memoir Chronicle 1941-1945 (Etz Ahaim, 1991), which, it should be noted, was never distributed commercially.<sup>[1]</sup> But a few weeks ago an updated edition was published under a new title: Manuscripts 1944-1947 – From Thessaloniki to the Auschwitz Sonderkommando (Alexandria, 2018). So now we can have an overall look. Let's begin.

Manuscript A

As already mentioned, Nadjari wrote two manuscripts, A and B. A was written in November 3, 1944, and it's a letter to a friend. It was found buried in the camp in 1980. Recently it was about 90% restored and it is published here for the first time, page by page (pp. 39-50). The content is as follows (with comments when necessary).

PAGE 1

The first page is not in Greek but it appears as above. It seems to be instructions in various languages for sending the letter.

PAGE 2

“To my beloved ones,
Dimitrios Athan. Stefanides,
Elias Cohen – Georgios Gounaris.

My dear company, Smaro Efremidou (of Athens) and so many others which I always remember, and to finish, to my dear homeland GREECE, to which I have always been a good citizen.

We started from our Athens on April 2, 1944 after I was snitched on at the camp in Haidari, where I would always receive the packages of the good Smaro and her efforts for me that are unforgettable in these hard days I am going through. I will [...] always to [...] look for [...] my Metsos and sometimes [...] to [...] but take care of [...] her address [...] our Elias and always take care of him [...] and that Manolis has not forgotten them.”

Metsos refers to Dimitrios Stefanides, and Manolis (Emmanuel) is the real first name of Nadjari.

PAGE 3

“And even more that as it unfortunately seems we will never meet again.

After ten days of travel, on April 11 we arrived at Auschwitz where we were sent to the Birkenau camp stayed about one month in quarantine and from there they took the healthy and strong. Where? Where? My Metsos? To a crematory, I will explain further on the nice work that the Almighty wished for us to do.

There is a large building with a wide smokestack with 15 (fifteen) furnaces.
Underneath a garden there are two large underground vast chambers. The one is used to undress and the other chamber of death where the people enter naked and after it’s full with about 3,000 persons it is closed and they gas them, they give up the spirit.

Our job was first to receive them. Most of them”

There are serious inaccuracies here for someone who spent 8 months at the camp.

First, he speaks of one large building with 15 furnaces where there were two. Second, the chambers were not underneath a garden as there was no garden and the chambers were not completely underground, as their roof was one meter above ground. Third, they were large but certainly not “vast”. The room that served as the gas chamber was 30 meters long, a little more than a basketball field (28 meters). It had a surface area of some 210 m<sup>2</sup>. If we assume a maximum possible packing density of some 10 persons per square meter, that would amount to 2,100 people. But that would require military-style discipline to achieve!

This description doesn't seem to stem from direct observation.

“did not know the reason, they cried when they were told that they were going to take a shower and they went ignorant towards death. Until today [...] said they are for the oven [...] tell them lies I would only say I did not understand the language they speak and to the people, men and women that I saw were doomed, would say the truth. After [...] all naked they walked to the chamber of death. In there the Germans had placed pipes on the ceiling [...] to make them think they prepare the shower. With whip in hand the Germans forced them to pack so it fits as many as possible, a real sardine can of humans, then they closed the door hermetically. The gas cans would come with the car of the Germ. Red Cross with two S.S. [...] They are gas men who through some”

These statements are confusing. First, Nadjari claims that their first task was to receive the victims (implying in the undressing room) where he spilled the beans to those who were doomed to die, while playing dumb with the rest. But what were they doing there? Only those unfit for work were sent to the crematorium. Also, the victims appear crying upon hearing about the shower, but at the same time remain ignorant as they enter. This does not make any sense, and as we will soon see the details of this story are different in the second manuscript.

“openings would throw at them the gas.

After half an hour we would open the doors and our work would begin. We would transport the corpses of these innocent women and children to the elevator that would take them to the furnaces chamber and from there they would place them in the furnaces where they would burn without the use of fuel because of the fat they contained. From a human around 640 grams of ash only would be produced [...] which the Germans forced us to smash, pass through a thick sieve and then a car would take it to throw it in the river near us, Vistula, and this is how they erase every trace.

The dramas that my eyes have seen are indescribable. In front of my eyes they have passed about 600,000 (six hundred thousand) Jews from Hungary – French – Polish from Litsmanstad, about 80,000 and recently”

Except for the fact that the gassing description is pretty vague, the claim about furnaces working without fuel is so nonsensical that casts even more doubt that Nadjari ever worked in a crematorium. In addition, it is a well-known fact that the ashes remaining from the cremation of a body amount to some 5% of the body's original weight.<sup>[2]</sup> Assuming an average weight of 60 kg, the ashes would have amounted to some 3 kg, not just 640 grams. However, if the cremation remains had to be smashed and sieved, this indicates an incomplete cremation, hence an even larger amount of cremation remains.

PAGE 6

“they are starting to arrive about 10,000 (ten thousand) Jews from Theresienstadt in Czechoslovakia. Today a transport from Theresienstadt arrived but thank God they did not bring them to us, they kept them in a lager, they say an order came not to kill Jews anymore and it appears to be true, now in the end they changed their mind, but now no Jew is left in Europe. But for us it's different, we must disappear from the Earth because we know too much of their unimaginable ways of abuse and revenge.

Our own commando is called Sonder kommando (special commando), initially it was made up of 1,000 (a thousand) 200 of them Greeks and the rest Polish, and Hungarians and after a Heroic Resistance because they wanted to remove 800 (eight hundred) the one hundred all fell outside the camp”

PAGE 7

“and the others inside.

My good friends Vicko Vrudo and Mois Aaron from Thessaloniki fell.

Now that this order came they will also remove us, we are 26 Greeks in all and the rest are Polish. At least for the Greeks we are determined to die like real Greeks, as every Greek knows how to die, showing up to these last moments, despite the villains' superiority, that Greek blood runs through our veins as we showed in the Italian war.

My dear ones you will wonder by reading the work I did, how could I Manolis or anyone else do this work burning my coreligionists, I wondered the same in the beginning, I thought many times to go”

PAGE 8

“with them to end it but revenge always kept me. I wished and I wish to live to avenge the death of Dad, Mom and my dear sister Nellie. I am not afraid of death, how could I be afraid of him after everything my eyes have seen? Because of this my Elias, my dear cousin, if I am gone you and all my friends should know your duty. I learned from my little cousin, Sarrika Houli (you remember her in my house), she lives today, that Nellie was with your little sister Errika during her last moments.

My only wish is for your hands to receive what I am writing.”

PAGE 9

“My family's fortune I leave to you Metsos – Dimitrios Athanasiou Stefanides – with the request to take with you my cousin Elias.

Elias is a Cohen, and consider him as if you had myself, always take care of him and if by any chance Sarrika Houli returns, my cousin, do to her my Metsos whatever you did to your dear to me niece Smaragda, because we are all suffering here as no man's mind can imagine.

Remember me sometimes as I remember you.

It wasn't meant for me to see our Greece free as you saw it in 12/10/44.

Whoever asks about me tell him that I am no more and that I went as a real Greek. Help, my Metsos, those who return from the camp”

PAGES 10-11

“at Birkenau. I am not sorry, my Metsos, that I will die, but that I will not be able to avenge as I want and know.

If you receive any letter from our relatives abroad reply appropriately that the A. Nadjari family perished murdered by the civilized Germans (New Europe), my George do you remember?

The piano of my Nellie, Metsos, take it from the Sionidou family and give it to Elias to have it with him always so he can remember her, he loved her so much, and she also.

Almost every time they kill I wonder if there is a God and nevertheless I always believed in him and I still believe that God wants it, let his will be done.

I die happy knowing that right now our Greece is Free, I will not live, let the others live, my last word will be Long Live Greece.

Marcel Nadjari”

Manuscript B

Now let's have a look at Manuscript B. This one is a more detailed memoir written in 1947. As Nadjari writes, after arrival at Birkenau, they first went to the Sauna, where they handed over their clothes and valuables. The next morning, they received their tattoos before going for a shower and a full haircut (head and body). Afterwards they stayed in quarantine for a month. It was then that Nadjari first heard about the mass killings:

“Various rumors began to circulate, that those who have gone left in the trucks after we disembarked from the train have been burned, after they killed them. Of course we did not believe it and thought that the Poles in the camp were telling us this to demoralize us, make us ill and take our bread.” (p. 76)

Finally he was sent to Block 13, the block of the Sonderkommandos, where he was assigned to work in Crematorium III. So let's see the description of a gassing (pp. 86-91). The first stage was as follows:

“They would arrive at our yard and then go down the stairs to the Auskleidungsraum where we received them. We would first tell them to sit to rest for a while, if of course the German wasn't looking, then the Germans would shout followed by us Ausziehen, that is undress. The little girls were ashamed and had a lot of trouble undressing, they would cry out of shame and not because they would die in a few minutes as they did not know that. Other women would give us gold coins saying it's a gift. We would take them, although we had no use for them, so that the Germans who were wandering around like crows would not have them. Still other women more mature and smart would come at us asking if they were going to die. I would always say that I did not understand German or any other language but Greek.”

The second stage followed:

“When the women had finished undressing, they would enter through the door in groups of five, naked, with shoes in hand and many with a soap. [...] Afterwards, the men would go down to the undressing room, wondering how they could get their clothes back, since they had all turned into a sea, the same procedure would follow, and they would also enter the gas room. Then, after it was filled and everyone had entered the gas room, the door was closed and, immediately afterwards, the two gas experts climbed above and opened 4 cans and emptied them from above either laughing or chatting about various irrelevant things. They put back the concrete slab. Many times they came down to the small scuttle on the door, watching, with a stopwatch in hand, the minutes needed so that none remains alive (a matter of 6-7 minutes). The moment the door was shut well and they threw the first gas can from the hole, the people realized they were going to die.”

The contradictions with the official storyline have already been pointed out in the previous article. What remains are two contradictions with Manuscript A.

First, in that manuscript the Germans force the victims into the chamber with whips whereas here they use deception. And second, in A we read about “openings” while here there is only one “hole”.

“After about one hour of the killing of these people, special airing devices which we had [...] would suck the polluted air so by opening the door we would only hear the clatter of the bodies gathered around the door which would fall violently on the cement floor.”

In Manuscript A the door opens after half an hour and the work begins right away. Here the ventilation starts after one hour and it works for an unspecified amount of time before the door opens.

“They were all calm. In this human sea we would observe such a serenity that I had doubts whether these indeed were the ones who a while ago were talking with us, who shouted, whose faces had the expression of fear, of terror. Now they looked calm as if they were resting, many were still looking upwards and pointing with their index finger at the sky.”

As the Italians would say, se non è vero, è ben trovato (even if it is not true, it is well conceived).

One last noteworthy fact before moving on to the matter of Nadjari's own survival. Original pages of the manuscript are reproduced in the book. In some of them the text is accompanied by sketches. Two examples:

Pages 26 and 29 of the original.

On the left is the Sauna where Nadjari indicates with numbers all the rooms he went through while on the right there are the barracks with the triple bunk beds. So here is the question: How many sketches of the crematoriums are there?

Answer: None! For reasons unknown, Nadjari neglected to depict the most important part of his testimony. He has also drawn a rough sketch of Bunker 2, as well as a map of the camp which fills an entire page, yet the crematoriums are nowhere to be found???

So finally, if Nadjari was a member of the Sonderkommando, how did he survive? Well, the information he gives about this is peculiar. First, on the demolition of the Crematoriums II and III (with the help of some girls) he writes:

“I, in every way, was trying to explain to Ninetta and the other girls how the Germans killed so many thousands, the mode of operation, how we were burning the bodies. Although they would see them in front of them, they could not believe it. I was explaining them this because we of the Sonderkommando were certain that we would not live, they would kill us beforehand, before liberation, because our eyes had seen more than they should have. This was not a reason not to be cheerful, and in fact I pretty much was. I would even set up a theater and they were all excited, specifically in fact, on January 1, 1945, I performed in the Auskleidungsraum of Crematorium I, where Ninetta and Paulina were present. As it seemed all of them were very pleased.” (p. 101)

One wonders which one is harder to believe: That Nadjari was in such a good mood or that he set up a show in the crematorium?

“On January 18, 1945 the evacuation of Birkenau Auschwitz was at an end. We, since morning, had been shut away in Block 13. We were a hundred. Our anguish was indescribable. While the others were leaving the camp, we were locked up. They had emptied the entire camp, the only ones left were us and some other little departments and almost all of the Germans. Every so often we would hear blasting around us and especially in the crematoriums. Around dusk, we suddenly see a huge column of prisoners who had left at noon returning back to the camp. We could not stand it anymore being shut away, we exited the Block and intermingled with the others. They looked for us a couple of times but none of us showed up.” (p. 102)

So this is how they escaped. They intermingled with other prisoners and the Germans lost them. Even if this was possible Nadjari forgot to explain something very simple: How exactly did they exit the block if they were locked up?

Summary

Nadjari’s manuscripts contradict both themselves and the official storyline, and even make it hard to determine whether he actually worked in a crematorium. What is certain is that they contain obviously false statements that any historian would pretend were never there.

What the Germans Knew | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Another important issue regarding the Holocaust is the awareness of the German public about it, either civilians or soldiers. What did the Germans know? Two researchers, historian Eric A. Johnson and sociologist Karl-Heinz Reuband, started searching for answers in 1993. After nearly 3,000 written surveys and 200 interviews the result was the book What We Knew: Terror, Mass Murder, and Everyday Life in Nazi Germany (Basic Books, 2006). It's time to have a look at their findings, so brace yourselves dear readers as this will be one hell of a long ride! Contents follow:

Conclusion: What Did They Know?

The authors not only interviewed Germans but also Jews, including eventually 20 interviews of each group, while changing the names of the interviewees to safeguard their anonymity. So we open the book and ask: What did you know about the mass murder of the Jews?

The Jews

We begin with Margaret Leib who, before fleeing to the US in 1941, was involved in communist resistance activities in Berlin.

"Before 1941, you hadn't heard anything. Between 1942 and 1945, I was already here [in America]. I arrived here with great difficulty with my mother on September 12, 1941. My mother had gone to France right after my father's death. My sister was nine years younger than me. She was killed. [While] they were still in Marseilles, she had a baby. Eventually she couldn't feed her child any longer and she didn't want to go on anymore. So she took the child to a children's home. Then she was picked up during a raid and sent to a temporary camp in Nancy, and from there to Poland and the gas chamber. That she was deported is something I only know about from books." (p. 13)

Only from books. No comment necessary. Next, Henry Singer, who fled to Italy in 1938. He doesn't seem to know much as he states only the following:

"It's not only the Germans that hated Jews. Almost the whole world hated Jews. The concentration camps – Auschwitz, Dachau, Buchenwald – Britain knew about it, France knew about it, the Americans knew about it. They could have done something about it. They could have bombed the camps because they were burning the bodies anyway. But they didn't do it. You know why? Because they said, 'Leave Hitler alone because he's doing a good job for us killing all the Jews. He gets the blame and we get what we want.' That's it in a nutshell, and nobody's going to tell me any different."

(p. 18)

On the other hand he admits:

“But in all honesty I want to say that not all Germans were as bad as you see being depicted in the movies and the films. The majority was, but there were some that were not. So it’s not fair to accuse all of them.” (p. 17)

We now move to Rebecca Weisner who was sent to Auschwitz in October 1942 at the age of 16:

“We already knew by late July, August. One came from this camp, one came from that camp. Somehow we knew those things were more or less going on – that there was Auschwitz and that they had gas ovens to gas all the people, children and so. We knew that.” (p. 51)

Once again, they “somehow” knew. But Ernst Levin who was also deported to Auschwitz in January 1943, has a few more things to say (pp. 73-75):

“Word was filtering out. It was also filtering out that transports were leaving for the east from the ghettos. It was known at that time that these transports went directly to Treblinka or Auschwitz. Terrible, terrible! But people didn’t want to talk about it. When the German Jews learned about it, they really refused to believe a lot of it. The German Jews themselves would say, ‘This is atrocity propaganda. That can’t be so. After all, it’s the twentieth century and we’re German.’ Many of them still considered themselves German. They didn’t believe it primarily because they didn’t want to believe it. Who can blame them? In Breslau the transports started in 1941. My grandmother had sisters, all of whom were sent on these transports. These people were taken away and they had nothing but their baggage. They left behind all their belongings, apartments, rooms, whatever they had. There were some vague rumors that they were going to the east to work. My grandmother’s sisters at that time were in their sixties. How were they going to work in the east? There were sick people. ‘What is happening to them?’ they wondered. It was very disturbing, yet nothing was known for certain. Nobody knew of the gas chamber in Auschwitz at that time. Breslau had a very large Jewish community, the second or third largest in Germany. The only Jews left in Breslau at the end of 1942 were those who were integrated in the German war effort.”

He further adds:

“I was on the last transport when Breslau decided to become judenfrei [Jew free]. I think it was in January 1943. This German guy I was working with – he was actually a Meister, but he had not been drafted because he was already too old – then gleefully said: “Na ja, jetzt geht Ihr mal Steine kloppen in Russland!” [Oh yeah, now you are going to go break rocks in Russia!] I figured that this was going to be our fate. In general it was said that we were going to be relocated to the east – to work in the east. Just about four weeks before I went on my transport, there was one transport before mine and a friend of mine named Helmut went on that transport. That transport wound up in Treblinka. In a place near Treblinka, there was also a contingent of Germans working, one of whom we had known. Helmut wrote a letter and gave it to this man and said: ‘Send it to my Ernst.’ I got this letter. I never knew who sent it or how they got it out. He told me in this letter that he was near Treblinka and ‘hier ist ein Lager, wo die Menschen chemisch behandelt werden.' [Here is a camp where the people are being treated with chemicals.] It is amazing that even at that time he wouldn't say that they were gassed. Isn't that amazing? I was thinking, 'What the heck does he mean?' I guess he eventually was gassed. He certainly didn't survive. Therefore I would have known four weeks before I was arrested that something was going wrong."

So in a worksite near Treblinka his friend Helmut heard about people being "treated" with "chemicals". Leaving aside the fact that he could even send a letter, this sounds more like a delousing procedure. As Levin himself thought, why didn't he just say that they were gassed?

Next is Ruth Mendel, deported to Auschwitz in April 1943, when she was only 14 years old.

"As it turned out, women and children arriving in Auschwitz were gassed. But we were not. We were taken into Auschwitz and the other prisoners that had been there already knew their way around and said to us that the reason we weren't gassed was that they thought, 'Well they'll die soon anyway, so it doesn't pay to run gas into the trains for just a few people.' When we arrived, the SS was there with the dogs and the white gloves and the whips in their hands and beautifully pressed uniforms. At the time there were no selections. We were taken to the women's camps." (p. 87)

This shows how silly the rumors could be. Despite her age she was put to work on digging ditches. Here's what she supposedly saw:

"That whole summer the crematorium was going day and night. During the day it was all smoke and at night you could see flames coming up. You could really see it. You could see it from miles away. In Birkenau I stayed with my mother the whole time in a big barracks, sleeping on boards with three pieces of straw or whatever that were infested with lice and fleas. I wouldn't be alive if not for my mother. The crematorium was going and the flames were coming out. At night you would see it red. During the day it was black because of the smoke. There were little pieces, chips of bone, flying all over the place." (p. 88)

We can be pretty sure that there is some poetic license here. And here's how she left the camp:

"They put us on a train on November 1, 1944. We had no idea how we were picked to go on this train. Someone told us it was not to go anywhere – at the end of the tracks was the crematorium, a few yards or so away. But someone else told us, 'No, you are supposed to go to Germany as laborers.' Of course you couldn't trust this, but it turned out to be true." (p. 89)

Well what do you know? Now it's Helmut Grunewald's turn who has some really interesting things to say. Born in 1918 to a Jewish father and a Catholic mother, he was deported to Auschwitz on March 1943. His father had been arrested by the Gestapo in 1942. Here's what happened at the interrogation:

"This had all happened half a year before my arrest. But [when I was finally arrested,] my father was already there. While he was being interrogated [at Gestapo headquarters] by Bóttner and two other officers, he said to them, 'I don't know why you want to interrogate me. I know that I'll be sent to Auschwitz and be gassed anyway.' [...] But then they said to him, 'What kind of atrocity story is this that you are telling us? What makes you think that they are killing people there? How do you get that idea?' 'Ah, you don't have to tell me that,' my father said. 'I know that. I know exactly what's going on there.'" (p. 95)

But how did he know that?

"My father was extremely well connected, also in non-Jewish circles. That people were being murdered in Auschwitz and in Poland in general was evident anyway. And it was also already known that Auschwitz was very clearly an extermination camp." (p. 96)

How about that. It was "evident". Well, no matter how evident here's the rest of the story. The Gestapo let him go!

"We believed it. We knew that it was true. It was just as my father had said to them when they had asked him, 'What makes you say that? What's with this nonsense?' He replied to them, 'You don't have to tell me anything. I know that. So why do you want to interrogate me for so long?' After this, they sent him back home to demonstrate that all of that was not true, and then my father went immediately into hiding. He went to the Eifel, to my grandfather's birthplace, and was hidden there." (p. 97)

Now Herbert Klein, deported to Theresienstadt in June 1943. In contrast to Grunewald, he claims that the Jewish community did not know of the mass murders. And as for the Germans he says:

"But nobody knew that [the Jews were being systematically murdered]. Nobody knew that because when my sister was deported from Theresienstadt to Auschwitz, first of all, we didn't know it was Auschwitz. Still I'm sure certain things must have been known. When the Germans say they never heard anything, that's a lie. One knew Dachau was a concentration camp. One knew they killed people. One knew that Sachsenhausen was a concentration camp. One knew about Buchenwald and about quite a lot of them. So, if someone said they didn't know anything about it, that's a lie. But if they say they did not particularly know that the Jews were murdered by the millions in Poland, that I accept. Even so, it is very difficult to accept." (p. 107)

Next, Hannelore Mahler, deported to Theresienstadt in 1944. Asked when did she first hear of the mass murders she replied:

"That was actually more or less in the camp. In Berlin, one had whispered about it, and one was always questioning whether it was true or not. But nobody had dared to say anything openly about it, so it was still only a kind of assumption. That is the way that it is when you yourself are in a situation where you can be sent away on a transport at any time. You don't want to believe it." (p. 117)

Asked one more time, she replied:

"In effect, we knew nothing. Sure, we said, 'Where are they? What's happened to them? And so on.' But this was among ourselves, and afterward there wasn't anybody left whom one could talk to. Yes, we suspected that those who had been sent away had not been sent to a sanatorium. But, since we ourselves could have been the next ones, or were

– we were practically on the list to be mowed down – we didn’t want to believe it, because we could have been next. Do you understand what I am trying to say? We talked a lot about this afterward in retrospect. In retrospect, we said that we had suspected it and left it unspoken during the war. Everyone knew it. Everyone had thought that it was so. But we did not want to talk about it, because you could be there yourself. When one suspects that those who had been arrested and taken away and had never been heard from again, had not been sent to a sanatorium, you can almost compare that with someone who is about to be tested for cancer. One just doesn’t talk about it, even though everyone knows that it is so. Do you understand? One just doesn’t talk about it.” (p. 119)

Next are the testimonies of Jews who went into hiding and the first is Ilse Landau, who was arrested in 1943 for distributing leaflets in Berlin. She was sent to Auschwitz but she managed to escape by jumping off the train. Her replies are worth quoting in full:

“When did you first hear about the mass murder of the Jews? Was it before you were put on the train to Auschwitz or after that?”

We had heard already that the other people were murdered in those other, nearer by, concentration camps like Bergen-Belsen and Sachsenhausen. There was a lot we had heard about.

When you were on the train going to Auschwitz, did you know that you’d go to Auschwitz?

Yes.

What did you know about Auschwitz at that time?

That they all would be gassed. Only a few who could work [might survive]. They were to dig the graves, cook for them, clean the toilets, or whatever there was to be done as work. That was the same as in Theresienstadt. My father died in Theresienstadt, and my aunt saw it with her own eyes that they had nothing to eat.

When did you first hear about the gassing of Jews and from whom?

That I can’t tell you.

Was it from other Jews, or from Gentiles, or from the radio?

From radio maybe. But I didn’t listen to the radio, my husband did. I went to sleep. I had to sleep. I wasn’t able to listen. A man is still stronger, you know. ” (p. 125)

Another Jewess, Lore Schwartz, describes Theresienstadt and Auschwitz as transport camps:

“We did know, because we had worked before in those transport camps. The old people and the war wounded and the Jewish community employees went to Theresienstadt, so you knew that there was a preference, that there must have been something special about it. Auschwitz, I was there, so I knew. I was there as a visitor. I also knew that my father was in Buchenwald and that he died a few days after he was released. We knew that it was no picnic whatever was there. How much the Germans knew, I don’t know. But I can tell you that later on when I was in a work camp that you marched there in the wintertime without hair and without clothes. So they must have known, too. Definitely! If anybody tells me they didn't, they did." (p. 131)

Finally, Rosa Hirsch also claims ignorance on mass murders:

"In the beginning, you really thought they were going to work camps. I guess they didn't want to admit it to themselves. Nobody knew for sure. I mean, at least nobody of the people I knew. We knew that it was something horrible. When the mail came back from my aunt's with address unknown, we knew they were not alive anymore. But nobody knew about gassing. I don't think anybody knew that. I mean, maybe they thought they died of hunger or maybe they died of something else. We didn't know." (p. 137)

This concludes the Jewish testimonies.

The Germans

We begin with Hubert Lutz who was born in 1928 and was a member of the Hitler Youth from ages 7 to 17. Regarding the murder of Jews he first states:

"We heard about a transport of people going out. There were rumors that people were killed, but there was never any mention of gas chambers. There were rumors that said people were squeezed together in these camps and most died of typhoid fever. And that was in essence the execution style. Now, about shootings, that was in connection with the partisans. Nevertheless, I am sure that they rounded up Jewish people and executed them along with the other partisans. I didn't really give it any thought. I was fifteen, sixteen years old. We heard this on the periphery. That was not, to kids of my age at the time, our primary interest." (p. 147)

Then follows this:

"When did you first hear that Jews were being murdered in great numbers?"

In great numbers, I would say 1948, 1949. We knew about concentration camps. In 1945 after the war there were a lot of people running around and showing their numbers, their tattoo numbers. There were some pictures that were shown right at the end of the war, like when they liberated Dachau, Buchenwald. But that to us was almost understandable because the pictures they showed were of people that had obviously died from starvation. You could see their skeletons. We had not been through that kind of a starvation, but we knew how quickly you lose your weight. And there was also the word that most of these people had died from typhoid fever. And there were many other typhoid cases, for instance, in France and in Buchenwald. So, yes, that was not excusable. On the other hand, there were times at the end of the war when a lot of our people didn't have anything to eat.

What about the gassing and the shootings?

We tried not to believe it. We simply said, 'No, that's too brutal, too gruesome, too organized.' Quite frankly, I began to read more and study more about it when I was in this country after 1959. A lot of people asked me, 'How come you guys didn't know this? You claim you didn't know anything about it.' And, I asked myself, 'Well, how come you didn't know this?’ So I started reading a lot and I started, well, maybe reading with a biased mind, hoping that I would find reason to believe that it was not true. But the evidence piled up. This became more convincing by the day. So I also asked myself, ‘Could we have done anything different? Where did the responsibility lie?’ My conclusion was the responsibility lies in the fact that people didn’t do anything about it. They just stood by and closed their eyes and ears. And I think that is true. People just didn’t want to believe it. They didn’t.” (p. 150)

Now a daughter of a former policeman, Gertrud Sombart, who lived in Dresden during the Nazi period had this to say:

“Did you know anything about the mass murder of the Jews?”

Not about the mass murder. We heard from my mother, who had heard from a female patient at the hospital, that there were such camps. But we thought they were labor camps because one had put them to work in the war industry. Nevertheless, she had provided some hints about that, but not anything specific. We did, however, get some more specific information from an acquaintance of ours. He had been working at a large power plant in Poland. He wore the Order of Blood decoration, which was for those who had been with the Nazis from the very beginning. Nevertheless, he was basically a good man, hardworking and industrious. We were friends with him and he knew what our views were. He would never trick us. While he was over there in Poland, he had seen how Jews were forced to shovel out ditches and were then shot. After that he said to himself that he was not going to go along with that, and then he returned [to Dresden] and talked about this.

But you apparently didn’t know until after the war that people were being killed in those camps?

Yes. There was, however, the time when I did see this one group. They were Jews and had probably been in such a camp. That was here in Dresden. Nevertheless, there were around fifty of them at least. They looked like starving wretches, haggard, and were merely able to shuffle themselves along. The population thought they were criminals. They looked like criminals.” (p. 161)

Next, Anna Rudolf who worked in Berlin at a film duplication laboratory:

“Did you know before the end of the war about the concentration camps?”

No. You would often hear things like, ‘He has been taken to a labor camp. He did something and he’s been taken to a labor camp.’ But everything was covered up and kept concealed. Nobody knew anything specific. And then we’d hear again, ‘They packed that guy off to Dachau.’ My parents had thought that Dachau was a labor camp until it got around what kind of camp it really was. After that, everybody was afraid and nobody dared say to anything.

Did you know from rumors before the end of the war about what had happened to the Jews?

Yes, even already during the war. That was all certainly talked about. But, as I was saying, it was always just said, 'They are going to a labor camp.' That they were gassed, and so forth, nobody had thought that. Nobody had thought that. Afterward, after the war, I worked with a Jewish woman whose father was a tailor. Her entire family had been taken away and her father had been forced to make and mend clothes in a concentration camp. But her brothers and her sister and her mother were all gassed. She herself had been hidden and so both she and her father survived. Anyway, she told me all about what went on there, how they were beaten, and how they had to do all that work. That was certainly horrible." (p. 170)

It's the same old story all over again. Someone was put to work while the rest of the family was gassed.

Peter Reinke follows, the son of a plasterer, born in 1925. He joined the navy in 1942 and he stated the following:

"While you were in the military, did you hear anything about the concentration camps or the deportations?"

No, no. Not much. Not much. It was said that the Jews who hadn't been deported had been made to work. That was what the [Nazis] had publicly told the people. What was done there, nobody knew. But we did indeed see how concentration camp prisoners had been forced to work, such as, for example, the Hiwis. These were Russians, White Russians, or Ukrainians, who had to carry out all sorts of functions. They had to work. They had to load and unload and perform all the menial tasks that needed to be done anywhere in the Wehrmacht, in any unit.

Did you ever hear any rumors or other things about mass executions?"

No, no. I didn't know about that. During the war we didn't hear anything about that. We were seldom on land, only for loading up supplies. [But there was this one time] when we were in Libau [Latvia]. The naval base lay outside the city – at the point where the open territory began – and there was a lot of shooting. Then a rumor went around that they were shooting Russians. But then, we knew that the Waffen SS didn't take any prisoners when they were dealing with the Russians. On the other hand, Waffen-SS men were shot by the Russians. There was so much shooting going on in the area – the front was only fifteen kilometers away – that you couldn't really tell who was shooting whom and where the shooting came from." (p. 176)

Next is Werner Hassel, who grew up in Upper Silesia, and listened to the BBC both at home and in the military. Yet he knew nothing about exterminations (p. 182):

"The soldiers out there on the front knew effectively nothing about the concentration camps and the mass murder of the Jews. I cannot imagine that [they had known]. I would have been aware of that. Especially since I came from a very different political past, I would have heard about that. A large number of people really didn't know anything. I myself didn't know where Sachsenhausen was or Auschwitz. That really was only known by people with inside information. When we were in Poland, we heard absolutely nothing [about the murder of the Jews], no rumors, absolutely nothing."

Now let's hear Hiltrud Kühnel, a student of dentistry during the war at the University of Frankfurt. Pay attention to her replies, one by one:

“Back then, what did you imagine concentration camps to be?”

Extermination camps. That’s what I imagined concentration camps to be.

You didn’t simply think of something like a labor camp?

No, no. Extermination camps! You knew that was what they were. Hence, if someone says today that he had never known that, it is absolutely not true.

Do you mean to say that not only you knew about that but others did as well?

That was known by others as well.

How did one know that?

From the circle of acquaintances that you had, from the clergy and from good friends who shared our political views. It was talked around about what they were doing there. Those were indeed real extermination camps.

When did you hear about extermination camps for the first time? Can you give an exact date?

That must have been 1938 to 1939 at the time of Kristallnacht. That was in November 1938. We were sent home from school. That morning our school principal said to us, ‘Please go home immediately, all of you. Horrible things have happened.’ I had to go back home with my schoolmate, from Frankfurt to where I lived in Hochst. Anyway, that was horrible for me. They had taken the cakes from Jewish pastry shops and thrown them onto the street. They cut open the Jewish families’ down blankets. There were a lot of Jews in Frankfurt. You could see the feathers floating around in the street. The cigars, the pipes from the tobacco shops, everything was lying in the street. The windowpanes were smashed in. I came home crying. We really could only cry. And then we said, ‘Those are beasts. Human beings don’t do things like that.’

But that isn’t exactly the extermination of human beings.

No, but that was the beginning of the disregard of a race. They classified them as inferior. I would say that is when one started to know about it all. But, for heaven’s sake, you weren’t allowed to talk about it.

But how did one hear about it then, if one wasn’t allowed to talk about it?

For example, from a clergyman who was often at our place and from some others, whose names I can’t recall, who said, ‘We heard that...’ That’s how.

But what had they heard exactly?

That the Jews were being gassed, and the foreigners. Indeed, one knew about the gassing.

One heard this expression exactly?

Gassing. Yes.

That they were being gassed, you heard this from clergymen? In your own home?

Yes, in our home. I already said that this was a kind of meeting place that the Nazis were aware of. They were aware that anti-Nazi groups were still meeting with my father.

Did you hear about this from the clergymen yourself?

Yes. Politics was the only thing they discussed at our place, whether it was over lunch or otherwise. I can really only recall political conversations at our home. That's how I grew up. The clergymen knew that at our place they would never be named as a traitor or anything like that because of what they had made known there.

I wonder how the clergymen got their information. Did they say how they found out?

No, they didn't tell us that. It only came up in the course of conversation as yet another atrocity that was known." (pp. 187-189)

On to Ruth Hildebrand, the daughter of a civil servant in Berlin. Regarding the concentration camps she knew the following:

"Only that the Jews were being sent there. That the Jews were being gassed, they didn't say. They didn't go as far as that. The soldiers who had escorted the trains with the Jews had to get off just before the gates [of the camps], and then they rode back again with the train that was now empty. That's what they said, and my husband told me about this late one evening. It depressed him so. It weighed heavily on him, and also, of course, on me. That they were gassed came out later. It did leak out slowly, however, that they had somehow met their death there. But one did not hear anything specific." (p. 194)

On these rumors about the camps, Ekkehard Falter from Dresden comments:

"One knew that there were concentration camps. The Dresden members of the Communist Party were incarcerated at the Hohenstein Castle. In 1933, after the Nazis took power, they were collected there, and the population of Dresden knew that there was a concentration camp where members of the Communist Party were incarcerated. At that time there weren't any concentration camps where Jews were being held, unless they were politicians. Only in 1943 did it become clear to me that Jews were being incarcerated in large numbers. They disappeared without any ado, picked up one by one. I knew that there was a special stratum of Jews here in Dresden that was richer than others who had pensions or had emigrated. But in the inner city, there were also poorer Jews from sections of the city where less affluent people lived because rents were cheaper. They didn't have the money to emigrate." (p. 198)

Asked when did he hear for the first time about the mass murders, the only thing he knew about was the mass shootings as he had learned from an SS sergeant:

"At night he would tell me about things they had done. Because it was all so horrible I couldn't sleep anymore. It would be a chapter in and of itself, and I don't now want to talk about what he and his combat unit did to the population, like hoisting them up into the air with their feet and then shooting them. He told me that he didn't understand how that could have happened. He said that there had been people with them who had passed their university qualification exams and had come from solid middle-class homes, but in only half a year they had been reeducated to the point that they no longer were bothered by what they were doing. [For example,] they had rounded up all the people in a Polish village, women and children, locked them up in a church, and then shot at them from the church's gallery before setting the church on fire. 'We then lay around the church in radiant sunshine while the church burned. Those who had not gotten out were screaming, and then the door suddenly opened and a small child came out. One guy then got up, rat-a-tat-tat, dead. [Having been involved in all of this,] can you imagine that I am now going to remain here?' And then, with the pin that had been just implanted in his leg and in a cast, he got up and took off. He even told me about things that were still worse. I don't want to talk about them here. They are that dreadful." (p. 199)

Stefan Reuter from a working-class family in Berlin, was asked if he had heard what was happening to the Jews during the war. Here's his response:

"No, as crazy as it is. Sure, it was talked about, but I didn't have any solid proof. At the time when my wife was to be picked up, one heard in communist circles that numbers of Jews were being gassed. There were these rumors, but there was no direct proof. After all, one can talk a lot. My thoughts leaned more toward the view that it could really have been possible." (p. 203)

Then we have Ernst Walters, from a small town in the Saar region, who became a Nazi Party cell leader in 1937, and declares that he was already aware of the fate of the Jews in 1935. After this he states the following:

"[During the war] my parents [were evacuated and] were in Hameln and I somehow got the news that they were there. Since I had my motorcycle, I decided to drive there – I even had somebody riding on the back of the motorcycle with me. And then on the way back, we drove through Thuringia. I don't know what town it was, as I didn't take notice of it. But, anyway, we made a stop there and the place was stinking: 'What is that smell?' 'Over there is a concentration camp, that's where the corpses are being burned, where soap is being made from the Jews.' In the concentration camps, [there were] Jews, and not only Jews. There were also communists. And there were also some in our town who disappeared. There were some who disappeared who were sick. That [all] was managed by the party. The party had them disappear." (p. 208)

Weird smells were enough for the imagination to go wild. But in the end everything turns out to be endless hearsay. Effie Engel was from a working-class family with communist leanings in Dresden. Here's how she learned about the mass murders:

"I heard about this from my mother, who had heard about it from her friend – they were actually not supposed to talk about it, as it was all strictly confidential. Just before the end of the war, he was given leave and he came to visit us and he said, 'Listen, I have to tell you this. I can hardly stand it any longer. It is impossible how those people are being abused there. They have driven them down into those tunnels and forced them to work under SS supervision, and one after another of them is dropping dead because they simply don't get enough to eat.' And then he also went on to tell us about how they had been in camps, and about how they were so decimated that there were ever fewer and fewer of them. Only the strongest were sent to work; the others were annihilated. That was something he knew about already, and that was how I heard about it." (p. 218)

Winfried Schiller was from the city of Beuten in Upper Silesia. His father was a doctor and had some connections with Auschwitz which was not far from them:

"In any event, Auschwitz was less than one hundred kilometers from us. Every now and then, one thing or another got through to us about how the Nazis had numerous people in the camp. But, about the actual gassing or the elimination of the Jews, that was not known right up until the last days of the war. But that the Nazis interned people there, that the camp was full of people, that was definitely known." (p. 222)

Regarding the rumors he adds:

"Only in the last years of the war was when the rumors got through about things like the concentration camp inmates being tortured and that they were dying so wretchedly. About the actual consistent gassing, we did not know. Then, when the Russian invasion came and the German army had to retreat, the concentration camp was evacuated. Then there came a great flood of concentration camp inmates in their striped clothes. It ran through Beuten toward Silesia. It was only then that the extent really became known." (p. 223)

Next witness, Adam Grolsch, a radio operator in the German army on the Russian front. Asked about the mass murder of the Jews, he first spoke of a mass shooting of 25,000 Jews in Pinsk within two days in October 1942. This was done on German orders but by Cossacks, Lithuanians and Latvians. Although the shootings are a fact, the number he claims is way too high to be believable.

Anyway he was finally asked if he had heard BBC reports about gassings, to which he replied:

"Yes, I heard that as well. I can still remember this because I later saw those [gas] vans. But I heard about it too. I had by chance seen those vans. They were parked in Rowno [Rivne] and nobody knew what they were. They were those large and long mobile trailers attached to trucks. That is to say, they were mobile gas chambers for smaller operations. My attention was drawn to it by the BBC. Where I saw it was in Rowno. Rowno was in the middle of the Ukraine. But previously we had heard about such things from the BBC, like about mass shootings of Russians. That was what I knew about the best. They had also explained how they had also done that with small groups [of people] and with such vehicles as well. That was such a thing to hear that you wanted to see for yourself if that was really the case. And then I ended up seeing two or three of those things in Rowno, parked near the harbor. I often had to go to Rowno to get replacement parts for the radio post. That could have been in 1943." (p. 237)

But according to the official story, those mobile gas chambers were single trucks, not the long trailers attached to trucks. And of course he never witnessed any of them in operation. He only made the connection because of the BBC.

So finally we arrive at the last witness, Walter Sanders, who was a communications officer on the Russian front. He concludes his interview with the following:

“For the sake of those who say today that they didn’t know anything about it – a large part of the population did know about it. Perhaps [they didn’t know] that it was quite as brutal as it was in reality. But they knew that there were concentration camps. They knew that Jews were kept there. And later, word got around that they were gassed. It wasn’t for nothing that it was said in those years, ‘Take care, otherwise you’ll go up the chimney.’ That was a familiar figure of speech. It circulated everywhere in Germany. [An expression like] ‘otherwise, you’ll go through the chimney’ doesn’t come about by chance.” (p. 259)

Nope. Not by chance. But a figure of speech it was.

Summary

From the revisionist viewpoint, not one of the above statements is unexpected or unprecedented. They all add up to the point that the rumors about mass killings were running wild, although not everyone had heard about them or believed them. They also illuminate the mindset of those who did believe them, some of them almost religiously. Of course there was hard labor and mass shootings. But after decades of research, it can be stated with certitude that it is the extermination story that has gone up the chimney.

American Jurists and Attorneys Opposing Injustice at Nuremberg

by John Wear

The Nuremberg and later trials were organized primarily for political purposes rather than to dispense impartial justice. This article will discuss the efforts of three American attorneys to expose and correct the injustice of these trials.

Charles F. Wennerstrum

Iowa Supreme Court Justice Charles F. Wennerstrum, who served as the presiding judge in the Nuremberg trial of German generals, resigned his appointment in disgust at the proceedings. In an interview with the Chicago Tribune, he criticized the one-sided handling of evidence in the trials. Wennerstrum said that selection of the evidence in the trials was made by the prosecution from the large tonnage of captured German records. The defense had access only to those documents which the prosecution considered material to the case.[\[1\]](#)

Justice Wennerstrum also said that the prosecution and staff at Nuremberg were more interested in revenge than justice. He stated: “The prosecution has failed to maintain objectivity aloof from vindictiveness, aloof from personal ambitions for convictions...The trials were to have convinced the Germans of the guilt of their leaders. They convinced the Germans merely that their leaders lost the war to tough conquerors.”[\[2\]](#)

Wennerstrum stated: “The entire atmosphere is unwholesome...Lawyers, clerks, interpreters, and researchers were employed who became Americans only in recent years, whose backgrounds were embedded in Europe’s hatreds and prejudices...If I had known seven months ago what I know today, I would never have come here...The high ideals announced as the motives for creating these tribunals have not been evident.” The lack of appeal in the Nuremberg cases left Wennerstrum “with a feeling that justice has been denied.”[\[3\]](#)

Edward L. Van Roden

Pennsylvania judge Edward L. Van Roden and Texas Supreme Court Justice Gordon Simpson were members of a three-man commission to investigate the torture and abuse of German defendants in American-run war-crimes trials. Their Simpson Commission report examined the 139 death sentences against Germans which at that time had not been carried out. The cases against the 139 doomed men fell into three groups: Germans accused of involvement in crimes at the Dachau Concentration Camps, in the killing of the crews of downed American warplanes, or in the Malmédy incident.

Van Roden was quoted in an article in The Progressive magazine that he was shocked at the methods used to obtain confessions from German defendants:

The statements which were admitted as evidence were obtained from men who had first been kept in solitary confinement for three, four, and five months. They were confined between four walls, with no windows, and no opportunity of exercise. Two meals a day were shoved in to them through a slot in the door. They were not allowed to talk to anyone. They had no communication with their families or any minister or priest during that time.

This solitary confinement proved sufficient in itself in some cases to persuade the Germans to sign prepared statements. These statements not only involved the signer, but often would involve other defendants.

Our investigators would put a black hood over the accused's head and then punch him in the face with rubber hose. Many of the German defendants had teeth knocked out. Some had their jaws broken.

All but two of the Germans, in the 139 cases we investigated, had been kicked in the testicles beyond repair. This was Standard Operating Procedure with American investigators.[\[4\]](#)

Van Roden stated that German prisoners who still refused to sign false statements faced more-severe improper treatment:

Sometimes a prisoner who refused to sign was led into a dimly lit room, where a group of civilian investigators, wearing U.S. Army uniforms, were seated around a black table with a crucifix in the center and two candles burning, one on each side. "You will now have your American trial," the defendant was told.

The sham court passed a sentence of death. Then the accused was told, "You will hang in a few days, as soon as the general approves this sentence: but in the meantime sign this confession and we can get you acquitted." Some still wouldn't sign.

We were shocked by the crucifix being used so mockingly.[\[5\]](#)

Van Roden concluded: "Unless these crimes committed by Americans are exposed by us at home, the prestige of America and American justice will suffer permanent and irreparable damage."[\[6\]](#)

Willis N. Everett, Jr.

American attorney Willis N. Everett, Jr. was assigned to defend the 74 German defendants accused in the Malmédy incident. The trial took place from May 16 to July 16, 1946 before a military tribunal of senior American officers operating under rules established by the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal.[\[7\]](#)

Everett and his defense staff of lawyers, interpreters and stenographers divided into several teams to interview the defendants. Everett wrote to his family of the experience:

Several defendants today said they thought they had had a trial...a Col. sat on the Court and his defense counsel rushed the proceedings through and he was to be hanged the next day so he might as well write up a confession and clear some of his fellows seeing he would be hanged...another kind of court had black curtains...The Lt. Col. sat as judge at a black-draped table which had a white cross on it and the only light was two candles on either end. He was tried and witnesses brought in and he was sentenced to death, but he would have to write down in his own handwriting a complete confession. Then the beatings and hang-man's rope, black hood, eye gougers which they claimed would be used on them unless they confessed. Not a one yet wrote out his statement but each stated that the prosecution dictated their statements and they said it made no difference anyway as they would die the next day. So on and on it goes with each one of the defendants. The story of each must have some truth because they have each been in solitary confinement.[\[8\]](#)

Jochen Peiper, the lead defendant in the Malmédy trial, made an extremely favorable impression on Everett. Peiper testified at the trial of the beating he received while being interrogated:

On the last day of my stay in Schwäbisch Hall I was called for interrogation and received, as usual, a black hood over my head. And I had to wait down there in the hall of the prison for about five minutes, since the American sergeant who came for me went to get some other comrades of mine from their cell. During this occasion when I was standing there quietly waiting, I was struck in the face by a person unknown to me, and several times in my sexual parts with a stick.[\[9\]](#)

All of the defendants at the Malmédy trial were found guilty, with Peiper and 42 other defendants sentenced to death by hanging. Peiper wrote a letter to Willis Everett after the trial expressing his gratitude for Everett's work as his defense attorney:

Before our steps separate, I want to thank you especially for all help you gave us as a human being, as a soldier and chief counsel of the defense during the past eight weeks. In a time of deepest human disappointment, you and [Lt. Col. Harold] McCown have returned to me much faith I already had lost. This will remain one of the best remembrances and was worth the whole procedure of the Malmédy case.[\[10\]](#)

Willis Everett on a Mission

Willis Everett was convinced that the Malmédy trial had been a justicial travesty. Approximately 100 of Everett's friends and some additional American military officers advised Everett to forget about the Malmédy case and live in the present. Everett's outrage, however, set him on a mission to obtain justice for the Malmédy defendants.[\[11\]](#)

Everett and another defense-team member prepared a 228-page critique of the investigation and trial, stating that the Malmédy convictions had been secured primarily on the basis of “illegal and fraudulently procured confessions.” The petition also argued that the trial was a travesty of justice to German soldiers since the Allies were also guilty of the same violations of international law. Everett sent this document to Lt. Col. Clio Straight’s office for inclusion in the internal review process that was mandatory before verdicts and sentences became final.[\[12\]](#)

Everett began to muster forces for a concerted campaign to reverse the Malmédy verdict. Everett read Charles Wennerstrum’s article in the Chicago Tribune, and wrote to Wennerstrum of his struggle to get a rehearing in the Malmédy case:

Consistently I have told the Commanding General EUCOM that I was going to the U.S. Supreme Court and the papers if they do not send the case back for retrial. Frankly I know of no way to get to the Supreme Court but have done a lot of “bluffing” along this line to force them to send the case back for retrial...We both think alike about war crimes trials except that I am a Rebel on the subject and you were gentle in your manner.[\[13\]](#)

Wennerstrum served as a source of sympathetic and judicious counsel for Everett in the months to come, and provided Everett with introductions to potentially supportive Midwestern politicians. Everett continued with a multipronged campaign of judicial appeal, publicity and congressional pressure to get a retrial of the Malmédy case.[\[14\]](#)

The U.S. Supreme Court refused a petition from Everett to rehear the Malmédy case. Everett then prepared an appeal to the International Court of Justice in The Hague (ICJ). Everett knew there was little chance the ICJ would accept his case since only states could be parties to cases before the ICJ. Everett discussed with Wennerstrum the innovative notion of arguing that since there was no German national government after Germany’s unconditional surrender, there was no one but Everett to make the appeal. Both lawyers agreed it was worth a try.

Wennerstrum also advised that they add the even more adventurous argument that, while the court statute might prohibit individuals from filing cases, “international common law” might be alleged to require it.[\[15\]](#)

The ICJ predictably refused to hear Everett’s appeal of the Malmédy case. Everett also received word on or about December 29, 1948, that some of the death sentences in the Malmédy case had been approved by Gen. Lucius Clay. Everett despaired that the U.S. Army was determined to protect itself at all costs, even at the price of hanging innocent men.[\[16\]](#)

Justice Prevails, Late

The Simpson Commission report recommended that all of the death sentences not yet carried out in the Malmédy case be commuted to life imprisonment. The report affirmed Everett’s misgivings about the mock trials and stated that the pretrial investigation had not been properly conducted. The turmoil resulting from the commission report along with the aforementioned article by Edward L. Van Roden caused the U.S. Senate to investigate the Malmédy trial.[\[17\]](#)

The investigation of the Malmédy trial conducted by the Senate Committee on Armed Services determined that there was “little or no evidence” to support Van Roden’s claim that the Malmédy defendants had been physically abused.[\[18\]](#) Judge Edward L. Van Roden testified at this hearing that he never said that 137 of 139 German prisoners had their testicles damaged beyond repair as reported in The Progressive magazine.[\[19\]](#)

However, the committee determined that improper pretrial procedures such as mock trials had adversely influenced the trial process, if not the outcome.[\[20\]](#)

On January 30, 1951, Gen. Thomas T. Handy, commander-in-chief of the U.S. European Command, commuted the death sentences not yet carried out of the Malmédy defendants to life in prison. Handy alluded to the fact that the killings had taken place in a confused and desperate combat situation to justify the commutation of the Malmédy sentences.[\[21\]](#)

Handy's decision produced jubilation among Malmédy critics and convicts. Peiper wrote to Everett:

We have received a great victory and next to God it is you [from] whom our blessings flow. In all the long and dark years you have been the beacon flame for the forlorn souls of the Malmédy boys, the voice and the conscience of the good America, and yours is the present success against all the well-known overwhelming odds. May I therefore, Colonel, express the everlasting gratitude of the red-jacket [worn by prisoners sentenced to death] team (retired) as well as of all the families concerned.[\[22\]](#)

The Malmédy defendants were gradually released from prison courtesy of the Annual Review Board and tensions resulting from the Cold War with the Soviet Union. Jochen Peiper was the last Malmédy defendant to leave prison, receiving his release on December 22, 1956.[\[23\]](#)

Sacrifices by American Attorneys

Advocating the freeing of the Malmédy defendants had required great courage and personal sacrifice on the part of the American attorneys. Gen. Telford Taylor, chief counsel for war crimes at Nuremberg, publicly castigated Judge Charles Wennerstrum for having made statements "subversive of the interests and politics of the United States." In an open letter to Wennerstrum, Gen. Taylor said that Wennerstrum had made a "deliberate, malicious, and totally unfounded attack on the trials." Taylor's letter to Wennerstrum concluded: "If you in fact held the opinions you are quoted as expressing, you were guilty of grave misconduct in continuing to act in the case at all."[\[24\]](#)

Edward L. Van Roden told Everett that he also paid a price for his involvement in the Malmédy case. Strong circumstantial evidence indicates that Van Roden had been blacklisted by the judge advocate general's office and denied further active duty in the army reserves, with likely adverse effects on his retirement prospects.[\[25\]](#)

Willis Everett also made a huge personal and financial sacrifice to free the Malmédy defendants. The physical and emotional stress from the appeal process caused Everett to suffer from declining health and at least one heart attack. Everett estimated his out-of-pocket expenses to be as much as $50,000, to which must be added the income lost through his neglect of his law practice. The West German consul in Atlanta later presented Everett with a check for $5,000 as a gesture of appreciation for his exhaustive efforts on behalf of the Malmédy defendants.[\[26\]](#)

For American attorneys Charles Wennerstrum, Edward L. Van Roden, and Willis Everett, an old-fashioned sense of justice far outweighed the personal sacrifices they faced in criticizing the American-run war-crimes trials. Their actions on an ethical imperative and sense of moral values were greatly appreciated by many Germans. Jochen Peiper wrote to Willis Everett: "You have been America's best ambassador to Germany, setting an example that was respected and recognized far beyond the defendants of the Malmédy case.”[\[27\]](#)

Bad Nenndorf is a bathing resort in the fringe of the uplands of the River Weser's watershed where people with joint ailments are treated with mud baths and soaks in sulfurous waters. On the grounds of the spa suffused with sulfur fumes stands a stately mud-bath house from the 19th Century. At the entrance, cure-seekers are greeted by the goddess Hygeia. Late in the 1920s, the bathhouse was extended into a massive complex with innumerable bathing huts.

War-Criminal Headquarters

After the end of the war, Bad Nenndorf wound up in the British Zone of occupation. In violation of the Hague Convention for Land Warfare, the occupiers subjugated the civil order and persecuted civilians, in particular political leaders, of the conquered land. In the Potsdam Protocol of August 2, 1945, the following is proclaimed:[\[1\]](#)

War criminals and those who have participated in planning or carrying out Nazi enterprises involving or resulting in atrocities or war crimes shall be arrested and brought to judgment. Nazi leaders, influential Nazi supporters and high officials of Nazi organizations and institutions and any other persons dangerous to the occupation or its objectives shall be arrested and interned.

In accordance therewith, the area surrounding the mud-bath house was designated a Civil Internment Camp[\[2\]](#) in early August 1945. 1200 residents of the area had to vacate their houses. The area was fenced off with barbed wire. The mud-bath house received a new function: registration center and prison for Germans who were to be charged as war criminals. In the bathing huts, the fixtures were removed and the tubs in the floors cemented over. From this resulted functional prison cells with tiled walls.

NSDAP functionaries, members of the SS, officers from every branch of the Wehrmacht, diplomats and industrialists were confined in the cells in order to be "prepared" for the coming war-criminal trials. But here also were kept defecting Soviet officers and mere illegal immigrants who were suspected of being spies for the Soviet Union—that same Soviet Union that was still an ally of Great Britain in 1945 and 1946.

The guard staff consisted of members of a British punishment company, who hoped by faithful performance in this assignment to recover the ranks that they had been stripped of.

The mud-bath house at Bad Nenndorf

Report of Victim Oswald Pohl

There are only two reports of conditions in the mud-bath house at Bad Nenndorf. One report comes from the head of the Wirtschafts- und Verwaltungshauptamt of the SS (Economic and Administrative Main Office), SS General Oswald Pohl, who was confined for a time at Camp Bad Nenndorf at the end of May 1945. In the last communication before his execution, he wrote:[\[3\]](#)

“Our treatment by the English in Bad Nenndorf was inhuman. I was confined alone in a cell in which there were four plank beds. My handcuffs were not removed in the locked and watched cell neither by day nor by night, neither when I ate nor when I attended to bodily needs. Indeed, at night with my hands still tied, I was bound by yet another fetter to the posts of the plank bed so that I could not move and for that reason was unable to sleep. I was hustled to my interviews down a long corridor to the interrogation room, during which some of the warders pushed me from behind, and others were to either side, who occasionally knocked me down with tripping and kicks. In front of the door of the interrogation room, I was forced to run in place until the beginning of the interview, which the warders forced to an ever-higher tempo by kicks in the ass and curses and threats. All this happened under the gaze of the sergeant posted at the scene. The way back to my cell consisted of the same gauntlet, wherein I was often knocked down by tripping, and ran headlong into the wall. On the second day, a chair was brought into my cell. I had to sit down to be 'shaved.' Even though I was shackled, two warders held me down on the chair while a third pulled my head back unmercifully by the hair so that I fell backward several times.

A fourth warder smeared my face with something that burned like acid while he slapped my face back and forth. After he had thoroughly 'lathered' me, he scraped my face with a dull razor so roughly that my blood dripped onto my jacket. During this procedure, his helpers continually spewed violent threats and imprecations in my face.

Finally, as though on command, everyone in the cell—there must have been eight or ten of them—set upon me, yanked me up, and pummeled me blindly, bound and defenseless as I was. Blows of fists rained down on my head and kicks hit me in every part of my body. Tottering on my legs, I careened from corner to corner until I collapsed unconscious from a massive blow or kick to the area of the stomach.

When I came to, all was quiet in my cell. I lay on a plank bed and I noticed that two doctors were attending me, one of whom took my pulse. My handcuffs were off. I passed out again.

I was only able to guess how long all this had taken after night had fallen. Since it was almost dark when I woke up, it must have been around eight o'clock; the beating must have begun around five. Someone handed me a cup of strong coffee and then I was brought to my last interview, this time without having to run a gauntlet. This interrogation lasted until long past midnight. The interrogating officer, noting my condition, inquired as to how it had come about. I gave him a brief account of the above. He stood up outraged and apologized in the name of the British Army. Then he left the room for a long while to—as he assured me—arrange with the commandant for punishment of the perpetrators. The affray had caused me the loss of an incisor and a molar.

The next morning at 7 o'clock I was transported, bound, in a truck to Nuremberg."

Another Report

The second report comes from the hand of the Nenndorfer Heinrich Steinmeyer and his wife Marie. The report was published in 1952 in the magazine Quick[\[4\]](#) and further circulates in Bad Nenndorf in various reproductions. Heinrich Steinmeyer was an inmate of the prison and died in 1948 from the effects of his imprisonment.

“British Interrogation Camp Bad Nenndorf 1945 – 1947

[...] the bathhouse [was] hermetically sealed away from the rest of the world. Except for the British officers, who automatically had clearance, and those British warders to whom clearance had been issued, no one knew of the existence of any such prison as this one. The Germans, of course, least of all, since whoever was consigned to this inferno was immediately rendered mute, invisible, obliterated.

No reports ever came out to next of kin from Bad Nenndorf. The British authorities, who were situated in Herford, gave information neither to next of kin, to the Red Cross which had been tipped off, nor even to the Quakers, who wished mercifully to provide aid. They even denied, when specific identification of a prisoner was submitted, that the man was even in Nenndorf...

[The tiled walls of the cells] became [...] a great source of fun for the British watchstanders, and a source of misery for the prisoners because the soldiers systematically smeared the walls with feces and the prisoners then had to clean the walls spotlessly with their fingers or a toothbrush. The individual cells were never heated and in the bitter cold winter of 1946-47, the water faucet in the dayroom froze up. The floors and walls were icy cold. One plank bed. No sack of straw. Two sheets. And all night long, the electric light was on, and every hour the guard noisily opened the door and two times every night came officer's rounds. The prisoners had to get up, stand still and give their number. For twenty minutes, one had to hear the slamming of the doors, the tramping of the guards, the bellowing of the accompanying soldiers.

This Is How They Passed Their Days ...

The guard staff were a hand-picked motley crew of thugs who probably possessed but little feeling, and certainly never any sympathy whatsoever. They were all members of a penal company who had to atone for a criminal offense, and here worked out their obligated tours of duty. And they made their remaining time as entertaining and pleasant for themselves as they possibly could. Now and then they had wild disputes among themselves and the prisoners then heard some of the grievances the boys nursed, and they realized in whose hands they lay. Sodomy, thievery, fraud, burglary, attempted murder, desertion. The threat to the prisoners lay in the fact that for every one of these brigands, a shining reward lay in the offing. A fierce struggle for survival drove them back and forth.

Each had earlier held a military rank. And each had a chance to win their honor back. But to the detriment of the inmates, this opportunity lay in subjecting the inmates to the roughest and most-brutal treatment possible. For this reason, the boys worked up the most-sadistic, private methods each of them could by which to torture the prisoners.

Every prisoner at Nenndorf reported that, after having fallen asleep with great effort, he was then awakened in great disturbance. In between were days, one like the other.

Rising time was 4:30. If the sergeant was in a bad mood, he came around at 3:30 or 4:00. The prisoners stumbled out of bed—that is, from their plank beds. Five minutes later, both sheets were to be drawn drum-tight across the bed. During the day, none was to sit, nor to lie. If any poor sod happened to sit or lie for a second or two—denial of food.

The day consisted of pacing back and forth in their cells from 4 in the morning to 9:30 at night, or standing against the wall. They stood against the wall until they felt they would go crazy.

Every prisoner knew within minutes of his arrival at Nenndorf that he was lost here, since 5 minutes after his arrival he stood in the intake room, where a sergeant tore the clothes from his body. It may be said of the Nenndorf garb that every arrival looked like a clown—jacket too small, pants too wide or too narrow, and everything stiff with dirt. Laundry was never done. In the issuance of shoes, the sergeant in charge was not satisfied unless the size of shoes issued was at least four sizes too large. That sounds harmless enough, but it gave rise to unimaginable torture. There were no shoelaces, our shoes just hung on our feet, and since every step we took outside our cells had to be on the double, we constantly stumbled and fell, the while driven onward with screams and pokes with rifle butts. After 3-4 hours: weak tea and perhaps a little porridge. After this, standing or pacing in the cell until one again thought oneself driven to madness.

The Man with the Uppercut

Before the evening officer's rounds, we had to take off our jackets, pants, and shoes and lay them in front of our cells, standing behind them in shirt and underpants. The commandant of Nenndorf, whose name no one will ever forget, Colonel Stevens, took pleasure in conducting the evening harangue. Rotund with broad shoulders and a face that was always dark red and many campaign ribbons on his chest, he looked askance at the pitiable, half-frozen forms in their underclothes with his small, cold eyes. Now and then he would randomly shout at one or another. This inarticulate yelp contained a question, which the prisoner invariably could not understand. Colonel Stevens would never wait for an answer, but rather immediately strike the man under the chin with his fist.

Then began a vicious ceremony under the gaze of the watchstanders. As soon as this tour was over, two or three prisoners were fetched from their cells. They had to sluice water, that had been placed specifically for this fiendish routine, down the long corridor and just so that the insensate bodies of the prisoners were soaked in the filthy froth. So their clothes, if they could be called clothes, lay until dawn in the swill until they awoke and had to clutch the totally besmirched and frozen rags against their bodies.

Of course there were interviews and interrogations. A huge number of witnesses have testified that British officers punched and kicked German army officers, officers of the Waffen SS and party functionaries mercilessly until they received the testimony they desired. Every prisoner in his cell either held his ears shut or trembled in every fiber of his body or ran uncontrollably back and forth in his narrow space whenever the deafening yelling, screaming, howling, crying and babbling of the tortured prisoners inescapably echoed down the corridor from the interrogation rooms, punctuated by the ferocious curses of the British interrogation officers.

Experiences in Hell

SS Obersturmbannführer Dr. Oebsger-Roeder was beaten unconscious by several British officers on Good Friday 1946, such that he had to be carried back to his cell. It took months for his grave injuries to heal.

SS Sturmbannführer Dr. Hahnke, chief of legations in the cultural-political section of the foreign ministry was so badly beaten up that for the rest of his life he had a game leg.

The last head of the film department of the propaganda ministry, Parbel, not only was flogged upon his arrival, but was consigned by a British major, a former German, to the feared and notorious Cell 12. In this place, buckets of water were continually poured so that the prisoner, barefoot in only a shirt and pants, had to either stand or pace back and forth all night in the wet. The poor soul spent fully eight days and nights in this hell and his condition even moved the minimal pity of one of the warders, who secretly took him out, gave him shoes and let him rest for an hour on the seat of the privy.

Captain Langham presided over most of the beating incidents. His name is unforgettable to Nenndorfers. He made sure that the unconscious were taken to the shower, there to be revived so that the beatings could resume.

Most of the torturers were sergeants. It speaks for the gallows humor of the prisoners that in the midst of this misery, they made up nicknames for one and another of these hangmen. One of these was called Henry VIII because he was bursting at the seams and continually roaring with a purple face. Another was called Red-eye for reasons that require no explanation. Another was called Smiley, and he was the worst of the beasts since he would appear in their cells in the middle of the night wearing an ice-cold smile, sweep them out of their bunks and make them do strenuous exercises until they were half-broken.

Escape attempts were hopeless, but nonetheless two prisoners who lived in the day room tried it: one of them got away; the other was caught near the camp in the search that ensued the detection of their absence, in which the entire guard staff took part. The unfortunate was interrogated at length and was so beaten that he finally gave away who had supplied him with civilian clothes. This was a miner who worked during the day in Barsinghausen, and on whose door the fugitive knocked one night. As the miner hesitated, his wife said to him, 'Help him, for Christ's sake.' The miner was detained a few weeks and what this man, an old Social Democrat, had to undergo in that period was cruel in the extreme. He had to throw up at every meal; by the time of his release he also was a complete wreck. The escapee himself was beaten thoroughly and then his handcuffs were chained to the shackles on his legs so that to get around, he had to walk or stagger completely bent over. Many saw him in this condition.

No Nenndorfer will ever forget the British 'military doctor' assigned to look after them, Captain Smith. A haggard, grizzled, emaciated figure that personified resignation. He would glance into each cell, listen absent-mindedly when anyone complained about this or that, and then growl, 'No personal remark.' (Nothing to report.)

Anyone who had a toothache was entirely neglected, and many had toothaches from being struck repeatedly in the mouth. There was no dentist. The dentures of Dr. H. C. Winkler, that venerable Mayor Winkler, who had directed the film industry and financed other major enterprises of the Third Reich, broke when he was thrown into jail at the age of 72. He could no longer chew. Captain Smith listened to the old man, who finally said he would starve to death. Smith responded drily, 'Then you'll starve to death.'

Oh, You Holy Christmastime

Anyone who spent Christmastime 1945 in Bad Nenndorf will never forget it their whole life.

The prisoners employed in the kitchen had scrimped and expended the most strenuous efforts to produce a little cheer on that evening. They had managed to produce ginger bread from their meager resources. And on that Christmas Eve, a faint glimmer of light in the thick fog of mutual hostility appeared. One of the guards, of Polish descent, visited each cell and to its occupant wished a 'Merry Christmas' in his heavily accented English.

His own people had received gross mistreatment in the war, perhaps he himself, maybe even by some of those that night confined in this prison, but this night, he spoke from his heart.

He had no inkling what a wave of Hell was about to break over the heads of the prisoners in a few hours. The entire British staff, falling-down drunk, wandered from cell to cell and beat, punched, and kicked anything that came between their fists and their boots, the whole night through. A night of much [...]

A Certain Type Must Be Eliminated

Verbatim quotation from an interrogation: 'We know very well that you and your friends weren't Nazis. But you're out of luck. You're of a type that we want to eliminate even more than we do the Nazis.'

It was the mill of collective guilt

But there were also God's mills, which grind slowly but surely what is cried to Heaven to spread it by rumor throughout the rest of the world. Prisoners who were released, spoke. And it became clear that in Nenndorf, things happened at the hands of the English that were as bad as, even worse than, since they were committed in the name of liberation and democracy, things for which Germans at Nuremberg were hanged or sentenced to prison. Many of the prisoners had been sworn to silence. But many were not silent.

The ball started rolling. The Catholic camp chaplain of Civil Internment Camp III in Fallingbostal, Vicar Magar, heard the rumors and sought particulars of another Nenndorfer, Mr. Parbel, which he immediately passed on to the bishop of Hildesheim. And within a few weeks, this venerated dignitary came to Nenndorf and held mass in full regalia and delivered himself of the most scathing condemnation of the torture huts operated by the Britons as described by several prisoners. He swore to relay the information in full force to Cardinal Griffy in England.

On the first Pentecost of 1947, the deputized member of Parliament Stokes stood at the door of Bad Nenndorf and demanded admittance. The British officers, feigning all innocence, had to let him in. The deputy went from cell to cell and made report of all. What he saw was enough: pitiful, beaten, half-starved, sick, intimidated, broken shells of persons.

On the same evening, the British guard staff, who had for more than a year plagued and tortured the defenseless, came on the run with friendly but distracted faces from cell to cell and shared out their own rations of cigarettes, chocolate and bon-bons. But the ball was still rolling...

Senior officers of the London constabulary Scotland Yard appeared and gathered evidence as to the conditions theretofore. They made no secret of the fact that they were preparing for a trial of the commandant and guard staff of the English interrogation camp [...]

Acquittal for the Torturers: 'I Didn't Know,' and 'I Followed Orders'

The trial in London went on and on. The defendants included the commandant of Camp Bad Nenndorf, Colonel Stevens, one of the most-brutal interrogation officers, First Lieutenant Langham, the camp doctor Captain Smith and some other offenders. It was embarrassing for Lieutenant Langham in that he was shown to be a former citizen of Germany. But much more was amiss. The commandant of the camp Colonel Stevens was let off on the grounds that he didn't know about the brutality [...]. Even the sergeants Red-Eye, Henry VIII and Smiley were acquitted, and on no less than the excuse that they were just carrying out orders [...] The only sentence arising from the trials was that passed on Captain Smith. His sentence consisted of his being discharged from the British Army. It was no punishment, since Captain Smith was an old man, long ready for departure, long since not an active military doctor, and he fastened upon this basis for mitigation [...]"

Behind the Scenes of the Postwar Period

The Third Degree

The Allies have finally agreed to a review of the sentences passed against real and supposed war criminals. Quick has moved at this time to publish this report so that the judges of these crimes, faced with the unconscionable implications of the decisions that lay in their hands, are made aware that not all the war criminals were German, but that judgment of such crimes depends essentially upon which side the criminals were on.

Introduction to the mentioned article in the German weekly magazine Quick of 1952, Vol. 5, No. 10, March 9, 1952, pp. 28–31.

After the trial in London, Camp Nenndorf was liquidated in August 1947.

Victor and Vanquished

The British co-victors exacted their revenge on the enemy in their fashion, whom they were able to conquer only with the help of foreigners and the sacrifice of their empire. It was the revenge of collapse. The conquered have long since absorbed the revenge and still bear the onus of the guilty. Since the “confessions” of those tortured not only in Bad Nenndorf but in many, many other places have formed the basis for the present comity among us, it is now considered very bad form to speak of that torture.

In the mud-bath house of Nenndorf, Hygeia has been cleansed, and the bathing huts have been restored to their original state. The screams of pain of its captives are long-since died away.

Died away to Where?

No seekers of cures come to Bad Nenndorf. It is quiet in the long halls of the mud-bath house. Seniors who practice their last steps with walkers on the promenade now occupy the clinics. Turkish boys now romp through the flowerbeds. Businesses are shuttered.

The ground on which the fatherland has rested since the end of the war is moldering. It even suffuses Bad Nenndorf with a foul odor that does not come from healing sulfur. Furtively, as though in the commission of a sin, the report of the Steinmeyer couple is passed from hand to hand.

Eyewitnesses to the Treblinka “Gas Chambers”

EYEWITNESSES TO THE TREBLINKA “GAS CHAMBERS”

Traditional Holocaust historians state that Treblinka was a pure extermination camp in which approximately 870,000 Jews were murdered. The number of Jewish survivors of Treblinka is generally thought to have been between 40 and 70, and probably closer to the lower figure.[\[1\]](#) This article will examine the credibility of several Jewish survivors of Treblinka.

CHIL RAJCHMAN

Chil Rajchman was a Jewish survivor of Treblinka who was interviewed by the US Office of Special Investigations in 1980. He later traveled to the United States to appear as a witness for the prosecution in the extradition trial of John Demjanjuk. Rajchman also took the witness stand in Jerusalem where Demjanjuk was put on trial for allegedly being a murderous guard at Treblinka.[\[2\]](#) The Israeli Supreme Court ruled that Demjanjuk’s guilt had not been proven, and that the eyewitness testimony of Rajchman and four other witnesses failed to identify Demjanjuk credibly.[\[3\]](#)

Rajchman described the gas chambers at Treblinka in his memoirs:

The Schlauch road is not long. In a few minutes you find yourself in a white structure, on which a Star of David is painted. On the steps of the structure stands a German, who points to the entrance and smiles—Bitte, bitte! The steps lead to a corridor lined with flowers and with long towels hanging on the walls.

The size of the gas chamber is seven by seven meters. In the middle of the chamber there are shower-heads through which the gas is introduced. On one of the walls a thick pipe serves as an exhaust to remove the air. Thick felt around the doors of the chamber renders them airtight.

In this building there are some 10 gas chambers. At a short distance from the main structure there is a smaller one with three gas chambers. By the doors stand several Germans who shove people inside. Their hands do not rest for a moment as they scream fiendishly—Faster, faster, keep moving! [4]

Rajchman wrote that exhaust gas from a Diesel engine was piped into the gas chambers. [5] However, Austrian engineer Walter Lüftl and American engineer Friedrich Paul Berg have both documented that exhaust from Diesel engines could not have been used for mass executions at Treblinka. Lüftl concludes in his report that the stories of gas chambers with Diesel engines and gas vans at places such as Treblinka can only be disinformation. [6]

Berg writes: “However, the story [of mass gassings] becomes even more incredible when one discovers that far better sources of carbon monoxide, better even than gasoline engines, were readily available to the Germans. Those other sources did not require either Diesel fuel or gasoline.” [7]

Rajchman in his memoirs also reported the following horrific incident:

It once happened that an oven was brought next to a huge grave, where perhaps a quarter of a million people were buried. As usual the oven was loaded with the proper number of bodies and in the evening it was lit. But a strong wind carried the fire over to the huge grave and engulfed it in flames. The blood of some quarter of a million people began to flare, and thus burned for a night and a day. The whole camp administration came to look upon this marvel, gazing with satisfaction at the blaze. The blood came up to the surface and burned as if it were fuel. [8]

Since blood consists mostly of water and is nonflammable, Rajchman’s story that blood burned as if it were fuel is totally absurd. [9]

Rajchman also reported other instances when the blood from gassed victims rose to the surface: “I remember that every morning when we went out to work, we would notice that the surfaces of the pits had burst in dozens of places. By day the ground was firmly trodden down, but at night the blood pressed up to the surface...The blood of tens of thousands of victims, unable to rest, thrust itself up to the surface.” [10]

Rajchman’s story that blood “pressed up to the surface” at night but was trodden down during the day is ludicrous. Rajchman’s memoirs about his stay in Treblinka are no more credible than his testimony at the John Demjanjuk trial.

RICHARD GLAZAR

Richard Glazar was a Jew sent to Treblinka at the beginning of October 1942. He said he spent 10 months in Treblinka before escaping from the camp. [11] Glazar in his memoirs also stated that exhaust gasses from motors were used in the gas chambers at Treblinka:

The gas chambers are the only brick buildings in the entire camp. Actually, they comprise two structures. At first was built—somewhat farther from the entrance—a smaller structure with three gas chambers, each about five by five meters. Sometime in the fall of 1942 the second building, containing 10 gas chambers, was completed. This building is located very close to the Pipeline, at the point where it opens into the second part of the camp. There is a hallway running all the way down the middle of the new building. One enters the gas chambers, five on either side, from this hallway. The new gas chambers measure about seven by seven meters. The motor room is built onto the back wall, where the hallway ends. The exhaust gases from the motors are pumped into the gas chambers through conduits in the ceilings of the chambers. These conduits are disguised as showers.[\[12\]](#)

Glazar made two major errors in his book. First, Glazar wrote that the Germans started to burn the corpses “one overcast November afternoon” in 1942.[\[13\]](#) This statement contradicts the standard Holocaust literature, which claims the incineration of corpses did not start until March/April 1943.[\[14\]](#)

Second, Glazar said that he was part of a camouflage unit that performed forestry work in the vicinity of Treblinka. Glazar wrote:

The camouflage unit is the only one of the old work squads that still has enough real work to do...Several times a day...some part of the 25-man unit has to go out into the forest, climb into the trees, harvest large branches, and carry them back into the camp, where they will be used for repairs. The other part of the unit straightens and firms up the posts, tightens the barbed wire, and weaves the new pine boughs into the fence until there are no longer any gaps in the dense green wall.[\[15\]](#)

Thus, according to Glazar, 25 inmates supplied Treblinka with its greenery for concealment. The “camouflage unit” would have been much larger if wood from the forest had been used to cremate the 870,000 corpses in Treblinka. The camouflage unit would also have chopped down the trees and then cut off the branches rather than engaging in tree-climbing activities. Yet Glazar apparently opines that such tree-felling never occurred during his time at Treblinka. Since historians universally state that there were no crematoria at Treblinka, this rules out the cremation of some 870,000 corpses using firewood.[\[16\]](#)

Air-photo evidence also indicates that the massive deforestation necessary to cremate 870,000 bodies never took place around Treblinka. Thomas Kues writes:

By comparing a detailed 1936 map of the Treblinka area with air photos taken by the Luftwaffe in May and November 1944 we are able to estimate the scope of contemporary deforestation in the area. If 870,000 bodies had really been burned at Treblinka, then the procurement of the required fuel would have denuded the entire wooded area north of the camp site. The air photos show that this is clearly not the case. Rather, the visible possibly deforested areas—amounting to less than 10 hectares—indicate the cremation of at most some ten thousands of bodies.[\[17\]](#)

The argument that only a fraction of the corpses were burned is not valid, since the Soviet and Polish forensic examinations of Treblinka would have discovered hundreds of thousands of corpses. The Allies would have shown these corpses to the world as proof of German genocide.

The only remaining conclusion is that most Jews at Treblinka were sent somewhere else, most likely to German-occupied Soviet territory. Richard Glazar's memoirs inadvertently confirmed the revisionist thesis that Treblinka was a transit camp.[\[18\]](#)

JANKIEL WIERNIK

Jankiel Wiernik escaped from Treblinka and published a document in May 1944 describing his experiences at Treblinka. Wiernik wrote:

A Jew had been selected by the Germans to function as a supposed "bath attendant." He stood at the entrance of the building housing the chambers and urged everyone to hurry inside before the water got cold. What irony! Amidst shouts and blows, the people were chased into the chambers.

As I have already indicated, there was not much space in the gas chambers. People were smothered simply by overcrowding. The motor which generated the gas in the new chambers was defective, and so the helpless victims had to suffer for hours on end before they died. Satan himself could not have devised a more fiendish torture. When the chambers were opened again, many of the victims were only half dead and had to be finished off with rifle butts, bullets or powerful kicks.

Often people were kept in the gas chambers overnight with the motor not turned on at all. Overcrowding and lack of air killed many of them in a very painful way. However, many survived the ordeal of such nights; particularly the children showed a remarkable degree of resistance. They were still alive when they were dragged out of the chambers in the morning, but revolvers used by the Germans made short work of them...[\[19\]](#)

So according to Wiernik, the gas chambers at Treblinka were not very efficient. Many victims suffocated or had to be killed with bullets, rifle butts or powerful kicks.

Jankiel Wiernik wrote: "Between 10,000 and 12,000 people were gassed each day."[\[20\]](#) Wiernik also wrote: "The number of transports grew daily, and there were periods when as many as 30,000 people were gassed in one day..."[\[21\]](#) This is an incredibly large number of people killed by a defective motor that took "hours on end" to kill the victims and which was frequently left off overnight.

Wiernik also wrote that handsome Bulgarian Jews were discriminated against: "These handsome Jews were not permitted an easy death. Only small quantities of gas were let into the chambers, so that their agony lasted through the night."[\[22\]](#) This would have made the gassing process at Treblinka even more inefficient. I wonder how 870,000 Jews could have been killed by such inefficient methods.

Wiernik described the corpses of the alleged gassing victims: "All were equal. There was no longer any beauty or ugliness, for they were all yellow from the gas."[\[23\]](#) Actually, victims of carbon-monoxide poisoning exhibit a cherry-red or rosy red coloring.[\[24\]](#) Wiernik's statement that the victims were "all yellow from the gas" is obviously false.

Wiernik wrote in regard to the cremation of corpses: "It turned out that bodies of women burned more easily than those of men. Accordingly, the bodies of women were used for kindling the fires... When corpses of pregnant women were cremated, their bellies would burst open. The fetus would be exposed and could be seen burning inside the mother's womb."[\[25\]](#) The absurdities promulgated by Wiernik are really beyond description, yet he is probably the most prominent witness to the alleged gassings at Treblinka.[\[26\]](#)

ABRAHAM GOLDFARB

Abraham Goldfarb arrived in Treblinka on August 25, 1942, and escaped from Treblinka during the revolt in 1943.[\[27\]](#) Goldfarb described the gassings at Treblinka:

On the way to the gas chambers Germans with dogs stood along the fence on both sides. The dogs had been trained to attack people; they bit the men's genitals and the women's breasts, ripping off pieces of flesh. The Germans hit the people with whips and iron bars to spur them on, so that they would press forward into the "showers" as quickly as possible. The screams of the women could be heard far away, even in the other parts of the camp. The Germans drove the running victims on with shouts of "Faster, faster, the water is getting cold, and others still have to take a shower!" To escape from the blows, the victims ran to the gas chambers as quickly as they could, the stronger ones pushing the weaker ones aside. At the entrance to the gas chambers stood the two Ukrainians, Ivan Demjaniuk and Nikolai, one of them armed with an iron bar, the other with a sword. Even they drove the people inside with blows...

As soon as the gas chambers were full, the Ukrainians closed the doors and started the engine. Some 20 to 25 minutes later an SS man or a Ukrainian looked through a window in the door. When he had made sure that everyone had been asphyxiated, the Jewish prisoners had to open the doors and remove the corpses. Because the chambers were overcrowded and the victims had held onto one another, they were all standing upright and were like one single mass of flesh.[\[28\]](#)

Goldfarb stated that dogs at Treblinka attacked the men's genitals and the women's breasts while the victims ran to the gas chambers. I wonder why the other survivors didn't report these vicious dog attacks of the gassing victims. Goldfarb's story is highly suspect.

Goldfarb's statement that the victims "were all standing upright and were like one single mass of flesh" is also not credible. Many of the dead victims would have fallen to the floor no matter how crowded the gas chambers. The dead victims would not have been "like one single mass of flesh."

CONCLUSION

No documentary or credible material trace exists of the alleged gas chambers at Treblinka. We would know nothing about the Treblinka gas chambers except for the testimony of a small number of eyewitnesses.

A November 15, 1942 report produced by the resistance movement of the Warsaw ghetto originally stated that steam chambers were used to kill Jews at Treblinka. In 1944, Jankiel Wiernik converted the embarrassing "steam chambers," which characterized the first phase of the Treblinka atrocity propaganda, into "gas chambers." Official historiography now considers the gas chambers of Treblinka as established historical fact.[\[29\]](#)

However, as discussed in this article, the eyewitness testimony of the Treblinka gas chambers is not credible. Such testimony cannot be used to prove that Germany mass murdered Jews at Treblinka. Germar Rudolf writes:

Thus, if 100 witnesses and 100 confessions state that the moon is made of green cheese or that 870,000 corpses can be burned within a few months without fuel and without leaving traces, both assertions being of a similar intellectual quality, then we have to conclude—in light of all the forensic evidence—that the witnesses and the defendants are wrong. Like it or not![30]

Nobody Denied It Happened? | CODOH

by Panagiotis Heliotis

Hello everyone. Last year Professor Deborah Lipstadt gave a lecture about Holocaust denial at the University of Oxford. There she stated:

“In not one war-crimes trial since the end of World War Two has a perpetrator of any nationality ever said it didn’t happen.” (1:55)

There are many, many people in fact who are under the same impression; they are quite certain that during the trials all the Nazis fell to their knees exclaiming “We did it!”. But is this true?

In order to find out we will have a look at several Nazi testimonies from the International Military Tribunal (IMT) and Nuremberg Military Tribunal (NMT) transcripts regarding the alleged attempt to exterminate the Jews – testimonies you will never find in history books.

We begin with Field Marshal Wilhelm Keitel (IMT, v. 10, p. 594, 598):

“DR. LATERNSEER: Do you know whether the higher military commanders at any time were informed of the intention of Hitler or Himmler to kill the Jews?

KEITEL: According to my opinion, that was not the case, since I personally was not informed either. [...]

DR. HORN: In connection with the testimony by General Lahousen, I want to ask you one question. At the time of the Polish campaign, was there a directive or an order by Hitler to exterminate the Jews in the Polish Ukraine?

KEITEL: I cannot recall any such things. I know only that during the occupation of Poland – that is after the occupation – the problem of the Polish Jews played a part. In that connection I also put a question once to Hitler to which, I believe, he answered that that area was well suited for settling the Jews there. I do not know or remember anything else.”

We continue with Reichskommissar Arthur Seyss-Inquart (v. 16, p. 19):

“DR. HAENSEL: You said in your interrogation that a decree of Heydrich’s caused you to have Jews transported from Holland. Did you see Hitler’s decree to Heydrich?

SEYSS-INQUART: I think so – a decree from Hitler to Heydrich alone would not have been for Heydrich.

DR. HAENSEL: You picture the situation as if Heydrich had told you that he had this decree.

SEYSS-INQUART: Yes, he told me that, and a few weeks later he sent me this decree.

DR. HAENSEL: Was it in writing?

SEYSS-INQUART: Yes, it was in writing.

DR. HAENSEL: And what did the decree say?

SEYSS-INQUART: That he had complete charge of the final solution of the Jewish question as well as other matters dealing therewith.

DR. HAENSEL: And when was this? 1941? 1940?

SEYSS-INQUART: It was at about the time when the evacuations started. That was in 1942.

DR. HAENSEL: That must be wrong. It was 1941, not later.

SEYSS-INQUART: Perhaps he showed me the decree later. I do not know the date of the decree.

DR. HAENSEL: That must be the case. But this decree, you said, was conceived in general terms?

SEYSS-INQUART: General terms.

DR. HAENSEL: It could be interpreted one way or another? I mean, you know...

SEYSS-INQUART: Yes, I had the impression that in the occupied territories Heydrich was to carry through the evacuation, and at that time I was not quite sure whether that was to be a final evacuation – which, however, was possible. The most extreme possibility was that the Jews would be collected in camps and after the end of the war settled somewhere.

DR. HAENSEL: I beg your pardon, Witness, the most extreme possibility would certainly be that the Jews would be destroyed, is that not so?

SEYSS-INQUART: I am speaking of the most extreme possibility which I thought of at the time.”

He also added (p. 20):

“DR. HAENSEL: Before 1943 did you discuss these problems with Hitler?

SEYSS-INQUART: I was merely present when Hitler talked about these problems. It was always along this line, to eliminate the Jews from the German population and to send them somewhere abroad.

DR. HAENSEL: But there was no talk at all about destruction of the Jews?

SEYSS-INQUART: Never.”

Now we turn to the Chief of the Reich Chancellery Hans Lammers (v. 11, pp. 50-53):

“DR. THOMA: I have only one more question. Did you know anything regarding the fact that Hitler had decided to solve the Jewish question by the final solution, that is, by the annihilation of the Jews?

LAMMERS: Yes, I know a great deal about that. The final solution of the Jewish question became known to me for the first time in 1942. That is when I heard that the Führer supposedly, through Göring, had given an order to the SS Obergruppenführer Heydrich to achieve a solution of the Jewish question. I did not know the exact contents of that order and consequently, since this did not come within my jurisdiction, at the beginning I took a negative attitude, but then as I wanted to know something I, of course, had to contact Himmler. I asked him what was really meant by the idea of the final solution of the Jewish question. Himmler replied that he had received the order from the Führer to bring about the final solution of the Jewish problem – or rather Heydrich and his successor had that order – and that the main point of the order was that the Jews were to be evacuated from Germany. With that statement I was satisfied for the time and waited for further developments, since I assumed that I would now in some way – I really had no jurisdiction here – I would obtain some information from Heydrich or his successor, Kaltenbrunner. Since nothing did come I wanted to inform myself about this, and back in 1942 I announced a report to the Führer, whereupon the Führer told me that it was true that he had given Himmler the order for evacuation but that he did not want any further discussion about this Jewish question during the war. [...]

In the meantime I once more turned to Herr Himmler. He was of the opinion that it was necessary to discuss this question since a number of problems would have to be solved, particularly since the intention of achieving a final solution of the Jewish question would probably extend to persons of mixed blood, first grade, and would also extend to the so-called “privileged” marriages, that is to say, marriages where only one party was Aryan whereas the other party was Jewish. The Führer stated once more that he did not wish to have a report on it but that he had no objections to consultation on these problems. That some evacuations had taken place in the meantime had become known to me. At that time, at any rate, not the slightest thing was known, about the killing of Jews; if crass individual cases came up, I always addressed myself to Himmler and he was always very willing to settle these individual cases. Finally, however, in 1943, rumors cropped up that Jews were being killed. I had no jurisdiction in this field; it was merely that I occasionally received complaints and on the basis of these complaints I investigated the rumors. But, as far as I could tell, at any rate, these rumors always proved to be only rumors. Every one said he had heard it from somebody else and nobody wanted to make a definite statement. I am, in fact, of the opinion that these rumors were based mostly on foreign broadcasts and that the people just did not want to say from where they had the information. That caused me once more to undertake an investigation of this matter. First of all, since I, for my part, could not initiate investigations of matters under Himmler’s jurisdiction, I addressed myself to Himmler once again. Himmler denied any legal killings and told me, with reference to the order from the Führer, that it was his duty to evacuate the Jews and that during such evacuations, which also involved old and sick people, of course there were cases of death, there were accidents, there were attacks by enemy aircraft. He added too, that there were revolts, which of course he had to suppress severely and with bloodshed, as a warning. For the rest, he said that these people were being accommodated in camps in the East. He brought out a lot of pictures and albums and showed me the work that was being done in these camps by the Jews and how they worked for the war needs, the shoemakers shops, tailors shops, and so forth. He told me:

“This is the order of the Führer; if you believe that you have to take action against it then tell the Führer and tell me the names of the people who have made these reports to you.”

Of course, I could not tell him the names, first of all because they did not want to be named, and secondly, they only knew these things from hearsay, so as I said, I could not have given him any definite material at all. Nevertheless, I once again reported this matter to the Führer, and on this occasion he gave me exactly the same reply which I had been given by Himmler. He said, “I shall later on decide where these Jews will be taken and in the meantime they are being cared for there.” [...]

DR. THOMA: But, Witness, please be quite brief. I am now putting this question to you: Did Himmler ever tell you that the final solution of the Jewish problem would take place through the extermination of the Jews?

LAMMERS: That was never mentioned. He talked only about evacuation.

DR. THOMA: He talked only about evacuation?

LAMMERS: Yes, only about evacuation.

DR. THOMA: When did you hear that these 5 million Jews had been exterminated?

LAMMERS: I heard of that here a while ago.”

And later (p. 115):

“MAJOR JONES: Are you, as the head of the Reich Chancellery, the man who knew all the secrets of the Third Reich, saying to this Tribunal that you had no knowledge of the murder of millions and millions who were murdered under the Nazi regime?

LAMMERS: I mean to say that I knew nothing about it until the moment of the collapse, that is, the end of April 1945 or the beginning of May, when I heard such reports from foreign broadcasting stations. I did not believe them at the time, and only later on I found further material here, in the newspapers. If we are speaking now of the elimination of a harmful influence that is far from meaning annihilation. The Führer did not say a word about murder; no mention was ever made of such a plan.”

Lammers also testified at the Ministries Case (NMT, v. 13). Asked again about the Final Solution he affirmed (pp. 419-421):

“Q. Witness, I must return to the killings of Jews. You stated that you had no knowledge of that. But I must nevertheless ask you, didn't you at least hear rumors of such killings of Jews, and what did you undertake on hearing them?

A. Only in the year 1943 did such rumors come to my knowledge and this happened through private conversations and through a few anonymous and pseudonymous letters. But for me these rumors remained rumors. I looked into them. However, I never succeeded in ascertaining anything positive regarding the truth of such alleged facts. People bringing me such rumors never wished to stand their ground and withdrew when I tried to pin them down to their statements. It always turned out that they would name their informants or did not wish to and that they themselves were not eyewitnesses. I myself always had the impression that such rumors rested solely on the listening to foreign radios which was strictly forbidden and punishable and in the last analysis no one wished to confess this activity. So far as I looked into letters that were actually signed, I found out that these were pseudonymous letters, and so far as I wished to pin any individual down to an actual deposition of facts, that never came about because the persons did not wish to stick to their stories and could produce no actual recounting of facts, and were themselves not eyewitnesses. [...]

Q. In what then did the problem of the final solution consist so far as you understood that term at that time and I emphasize your understanding of the term at that time?

A. The solution was to lie in the evacuation of full-blooded Jews, and secondly, a regulation of some sort concerning the privileged Jews and the half-Jews.

Q. Witness, on the basis of the minutes of the three meetings of 20 January 1942, 6 March 1942, and 27 October 1942 put in by the prosecution, are you still of the opinion that no program for exterminating the Jews was ever set up and that, secondly, with regard to including half-Jews and privileged Jews in the evacuation or other measures, no program was set up?

A. Yes. I am of that opinion. At least this program never came to my attention. The program cannot have been set up.”

Minister of Finance Schwerin von Krosigk and Secretary of the Foreign Office Ernst von Weizsäcker were also examined during that trial. On the Final Solution, von Krosigk stated (p. 406):

“Q. With reference to the problem of the treatment of the Jews I have one more question. These matters have been repeatedly discussed here. I would only like to hear your personal attitude. What did you know about the so-called Final Solution [Endlösung] of the Jewish Question?

A. I cannot remember ever having heard the term at all before the collapse. At any rate I was not aware of any physical extermination as a solution of the Jewish question.

Q. The prosecution naturally says that many people in Germany knew it and asks why you, as a minister, did not know it. Is it possible for you to explain that?

A. Of course it could not remain hidden from me that in wartime Jews were evacuated from Germany. All the less since the property they left behind them was transferred to my financial authority for administration and evaluation. But as far as a plan, the execution of such a plan went, that this evacuation was to lead to extermination, that is something of which I never heard anything at all. When I asked I was always told that these measures were equivalent to the internment of enemy nationals in wartime for security reasons.

Q. At that time were you ever given the name of a place where they were taken?

A. The East was mentioned quite generally. I only heard one name. That was Theresienstadt. That was given to me as a place which had been evacuated by other inhabitants and made available for the settlement of German Jews.”

And von Weizsäcker (p. 437):

“Q. Were you kept currently informed about what was happening to the Jews and what extent the extermination [Vernichtung] had assumed?

A. From the very beginning I considered many atrocious actions possible, but my imagination did not suffice to picture what I actually learned after the collapse.

Q. Didn’t you know of the plan of the so-called Final Solution [Endloesung], I mean the plan regarding the final extermination of all the Jews who were reported to the East?

A. This plan was completely unknown to me.”

We return to Nuremberg with the testimony of Julius Streicher (IMT, v. 12, p. 374):

“LT. COL. GRIFFITH-JONES: We will go on. Now, I just want to put one or two further articles of your own to you. You remember what I am suggesting, that you are inciting the German people to murder. We know now that at least you had read one article in the Israelitisches Wochenblatt where murder is mentioned. I just want to see what you go on to publish in your own paper after that date. Would you look at Page 47-A. This is an article by yourself on 6 January 1944. This is after you had been living on your estate for some time.

“After the National Socialist uprising in Germany, a development began in Europe, too, from which one can expect that it will free this continent for all time of the Jewish disintegrator and exploiter of nations; and, over and above this, that the German example will, after a victorious termination of the second World War, bring about the destruction of the Jewish world tormentor on the other continents as well.”

What example was the German nation setting to the other nations of the world? What example do you mean there?

STREICHER: This article corroborates what I have been saying all along. I spoke of an international solution of the Jewish question. I was convinced that if Germany had won this war or had been victorious over Bolshevism, then the world would have agreed that an understanding should be reached with the other nations for an international solution of the Jewish question. If I wrote here about destruction, it is not to be understood as destruction by mass killing; as I have said, that is an expression; I have to point out that I do not believe that Erich Kauffmann<sup>[1]</sup> really wanted to kill the German people by sterilization, but he wrote it, and we sometimes wrote in the same manner, echoing the sounds that we heard in the other camp.

LT. COL. GRIFFITH-JONES: You have not yet told us what is this international solution that you are advocating by talking about extermination; if it is not murder, what is it? What is the solution?

STREICHER: I have already said that I founded the Anti-Semitic Union, and through this Anti-Semitic Union we wanted to create movements among the nations which should, above and beyond governments, act in such a way that an international possibility would be created, such as has been represented today here in this Trial – thus I conceived it, to form an international congress center which would solve the Jewish question by the creation of a Jewish state and thereby destroy the power of the Jews within the nations.

LT. COL. GRIFFITH-JONES: That is your answer – that you were advocating a Jewish state? Is that all that this comes to? Is it simply that you were advocating a Jewish national home? Is that what you have been talking about in all these extracts that we have read? Is that the solution which you are advocating?

STREICHER: Well, I do not know what you want with that question. Of course, that is the solution.

LT. COL. GRIFFITH-JONES: Very well. Let us just go on now. Turn to Page 48-A now, will you? This is 24 January 1944, “Whoever does what a Jew does is a scoundrel, a criminal, and he who repeats and wishes to copy him deserves the same fate – annihilation, death.”

Are you still advocating a national Jewish home?

STREICHER: Yes, that has nothing to do with the big political plan. If you take every statement by a writer, every statement from a daily newspaper, as an example, and want to prove a political aim by it, then you miss the point. You have to distinguish between a newspaper article and a great political aim.”

Next, Chief of the Wehrmacht Alfred Jodl (v. 15, p. 332):

“DR. EXNER: As we are just talking of the Jews, will you tell the Court what you knew about the extermination of Jews? I remind you that you are under oath.

JODL: I know just how improbable these explanations sound, but very often the improbable is true and the probable untrue. I can only say, fully conscious of my responsibility, that I never heard, either by hint or by written or spoken word, of an extermination of Jews. On one single occasion I had doubts, and that was when Himmler spoke about the revolt in the Jewish Ghetto. I did not quite believe in this heroic fight; but Himmler immediately supplied photographs showing the concrete dugouts which had been built there, and he said, “Not only the Jews but also Polish Nationalists have taken refuge there and they are offering bitter resistance”. And with that he removed my suspicions.

THE PRESIDENT: Are you speaking of Warsaw? What example was the German nation setting to the other nations of the world? What example do you mean there?

JODL: I am speaking of the uprising in the Warsaw Ghetto of which I heard through a personal report from Himmler given in our presence, in the presence of soldiers at the Fuehrer’s headquarters. Himmler spoke only of an uprising and of bitter fighting. As far as the activities of the Police are concerned, of the so-called action groups, Einsatzgruppen and Einsatzkommandos – a conception, incidentally, of which I first heard here in detail – there was never any explanation through the Fuehrer himself other than that these police units were necessary to quell uprisings, rebellions, and partisan actions before they grew into a menace. This was not a task for the Armed Forces, but for the Police, and for that reason the Police had to enter the operational areas of the Army. I have never had any private information on the extermination of the Jews; and on my word, as sure as I am sitting here, I heard all these things for the first time after the end of the war.”

We continue with Alfred Rosenberg (v. 22, p. 382):

“The thought of a physical annihilation of Slavs and Jews, that is to say, the actual murder of entire peoples, has never entered my mind and I most certainly did not advocate it in any way. I was of the opinion that the existing Jewish question would have to be solved by the creation of a minority right, by emigration, or by settling the Jews in a national territory over a ten-year period of time. The White Paper of the British Government of 24 July 1946 shows how historical developments can bring about measures which were never previously planned.”

And finally, Reich Marshal Hermann Goering (v. 9, p. 619):

SIR DAVID MAXWELL-FYFE: You heard what I read to you about Hitler, what he said to Horthy and what Ribbentrop said, that the Jews must be exterminated or taken to concentration camps. Hitler said the Jews must either work or be shot. That was in April 1943. Do you still say that neither Hitler nor you knew of this policy to exterminate the Jews?

GOERING: For the correctness of the document.

SIR DAVID MAXWELL-FYFE: Will you please answer my question. Do you still say neither Hitler nor you knew of the policy to exterminate the Jews?

GOERING: As far as Hitler is concerned, I have said I do not think so. As far as I am concerned, I have said that I did not know, even approximately, to what extent these things were taking place.

SIR DAVID MAXWELL-FYFE: You did not know to what degree, but you knew there was a policy that aimed at the extermination of the Jews?

GOERING: No, a policy of emigration, not liquidation of the Jews. I knew only that there had been isolated cases of such perpetrations.”

So here is the question: Is Dr. Deborah Lipstadt aware of all this? If yes, then she is deliberately misleading the public. If not, she is just an ignoramus who should probably stick to giving lectures on making birthday cakes.

Robert Faurisson, 1929 – 2018

by Arthur R. Butz

For the occasion of Robert Faurisson's 75th birthday, in 2004, I wrote a little piece (<https://codoh.com/library/document/1643/>) assessing his revisionist career. Now I must write his eulogy, but that 2004 piece can be considered part of this eulogy. There is nothing there to retract, leaving aside one objection he raised (message to me of Feb. 5, 2004: He had in fact published a little monograph I had forgotten, namely Mémoire en défense contre ceux qui m'accusent de falsifier l'histoire, 1980, with a foreword by Noam Chomsky).

Robert Faurisson

Also, I should note that, while the sole formal author of the 1980 book Vérité Historique ou Vérité Politique? was Serge Thion, it would be more realistic to consider Faurisson at least co-author. The book presented Faurisson's analysis of The Diary of Anne Frank, by Otto Frank.

My earlier concern that his work has not been adequately expressed or summarized remains. He left us with the situation largely unchanged in that respect, but it may now be possible to create a summary of his work that will satisfy us, though not Robert, wherever he is.

Let me explain.

Revisionists are difficult people. Their characters are necessarily individualistic and they are the last to agree on anything for the sake of harmony. Flipping through a dictionary, I wondered if I should describe Robert as not being a “concordant” person, but I kept thinking only an idiom would do: he was “not a team player”. It is not difficult to see why it is inevitable that revisionists are temperamentally difficult. We must accept them on these terms; otherwise, we would not have them. A compliant or agreeable revisionist is no more possible than a married bachelor.

I am proud to say I share some of those features, and I realized very early that any significant joint project with Robert, such as coauthoring an article, was out of the question. The little bit of friction I had with him, over the more than forty-two years of our relationship, was handled in brief private communications, but I know of cases of sincere comrades trying close cooperation with explosive results, creating significant periods of actual hostility, and provoking the lash of Robert's words.

Now that he has gone where we are all headed, publication of a summary or condensation of his work, written by a very able revisionist, may be possible.

Robert's passing will even be furtively upsetting to his enemies, as he played a role in France unlike anything we know in the USA. Everybody knew who Robert Faurisson was (Marine Le Pen called the 1990 Fabius-Gayssot law the "loi Faurisson" – RF mail of 2/27/18), because he was Goldstein for the media hyenas and pseudo-intellectual poseurs. On 23 August 2012, I wrote Germar Rudolf and others in connection with an article published by Ariane Chemin in Le Monde, and which Faurisson challenged in court (of course he eventually lost the case in June 2017 and appealed, unsuccessfully, in February 2018). I noted

"RF is their Goldstein. They would be lost if he were to pass from the scene."

I once read an account of a meeting in Paris during which, it seemed to me, each speaker tried to outdo the others in denouncing Robert, thereby reminding me of Orwell's "two minutes hate." I could easily imagine a participant heaving a volume of the Grand Larousse (The dictionary has 7 volumes; the encyclopedia has 10 volumes) at a TV screen depicting Robert-as-Goldstein on horseback, at the head of a column of Nazi soldiers passing through the Arc de Triomphe. In fact, I could even imagine each speaker given his own volume to heave.

Given those considerations, consider an article that appeared in Le Monde on 8 February 2018, about Faurisson's appeal against the Ariane Chemin article, entitled "The final battle [L'ultime bataille] of the Holocaust denier Robert Faurisson." Early in the story, it was noted Faurisson was 89. I could not help but interpret this story as expressing, among other things, both glee and regret that this Goldstein would soon be gone. To paraphrase a recent US president, they won't have Robert Faurisson to kick around anymore.

It will take time for his departure to sink in. Then there will be an awful void for many American revisionists; it could seem France no longer exists. On the other hand, it may now be possible for an able revisionist to attempt to summarize his work, but that person should be forewarned: an angry voice may come down from the clouds booming "Idiot! You have not understood at all!"

The Adolf Eichmann Trial | CODOH

by John Wear

This video (52 minutes) shows one of the Hitler's Henchman series (on Eichmann), and shows the contrast between the nonsense of the "Holocau$T" as presented to the public and the facts as shown in the article below.

The Adolf Eichmann trial created hugely increased public awareness of the so-called Holocaust in Israel and worldwide.<sup>[1]</sup> Deborah Lipstadt writes: “This trial, whose main objective was bringing a Nazi who helped organize and carry out genocide to justice, transformed Jewish life and society as much as it passed judgment on a murderer.”<sup>[2]</sup>

Law professor Lawrence Douglas writes: “The Eichmann trial...remains the Great Holocaust Trial—the legal proceeding in which the tasks of doing justice to unprecedented crimes, clarifying a tortured history, and defining the terms of collective memory conjoined and collided in the most provocative fashion. Indeed, the Eichmann trial served to create the Holocaust...”<sup>[3]</sup>

This article will show that the Eichmann trial was instead an unjust proceeding that augmented an already-false history of the so-called Holocaust.

Historical Background

Adolf Eichmann was abducted by Israeli agents in Argentina in May 1960. Given a choice between instant death or a trial, Eichmann chose to be the defendant in a criminal trial in Jerusalem that began on April 11, 1961.<sup>[4]</sup>

The defense strategy in Eichmann’s trial is summarized on the Yad Vashem website:

The defense team [was] comprised of Dr. Robert Servatius and his assistant, Dieter Wechtenbruch. The defense did not contest the facts included in the indictment, opting instead to play down the responsibility of the accused for the crimes of the Nazi regime against the Jews. The defense depicted the accused as “a small cog in the state apparatus,” lacking influence upon the planning and operation of the murder machine. This line of defense stressed Eichmann’s hierarchical inability to defy the instructions of his superiors, and the fact that it was the heads of the Nazi regime, rather than Eichmann, who adopted the decisive criminal decisions.[\[5\]](#)

As in the Nuremberg trials, almost all of the available documents were controlled by the prosecutors. With only two men on his defense team, Eichmann worked very hard throughout his trial and became the chief assistant to his defense counsel.[\[6\]](#)

The Israeli Mossad also spied on Dr. Servatius, and all of his consultations with Eichmann were closely monitored. This made it virtually impossible for the defense to spring any surprises during the trial.[\[7\]](#)

Eichmann underwent months of interrogation before securing defense counsel. Eichmann seemed to think at first that he would be kept alive in Israeli captivity only so long as he talked to his interrogator, Avner Less. The result of Eichmann's interrogations was 275 hours of tape and a transcript running to 3,564 pages.[\[8\]](#)

Consequently, the prosecution team had a huge advantage in Eichmann's trial. Former Israeli Supreme Court Judge Gabriel Bach states: "We were three prosecutors. We gathered millions of pages of documentation and read a great deal of background sources. I don't think I slept more than three hours every night throughout the trial...The German government was very cooperative and sent us a great deal of material."[\[9\]](#)

Servatius stated at the opening of Eichmann's trial that a fair trial was not possible in Israel. Servatius contested the legal basis of the trial and asked that the case against Eichmann be dismissed. Israeli Attorney General and chief prosecutor Gideon Hausner spent two and a half days rebutting Servatius's numerous challenges to Israel's legal right to conduct the trial. The three Israeli judges predictably ruled against Servatius and ordered the trial to continue.[\[10\]](#)

Eyewitness Testimony

The prosecution called 112 witnesses in Eichmann's trial. Testimony from Jewish eyewitnesses constituted the central element of the prosecution's case, with only one non-Jewish eyewitness called to testify.[\[11\]](#)

Gideon Hausner called numerous witnesses who had no connection with Adolf Eichmann. While much of this testimony was based on hearsay, the Jewish eyewitnesses transformed the trial from an important war-crimes trial to one that would have enduring significance.[\[12\]](#)

Dr. Servatius knew under the trial conditions in Israel he could not contest the official Holocaust story. Servatius, who was supposed to be defending Eichmann, was also fully aware that he could not garner sympathy for his client by aggressively challenging the Jewish eyewitnesses. Servatius thus decided to conduct almost no cross-examinations of the prosecution witnesses.[\[13\]](#)

Hannah Arendt confirmed that that the prosecution witnesses were seldom cross-examined. Arendt wrote:

...the defense hardly ever rose to challenge any testimony, no matter how irrelevant and immaterial it might be" and "...the witnesses for the prosecution were hardly ever cross-examined by either the defense or the judges...[\[14\]](#)

When Dr. Servatius did contest a witness's testimony, his goal was to show that it had no relevance to Eichmann's activities. For example, when parts of Hans Frank's diary were read into evidence, Servatius did not object to the diary's admission or the readings from it. On cross-examination of the witness through whom the diary was put into evidence, Servatius asked only one question: Was the name of Adolf Eichmann mentioned in any of these 29 volumes? Since the answer was no, Servatius was satisfied.[\[15\]](#)

Servatius also did not call any defense witnesses in Eichmann's trial. Most of the potential defense witnesses had been members of the Nazi Party, SD or SS. This meant that if they set foot in Israel they could be arrested under the same law under which Eichmann was being tried, and any testimony they gave in court was likely to be self-incriminating.[\[16\]](#)

The prosecution did allow affidavits from pertinent defense witnesses despite the fact that the prosecution would be unable to cross-examine these witnesses in court.[\[17\]](#) Several defense depositions were taken in German courts with Dieter Wechtenbruch appearing as Eichmann's defense counsel. However, these defense witnesses, who could be subject to prosecution in Germany for any incriminating statements made in their depositions, were of no help to Eichmann's defense.[\[18\]](#)

Nuremberg Testimony

The prosecution also used testimony and affidavits from the International Military Tribunal (IMT) at Nuremberg to convict Adolf Eichmann. For example, the prosecution entered into evidence Rudolf Höss's affidavit from the IMT that implicated Eichmann in the workings of Auschwitz-Birkenau. Rudolf Höss's memoirs, which stated that Eichmann had visited him in the summer of 1941 to discuss the use of poison gas, were also introduced into evidence.[\[19\]](#)

Rudolf Höss's testimony and affidavit should not have been allowed into evidence in Eichmann's trial because Höss underwent particularly brutal torture upon his arrest. Höss stated in his memoirs: "At my first interrogation, evidence was obtained by beating me. I do not know what is in the record, although I signed it."[\[20\]](#)

Additional proof that the torture of Rudolf Höss was exceptionally brutal is contained in the book Legions of Death. This book states that Sgt. Bernard Clarke and other British officers tortured Rudolf Höss into making his confession.[\[21\]](#) Obviously, such testimony obtained through torture should never have been admissible as evidence in Eichmann's trial.

The testimony of Dieter Wisliceny at the IMT was also used against Eichmann. Wisliceny claimed at the IMT that Eichmann showed him a written order signed by Heinrich Himmler for the physical extermination of the Jews.[\[22\]](#) The prosecution at the Eichmann trial used Wisliceny's testimony even though no written order from Himmler or anyone else to exterminate European Jewry has ever been found.

Film Evidence Presented at Trial

An excerpted and sliced version of Nazi Concentration Camps, the U.S. Army Signal Corps documentary shown to dramatic effect at the IMT, was shown in the 70th session of the Eichmann trial. This documentary was shown without soundtrack, and provided visual proof of the crimes of the so-called Holocaust. Gideon Hausner described the emaciated prisoners of war as "figures of Musselmänner"—that is, the death-camp inmates destined for the gas chamber because of their broken physical and psychological state."[\[23\]](#)

The prosecution at the Eichmann trial failed to mention that most of the inmates in these camps died of natural causes. When American and British forces took control of the German concentration camps, they were followed by military personnel charged with documenting evidence of German war crimes.

One of these was Dr. Charles P. Larson, an American forensic pathologist, who performed autopsies at Dachau and some of its sub-camps. Dr. Larson performed about 25 autopsies a day for 10 days at Dachau and superficially examined another 300 to 1,000 bodies. He autopsied only those bodies that appeared to be ambiguous. Dr. Larson stated in regard to these autopsies:

Many of them died from typhus. Dachau's crematoriums couldn't keep up with the burning of the bodies. They did not have enough oil to keep the incinerators going. I found that a number of the victims had also died from tuberculosis. All of them were malnourished. The medical facilities were most inadequate. There was no sanitation...

A rumor going around Dachau after we got there was that many of the prisoners were poisoned. I did a lot of toxicological analysis to determine the facts and removed organs from a cross-section of about 30 to 40 bodies and sent them into Paris to the Army's First Medical laboratory for analysis, since I lacked the proper facilities in the field. The reports came back negative. I could not find where any of these people had been poisoned. The majority died of natural diseases of one kind or another...[\[24\]](#)

Dr. Larson did report that a number of inmates had been shot at some of the German camps, and that the living conditions in the camps were atrocious.[\[25\]](#)

Dr. John E. Gordon, M.D., Ph.D., a professor of preventive medicine and epidemiology at the Harvard University School of Public Health, was also with U.S. forces at the end of World War II. Dr. Gordon determined that disease, and especially typhus, was the Number One cause of death in the German camps.[\[26\]](#)

This and other medical evidence proving that most of the inmates in the Signal Corps documentary died of natural causes was not presented at Eichmann's trial. Obviously, such evidence would have undermined the prosecution's contention that inmates in the German camps died from a German policy of genocide.

Eichmann's Testimony

Eichmann sent a note to Servatius before his trial stating that he had few hopes of getting out alive. However, Eichmann wanted to tell the truth for the sake of his descendants. Eichmann stated: "They will know that their father, great-grandfather, and so on was no murderer. That alone matters for me, not just to survive."[\[27\]](#)

Eichmann emphasized in his testimony that he was obliged to follow orders and never acted on his own initiative. Eichmann could not testify that Germany did not have a program of genocide, since the Israeli judges would never have allowed such testimony. Instead, Eichmann portrayed himself as a cog in a machine who had always sought peaceful solutions rather than a murder program. Many news sources reported that Eichmann did a good job in answering Servatius's questions.[\[28\]](#)

Gideon Hausner's cross-examination of Eichmann lasted two weeks and turned ugly from the outset. A New York Times article stated that Hausner's "shrillness and posturing" made Eichmann look like a "clever and wily opponent."[\[29\]](#) A Dutch reporter observed: "...Eichmann has won on points. He turned out to be of greater stature as a defendant than Hausner as a prosecutor." [30] Despite his best efforts, Hausner was never able to get Eichmann to admit his guilt.

The three Israeli judges took turns asking Eichmann questions after Hausner's cross-examination. Eichmann told the Israeli judges that he was not an anti-Semite, and in a few cases had attempted to help Jews. Eichmann stated that he had to follow the "orders by a supreme head of state," and that he did the best he could under these circumstances. Eichmann's testimony would seem not to have convinced the judges of his innocence. [31]

Conclusion

On December 11, 1961, the presiding judge in Eichmann's trial handed down the death sentence. Adolf Eichmann was hanged six months later. Eichmann's execution was the first in Israel's history. [32]

Hannah Arendt wrote in regard to the Eichmann trial:

In Israel, as in most other countries, a person appearing in court is deemed innocent until proved guilty. But in the case of the Eichmann trial this was an obvious fiction. If he had not been found guilty before he appeared in Jerusalem, guilty beyond any reasonable doubt, the Israelis would never have dared, or wanted, to kidnap him; Prime Minister Ben-Gurion, explaining to the president of Argentina, in a letter dated June 3, 1960, why Israel had committed a "formal violation of Argentine law," wrote that "it was Eichmann who organized the mass murder [of six million of our people], on a gigantic and unprecedented scale, throughout Europe." In contrast to normal arrests in ordinary criminal cases, where suspicion of guilt must be proved to be substantial and reasonable but not beyond reasonable doubt--that is the task of the ensuing trial—Eichmann's illegal arrest could be justified, and was justified in the eyes of the world, only by the fact that the outcome of the trial could be safely anticipated. [33]

The three Israeli judges in Eichmann's trial were also biased. This is implicitly acknowledged in the book Eichmann Interrogated, "It was a fair trial as far as the feelings of the judges permitted." [34] Law professor Frank Tuerkheimer writes concerning Eichmann's judges: "Aside from what they knew as educated persons, each of the three judges had left Germany for Palestine in the 1930s and it would be unusual if none of their extended families had emerged unscathed from the Holocaust." [35]

In Israel, where emotions ran high concerning the so-called Holocaust, it was of course impossible for Eichmann to get a fair trial. The prohibition of the defense to question the reality of the Holocaust story, to cross-examine prosecution witnesses, to consult with Eichmann in confidence, to have the case heard by impartial judges, to contest testimony and evidence from the IMT, and the routine admission of hearsay evidence all ensured Adolf Eichmann's conviction. The result was an unjust verdict that augmented a false history of the so-called Holocaust.

The Man in the Glass Cage

by Jett Rucker

Probably the most-famous man-in-a-glass-cage in history was Adolf Eichmann, an ex-lieutenant colonel of National-Socialist Germany's vaunted Schutzstaffel, better known as the SS. His 1961 Jerusalem trial for crimes alleged to have been committed outside Israel before the creation of the Israeli state was broadcast in near-real time over television, making it one of the first such events so televised. The black-and-white images of Eichmann pleading for his life were common on television screens all over the world for the trial's 125-day duration, and so was the sight of the famous glass enclosure that Eichmann was placed in to give his testimony. Of course, denying, even minimizing his crimes would obviously not have gained him a reprieve from being hanged, so much of his testimony was confessional in nature, but so stage-managed as not to resemble too-closely the mawkish self-accusation made familiar to observers everywhere in ham-handed Soviet productions such as the 1936-38 Moscow Trials, in which conspirators against the Soviet state propounded their sins so fulsomely as to reveal their contrivedness to all but the most-blinkered of spectators.

The glass enclosure was said to be bullet-proof, and although it was never tested with actual gunfire, there would seem to be little reason to suppose that it wasn't bullet-proof. But it was also soundproof, or nearly so. The structure had a metal roof, which might be justified on grounds of providing it with structural strength, but it also contributed to the enclosure's sound-proofness, such that Eichmann had to speak into a microphone in order to be heard outside the booth. If the system had any kill switch(es), it does not appear that any such was actually used during the proceedings.

However, Eichmann was in a position to reveal damning testimony against a number of then-prominent Israeli leaders over collaboration with Eichmann's National-Socialist German government that occurred in the late 1930s, before Germany and Great Britain declared war on each other. Obviously, any such testimony was scrupulously not elicited in the questioning Eichmann was subjected to, nor would the slightest trace of any such thing have appeared in whatever scripts Eichmann was made to recite. This collaboration is referred to in some detail in an extended book review by Ron Unz published on August 6, 2018 in the Unz Review, in which Unz poses questions like the following:

A more cynical observer might find it a very odd coincidence that the first prominent Nazi the Israelis made such an effort to track down and kill had been their closest former political ally and collaborator.

Observers remembering the past alliances of the US with Antonio Noriega of Panama, Saddam Hussein of Iraq and/or Osama bin Laden of al Qaeda might find something familiar in this turn of events. The constant presence of two burly guards in the booth with Eichmann accords well with this scenario; one imagines that all their “labor” might have been obviated by the simple expedient of chaining Eichmann’s ankles to the floor, safely concealed from sight by the non-glass lower panels of his “bullet-proof” enclosure. It’s easy to suppose that the guards, either of whom obviously could have overpowered Eichmann, disposed of a gag, handcuffs and other means of swiftly silencing any off-script utterances Eichmann might have attempted in a suicidal paroxysm. But such “trials” are quite nothing if not theater. Shoah trials, they might be called from today’s perspective.

I cannot claim credit for the riveting speculation that the real purpose of the enclosure, and the guards, was to make certain Eichmann stayed on-script with his every word. The notion appears in Unz’s book review:

Presumably, harsh means were employed to persuade him not to reveal any of these dangerous pre-war secrets at his Jerusalem trial, and one might wonder if the reason he was famously kept in an enclosed glass booth was to ensure that the sound could quickly be cut off if he started to stray from the agreed upon script.

The scenario of a “Nazi” captive being made to sing for his life and then executed for his troubles is as old as ... how old might such a sequence be? As old as Scheherazade and a thousand-and-one Arabian nights? However old, how could its age dissuade a potential victim from trying, against all trying, to win a last, final fingerhold on life, precious life, if only for one hour more, one minute, one...?

Interestingly, half a century after the trial for which it was built, the enclosure itself has acquired a certain celebrity of its own. At the initiative of entertainment mogul Milton Maltz, namesake of Cleveland’s Maltz Museum of Jewish Heritage, “the” enclosure (it isn’t clear whether it really was the enclosure, or a replica) toured New York and Cleveland. Its “debut” at least outside Israel, was on February 17, 2016 at Maltz’s Cleveland establishment. This article promises that the exhibit, which presents Eichmann’s abduction and his sentencing and execution, will travel to various other cities in the US. As of October 19, 2018, the exhibit is in South Florida, and a person at the host museum in Dania, Florida informed me over the telephone that the enclosure on display is in fact a “replica” of the original—perhaps understandable in view of how heavy it would be if in fact all “bullet-proof” glass and tellingly in keeping with the replica nature of the gas chambers in “Nazi death camps” and other artifacts of the savage treatment purportedly visited upon Europe’s Jews by the National-Socialist Germans who lost World War II.

The knowledge in Eichmann’s memories, which he disclosed neither in his trial testimony nor in the two-part series in Life Magazine in which he recounted his activities carefully compartmented from those in which he conspired with Zionist leaders against the British occupiers of the coveted homeland of Zion, Palestine, was a veritable atomic bomb to the moral legitimacy of the Zionist movement that had secured the establishment of Israel a mere 12 years before his abduction. Eichmann had to be controlled, to sing the Israeli song, and thereafter to be hanged, as he was, in Israel's prison at Ramla in 1962.

Comparisons with the 1946 performances of Rudolf Höss, former commandant of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp, are irresistible, unless, of course, you feel Höss was spouting accurate (and informed) truths, instead of contrived stories, á la Scheherazade, to prolong or even save his life in the face of lethal charges by actors who had complete disposition not only of his own life, but of those (he was at least led to believe) of those whom he held most-dear, his wife and children.

Eichmann's Israeli captors, so far as is known, did not threaten Eichmann's family members (still in Argentina), but the proposition that they did not offer him ways of deferring, or eliminating, the power of (his) life or death of which they disposed is simply inadmissible. Eichmann "acted" for his life, and lost.

The outcome was foreordained. And if, bound and gagged as he effectively was, he had sought, like Icarus, to fly too close to the sun, he would have plummeted to the hard earth, his wings melted as surely as the gag would have been placed across his mouth.

By such are we "informed" of the sins of those who lost the war.

Gleiwitz: A False, False Flag?

by Veronica Clark

Nothing unusual happened at the Gleiwitz transmitter station on the night/early morning of 31 August. There was certainly no false-flag event initiated by SS or SD troops there. However, a few vexing questions remain unanswered

According to most historians, the Gleiwitz Incident is the “false flag” that touched off World War II in Europe. Put simply, it was the Nazis’ casus belli “heard ‘round the world.” This is what most of us accept as true. The reality is far simpler and less exciting, however...

Nothing unusual happened at the Gleiwitz transmitter station in Germany near the Polish border on the night/early morning of 31 August. There was certainly no false-flag event initiated by SS or SD troops there. However, a few vexing questions remain unanswered. I will ask and try to answer a few right now, and then I will ask and offer a few more alternative answers later on as we proceed through the sordid details.

Before I proceed, a brief word about the White Book. The German White Book (Das Deutsche Weißbuch) was one of several official records produced and kept by the German government. In fact, the White Book concept dates back to World War I. It contains reports, memos, etc. of German officials, such as Joachim von Ribbentrop, in support of the German government and its agenda. The White Book we are concerned with in this case was produced by the Auswärtiges Amt (Foreign Office).

Incidentally, Ernst Heinrich Freiherr von Weizsäcker, a traitor and anti-Hitler conspirator, served as State Secretary at the Foreign Office from 1938 to 1943. Together with Admiral Wilhelm Canaris and General Ludwig Beck, Mr. Weizsäcker was a leader of the “anti-war” group in the German government. The relevance of these details will become clear as we proceed, since Weizsäcker and Canaris may have originated and/or fabricated the ‘Gleiwitz Incident’ report as documented in the White Book.[\[1\]](#) In the light of the evidence I have researched, this is the most compelling circumstantial case thus far.

Firstly, we do not know who the source for the official White Book report is for this purported event. There is an entry in the White Book for 31 August 1939 which is attributed to the police president of Gleiwitz. There is a problem with this, however. The police president at the time was a certain Mr. Schade, and he was murdered in a postwar Polish camp after his IMT (International Military Tribunal) interrogation in 1945.<sup>[2]</sup> He was never cross-examined during the trial,<sup>[3]</sup> so his testimony to confirm that he is the actual source will not be had. It is possible that this man was in cahoots with the SS men who appeared at the transmitter station to conduct a brief (and seemingly innocent) radio exercise over the weather channel and who then promptly left. (More about them later). Did Mr. Schade (have to) take a vow of silence in this regard? If this is the case, then the report as well as the broadcast about a supposed “shootout and fatal wounding” at the station were SS fabrications. In any case, they were bogus. Nothing happened and the fake report was planted to deceitfully implicate Poland in a scuffle and fatal shootout at the station, an event and death which never happened but which the Allies claimed did happen. Put simply, this was a fictitious report and broadcast that ultimately backfired on the SS and was in fact used against them with all kinds of lurid details added post facto by the Allies. This is a possible explanation. But there is another possible explanation. What if these SS men were not actually SS men, but imposters with fake credentials? Without Schade’s honest account, we will likely never know if either of these explanations is correct.

Secondly, we do not know the source for the presumably live broadcast from nearby Breslau supporting the claim that the station was in Polish hands and that some sort of commotion was happening there at 20:00 hours. There was a Breslau broadcast in this regard because Captain Otto Radek<sup>[4]</sup>, whom we will revisit later on, and a few other “earwitnesses” heard the broadcast. They got all excited about it since there were reportedly numerous such separate border shootouts/events that took place that night—none of which Hitler mentioned by name in his “infamous” war-proclamation speech the following day. At any rate, unless the “few SS men” were responsible for this broadcast and the station personnel on duty that night were in cahoots with them to keep quiet about it, then they cannot be the source for this broadcast. All we know is that eyewitnesses at the station, including Radek’s own subordinates with whom he spoke that night, testified that “a few SS men” showed up and conducted a radio exercise there at the station and then promptly left. There was no shooting, no disturbance, nothing. All was quiet, they asserted. If this is the case, then these SS men were innocent of creating a fictitious commotion and broadcast, and some other source is responsible. The questions to ask given this scenario are who was it and how was it done? We may never be able to answer these questions, but they must be asked since we do not have sufficient answers.

There is one other problem I must mention up front. Unlike the SS, the Grenzpolizei is mentioned by name in the White Book entry regarding the Gleiwitz transmitter station. It turns out that the Grenzpolizei worked intimately with Admiral Wilhelm Canaris’s Abwehr (German Military Intelligence Service) on sabotage missions against Poland prior to the outbreak of war.<sup>[5]</sup> The significance of this oft-overlooked detail will become clear as we delve into the details of the incident at Mosty.

One can see how and why the official record is so convoluted. The official narrative actually consists of many conflicting narratives featuring a whole range of improbable characters. We won’t get into all the details here, but suffice it to say that the official story is nothing more than fanciful fiction. And poorly written fiction at that!

Let us briefly examine just a few details to unscramble this mess as best as possible. Historians overwhelmingly accept as true, as do most people who know of this “incident,” that the SS, SD and Gestapo worked together to concoct an elaborate fake raid on the radio-transmitter station located in Gleiwitz (now known as Gliwice<sup>[6]</sup>), a small border town located on the Polish-German frontier. By most accounts, a handful of either SS or SD men—historians are unable to agree on which—purportedly dressed up as “Polish soldiers” or “insurgents” and staged a shootout at the transmitter station. This shootout was purportedly led by the notorious Nazi turncoat Alfred Naujocks[7], the sole source behind the Nuremberg account of the raid. These SS and/or SD men were supposed to have left a body—only recently identified as a Polish citizen of German descent named Franz Honiok (minus any proof)[8]—at the scene as evidence that much more than just a scuffle took place there.[9] However, some historians, such as Dennis Whitehead, seem to think that the SS/SD shot and killed a few of their own men to make the whole thing seem real, and that in fact hundreds of men took place in this whole covert operation (300, to be exact)—which includes two other “false-flag” raids at Hohenlinden or Hochlinden (henceforth, H/H; historians cannot agree on which location it was) and Pitschen. In a nutshell, Mr. Whitehead merged several contradictory versions of the Gleiwitz Incident in an attempt to sell the entire “Nazi false-flag” story as legit. He failed in his mission because two (or more) fictional accounts are no better than one. My own research into this incident, and the other two purported false flags at H/H and Pitschen, proves that not a single one of these historians’ claims is verified. Not a single one.

As it stands, the Gleiwitz Nazi “false-flag” incident is nothing more than a hoax. It is a media fabrication that may have originated with (and/or been expanded upon by) the traitorous Wilhelm Canaris and Co. residing safely behind the security of the much-respected Abwehr[10], abetted by fellow traitors such as General Halder, Erwin Lahousen, Herbert Mehlhorn, Hans Oster, and a handful of other traitors and sellouts during and after the war. I say this with relative confidence because the official account of what happened at Gleiwitz, H/H and Pitschen is nearly identical to the real story of the incident at Mosty. I will recount this incident now, minus the fine details.

Wilhelm Canaris’s Abwehr SO- and KO-Groups were entrusted to destroy or secure certain strategic points behind enemy lines prior to Germany’s official invasion of Poland. At the last minute, and much to Canaris’s chagrin if his surviving colleagues are to be believed, Hitler called off the invasion awaiting an answer from Italy concerning support for his Polish endeavor. Canaris’s Abwehr men had to scramble back out of Poland and retreat to Slovakia pending further notice from above. One of Canaris’s men was caught (Josef Kulik), however, and an official inquiry was conducted by Polish military authorities as to why this German was cavorting about in their territory. He was able to assuage the Poles by feigning to have gotten lost and confused as to the border demarcations between Poland and Slovakia, and after a brief interrogation and investigation he was apparently released. This is so uncannily similar to how the story of Gleiwitz, H/H and Pitschen is told by Mr. Whitehead and other historians that one is impelled to take a second look and to compare them. Upon doing this, I have concluded that the Gleiwitz/H/H/Pitschen macro-incident is nothing more than a tall tale modeled on the real incident at Mosty, perhaps to clear the name of Canaris and the reputation of the Abwehr, instead indicting and condemning specifically “Nazi” state organs (SS, SD and Gestapo). In other words, the Gleiwitz White Book report may be a case of cover (for the Abwehr) and projection (onto the Nazis). (I explain in my two-volume book a range of possible Allied motives for doing this.) If correct, this may explain why “Abwehr” and “Grenzpolizei”[11] are both mentioned in that White Book entry and why zero references to the SS, SD or Gestapo are present in that same entry.[12] There is zero doubt that Abwehr traitors and fellow travelers expanded upon the fictitious incident with wild and lurid details implicating every Nazi organ they possibly could during and after the war, most notably during the IMT. This is beyond any doubt. But, moving along here, also curiously missing from this entry is Captain Otto Radek and 3rd Company of Border Guard Battalion 1/68. [13] He and his border guard, not the border/frontier police or anyone else, were in charge of station security that evening. Thus, when Capt. Radek heard some sort of commotion at the station via the nightly Breslau broadcast, he was taken aback and immediately made for the station via motorcar. To his complete surprise, all was quiet upon his arrival and his fellow guardsmen reported that nothing had happened there. The traitorous Abwehr appears to be the missing link that makes sense amidst all the conflicting information surrounding this entry and the purported “Nazi false flag” at Gleiwitz,[\[14\]](#) which I thoroughly explain and explore in my two books.[\[15\]](#) One has to read both books to piece the entire case against the Abwehr and other traitors together, as there are many layers to this rotten onion.

In this instance, “Abwehr” is an inapposite term to use in this entry seeing as how Die Abwehr was the name of Germany’s military intelligence service at the time. We are expected to accept without question that no other term was appropriate in this entry and context. It just strikes me as odd. And again, this particular entry is attributed to none other than Police President W. Schade, a man murdered not by Nazis but, as I will address again later, by Poles in a postwar concentration camp in 1945.[\[16\]](#) After the war, when Capt. Radek attempted to properly investigate what did take place at the station that night, if anything, his efforts were thwarted in interesting ways.[\[17\]](#) It seems obvious who was silencing whom here.

Permit me to further speculate about the transmitter entry as a possible Abwehr/Grenzpolizei fake. The source for the White Book entry must also have been the source (or was in close touch with the source) for the Gleiwitz incident news stories/reports put out by the DNB (Deutsches Nachrichtenbüro[\[18\]](#)) and the Völkischer Beobachter (VB). Whoever that source was, it seems to me, was trying to make the Nazi press look bad. And it is a fact that several Abwehr traitors along with their allies were working to subvert Hitler since 1937, especially regarding his diplomacy concerning Poland. Maybe said source planted this White Book entry knowing that not only the Nazi press but the Allied press too would pick up on it and use it against Germany (i.e., that Hitler had “started the war with a lie”). In other words, maybe the Allied press was tipped off about this purported “incident” (along with the two others at H/H and Pitschen, which the British press also reported on) and subsequent White Book report, and so they could utilize it how they wanted against Germany. Indeed, the British press had reported on these incidents (Gleiwitz, H/H and Pitschen) before they were even completed! As well, both the DNB and VB agencies reported an incident at Gleiwitz featuring contradictory details to those of the White Book and to those of the Allied versions (including that of Mr. Naujocks).

Let’s move on.

Deeper research into the purported Gleiwitz Incident indicates that nothing happened at the transmitter station aside from the brief SS radio exercise/test. There was no commotion, no shootout and no fake Polish soldiers or ruffians. The Gleiwitz hoax was laid to rest for the remainder of the war. Even most mainstream historians refer to it as “forgotten,” “little known” or “insignificant.” However, it was resurrected for the IMT to indict the Nazis in particular as the sole guilty party for the outbreak of war with Poland, and all by most murderous and deceitful means! Germany had to look bad. Because, as we all know, the USSR really was bad. The worst kind of bad. And Britain was bad too. The British leadership, notably Sir Winston Churchill, was very interested in war breaking out on the Continent to the benefit of the Empire’s longstanding “Divide and Conquer” strategy. Somehow the Nazis had to look worse than everyone else.

The spotlight of condemnation had to remain on Germany. Touching off the world’s worst war by needless murder and clandestine trickery was the perfect indictment of an otherwise honorable nation. Throughout the IMT, it only got worse for Germany. Indeed, this Gleiwitz incident set the stage for the entire Allied casus belli against Germany. Germany, and Germany alone, was the sole culprit for the outbreak of war. By any means necessary. I would also venture to guess that the incident at Venlo, during which the Germans seized two English SIS spies just across the Dutch border, had something to do with the resurrection of the Gleiwitz hoax for the IMT.[\[19\]](#)

The Gleiwitz fiasco is best known to historians and the public as either Operation Himmler or Operation Tannenberg. Yes, you read that right folks! Historians cannot even agree on the name of this “false flag” without which Hitler had no just cause for war against Poland. Had so many lives not been lost in that conflagration, and had not so much needless guilt and personal smearing been meted out against otherwise innocent parties and persons, this whole thing would be comical.

I must digress for just a moment and recap because the following two points need to be appreciated fully. First, qualified historians cannot even agree on what this “false flag” operation was called. Yet, without this operation (and the two others that supposedly went along with it at H/H and Pitschen), (we are told that) Hitler couldn’t even hope to sell his invasion of Poland to the German people as legit, let alone to the world. It was, per the official historical record, his “casus belli”. Secondly, historians cannot decide if it was the Gestapo, SS or SD, or all three(!), that led the three purported border raids, nor how many men were involved in each. The official narratives are a shambles. Really, these two points alone establish the untenability of the official historical record regarding Gleiwitz. And if the record is this problematic, why should Germans (then or now) bear any guilt in this regard? This is in fact why the truth about what did and did not happen at the Gleiwitz transmitter station is so important to determine. Germans have been bearing needless guilt and shame regarding this aspect of World War II. I believe historian Gerd Schultze-Rhonhof has called it “the war that had MANY fathers,” not just one father. Moreover, as with Lord Dacre’s Table Talk, which Dr. Richard Carrier has again blasted as essentially worthless as a record of Hitler’s utterings[\[20\]](#), real Third Reich history (Real3R) has been eluding the public for decades. It is high past time to set the entire World War II record straight.

In a nutshell, my tentative conclusion about Gleiwitz is as follows:

The German White Book ‘Gleiwitz Incident’ entry of 31 August 1939 originates with 1) Abwehr/Grenzpolizei traitors, or 2) Police President W. Schade. Since Herr Schade was conveniently murdered in a postwar Polish concentration camp in 1945, as aforesaid, he is not the likeliest suspect. Unfortunately, Canaris was killed by the Nazi state for his long-time duplicity, so there will likely never be a sure way to confirm who, precisely, originated this official report. Suffice it to say that in the light of all the evidence, or lack thereof, as well as the Mosty Incident, which implicates the Abwehr, Grenzpolizei and Canaris in provable ‘war crimes’ as well as in regard to violation of Poland’s sovereignty when war was not yet on, the Abwehr, Grenzpolizei and Canaris are the likeliest suspects. I hardly need mention that Hitler called the war off on 25 August[\[21\]](#), so if he was going to utilize alleged “false flag” raids at Gleiwitz, H/H and Pitschen as his reason(s) for war, why would all three “false flags” only be planned for (and actually take place on) 31 August and not also on the evening/early morning of 24/25 August as with Mosty? Talk about playing with fire! Please recall that the invasion took place on 1 September, not on 26 August as originally planned. It was not until recently that the official narrative tried to mitigate this blatant error. Every single account has asserted that all three “raids” took place on the evening/early morning of 31 August. Moreover, why did Hitler neglect to mention a single one of these most-coveted of false-flag events by name in his declaration of war speech the next day? That’s a huge problem that not a single historian has addressed. Until now, of course.

I will now ask a couple more vexing questions, which I explore in my two-book set.

The Allied press, specifically in Britain and the US, as well as the Völkischer Beobachter (official NSDAP newspaper) and the DNB (semi-official news agency with Allied connections and employees) put out conflicting and disputable versions of the alleged incident.

Why?

Who delivered the Breslau broadcast about what reportedly happened at the Gleiwitz transmitter station? Was it a traitor? An Allied mole?

Let's ponder these possibilities for a moment.

A traitor or mole would be motivated to sabotage Hitler's war effort and/or to undermine his credibility and/or honorable conduct. This was in fact one of the earliest goals of the traitors in the Abwehr (their collective sabotage of Hitler's diplomatic efforts commenced in 1937).

The Allied press reported soon after Hitler's invasion of Poland in 1939 that he had "started the war with a lie." Who fed the Allied press this line? That "lie" consisted of the "false flags" perpetrated by the instruments of the NSDAP itself (Gestapo, SS and SD) at Gleiwitz, H/H and Pitschen. However, not one of these "false flags" has any evidence to support it.

Revisionist historian Carlos W. Porter mentions a "posh Polish-bank branch" near the border which did "very little business." It was allowed to exist and operate with the German authorities' permission. Oddly, it disappeared right around the time of the purported Gleiwitz "false flag." Did any of these folks have British and/or Abwehr/Grenzpolizei traitor connections or contacts? If so, might their involvement in this "false-flag" hoax (at the time) explain the murder of Gleiwitz transmitter station manager Klose (murdered by partisans in 1945) as well as the murder of Gleiwitz police president Schade? If this Polish-bank branch was involved at any level in this "false-flag" hoax, then my hypothesis accounts for both its existence and sudden disappearance, something that has thus far eluded historians. Perhaps the Abwehr and/or Grenzpolizei had something to do with it.

In any event, why was this "false-flag" hoax resurrected after the war, and why did it receive so much attention during the IMT and after the war as it pertains to the Allied narrative? (See accompanying appendix of actual IMT testimony.) Remember, it was "insignificant" and "little known" at the time (even though it was supposed to be Hitler's casus belli Number One). One sensible explanation is that the Abwehr's traitorous agents—e.g., Erwin Lahousen and Wilhelm Canaris in absentia—as well as SD/SS turncoats, such as Alfred Naujocks (who defected to the Allies toward the end of the war) and even Heinrich Himmler's adjutant Karl Wolff, were needed as star witnesses for the prosecution (and later on for the Cold War as American agents). As such, these people's 'war crimes' and the Abwehr's 'war crimes' at Mosty et. al were simply dismissed or apparently attributed to dead men and/or the SS, SD and Gestapo via Gleiwitz, H/H and Pitschen.

The Abwehr's and these other traitors' suspected role in concocting these "false-flag" reports and stories—either at the time (in 1939) or later on during the IMT, or in postwar memoirs and magazine interviews like the one featuring Herbert Mehlhorn in Stern in 1952—seems undeniable. The purported "false flags" at Gleiwitz, H/H and Pitschen mirrored their own sabotage missions in Poland nearly to a tee. That's uncanny. Not to mention Alfred Naujocks's two missions against Formis and the SIS agents resemble the Gleiwitz scene enough to render Gleiwitz a fictional knock-off.

Lastly, we must ask why Alfred Naujocks's IMT affidavits mention only two "false flag" sites (Gleiwitz and Hohenlinden) while the IMT and postwar accounts of other suspected actors in this hoax (e.g., Lahousen and Mehlhorn) mention three sites, one of which is incorrect (Hochlinden)? Is this because the IMT “evidence” and postwar “history” had to match Hitler’s actual 1 September proclamation, wherein he casually mentioned three sites and not just two? It sure makes one wonder, especially since Hitler failed to name them specifically. Indeed, he failed to exploit any of them as his casus belli. Instead, he and Dr. Goebbels’s propaganda machine exploited the Bromberg Massacre (which took place two days after the invasion on 3 September) and other alleged Polish atrocities and persecutions against German minorities residing in Poland. Just check out the book Die polnischen Greuelthaten an den Volksdeutschen in Polen: Im Auftrage des Auswärtigen Amtes auf Grund urkundlichen Beweismaterials zusammengestellt, bearbeitet und herausgegeben. What’s more, the British already knew Hitler’s real casus belli, which is featured in the secret Whitehall Report.

I must admit, the Allies were clever. But they were also sloppy. They were equally sloppy regarding the Crystal Night “telexes” that they concocted out of whole cloth for the IMT prosecution.

Let’s recap the main points of our inquiry thus far.

The Gleiwitz false flag never took place.

What reportedly did take place was a brief radio exercise or test conducted by a few purported SS men who properly identified themselves to station personnel on duty that night. Since the Gleiwitz station’s weather channel was not intended to broadcast far and wide but only locally (another glaring problem with the official narrative), it was the perfect station to conduct a relatively private test or exercise. (It was also the perfect station to serve as setting for a media hoax.) What these SS men’s motives were for conducting said exercise/test remains unclear. My own research has revealed that communications were cut or failing all along the frontier leading up to the war, so it may be that they were simply interested to see whether the station was still functioning as intended. Perhaps they might need to use it for local communications purposes. It’s hard to say, but nothing untoward happened at that station and there are several witnesses who have attested to that. Those who have contradicted this version of what happened there, or could have contradicted it, are all confirmed traitors and/or IMT prosecution star witnesses. Or, they were murdered or died untimely deaths.

Convenient, isn’t it?

The Gleiwitz false flag is based on a real Abwehr/Grenzpolizei sabotage (“crime against peace”) mission behind Polish lines (i.e., the incident at Mosty).

It should not surprise anyone to learn that all of the surviving “stars” of the Gleiwitz, H/H and Pitschen stories were Abwehr traitors or SD/SS turncoats. What’s more, many of these same “stars” featured prominently for the IMT prosecution.

What a coincidence, eh?

The Gleiwitz hoax may have originated with Abwehr/Grenzpolizei traitors and was resurrected during the IMT as revenge for the Venlo affair.

After all, it was none other than Mr. Naujocks who successfully pulled off the kidnapping of two British SIS agents, Stevens and Best, by brazenly dashing across the Dutch border and hauling them off by motorcar after a brief scuffle and shootout.. Churchill was furious and had to revamp the entire SIS as a direct result. This affair embarrassed Britain immensely—to be involved in such shenanigans! What’s more, the Dutch had violated their own neutrality by allowing said agents to use their country as a spies' playground. Hitler exploited this incident for all it was worth, which was quite a lot. It was such a lethal blow to British prestige and fair play that Winston Churchill and his fellow British authorities would have had good reason to use the very man who captured their agents, a man who had caused them so much political pain and international embarrassment, for their IMT casus belli against Germany. That man was none other than Mr. Naujocks.

Hence the resurrection of the Gleiwitz hoax for the IMT featuring Alfred Naujocks as star witness! The IMT scene likely went something like this: "We wrote up these nice affidavits for you, Mr. Naujocks. You sign your name to them and we let you go. Sound good?"

After signing off on the Gleiwitz affidavit (along with two others), Naujocks disappeared—until his strange death in the 1960s. You see, Naujocks was just about to be brought to trial by the West German government for the death of a man at the Gleiwitz transmitter station—because that's what the official 1961 Gleiwitz movie put out by the communist East German government claimed had happened!!—when he just up and died. Or he disappeared. Historians are not exactly sure which it was. But the craziest thing about that trial is that Naujocks was cleared of all charges (in absentia). The man who was allegedly shot and left for dead at the Gleiwitz station could not be identified. In fact, the prosecution could not establish that a shooting or murder had even taken place there! Yeah, the rabbit hole does go deep on this one.

I could go on and on with the curious details of this incident, but that would defeat the purpose of my two-volume book on this topic. I recommend interested persons read both books in order to know the Gleiwitz incident, and so much more, inside it and out.

Hitler did not utilize the Gleiwitz incident to make his case for war. Uncanny, really, seeing as how it was supposed to have made his case for war with Poland and all. Among the most pressing problems about what purportedly transpired at Gleiwitz, at least as I see it, is that there are countless versions of this most 'singular' event. How is this possible since there is only ever one version of the truth?

To my knowledge, there is not a single historian who claims that the purported "false flag" at Gleiwitz was legitimate. Some historians have supported Hitler's real motives for invading Poland, which are fully fleshed out in my two-volume book set, though said historians are few and far between. Most historians condemn every move Hitler and Germany made because that is what political correctness guides them to do. They are shackled by the official World War II narrative, which must always be anti-Nazi.

Having said that, Time Magazine ran the following story on Monday, 29 May 1939:

"King Alexander of Yugoslavia and French Foreign Minister Louis Barthou were murdered at Marseille in 1934 by a professional assassin whose Italian connections were carefully hushed. Two years ago British Ambassador to China Sir Hughe M. Knatchbull-Hugessen was machine-gunned and dangerously wounded by a Japanese plane. During the Spanish Civil War "pirate" submarines torpedoed British and French merchantmen. If an incident were needed to start a war, the world has recently had plenty of them." (emphasis added)

Yes, the world, including Hitler himself, had witnessed many incidents that could rightly have been used as pretexts for war. If this was the case, then why were and are Hitler's reasons considered "unjust"? The fact of the matter is that Hitler did not need a raid at the Gleiwitz station to justify invading Poland. In fact, an incident concerning a certain Mr. Gruebner is recognized by the media here as a valid case for war. The Time journalist was in fact wondering whether Hitler would use this man's murder as his casus belli against Poland.

The Time article went on to report that “Early this week there was another, this one at Kaltof in highly inflammable Danzig. Involved was no highly placed ruler or diplomat, but a German butcher named Gustav Gruebner, who was killed by a shot fired from an official Polish automobile. Since incidents amount to what nations want to make them, Führer Adolf Hitler could give Butcher Gruebner a sure niche in history by deciding that this was just the right kind of provocation he needed to march into Danzig.”

Hmm...I thought that the Gleiwitz raid was “just the sort of incident” Hitler needed? What happened to that?

We then read:

“There are always two versions to diplomatic incidents, and l'affaire Gruebner was no exception. The Polish account: the Polish Vice-Commissioner to Danzig went to Kaltof to investigate the sacking of a Polish customs house by a German mob; his party was attacked, compelling his chauffeur to fire in self-defense. To this the German version bears little resemblance: there was merely an orderly demonstration against ‘molestations’ of German girls by Polish officials, and Gustav Gruebner was plugged for no reason at all. The Nazi-controlled Danzig Government through the Senate President promptly demanded compensation for Butcher Gustav's bereaved relatives, apologies, and the surrender of the ‘murderer.’ The Poles made counter-demands: punishment of those guilty of the attack on the customs house, compensation for damages and assurances for the protection of Polish interests.”

As we can see, both sides were antagonizing one another, and both sides had legitimate grievances. Germany was no more nor less guilty for touching off World War II than Poland (or Britain, or France, or the US, or the USSR).

As the old saying goes, “it takes two to tango.”[\[22\]](#)

Appendix

(relevant IMT testimony; all emphasis added)

27 Aug. 46

As a Crime against Peace the SD is accused of having staged so-called border incidents before the outbreak of the war to give Hitler an excuse for starting the war. The Prosecution, however, referred to only one border incident in which the SD is alleged to have participated. That is the alleged attack on the Gleiwitz radio station.

In this connection the Prosecution made reference to the affidavit of Alfred Naujocks of 20 November 1945. This is Prosecution Document 2751-PS. The deponent of Document 2751-PS, Alfred Naujocks, was heard before the Commission. On that occasion he declared that the execution of the attack on the Gleiwitz radio station was not included in the aims and purposes of Amts III and VI.

The witness further testified that no sections of Amts III and VI were used for the execution of that border incident in Gleiwitz and that the men who with him attacked the Gleiwitz station did not belong to the SD, Amt III.

The witness also stated that by the term “SD men” in his affidavit of 20 November 1945 he did not mean the members of any definite office of the RSHA; but common usage of the term “SD men” referred to RSHA members of all offices which were subordinate to Heydrich.

The witness further stated that he was charged with the execution of the border incident at Gleiwitz, not because he belonged to Amt VI and worked there, but that exclusively personal reasons were responsible for that decision.<sup>[23]</sup> The witness testified that on the basis of the conversation he had had with Heydrich he had gained the impression that Heydrich would have given him that assignment even if he had not been a member of Amt VI and the SS. The order for the execution of this assignment reached the witness Naujocks not through the official channels of the chiefs of Aemter III or VI. The chiefs of Aemter III and VI had no knowledge of this action.

The members of the SD, Amt III and Amt VI, had no knowledge that the attack was carried out by Naujocks, a member of Amt VI. Particularly the members of the SD-Leitabschnitt which was in charge of Gleiwitz, and the outpost of the SD, had no knowledge of this activity and could not have had, because Naujocks had been forbidden to get in touch with any members of the SD whatsoever in that territory.

...I also submitted 215 affidavits for the office of the RSHA as well as for all territories of the SD-Leitabschnitte and the SD-Abschnitte, particularly for those situated in the regions of Katowice, Danzig, and Saxony. Those affidavits testify that the members of the SD during the critical time had no knowledge of the faked border incidents or the participation of the SD in them.

The affidavit by the witness Dr. Mildner (2479-PS) is refuted by the testimony of the witness Naujocks and Affidavit Number SD-11, Dr. Marx. This subject matter does not provide sufficient grounds to declare the SD to have been criminal, since this would presuppose proof of the fact that the SD as an organization was employed in the aggression, and that its members had cognizance thereof. (Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/08-27-46.asp>)

29 Aug. 46

...The Gestapo and SD were likewise involved in the commission of Crimes against Peace. The very incident that served as an excuse for the invasion of Poland, and thus set off the entire war, was executed by the Gestapo and the SD. I refer to the simulated Polish attack on the radio station at Gleiwitz. where concentration camp prisoners were dressed in Polish, uniforms, murdered, and left as evidence of a Polish raid, so as to afford Hitler a justification for the attack upon Poland.

(Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/08-29-46.asp>)

23 Aug. 46

...In this connection the Indictment makes the charge that the Gestapo, together with the SD, had artificially created border incidents in order to give Hitler a pretext for a war with Poland. Two border incidents are cited, the attack on the radio station at Gleiwitz and a feigned attack by a Polish group at Hohenlinden.

The attack on the radio station at Gleiwitz was not carried out with the participation of Gestapo officials. The witness Naujocks, who was the leader of this undertaking but did not belong to the Gestapo, has confirmed unequivocally that no member of the Gestapo participated in this action. Instructions for this undertaking emanated directly from Heydrich and were transmitted orally by him directly to Naujocks.

Instructions concerning the feigned attack at Hohenlinden were transmitted by Mueller, the chief of Amt IV of the RSHA, to Naujocks; however, Naujocks, who directed this action, has expressly denied any participation by Amt IV.

Afternoon Session

DR. MERKEL: I had gone as far as the testimony of the witness Naujocks regarding the attack on the radio station at Gleiwitz and the attack of that group near Hohenlinden. He stated that, quite naturally, it was not one of the tasks of Amt IV of the RSHA to engineer border incidents. Nor did Mueller select members of Amt IV for the purpose of staging the above-mentioned border incident, but only individuals who were in his confidence; for Heydrich did not trust the Gestapo with respect to secrecy and reliability.

Naujocks stated literally: “I cannot identify Mueller with the organization of the Gestapo.” (Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/08-23-46.asp>)

DR. LATERNSEER: Did you have knowledge of the attack on the Gleiwitz radio station?

VON RUNDSTEDT: No. (Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/08-12-46.asp>)

DR. FRITZ: Please give us examples of cases wherein you felt you were deceived.

FRITZSCHE: During this Trial the news was discussed which circulated at the beginning of the Polish war about the attack on the Gleiwitz radio station. At that time I firmly believed in the truth of the official German news. I need say nothing about this case. (Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/06-27-46.asp>)

20 Dec. 45

“3. I went to Gleiwitz and waited there a fortnight. Then I requested permission of Heydrich to return to Berlin but was told to stay in Gleiwitz. Between the 25th and 31st of August I went to see Heinrich Muller, head of the Gestapo[24], who was then nearby at Oppeln. In my presence Muller discussed with a man named Mehlhorn plans for another border incident, in which it should be made to appear that Polish soldiers were attacking German troops .... Germans in the approximate strength of a company were to be used. Muller stated that he had 12 or 13 condemned criminals who were to be dressed in Polish uniforms and left dead on the ground at the scene of the incident to show that they had been killed while attacking. For this purpose they were to be given fatal injections by a doctor employed by Heydrich. Then they were also to be given gunshot wounds. After the assault members of the press and other persons were to be taken to the spot of the incident.[25] A police report was subsequently to be prepared. (Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/12-20-45.asp>)

4 April 46

DR. NELTE: You know, of course, that this matter was connected with the subsequent attack on the radio station at Gleiwitz. Do you know anything of this incident?

KEITEL: This incident, this action came to my knowledge for the first time here through the testimony of witnesses. I never found out who was charged to carry out such things and I knew nothing of the raid on the radio station at Gleiwitz until I heard the testimonies given here before the Tribunal. Neither do I recall having heard at that time that such an incident had occurred. (Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/04-04-46.asp>)

30 Nov. 45

COL. AMEN: Will you explain to the Tribunal the nature of the assistance required?

LAHOUSEN The affair on which I am now giving testimony is one of the most mysterious actions which took place within the Amt Ausland-Abwehr. A few days, or sometime before – I believe it was the middle of August – the precise date can be found in the diary of the division –Abwehr Division I, as well as my division, Abwehr Division II, were given the task of providing Polish uniforms and equipment such as identification cards and so on, for an Undertaking Himmler. This request, according to an entry in the diary of the division which was kept not by me, but by my adjutant, was received by Canaris from the Wehrmacht Operations Staff or from the National Defense Department. I believe the name of General Warlimont is mentioned.

COL. AMEN: Do you know where this request originated?

LAHOUSEN: Where the request originated I cannot say, I can only say that it reached us in the form of an order. It was, to be sure, an order on which we, the divisional chiefs concerned, already had some misgivings without knowing what, in the last analysis, it meant. The name Himmler, however, spoke for itself, and that is also evident from entries of the diary which record my question why Herr Himmler should come to receive uniforms from us.

COL.AMEN: To whom was the Polish material to be furnished by the Abwehr?

LAHOUSEN: These articles of equipment had to be kept in readiness, and one day some man from the SS or the SD – the name is given in the official war diary of the division – collected them.

COL. AMEN: At what time was the Abwehr informed as to how this Polish material was to be used?

LAHOUSEN: The real purpose was unknown to us then; we do not know its details even today. All of us, however, had the reasonable suspicion that something entirely crooked was being planned; the name of the mission was sufficient indictment for that. (Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/11-30-45.asp>)

MR. JUSTICE JACKSON: And would you care to tell the Tribunal what you know about the fictitious incidents along the Polish border?

BODENSCHATZ: I do not know anything positive. I was asked by Colonel Williams whether I knew in advance about the incident of the Gleiwitz broadcasting section. I told him I knew nothing about it. It was only that the incidents on the Polish border were very similar to those which happened on the Czech border. It may have been presumed – that was only my opinion – that they were perhaps deliberate. But I had no positive proof that anything had been staged on our part. (Source: <http://avalon.law.yale.edu/imt/03-08-46.asp>)

[2] I am currently inquiring about the testimony of Mr. Schade and I will publish an update as soon as I have that information. It is possible that Mr. Schade based his report on what he heard from the Breslau broadcast, assuming he did hear it that night and that it contained all the necessary details, but without seeing his testimony I cannot confirm or deny this. We do not know how he got the details for this report. We also do not know exactly what was said in that broadcast. “Earwitnesses” offer conflicting testimony in this regard.

[3] Cross-examination is when the defense attorney questions the prosecution’s witness(es), in this case Mr. Schade, during a trial. Cross-examination allows the defense to present evidence via witnesses of their choosing.

[7] During an attempted kidnapping gone sour, Alfred Naujocks accidentally shot and killed Rudolf Formis, the radio technician who was operating an illegal station near Prague in behalf of Hitler’s personal enemy, Otto Strasser. Reinhard Heydrich, his superior at the time, was furious. At Venlo, just across the Dutch border, Mr. Naujocks nearly bungled the kidnapping of two British SIS agents suspected of assisting Georg Elser in the assassination attempt on Hitler at the Bürgerbräukeller—Mr. Stevens and Mr. Best. Since Mr. Naujocks did pull off the mission successfully, he was awarded the Iron Cross by Adolf Hitler.

[9] Most mainstream historians assert that deceased concentration camp inmates (referred to as Heinrich Müller’s “canned goods”) were left at the scene as opposed to just a single man. However, few of these historians agree on the number of bodies purportedly left at the scene; nor does any of these historians support their claims with reliable evidence. They all rely on conjecture and hearsay. See Heinz Höhne’s thesis, for example. (Heinrich Müller was Chief of the Gestapo throughout the war. He disappeared or died in 1945.)

[10] There are two more possibilities as to the origins of the Gleiwitz report/incident, one of which is that it is an Abwehr/Grenzpolizei fabrication, the other of which it is a Polish-British fabrication. I explore both hypotheses in detail, accompanied by a wide range of evidence, in my two-volume book on the topic. Please see Volumes 1 and 2 of The Gleiwitz Incident: Nazi False Flag or Media Hoax?, which is available directly from me or from Amazon.

[11] The Abwehr and Grenzpolizei worked intimately together throughout Canaris’s sabotage mission in Poland prior to the outbreak of war (i.e., leading up to the incident at Mosty). Unlike the SS, SD and Gestapo, IMT testimony exonerating these three agencies aside, neither the Abwehr nor the Grenzpolizei was implicated and/or condemned as criminal organizations during the IMT.

[12] If the SS was trying to be clandestine and circumspect about conducting fake border incidents, then why are they mentioned by name (SS-Verfügungstruppe) in the official White Book entry of 31 August 1939 as Entry #5? Were the Nazis so stupid? Not to mention this border incident happened at Hoflinden, not Hohenlinden or Hochlinden.

[13] Otto Radek, first lieutenant and later captain in World War I, was instructed to set up the border guard in the Gleiwitz area; he was also appointed commander in charge. Radek was a reserve officer and public-school teacher, an upstanding citizen. Beginning on 24 August 1939 the border guard was deployed in full force; they received live ammunition with the objective to safeguard the region. The Gleiwitz transmitter station was secured by 3rd Company of Border Guard Battalion 1/68.

[14] Sometime in March 1937, senior Abwehr Officer Paul Thümmel provided much significant information about the German intelligence services to Czech agents who in turn, forwarded the data to SIS London. Thümmel also delivered details about “military capabilities, and intentions” as well as “detailed information on the organization and structure of the Abwehr and SD” along with “the near-complete order of battle of the Wehrmacht and Luftwaffe, and German mobilization plans.” He later provided advance warnings of the German annexation of the Sudetenland as well as the invasions of Czechoslovakia and Poland.” (See Jeffrey Richelson, Century of Spies: Intelligence in the Twentieth Century (New York: Oxford University Press, 1995), 85.)

Before Spring 1938 came to an end, the conservative members of the German Foreign Office and many officers in the military had expressed fears about the risks of a European war initiated by Hitler. A conspiratorial group formed around General Erwin von Witzleben and Admiral Canaris as a result. Throughout the process, Canaris and subordinates such as Helmuth Groscurth worked to prevent war. Canaris participated in the plots among the military leadership for a coup against Hitler and attempted to establish covert communication lines with the British. Before the invasion of Poland occurred, the Abwehr went so far as to send a special emissary, Ewald von Kleist-Schmenzin, to London in order to warn them. (See Klaus Hildebrand, The Foreign Policy of the Third Reich (Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1973), 70–71; Richard Bassett, Hitler’s Spy Chief: The Wilhelm Canaris Betrayal (New York: Pegasus Books, 2011), 147–164; and Gerhard Weinberg, Hitler’s Foreign Policy 1933–1939: The Road to World War II (New York: Enigma Books, 2005), 585.)

[15] The only rival explanation (i.e., the official revisionist explanation) which is not without its own problems is that Polish insurgents operating out of a local bank front (i.e., the “posh Polish-bank branch” as described by Revisionist Carlos Porter) really did attack the station, and this whole thing was covered up by the Allies post facto. The incident was then turned around on the Nazis, hence the need for Alfred Naujocks’s affidavits for the IMT. But this explanation ignores the Mosty parallels completely, and it does not account for who was behind the Breslau broadcast about a shootout and scuffle at the radio transmitter station that certain “earwitnesses” claim to have heard. Of course, not only the shootout and scuffle but the Breslau broadcast in Polish and German could have been conducted by Polish insurgents, but there are conflicting eyewitness/earwitness reports asserting that NOTHING at all happened at the station. No insurgents, no nothing. I explore all possibilities in my books, without committing myself 100% to any single explanation owing to a few unanswerable questions. My hope is that my books will prompt further inquiry and perhaps we will get some definitive answers at last. What I can say with 100% certainty is that the Nazis did not conduct a false flag there or anywhere else on the border that evening/early morning.

[16] Might Mr. Schade have been working with Abwehr/Grenzpolizei subversives/traitors in this regard? Yet another possibility. It would certainly explain why he could not be cross-examined (Abwehr and fellow traitors had to be protected throughout the IMT for the prosecution's sake) and why he had to be murdered by the Allies as quickly as possible, so as not to be further questioned or allowed to talk to the public or write contradictory memoirs post facto. Bear in mind too that the Gleiwitz station manager, Herr Klose, was murdered by partisans in 1945. Odd, no?

[17] I detail all of this in my books.

[18] The Deutsches Nachrichtenbüro GmbH (DNB) was the official, central press agency of the German Reich at the time of National Socialism.

[19] CODOH readers may consult my two-volume set entitled *The Gleiwitz Incident: Nazi False Flag or Media Hoax?* for those (and many more) details.

[20] He wrote on his blog, “historians are so annoyed that they don’t have good sources, that they start unconsciously acting like the sources they do have are good. Because, you know, “it’s all we have,” and “we have to work with what we have.” Historians all too often leverage sources with hope rather than fact: a source sucks and is unreliable, but is all they have, so they treat it as authoritative and reliable. This has happened with Hitler’s Table Talk: the vast suspicion that surrounds its reliability is ignored, and it continues to be treated as the verbatim words of Hitler, when in fact it appears actually to be the words of minions recording their recollections of him, and later editors who changed up what they wanted.” See Richard Carrier, “History as a Science,” October 7, 2016, <https://www.richardcarrier.info/archives/11311> (accessed November 27, 2018).

[21] Hitler had set the invasion of Poland date as August 26, but on August 25 he called off the attack when he heard that Britain had signed a new treaty with Poland promising military support.

[22] For much more detail about this Time article and Hitler’s real reasons for war against Poland, please consult my book co-written with J. A. Sexton entitled *The Hitler Worship Cult: Distortion, Justification & Mythmaking*. We have included countless important details, such as the following: “...the German death figure of about 5,000 blew up into 58,000, and then 300,000 by the time Hitler heard about it...actual conference minutes of Hitler and his generals confirm the thesis that Hitler was willing to use force against Poland as early as March 1939 (five months prior to the alleged ‘anti-German massacres and atrocities’ and the physical invasion in August).”

"This Hitler Worship Cult myth just collapsed. Totally. Poland was not in a position to launch an offensive war against Germany, which is why Hitler used the alleged mass persecution of ethnic Germans in Poland as his public casus belli. He could not sell his war to the German (or world) public otherwise." (p. 29) Hitler never cited the purported Gleiwitz incident, not privately or publicly.

[23] Why would Heydrich request Naujocks after he (Naujocks) nearly blew the kidnapping of Stevens and Best at Venlo, and completely blew the mission to kidnap Formis? Naujocks is unreliable. Period.

[24] But we just read in the afternoon session of 23 August 1946 that “Naujocks stated literally: ‘I cannot identify Mueller with the organization of the Gestapo’.”

[25] Members of the press and other persons were never taken to the scene of the incident.

The Betrayal of Honorable Dissent: German Scientists after World War II

by John Wear

Werner Heisenberg

The end of World War II brought a crisis in Germany that is rarely mentioned in the history books. The Allied denazification program and extreme economic deprivations in Germany aroused bitterness among leading German scientists. Even vehemently anti-Nazi German scientists came to realize that the Allied occupation was a system of repression no better than what they had experienced under the National Socialist regime. This article will focus primarily on the reactions after the war of three of Germany's greatest scientists: Max von Laue, Otto Hahn, and Werner Heisenberg.

Max von Laue

German Nobel-laureate physicist Max von Laue earned an international reputation for being courageously anti-Nazi. In a speech at an annual Physicists Conference on September 18, 1933, von Laue unmistakably implied a comparison of the Nazi government's attitude toward Einstein and relativity theory with the attitude of the Inquisition toward Galileo. When Jewish chemist Fritz Haber died in January 1934, von Laue published a tribute to his former colleague in two widely read and prestigious scientific journals. Von Laue's speech and obituaries resulted in reprimands from the Prussian Ministry of Education.[\[1\]](#)

Other similar actions made von Laue an international symbol for refusal to cooperate with the Nazis. Von Laue indicated after the war that he stayed in Germany for a number of reasons, one of which was not to pre-empt badly needed positions abroad from exiled Jewish physicists. However, his primary reason for staying in Germany was "I wanted also to be there once the collapse of the 'Third Reich'—which I always foresaw and hoped for—allowed the possibility of a cultural reconstruction upon the ruins this Reich created."[\[2\]](#)

Even though he never worked on the German atomic-bomb project, Max von Laue was interned immediately after the war in England in a house named Farm Hall. Von

Laue returned after his internment to a devastated Germany. Everywhere there were severe shortages of food, clothing and shelter. German children begged for food while their parents rummaged through garbage for whatever food they could find. Von Laue wrote in 1946 to his son Theodore at Princeton: “[The Germans] are immeasurably depressed. The complete suffering of war makes itself felt only now.”<sup>[3]</sup>

Max von Laue also soon became disillusioned with the Allied denazification program. Von Laue wrote to his son: “More ‘denazification’ is going on here. My colleagues and I are now supposed to fill out our fourth questionnaire, a monster of 12 pages and with 133 questions! We declared that we are refusing to fill it out. The thing is beginning to get humiliating.”<sup>[4]</sup> Von Laue also angrily complained to his son that denazification as practiced by the Americans in particular made “every use of reason impossible.”<sup>[5]</sup>

As a courageous anti-Nazi, von Laue was frequently called upon to defend German scientists after the war. Niels Bohr, the great Danish physicist, wrote to Otto Hahn in 1946 suggesting that German scientists should publicly apologize for the treatment of scientists in countries occupied by Nazi Germany. Max von Laue responded by writing:

I hardly believe that the Germans coming into consideration would find themselves ready to do so. In any event, I am against it. Such self-evidences are not said so specifically, least of all in formal declaration. If our colleagues abroad would like to hear such declarations, documenting a distancing from the spirit of the Third Reich, they only need to take a look at the speeches that the presidents at German universities delivered at the inauguration of the new semester...<sup>[6]</sup>

Von Laue also defended the motives of German scientists who had worked on the German atomic-bomb project during the war. In a review of Samuel Goudsmit’s book Alsos, American physicist Philip Morrison stated that the Germans “worked for the cause of Himmler and Auschwitz, for the burners of books and the takers of hostages. The community of science will be long delayed in welcoming the armourers of the Nazis, even if their work was not successful.” Von Laue wrote in reply that it was a “monstrous suggestion” that German scientists as a body worked for Himmler and Auschwitz. Von Laue also said he doubted whether Goudsmit could ever write objectively about the German atomic-bomb program.<sup>[7]</sup>

Otto Hahn

German chemist Otto Hahn was also strongly anti-Nazi. Hahn and nine other German scientists were interned in England for six months after the war in Farm Hall. On November 16, 1945, the Swedish Royal Academy announced that the Nobel Prize in Chemistry for 1944 would be given to Otto Hahn for his discovery of fission.<sup>[8]</sup>

On November 10, 1946, shortly before Hahn’s departure for Sweden to receive his Nobel Prize, Hahn stated to a Swiss visitor:

You see, I had hoped for years for the time when we would be rid of the heavy mental burden of National Socialism, and how much I looked forward to being able to work freely and without hindrance. But now I am sitting here, a head without a body; I am not allowed to return to my institute because it lies in the French Zone, and I have little idea about the other institutes, and here come new people every day wanting a job or a political exonerating certificate or whatever else. I simply cannot help these people. Formerly, I really used to be a cheerful person and was actually never pessimistic, but if people just come with demands and one can hardly move for all the restrictions, I simply cannot go on. And imagine, ludicrous though it may sound, at the moment I don’t even have a sound pair of shoes to put on. So, what use is it to me if the Nobel Prize is waiting for me in Sweden, which I am not allowed to pick up because I don't get a travel permit and meanwhile, I submit one application after the next for months on end in vain for a pair of shoe soles? If they would at least send me a pair of shoe soles against the Nobel Prize account, then I wouldn't have to walk around with wet feet all the time.[\[9\]](#)

Otto Hahn was initially favorably disposed to the denazification process. However, by 1947 he had changed his mind. Hahn stated that German scientists “profoundly regret how the ‘denazification’ is flipping into its obverse through the many measures, pushing true peace further and further away.” Hahn also criticized the blatant lack of equal treatment resulting from regional variations and the many alterations to the guidelines of the denazification process.[\[10\]](#)

Otto Hahn also wrote bitterly about the exiles of German scientists to foreign countries:

Most of the older professors leave Germany very unwillingly, because they feel that their place is here. Necessity compels them, because their livelihoods and working opportunities in their country are taken away from them or else they are left in a constant state of fear of such an occurrence. All this, after our having experienced well enough what it means to replace competence with “politically irreproachable” dilettantes. But more depresses these men: the awareness that it is evidently not a matter of an honorable appointment to an independent research institution or university of some rank but (at least according to the American press) forms a part of the “reparations.” Centuries ago, princes sent their countrymen away as plantation workers or soldiers. Today, scientists are exported.[\[11\]](#)

Bitterness is a word that appears frequently in the writings of German scientists after the war. Otto Hahn wrote in 1949: “It is certainly understandable that the factory dismantlings still taking place four years after the capitulation are being greeted with bitterness, particularly among the academic youth.”[\[12\]](#)

Werner Heisenberg

Werner Heisenberg was one of the world's leading physicists before World War II. Heisenberg was awarded the Nobel Prize in Physics for 1932, and he received several job offers from American universities in the summer of 1939. Despite his aversion to National Socialism and Adolf Hitler, Heisenberg decided to stay in Germany to help train Germany's young physicists.[\[13\]](#)

Heisenberg had exuded an air of delighted confidence and appetite for intellectual combat before World War II. Arnold Sommerfeld, his professor at Munich, called him healthy, eager, full of hope, uncomplicated. Wolfgang Pauli before the war called Heisenberg a Boy Scout. Heisenberg was completely changed after the war. Physicist Victor Weisskopf wrote in his memoirs, “I saw Heisenberg after the war and he was completely changed from the man I had known...He visibly carried a load.”[\[14\]](#) Several of Heisenberg's colleagues after the war also observed that he seemed to suffer from a perpetual depression.[\[15\]](#)

Heisenberg suffered from his failure to explain his involvement in Germany's atomic-bomb program to his former friends. When Heisenberg met with Niels Bohr in August 1947, the two could not agree on even basic points of their last discussion in September 1941. Heisenberg had hoped in 1941 that he could obtain Bohr's help in reaching an agreement among physicists not to build an atomic bomb during the war. Bohr had not wanted to pursue Heisenberg's suggestion, and apparently did not trust Heisenberg's motives. Germany had driven many of its leading scientists into exile before the war, and it seemed to Bohr that Heisenberg was seeking to negate this Allied advantage in the development of atomic bombs.

Although they had been the closest of friends, Bohr and Heisenberg were unable to communicate effectively either in September 1941 or in August 1947. After a while the two great physicists felt it would be better to stop disturbing the spirits of the past. Their close friendship had been shattered.[\[16\]](#)

An important point to make concerning Heisenberg's meeting with Bohr in September 1941 is that Heisenberg had no official authority to tell Bohr anything about the German atomic-bomb project. Heisenberg had committed an act of treason by attempting to obtain an international agreement among physicists not to build an atomic bomb during the war.[\[17\]](#) Heisenberg had courageously risked his life in their meeting.

Heisenberg did not fare any better with his former friend Samuel Goudsmit. Goudsmit had written a book entitled Alsos that was highly critical of the German atomic-bomb program. Heisenberg patiently tried to explain the factual misstatements in Alsos. Goudsmit grudgingly conceded some mistakes he had made in his book, but was infuriated by Heisenberg's claim of "a sense of decency" and his insistence that a "moral decision" was involved in the question of whether German scientists would build a bomb for Germany.[\[18\]](#)

The remarkable thing about Alsos is that Goudsmit claimed to see documentation that his parents had died in a German gas chamber. Goudsmit wrote: "The world has always admired the Germans for their orderliness. They are so systematic; they have such a sense of correctness. That is why they kept such precise records of their evil deeds, which we later found in their proper files in Germany. And that is why I know the precise date my father and my blind mother were put to death in the gas chamber. It was my father's 70th birthday."[\[19\]](#)

Since Goudsmit spoke fluent German and no documentation concerning German gas chambers has ever been found, Goudsmit is certainly lying about seeing records that his parents were put to death in a German gas chamber. Yet Goudsmit hypocritically questioned the morality of the German scientists who worked on the atomic bomb. In his last letter to Heisenberg in June 1949, Goudsmit wrote he was ending their discussions because "I am afraid that we might lose our tempers."[\[20\]](#)

The subject of the German atomic-bomb program continued to remain touchy. In the fall of 1949, Heisenberg made his first trip to the United States in over 10 years. Victor Weisskopf, who was then teaching at MIT, held a reception for Heisenberg in Weisskopf's home. Approximately half of the guests Weisskopf had invited failed to appear at the reception. They all gave Weisskopf similar explanations for staying away; they didn't want to shake the hand of a man who had tried to build an atomic bomb for Hitler.[\[21\]](#)

The cold reception continued for years. In the early 1950s, Heisenberg's wife Elisabeth sat next to James Franck at a physics conference on Lake Como in Italy. Elisabeth Heisenberg told Franck that she and Werner felt terribly isolated; people treated them coldly and blamed them for things they hadn't done. Franck unsympathetically replied: "This is the way we Jews were always treated—now the Germans must live with it."[\[22\]](#)

Even Heisenberg's appetite for competition became weakened by years of postwar humiliation. In a film made in 1965, for example, Heisenberg conceded a discussion point to Paul Dirac which before the war he would have contested vigorously. [\[23\]](#)

Conclusion

German scientists were not allowed freedom of speech after World War II. The physicists released from Farm Hall were told what they were allowed to say in public and initially were allowed only to reside within the British Zone. One scientist wrote to physicist Walther Gerlach: “People are all so timid, perhaps justifiably so, for one can’t speak one’s mind as freely now anymore as during the Third Reich.”<sup>[24]</sup>

German scientists were also filled with bitterness and cynicism after the war. The Allied denazification program was especially unpopular. One German wrote in his diary: “These mindless dismissals of all former Nazis could drive one to desperation. The method only shows that the Americans are no smarter than their predecessors, the Nazis. What did a reasonable man say to me yesterday? From a mild dictatorship with its faults we have now arrived at a severe dictatorship.”<sup>[25]</sup>

Ultimately, even anti-Nazi German scientists regarded the Allied postwar occupation of Germany as merely a substitution of one hated system of restrictions with another.<sup>[26]</sup> The Allied denazification program, the forced transfer of German scientists to other countries, the restrictions on speech, and the poverty and starvation in postwar Germany created bitterness and depression among even the most anti-Nazi German scientists.

The I. G. Farben Trial

by John Wear

I.G. Farben is the short name of the corporation Interessen Gemeinschaft Farbenindustrie Aktiengesellschaft, which can loosely be translated as the Community of Interests of Dye-Making Companies.[1] I.G. Farben was by far the largest German business organization and one of the largest and most profitable corporations in the world at the start of World War II.[2]

The original International Military Tribunal (IMT) had planned to indict a prominent industrialist who typified the complicity of German business in Hitler's programs. However, the IMT refused to include an industrialist as a defendant. Instead, the decision to conduct trials of German industrialists for war crimes was left to each of the Allies.[3]

The United States filed an indictment on May 3, 1947 against 24 of I.G. Farben's leading executives. One of the defendants was dismissed for health reasons. The 60-page indictment alleged that the defendants were responsible for National Socialist Germany's war crimes. The trial, which began on August 27, 1947 in the Palace of Justice at Nuremberg, was the sixth of 12 war-crimes trials the United States held in its occupation zone after World War II.[4]

DEFENSE STRATEGY

The 23 defendants at the I.G. Farben Trial were among the industrial elite of Germany. They had little resemblance to Hitler's SA and SS members. Instead, they represented a combination of scientific genius and commercial acumen that made I.G. Farben preeminent in the world of technology and commerce. Like their counterparts in other countries, they were among the leading supporters of culture, charity and religion. They accepted official posts in the spirit of public service when their government called them.[5]

Their most-effective defense strategy was the "defense of necessity." This defense emphasized that so far-reaching were the Reich's regulations and so stringent was their enforcement that refusal to comply exposed an industrialist to imprisonment and even death. In order to survive, the defendants had to obey even the most heinous demands of Hitler's government; hence the phrase "defense of necessity." [6]

Defense attorneys put forth an argument that they thought would persuade the judges: "Replace IG by ICI for England, or DuPont for America, or Montecatini for Italy and at once the similarity will be clear to you." The defendants were honest industrialists who had worked for their country's defense—just as any patriotic American in a similar position would have done on behalf of the United States.[7]

Defense counsel also advantageously used the prevailing atmosphere of the Cold War. The defense cited Hitler's opposition to communism to explain their clients' enthusiastic participation in Germany's policies and practices. One defense attorney stated: "How right Hitler was in this outline of his policy...might be confirmed by the political situation which has developed in recent months in Europe." [8]

The defendants typically made good witnesses. Diarmuid Jeffreys writes:

In truth, the defendants were rarely tripped up, because they all stuck broadly to the same line: they were merely simple, patriotic businessmen or scientists engaged in tasks for the benefit of others. Every incriminating document had an alternative explanation; every prosecution witness was misguided or sadly misinformed. When the questioning became too rigorous they fell back on simple protestations of ignorance. No, they had never seen the report the prosecution was referring to. No, they had no recollection of that meeting. If one of their colleagues had told them such a thing, they could not remember it. It was all such a long time ago. And then, when released from the stand, they would go back to their places in the dock and, after a few whispered asides to their colleagues, reassume their pose of slightly weary detachment. It was as though they were being forced to sit through shareholders' questions at an annual general meeting, a tiresome duty that had to be endured.[\[9\]](#)

PROSECUTION STRATEGY

Josiah DuBois, the chief prosecuting attorney in the I.G. Farben trial, wanted to make sure the judges fully grasped the enormous power and influence of the organization the accused men worked for. The prosecution set up huge charts and diagrams detailing the scale and scope of I.G. Farben, and introduced into evidence a mass of supporting reports, correspondence, patent licenses and other corporate documents. However, this proved to be a tactical error. Two of the judges questioned the relevance of the testimony, and openly complained that the trial was being slowed down by documents having only the slightest materiality to the charges.[\[10\]](#)

It was not until the prosecution reached the charges of enslavement and mass murder that it began to have success. The prosecution introduced scores of witnesses who had been in Auschwitz to support these charges. Through former Auschwitz inmates, physicians and even some I.G. Farben officials, the prosecution witnesses told stories that were gruesome but still had the ring of truth. These prosecution witnesses testified to the horrific conditions at Auschwitz and Monowitz, and many testified that mass murder had taken place in the two camps.[\[11\]](#)

The defense introduced into evidence 386 affidavits in an attempt to dispute the validity of the prosecution's witnesses. The defense also attempted to counteract the damaging prosecution testimony by introducing affidavits detailing the efforts of the defendants to protect Jewish employees. For example, the Jew Carl von Weinberg fled to Italy with the aid of I.G. Farben officials. Weinberg received his pension of 80,000 Reichsmarks throughout the war at great risk to the members of the I.G. Farben hierarchy who had approved these payments.[\[12\]](#)
